Izuku curiously peered over his shoulder.

Himiko gave him an uncharacteristic smile.

“Did you need something?” Izuku asked carefully.

“Let me help you at the shooting range,” Himiko said a little too sweetly. “I need to sharpen my aim as well.”

Alone with Himiko in the training facilities?

Izuku frowned and said, “uh, no thank you.”

He turned his head forward and walked a little quicker. But he internally groaned when the footsteps behind him kept up with his pace. Himiko put a skip in her step as she caught up and walked beside him. She tilted her head with a subtle saccharine charm.

“No, really. I can join you and help manage the mechanics,” Himiko pushed. “We’ll switch off after five hours. Think of it as my way of making sure you don’t screw up our next assignment together. I’m not doing this to be nice. I promise.”

Izuku wanted to tell her to go away—but when she hooked her arm on his, he knew she wouldn’t drop it. He sighed and told himself that it was one training practice. If she tried anything he could defend himself easily; she never beat him in sparring matches anyways.

“Alright, sure,” Izuku said, giving in all the way. “You can manage the machinery.”

Himiko smiled like she’d gotten the keys to a treasure trove.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Their shooting facilities were underground in the level above the punishment basement. It was a concrete fortress with rows and rows of practice ranges. Inside each room was a large space with various objects and obstacles to test how well they could shoot from complicated angles and scenarios.

But what made The Viper Academy’s shooting range unique was how it operated. Normal shooting ranges stocked sheets of paper with faceless silhouettes and lines on them to tell the shooter how accurate their bullet was.

On the other hand, viper shooting ranges were designed to weed out empathy.

Inside each practice range were realistic dummies of a wide variety. Old. Young. Tall. Short. Every type of physical form a human could take, the range accounted for it fifty times over. This was to ensure that all vipers could go for the kill no matter who it was.

There were options for how the dummies would appear. One option was the speed of the dummies appearing and disappearing. Fast. Slow. Medium pace. The next option was of age and appearance. Old. Young. Brown eyes. Blue eyes. These options could be operated manually or automatically set.

Izuku usually chose ‘randomize’ and let the range be automatically operated.

Himiko took her place in the operating station. It was a tiny glass box suspended above the shooting range. She sat down, kicked her feet up on the control panel next to all the different buttons. While she gazed down, Izuku mechanically went through the motions as he put on the green shooting range gear. He treated this like any other training session as he loaded up the gun and cocked it.

He gave Himiko a thumbs up from the ground and she grinned.

The first dummy to appear was an elderly lady with gray hair. She was sweetly smiling in a pink dress.

Izuku easily shot a bullet through her skull.

The second dummy was of a young child of about the age of six. He had green eyes and curly purple hair.

Izuku shot him in the chest.

The third dummy was of a large man with dark brown hair and gray eyes.

Izuku shot him three times in the chest to account for his size.

This continued over and over until Izuku fell into a lull. He was operating purely from his muscle memory at this point as he emptied rounds of lead. The bodies appeared and he eliminated them just like how he was trained. He went through at least three clips of bullets until the next dummy came up.

This dummy had blond hair and green eyes.

Izuku hesitated ever so slightly. He furrowed his brow at the slip up but still shot through the skull.

Himiko ramped up the speed and numbers.

Five dummies popped up and one of them was blond. Izuku shot the other four first and there was a split second delay where he was able to shoot the blond dummy in the chest. Next, the speed increased. Izuku rapidly fired off his gun, reloading and cocking with viper level speed. More than fifteen dummies appeared at once now. Then twenty. Then thirty.

But in a short time all his movements were staggered.

One by one, each dummy slowly bled into having blond hair. Soon every blond dummy had red eyes.

Izuku stopped firing. Then all the color drained from his face. Dread sank into his spine like a rusted sword.

A sea of realistic dummies with red eyes and blond hair were staring back at him.

He carefully looked up at the control room.

Himiko smiled sickly. She silently chuckled behind the glass and waved.

Chapter End Notes

This is the last "Entr'acte" so be prepared to buckle in.

Next chapter is entitled "The Incident" and after that it'll steam roll right into the present story line. Since it's already written and edited, it'll be posted within a regular 2 weeks :) We're heading straight into hell, literally and figuratively :)

No preview because everything is a spoiler. Just think of how evil all Izuku's siblings are :^D Thank you so much! Lemme know what you think is going to happen for "The Incident"!! It's so exciting that we've finally arrived here after....350k words lol

Chapter 21: The Incident

Chapter Summary

First rule of snakes: never trust them.

Chapter Notes

Hellooooo! Welcome back to this very special chapter!!! Woooo! This is one I've been itching to write. I hope you all enjoy it and thanks for all your patience on this story! I'm having a ton of fun writing this. First, thank you to the LOML Luna for Betaing and being such an amazing sound board. She always pushes me to be my best angsty self.

Without further delay, enjoy!

Warnings: Extreme violence

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 21 — The Incident

.

.

.

Start of The Incident

Izuku didn’t finish the training session.

He hurried out of the training facilities like he’d been bitten by a real poisonous viper. Izuku could see Himiko begin to run too, and he snatched off the training gear as if it was suffocating him.

Izuku hated himself. He hated this place. He hated how he failed at keeping his one weakness concealed. Truly, he underestimated how overly observant Himiko was. She’d been keeping her eyes locked on him like a shark ready to pounce at the faintest whiff of blood—and she succeeded.

Himiko ran to Tomura to tell him what happened.

Right in step, Izuku did the same in an attempt to cover his own ass.

When they barged into Tomura's office, their older brother treated them like two children tattle telling on each other. But it was more than that. It was life or death—even if Tomura didn't know.

"Izuku has more than a preference for people with blond hair!" Himiko exclaimed. She frantically waved her hands up and down but Tomura's expression didn't seem like he cared. "The loose end also had blond hair! And now, in the shooting facilities, he hesitated on every single dummy that had blond hair!"

All of it strung together sounded outlandish.

It was like the words were floating without an anchor, Izuku noted. The center of the story was missing and because of that, her rant didn't quite make sense.

Tomura's brows furrowed together. He glanced between them not really understanding where this was going. He stayed silent, waiting for further explanation—but there was none.

Himiko knew nothing else. She kept repeating the same three points over and over until they lost their gravity. She wouldn't make sense until the real reason why Izuku hesitated with blond hair was uncovered.

When Himiko hit a wall while explaining, Izuku spoke up.

He stepped forward and blurted out the only thing that would slightly throw her off his scent:

"I've recently been sexually fantasizing about the model on the cover of my romance book," Izuku said quickly without taking a breath between words. "The model has red eyes and blond hair. That's why I have been so weird about it recently. I think that guy is handsome and I am fixated on him."

Tomura's whole expression became immediately exhaustive. He clasped his hands together and brought them up to his forehead to lean against.

He looked like he was praying for strength to deal with Izuku's idiocy.

Himiko stared at Izuku like he had finally lost it. But the twist in her face told Izuku she didn't believe him. Her cunning eyes narrowed as if she could smell the putrid lie on his lips. However, Izuku knew he didn't have to convince her—he only needed to convince Tomura.

Luckily, Tomura thought he was pathetic.

"You two are impossible," Tomura muttered. He exhaled roughly and shook his head. "I thought I told you to leave me alone for the rest of the day?"

Himiko's face dropped. She realized she was losing grip on the thin thread of truth she wrangled. She stammered, whirling on Izuku with a glare then back to Tomura.

She tried to say, "but the blond hair—" but it was no use.

“Save it,” Tomura cut down. He lifted a hand to stop her rambling and it curled into an impatient fist. “I am preparing for our next assignment with Chisaki. It’s extremely important so I don’t have time to dwell on Izuku’s strange sexual preferences.”

“I’m sorry for disturbing you, big brother,” Izuku said. He bowed and then decided to quickly switch the topics for his own sake. “What is the next assignment with Chisaki? If you don’t mind me asking.”

It was a perfect segue away from Izuku’s weakness.

Himiko was fuming beside him. She glared into his skull, but Izuku stared straight forward, ignoring her purposefully.

“We’re going to be escorting Chisaki Kai to the Tokyo Underground Council meeting,” Tomura said. “The six of us all together next week.”

Both Himiko and Izuku slightly stiffened.

The Tokyo Underground Council was extremely private. It was more of a myth than a real thing. Only a select few knew about it and even fewer knew who was on the council.

“That’s incredibly high ranked,” Himiko said seriously. Now her attention was hooked elsewhere. “Usually Nine handles all matters regarding the Underground Council.”

Tomura smirked and tilted his head. “Well, now I do.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Himiko never really dropped the blond hair revelation. It was more so buried underneath their busy lives like a tiny needle in a haystack. But she was holding on to it in case she wanted to pull that needle out and stab Izuku in the eye with it.

Izuku on the other hand took a hard stance on the lie he told. He leaned into the fabrication about him having sex fantasies involving the random model with full force. He even asked Jin about how to stop sex dreams.

It was ridiculous enough that it seemed like he was telling the truth. Because what type of viper would admit to such a silly thing? No one on their unit listened to Himiko after that, dropping the strange fiasco all together.

The next week came and all talk of blond hair and red eyes were pushed aside.

Their new focus: The Tokyo Underground Council.

The Tokyo Underground Council was a shadowy network controlling their city.

It was a deadly, but invisible, spider web that connected all corners of organized crime in Japan. At the edges of it laid all the small criminals, wannabes, and mobsters. These were mainly the people who wanted to crawl their way to the center of the gold mine.

However, at the crux lay six pillars who held it all together. Izuku heard snippets about who these six people were. Each of the six pillars in the Underground Council used codenames to stop their true identities from spreading too far. This helped them remain illusive enough that none of their lives would be in danger.

Izuku had no clue who five of the six pillars were, but he knew one: Chisaki Kai.

Chisaki's power was historically unmatched. His reign over Tokyo started when he first took over his family's yakuza syndicate. Back then, it was only the Yamaguchi-gumi that he inherited. However, underneath his governorship, Chisaki was able to unify all the other major yakuza families in Japan into his own. It happened with all the grace of a blood soaked soap opera. Once he finished absorbing every inch of his rivals, what birthed was known as the Shie Hassaikai.

He gained the underground codename of Overhaul because of it.

Now that he controlled what is the largest criminal organization in history, he sat at the head of the Underground Council. He could say jump, and everyone would do it. But he could just as easily say kill and massacre an entire city.

And because of that, Chisaki Kai was The Viper Academy's number one client.

Izuku thought about all this as he walked behind Tomura.

His brother's shoulders were squared out in a way that was similar to a General who was leading a small army. Maybe he was, Izuku thought. He looked behind himself in that moment to see the rest of the Viper Seven unit following dutifully.

They were all dressed in their signature offensive fighting gear. Izuku sported his metal mask, covering the bottom half of his face. His sleeveless bodysuit was a deep viridian green and his twin fang daggers were hooked at his hips, their green tassels swayed with every step he took.

Tomura's favorite twin machetes were pinned to his back. He was dressed in all back tech wear with chains along the sides of his hips that sported various knives. Aoyama was wearing athletic leisure in blue hues and silver highlights.

Jin wore a simple, tight black shirt, dog tags and black and gray camo pants. In contrast to him, Himiko wore her favorite body suit that adorned two red lines running vertically along her sides. Then finally Ibara wore a perfectly crisp white jumpsuit with visors as she carried the briefcase full of various poisons.

They walked out of The Academy and down the narrow pathways in Tokyo. Immediately the people of Hadeus cleared the sidewalk for them as soon as they saw Tomura. Everyone's eyes bulged wide and quickly they bowed out of the way. It was curious. Izuku wondered when Tomura made such a reputation for himself.

Ibara sauntered to the front of the pack and walked beside Tomura. She turned to him and asked, "What is the meeting about today? It has to be really important to hire all six of us."

“The meeting is about the murder of one of the six pillars,” Tomura answered easily and everyone’s head perked up. “He was slaughtered fairly gruesomely from what the rumors are.”

“Do you know who it was?” Ibara asked in a low voice.

Tomura was quiet for a moment. Then he said, “I don’t. I know it was a man that had blond hair, that’s it but that could be anyone. It’s a common color.”

Everyone digested the information. How peculiar. After that they followed Tomura into a familiar restaurant. It was the place where Izuku caught Tomura having an overly friendly moment with One and Chisaki together.

Originally, Izuku didn’t think anything of this location being where the Underground Council might be meeting. It would make sense. However, he was proven a bit wrong when they walked in and Tomura didn’t stop for a table or a private room.

Instead, the hostess in the front saw them and quickly bowed her head. Tomura nodded at her, and it was then that Tomura pulled out a silver key from his pocket. Izuku followed his brother cautiously as he led them to a door in the backroom of the restaurant.

Using the key, Tomura unlocked it and revealed a large black elevator.

Tomura swiped his Viper Academy smartwatch on the keypad. The elevator activated, glowing bright white.

The door pulled open smoothly like it was brand new. The inside of the elevator shaft was all black and dark blue fluorescent lights rimmed the edges. When they all got into the elevator, Izuku noted there was only one button. It was black, sleek, and held no number. Tomura pressed it and it lit up blue.

The doors closed on them and no one spoke a word as they dropped down.

It felt like they were falling forever, honestly.

When the elevator shaft finally stopped and the doors jerked open, Izuku was hit with an unexpected wave of nostalgia .

His face shifted into pure shock.

All around were tall old, mythical-like pillars.

“Wait,” Izuku whispered. He walked out of the elevator and stared. “This is…”

“Yes.” Tomura wrapped an arm around Izuku’s shoulders and leaned down. His eyes were full of pride and mirth as he spoke. “This is your old pathway to the outside, Izuku. I owe you a big thank you for introducing this place to me all those years ago. Some good came from your delinquency.”

Izuku gazed on, struggling to comprehend what he was seeing.

The once abandoned flood system was now a fully functional underground city. Dozens, no, hundreds of people were weaving in and out down below like ants into newly crafted buildings.

The pillars were no longer a dull gray but a sleek black. Every pillar supported bridges, buildings, and balconies that all wove across each other like spiderwebs. The whole space was illuminated seductively with deep, dark colors such as maroon, mauve and sapphire.

All six Vipers stood next to each other on the balcony of the elevator. They looked down as a stray gust of wind from below bellowed upward.

“Welcome to the new Hadeus,” Tomura informed everyone. “It’s the official underground society come to life. I’ve been working with Chisaki to build this for the last ten years. This is the first level, limbo. In total there are nine levels, each going further down into the ground. To keep everything organized, each level is a different floor of operations and referred to as a ‘circle’.”

Izuku was transfixed.

This was incredibly intricate.

“Holy shit,” Himiko exclaimed in awe. “Would I be able to find a gambling spot here?”

“Yes,” Tomura said with a nod. “To find anything related to gambling, buying or trading you would go to the Fourth Circle: Greed.”

Jin gave a low whistle and curiously tilted his head. “What about sex things?” He mischievously asked. He grinned when Tomura frowned deeply and narrowed his eyes. “I know a place like this gotta have at least a dozen sex clubs.”

“…Second Circle: lust,” Tomura answered with a sharp, chastising tone. “Try not to let yourself indulge too much.”

“This is so cool,” Aoyama muttered. He gazed down at the sea of neon lights. “This is like a perfect paradise for people like us.”

“Precisely,” Tomura said. “We can exist here without judgment.”

Izuku became conflicted the longer he observed the new Hadeus.

This was a piece of his childhood that was attached to Kacchan. It was odd seeing the very place that brought him to the plaza of the broken angel twisted into something like this. A lot could change in a decade.

“What circle is the council meeting in?” Izuku asked quietly.

“The council will be meeting in the Sixth Circle,” Tomura answered. “That’s where we’re heading now, follow me.”

They all trailed behind Tomura as he walked down the stairs.

Then, they were fully immersed in the first circle of hell.

ᔓᔓᔓ

As they descended, Izuku began to see how unique each circle was.

The first circle, which was called Limbo, was more so for anything. People wandered around there looking sort of lost or searching to get into gangs. The buildings up there were a sanctuary for anyone who needed a place to sleep. Or even quick stops for operations that weren't terribly important.

By the time they reached the second circle, Izuku realized why Tomura answered Jin the way he did. It was a red light district with the same, vast structure as the first circle. All around were underground sex operations and sex workers. Pretty men and women beckoned to them as they passed by underneath the cardinal and fuchsia colored lights.

When they walked down further, they came across the third circle. The green lights flickered brightly above them with hints of yellowish and blue undertones. All around them were restaurants and banned substances that were illegal within Japan.

Their earpieces lost signal by the fourth circle underneath deep, golden lights.

It was here that Tomura posed a very important question. He would never have asked it if they weren't this far underground.

"How do you all feel about Nine?" Tomura asked. He clasped his hands behind his back and curiously glanced at them over his shoulder. "No need to bite your tongues, I won't tell him. This is private between us."

Izuku was taken back at the sheer gall.

Everyone else seemed to be as well based on their silence. But as it stretched on, the six of them exchanged speculative glances. In the corner of Izuku's mind, Hiryu's ghost joined them and studied them curiously.

Izuku didn't know what to say. He didn't like Nine but the fear inside of him instilled by their handler was something powerful. Talking down about Nine felt like they were trespassing on property that was bound to get them skinned.

"I respect him, I suppose," Himiko said with a shrug. "We don't really have much of a choice."

"Yeah." Aoyama nodded, agreeing with Himiko. "It's hard to like him but I respect him."

"Well I say fuck him," Jin spat. "I never really liked the guy. I think he gets off on torturing us in the basement."

Izuku and Ibara stayed quiet until Tomura turned his wintry gaze on them.

Ibara shifted on her feet. “I think he manages poorly,” she admitted. “We haven’t had any new kids in a long time and he should have figured out a way around that a while ago.”

“I agree with Ibara,” Izuku decided to say.

He truthfully didn’t. He was happy there were no other kids being sold to The Academy. He found a specific type of peace knowing the cycle might end with his cohort.

“Interesting,” Tomura muttered.

He sucked his teeth as if taste-testing what he was about to say.

“I have something I want to admit to you all as well,” Tomura continued. “I have been working with Chisaki privately without Nine’s permission or knowledge. It started about ten years ago when Nine let me accompany him on a mission with Chisaki.”

Everyone grew eerily quiet.

Private assignments off books? That was one of their taboos. They weren’t supposed to operate without their handler’s knowledge—yet here Tomura was doing it for ten years.

Izuku was both impressed and terrified.

“I saw a vision of a future for us back then,” Tomura said slowly. “I tried to tell Nine about my plans, but he dismissed me like a child. He said I was dreaming too big for someone who was a Viper. We’re supposed to be mindless weapons not leaders.”

“He’s not wrong,” Aoyama touched upon. “We are only assassins. That’s our purpose in life.”

“I know,” Tomura agreed. He nodded his head then tilted it as if seeing life from another angle. “But I want to be the leader of the Tokyo Underground Council one day—and I want to be more powerful than Nine himself. I want to make Vipers more than merely deadly assassins. I want to give us power and a position in the underground other than simply being useless men’s weapons.”

“Bold claim,” Jin said slowly. “How will you do that?”

“I…I don’t know yet,” Tomura admitted. This was the first time he ever sounded unsure. “I’ve become very close and friendly with Chisaki recently. He likes me more than he likes Nine, and he wants me to handle all cases involving him because of it. It didn’t make Nine happy—but he has to do what Chisaki says. I can find a way to power through Chisaki if I work with him long enough.”

“I kind of like the sound of this plan,” Ibara decided. She folded her arms seriously and her gaze grew solid. “What’s your next move then?”

“Well. Luckily someone brutally murdered one of the six pillars. Because of that, there’s an open spot available on the council now,” Tomura said. “Crime lords from all over the country are trying to bribe Chisaki or prove themselves in his eyes to get the seat. But I think I can obtain it.”

Himiko scoffed and announced, “Now you’re sounding ludicrous. You’re not a crime lord and you don’t have enough money to bribe the Yakuza heir with. How are you ever going to get that seat compared to all the other more qualified assholes gunning for it?”

Tomura shrugged.

“Not sure,” Tomura said. “The only thing I can think of is a trade. I have to find something Chisaki would want so badly that he would give me a place at the table in exchange for it.”

Izuku discarded everything Tomura said after that.

This was an unreachable dream. His brother was always the most driven of their family, so it shouldn’t surprise him that Tomura’s ambition went this far. He scored high on tests. He held the highest rank. He was the one who Nine trusted the most. It’s why every Viper admired him like he was a God amongst men, everyone was eager for his validation.

Tomura was a perfect Viper—but that’s all he was.

At the end of the day Tomura was a nobody who was sold into human trafficking like the rest of them.

He had no possessions that Chisaki didn’t already have a hundred times over.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they finally reached the sixth circle, the lights surrounding them were all bright white. It was set up in a way that was clearly the circle of corporate operations. Everything here was perfectly neat in a way that Izuku could have mistaken the building they walked into for one in the Tokyo business district.

They met Chisaki in a small room that was underneath several locks and needed several keys.

The Yakuza Heir was dressed in an all gray pinstripe suit that made his golden eyes stand out. His skin was an unearthly type of pale and the hair on his head was a sleek reddish brown. Chisaki ran his long boney fingers over the expensive green faced Rolex on his wrist as someone next to him talked about various drug shipments to China.

He donned a bored, unfazed expression encompassing his sharp features when he finally acknowledged their presence.

Tomura bowed deeply at the waist. In sync, each of them lined up in numeric order according to their mark with Izuku standing at the end of the line. They all bowed at the same time and placed their arms behind their backs.

“Good evening, Mr. Chisaki,” Tomura said in a polite voice. “We’re here reporting for duty.”

When they all unbowed, Izuku saw Chisaki scan them up and down.

“Ah. My first time meeting The Viper Seven in person,” Chisaki said in a flat tone. His bored eyes roamed their unit. Then he raised one of his arched brows suspiciously. “There’s only six of you.”

“Obsidian Viper is on a permanent assignment overseas,” Tomura answered fluidly. “He won’t be joining us.”

“What a fuckin’ liar,” Hiryu’s phantom groaned. He unhappily huffed in the darkest corner.

“Shame,” Chisaki muttered. “I was hoping to see all my merchandise today considering how much I paid. The price for the full unit made me go to another company to see if they might be cheaper, but atlas, no one really offers the same level of training as The Academy.”

“We’re always thankful for your patronage,” Tomura said with a fake smile. “Glad no one can beat out our impeccable skill set.”

Chisaki strolled by them carrying an air of languor.

He assessed each one of them without haste and also without interest. Izuku knew this man was entirely disinterested in them. To him, they were merely wallpaper to be plastered in the background for this meeting. Izuku supposed they were only a form of deadly decoration in comparison to how much influence Chisaki possessed.

When Chisaki strolled by Izuku, Izuku was expecting him to keep going like he’d done for the rest of their unit.

However, when Chisaki passed him the man stopped.

He backtracked slightly, and did a double take. A small spark of interest bled into his face as he cut his eyes at Izuku.

Izuku stiffened underneath the yellow gaze.

From the front of the line, Tomura turned his head towards the interaction.

“Freckles,” is all Chisaki said with a curious tint. “I don’t think we’ve met before. I’m guessing you’re the Viridian Viper?”

Izuku nodded dutifully. “I am, sir.”

Chisaki tilted his head at Izuku. “What’s your real name?”

Izuku was taken back. He turned his eyes to Tomura for a clue of what to do. His brother was staring hard with his lips in a thin line. Slowly, Tomura walked over and stood behind Izuku like a looming shadow. Tomura sat both his hands on Izuku’s smaller shoulders with a protective grip.

“His name is Izuku,” Tomura answered for him in a powerful voice. “He’s my little brother.”

Chisaki cut his eyes to Tomura.

Izuku didn't have to see his brother to know he was giving his signature stare of dominance. Chisaki nodded, as if approving of the name, then he reached forward to tap the metal mask on Izuku's face.

"Can we remove this for the night? It feels suffocating," Chisaki said.

Izuku thought for certain his brother was going to say 'no'. It was Izuku's safety net to hide his emotions that he could barely keep a lid on. But to Izuku's surprise, Tomura removed his hands from his shoulders and unclasped the mask. He gingerly removed it from Izuku's face and then brushed a stray curl behind his ear.

Izuku's heart rate sped up. He felt inexplicably nude.

"Incredible. Your face is perfectly symmetrical," Chisaki whispered in awe. "I've never seen this level of exquisiteness before."

Chisaki drew close, getting personal. Izuku stayed as still as a statue like he was trained as Chisaki reached up and grabbed his chin. Chisaki turned his head side to side much like Nine in the past.

"He is quite beautiful, isn't he?" Tomura agreed.

Chisaki glanced down at the daggers attached to Izuku's hip. He reached and grabbed one of the swinging tassels and caressed it lightly.

"Deathly so," Chisaki agreed with an air of intrigue.

Izuku relaxed his arms, breaking his stance. His limbs fell to his side and the motion brought Chisaki's eyes down to his arms.

Suddenly the glimmer of admiration left as quickly as it came. Chisaki's lips curled over his teeth and he reeled his head back. He took a generous step away.

The sudden cold switch confused Tomura and Izuku.

It was then Izuku and Tomura both followed Chisaki's line of sight.

Chisaki was staring in disgust at the damage Tomura inflicted on Izuku from various sessions of 'punishments'. Izuku's arms were littered with blue, purple, and even some yellow bruises. Jagged cuts and scrapes from assignments were layered across the bruises. However, what stood out the most were the angry, red welts from where Tomura had beaten him fiercely with the belt over and over and over.

"A battered beauty, what a shame," Chisaki muttered like he was disillusioned. "Such ugly marks too. You were nearly perfect."

Chisaki gave a long, disappointed exhale. He fell back into his bored demeanor and turned away from Izuku like the whole interaction never happened.

Izuku didn't think much of it and wrote it off as weird rich-guy behavior. Chisaki wasn't the first person to comment on his looks and he wouldn't be the last.

"Well, the meeting will start shortly," Chisaki announced. With a single head nod he signaled for his secretary to grab the clipboard and pen. "We should be heading over to that part of the building now to ensure we'll be on time."

All the Vipers slipped directly into their killer personas.

Everyone except Tomura, that is.

Instead, Tomura studiously glanced between Izuku, Chisaki, and the bruises on Izuku's skin.

He pursed his lips to the side and the gears in his head turned.

The room where the council was meeting was grand and golden. The rug that spread across the floor was full of delicate, organic designs. He looked closely at the woven birds and wondered how expensive this thing was.

On top of that rug was a medium sized table that held six chairs. There was a single chair at the head of the table.

They walked around Chisaki and his secretary in the formation of a protective circle with their weapons drawn as he took his seat. Tomura took his stance next to Chisaki's chair and signaled for the rest of them to line up behind their client's seat.

Like a storm, in came the other four pillars.

They were some of the most dangerous yet intelligent looking individuals. They all walked in with at least five to ten guards, and the aura around them was untouchable. Judging by the amount of weapons strapped to everyone, Izuku knew not a soul in this room trusted each other.

The first person to walk in was a lanky ginger man with a pointy nose. His codename was Re-Destro. His eyes were a dull green and his hairline was receding in an M shape. He was dressed in an expensive green suit and copper jewelry. He lit a fat cigar between his boney fingers as he took his seat.

The next person was a young woman with gorgeous brown skin and long lilac hair. Her codename was revealed to be Curious. Her flowy hair swayed as she walked in with a glamorous, long navy blue dress. She puffed up the expensive fur shawl on her shoulders as her turquoise eyes surveyed the room.

The third person to walk in was a tall woman with deep red hair. Her hair reached to her waist and her bangs were cut at chin-length. Her codename was said to be Slice. Her skin was glossy and looked healthy. But along her thighs were knives and her purple dress was decorated in sharp weapons.

The last person to walk in caught Izuku's eye.

It was a tall, built man with sleek black hair. Around his neck was a necklace made of human molars and on his back was a long rusted katana embedded with blood stains. His cunning eyes were like bullseyes as he took the time to assess everyone. His codename was known to be Stain.

All four people took their seats. They skipped hellos and began the meeting when Chisaki folded his hands.

Izuku originally zoned out for the first three hours of the meeting.

The five pillars talked about operations in extreme code. Any location was referred to as a fruit, and within their sentences the pillars used random latin terms such as sepelio, excessum and letum. It all made sense why Tomura pushed to learn Latin so long ago.

It wasn't until about half way through the meeting did Izuku catch a bit of the convo that hooked his attention.

"My entrapment with the bribes didn't work," Stain barked. The large man wrinkled his face and balled his fist up. "That brat is more of a savage brute than I would have guessed. He spat on my Persian rug like he was raised by goddamn wolves."

"So he's hotheaded. I guess it's genetic," Chisaki muttered. He still looked bored as he leaned his head in his hand. "Did you get the information on him I asked for?"

"Yes, I did." Stain snapped his fingers and one of his men stepped forward.

Stain's lackey revealed a black folder that was brimming with documents. It was lofty and slightly disorganized. The lackey walked it over to Chisaki with an anxious expression, clearly terrified of the Yakuza Heir. Izuku resisted the urge to strain his neck to see what was inside, his view was obstructed by Chisaki's large chair.

"I must say I am delightfully shocked by what we uncovered," Stain said with a chuckle. "I think you'll be interested in bringing in the brat. We could mold him to be one of the most ruthless crime lords in history. He has the greatest bloodlust I've ever seen in someone so young."

"I have no interest in that," Chisaki said. His eyes remained uninterested as he plucked a flimsy photograph from the folder. He held it up and tilted his head to the side. "This right here is what I am interested in."

Izuku wished he could see what the photograph was based on all the confused reactions.

"Her?" Stain frowned. "She's merely some random gambling addict. What about the fact that brat is that dead bastard's son?"

Stain angrily gestured to the empty seat next to him.

“Pointless information given this kid is about to be an orphan,” Chisaki muttered. “I almost feel sorry for him for having such a terrible set of parents.”

Curious spoke up now. She jutted her chin to the photograph in Chisaki’s hand. “So you’re planning on killing the mother, Overhaul?”

“Yes, I am,” Chisaki answered with no inflection.

“Why, might I ask?” Slice butted in. She frowned as she looked between Chisaki and the photo. “This doesn’t seem very much like you.”

“It’s not like me, honestly. But this whole thing is troublesome,” Chisaki answered. “I loaned this woman about a million yen and sheltered her in a Yakuza safe house. She was hiding from child protective services and told me she left her kid with a relative in the meantime. I took pity on her. But then she proceeded to steal my dead grandmother’s pearls from underneath me and fled without repaying her debts.”

“Sounds like a petty crime,” Slice said.

“Debts are debts,” Chisaki firmly reminded her. “That is our motto and we should start enforcing it.”

“How long ago was this?” Curious asked.

“It was about thirteen years ago,” Chisaki answered then shrugged. “No one remembers it. But I figured I would clip this loose end while I have the chance. The sixth pillar always let too many things slide and who’s to say his death isn’t the fruition of his sloppiness.”

“Allow me to kill the brat’s mother for you then,” Stain offered. He snidely smiled as he placed his hand above his heart. “He made a mockery of me. My people are waiting for me to teach him a lesson.”

Chisaki broke his relaxed demeanor and frowned. His eyes narrowed on Stain, and everyone else stiffened.

“Are you asking me to help save your reputation because you decided to make a sloppy show?” Chisaki asked.

“Yes,” Stain clarified with mild hesitation. He cleared his throat awkwardly. “It’s a matter of optics. I’m sure you understand.”

“I don’t,” Chisaki cut down in a clipped tone. “I think the way you handle things is as sloppy as our dead ally. Given how your failed entrapment of his kid went, It would be foolish to entrust this to you. I’ll give it to a Viper instead. They always get the job done—you? Not so much.”

It was obvious Stain was resentful of that answer.

He dug his gaze into Chisaki for a second too long.

All the Vipers in the room reached for their weapons and in turn all of Stain's henchmen reached for theirs. The tension in the air spiked to new degrees as the murderous intent dripped all over the floor.

Stain then wearily glanced at the The Vipers surrounding Chisaki.

When Tomura's face darkened into a lethal glower like a cobra, Stain reluctantly bowed his head.

"Of course, Overhaul," Stain muttered. "My apologies for asking."

All the Vipers relaxed their stances and shortly after so did Stain's henchmen.

Chisaki turned his nose up and shook his head like he was dealing with a spoiled brat.

"May I propose that Stain take credit for the kill?" Curious suggested. She smiled sweetly as she leveled with their leader. "Optics are important. No one knows this woman owes you money but everyone knows this kid openly disrespected Stain. If we are to keep our allyship strong, we have to make sure we look unforgiving to the public eye. Otherwise we'll begin to look collectively weak."

Chisaki thought about it for a moment.

Then he waved his hand as if he didn't want to dwell on the topic any further.

"Sure," Chisaki said without much concern. "I suppose that's fine. As long as she's dead I don't care who takes credit."

Stain perked up.

A grotesque smile encompassed his shadowy features.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the meeting ended Chisaki made them wait inside of a small room with him.

It was an off-site office space for Yakuza business. Inside the room were the bare minimum utilities. A printer. A chair. A shelf and a window to see the underground sixth circle. Chisaki sat at a large mahogany desk as he wrote down something and off to the side his secretary was typing on their laptop.

As they waited in silence, Tomura's arms were folded. A small furrow creased his brows as he stared at the welts along Izuku's arms. Izuku didn't think much of it, but he was beginning to feel self-conscious underneath Tomura's calculating gaze.

Tomura probed his tongue into his cheek as his eyes roamed up and down Izuku's figure.

"Vipers," Chisaki suddenly called, snapping them all into formation. Chisaki's secretary stepped forward holding a thin, simple red folder. "I have a new assignment ready for you—specifically for Blood Viper."

Himiko stepped forward and bowed.

“Please make sure the scene is clean,” Chisaki said. His secretary handed Himiko the folder gently. “I don’t want it tied back to me since Stain is going to take credit for this.”

Himiko nodded dutifully and stepped back in line. She thumbed quickly through the folder then paused at something. Himiko cut her eyes to Izuku. She then stood up straight, closed the folder quickly, and cleared her throat.

“I think this would be a better job for the Viridian Viper,” Himiko said. “He’s the better poison sniper between the two of us. I can still accompany him though. Two Vipers are always better than one.”

All the Vipers in the room looked at her oddly then glanced at Izuku.

Izuku frowned, baffled. What was her angle?

He stared at her, but she didn’t give him the satisfaction of a single bit of attention. She clutched onto the red folder tightly as she looked straight forward.

Chisaki raised a thin brow at the two of them. Then he looked at Tomura.

“Is that true?” Chisaki asked.

Tomura was hesitant, but still nodded. “Yes. Izuku is the better sniper between the two.”

“Alright, fine,” Chisaki agreed, then turned to his secretary with a small nod. “Change it over to Viridian Viper.”

The secretary stepped forward, took the red folder from Himiko and drew up a new form. He made amends to have the case switched over from Himiko to Izuku. Then he walked to hand it to Izuku—but Himiko grabbed a hold of it.

“I’ll hold it,” Himiko said kindly. “My baby brother has delicate hands.”

Himiko’s golden gaze pierced through Izuku. A falsely sweet smile spilled upon her lips, and she earned several peculiar glances.

Suddenly, the ghost of Hiryu was hanging over his shoulder, casting a cold shadow.

ɯɯɯ

Night before The Incident

The entire train ride to Yokohama, Himiko ignored him.

He looked at her sideways as they departed for their assignment. She didn’t give him anything other than a tight smile as she privately read the details and instructed them where to go.

Anytime he tried to force her to crack, she sneered.

“Show me the folder, Himiko,” Izuku said sternly once they were a couple stops away from Yokohama.

“There’s no need,” she quipped. She dug some dirt from under her thumbnail. “You don’t even like looking at the folder details. Why do you want to know?”

“Because you’re acting strange,” Izuku said. “And I don’t trust you.”

At that, Himiko laughed.

“I’m only here to accompany you, don’t worry,” Himiko reassured. She kicked her feet up in the seat across from her. “I want to make sure you don’t screw up like last time. I’m watching you closely.”

Izuku leaned back in the chair and crossed his arms. He decided to just let whatever she was playing at take its course. She didn’t know exactly why he didn’t pull the trigger last time. Plus, they were sniping someone from a long distance.

What could possibly go wrong?

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku walked onto the rickety rooftop with caution.

The tiles underneath his feet were unstable and clearly neglected. In the dead of night there were hundreds of windows in range from this vantage point. Izuku kept himself peeled for whatever Himiko might pull. He carefully studied her as he set up his sniper rifle. She smiled at him right back holding the folder.

“Which one is it?” Izuku asked impatiently.

Himiko smiled with fever. She pointed slowly across the way with a long, slender finger.

“That one,” she said in a lilting voice. Izuku followed her finger to a small window. Yellow light was pouring from it. It was the only window with a light in the expensive apartment complex.

Izuku took his stance.

He kneeled down on the jagged rooftop and gripped his rifle. He tilted his head and peered through the bullseye. He scanned for the target——and his heart dropped when he was met with a strange visual.

On the couch was a woman with scarlet red eyes and ash blonde hair.

Izuku snatched himself backwards and whipped his head at Himiko.

His devious sister smiled back at him.

“This isn’t the time to play games with me,” Izuku hissed. “Chisaki is not the person we can screw up assignments for. Where is the real mark?”

“I’m not playing any games,” Himiko informed. “This is the mark.”

She then plucked a picture from the red folder and turned it around with two fingers.

Izuku stood up and snatched it from her. He looked at the photograph, trying to tell himself it wasn’t real. But it was. The exact same woman on the couch was in this photo. She was carrying a bundle of pink carnations with a bright smile on her face. But worse, she had a lopsided type of smile. One that felt eerily symmetrical to Kacchan’s.

Himiko smirked when all the color washed away from Izuku’s face.

“I told you. She’s the mark,” Himiko said, rubbing it in. She continued to read the address out loud to him, confirming this was the correct location. When she finished, she snapped the folder shut and smiled with a glimmer of satisfaction. “Now, take the shot.”

Izuku swallowed and stilled his nerves.

His gaze hardened as he turned his attention back through the bullseye. He positioned himself with perfect aim. One bullet. One bullet. That’s all it would take. He looked at the woman who was snuggled into her couch. She was eating a bowl of popcorn and rotating puffing on a cigarette. Around her neck were the pearls Chisaki mentioned.

Izuku tried to move his finger on the trigger, but instead it ran ice cold.

Fear began swelling inside of him.

Himiko squatted directly next to him and leaned in.

“I said, take the shot, Izuku,” she commanded slowly.

Izuku exhaled through his nose as he told himself the same thing. He could do it. He could—but the longer he looked at the mark the longer he felt like he saw Kacchan. He then thought he hallucinated a potential resemblance with the stranger. Suddenly, it wasn’t one red string wrapped around his heart—it was two.

He attempted to pull the trigger a second time and saw Kacchan smiling at him in the nook.

He attempted to pull the trigger a third time and saw the handsome stranger smiling at him in Vienna.

Izuku grew more and more distraught every time he failed to pull the trigger. Each instance he was stopped by the clenching in his chest. He was bombarded with a tango of scarlet red eyes boring into him. Abruptly, his heart felt like it was collapsing under weight. Izuku struggled to breathe and the sinister presence of Himiko next to him made him slowly panic.

She knew.

“I think I finally found your weakness, baby brother,” Himiko chuckled darkly.

Izuku began to shake. He reeled back with his eyes wide.

“Please,” Izuku said. He slowly shook his head, begging for an ounce of mercy. “You know. Fine, but I can’t—I can’t do it—”

“Why red eyes and blond hair?” She pushed. “Why does that specific combo fuck with you?”

“Himiko,” Izuku warned from between his teeth. “Please. Leave this alone.”

His eyes dangerously darkened.

“Y’know, I thought about this after the training session,” she said. She tilted her head while her eyes darkened the same way as Izuku. “I couldn’t quite figure it out at first. I did believe all that bullshit about the model originally. But the more I thought about it—I kept thinking about that loose end. Especially—how he looked at you from that train window.”

“What are you getting at?” Izuku cut off.

“He looked at you like he knew you,” Himiko spat. “Like if you pulled the trigger it would be a betrayal.”

“Don’t do this,” Izuku pleaded.

“Oh, I’m going to do this and more,” she said happily. “I couldn’t shake the feeling about that loose end. So I decided to go digging for information—so I got Aoyama black out drunk. I figured I would go straight to who you’re closest with to see what’s going on. But Imagine my surprise when he blabbed about him and Tomura having to forge documentation for you. You have missed dozens of marks.”

Izuku’s heart dropped straight to the floor.

“Do you know what happens to vipers that cross Nine, Izuku?” Himiko asked.

The coldness from Izuku’s trigger finger crept up. It spread from his hand to his arm, and deep into his veins until Izuku felt like his bones were crafted of very fragile ice.

“They die,” Himiko said with delight.

Izuku’s shaking grew steadily like a building earthquake until all the dreadful moments compiled. With glee, Himiko pushed him out the way and took a hold of the sniper rifle. He stumbled backwards and stared in horror at her. His body was paralyzed because she knew about the documentation forging.

She cocked the weapon—something Izuku failed to do.

She kneeled into position as she smirked at him.

“I’m going to have a fun time informing Chisaki that your defect prevented you from taking the shot,” Himiko said. “Then I’m going to have a goddamn field day exposing you, Tomura and Aoyama’s little facade. I feel like Nine will spare Tomura because well, he’s Tomura. Aoyama will probably be demoted and no longer trusted with company records. But you—as defected as you are—he’s going to exterminate you.”

She grinned as she turned her attention to the window.

She looked through the bullseye and put her finger over the trigger.

“I hope you enjoy your fall from grace, Izuku. Because when you land, it’ll be in a coffin.”

Izuku couldn’t say what came over him. He knew his mental block was strong, but what happened next felt like slow motion.

Himiko moved her trigger finger.

In a flash, Izuku envisioned her shooting Kacchan through the heart.

His body moved on its own and he plunged forward. He dived directly into her and the gun. The rifle tilted up, firing the bullet straight into the sky. At the same instance, Himiko and Izuku went tumbling into the loosened tiles of the roof. Her head hit the hard surface with a sharp crack and the skin on Izuku’s palms was scraped off against the uneven surface.

He hissed in pain and jerked his head behind him. His eyes widened when the rifle went toppling over the edge off the roof. It hit the ground with a shattering sound. He then snapped his head to look beneath him and there was Himiko—nearly knocked out.

Izuku’s breath caught as he stared at her limp body.

He carefully turned her over to inspect her head damage, fearful of the worse.

But before he could look, a loud groan echoed into the night. He retreated his hand and Himiko’s eyes slowly blinked open. Her head swayed as she struggled upright on her forearms. Her eyes were wide as Izuku scrambled away from her.

She touched the back of her head. When her hand pulled back, there was dark crimson blood oozing down her fingers.

They stared at each other in shock.

The wind howled loudly. Izuku swore he heard the faintest bit of Hiryu’s voice come with it.

“Run,” Hiryu whispered.

Izuku did.

Izuku took off in the direction of the exit as if the wind was carrying his feet. Several bullets went flying by his head and he ducked the best he could. A scolding hot bullet nicked his pocket, and the impact made him hiss out loud.

He made a mad dash for the door, and successfully locked it behind him. A loud pounding on the door followed mimicking booming thunder. Himiko's shrill voice was like lightning cracking in their ever growing storm.

Suddenly, Izuku could hear Himiko call someone—and he knew it wouldn't be Tomura.

Izuku then tried to call Tomura to warn him about what Himiko knew. He reached for his pocket but was mortified to find his phone impacted with a bullet. He desperately tapped the shattered screen and tried to turn on the device but it was no use. It was as dead as he was.

"Hello? Nine?" Izuku then heard Himiko say.

Izuku's heart plummeted.

He didn't stay to hear the conversation.

He backed away from the steel door and retreated down the empty building. He didn't know how much time he gave himself, but he knew it wasn't much. From up above he heard Himiko shoot the lock clean off the door and slam it open.

Izuku used all his stamina training as he jumped down the stairs to land on his feet with staggering impact. He ran out a side door of the abandoned building and straight into a dark alley. Faintly behind him he could hear Himiko chasing him.

Giving himself more speed, Izuku zig zagged around several corners and narrow pathways. With every corner that he turned he saw Hiryu's phantom standing in the darkest shadows, bleeding out of the bullet holes Izuku put in his body.

His mind was pounding with panicked thoughts.

He screwed up beyond Tomura being able to fix this. What's worse, he got Tomura and Aoyama mixed up in his defect. Panic captured Izuku's heart as he tried his best to outrun the grim reaper over his shoulder. He tried to think of scenarios this could play out in his favor but he knew there would be none—

—Sudden, hot pain swelled in Izuku's inner thigh.

Izuku hissed out loud and stumbled on his feet at the sensation.

He leaned against a dirtied brick wall in confusion. He panted heavily as he gripped his thigh.

"Fuck," he hissed. "Why now?"

Izuku cursed himself for potentially pulling a muscle or pinching a nerve in this type of moment.

With impatience, Izuku kneaded into the spot to ease the pain. He wearily gazed over his shoulder, feeling the clock ticking on him.

To his dismay, the pain didn't go away—it grew.

Izuku heard Himiko's footsteps get close. He sucked in a deep breath and took off again.

Memories of Hiryu's cold, dead body hovered close to him. He could feel the clammy skin of his deceased brother pressed against him with every step he took. He ducked quickly through a maze of allies into a sketchier part of the city that had a darkly tinted nightlife.

Izuku knew a gangster when he saw one, and he could see several as he came to the mouth of one narrow pathway. He found himself in what felt like a secret club scene as several eyes were on him.

Izuku didn't waste time. He ran past all the curious goons towards the nearest ally.

Izuku looked behind him for a split second—then came to a crashing halt when he collided with someone.

Him and the person went flying down into the pavement and both of them groaned loudly. Izuku hissed, arching his back at the pain. The heat in his thigh was increasing, slowly becoming numbing.

He frantically opened up his eyes to see soft, pink carnation petals raining down like soft snow. Izuku turned to see his blond stranger holding a now ruined bouquet of pink carnations. Both of their hair was littered with the gentle flower petals. Izuku quickly gazed past the stranger, chest heaving.

For the first time in his life, Izuku didn't care about seeing this man.

The stranger groaned and sat up on his forearms. He grabbed his head and shook it.

"What the actual fuck?" The deep voice barked. "Watch where you're going dumbass—"

Piercing red eyes snapped up to glare at him.

"Deku?!" The stranger hissed immediately. "Oh, fuck no. You're not messing up my assignment tonight. I have places to be in the morning—"

The stranger immediately pulled out his knife and swung it. Izuku, stunned at the action, quickly put his hand up in defense. He moved too late and the sharp knife cut through his skin, gashing his palm deeply. Izuku yelled and curled his hand into his chest.

The stranger stopped mid-second-swing the second they locked eyes.

Izuku's bloodshot eyes pleaded with him in silence. The stranger looked at him, taking in his terrified, disheveled appearance. The blood that was dripping from Izuku's skinned palms smeared across his forearms and all over his clothes.

Izuku took a moment to frantically try to stand up right, but stumbled. The pain in his leg was growing and Izuku couldn't figure out why.

Izuku looked past the stranger, and the stranger glanced behind himself wearily.

Izuku knew Himiko was still behind him, but not that far. He decided to not take the chance of her catching up to him. Izuku pushed through the radiating pain in his thigh and took off running again. He was stumbling and he tried his best to reach the next street.

Suddenly a strong hand grabbed him by his elbow. He was dragged into a narrow pathway that held another dark corner. The space was too tight to walk through and far too small for two people. Their bodies slotted together in a singeing closeness in the darkness. Quickly, the stranger clasped a hand over his mouth to muffle his ragged breathing.

Seconds passed and Izuku could hear Himiko's footsteps speed past.

Their chests breathed in and out in sync. Izuku's eyes were wide with fear. His hands were clammy with anxiety. Only when Himiko's footsteps faded into the background did Izuku glance at the stranger. The stranger's scarlet eyes were unnaturally bright in the darkness, like they were illuminated with all his passionate hatred for Izuku.

Izuku then registered that he was tightly holding onto the stranger's shirt. But Izuku couldn't let go.

As if the stranger could tell Izuku was scared of something—or someone—he peaked around the corner.

"First off, are you here on an assignment to kill some drug lord named Daiki?" The stranger asked carefully. "Because if you are, I'm contractually bound to stop you."

"N-No," Izuku responded truthfully. He shook his head fast. "I'm not. I swear. I-I need to get out of this city."

The stranger then cut his eyes down to the blood covered bruises on Izuku's arm.

He then maneuvered their bodies out of the tight space. They both carefully looked around before swiftly fading into the darkness of the back passageways. The stranger was dragging Izuku by his elbow further and further into the darkness.

Izuku's viper was telling him he was making a mistake letting this man drag him to some dark corner—he could kill him.

But an inkling of Izuku trusted him.

"The waterway passage underneath Yokohama leads out to the city limits," the stranger informed him. He let go of Izuku and bent down to lift up the heavy lid on a manhole. He gritted his teeth and dragged it to the side. "It'll spit you out into a river."

"Wh-Which way is the opposite direction of Tokyo?"

"To the right. Keep making rights and you'll end up in Kamakura."

The sound of footsteps suddenly drew close and Izuku's blood ran cold. He knew all his siblings' footsteps by heart—and those were Himiko's coming near.

The stranger could see the panic paint across his face. The stranger also looked over his shoulder and began hurriedly guiding Izuku down. He helped lower Izuku into the water system, until his feet hit the underground stream that waded up to his thigh.

Izuku hissed at the absorbed impact that shot up his leg. The pain was now radiating into his whole upper thigh. Izuku looked up from the dark tunnel above to see beautiful red eyes.

The stranger nodded at him and dragged the lid for the manhole back in place, shutting him in.

Izuku listened for the stranger to run away. Next, Izuku pressed himself against the underground wall as he heard Himiko's footsteps come to a skidding halt. She stopped right above him. She slowed, staring around and checking the area. But when she couldn't find him, she cursed out loud.

Izuku held his breath as she ran back the direction she came.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Morning of The Incident

By sunrise Izuku's entire leg was numb.

He was moving slowly. He was lugging the appendage along as if it was dead. Izuku was worried it was because the pain felt like it was searing through his flesh. He groaned as he worked his way through the dirty water, face pinched at the putrid smell. He hoped the stranger was right about this and not dragging him through literal shit for the hell of it.

During his journey, Izuku was trapped in shock. He was shocked at what Himiko knew.

But worse, he was shocked he possessed a reflex to stop a kill.

From here on out, Izuku knew his life would fall apart right into a casket. Himiko was right. Nine would punish Aoyama and Tomura but he would kill Izuku for being so deeply defective.

All the pieces of his half baked life crumbled like paper before his eyes.

But it was nearly a matter of time, wasn't it? Tomura had been covering for him since he was eight. Now he is twenty. It was bound to catch up with him and strike him in the jugular. He didn't guess Himiko would be the one holding the knife when the time came. There were legitimate grounds to say he attacked Himiko with that head wound. Not only that, he was guilty of helping forge documentation, being defective, and lying.

If he went back to The Academy now, Nine would give the command to exterminate him.

On this lonely excursion, Izuku knew he would miss his siblings.

But most of all, Izuku realized he didn't want to die.

A flicker inside of him wanted to experience the life he always dreamed about as a child. One with a family. One with a lover and he wondered if he could buy himself two years of paradise after twenty years of hell. Izuku didn't want to die by Himiko's hands. He thought about how Hiryu had gotten away—not for long—but maybe Izuku could buy himself some time.

Maybe he could even look for Kacchan now, he thought dangerously.

That thought alone gave him a second wind.

Izuku turned another corner and suddenly was flooded with a blinding white light.

He put his throbbing hand up to shield his sore eyes. He sighed in relief for finally getting to the exit and dragged himself towards the light. He used the walls to support himself.

He reached the opening of the waterway and exactly like the stranger promised, it led out to a large river. Izuku sucked in a deep breath and plunged into the body of water. The cold water hit his skin and he relished the breath of fresh air as the stench of the waterway was rinsed off of him.

Izuku swam weakly to the surface and over to the edge. His fingers dug into the wet earth and pulled himself up with all his grit.

Izuku breathed out heavily as he dragged his body onto the field of grass. All around him were tiny dandelions swaying with the morning breeze, tiny seeds flying off with the gust of the wind. Izuku lobbed his head as he tried his best to catch his breath.

He gazed at the beautiful sunset like it was a new beginning and tears of slight happiness gathered in his eyes.

He turned his head over his shoulder to see the distant skyline of Yokohama. He silently thanked the stranger in his head. It was then Izuku knew he would miss one more person if he was to escape this lifestyle.

Izuku began to pull himself onto his feet when the sound of a single sigh stopped him.

Everything in his body ran cold.

"Once again, you're crawling through tunnels you shouldn't be," Tomura's voice drawled. "You really never change, do you?"

Izuku's head slowly turned in disbelief.

To his horror, Tomura was sitting cross legged on top of the exit of the tunnel. It was as if he was waiting for him this whole time. He was dressed in the same clothes from the day before.

"H-How?" Izuku asked, voice cracking.

"I have my ways," Tomura said angrily.

Tomura slid off the tunnel and stood in front of Izuku. He stepped unkindly on Izuku's injured hand with his leather boot.

Izuku hissed as he tried to retract his hand, but Tomura dug into him further.

"I asked Chisaki for a photograph of the mark after Himiko began acting strange," Tomura revealed. He put his hands into his trench coat pockets and tilted his head. "Red eyes and blonde hair. The same thing Himiko kept rambling on about. I decided to tail you two after that and keep a close eye in case anything happened. I guess I was right to do so."

Izuku's voice splintered with a sob.

Any hope he conjured of a different life slipped away as quickly as it came.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Tomura dragged him back to that rooftop and his numb leg protested the whole way.

It was the middle of the day now, and the sun was shining terribly bright for such a moment. Izuku thought for sure maybe Tomura would kill him before Nine could. Maybe this would be Tomura's last possessive act as his caretaker: ending his life.

The dried blood from where Himiko hit her head was caked on the roof. It looked like it was scrubbed but the jagged tiles were too tattered to purge all the cracks.

They both looked at the distant window and the silhouette of the woman inside. She was vacuuming while singing and dancing.

Tomura's hand touched his back too gently and all too threateningly.

"Do you know her?" Tomura asked carefully.

"No," Izuku said.

He clenched his fists when Tomura began pushing him closer to the edge. It was subtle but his feet moved with every second closer and closer to the fall off.

"Then why can't you kill her?" Tomura asked.

Izuku's breathing became erratic. He tried to nudge the words off his tongue but they stayed glued down against his will. Tomura snarled and pushed him hard until his toes were directly on the slippery edge.

"Izuku. Either you tell me what's going on right now or I push you over this edge and save us both trouble."

Izuku's instinct to survive kicked in. "I-I…I can't pull the trigger when someone…has red eyes and blond hair."

Tomura sucked at his teeth. His hand switched from lightly pushing him to clutching his shirt.

"Why?" Tomura hissed. He pushed Izuku closer to the edge but used his strength to hold him on the angle. "Tell me right fucking now."

Izuku's footing slipped slightly on the incline. Panic surged through him.

"Wh-When I snuck out—those tw-two years," Izuku said quickly. He wept through clenched teeth. "I-I met a boy with red eyes and blond hair."

"I love you Kacchan," Izuku heard his younger self say as he wrote the tiny note. He could feel the same tears slip out his eyes now as he thought about his life hanging in the balance. "Please come back."

"I-I fell in love with him when I was younger," Izuku whispered.

Tomura stopped inching him forward. He yanked Izuku backwards and forced him to look at him. Tomura's eyes were wild. He stared at Izuku like he crossed a line that even he couldn't save him from.

"You're in love?" Tomura hissed.

"Not anymore," Izuku rushed to correct. "I-I—when I was younger I was. An-And I think it has manifested as a mental block."

Izuku expected to be backhanded. He flinched automatically, ready for the pain but nothing came. Instead, Tomura's eyes were full of disbelief and his hands were balled in restraint. His brother furrowed his brow and looked at Izuku up and down.

Tomura's eyes lingered on his battered, ugly arms.

Then Tomura glanced at the window of the woman across the way.

"Does anyone else know this?" Tomura whispered.

"No," Izuku said. "But Himiko knows about the documentation forging we've been doing. I tried to call you but she shot a bullet through my phone. She's planning on telling Nine and having me exterminated."

Tomura's face hardened and his eyes sharpened. Izuku could see plans formulating in Tomura's head. The gears were rapidly churning, but it worried Izuku how calm Tomura was.

"Thank you for telling me," Tomura muttered with a deadly resolve.

Tomura let go of Izuku and pulled out a hunting handgun. It was fully black and made of steel with long-distance bullseye perched at the top. It was exclusively used to hunt animals but only the most skilled of assassins could use it for sniping.

He cocked it and handed it to Izuku.

Tomura placed his hand over Izuku's. He wrapped Izuku's fingers around the cold metal for him and fixed his finger on the trigger. Tomura manhandled Izuku roughly. He positioned Izuku to hold up the gun and aim it at the window.

Izuku looked through the bullseye to see the woman inside. She opened the window to let fresh air in. The wind blew through her beautiful blonde hair and rustled the pearls around her neck.

She closed her eyes to enjoy the feeling of fresh spring on her skin.

"I will fix this," Tomura said from behind Izuku. He leaned over Izuku's shoulder to share his viewpoint. With a delicately gloved hand, Tomura adjusted Izuku's aim by a millimeter. "But first, we need to break your mental block."

The zing of metal echoed into the air. The edge of Tomura's machete pressed into his neck and Izuku froze. It dug into his flesh slightly, drawing out blood. Izuku stilled as his survival instinct swung full force to rattle his bones.

"Take the shot," Tomura commanded.

The terror instilled in him by Tomura triggered his viper .

Izuku hardened with his back against the wall and his brother over his shoulder. He closed his eyes to sink into the bottom of himself. The Viridian Viper slithered awake.

It snaked its way up his back and wrapped around his wrists. But instead of taking the wheel, it burrowed into Izuku's core. It coiled around all his memories of Kacchan. The large viper inside of him towered over the boy with blonde hair and red eyes, poised for the kill.

The viper began squeezing his precious memories tighter and tighter until the memory of the boy snapped in two at the spine.

Izuku pulled the trigger.

The bullet flew swiftly.

It pierced through the memories of the nook. It shattered the memories of the kiss. It snapped the memory of their string wedding bands. It broke every dream Izuku possessed about seeing his Kacchan again and landed into the woman's skull.

Izuku opened his tear filled eyes at the exact moment the bullet lodged in her skull. Her eyes rolled back and her body went limp slowly. Izuku watched as she fell over and in her place, he saw Kacchan with that same bullet hole between his eyes. He saw Hiryu as well.

The three bodies tied together, toppling in sync and hitting the floor in the pool of blood.

Izuku lowered the gun and his arms felt as heavy as lead. He studied the countless blood speckles that decorated the glass and guilt crawled its way up his throat.

Something inside of him broke.

Tomura removed his machete from his throat.

“Let’s get back to Tokyo and clean up this mess,” Tomura muttered. “Don’t say a word about this mental block to anyone. I’ll handle this.”

Tomura then whipped out his phone and dialed someone.

“It looks like we’ll need to expedite our plans. Please come to The Academy as soon as possible,” Tomura said to someone’s voicemail.

Izuku couldn’t peel his eyes away from the blood painted window.

For the first time in his life, he felt like he committed a crime.

The Incident

They made it back to Tokyo within a couple of hours.

Tomura’s hand clasped tightly on Izuku’s upper arm. His finger dug into Izuku’s skin, but not enough to be bruised. Izuku let himself be led back to their home, trusting his brother had a plan. But despite trusting Tomura, Izuku couldn’t help but be petrified.

They stepped foot into the lobby and dozens of eyes were on them instantly.

Whispers sparked as all the different vipers looked at them. Izuku wearily glanced at the gathering crowds as they pointed, but Tomura kept his eyes straight forward.

“Keep calm,” Tomura whispered to him. “We need to buy a couple of hours and I can get this all straightened out.”

Immediately, Nine came forward, cutting them off from going further into the building. He was in a polished dark purple suit and on each side of him were six bodyguards poised in all white tactical gear. Standing behind him was Himiko, her arms folded with a frown.

“Seize 217 from 117,” Nine commanded with a chilly air. His eyes were full of death as he pointed to Izuku. “117 no longer has jurisdiction over 217 from this moment on.”

Izuku’s eyes widened.

Tomura’s protective energy spiked. He gritted his teeth, pulled Izuku behind him, and objected to them being torn apart. Several hands began pulling on Izuku and his eyes widened when he saw metal restraints being brought out.

Izuku whimpered when Tomura’s hold grew bruising, but his brother didn’t let go of him. Multiple guards began trying to tear them apart, and Nine’s chilling stare gazed down on them. Izuku was terrified—he began to shake. Tomura clenched his teeth and pulled them tighter together.

“Nine,” Tomura said with a leveled voice. “Hold on for a moment. We can explain our side of things—”

“Shut up,” Nine snapped. He waved his hand for more guards to join in the tussle. “Restrain 117 too.”

A guard tased Tomura directly in the stomach when he refused to let go. Tomura clenched his teeth and knocked the guard back with his elbow through the shocking pain. When he refused to go down, more guards piled on Tomura. It took three more tasers to get Tomura to finally buckle. Tomura’s body jolted in an unnatural way as saliva trickled down his chin.

Izuku gasped in horror when his brother dropped to the ground and cuffs were put on him.

Izuku whirled around trying to get out of the guard’s hold but it was no use. He was overpowered and thrown down on the floor directly across from Tomura. The two brothers stared at each other and Izuku’s eyes were wide with tears while Tomura’s burned with fury.

Izuku was harshly put into restraints with his arms twisted behind his back. The metal dug into his skin as the reality of what was occurring sank into him as well. Tomura might not be able to save him this time.

“I don’t want to die,” Izuku whispered with a sob. “Please.”

Tomura’s nostrils flared. His paralyzed body didn’t move as his furious eyes crept over to Nine.

Nine stood over the pair of brothers. His unfeeling eyes locked onto Izuku as he spoke his next words.

“Take 217 to the basement. Permanently.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku sat inside of a glass box wearing nothing but a white shirt and loose fitting white cotton pants.

The numbness in his leg slowly but surely went away. Izuku noted this occurred when he stepped foot in the lobby of their home and couldn’t help but find it curious—but there was no use in pondering what that meant now. Was there?

Izuku’s head hung in defeat and his body was beaten into exhaustion. The taste of iron clung to his lips from where the guards roughed him up when they tore him apart from Tomura. His eyes were puffy as he studied his beaten up palm, particularly gazing at the gash that the stranger inflicted on him less than 24 hours ago.

He shifted on the soft cushioning he was sitting on. Inside of the glass box was all white padding. The only light in the room swayed above him. It was a naked bulb that hung from an electrical cord going back and forth like a pendulum. It ticked over him, counting down his last hours.

Izuku heard stories about this box from Himiko.

It was the holding box. It was made of unbreakable tempered glass. It was where dangerous vipers were placed right before they were put down. They would await their fate as the proper punishment for their death was prepared. In front of him were ten guards poised with machine guns all pointed at him in case he attempted anything.

“Didn’t think it would be this soon that you would follow me to the grave,” Hiryu’s ghost murmured from beside him. He sighed and leaned back on his arms. “I thought for sure it would be more like five years.”

Izuku squeezed his eyes closed in an attempt to silence the voice in his head. “Go away.”

“Oh? You’re not going to listen to me now?” Hiryu’s voice chastised.

“You’re not real,” Izuku whispered. He hung his head further down. “You’re just in my head.”

Hiryu’s ghost scoffed. “Oh. I’m more than in your head. You don’t understand what I am yet.”

The door to the chamber opened.

Izuku glanced up from beneath his bangs to see Nine, Ms. Nagant, Mr. Compress enter all at once. Their eyes were sharp on him, and Izuku noted the long, black Katana in Nine’s hands. Behind them were Himiko, Jin, Ibara in a straight line. Izuku felt bitterness swell inside of him at Himiko’s smugness. The gleam in her eyes was similar to as if she won an award.

Izuku was about to frown at her, but stopped himself when Ibara made eye contact with him.

She slowly lifted her pointer finger up to her lips in a ‘shush’ motion.

Izuku furrowed his brow and immediately the hairs on top of his arms stood up.

Nine stood in front of the box with repugnance. He looked at Izuku like he was a failed project as Ms. Nagant pulled out a neat clipboard with several pieces of paper clipped to it.

“I needed to do a deep dive on you and figure out what all was going on,” Nine said with a glare. “117 really did cover for you, didn’t he? I guess he’s slightly defective as well. Seems like he cares about you in an unhealthy manner. But that’s probably my fault for giving you to him so young. Luckily, 215 is easy to crack.”

Izuku hung his head again. His chest pinched at the thought of Aoyama probably being tortured somewhere.

“215 sways so easily when his life is on the line,” Nine said. “Now. Let us get to business.”

Nine snapped his fingers and Ms. Nagant began reading out loud.

“217. Defectiveness level: severe,” Ms. Nagant announced. “Sneaking out. Helping another student during The Cull. Possession of banned books. Possession of banned movies. Knowledge of Obsidian Viper’s defect without informing others.”

Jin gave a low whistle, like he was surprised and impressed.

Ibara didn’t look quite as surprised and she kept her head turned towards the door.

“Conspiracy to potentially allow Obsidian Viper to leave,” Ms. Nagant continued. “Perfect kill streak was broken two years ago and over one hundred marks have been missed since then. Documentation forging for each missed mark while having 117 complete the assignment for him. That completes the list of violations.”

Each strike felt like a hammer upside Izuku’s head.

“We talked to a few others on The Viper Seven team, and evaluated your worth,” Mr. Compress spoke up. “We came to the conclusion that it’s best if you are exterminated.”

“What’s going to happen to Tomura and Aoyama then?” Izuku whispered, finding his voice.

Ms. Nagant sighed and put her hand on her head. She then said, “you’re still far too concerned for others, even when you’re facing the death sentence.”

“If you must know, Tomura will be retrained,” Nine said lightly. “Without you here, I’m sure he can actually reach his full potential. As for Aoyama, he will be stripped of his Viper Seven title immediately. Since he’s not a great fighter he potentially could also be sold elsewhere—”

Nine’s sentence was cut short when the door slammed open behind him.

Everyone’s head whirled at the unexpected intrusion. Izuku’s eyes widened and his heart palpitated at the sight of Tomura. His brother’s features were etched with a bitter subzero cold. He was dressed in his tactical gear and in his hands were both his machetes, cleaned and sharpened.

Tomura’s merciless eyes locked on Nine.

Ibara smirked slightly.

“What’s the meaning of this?” Nine hissed. He turned to the guards and pointed towards Tomura. “Who let him out of his restraints?”

“I did,” a powerful voice boomed.

Everyone stopped, knowing exactly who that was.

Tomura glanced behind him.

Out of the darkness, the body of a golden cane was the first thing to be seen. Next were the diamond eyes of the golden viper head attached onto the cane.

When the figure emerged from the shadows fully, One himself materialized.

His crimson colored eyes were stewed in bloodthirsty malice as his thick curly white hair was combed back. The freckles on his face were in the pattern of blood splatters as they stretched down his neck. He was decorated in a perfectly crisp black suit, gray shirt, and golden tie.

The golden rings on his hands were shined brightly and the ring on his ring finger was a golden Black Mamba that snaked all the way up his appendage.

He walked into the room and stood directly next to Tomura.

Nine's face dropped as did Ms. Nagant's and Mr. Compress'.

The three of them shared a confused set of glances between each other. Izuku didn't miss how worried they looked—as if they didn't know One would be here.

Himiko's eyes widened in confusion. She whipped her head between One, Tomura and Izuku. Then she finally fell back against the wall in the shadows. Jin and Ibara followed suit.

"O-One," Nine said with a stutter. "What are you doing here?"

"I came as soon as Tomura called me," One said. His eyes were homed in on Nine's jugular, not bothering to look him in the eye. "It's been a while since you invited me to check in on The Academy. I know I've been busy with several other things the last few years but I couldn't help but wonder why. It seems like things here have been out of hand for a minute now."

Nine cleared his throat and straightened his tie. "Yes, but I am taking care of the defective products now—"

"—That's not what I'm talking about," One snapped. "I'm referring to the fact there hasn't been a new cohort in years. You've been lying to me about my operations."

Silence.

All eyes were prying into Nine now—staring at him like he slit his own throat.

Lying to Nine was a crime. But lying to One was inconceivable. Even Himiko's face shifted from shock, confusion, then finally she lowered her head. Izuku knew she resigned any hope for Nine at that moment.

One walked over to Nine and stared him down in his eye.

"When were you planning on telling me that Peter Moore cut off all contact with you?" One asked.

Nine couldn't speak. He stumbled on his words for the first time.

"Oh, don't trip up on me now," One taunted. "It's a shame you were about to discard a perfectly good viper for lying about what was occurring on assignments when you yourself have been committing an even bigger lie. Do you really think it's wise to kill Izuku when we have no one to replace him?"

"I'm sorry, Grand Father." Nine immediately kneeled down on the ground in submission. "You're right. I will keep 217 alive. I didn't mean for the lie to go on for so long. I truly did think we would have our affairs sorted out by now. Please. Let me know what I can do to make things right."

"There is nothing you can do," One scoffed. "From here on out, Tomura will be taking over for you."

Everyone's eyes widened. Izuku's head snapped up all the way and he straightened his spine.

Tomura? As the leader of The Academy?

"Oh," Hiryu's ghost whispered. "His long game is impeccable."

"Excuse me?" Nine exclaimed. He whipped his head up and glared at Tomura. "He's a child. He's barely twenty six—"

"So?" One questioned. His voice boomed on all the walls as he slammed the end of his cane into the ground. "I was slitting throats for Chisaki's grandfather by the time I was ten. Then I was a full fledged assassin for our country by the age of thirteen. By the time I proposed the concept of The Viper Academy to the city of Tokyo I was just sixteen. And I was running it when I was twenty and that's when I found you discarded as a baby."

"Yes, I understand all that Grand Father," Nine said. He stood up from his knees and shook his head. "But 117 is not us."

"Tomura is family," One said with finality. "He's been my informant for years and I've been taking a personal interest in preparing him to be the next King Cobra. After poking around, I found out a lot of the vipers here themselves regard him as the perfect viper. You and I both know admiration is more influential than fear. The transition to power for him would be easy —"

"No," Nine spat. "I refuse to let this happen. I'm sorry, Grand Father. I respect all decisions you make but not this."

"I had a feeling you might say that," One said unhappily. He folded both of his hands over his cane and tilted his head. "If you think you are so much better than Tomura then prove it to me."

Nine gritted his teeth. "How?"

"Fight him. If you win, then you keep your position. If you fail, you hand him the King Cobra ring and take your punishment in stride."

"I accept," Nine said. He whirled his glare onto Tomura. "I will prove to you that I am far more suitable for the role than 117—"

“—Tomura,” One corrected.

Nine’s eyebrow twitched. “…I am far more suitable for the role than Tomura ever would be.”

“Tomura,” One called. “Do you accept the challenge?”

All eyes were on Tomura now.

Tomura’s face didn’t shift during this conversation. The whole time his eyes were trained on Izuku. With patience, Tomura walked over to the glass box Izuku was in. Izuku looked up as Tomura neared. There was a veil over Tomura’s eyes as he studied Izuku’s new cuts and scrapes.

Tomura’s chest heaved slightly, angry about something.

“I accept,” Tomura said with a slight growl.

Tomura raked his machetes against each other. He turned around gradually, eyes piercing through Nine. Nine’s expression hardened and his stature changed to going on the offense.

“Let’s make this quick,” Nine hissed.

“Take your stances,” One commanded.

Darkness fell over the room as everyone moved to the sides, opening up the floor to the two men.

Izuku pressed his hand against the glass of his box as he watched. His skin was covered in goosebumps, unsure of where this was going to go.

All eyes were honed in as the winds of change swept through. The two vipers encircled each other, and it was then Izuku could plainly see the irony in this face off.

Tomura and Nine shared physical traits that made their rivalry eerie. Same shade of white hair. The same tall, threatening build and height. The color of their eyes was even almost similar—set off ever so slightly with Tomura’s being alizarin while Nine’s was an imperial purple.

It was like Tomura was Nine’s dark mirror staring back at him as the better, newer, upgraded version of himself.

Nine began to undress, preparing himself for the battle. He got rid of his tie and shrugged off the blazer. He took his shirt off slowly to expose his scarred chest. It was full of cuts and scrapes from a life before either Izuku or Tomura was born.

He was well defined in a way that displayed a lifetime of training. Izuku could probably guess the lives taken by his hands were infinite. Nine gripped the hilt of his black katana and unsheathed it. The blade shined under the dim light. He dragged it against the concrete as he walked into the middle of the floor with his eyes trained on Tomura.

Tomura smirked in an insidious manner. He cracked his knuckles like Nine fell right into the center of his plans.

Slowly, Tomura moved to do the same as Nine and removed his shirt. It was then Izuku finally saw the full breadth of his brother's viper tattoos. They covered his chest, abdomen and sides in intertwining tangles.

At the center of his back was a new tattoo. It was a large horned viper in the shape of an infinity symbol, eating its own tail. Ouroboros, Izuku thought to himself. The symbol for immortality.

Above the viper was the Japanese character for life and at the bottom was the character for death.

Tomura cracked his neck as he gripped both his machetes and stood across from Nine.

"Begin," One commanded.

Straight away, both Nine and Tomura moved for the kill. Their clashing metal reverberated the room as they collided in a fury of slashes and blows.

Nine was faster than any assassin Izuku ever saw. The years of experience he held over Tomura was evident. He was keen in his dodges, moving his body simple millimeters to evade deadly blows. Then wherever Tomura left an opening, Nine was skilled enough to immediately stab for it. He cut Tomura behind the shins in order to slow his movements.

If this was any other opponent, this would have worked.

However, Tomura was crafted from sheer endurance. He soaked up the pain like it made him stronger. Tomura moved as if he didn't feel pain, and Izuku questioned if he did.

Tomura quickly changed his fighting style to defensive. Tomura dodged blow after blow, studying Nine's posture with every step. He assessed which way Nine's weight leaned. He sized up how far his reach was with the sword and he noted the side he was slower at defending.

Nine seemingly saw this, and changed his fighting style to avoid being bested—but it was too late. Tomura made his calculations.

Within the next second Tomura executed a perfect combo of blows that went for all of Nine's weak points. He swung for Nine's jugular and right as expected, Nine leaned backwards out of the way. Tomura faked him out and switched his footing quickly. He then swung his second machete.

He cut Nine deeply in the oblique and dragged it to rip his flesh clean.

Blood sprayed and Nine immediately tried to go full defensive.

Tomura didn't let up as he forced Nine backwards. Slash after slash rained down in a brutal rhythm. For every blow Nine was able to dodge, Tomura forced two more on him. Gashes were carved into Nine's arms, legs, and chest in mere minutes. With every blow Tomura's eyes became more and more satiated at the pain.

All the vipers in the room gasped when Nine began to stagger, showing weakness.

Tomura's bloodthirsty eyes caught the mistake and he pounced immediately. One. Two. Three slices were given to Nine's weak points. Nine yelled in agony as the blade cut straight through the tendons in both his heels. Then finally Tomura swiftly kicked him off his feet and body slammed him into the concrete floor.

Ibara smiled at the sound of Nine's skull cracking.

Tomura put his foot on Nine's chest and pushed one of his machetes to rest at the jugular of Nine's neck. The vein pulsed against the steel as Nine roughly breathed in and out.

Defeat sagged Nine's shoulders—he'd been bested.

"Fine," Nine said through his gritted teeth. He gripped his bleeding side as he glared at One. "I give my position to Tomura. But heed my word, you'll regret this later, One." Nine angrily pushed away the machete. He staggered upright, resting on his knees as he tried his best to clutch his side.

Tomura circled behind him, looming without a word.

It was then that Tomura glanced over at One.

One gave a single head nod.

Tomura's eyes burrowed to a level of darkness they never achieved before. All the fury of resentment and thirst for power melted together as he reeled back his blade. He viciously barred his teeth as he swung the machete.

Nine noticed too late. He quickly turned to see what was happening behind him but the blade ferociously swept through.

Several people in the room gasped, Izuku included.

The machete severed Nine's head from his neck in a fell, savage swoop. Everyone but One himself stared on in shock as it happened. The blood from Nine's arteries sprayed upwards, raining down dark crimson directly on Tomura.

An unsettling smile twitched onto Tomura's blood soaked face. Nausea rocked into Izuku's stomach at the unnerving nature of it. Izuku glanced around and was even more terrified to witness how everyone stared on in awe like they were witnessing Tomura being born again in Nine's blood.

One began grinning as the red liquid turned Tomura's hair from pure white to red.

Izuku slowly backed away from the edge of his cage as Tomura kicked over the decapitated body. Nine's head rolled across the room, leaving a trail of blood until it stopped directly at One's shoe.

One lifted his clean boot up, and pressed it directly on Nine's disembodied face.

"Bravo," One said. He slowly clapped with delight. "Thank you for taking care of that liar for me, Tomura."

Tomura bowed his head. "It's my honor."

"Like we agreed, go ahead and claim your prize."

Tomura leaned down and lifted up Nine's limp, lifeless hand.

He tried to keep his face expressionless, but the emotion of unequivocal victory was teeming from out of all of his pores. Prudently, Tomura plucked the silver King Cobra shaped ring off of Nine's dead flesh. Tomura held it up to the light for a moment, admiring it. It shone in the light, sparkling as blood dripped off of it onto the ground.

Then Tomura slowly placed it on himself like it was a crowning. He flexed his muscular hand, testing the new power that came with the ring as the strength surged through his veins.

Tomura's nostrils flared as he breathed in.

He breathed out with a sinister grin.

Izuku was frozen in place.

One rolled his shoulders. "Everyone, we're going to have an all hands meeting after this. It's time to get things in order around here for good."

Mr. Compress and Ms. Nagant nodded. They seemed unfazed by the turn over of power. All the guards followed One loyally and no one bothered to spare a glance at Nine's maimed body. Izuku knew they held no empathy in their hearts. Ultimately they would follow whatever command One gave—and now Tomura.

"What story should we tell people if they ask what happened to Nine?" Ms. Nagant questioned. "Surely we're not going to let it be known he lied to you about the cohort issue successfully for this long."

One rolled Nine's head underneath his shoe thoughtfully. He then said, "I think I will tell people he died in a freak accident. An incident—if you will. Now. Let us get to business about securing the next cohort. Tomura proposed a new way to obtain children."

One kicked Nine's head off to the side.

He snapped his fingers and pointed towards the dead body. Within seconds, the guards began gathering up Nine's remains. Not a single soul spoke as their once ruler was carried off in two pieces.

Slowly everyone trickled out of the chamber, forgetting about Izuku. Jin. Ibara.

Himiko spared him one glance and then it was only Izuku and Tomura left alone with a pool of blood. Tomura stood over the red liquid, looking at his reflection. He tilted his head side to side, and gazed on at the ring that now sat at home on his finger.

Tomura's eyes snaked over to Izuku.

He walked to the glass wall that separated them wearing a thoughtful expression. His lips were thinly pressed together as his eyes glanced up and down Izuku's arms.

Tomura held his blood covered hand up to the glass and Izuku slowly stood up.

Izuku's vision pulsed white from the exhaustion as he walked to the front of his cage. The spots in his eyes danced as his legs screamed in protest with every step. Izuku looked at his brother's bloodied hand. He then put his hand up against the glass as well.

They stood in silence.

Izuku waited patiently for the next move. His heart hit against his chest over and over like a drum, expecting to be let out.

However, nothing happened.

Tomura looked at the lock. So did Izuku.

Tomura slowly removed his hand, leaving a crimson handprint behind. Izuku frowned, and he swayed on his weak legs when anxiety crept into him.

"Tomura?" Izuku cautiously called.

Then, Tomura backed away from the glass. Izuku's vision faded further into white from all his energy being depleted. Izuku breathed unevenly as he leaned against the glass for support. He wearily stared into his brother's eyes that were endless pools of nothing.

Panic stacked high in Izuku as Tomura took another step backwards.

"To-Tomura?" Izuku questioned again.

When Tomura took another step, Izuku's gut felt like it'd been sucker punched.

"He doesn't need you anymore," Hiryu's phantom tried to tell him. "All you were good for was making him look like a perfect Big Brother. You helped him get the high rank and respect. Now, he got what he wanted. He made himself look like the perfect viper until he could seize control for himself."

Izuku's heart rate quickened. "Tomura, please no—don't leave me here."

Tomura turned his back, leaving Izuku to gaze at the blood soaked Ouroboros tattoo that stretched across his skin.

“Tomura!” Izuku screamed. He banged louder and louder on the glass with every growing second. “Tomura! No! Don’t—Don’t le-leave me! Don’t leave me here! Please!”

Tomura glanced once over his shoulder at Izuku. He basked in blood and his newly acquired power as he reached for the light switch.

“Tomura!”

Darkness consumed the room and the door slammed shut.

Four Days After The Incident

The blackness faded into countless hours of mental torture as Izuku’s body began to shut down.

His system was in overdrive and far past the point of survival mode. He was clinging to life as he laid there neglected, dreaming of better days. The basement was a bitter type of cold that wasn’t cold enough to freeze but enough to cause him to convulse into violent shivers.

The padding where he was wet with tears. Izuku couldn’t control the sobs that he poured into the dingy material. His stomach felt like it was trying to devour itself from the inside out. It hurt to blink, cough, or breathe.

He’d been starved of any food or water and was left alone with his cruel thoughts.

“I told you, he doesn’t need you anymore,” Hiryu whispered in his head. “He only kept you around to look good in front of Nine. Now he doesn’t need you. You’re disposable.”

“He’s going to leave you down here to die, runt,” The ghost of Sen said. The dead boy joined Hiryu in the dark corner of Izuku’s mind with a viciously, delightedly smirk. “He’s never coming back for you.”

Izuku weakly curled into himself more.

His head was becoming light.

“At least you can come home with me now,” a new, soft voice said.

The sound of The Dance of The Lovebirds came in gently.

Izuku lifted his head weakly at the strange new voice. When he thought he opened his eyes, he swore he saw a tiny figure there, standing behind Hiryu and Sen. The small frame was haloed by a yellowish light and looking at him with a gentleness he never knew.

“I’ll always be here for you,” Kacchan’s voice said. “We can finally run away together.”

More tears swelled in Izuku’s eyes as he stared. The small figure became brighter—showing the boy from his past in full clarity now.

Izuku could perfectly see the beautiful red eyes and blond hair he was stuck on. It felt nearly real and Izuku knew now why he didn't want to die. He needed to see that boy one last time before he started a new lifetime.

He looked at the boy he wished he ran away with sadly.

"C'mon," Kacchan beckoned. He extended his arm and stretched out his palm for Izuku. "Take my hand and we can go."

A tear rolled down Izuku's cheek.

With his final bit of strength he lifted his hand and tried to grasp the last red strand in his life. When he thought he touched the smaller hand—a larger one eclipsed around his wrist. The warm scarlet eyes Izuku dreamed about were replaced with deadly, frigid ones.

Slowly, the mirage faded away and in place stood the very real, malevolent Tomura.

His brother stared down at him like he was a precious emerald.

Izuku tried to pull his hand back—but Tomura gripped him tightly.

Tomura bent down to lift Izuku upright and the whole room swayed. Famine protested around Izuku's muscles and his vision spotted black. Izuku blinked rapidly as his heart struggled to pump blood.

"No dying on me yet, Izuku," Tomura said. "I still need you."

Izuku tried to stay awake—but the darkness pulled him under.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Izuku gained consciousness again, it was to an overwhelming light. Everything around him blended in blurry colors of gray, black, and beige. His vision pulled into focus to show him the inside of an expensive penthouse he'd never been in before.

Izuku's head swayed backwards with confusion and he tried to orient his weak body.

He registered that he was standing up. No. Not standing—leaning. He was leaning against something? Someone. It was a warm body. His finger felt out the body and he registered it was a man. Izuku's eyes struggled in and out of focus until finally he could see Tomura.

But everything about Tomura looked different.

Instead of his casual tech gear, his brother was wearing a suit similar to Nine's. It was black, crisp and ironed to perfection. The blazer was made of an expensive material and his tie was a sharp silver. His hands were now fully decorated with single rings.

Sitting on his index finger was the silver King Cobra ring, shined and rid of blood.

Tomura looked like a leader now.

“Ah, you’re finally awake,” Tomura said with a slanted smirk.

Izuku wanted to speak but the dryness in his throat was choking him. He groaned when his head pulsed with radiating pain. His head lobbed again and suddenly Izuku was aware of Tomura hoisting him up by the waist.

“Welcome to our new home,” Tomura announced happily. “This is Nine’s old penthouse. Now it’s ours.”

Tomura maneuvered Izuku’s head for him so he could see.

All around were tall gray walls, dark marble, and black silk curtains. The decor was dark yet luxe and there were silver statues of life sized vipers in various corners. Off to the side was an inside waterfall along with a lit fireplace and a spiral staircase that went three levels up.

Izuku became dizzy and he gripped onto Tomura tighter.

They began walking around as Izuku looked at the incredibly high ceiling. Dangling above them was a delicate crystal chandelier that illuminated the whole space. They stumbled into what Izuku presumed to be the lavish living room. Tomura delicately placed him down like a doll on a plush black sectional couch by the fireplace.

Izuku shivered, still trying his best to stay conscious.

“We’ll get you some food soon,” Tomura reassured. “I gave you a punishment of famine for what you told me about that boy with red eyes and blond hair. But now all that’s behind us.”

The pain in Izuku’s stomach felt acidic now. He weakly moaned, unable to formulate any words or thoughts.

Tomura stood up and his eyes raked over Izuku’s body.

Izuku noticed that the binder of men Tomura gifted him was on the wooden coffee table in front of him. He blinked slowly at it. His eyes lingered closed, and he nearly welcomed the darkness once more.

When he opened his eyes again, Tomura was standing in front of the roaring fireplace with the binder.

His brother then opened the binder and one by one, tore out the sheets to allow the fire to eat the paper.

“I remember the first day they handed me to you,” Tomura said. His eyes stayed glued on the fire. “I was seven, it was a blazing summer and I just spent six days in the basement with a famine punishment too. Everyone else in my cohort had Big Brothers and Sisters to take care of them but I didn’t. Nine miscalculated the imports. He told me I was an extra.”

The crackling from the charred paper echoed into the quiet penthouse with Izuku’s uneven breathing.

“No one gave a damn about me—but then you came along,” Tomura muttered. He threw another profile into the fire. “Who would have thought the first person to think I was important would be some sniveling two year old? You were crying for your mom and confused. I should have found it disgusting—but I didn’t. Your hair was a mess so I pushed it out the way.”

Tomura looked at the picture of one of the blond men from the binder before chucking it away into the flames.

“I felt something then for you that never went away,” Tomura confessed. “I felt sad, but more importantly I felt related to you by pain not blood.”

Izuku’s brows furrowed as he intently listened from the couch.

“You stopped crying when you saw me and for the first time someone looked at me like I was important. I told you I was your new brother. You held your arms out and I picked you up and you clung to me. I realized then as you were shaking in my arms that you noticed me. You told me you were scared and I was too. We both were. But something pulled inside me and I stopped being scared for the both of us.”

Tomura finished emptying the binder and then tossed it in the fire too. A large crackle boomed from the fireplace as it swallowed up the material. Tomura turned around again, and began to pull his long hair back into a neat bun with a red string.

“Now, we don’t have to be afraid of anyone else anymore,” Tomura said finally.

He walked over to Izuku and shifted him upright.

“Shirt off,” Tomura commanded coldly.

Of course, Izuku thought. Famine wasn’t enough. Especially not after Izuku confessed to being in love with someone when he was younger.

Izuku blinked rapidly. He lifted a wobbly hand to take his shirt off, unclasping the first button with his dirty fingers. He began to sloppily sink to the floor. His muscles automatically poised in position for brute punishment only to be stopped.

Tomura grabbed him by the arm and forced him back up on the couch.

“No. No more punishments like that,” Tomura corrected.

Izuku halted.

He lifted his heavy head. He was unsure if he heard that correctly.

“…No more?” Izuku wheezed out.

“No more belt punishments,” Tomura repeated. He then took Izuku’s shirt off for him. “I won’t be hitting you ever again. With Nine gone, I realize what I was doing was, ah, extreme.” Tomura handled Izuku like he was suddenly valuable. “Now that I’m in charge, I’m going to be approaching everything differently. Including how we execute your punishments."

Tomura discarded Izuku's shirt to the side and then carefully inspected his wounds. His fingers grazed all the cuts, scrapes and bruises. He focused on the red welts and inspected Izuku closely.

It was then Tomura stood up, went to the bathroom area and returned with a basket of expensive ointments. He pulled out several creams with fancy labels that still had the high dollar sign price tag attached to them.

Izuku was confused at first but then Tomura held one up for him to see.

"As an apology, let me help you clear your skin from those ugly marks," Tomura said with a tight lipped smile. "It'll be like erasing all those years."

Mixed emotions fought for dominance inside of Izuku's ribcage.

Anger was the first to spark. He was furious that Tomura thought all that could simply be washed away. Even if the marks left—the fear inflicted would stay. But soon, rising like a tide inside of Izuku was the emotion of relief.

Izuku nodded the best he could in his state, hoping this was real.

He stared at the new version of his brother as Tomura started coating his scars with the expensive skincare items. Tomura looked refined. Well put together. He looked as if he conquered a beast he'd been wanting to slay for years. He kneaded his fingers against Izuku's skin and made Izuku relax on the comfortable couch.

When Tomura finished coating his skin in the various creams and lotions, his brother walked into the kitchen.

Izuku noticed now that even Tomura's walk was different. Every step he took felt like an omnipotent stride. More so than Nine ever walked.

Tomura's new air was chillingly dominant.

When Tomura returned from the kitchen, he was holding a large silver platter full of Izuku's favorite foods.

Izuku perked up. Tomura smiled and placed it down right in front of him. Izuku reached for the chopsticks and Tomura turned on the large TV mounted above the fireplace.

As the news played, Izuku struggled to feed himself. He attempted to grip the utensils several times and failed. When it became a bit embarrassing, Tomura spared him. His brother grasped the chopsticks and then slowly began to feed him. Izuku shifted uncomfortably at the action but allowed himself to be helped in his weakened state.

Tomura stayed silent, fully invested in watching Izuku get nursed back to health.

Suddenly, right before Izuku could swallow his first bite, the sound of a crying baby bounced off the walls.

Izuku furrowed his brow and tilted his head up to the third level of the penthouse. Dread hugged him like an old friend when the crying steadily grew louder. Izuku knew there was only one explanation.

He inched his gaze to Tomura, who was radiating a glacial aura.

“Oh, I forgot to mention,” Tomura said as he picked up another bite for Izuku to eat. “That’s your new little brother. His name is Katsuma.”

Chapter End Notes

Thank you guys so much for reading!! Lemme know your thoughts below :3 Excited for the next two chapters! It timeskips into the present. We'll get to see Izuku's POV of Paradise and the Honeymoon phase. We will also be further unraveling what happened while they were in Biei that Katsuki didn't see! Thank you so much for reading!!! I look forward to all your screams :3

Chapter 22: Attacco

Chapter Summary

Attacco (It.) — binding together two notes.
The name comes from the Italian attaccare, "to unite"

Chapter Notes

Helloooo! Welcome back to this lovely train wreck, I mean love boat :) First, thank you to Luna for betaing like always!

Secondly, thank you all for reading this far! We've finally seeing the light at the end of the tunnel and circling up on catching up on the present. Almost all my little dominos are in place and I'm so stoke for these upcoming chapters!

It'll be a lot of fluff! After the Paradise Recap, it'll be more bkdk fluffy and smutty scenes from the Honey Moon arc that weren't in Katsuki's POV. I've tortured you all enough with angst so here's tooth rotting fluff as a thank you for sticking around :')

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 22 - Attacco

.

.

.

Izuku was always a believer in fate.

Fate decided the future, past and present. Fate was the reason he was banished to the Viper Academy when his mother decided his freckles were a curse. Fate was something no one could outrun, even if they wanted to. Everything was predetermined.

But Izuku hesitated if he thought fate was immovable when Tomura placed a tiny bundle in his arms.

The soft blanket wrapped around the infant was orange. Izuku knew he would never forget that detail. A gentle, delicate orange. In his stomach, anxiety burrowed into him like a cluster of worms.

Katsuma.

Izuku's whole childhood flashed before his eyes.

"Exactly five kids have joined us," Tomura informed him. "Katsuma, Tamashiro, Eri, Hana and Kota. One for everyone, besides me, in our unit. I told One a smaller cohort is more effective because we can concentrate our efforts better."

They were standing on the third floor of their new penthouse. Up here was a rooftop balcony. It led out to the perfect view of Mt. Fuji and the entire vast city of Tokyo. There were three rooms: one entertainment room, one private study, and lastly, one nursery for their new brother.

The baby roused in his arms. Izuku instinctively drew him closer to his chest. The baby snuggled into him and Izuku's heart skipped a beat.

"How is this possible?" Izuku whispered. "I thought Peter Moore cut off contact with Nine?"

"He did," Tomura said. He stood next to Izuku studying Katsuma as well. "But I proposed a whole new Viper Academy system to One before the incident. It included upgraded training plans and a new avenue of getting the next cohort."

Izuku grew sad knowing Katsuma was sold.

"You found a new trafficker?" Izuku asked.

"No," Tomura said. "I proposed to One we should kidnap a small number of infants from various hospitals."

Izuku's heart stopped.

ᔓᔓᔓ

5 Year After The Incident

Izuku softly played the violin in Katsuma's bedroom. The music carried throughout the penthouse like fluttering butterflies. The wings of each note soared high and dipped low. Izuku smiled as Katsuma gradually drifted off to sleep in his bed, snuggled up with a small All Might toy.

Izuku gradually trailed off the note he was on. He carefully waited until Katsuma was fast asleep before stopping fully. He studied his little brother with contemplation. His heart squeezed at the faint, tiny sprinkle of freckles across the bridge of Katsuma's nose.

"Did he have trouble getting to sleep again?" Aoyama quietly asked from the doorway.

"Yeah," Izuku muttered. He slowly put his instrument away. "I think I might've accidentally gotten him used to me playing violin before bed. I guess he was listening to me play all these years."

“How sweet,” Aoyama said with a small smile.

“I guess.” Izuku laughed and scratched the back of his head. “Thank you again for watching him while we go out tonight on client business.”

“It’s not a problem at all,” Aoyama said with a smile. “It’s kinda nice being the designated night babysitter of the unit! I can work while watching the baby monitors.”

Izuku chuckled at his brother. They walked out of the nursery and Aoyama stole a handful of glances at him. Then he cleared his throat.

“Have you…seen Himiko at all?” Aoyama asked carefully.

Izuku’s smile dropped.

“No,” Izuku said curtly. “You know she doesn’t talk to me. She avoids me like the plague.”

“Yeah but I was hoping she would come around soon,” Aoyama muttered. “After her demotion she only takes months-long overseas assignments now. She’s barely around to help out with her Little.”

“She probably wants to keep out of Tomura’s way,” Izuku said with a shrug.

He tried to tell himself not to be bitter, but it was hard.

After Nine’s beheading, Tomura wanted Himiko to be next. She’d proven her loyalties were not in the correct place like Ibara’s and Jin’s. If One hadn’t been there, Himiko surely would have been in the grave. But One was, and One told Tomura it wasn’t entirely her fault. She was pledging loyalty to the leader of the house—which was not a bad trait to have.

She escaped Tomura’s wrath by a hair. She was allowed to keep her life but not Tomura’s respect. She was given lower ranked missions, and was barely called upon unless it was specific Viper Seven business.

Because of this, Himiko kept her head down these days.

“Well, if you happen to run into her at all tell her I’m looking for her,” Aoyama said sadly. “Her Little misses her and I can only do so much to really take care of two kids.”

“Sure thing,” Izuku replied.

Aoyama huffed and nervously chuckled. “Well. Enough about that—you should get going. You wouldn’t want to keep Tomura waiting.”

Izuku nodded, feeling awkward about the way their conversation ended.

“Right. Thanks again, Aoyama.”

The two said their goodbyes as Izuku descended to the second floor of the penthouse.

The second level held his and Tomura's bedrooms alongside a large den. There was a small indoor garden next to the windows where Izuku tended to a group of plants. The tiny flowers brought him a level of peace. It was nice to see something grow instead of die.

He walked into his room. It was still decorated with all the same vintage romance posters.

On his bed awaiting him was the outfit Tomura chose. It was a simple sleeveless black shirt with a high collar. The fabric hugged his waist, chest, and back, leaving little to the imagination. To emphasize it more his black pants were tight enough to show all his muscles.

Izuku looked in the full length mirror. He assessed his clear skin.

Over the last five years, Tomura kept his word and never hit Izuku again. Instead, Izuku's punishments involved the glass box in the basement. It was a betrayal in Izuku's opinion. Tomura spent years telling him he would spare him from the basement. He would rub in how lucky Izuku was to never have to go down there.

Then he banished Izuku to the basement the exact moment Nine was gone.

It made Izuku realize Tomura never cared about sparing him from the basement. Tomura only cared about wanting to be the one to inflict the pain—and pain he did inflict.

The several days of famine always wore Izuku down.

And each time, a bit of Izuku's trust in Tomura chipped away.

But despite all this—Tomura made sure to never touch him unless it involved helping clear up his scars. The fancy skincare regimen Tomura placed him on worked like a magic wand erasing the marks.

But some scars stayed, like the one on his palm he received from his stranger. However, that was to be expected. They couldn't heal all the years of violence. But the faintness of Izuku's scars were like an air of mystery now rather than a cloak of shame.

Izuku traced the scar on his palm thoughtfully. He did this frequently because the kindness the stranger showed him that day was rare. Whenever he was feeling sad, he thought about how quick his stranger was to help him escape the city. Even though he hadn't managed to get away.

When Izuku descended down the spiral staircase, his happiness slipped away fully.

Leaving Katsuma behind always made Izuku sad.

Over the last five years Izuku could feel himself change. He shifted into a Big Brother and he thought about Katsuma a lot. He thought about his food. His hair. His clothing and what made him smile.

But more so, he thought about Katsuma's real family. Unlike the previous cohorts, these kids weren't blood money. These kids parents' were probably searching for them.

Their fate wasn't to be locked up in this hell hole.

Izuku's heart clenched every time he stared at Katsuma's happy face.

Tomura's new Viper Academy system was effective and One gave him high praise for it. Truly, it was simple. When it was said out loud, Izuku wondered why it hadn't been thought of before.

Tomura proposed that Littles should strictly be for the higher ranked Vipers of the previous cohort when they became adults. The Viper Seven would be the first trial of this. Himiko received Tamashiro. Ibara took in Eri. Aoyama was in charge of Hana. And lastly, Jin was given Kota. He was overjoyed for a second chance at being a Big Brother.

The family dinners now included the five kids. The children played together in a way that sustained them with proper attention. All the while they were molded in the Viper way. It was working. Izuku could see the viciousness coming out of Kota similar to Sen.

However, Katsuma was a mirror of Izuku: soft and meek.

Because of that, Izuku couldn't silence the loud buzzing in his skull. Whenever he stared at the kids, he saw Nine's death over and over.

Watching Nine get beheaded the same week he was handed a newborn made it abruptly clear how horrifying this all was. It was an endless cycle of death and Izuku didn't want to guess which of the kids would die before the age of ten.

But he didn't have much say in the matter.

Tomura was in charge of not only their unit—but all operations. As the new manager of the Viper Academy, Tomura ruled with an iron machete. He doubled the amount of missions in less than two years and he made valuable connections to new clients overseas. Nine was nothing but an example of what happened when you crossed One and pissed off Tomura.

More so, Tomura ran The Academy better than Nine ever did. Every Viper dutifully admired him. They all aspired to be as ruthless, calculating and violent as he was.

That is, everyone except Izuku.

The broken trust Izuku gained in Tomura after The Incident made Izuku internally resistant.

He didn't want to be like Tomura. And Izuku didn't want Katsuma to be like him either.

Izuku exhaled at the bitter thoughts about his brother.

It's exactly who he was going to meet now. Tomura requested he come out for dinner with him in the third circle of Hadeus.

He walked out of their home into the streets of Tokyo. He started heading straight for the entrance he usually used to get to the underground city. Along the way, several whistles called out to him.

“Hey there, Izuku,” a woman said with a sing-song tone.

Izuku chuckled nervously as he waved to her.

He kept walking and various men and women attempted to grab his attention. They promised him a good time with flirty gazes. Izuku blushed as he sweetly smiled at each person that cat-called him. He gave the familiar people of Hadeus a polite head nod in an attempt not to be rude.

A particular gruff man with an eye patch whistled at him. He curled his finger in a ‘come here’ motion at Izuku.

Izuku knew this guy was a pusher. He had been trying to fuck him for three years and was extremely persistent. Izuku rejected the offer yet again and walked slightly faster.

“Aw, c’mon baby boy,” the man yelled after him. “I know you’re shy but I could make you cum so hard you see stars!”

“Sorry!” Izuku called back with a smile. “Still not interested!”

Heat burned at the back of Izuku’s neck. When he turned the corner, he puffed out his cheeks in an attempt to cool down.

Izuku didn’t know if he could ever get used to that.

The last five years changed for Izuku more than just internally, they changed him externally too. He was always regarded as attractive, sure. He knew that. But over the last several years, his looks began to turn heads wherever he went without fail. Jin said he was one of those people who only got finer with age.

Because of this, Izuku was no longer strictly The Viper Academy’s gem, but Hadeus’ as well.

It started when his skin began to heal.

When his arms became acceptable, Tomura asked Ibara to give Izuku a makeover. His brother was very insistent that he wanted Izuku to be the most stunning person in the room at all times. This was because Tomura wanted to establish their influence in the underground—and beauty was influential.

Ibara delivered happily. She treated Izuku like a doll she played dress up with. Izuku enjoyed it. He was happy to spend quality time with his sister. Ibara kept all his outfits sweet but slightly sexy. They were alluring but not so much that they screamed ‘look at me’.

And it worked like a charm.

All eyes were always on Izuku—and all hands wanted to touch.

But Tomura didn’t let anyone.

He dangled Izuku in front of clients as a way to gain attention. It was successful. Many people kissed Tomura's ring for the prospect of getting closer to Izuku. But they never did. Izuku was entirely disinterested in anyone in Hadeus, and even if he was, Izuku was sure Tomura would rather gut a person than let anything happen.

Tomura was ferociously protective of Izuku's body, like he was guarding it.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku reached the usual underground entrance of Hadeus that was exclusive to Vipers.

He swiped his watch and the blue lights lit up. He rode the elevator down the steep drop patiently. When he reached his destination on the first circle, Izuku began his descent. He walked quickly while also saying hello to people he knew.

When he finally reached the third circle, Izuku looked around for the restaurant.

His brother wanted him there to help ease a business deal with a Thai client. That usually meant he wanted Izuku to look pretty in the background while playing the violin. It helped add an air of sophistication to the mix while Tomura negotiated.

Izuku re-read the text Tomura sent him. He was to meet in the number six private lounge. Izuku walked along the endless string of rooms. Each one had long, velvet green curtains with golden numbers above. Izuku found the golden six and stopped in front of it.

There were two bodyguards placed out front. They patted Izuku down then stepped aside.

Izuku pulled the curtains back, walked into the private lounge, then froze.

All around were Yakuza members, distinguishable by their tattoos and threatening stares. They were on the couch. Against the wall. Behind the private bar and the two tables. Some were standing by the piano that was off to the side of the room laughing as they pressed some of the keys.

Standing in the middle of the dim room was Chisaki.

A haze of fog encompassed him from all the cigar smoke. He was tall and intimidating like he always was as he held a cup of whiskey in his hands. Chisaki was dressed in an all black pinstripe suit and a long, expensive jacket with black fur on the collar hanging off his shoulders like a cape.

His piercing gold eyes cut through all the smog and landed on Izuku.

"Oh, I'm sorry for intruding, Mr. Chisaki," Izuku quickly spluttered. He bowed deeply and began to walk right back out. "I must've gotten the rooms mixed up—"

"—You're in the right one," Chisaki corrected.

Izuku stopped.

He eyed Chisaki. The powerful man smiled at him in a way that was reserved for people who were informal with each other.

“Sorry for the ambush,” Chisaki said while tilting his head. “Your brother is running a bit late. He canceled the other business meeting for one with me. I hope you don’t mind.”

Izuku hesitated slightly. He did mind—but he could never voice that considering Chisaki was the most powerful man in Japan.

“Of course not,” Izuku quickly said. “Always a pleasure to see you, Mr. Chisaki.”

Chisaki curiously studied Izuku’s bare arms.

Then slowly the room bled back into normal conversations. Izuku breathed out to steady himself. It’s not that he didn’t like the Yakuza—he just didn’t feel comfortable around people who could collect his head and have no consequences for it. Tomura was one of the most powerful people in Hadeus now, sure, but he was not as powerful as the Yakuza Heir.

Izuku glanced around and next to the piano was a black violin.

It was perched beside an intricately designed music stand. Izuku knew that was his station and took his place. He carefully tuned the violin and looked at the music sheet Tomura picked out for him to play.

He sat down in the music chair and glanced at the door.

Where is Tomura? Izuku thought.

Suddenly, a burly man walked up to Izuku. He was wearing all purple and a crooked smile. The smell of Hennessy was laced in his breath.

“Wow. You’re more stunning in person,” the Yakuza member said, swaying slightly. He leaned down into Izuku’s space a little too close for comfort. “The rumors really don’t do you justice.”

“Thank you,” Izuku replied with an affable smile.

Without being prompted, the drunken man’s hand shot out. He went for Izuku’s hair, entranced by the shiny curls.

Izuku quickly caught the man’s wrist and twisted it backwards. Izuku’s face didn’t change when the man hissed out loud in pain. His yell drew attention from everyone in the room. Izuku kept twisting with the brute strength people always forgot he possessed.

As the man screamed for Izuku to let go, Izuku stared coldly at him.

Being touched without his permission was Izuku’s biggest pet peeve. These days, any unwanted touch bitterly reminded him that he was property. People seemed to forget that while he was attractive he was not an attraction they could freely paw at.

An amused smirk stretched across Chisaki's lips.

"Careful," Tomura's voice suddenly cut in. "I've cut off men's hands for that."

Everyone turned to see Tomura entering the room.

The scars on his face grew with him, maturing his features into cracked porcelain. His hair was pure white now with a slight tinge of blue. The long hair was pulled back into a half up and down bun with a red string. And in his eyes was a ruthlessness that refined over the last five years.

If looks could kill, a single glance from Tomura could slit a thousand throats.

In his hands were three thick, silver chain leashes. At the end of each one was an all black Doberman. Tomura's guard dogs: Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos. The same as Izuku, Tomura was also a believer in fate. He believed he was destined to be the ruler of the Tokyo underground. As an homage he bought three all black dogs to mimic Hades' Cerberus.

Izuku let go of the man's wrist to bow at Tomura's arrival—as did the rest of the room.

Even Chisaki gave a half shallow bow.

The drunken man staggered off to the corner nursing his wrist. Chisaki opened his arms and welcomed Tomura with an amiable smirk.

"So glad you could fit me in," Chisaki said as Tomura approached him.

"My pleasure," Tomura said. "I'm happy you returned my calls. Now, shall we get to business?"

"Lets."

With his hand that was holding the glass of whiskey, Chisaki gestured for Tomura to join him on the leather couch. The couch was facing directly towards the piano and where Izuku was stationed. Tomura glanced one time at Izuku with a sharp nod. There was a glint in his eye that was calculating as he gestured for Izuku to begin playing.

The two influential men began their conversation on the couch as Izuku held up his violin.

Part of Izuku was curious as to what they were discussing, but the other part of Izuku didn't care.

Tomura was always closing deals, making connections, and ensuring that The Viper Academy was a staple of the underground. He'd done a successful job at establishing them as more of a crime family than a business these days.

Izuku began to play the alluring music that was on the sheet. He knew this song well, it was Tomura's favorite. Dark and eerie. The melody of the song drowned out all conversation that could reach his ears. Slowly, Izuku was lulled into a trance that carried him elsewhere. Izuku kept his eyes trained on the music sheet as he played, but he imagined himself somewhere else.

Whenever he played the violin, Izuku thought of Kacchan.

It was involuntary but he accepted his haunting in stride. Without fail, he could visibly see the old plaza the way it used to be. He could see the two of them holding hands in a hazy memory below the broken angel and hear The Dance of The Lovebirds so clearly.

Izuku smiled slightly. He enjoyed the comfort that one good year of his life brought him.

When he arrived at the end of the song, Izuku snapped out of his imagination.

Several Yakuza members in the room clapped, and others paid him no mind and continued to drink. The weak applause was almost laughable. Izuku immediately began playing the next song, and curiously turned his eyes to his brother.

Izuku almost messed up his note. Both Chisaki and Tomura were staring deeply into him. Neither man was talking. Heat began to burn at Izuku's cheeks from the unusual attention.

Then Chisaki cocked his head and gave him a small wave.

Izuku blushed and quickly cut his eyes back to the music sheet.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After about an hour of sitting through the suffocating smell of cigarettes, cigars, and liquor, the meeting concluded.

Izuku stopped playing when Chisaki stood up and straightened out his jacket. The simple gesture was like pulling puppet strings on all his men. They all began packing up their things.

Izuku stayed seated and waited for Tomura's signal. It was then that Chisaki held out his hand for Tomura to shake. Tomura's eyes instantly sparked with fire. Like someone who conquered a long battle.

He shook Chisaki's hand in a firm handshake, and bowed his head respectfully.

Tomura then cut his eyes to Izuku.

Izuku stared back at him patiently, ready to leave. But he didn't get his wish when Tomura walked away towards the back of the room. Izuku watched as his brother began chatting with the second in command of the Yakuza. Tomura gestured to the man behind the bar and they started making drinks and chatting.

Chisaki then walked straight up to Izuku.

Izuku looked up. Chisaki was smiling at him a little too nicely.

“You play beautifully,” Chisaki said first.

“Thank you, Mr. Chisaki,” Izuku said. He bowed his head and nervously shifted in his seat.

“Do you…like classical music a lot?” Chisaki asked.

Izuku nodded his head. “I do. It’s my favorite type of music.”

“Would you enjoy events like symphonies or masquerade balls then?”

Izuku looked around and noticed a couple of Yakuza members stealing glances at them. Izuku smiled the best he could before answering.

“I suppose I would, Mr. Chisaki,” Izuku said honestly. “I’ve never been to one.”

“Please, call me Kai,” Chisaki corrected and laughed a little. “No need to be so formal all the time.”

He pulled a seat up next to Izuku and scooted in closely. Izuku froze fully, entirely taken back. He never got personal with Chisaki—that was something only Tomura ever did. He was nervous and unsure how to exactly speak with a client. Izuku glanced at Tomura whose back turned towards them.

“Try it,” Chisaki commanded with an unnerving smile. “Call me Kai.”

Izuku opened his mouth hesitantly.

“Ka…Kai,” Izuku whispered.

The name against his tongue immediately tasted wrong, like rotten boiled eggs. Izuku averted his eyes, cleared his throat, and focused on the violin in his lap.

“Sorry,” Izuku quickly apologized. “I am not used to addressing you that way, Mr. Chisaki.”

“Hah. Don’t worry.” Chisaki laughed. “I’ll get you used to calling me Kai soon. I had a feeling you would be shy about it.”

Izuku was about to ask what that meant—but he got his answer.

Without a word, Chisaki leaned in close. Their shoulders touched and Chisaki’s hand stroked his thigh. Izuku nearly jumped out of his seat.

“You’re very sweet,” Chisaki whispered. “I’ll try my best to be gentle with you.”

Izuku’s first instinct was to break Chisaki’s wrist.

Izuku’s second instinct was his self preservation. It grabbed a hold of him and reminded him that this was the most powerful man in the country. Breaking Chisaki’s wrist would guarantee Izuku’s neck being snapped within a millisecond.

Izuku steadily grew disquieted as Chisaki's gaze roamed his body. Izuku cut his eyes towards Tomura. His older brother was watching them. His cold eyes were locked onto the hand resting against Izuku's thigh. Izuku waited for his brother to step in like usual—

—but Tomura did nothing.

He turned away.

Izuku's blood ran cold when it all clicked together.

The hand on Izuku's thigh squeezed tenderly and then Chisaki stood up. Chisaki gestured with his head for his men to leave. Like loyal ants they all followed. One by one each Yakuza member lined up and poured out of the private lounge. Chisaki and his second in command were the last ones of the Yakuza left.

Right as Chisaki was about to exit, he stopped in the doorway.

He glanced happily at Izuku. Then glanced thankfully at Tomura.

"Pleasure doing business with you, Tomura," Chisaki said with a head bow.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The whole walk home an emotion like simmering coal forged in Izuku. It burned from the bottom of his spirit and crawled up his skin. It started at his legs then passed his stomach to sit at his throat. Dread made Izuku's throat swell until it burned.

Tomura didn't bother to acknowledge him and it infuriated Izuku. His brother stared forward the whole time, walking slightly ahead with the three dogs. The two brothers stayed silent the entire walk, until they arrived back home.

When the door to their penthouse closed shut, that burning emotion ripped right out of Izuku's throat.

"What did you do?" Izuku harshly whispered.

Tomura's expression barely changed. He pressed his lips into a contemplative line. He ignored Izuku as he gave his dogs treats and patted their heads. When the three animals wandered off to their corner of the living room, Tomura turned and glared at him.

"What I did was secure The Viper Academy's future," Tomura answered. "I finally obtained a seat at the Tokyo Underground Council after five years of hard work."

"In exchange for what?" Izuku pushed.

He stared deeply into his brother's cold eyes with a profound sense of anger.

"A couple of things," Tomura finally admitted with a sigh. He crossed his arms and lowered his head away from Izuku. "In exchange for the seat he wanted access to all my connections.

I needed to do extra tasks for him like kill off budding rival gangs. Additionally he wanted a payment. Of course, I couldn't come up with the dollar amount he proposed."

Tomura licked his dry lips.

"I knew there was one more option," Tomura whispered. "Chisaki has an obsession with…purity. I knew his interest in you doubled when your skin cleared. Then his interest tripled when I told him how you were untouched. So I asked him if he would be interested in buying your virginity to cover the gap in payment. He agreed, happily."

The floor beneath Izuku's feet felt like it gave.

Tomura glanced at him with pity, but there was zero regret in his eyes.

"It's all been signed, and the seat will be officially mine after consummation," Tomura continued. "When he calls on you, I'll let you know. I know this isn't ideal, but I promise you it'll be worth it soon enough."

"How much?" Izuku whispered.

"That's not important—"

"—Tell me," Izuku demanded and his voice cracked. "How much?"

"Eighty million yen," Tomura answered reluctantly. "Be flattered, most assassin's virginities go for just three million. I'll get you something nice with the money as a thank you. But in the meantime, you need to get your beauty rest. We can go over everything in the morning at breakfast. Goodnight, Izuku."

Tomura turned on his heels.

When his back was facing Izuku, the ghost of Hiryu appeared. Hiryu was glaring a hole through Tomura's skull and his expression was twisted in hate. His nostrils flared in defiance.

"No," Hiryu's phantom said.

Tomura stopped walking.

He looked over his shoulder with a sharpened glare.

"What did you say?" Tomura questioned.

Izuku blinked.

Then he recognized he was the one who said 'No.'

Tomura turned towards him. His face was apprehensive at Izuku's outright refusal. When their gazes clashed, a new emotion in Izuku's spine hardened. It molded into his muscles at the realization he was the one to talk back.

Like mist being blown away, the imagery of Hiryu faded. The illusion vanished to show Izuku it was really himself glaring hatefully at Tomura.

Tomura was taken back by the depraved leer.

Izuku immediately fixed his face but didn't change his mind.

"I-I said no," Izuku repeated. "There has to be something else he would want, I'm n-not agreeing to that."

Tomura scoffed and dismissively waved his hand. "Izuku. This is a seat at the Underground Tokyo Council in exchange for a single fuck. Think of the bigger picture here."

Izuku took a step back and shook his head. "Tomura, please. I-I don't want to do that—N-Not with Chisaki—"

"Why? Because he's not blond?" Tomura jabbed cruelly.

"That's not it," Izuku whispered. "I don't like Chisaki in that way."

"I know I said everyone has their preferences, but please, spare me the spoiled brat speech," Tomura exasperated. "This is the Yakuza heir we're talking about. One of the most powerful men in Japan. This is the closest thing to romance you'll get. Maybe if you're lucky he'll buy you again and it'll bud into some sort of ritual. I would allow you to date, if it was Chisaki."

"But I don't want him," Izuku said solidly. He blinked through the tears in his eyes as he clutched his shirt. "This is my body we're talking about, Tomura—"

"—It's not your body," Tomura snapped. "Don't you get it by now? Your opinion doesn't matter. Your desires and happiness do not matter. You're a viper, not a person. Your body has never been yours. Nine owned it before and now I own it."

Gradually, that feeling of simmering coal strengthened in Izuku's chest.

It burned hotter each passing second he dared to keep eye contact with his brother.

"Izuku," Tomura warned. He lowered his voice to a threatening octave as his eyes darkened. "I'm doing this for the better of both of us, you know that right? When I get this seat, we won't have to be at the whim of clients all the time—we can call the shots. All you have to do is take it like a whore for one night. You're going to do it, and you're going to do it happily. Are we clear?"

No. They weren't.

Izuku never considered how he would lose his virginity. He'd forgotten it was still at risk of it being taken after this long. It was the one thing that belonged to him—something The Academy never possessed. Only him.

"I said—are we clear?" Tomura asked when Izuku stayed silent too long.

Izuku's breathing slowly became heavy. His nostrils flared as his glare deepened. The longer he looked into Tomura's eyes, the more he felt betrayed and used.

Tomura sauntered up to Izuku. He hooked his finger under Izuku's shirt collar and pulled down to expose his mark. The simple motion was a bitter slap in the face—but what Tomura said next triggered Izuku like nothing else.

"217, I said, are we clear?" Tomura hissed.

Izuku snapped.

His arm reeled back as he did the unthinkable: he punched Tomura dead in the face.

The full strength he used snapped Tomura's head to the side and the tears in his eyes fell. A visceral cathartic feeling poured out of him, extending into the punch. He mourned the thought of the last thing that was his being stolen from him.

Izuku swung again through his blurry vision. This time however Tomura caught his wrist. His brother twisted his arm unnaturally backwards. It inflicted excruciating pain but Izuku gritted his teeth through it. Izuku used his other hand to swipe at Tomura's face. He clawed straight down and drew fresh blood.

Tomura yelled shrilly in bloodcurdling agony.

"You ungrateful fucking brat," Tomura spat and he flung Izuku down to the floor.

Izuku began to scramble upright but quickly Tomura straddled him and pushed him back down. They struggled back and forth with Izuku biting, kicking, and scratching. Tomura violently shook Izuku, slamming him against the floor. Their whirlwind shook the furniture with their loud crashes and bumps.

Immediately the three dogs began barking loudly, adding to the noise.

Izuku twisted his body, trying to escape. He screamed, "Get off me!" as he reeled back his elbow and sharply struck Tomura in his nose.

A sick crack filled the space.

Blood trickled down Tomura's nose and he grew furious. His expression sunk into destructive anger as he tried to force Izuku down in submission. He clawed his hands into Izuku's hair and roughly pushed Izuku's face into the carpet and dragged him.

Izuku tried to shake Tomura off with all he could. The burn of the carpet scraped against his cheek as he tried to struggle away. But his brother over powered him and pinned him down with his pelvis pressed directly against his backside.

"Is this how you would rather lose your virginity?" Tomura hissed violently. He tightened his grip on Izuku's curls until he was ripping out several hairs. "Eating carpet like your goddamn mother did when she fucking conceived you? Hah?! Because that can be arranged and you would have wished it was Chisaki."

“I said g-get off!” Izuku screamed.

“—‘Zuku?” A tiny voice whispered.

Both Izuku and Tomura halted.

Izuku’s eyes went wide as he looked up. Standing on the staircase was Katsuma. His big eyes were wearily looking between the two of them. He was worried for Izuku and clearly scared of Tomura as he hid slightly behind the staircase bars.

“Go back to bed, Katsuma,” Tomura commanded.

Katsuma didn’t move. He glanced at Izuku.

“Do—Do as he says, Katsuma,” Izuku said with a comforting smile. “I’ll be upstairs in a minute.”

Katsuma hesitantly went back up the stairs. He glanced backwards several times and then shut the door to his room.

Izuku’s body sagged, and he rested his throbbing head into the brittle carpet.

Tomura roughly exhaled and recollected himself. He let go of Izuku and sat back on his hunches. Izuku rolled over and sat up, still glaring at Tomura. Tomura wiped the blood from his injuries and snarled when he saw how much damage Izuku inflicted to his face—yet again.

“If you don’t do this, Izuku, I will hurt Katsuma,” Tomura threatened coldly.

Izuku stiffened. “You wouldn’t. He’s my little—”

“—Oh, but I would,” Tomura cruelly promised. “He’s about the age where Nine would start sending kids to the basement for punishments. Maybe he’s old enough to start taking your punishments for you. Is that what you want?”

Tomura stood up and his shadow fell over Izuku. He knew Katsuma was one of Izuku’s weak points.

Izuku’s stomach twisted in knots and it was like cotton had been shoved in his throat. He gripped the carpet beneath his fingers in pure, unchecked rage—but there was nothing he could do. He was powerless against Tomura. He was always powerless.

“Don’t hurt him.” Izuku finally lowered his head in submission. “I’ll do it. Just don’t touch him.”

“Glad you see it my way,” Tomura said. He wiped his bleeding lip and shook his head. “Good night, Izuku.”

“Good night,” Izuku whispered from his clenched jaw.

“Good night—what?” Tomura hissed.

Deep resentment flickered in Izuku’s heart but he didn’t show it.

He pulled his lips to say the rancid words, “Goodnight, Big Brother.”

Izuku walked into Katsuma’s room feeling numb.

Katsuma was still wide awake in his bed. The loud noises and screams must’ve terrified him. Katsuma’s big brown eyes were full of tears and red at the rims. When he laid eyes on Izuku, Katsuma reached his arms up to him.

Izuku wordlessly walked over to Katsuma and crawled into the tiny bed with him.

Katsuma began crying softly and Izuku stroked his hair until he fell back asleep. As Izuku listened to Katsuma’s tiny sniffles fade, he thought about his place in the giant machine that was The Viper Academy. He tried to envision himself as a dutiful, working clog.

Izuku tried to picture if he could stand back idly when the time came for Katsuma to start his brutal training.

The basement. The lashes. The Cull. The poison. The pain that only produced more pain. It was a cruel, vicious cycle that would never be broken once Katsuma got his mark. The original fate he had of a warm home would be buried, and his hands would be soaked in red forever.

A dangerous resolve settled into Izuku.

He saw a vision of a giant viper made of stone, slithering around in circles. It endlessly ate its own tail with the help of them all being new additions to keep it growing. The body grew longer with the help of Ibara. The help of Jin. Hiryu. Himiko. Sen. Aoyama. Kota. Eri. Everyone. Every new addition was a new link in the chain that kept the viper spinning. And sitting at the head commanding them to be eaten was Tomura.

Resentment boiled Izuku’s blood when he envisioned Katsuma being another link in the chain.

Izuku was going to drive a wedge straight into the cycle and snap its neck, even if it was the last thing he did.

“I’ll get you out,” Izuku promised in a whisper. “You’re going to go back to your family.”

When Katsuma and Tomura were fast asleep, Izuku took a long walk around their large home.

He wandered the sterile white hallways like a forgotten shadow. He passed the classrooms. The dorm rooms. He passed the suites where many of the other vipers lived. Izuku stared at all the different white doors that were designated for their life.

He held his hands in front of him as he studied his palms. All he could see was venomous sin. It was too late for him. There was no saving him from this fate but Katsuma was truly pure. There were people out there who loved him, unlike Izuku.

Izuku's brain tried to search for an answer to free Katsuma and all the other children. But nothing came to mind right away. He desperately needed time. He needed a shit ton of time to break into the records, track down each family, and then deliver each kid to their rightful home.

But how?

As Izuku was walking, he came up upon Tomura's office that was once Nine's. The golden double doors were shut tight but a dim, yellow light was pouring out from beneath them.

Izuku cautiously slowed his stride.

Who was inside if Tomura was in bed asleep?

Izuku glanced behind him once, then quietly walked up to the doors. He stayed light on his feet as he crouched down. He pressed his ear against the door, surprised to hear two faint voices chatting inside.

"I haven't been able to reach Peter Moore in years," One said. "That white devil continually dodges my inquiries and last we spoke he threatened to breach the NDA he signed. For that alone, he needs to be eliminated."

"Have you discussed this with the Governor?" Ms. Nagant asked. "Surely he will take care of it."

"Unfortunately the Governor doesn't accept direct calls from me at this time," One huffed. "It's an election year. To protect himself, he doesn't converse with me during election season. I'm afraid we're on our own. I have no way of knowing if the Governor plans to eliminate Peter Moore, so we need to do it ourselves to cover our bases."

"Good call," Ms. Nagant hummed. "Well, I received information that he's hiding under the name of Henry Sekai. He left the Americas to come to Japan under a new identity as a romance specialist. He even has a ridiculous resort called Ai no Rakuen that he's now using to lure people into human trafficking."

"Hm. Would it be easy to get close to him?"

"No," Ms. Nagant said unhappily. "The resort is full of his operations and security. It would take effort to get close to him and snuff him out."

One tapped his fingers against a wooden surface. "I will probably ask one of my top vipers to do this as soon as possible, but I am unsure which. We can finish this conversation tomorrow when I consult Tomura on who I should choose."

Footsteps began approaching the door and Izuku quickly backtracked around a corner. He ducked into the shadows as the double doors opened.

Izuku digested the information as he gained an idea.

ɯɯɯ

When Izuku went back to their penthouse, he lay awake in his bed. He was on his laptop researching Ai no Rakuen to death.

Love's Paradise.

When he saw it was located in sunny Okinawa, Izuku's chest filled with butterflies. He'd never been to Okinawa. He knew there was a subtle blueness in that statement considering its where he and Kacchan planned so foolishly to run away too. It was also the location of the romance novel he was in love with.

Izuku's curiosity was fully hooked as he looked at the palm trees on his screen. With every scroll, he was bombarded with pastel colors of pink, red, and purple. And with every click, his eyes lit up.

Couples' massages? Pool side mingling? Beach picnics and romantic hiking?

Izuku could barely contain his smile. It was perfect.

Izuku's heart clutched with guilty pleasure as he stared at the glittering hearts on the website. What a shame this was really a human trafficking ploy. Izuku could easily see the allure. If he was a normal person, he probably would fall prey to this candy colored death trap.

Izuku bit his lip as he eyed the In The Mood For Love poster on his wall.

This could work to his advantage.

He needed time to make a plan on how to get Katsuma out. But if he could do that before Chisaki claimed his virginity, even better.

Only Kami knew what kind of chaos would spread over Tokyo the day Tomura gained control of that seat. The power he would possess had the potential to exceed One's.

Izuku could envision Tomura's vengeful hand splaying across the council table. He imagined blackness seeping from Tomura's fingertips like spilled ink and into the cracks. The flesh of the table would rot like gangrene and slowly the whole city would be consumed. One by one every citizen in Tokyo would be swallowed into the empty blackhole that was Tomura until nothing was left.

If Tomura got that seat, Izuku knew he could kiss any dreams of freedom for Katsuma and the other kids goodbye.

When the morning came Izuku took a page out of Tomura's playbook: he bypassed the middle man and went straight for One.

He learned from Tomura at breakfast that One was in town for the week. One would be working out of Tomura's office that was a floor below their penthouse. That was code for 'be on your best behavior and don't embarrass me'. Izuku took the hint and Katsuma quietly hunched into himself.

While Tomura was in the shower, Izuku snuck into Tomura's room.

He quickly fed the three dogs treats so they wouldn't bark. Next he peeked through his brother's planner. He thumbed the pages quickly until he found the current date. He saw the crammed schedule and read Tomura was meeting with One in exactly forty minutes.

Izuku skipped his shower and threw on his clothes.

He jogged lightly to the office and took a deep breath. His hands were shaking as he realized this was his first step in trying to out maneuver Tomura. There would be no turning back after this.

With all the bravery he possessed, Izuku knocked on the door. One's deep voice commanded for him to come in. Izuku smiled disarmingly as he pushed open the doors.

"Izuku, welcome," One said while scribbling in a notebook. "What can I help you with today?"

Izuku went straight to the point. He held his chin up high as he looked One in the eye. "I wanted to offer up my services to kill Peter Moore for you, sir. It would bring me great pleasure."

"And how do you know I need Peter Moore killed?" One questioned curiously.

"I…overheard you last night," Izuku shamefully admitted.

One clicked his pen and sat it down. "Eavesdropping is typically frowned upon."

"Sorry, sir," Izuku said quickly. He pushed through his nerves to remain calm. "But I did some research and I would be the best person for this job. I have an appearance that makes people instinctively underestimate me. Along with that, I can blend in effortlessly to the romantic resort scene because of my unsuspecting appearance and demeanor."

One raised a brow, clearly impressed and taken back at the forwardness. But One liked proactive Vipers.

"What would make you better for this job over Jin or Ibara? They are more experienced in espionage than you."

“Jin and Ibara both have the mark of the viper,” Izuku pointed out. “I am the only top viper that is not tattooed. Moore may see the viper tattoos on their skin and become immediately suspicious. He knows too much about us to not think anything about snake imagery. However, I can simply put a bandaid over my number and he’d never know I was from The Academy.”

One then looked down at his own hands.

Both his knuckles were graced with a simplistic viper tattoo. It snaked its way between his fingers to run across his hand. He wiggled his appendages rhythmically to make it dance.

“You have a fair point,” One agreed. “Do you think you can get on top of this soon? I have a trip to Czechia this weekend. I would like to have that roach killed by the time I come back.”

Izuku nodded and put on a sickly sweet smile. “I can head out within the hour, sir.”

“Hah!” One smiled. He clapped his large hands together with a thunder-like boom. “I like your eagerness to kill. You remind me of myself a bit.”

Izuku bowed his head. “That’s the highest compliment any viper could ever be told.”

One began pulling out paperwork and invited Izuku to take a seat in the chair across from him. They chatted idly for a while, ironing out details. Izuku shared all his knowledge about the resort he conjured up last night. One jotted down various information and nodded his head.

When the ink was dry, One took a second to study him. He tilted his head and his eyes honed in on Izuku’s hair.

“Your hair is a very unique shade of dark green,” One said suddenly. “I’ve only ever seen it once before.”

There was a weight to his words that made Izuku contemplative. But Inko appeared in his mind and he immediately shoved her back down.

Right as Izuku was about to respond, the doors behind him opened. Both Izuku and One turned their heads to see Tomura entering with paperwork in hand.

Tomura’s expression tightened to surprise upon seeing Izuku.

“Am I late for the debrief?” Tomura asked slowly. He glanced at One. “I wasn’t aware Izuku was joining us as well.”

“You’re not late at all,” One reassured. He leaned over the desk and grinned. “Izuku here made an impromptu visit. He offered to kill Peter Moore for me starting today.”

Tomura’s mouth hung open slightly, entirely blindsided. “I—I was not aware of this assignment.”

He cut his eyes at Izuku and Izuku kept an innocent expression. He decided quickly he needed to begin using his doe eyes for more than assignments if he was going to outwit Tomura.

“The meeting I called you for today was going to discuss the Peter Moore situation,” One said. “I was going to consult you about who would be the best assassin for the job, but Izuku already informed me it would be him.”

“This is a job Ibara can do,” Tomura countered.

“Ah. Well. Izuku pointed out that Ibara has the mark of the viper,” One said. He held up his right hand to emphasize his point and wiggled his fingers. “Izuku is the only one who would be able to go undercover for this close up mission fully without being detected. And I don’t trust any lower ranked viper with this assignment.”

Tomura’s lips pressed so tightly before saying, “but Izuku is needed here.”

“For what?” One questioned. “What could be more important than getting rid of that vermin?”

Izuku and One both waited for an answer.

Izuku knew the answer was selling his virginity to Chisaki. But did One?

Based on Tomura’s immediate silence—Izuku concluded One didn’t have a clue about the under the table deal. Which was information Izuku could use to his own advantage. Tomura was keeping the table seat a secret from One. This meant he wouldn’t dare force Izuku into Chisaki’s bed as long as he was on assignments that One knew about.

“Actually, it’s not that important,” Tomura backtracked. He gave a shallow bow at the waist and smiled curtly. “Izuku would be the best choice for the job.”

“Great!” One exclaimed. “Glad we’re all on the same page. Izuku, begin to pack your things. You’re heading to Okinawa today. Remember, take out Moore quietly. Leave no trace behind.”

One handed him a heavy red folder with a smile.

The weight of the folder in Izuku’s hands felt like the first step to Katsuma’s freedom.

ɯɯɯ

As Izuku packed his bags, Tomura loomed in his doorway with folded arms.

“You can delay the inevitable but it is still the inevitable,” Tomura spat. “Fate is fate.”

Izuku looked over his shoulder innocently. He stared Tomura dead in the eyes and played coy the best he could.

“I’m not delaying anything, Big Brother,” Izuku said naively and gave a gentle gaze. “I walked by and heard One talking about Moore and did what any Viper would do. I offered my services.” Izuku bowed his head to add to the act. “I know you know best and only mean well with me and Chisaki. When I come back, I will be happy to do my duty to help secure the seat for you.”

Tomura’s suspicions softened at the words. It was exactly what he wanted to hear. Izuku knew this because it was exactly the opposite of what he felt.

Tomura nodded, deciding that this was simply a blip in his road to power. He exhaled tiredly through his nose and walked to stand next to Izuku. He picked up one of the pink shirts Izuku picked out and began folding it.

“Try to make this a quick assignment,” Tomura whispered. He placed the shirt in the suitcase with care. “Chisaki isn’t known for his patience.”

Izuku nodded with a plastic smile. “I’ll come back in a few days, tops.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

First Day in Paradise

The scenery was more breathtaking than Izuku could ever imagine. He heard all the rumors about how captivating Okinawa was. He’d seen the pictures. But no photograph or words did it justice. The crisp blue sky felt bluer and the palm trees were standing taller than most he’d ever seen. The turning tides looked as if they were waving to him from over the horizon.

With the first step off the private jet, a strange breeze blew through.

It was steadfast and nearly took Izuku’s sun hat with it. Izuku lightly yelped as he grabbed the straw hat and pulled it back on top of his head firmly. He steadied himself and began making his way to the resort.

Okay, he told himself in a small prep talk. Kill Moore quickly, rest up, and come up with a game plan in the extra days. No getting distracted.

Izuku settled into his resolve as he lugged his giant, pink luggage behind him.

He took the first taxi he could find and read through the decorated pamphlet as he rode inside. A delicate blush covered his cheeks as he read the brochure. There were many pictures of couples on the inside and it was packaged perfectly to sell romance.

Maybe…a small distraction wouldn’t hurt anything, Izuku reasoned. He could indulge a bit while he was here—it was basically like being directly transported into one of his novels.

There was no harm in participating in some of the activities.

Izuku walked into the dazzling resort with wide eyes and a full heart. He glanced around, taken back by the crowds. The lobby was densely packed with couples all holding hands and singles ready to mingle. Every person was dressed in bright, lovely colors. It nearly made Izuku's eyes hurt by how much of a contrast this was from his usual sterile, colorless life.

He smiled longingly when he saw two women kiss and hold hands.

Okay, he was going to enjoy this more than he thought. How cool was this? He got to have a front row seat to true love for the first time in his life! As he watched the couple, he hoped one day Katsuma could have something normal like that. It was too late for him—his sins could never be forgiven but Katsuma's whole life was ahead of him.

Izuku took a spot in line and waited patiently. He reviewed his cover:

His name for the week was Hiroji Chiba. A young man from the countryside who was here on vacation by himself after a bad break up. Izuku planned on getting close to Moore by potentially flirting with the staff until he got more information about Moore's blindspots. Then he would execute his assignment from there.

The line was moving fluidly as Izuku reviewed his new persona. Then the line came to a halt when it was his turn to be serviced.

Suddenly, the bellhop ran off somewhere, leaving only an apology behind.

Izuku was a patient man so he didn't mind at first. But after a while, people behind him grew antsy. He peaked around, trying to figure out what was the hold up. But no one ever came to the front.

If he was into writing reviews, he would strike off one star for how long he was on his feet.

Then suddenly, the person behind him spoke.

"You have got to be shitting me," a voice Izuku was all too familiar with groaned.

Everything froze in time. The bird stopped chirping. The people stopped laughing. Several eyes crawled towards him and absolute annoyance trickled down Izuku's spine.

Slowly, he turned around to face his worst possible scenario.

Looming over him was the stranger from both his dreams and nightmares.

Over the last five years the stranger was a steady constant. They orbited around one another like they were each other's center of gravity. They were always fatally drawn together over and over. In their push and pull, Izuku got to watch the stranger grow into a dangerously beautiful human.

Every time Izuku was running away from this stranger, he noted the new differences. His sharp features grew stronger. His salient high cheekbones were fully refined. Even his eyes had grown more striking and the hue of his blonde hair only seemed more alluring.

Which helped nothing. This man was a flat out liability for such an important assignment.

“No,” Izuku said immediately. He shook his head quickly. “Nu-uh. I refuse. This is not happening—”

“—I agree, it’s not. You need to fucking leave in the next five seconds,” The stranger barked.

Immediately Izuku bristled. “I’m not going anywhere. Why are you here!?”

“Me?! What the fuck are you doing here! If you’re here to screw up another one of my marks I swear—”

“—I’m not the one always sticking his gun in other people’s business!”

“Yes, the fuck you do—” The stranger paused and closed his eyes in a poor attempt to calm his illy controlled temper. He ran his hands down his face in disbelief. “Please tell me you’re here because you’re some dumbass hopeless romantic and not because you’re here on an assignment.”

Izuku spluttered, unsure what to say in public. As he was tongue tied, the stranger spoke up again.

“I’m not going to argue with you, Deku. You’re going to listen carefully and follow what I say and leave.”

“I need to leave?” Over his dead body. If he went back to Tokyo now, Tomura would strip him naked, put a bow on his ass and drop him in front of Chisaki’s doorstep. “I was here first!”

“Oh shut up, we’re not five!”

“I swear if this ends up like that time we were in Taiwan I’m going to actually murder you.”

The stranger’s lip curled. He glared at Izuku until his eyes narrowed into dagger-like slits. He leaned down to face Izuku at eye level until his breath was against his lips.

“As if you have the guts to kill me.”

Izuku halted all together and his eyes widened. All the times he failed to pull the trigger stacked up in front of him. The stranger’s eyes were so downright vicious it made Izuku’s heart skip a beat.

…Did the stranger somehow know about his weakness?

“—Well, what do we have here!” A booming voice cut through the tension.

Both men stiffened and turned their eyes to the counter. Waiting there was a tall man in a white suit with a golden White Dove pin on his collar. He had pinkly fair skin, brown hair, and light brown eyes. Izuku bit his tongue when he recognized the newcomer immediately.

It was Peter Moore. His mark.

The unsuspecting target laughed and gestured to them to come up all the way to the counter. Both Izuku and his stranger glanced discreetly at each other. The look read ‘go along with it’. It was clear the stranger knew who this was as well.

Izuku stood up straight as they awkwardly walked up to the counter together.

“I’m so sorry that no one has come to the counter yet,” Moore said. “But I have to just say you two are hilarious. You remind me of me and my wife at your age, ha! Always at each other’s throats, we’ve also been to Taiwan. Lovely place.”

Izuku nearly choked and the stranger next to him fumbled slightly.

Moore was listening to their squabble?

“You are married, right?” Moore questioned with a minor frown when Izuku and the stranger didn’t say anything. The affection in his eyes faded to be replaced with sharp suspicion. “You two fight as though you’ve been together for ten years, if not how do you two know each other?”

“Y-Yes!” Izuku quickly said. “W-We are, um—”

Izuku looked up at the stranger, trying to search for an answer to this awkward situation. In a split second, red eyes transported him back to when he was a child. He envisioned him and Kacchan creating wedding bands from old strings.

“This…is my husband,” Izuku said suddenly.

Silence.

Shit.

The word ‘husband’ slipped out before he could catch it. Izuku wanted to slap himself for blurting out that word. Why hadn’t he said boyfriend? Or date? He quickly pinned a forced smile across his face and luckily for him, the stranger got the hint as well.

“Yup,” The stranger quickly agreed. He smiled so fake Izuku was sure he’d turn into a Ken doll right there. “Verbal berating is our own special way of affection. Excuse anything you may have heard.”

“Yeah, you know how it is,” Izuku chuckled playfully. He reached up and pinched the stranger’s cheek hard since he couldn’t slap him like he wanted to. “Sometimes you just really...really want to wring your spouse’s neck after so many years together.”

When Peter Moore laughed, Izuku wanted to die.

He wasn’t going to make it back to Tokyo in a single piece. He engaged in light conversation with Peter Moore and his curse of a stranger.

His target smiled too happily at them and asked, “What name is the reservation under?”

“—Bakugou is our last name,” The stranger suddenly said. “It should be under Taro Bakugou.”

Izuku held himself back from scoffing.

Taro Bakugou. What a fake sounding name. It was baffling to Izuku that the stranger couldn’t even pick a name that sounded the least bit real. Whose last name was Bakugou?

He glanced at the stranger and the stranger glanced at him.

Tomura always warned him about distractions. His elder brother frequently emphasized how a single gust of wind can knock an entire fleet off its course.

And this guy was a typhoon waiting to happen.

A typhoon was an understatement.

The stranger was a combination of an earthquake, wildfire, and tsunami wrapped into one ill tempered blond. He was abnormally large and possessed a crazy amount of strength. What’s more, he seemed to be fueled by sheer will power and not training.

He was a unique type of natural disaster—but a disaster nonetheless.

Immediately upon entering their room, the stranger forced Izuku up against the wall. It was a terrible mix of frightening and exciting because of how easily he hoisted Izuku up. But Izuku couldn’t even focus on that. If this stranger was here that means Izuku’s assignment would get blown—it always got blown when red eyes and blond hair were involved.

And to confirm what he said, their fighting unwillingly drew the attention of Peter Moore.

“Is everything okay in there?” Moore called from the other side of the door. “There was a call from your neighbors to the front desk about fighting.”

That was like a bucket of cold water on both of them.

Quickly, Izuku realized they needed to make nice if he wanted any hopes of surviving the week. Katsuma’s freedom was in the balance. That alone calmed Izuku enough to think clearly through his mental block and begin to put on his charm.

“Y-Yes, we’re fine!” Izuku quickly said and answered the door. “I’m so sorry about that! We didn’t mean to make so much noise.”

Upon coming face to face with Moore a second time, Izuku immediately saw the distrust.

Moore’s eyes were kind but behind his facade was deathly intent. He knew he was wanted in more than four countries and pissed off who knows how many people. He was keen on his examination of Izuku and Taro.

His eyes landed on their empty ring fingers.

Izuku mentally cursed himself for blurting out husband. How could they be husbands without wedding rings? Quickly, Izuku put on his naive face and played cute enough to shoo Peter Moore away. When his mark was out of ear shot, Izuku decided he needed to plead his case and make nice.

"...That man is my mark. I have orders to take him out quietly," Izuku admitted.

This was a risky move. But this was the one assignment he absolutely could not fuck up.

The stranger's angry expression faltered. He looked sideways at Izuku and said, "Seriously?"

"Yeah," Izuku reassured. He licked his lips, feeling like he was admitting something he shouldn't. But he'd do this for Katsuma. "He, um, crossed a higher up and my handler is demanding that he be put down."

"Well, I guess that works out for us both in whatever miracle," the stranger mumbled.

Izuku raised a brow. "And why do you say that?"

"My agency has been hired by two separate governments to take him out as well," the stranger explained carefully. "He's wanted in several countries dead or alive and it seems like everyone is leaning towards dead."

Izuku's mouth dropped slightly.

He stared at the stranger in utter surprise. For once this guy wasn't guarding someone? Miracle was an understatement.

It felt like fate was smiling right down on Izuku for the first time.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they went to dinner later that night, Izuku was disquieted by how organized the seating was.

Every couple was assigned a group and were forced to stay within that group for the remainder of their overlapping vacations. To the innocent eye it seemed like a great way to build community. To Izuku, who was raised under Viper rule, the layout was a catalog.

Moore was keeping close track of his potential merchandise.

Which is why Izuku was only half surprised to find Moore at their table after their slip up.

"Bakugous!" Peter Moore greeted them through the dense crowd. "Over here! I saved you two seats!"

Peter Moore turned to them with a smile as fake as plastic that could cut.

When they approached, the other couples in their group introduced themselves one by one.

Momo and Jirou were two lovely girlfriends. Eijirou and Mina were the most athletic husband and wife duo possibly on the planet. And lastly, Shouto and Inasa were a pair of husbands. But there was something slightly off about them. They were surveying him and the stranger as if they pinned something wasn't quite right about them as well.

Which opened the door to the hot spot.

From the moment Izuku and his fake husband sat down, every question was a careful probe:

Where were their rings? What happened in Taiwan? How did they meet?

Izuku answered everything fluidly, fully leaning into his fake husband role. He placed some truth into his lie, because the best lie was always based on real events. He was doing well, and had everyone hooked around his finger until his stranger interjected with a surprising addition.

"He came into my life quickly," the stranger muttered after being asked how they met. "Quick and fast like an annoying little bullet you can't see coming."

Izuku felt immediate disillusionment and confusion.

The gentleness slapped Izuku with various encounters of their 'truces'. He was reminded of all the tiny touches that conflicted with the stranger's personality. This was supposed to be them faking a marriage—but that tone of voice was not fake.

"I meant…when he first came up to me, Hiroji's presence shocked me, y'know?" The stranger continued suddenly. "I'm no good at that mushy crap but, uh. He was dressed in all red. Not that cheap cherry red color either. No, he was dressed in a really elegant shade of red—like expensive wine—a deep crimson."

He remembered what I was wearing?

That was a detail even Izuku forgot.

"The color highlighted his eyes," the stranger continued. "When he looked at me, I felt like his gaze had pierced through me—like a bullet. I had no way of anticipating him." The stranger turned to him and held eye contact as he said, "It was hard not to want to know someone's name after that."

Intense scarlet eyes bored into him and Izuku's stale heart fluttered to life.

"So, you two meeting was incredibly romantic," Mina sighed with a large daydreamy expression. "I knew it had to be something absolutely stunning! Ahh, I wish me and Ei had met with something like that. I had gotten lucky and swiped right on him on Tinder while drunk."

"Yeah," Izuku whispered quietly.

He urgently turned away, not daring to look at the stranger at that moment. If he stared too long he worried he might breathe back to life his infatuation. He worked so hard to bury it in the last five years. It would be especially cruel to torture himself with something he couldn't have—especially here.

Throughout the rest of the dinner, Izuku discreetly glanced longingly at all the real couples.

ᔓᔓᔓ

At the day's end, Izuku's morbid curiosity about the stranger resuscitated despite his best efforts.

All through the dinner he couldn't get that monologue out of his head. It was something about the way his stranger spoke about him. So gentle, yet rough.

Which is why when they were in bed that night Izuku said, "Um, I think we should start getting to know each other. You know, for the mission. In case we get asked more questions we should be prepared."

It wasn't for the mission, entirely.

He learned his fake husband was born in Tokyo, but didn't live there anymore. Izuku soaked in that fact. That was closer than he thought. What's more curious is that the stranger was from old San'ya. That's where he met Kacchan at the plaza of the broken angel.

It was another overlap.

Lopsided smile. Blond hair. Red eyes. Now San'ya?

Odd.

Izuku fiddled with his fingers the more information he learned. The stranger's favorite color was green. He was the same age. He liked violin music as well. He used to be left-handed and now was right-handed. That was due to his mother believing old superstitions about left-handed people being bad luck. Every tiny piece of information cleared the fog that clouded the mysterious man.

Which left one last question:

"...Is your name really Taro?" Izuku asked quietly, his curiosity burning right through him.

The stranger immediately huffed and glared at him. "Go to bed. I'm not telling you my real name."

"I promise I won't use it against you. I'm only curious after all this time—"

"—I fucking said no." The stranger snapped. "Why the hell would I give you my real name when you've tried to kill me on several occasions and have fucking shot me countless times?"

Izuku stared at the stranger sadly.

“I’ve never tried to kill you,” Izuku said honestly.

He didn’t expect to be believed.

“Whatever. Just drop it,” the stranger said. The stranger turned over on the tiny couch and faced his back towards Izuku. “I don’t give out my real name to people in our line of work. Especially not people like you.”

“Right,” Izuku said tightly.

People like him: a freak.

He reminded himself what the stranger said all those years ago. This man didn’t like him one bit. He was tolerating him.

Izuku decided to get lost in his book after that. It was his coping mechanism. The comfort of that old story always helped distract him from any hurt he was feeling.

“That’s understandable. Sorry for asking,” Izuku muttered.

“Goodnight,” the stranger snapped. “And put the fucking book away. Reading in the dark is bad for your eyes and you need to stay sharp.”

Izuku would have listened if not for the fact he was reading his favorite part of the book. It was the scene where the two lovers finally accept each other fully and confess all their grief. It was here that Izuku assumed the lesson that forgiveness was the final act of love. From there, love could become true love. It’s why he adored this passage so much.

Then the gruff voice beside him said, “My real name is Katsuki.”

Izuku whipped his head to the stranger in surprise.

“Katsuki?” Izuku parroted, testing the name.

Something far in the back of Izuku’s head tugged. He tried to follow where that pull originated, but found himself lost in his memories. Everything was tangled together in a mess of blood, torture, and all the atrocities Izuku witnessed in his life.

But he nearly dropped his book at how perfectly Katsuki could translate to Kacchan as a nickname.

How cruel of fate to make sure that everything always led back to that boy he no longer knew. It made his chest feel tight. Katsuki turned around and Izuku could barely blink. When he registered that he was staring, Izuku cleared his throat.

“That’s a nice name,” Izuku stammered out. “I-It suits you very well.”

“Now, what’s your name?” Katsuki asked. “I know it’s not Hiroji.”

Izuku smiled at how Katsuki was glaring at him. Much like a Pomeranian trying to intimidate someone but there was no real bite behind it. Those red eyes looked at him a second too long and Izuku was sucked back into that damning gravity.

“I’m Izuku.”

Second Day in Paradise

When the next morning arrived Izuku couldn’t get the stranger’s real name out of his head.

Katsuki. Katsuki. Katsuki.

It was a beautiful name for a beautiful man.

Every time those scarlet eyes were on him, Izuku found himself weakened at the knees. It wasn’t good for him to be around Katsuki this long, he concluded. Being in the same room with Katsuki was affecting Izuku like toxic fumes to his brain.

And there was strain in the air every time silence fell between them.

Sometimes he found Katsuki’s eyes roaming his body or staring at his eyes a little too deeply. Katsuki probably wasn’t even aware of what he was doing, much less the effect it was having on Izuku.

Katsuki felt like temptation embodied.

Through his distracted haze, he was able to think clear just enough to scheme. They plotted to kill Moore with a murder-suicide. Izuku found himself hopeful that this debauched partnership might make the mission go quickly. The only hurdle they needed to jump was passing as husbands.

Which brought them to the first step: buying rings.

They chose gorgeous faux rings. An emerald gem for Katsuki’s ring and a ruby for Izuku’s. It was meant to represent them carrying each other’s eye color. It didn’t take Izuku any time to find the right shade of red to match Katsuki’s eyes. That shade of red had blown up his life a stupid number of times.

But he quickly learned, while Katsuki’s name was beautiful, he was a down right asshole.

He made fun of Izuku’s looks. His clothes. He even took a jab at Izuku for being a hopeless romantic. Katsuki couldn’t hold hands with him without putting up a fight.

To top it all off, every time Izuku spoke Katsuki followed it up with a snide comment.

“You look fucking hideous.”

“Stop looking at me with those creepy bug eyes of yours.”

“Romance is disgusting. Only fools believe in that shit.”

Katsuki was driving Izuku insane.

How did someone so handsome get cursed with such a foul mouth and attitude? By the time breakfast came, Izuku was at his wits end. And it wasn’t even ten o’ clock in the morning.

Izuku sat down to eat entirely disgruntled on the inside.

He unhappily forced a grin. He tried his best to focus on all the romantic things around him to lighten his mood. But it was hard with that grainy voice beside him saying something sarcastic. Izuku gave Katsuki a warning glare from the corner of his eye. But paused when he noticed that Katsuki was admiring the art on the ceiling.

Katsuki’s gaze was suddenly gentle.

Izuku furrowed his brow at this.

It was odd how quickly Katsuki could flip. One minute he was saying the most off the cuff statement, the next he was appreciating fine art. As Katsuki admired the mural, Izuku begrudgingly admired him.

“I see you’ve taken an interest in the painting above, Taro,” Moore cut in. “I commissioned it myself. It tells of this story I heard as a kid about two lovers.”

Izuku’s interest was piqued as he looked at Moore. Moore’s usual fake happy demeanor was dropped slightly as he looked up at the painting. Izuku finally turned his gaze up and was taken back at how extravagant the art was—but there was something sickening about it at the same time.

The painting was molding to the dome ceiling. The same two figures appeared throughout. One was an angel with blackened wings, and the other person was wingless, dressed in all white.

Izuku studied how the two figures interacted with each other. Soft touches. Gentle gazes.

“What’s the story’s name?” Katsuki asked curiously.

“Ah, I can’t recall the name personally.” Moore shrugged his shoulders. “It was told to me as a child, so bits of it escaped me and I could never come across it again. It’s morals stuck with my psyche so much that when I opened this place, I wanted to put it up in hopes maybe someone would recognize it.”

“I have never heard of anything resembling this,” Inasa said with a curious hum. “What’s it about?”

“It’s the love story of an angel and a sinner human,” Moore explained. “The painting shows them meeting, falling in love, and how other angels watched them care for each other.”

Izuku eyed the middle panel that was the two lovers kissing.

He tilted his head, liking the painting.

“What’s with that part right there?” Katsuki asked carefully. “It’s different from the rest.”

Izuku turned to the part of the painting Katsuki was looking at. It was dark, and vastly different from the rest of the painting. The angel with blackened wings was holding the figure dressed in all white. The sinner’s body was limp, lifeless even.

“Ah, great eye, Taro! That part tells the end of the story.” Moore grew quiet, drawing out the moment. “After the human falls in love with the beautiful angel, he asks to receive a potion that would turn him into an angel. This way he could grow wings and join his lover in eternity.”

Izuku related to the sinner human more than he liked to admit.

He always pictured himself soaked in sin. From his conception to now, every bit of Izuku’s life was tainted with unforgivable darkness. If he’d been given any chance of being normal—of being an angel—he would take it.

He would drink that potion too in a heartbeat if it meant his fate would change.

“Wow,” Mina said with a dreamy look. “Changing who you are to fly away with the person you love. So sweet!”

“At this point in the story, yes.” Moore interrupted. He clasped his hands together while his eyes never left the last panel. “Unfortunately, it turned out the angel was an angel of death—not love. The angel was sent to collect the human’s soul for hell but fell in love along the way. So, when the time came, instead of delivering a potion that would turn the human into an angel, he gave him a red apple injected with viper venom. It ends his lover’s life.”

Izuku was saddened.

“The angel weeps because he did truly love the human,” Moore continued. “However, nothing could be done as he watched all the life drain from his lover’s face. The human spends eternity in hell. Then the story ends there.”

How bleek.

Izuku restrained himself from giving Moore a dirty look. This felt like a looming threat.

“That’s...dark,” Kirishima whispered. “I have to admit I thought it would be a happy ending.”

“Seems a little off brand for the whole romantic paradise theme,” Katsuki said suspiciously. “What kind of moral is behind some fucked up shit like that?”

“That sometimes the person you love is also the same reason for your demise,” Moore explained. “We never truly know another person—only what they show us.”

Izuku stared apprehensively at the tempting red apple.

Izuku was enjoying every single Paradise activity with great joy, truthfully. With everything he did, he found himself feeling the slightest bit normal like he really was here on vacation.

But every time he got too comfortable—Katsuki was there to fuck it up.

Katsuki could probably drive a monk, a priest, and a nun to alcoholism.

At this rate, hell, he might drive Izuku to it. Which is why Izuku was only half shocked when Katsuki dropped him to the damn ground in their aerobatics class.

His legs hit the hard surface with a loud, horrible bang. Everyone in the vicinity turned to them with scandalized looks. Izuku whipped his head to glare at Katsuki and ask what the actual hell—but Katsuki was marching right out of the class like the sight of Izuku's ass spooked him.

Izuku nursed his throbbing kneecaps that took the blunt end of the fall. And much to his mortification Momo saw the whole thing. She walked up to him once Katsuki was out of the room.

"Are you okay?" Momo asked. She held out a hand to help him up and Izuku took it. "That looked really painful."

"Oh, I'm totally fine." Izuku tried to laugh it off. He winced but smiled through it and waved his hand politely. "It was an accident. Taro had to rush to the bathroom."

Momo frowned. "He could at least have put you down gently."

Yes, Momo. Yes he could have, Izuku mentally agreed.

"He's just tired," Izuku deflected.

Izuku was about to follow after Katsuki but then suddenly, Momo pulled out a card from her pocket. Izuku's face dropped when he saw the bold letters: Licensed Therapist and Mental Health Professional.

Shit.

Momo's credentials could blow his cover if she saw fit to file a domestic abuse allegation against Katsuki. Then that would lead to nosy cops.

"I see a lot of this behavior," Momo said sincerely. "I obviously won't give a diagnosis but if your husband is being emotionally abusive to you, you can tell me."

"Oh! H-He's not abusive!" Izuku rushed to deny it. He shook his head furiously but Momo didn't seem convinced. "Really it was an accident—"

"—Well if that's the case, maybe some couples' counseling might be good?" Momo said. She tilted her head and looked down at his reddened knee caps. "Even if that was an accident, the lack of care he has for you after dropping you to the ground is worrisome. Not to mention how he undermines you during our meals. It's very notable that he doesn't treat you well. The Ashido-Kirishimas have noticed it as well."

Izuku nearly saw red.

Katsuki was going to blow this for him. Yet again.

Izuku took Momo's card, excused himself, and calmly walked off. Once he was in the locker room, he checked if anyone was around and was happy to find himself alone with Katsuki.

Immediately, all his fury let loose.

He didn't let up as he drilled into Katsuki. At first Katsuki was defensive, then slowly he seemed like he agreed with Izuku. They both had a lot riding on Peter Moore being six feet under.

"We're supposed to be affectionate," Izuku emphasized during his lecture. "You know—nicknames and all that. You can't call me Dumbass, Deku, and Dipshit all day long in front of these people. If you like 'D' names that much, choose something else. Like dumpling—"

"—Dumpling?" Katsuki scoffed and gagged like a goddamn drama queen. "Absolutely fucking not."

"Well, I don't care what you choose," Izuku nearly shouted. "Just stop insulting me in front of people when we're supposed to be madly in love! Call me something nice!"

"Alright. How about my darling dumbass?" Katsuki sarcastically sneered.

"You could stand to drop the 'dumbass' in front of other people."

"Fine. I'll drop the dumbass." Katsuki scowled.

Izuku stiffened when suddenly Katsuki leaned down from his ogreish height to meet him at eye level.

"Does this do it for you, darling?" Katsuki whispered in his raspy voice.

Izuku's anger flat lined and his heart fluttered. He found himself faced with the inexplicable need to lean in. The low octave 'darling' was said in spoke to his sleeping desires.

Darling was a nickname Izuku always liked. He thought it was sweet, endearing, and he sometimes fantasized about being given a pet name. And it sounded perfect in Katsuki's voice.

Suddenly, a strange pull of tension strung them together.

Katsuki eyes danced down to his lips and lingered a second too long to be written off as platonic. Izuku was well versed in lustful gazes. They crawled all over his body constantly—and Katsuki was currently giving him one.

“Ye-Yeah,” Izuku stammered. “Darling works.”

On cue, weakness hit the back of his knees. They were way too close. Izuku took a large step back in an attempt to regain his composure. Like magic, the fluttering in his heart slowed its tempo with the distance.

How did that always happen with Katsuki?

Everything about Katsuki affected Izuku. Whether it be anger, sadness, or want, Katsuki always managed to draw emotion out of him.

Izuku knew he needed to keep his distance.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The rest of the day was not an entire disaster. But it was obvious that he and Katsuki weren’t exactly a couple.

Shouto and Inasa were keeping an unusually close eye on them. But after the aerobics class, Momo was too. Every time Katsuki was a little too rough with him, Momo would narrow her eyes as if she was going to whip out her business card and cut Katsuki with it.

They needed to figure out how to come off as a couple fast.

But the mission was making progress regardless of their bumpy start.

By a stroke of luck, that was surely manufactured by Moore, they ran into him again. Their mark came up to them at the lounge bar with his uncanny smile.

But this time he was accompanied by a strange, lanky man that had standoffish vibes. Moore’s companion had long black hair that was slicked back and a sunken face. He was dressed in all black and sitting pretty on his collar was a golden pin of a dove.

His name was revealed to be Koizumi.

Instantly, Izuku immediately recognized the name.

Koizumi was who Inko said offered her a new life and money in exchange for him. He secretly curled his fist behind his back and his fingernails bit into his skin. As Koizumi talked, deep disdain echoed in Izuku.

While hiding his fist, Izuku grinned at both Moore and Koizumi. His smile was real, because all he could imagine was slitting their throats for what they did.

During the conversation, it was easy to pickpocket Moore’s wallet. The faux jolly man didn’t notice when Izuku’s sly hand snuck down during their hug. When Moore and Koizumi were gone, Izuku opened it.

The only thing inside were black business cards. Each card was marked with a single white dove in the middle.

It all strung together. Koizumi and Moore both had White Dove pins. And there was a cruise ship at the dock that had a giant white dove on it too. Izuku knew it was all connected—which meant there was only one place to go.

“Well, it looks like we’ll be going on that cruise boat after all,” Izuku said. “I’ll buy tickets for us to go on it tomorrow.”

Everything was going to get serious from here on out.

ɯɯɯ

When they made it back to their room, the awkwardness from the day was apparent.

If Izuku was a teacher, he’d give Katsuki a double F minus on his performance. Izuku unhappily bought the tickets for the White Dove Love Boat, and they retired for the evening.

Izuku climbed into the heart-shaped bed and watched Katsuki struggle on the couch again. The large man kept tossing and turning. It nearly looked like a cartoon with how tiny the couch was.

His heart pulled for him, despite all the antics.

Leading with his empathic side, Izuku scooted over. He smiled softly and coaxed Katsuki in bed with some effort. Katsuki immediately built a pillow barrier between them and Izuku couldn’t stop himself from laughing at the stupid row of red pillows.

After a small conversation, Izuku stared up at the ceiling.

As he listened to Katsuki’s steady breathing, Izuku thought about his life back home. A lot was riding on the success of this mission.

“Y’know,” Izuku said into the silence. “If you’re going to have trouble pretending to be my husband, this means we’re going to have a tough time convincing Moore we’re in love. Which is going to cause issues for us to gain his trust. Our plan is only going to work if we’re in harmony.”

A whistle from the gust of wind from outside reached Izuku’s ears.

“Teach me,” Katsuki said.

It was so soft that Izuku nearly missed it. He turned to Katsuki to make sure he hadn’t imagined that.

Izuku’s breath hitched at how close they really were.

Katsuki’s eyes were near enough that Izuku could make out various shades of red. Layers of hues were stacked up on top of each other. Scarlet. Amber. Even a touch of blood orange twinkled from underneath.

For once, the red eyes that always stopped Izuku's heart weren't full of hatred. Instead they were silently pleading with him. It was as if Katsuki was lost at sea and Izuku was the only raft in sight.

"Er, for this assignment," Katsuki elaborated. "You clearly know how to mimic all this lovey dovey bullshit to the last bat of an eyelash. So, show me how to play the dumb part of a doting husband until we finish off that bastard."

Izuku's heart clutched dangerously once more when the unspoken tension between them returned. Katsuki's gaze flickered all over. His hair, his cheeks, it was like the man was unconsciously counting his freckles and it sent unusual feelings into Izuku.

Izuku swallowed thickly as he treaded carefully.

"Are you sure, Katsuki?"

"Yeah. Teach me how to be in love, Izuku."

Izuku knew he was damned from that moment on.

ɯɯɯ

Third Day in Paradise

Izuku was nervous yet excited.

Teaching Katsuki about love was going to allow him to put himself to the ultimate test.

That morning after getting dressed, Izuku thumbed through his novel. He was trying to find any passages that would be a good starting point.

He found sixty seven.

This truly was shaping up to be a vacation. Izuku began writing a bunch of notes: The hand holding. The longing stares. The eagerness to see one's lover. Anticipating each other's needs. It was fun to piece together the concept of romance as a lesson plan.

Izuku smiled as he looked at what he'd written.

Kacchan had no clue what type of obsession he created that day in the nook—but Izuku was so thankful for it.

As he placed one more neon-colored tab on a page, a droplet of self doubt nested in his head. He paused as he considered a very large glaring fact: he had no clue what real romance was like. Could he really teach another about it if he never experienced it himself?

Izuku nervously fiddled with the page of his novel as he thought about this.

When they made it onto The White Dove Love Boat Izuku's heart nearly bursted at the seams.

The whole cruise boat was a setting straight out of a movie.

The boat was painted a sophisticated cream color, trimmed in gold and had mahogany flooring. Dipping down from the top deck to the bottom like ribbons were endless rows of romantic white fairy lights that perfectly illuminated all the waiters below. Each waiter smiled with golden platters in their hands ready to serve pink martinis.

Izuku's eyes lit up like fireworks when he saw the long beach chairs next to the railing. But even better, there was a band.

He gazed at the couples dancing joyfully in front of the band.

Beside him, Katsuki groaned. "For fucks' sake. This is—"

"—Nice!" Izuku finished happily. Immediately he dragged the grouch by his arm. "Hurry! Let's stake our claim on one of the chairs next to the band."

Izuku was happy to find Katsuki didn't put up much of a fight. He was getting more receptive to their fake husbands ploy.

Maybe by the end of the week they would finally be convincing husbands.

Izuku immediately started his lesson plan. He told Katsuki which passage to read and could visibly see Katsuki swallow his pride. They sat on the desk quietly side by side holding hands as Katsuki read.

Izuku turned his head to watch the couples dance.

Each pair was moving to their own unique synchronization. It was like they knew the other person from the inside out. There was a young couple who were happily giggling and spinning each other. Next to them was an older couple with ashen gray hairs. They moved slowly as their fingers intertwined and their foreheads rested against each other.

Izuku tried to imagine himself with someone like that.

He attempted to picture Chisaki at first. The Yakuza Heir wasn't exactly ugly. His aura was like a dark prince of the underworld that took very good care of his captives. Izuku sucked his teeth at this thought. Maybe accepting his future doom would be good—but the imagery fell apart at the seams.

Next, Izuku tried to imagine himself and Kacchan. But Kacchan was so mentally far away and potentially dead.

Without even trying, Izuku perfectly pictured him and Katsuki.

He surprised himself a bit. He could easily imagine them dancing in each other's arms in a slow, deadly waltz of their own. A fiery push and pull of need and hate. Of softness and brute force. Izuku's core tightened at the thought of being in Katsuki's arms and having his fingers rake down his spine.

Izuku's thoughts dangerously went astray. What would it be like to kiss Katsuki?

Then suddenly gentle lips connected with his hand.

Caught off guard, Izuku whipped his head so fast he nearly broke his neck. Katsuki's lips were pressed directly against the top of his hand. The gesture shot longing right into Izuku's veins. Katsuki's burning eyes snapped up to look at him and stole all of Izuku's breath.

"What are you doing?" Izuku asked tightly.

"What does it look like, idiot? I'm kissing your hand," Katsuki said as though it was obvious. He held up the book for context. "That's what they did on page twenty. Seems a little fast to me, but that's a normal affectionate thing between pining husbands. Right?"

Of course. The book. He had forgotten and got lost in his thoughts that fast.

"Oh. Ye-Yeah," Izuku said. He awkwardly readjusted his sun hat. "Um, good job. Keep reading."

It was then Izuku knew his unfortunate crush sprung back to life.

He tried to will away the picture of him and Katsuki dancing and kissing.

He was unsuccessful.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku was thankful Inasa and Shouto found them before his mind could wander further.

The Todoroki husbands invited them to join them in the cooking class in the lower basement. Izuku happily agreed to it. He was always kept on a strict diet and because of that, Izuku eagerly took any chance to try forbidden foods or fruits when Tomura wasn't around.

It was supposed to be a cute and easy baking class.

It was supposed to be light and fun. But of course—Katsuki made it absolutely impossible. It was bad enough that Izuku struggled to keep his thoughts clean. But the entire baking class Katsuki kept his sleeves rolled up and teased him. With every kneed into the dough, Izuku saw how Katsuki's ridiculous muscles flexed and rippled.

And damn—he had arms.

Katsuki was ripped to the heavens and back. Like he did arm day seven days a week and also in his sleep. Izuku tried to keep his eyes on his own dough. But it was impossible with that Herculean distraction directly next to him.

But that wasn't the icing on the doughnut. Oh no.

Katsuki turned everything into filthy temptation within mere minutes.

“These are nothing but metaphorical creampies in pastry form.”

Izuku regretted not packing duck tape. He should’ve packed a whole suitcase full so he could keep Katsuki’s mouth shut.

“Stop being so crude,” Izuku harshly snapped back. “People can hear you so don’t say that.”

“What? Don’t say creampie?” Katsuki said louder. “That’s exactly what the hell these are—”

Izuku wearily glanced around at the people who heard. Several couples were looking at them like they were perverts. An elderly woman shook her head and Izuku was overcome with embarrassment.

“—Now once you get the hole all adjusted, it’s ready to be filled to the brim!” The instructor said gleefully. “Just insert the tip of the piping bag when giving the hole the custard. Nothing more. You don’t want to stretch your hole too wide.”

Izuku grew quiet at that. His cheeks burned as he tried to fill up the doughnut. Heat simmered at the bottom of his belly as he unwillingly imagined the doughnut in his hand as something else.

Katsuki flashed a mirthful smirk and Izuku wanted to slap him.

“C’mon, nerd. Fucking look at ‘em.” Katsuki chuckled darkly and leaned into his personal space. Izuku’s heart hammered harder. “You really don’t see it?”

“No. I don’t.”

Izuku glared at Katsuki despite the slow rising heat in his core. He turned to quickly get this task done without incident. But then Katsuki took one of the freshly filled pastries and held it up to his lips.

Izuku began to protest—but it was too late.

Without breaking eye contact, Katsuki dragged his tongue up the soft pastry, lapping up the drizzle of white custard that oozed out. He swirled his tongue around the brim a bit, and Izuku’s eyes widened at the expertise of the gesture.

Then Izuku gasped in horror as Katsuki sunk his tongue into the pastry.

This man was an absolute slut.

All it took was one flick of Katsuki’s tongue to make Izuku imagine Katsuki doing that to him.

Suddenly, the piping bag in Izuku’s hands burst.

Custard went everywhere. In his nose. In his hair. Izuku yelled in surprise when his whole face was suddenly covered in thick cream. He scattered to wipe it off, and quickly realized it was his fault. He didn’t even know he’d been squeezing the bag that tightly.

It was awful how the filthy imagery didn't leave his mind right away. It lingered. The picture of Katsuki eating out a very different creampie slowly burned its way through Izuku's overactive imagination.

Izuku ran straight for the bathroom.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Fury, embarrassment and arousal swirled in Izuku. He looked at himself in the bathroom mirror after he washed off all the custard. His hair was dripping wet and his cheeks were pink as can be. He took a deep, shaky breath in.

He squeezed his eyes shut, and tried to wash away any dirty scenarios involving Katsuki's skillful tongue. But he was wildly unsuccessful. He saw Katsuki caressing him, kissing him, and undressing him.

It was like Taiwan all over again when Izuku couldn't stop himself from getting bricked up.

Izuku placed his hand on his beating heart in a plea and squeezed his eyes shut.

Please. Please stop.

It took twenty full minutes for Izuku to calm down.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the boat finally docked, he and Katsuki went straight to business. They were able to locate the White Dove Headquarters quickly. The gray warehouse was completely isolated and almost fully underground. It had the stamp of a white dove with an olive branch on the side.

Chilling aura was all around the woods. In the distance, the sneaky crunch of footsteps could be heard trailing in front of them. Izuku and Katsuki took an offensive stance, ready to strike.

Izuku thought it would be some of Moore's henchmen—but he was wrong.

To his surprise, it was the Todoroki husbands.

And then they learned the two were cops.

Fate was a cruel person, Izuku thought. Not only was he settled with a fake husband who could barely play the part, now there were two cops in his Paradise group watching his every move. Both him and Katsuki took a break to call their supervisors.

Izuku fiddled with his phone a bit, practicing what he could say to buy himself more time. He pressed the contact '117' but Tomura did not pick up. Izuku frowned a bit.

He then dialed the direct link for The Academy and was greeted by Aoyama's cheery voice.

“Hello!” Aoyama said. “You’ve reached The Viper Academy. Is there anything I can help you with?”

“Hi Aoyama. It’s me. Is Tomura there?” Izuku asked. “I need to talk to him about this Moore assignment.”

“No, he’s abroad with One right now,” Aoyama said. “They were actually supposed to be back today but apparently need to lay low longer. Someone from One’s past apparently caught wind of him being in Czechia.”

Izuku pursed his lips. Just his luck—but this could work.

“I know this was supposed to be a quick assignment but, there’s cops here. They’re directly next to me and I don’t want to risk them outting me. Do you think you can add on extra time? This assignment is more complicated than I thought.”

Izuku looked over his shoulder at Katsuki in the distance.

“Cops? Shit,” Aoyama muttered. Izuku could hear the rapid click clack of the board. “Okay. I added extra time to the assignment with a red flag of cops close by. When One and Tomura come back, I’ll let them know what happened and I’m sure they’ll understand. In the meantime, lay as low as possible until we get word on what One wants to do.”

Izuku nodded. “Great, I’ll see you soon. Tell Katsuma goodnight for me.”

“Haha of course! I tell him every day. He misses you.”

Izuku softly smiled at that.

In a twist of events, he got just what he wanted: more time.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they regrouped, something in Katsuki shifted.

His shoulders were relaxed. His body language was leisure and the edge in his eyes was gone. He looked at Izuku now like he wasn’t the worst person in the world—maybe only the second.

Katsuki told Izuku his supervisor didn’t answer the phone. But he seemed okay with it. He had to wait until he got instructions on what to do, and Izuku told him the same.

Now, they really were on vacation.

They walked the beach side by side quietly. A few idle words were exchanged until they finally came to a halt. They had time to kill before the cruise came back and overall, Izuku was happy.

They sat on the beach chatting and going over more lessons in love. This time Izuku felt a bit more confident in explaining and Katsuki was more open to accepting the information. They were getting there—slowly but surely.

As they ate the pastries on the beach, Izuku watched the sunset. Katsuki stopped reading and did the same.

Everything halted in time as the beautiful orange and red colors kissed the earth. The reflection against the deep blue sea was like a painting being breathed to life in front of them.

“I love watching sunsets like this,” Katsuki suddenly said.

Izuku turned to him and his heart leaped. The reflection of the rosy hues painted across Katsuki’s skin, lips, and eyes. He was haloed in a light of beauty that was captivating. Without taking his eyes off the sunset, Katsuki genuinely smiled for the first time Izuku ever saw.

It suited him.

“Is there a reason you love sunsets so much?” Izuku asked.

“It reminds me I’m human.” Katsuki turned to him. “We’re all just humans under the same sky.”

The weight of the words sat on Izuku’s mind as the colors bled from the sky.

They boarded the boat to the mainland that evening under beautiful stars. Everything was shining brightly as fate took her time aligning the constellations. Izuku admired the night sky while they were on the boat.

But then his peace was broken.

Peter Moore joined their boat ride back to the mainland. But there was an unsettling gleam in his eyes. He surveyed Izuku in a way that Izuku knew all too well: like he was property. His eerie gaze was a mirror of Nine, Chisaki, and Tomura wrapped up in one.

It unsettled Izuku when he was given a white lei.

Moore carefully tucked an olive branch behind his ear and Izuku’s heart dropped straight into his stomach. He suddenly felt like he had slipped off his balancing beam. He was struck with the reality he was nothing more than property once more.

Then Katsuki did something to save him from his own neuroticism.

“Thanks for the leis, but I promised my husband a dance before you all came over,” Katsuki said suddenly. “I want to make sure we have enough time to dance before the boat docks.”

He smiled at Izuku and extended his hand out.

“Are you ready, darling?” Katsuki asked, gazing at Izuku expectantly.

It was a vision: Katsuki sat across from him with his lopsided grin under the fairy lights. His eyes were pouring protectiveness and they looked at him and only him. Izuku grabbed Katsuki’s hand and instantly Katsuki intertwined their fingers. Izuku was swept away from that dark side of his mind and Moore.

A bit of Izuku wished this wasn’t fake. But with the eyes of Moore and the Todorokis he knew Katsuki was trying his best to act.

But as the night bled on, some type of line blurred. It didn’t feel exactly fake when Katsuki defended his song choice to the band and it didn’t feel entirely fake as they slowly danced together.

Both Moore and the Todorokis were long elsewhere, but the two of them stayed rooted under the stars.

Katsuki held him gently as they swayed back and forth in sync with the ocean. They held eye contact as they laughed and Izuku’s heart melted right into the center of Katsuki’s gravity. The breeze blew through Katsuki’s hair and ruffled the red lei around his neck.

He tried to remind himself that they were acting. But then Katsuki lifted a hand to brush his bangs out of his face. The touch was electrifying as Izuku leaned in closer. Katsuki didn’t notice.

“I guess this boat ain’t that bad,” Katsuki muttered. He winked playfully. “You have good taste.”

Katsuki smiled down at Izuku and his heart soared high.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Fourth Day in Paradise

The next morning came and Moore invited them out into the Yanburu woods. Magically, they had won a randomized lottery for a free camping trip add on. How totally not suspicious.

Before the mission, Izuku was instructed by Aoyama to steer clear of the Yanbaru forest. There was no cell phone signal on that part of the island and Izuku needed to be accessible at all moments.

But it seemed like Moore knew that. He was going to isolate their Paradise Crew for something sinister.

It was odd that Izuku hadn’t heard back from Tomura yet. Usually Tomura answered his calls on the first ring, like a responsible elder brother and handler. But this was the first time in history Izuku was left hanging for more than two hours.

Whatever was happening in Czechia must’ve been chaotic.

Izuku only hoped Tomura called back before he lost signal because he was the only one given white colored camping gear.

Laying low wouldn't be an option for long. Izuku wasn't stupid.

He knew white was a signal to traffic him. Whoever worked for Moore would see Izuku's white colored backpack and know he was next for their trafficking rings. Izuku's suspicions were confirmed when they walked out into the lobby. The feeling of prickling eyes pierced into his nape like needles. He glanced around to see all the workers staring at him.

Sadness embraced Izuku.

He really was destined to be property, wasn't he?

Even in a resort, with at least a thousand other people, Moore still managed to single him out. Maybe there was something about him that made him seem like an easy target.

Izuku blamed his freckles. He wished he could rip each one from his skin one by one.

ᔓᔓᔓ

His suspicions were bitterly confirmed when later that day someone tried to kidnap him.

They had gotten stuck in the woods due to a prank by their Paradise Crew. Their group left him and Katsuki stranded by the lake without their clothes in a poor attempt to make them bond. It was surely supposed to be harmless since it wasn't forecasted to rain.

But of course, with Izuku's luck, it rained.

His would-be-kidnapper tried to slit Katsuki's throat but Katsuki easily dodged. Izuku quickly went on the offensive and disarmed the assailant. It took less than a minute for them to overpower the attacker. It was the first time they worked in sync rather than against each other. It was surprising how fluid they moved side by side—an unstoppable duo.

When Katsuki snapped the man's neck Izuku forced himself to feel nothing.

But curiously, he witnessed Katsuki's shoulders sag. His eyes glazed over slightly, and it was clear he was affected by it. This was the first time Izuku saw someone in their line of work be sad for the loss of life.

It was odd. Weren't they supposed to be immune to it? Izuku always thought feeling sadness was wrong and he demonized himself every time he felt sorry for killing.

They found shelter in a cave through the storm. While inside, Izuku couldn't contain his curiosity about what triggered Katsuki's solemn expression.

"Do you...Do you feel anything when you do it?" Izuku asked, barely above a whisper.

Katsuki was leaning against the cave wall in nothing but his boxers. His muscles were rigid and his expression was apprehensive. He stared at Izuku with vulnerability he never gave before.

“Most days I don’t,” Katsuki answered honestly. He hung his head and shrugged his shoulders. “But more recently—yeah. I do.”

Katsuki didn’t know it, but he shifted Izuku’s world view with those single words.

It was like everything Izuku knew about emotions shifted ever so slightly off its axis.

“I feel a little bit too,” Izuku nervously admitted. “I try my best not to, like I was trained. But it’s something about when the moment comes to finish—the inkling of the subconscious I try to drown speaks out.”

It was like a weight off his chest had been lifted up. This was the first time he openly admitted to his weaknesses without judgment. Katsuki’s eyes softened. He looked at Izuku like they were kindred spirits and it made Izuku’s heart warm with tiny comfort.

It was then Izuku considered maybe he wasn’t as weak as he thought.

“A mark is a mark,” Katsuki said quietly. “Subconscious or not, we have a job to do. Loose ends aren’t good. Especially ones that are trying to traffic you.”

Izuku couldn’t stop the dry, sarcastic laugh that he let out.

If only Katsuki knew the irony in that statement. Moore already successfully trafficked him.

“Yeah,” Izuku whispered. “I guess not.”

Later that night, Katsuki graciously offered up his body heat. Izuku rejected it at first. But then he allowed himself to once again be reminded by Katsuki that he was only human.

He was a human who was affected by small things like the weather and moved to tears by larger things like loss of life. He curled up underneath Katsuki that night and allowed himself to be for the first time.

Katsuki wrapped his arms around him and the full bare-body skin on skin contact shocked Izuku. It threw him off at first, and he had to adjust to it in the same way someone would feel getting into hot bathwater.

But slowly, Izuku relaxed into Katsuki. This close, he could smell Katsuki’s natural cinnamon musk mixed in with the scent of rain.

The unnamed tension returned as they slotted together.

Katsuki’s hand wordlessly fiddled with the hem of his lace underwear and Izuku didn’t say anything about it. It was a curious touch, like Katsuki was trying to piece together Izuku.

The lingering fingers made Izuku’s core tighten strangely and he tried to stay as still as a statue.

Half way through the night, Izuku heard Katsuki's snoring. He turned around carefully and studied Katsuki up close. He looked so peaceful sleeping, and Izuku noted Katsuki's dark blond eyelashes. With tender care, Izuku traced Katsuki's cheekbones and his fingers lingered at his lips.

Katsuki roused closer in his sleep at the touch. Their chests pressed together and their beating hearts locked in sync.

"Thank you for reminding me, I'm human," Izuku whispered.

He wrapped his arms around Katsuki and fell asleep peacefully.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Fifth Day in Paradise

When the next morning came, their Paradise Crew found them rather easily. They showered them with apologies and Izuku quickly forgave them. He knew they had no ill intent and it wasn't the worst thing in the world to get stuck with Katsuki in a cave.

Five days ago he might've thought differently but now—now he is growing more fond of Katsuki than he thought was possible.

Katsuki was soft. He was rough. He was an asshole but he was caring at the same time. He was a mess of conflicting characters but that's what made him what he was: human. He didn't need to flatten himself out to be one thing or the other. He could be multiple things at once without it having it beaten out of him like Izuku.

For the first time, Izuku gave himself grace with his lack of control over his emotions.

He got slightly lost in his thoughts as he struggled with the notion of if he was a real viper. Maybe he wasn't? Real vipers only felt anger, greed, pride, and bloodlust. Izuku felt so many other things like empathy, love, and sympathy.

Maybe he was supposed to run away with Kacchan and live an entirely different life.

Maybe the path he was on now wasn't his true fate.

But, in order for that to be true, Kacchan would still have to be alive. And Izuku couldn't torture himself with thoughts of maybe or ifs. Instead he looked at who was in front of him now: Katsuki.

Currently Katsuki was rowing a canoe down a small stream with both of them inside of it.

It was a miracle that Katsuki was being so tame now. He was eager to learn the next lesson in love and it made Izuku's heart swell with joy a bit. Katsuki was rough around the edges but soft in the middle and it was endearing.

They settled in that night around the campfire with the rest of their Paradise Crew.

But more exciting, he got to make s'mores for the first time in his life! Katsuki graciously helped him, holding his hand over Izuku's. Katsuki smiled at his naivety and Izuku didn't feel embarrassed. He let himself be helped like a normal human and couldn't stop from leaning against Katsuki.

When he bit into the messy treat, Izuku hummed happily. He forgot where he was and enjoyed the moment. He was totally making these for Katsuma when he got home.

Then softly, Katsuki reached forward and wiped his mouth for him.

"You always make such a fucking mess," Katsuki mumbled.

His fake husband made sure he was marshmallow free and intertwined their fingers together. It was done with ease and it was beginning to feel comfortable. Izuku shyly smiled. Katsuki was so kind and their hands fit together so well.

Their Paradise crew fell into an interesting conversation about life. Then it segued into telling interesting facts about one another. Everyone shared something about themselves that was unique, and Izuku was loving it.

"I was switched at birth," Momo shared first. "I ended up finding my real parents in my teens, so I have two sets of parents now."

How lucky, Izuku thought. Double the love.

"I stole my first electric guitar," Jirou admitted. She earned a judgmental glare from Shouto.

"I'm from a long line of farmers," Inasa said. "I came to the city once in college and liked it so much that I moved to a big city."

"Oh!" Eijirou spoke up. "I have black hair naturally, but I dye it."

Everyone was so flawed—no. Everyone was human.

Izuku felt inclined to share. He nervously squeezed Katsuki's hand to get some bravery.

"I...I overcame a small lisp when I was younger," Izuku confessed in a small voice. "I had selective mutism as a child, so I ended up being a bit late on my speech development."

Everyone hummed and nodded. Jirou told him he shouldn't feel ashamed. It was common. Izuku's heart melted in a comfort he never knew. This whole time—he wasn't defected, he was merely a human with human flaws.

Next was Katsuki's turn.

At first, it wasn't something that shocked Izuku.

"I have lucid dreams," Katsuki admitted. "So I, uh, wake up feeling like I slept a long time but I don't feel well rested."

Then slowly, Katsuki's speech transformed into something increasingly confusing.

"I...I dream about this boy I knew when I was younger," Katsuki further added.

Momo put her therapist hat on as she pulled more and more information from him.

"We spent a full year together from the ages seven to eight," Katsuki confessed.

Izuku saw Kacchan in the nook holding his hand.

"She had left me in the streets to fend for myself."

Izuku saw Kacchan crying for his mother.

"I was wandering around worried about her while I nearly fucking died of hypothermia."

Izuku saw Kacchan shivering in the cold with no jacket.

With each detail, an irrational scenario was pieced together. But it was supposed to be impossible. Izuku's eyes widened with every word. San'ya. Blond hair. Red eyes. Lost at seven. Found at eight. Abandoned in the winter. No. No. No. There wasn't any statistical way this could be true.

Izuku couldn't believe it—

—Until the final blow landed.

"He couldn't even pronounce my name—had to call me 'Kacchan.' Some days it felt like he was the only person to ever love me, and I never saw him after that."

Everything stood still and the woods faded away underneath the words.

They were floating in darkness with nothing but the bright flame of the fire beside them. In slow motion, all the years passed by. From the moment they were younger to the present. Every beautiful version of Katsuki flashed before him like a flip book. They all turned to face him and smiled.

"Well, besides Hiroji," Momo suddenly said, snapping Izuku out of his mind.

"What?" Katsuki frowned and gave her a confused stare.

"Hiroji loves you," Momo repeated. She gestured to Izuku with a genuine smile. "You two are married."

Uncontrollable tears welled up in Izuku's eyes.

He blinked rapidly, unable to take his eyes off Katsuki. He tried to memorize every spike, every wrinkle, every frown line and refined curve of his face. He overlapped the boy he used to know with the man in front of him and it was a perfect alignment.

"Right. Yeah." Katsuki suddenly let go of his hand but Izuku couldn't move. "Of course."

“I think remembering that boy will help you,” Momo suggested. She clasped her hands and nodded happily. “You should allow yourself to reflect on that year and stop suppressing it so deeply. This way when you do feel like there are days that no one loves you, you can remember what he did—and lean on your partner for support. You love and care for Taro, don’t you Hiroji?”

Katsuki cut his eyes to him.

The first thing Izuku wanted to blurt out is that he was the boy.

But his tongue stayed still under all the eyes on them.

“Ye—Yeah. I-I d-do,” Izuku breathlessly whispered. His eyes searched Katsuki’s features, studying them meticulously. He blinked back his tears as he said words that were straight from the heart. “I lo-love and care about him a lot.”

Katsuki’s face soured at the mention of ‘love’. It was like the word was poison and curdled his blood. The air shifted—but Izuku didn’t know why. Katsuki grew so quiet and his nose scrunched in the same way it did when they were kids.

“I’m going to go look at the stars or whatever,” Katsuki muttered.

He stood up to leave without sparing a single person a glance. Izuku’s eyes stayed glued to him with every step.

“I…I’m going to go follow him,” Izuku whispered shakily. “T-To make sure he’s okay.”

Izuku stood up and followed the pull in his heart.

ɯɯɯ

Izuku found Katsuki sitting alone on the edge of a cliff close to the campsite. He was sitting down on a moss covered tree, facing the open sky. His head was lowered between his shoulders and on top of his back looked like the weight of the world.

Izuku purposefully stepped on a twig and snapped it to give Katsuki a heads up he was coming. It worked easily and Katsuki turned around. His glare was in full force and the expression on his face read: leave me the fuck alone.

But Izuku couldn’t.

Never again could he leave Katsuki alone.

“Came to check up on your husband?” Katsuki asked sarcastically. He tore a green leaf in his hands in two aggressively with a sneer. “You know, you don’t have to be attached to my ass all the time.”

Izuku didn’t respond.

He assessed Katsuki's mood and knew he was deeply upset. It probably was about Momo forcing vulnerability out of him in front of strangers, and Izuku felt sorry for him.

He took a seat next to Katsuki on the tree root. Izuku couldn't peel his eyes away from Katsuki.

He'd grown used to seeing ghosts. He saw Sen. He saw Hiryu. He saw the people he killed. Izuku even saw Kacchan's ghost—but this whole time the phantom from his childhood was really the steady stranger in his life.

Izuku had to give it up to Fate.

She was creative in her plans. Every step of the way Izuku thought Katsuki was a curse. But now the sheer sight of him tugged on every heart string Izuku had until they snapped.

"I wonder if certain things are written in the stars," Izuku whispered with a blue undertone.

He forcefully turned his eyes up to the sky as he tried to think of what to say. But he wasn't any good at this. Too many phrases cluttered his thoughts and he had not a clue how to begin to say, 'it's me. I'm the boy you've been thinking of for years. And I've been thinking of you too. Now what?'

Instead, Izuku tried a more graceful approach and asked, "Do you believe in fate, Katsuki?"

"No," Katsuki answered. He shredded another leaf. "Fate doesn't exist."

Izuku's heart clutched. "Why do you think that?"

"Because the only thing that's real is the consequences for your actions," Katsuki said bluntly. "We all have free will over our decisions and blaming fate on the outcome is an easy scapegoat. But I'm guessing you believe in fate."

"It depends," Izuku's small voice said. "Usually I don't, but sometimes it's hard to ignore the signs."

Izuku glanced down to their wedding bands trying to find the words.

"D-Do you believe it's possible for two people to be meant to be in each other's lives?" Izuku blurted out. He timidly scooted over on the root, closer to Katsuki. His eyes shyly looked down at Katsuki's hand and he yearned to reach for it. "For example, let's say, if they were forcefully separated the first time, fate would bring them back together...yeah?"

Izuku reached out to hold Katsuki's hand—

—and Katsuki coldly shifted away.

Izuku's hand grasped nothing. It hurt like a twisted knife in the heart. Izuku swiftly retracted his hand, suddenly feeling stupid. That simple gesture reminded him that Katsuki did not like Deku. Katsuki was merely tolerating him and all the fake niceness from the last five days was just that: fake. Not real.

“Izuku. I don’t really care about this romantic shit right now—”

“—It’s not romantic,” Izuku corrected.

He hung his head to hide his hurt. It was then Izuku knew there was one of two reactions Katsuki could have to Izuku revealing it was him: Katsuki would either be shocked and relieved. Or disgusted to know it was him.

‘Fucking freak’ echoed in Izuku’s ears.

Carefully, he probed Katsuki to gauge what his reaction might be.

“I-I’m just talking,” Izuku said. “I wanted to know how you would feel about possibly having...a person you were meant to cross paths with.”

Katsuki scoffed.

“It sounds over optimistic,” Katsuki cut down unkindly. “I don’t believe two people are destined to meet each other. Fate doesn’t bring them together because fate isn’t real. No one on this dumb earth is destined to meet anyone. The only thing we’re destined for is death.”

Izuku sucked at his teeth.

He absorbed the words and concluded what Katsuki’s reaction would be. It would be violent disgust and he probably wouldn’t believe it was him. Katsuki undoubtedly kept a pure, lovely version of Izuku in his head from their childhood. The halo was probably bright and contrasted with Deku.

Izuku dolefully studied his hands.

Katsuki would be mortified to know what he had grown into: a viper with a kill count in the thousands. Izuku decided then his final act of kindness for Kacchan would be to shield him. Katsuki never had to know the boy who saved him grew up to be the man he loathed.

Then, they both glanced up once more at the night sky.

At that exact moment two shooting stars fell in tandem.

The sparkling white lights shot across the atmosphere. The trail behind them added more splendor to the already decorated sky. Izuku watched as the twin stars fell in sync, intertwining in a way that crossed their paths among the glittering constellations.

Katsuki turned to Izuku with his beautiful red eyes. He quietly asked, “What did you wish for?”

Izuku smiled sadly. “I have nothing to wish for anymore. My one wish has already come true.”

Fate finally brought him back the one person he always wished to see. He looked down at the ruby wedding ring on his hand in a new light and was thankful he was able to keep the promise he made.

“Now we’re husbands and you always have to come back to me. Alright? You gotta promise.”

“Okay, Kacchan. I’ll always come back. I promise.”

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much for reading!! Please give the songs in this chapter a look-see if you have the chance. I've been itching to use them :') I got a whole playlist of songs ready to fire off that tie to so many specific scenes.

Let me know what you think below! Thank you so much for reading and commenting ^_^ 💜

Chapter 23: Espressivo

Chapter Summary

Espressivo (stylistic indicator) to play with expression.

Chapter Notes

Helloooo and welcome back!!! First, big thank you to my power house of a beta and LOML Luna! This chapter was really fun to write and it's been a joy getting to this re-cap arc! Without further delay, I hope you enjoy this chapter and the songs! ^^

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 23 — Espressivo

.

.

.

All the repressed emotions in Izuku grew bigger and bigger until he tore at the seams.

It happened all at once. Joy was amplified. Relief was overwhelming. And finally, sadness was potent against his tongue. He couldn't contain any of the overpowering feelings that poured from his heart.

Somehow, Kacchan was alive, and he'd been with him the whole time.

They retired for the night to their tent in the woods without many words. Katsuki rolled over on his side and faced away from him.

Izuku stayed still, staring at Katsuki's back all night.

He studied Katsuki's broad shoulders and his thick hair. His large physique contrasted everything Izuku remembered about Kacchan. Back then, Katsuki used to be frail from malnutrition and layers of neglect. He had long, but skinny limbs, sunken eyes, and thinning hair.

For peace of mind, Izuku concluded that Kacchan got lost in the winter that year. It made sense if his weak body collapsed. Maybe the snow covered him up and no one found his body until late spring.

That was the tragic end to the boy in the nook.

But somehow, Kacchan not only survived but he survived to be healthy.

Izuku smiled solemnly to himself.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Sixth Day in Paradise

When the morning came, Izuku was exhausted. He hadn't slept a wink. He was so terrified that if he closed his eyes Katsuki would vanish.

Since he decided not to sleep, he kept himself busy.

With delicate care, Izuku folded all of Katsuki's clothes. He tucked them in his duffle bag and his fingers lingered on each fabric. He was still amazed at just how big Kacchan grew to be.

Izuku folded his own clothes next and then climbed out of the tent. He walked around aimlessly listening to the sounds of the forest. Izuku stopped walking when he came to the river bend. He sat down in the grass and stared at his reflection in the water.

He attempted to mesh together the two versions of himself that Katsuki knew: his younger self and Deku.

They didn't blend—and because of that Izuku was hesitant to tell Katsuki.

By the time Katsuki woke up everyone else was awake too.

Katsuki quipped something sarcastic, but Izuku was too tired to banter. Izuku offered up sheepish smiles instead because that's all he could muster.

Their Paradise Crew packed up the bubblegum pink van with glee. They all piled up in the car to head back to the hotel while laughing and giggling. Izuku took his seat on Katsuki's lap without much fuss. He still felt outside of his body as he slowly absorbed the information of Katsuki being Kacchan.

During the beginning of the car ride Izuku drifted off slowly. He uncomfortably staggered in and out of sleep the longer they drove.

Suddenly, Katsuki leaned forward and whispered in his ear.

"Hey, are you okay?" Katsuki asked in a deeply concerned tone. "You've been quiet. Usually, you're annoying the shit out of me by now."

Izuku stiffened a bit. He twisted slightly to peer behind him.

All he could see now was Kacchan when he gazed at Katsuki.

“Sorry,” Izuku replied quietly. His eyes skirted downwards. “I…I didn’t get any sleep last night. I think I was too on edge and it’s finally catching up to me.”

Katsuki pursed his lips, and then the van hit another bump. They both lurched forward and Izuku deeply exhaled from feeling absolutely beat.

“Lean back,” Katsuki commanded. “You’re not going to get any rest hunched over like that.”

Katsuki leaned backwards and patted his stomach to emphasize his point.

Izuku shook his head and said, “No, it’s okay—”

“—C’mon,” Katsuki said with an annoyed inflection. “Lean back. I’ll steady you while you nap. Ain’t an issue after fucking cuddling damn near nude in your little panties. Nothing can be more embarrassing than that.”

Izuku felt mortified at the mention of his private garments. But he was further forced into embarrassment when Katsuki gripped his shoulders.

It was terrible how well his large hands fit on him. They were the perfect size and warmed that whole area of his skin. Izuku reluctantly allowed himself to be pulled backwards against Katsuki’s sturdy chest.

Katsuki shifted their bodies until they slotted together perfectly.

If he wasn’t so tired, Izuku would be blushing. But the warmth of Katsuki’s body lulled him into a safety he had not felt since the nook. He turned inwards to lean into the crook of Katsuki’s neck. At this angle, he could smell Katsuki’s natural cinnamon musk so clearly.

His mind slipped away into sleep the same moment he looked up. He saw double vision.

Both young and older Katsuki smiled at him.

“You’re…here,” Izuku muttered, finally accepting the truth. “I’m glad you’re here.”

He drifted off into a comfortable sleep as Katsuki wrapped his arms around him.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they came back to the hotel, it was unsettling. Some of the workers in the lobby were surprised to see him. They did a double take and quickly shuffled away. Izuku ignored them but knew it was something to deal with later.

Katsuki and Izuku said their goodbyes to their Paradise Crew with hugs and fake smiles. When it was only the two of them in the lobby, they reluctantly reached for their cell phones.

Izuku grimaced deeply and Katsuki winced.

15 unread text messages and 10 missed calls glared at him. Most of it was from Tomura. Others were from Aoyama.

Izuku clicked on Aoyama's text first.

[215]: You're still good on the mission. One said take your time, don't leave without killing Moore and steer clear of the cops.

[215]: Also, you need to contact Tomura back right away. He's been on edge. I haven't seen him this pissed in a while.

Izuku reluctantly clicked on Tomura's text.

[117]: Izuku. I forwarded you an email Chisaki sent me so you can understand how livid he is.

[117]: Chisaki is demanding we set a date for the consummation when you come back.

Izuku wearily clicked on his email app. He was mortified to see the email Chisaki sent Tomura was entitled 'Regarding my purchase: Izuku'.

Chisaki's clipped tone in the email was beyond livid, really. He was egregiously agitated that Izuku left for an assignment right after their deal had been brokered. Apparently, Chisaki was expecting Izuku to stay and be deflowered within the week. He had made some extravagant plans for it and he had to cancel the venue he reserved, losing his deposit in the process.

Now, because of his unhappiness, he was requesting a full seven days with Izuku.

Tomura's reply to the email was reluctant in the same way as a merchant who was being haggled for their most prized possession—but they still needed to make the sale. He accepted the new deal to soothe things over but with little joy.

Reading that exchange was a slap of harsh reality.

Somehow in the haze of this pink paradise, Izuku forgot the fact his virginity was spoken for. He became seasick at the thought of being with Chisaki for an entire week.

Izuku turned his eyes towards Katsuki. Instantly, the second he saw his favorite shade of red, he felt a little bit better.

Izuku sheepishly smiled and said, "I, uh, have to go call my handler A.S.A.P. Should we head upstairs?"

"I have to call my boss too," Katsuki replied. Katsuki fiddled with his phone and his eyes skirted away. "I…I should probably do it in private, so I think I'm going to find a spot elsewhere. No offense."

He didn't trust Izuku.

"Uh, yeah, you're right," Izuku agreed quickly. He attempted to hide his embarrassment. He forgot that easily that in real life they disliked each other. "Here, let me take your bag upstairs for you."

Before Katsuki could protest, Izuku grabbed Katsuki's bag. He hoisted it up with ease and walked quickly towards the elevators.

When he got to their hotel room, his shoulders sagged with emotions too large for his body.

He quickly felt caught in a tug of war between obligation and his own desire as his mind bounced between visions of Chisaki and Katsuki. At one end was the Yakuza and their threats they always made good on. On the other side was his desire to be with Kacchan that could never be killed after all these years.

But in the middle was Izuku, tied at the waist and strangled for air.

However, all it took was a single thought about Tomura to dispel all thoughts of choice.

Izuku quietly called his brother. He was surprised to find himself once again forwarded to voicemail, so he decided to text him instead.

[You]: I read the email. We can set the date when I come back.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku tried his best to push thoughts about Chisaki and Tomura to the side, but it was hard. With thoughts of Chisaki came thoughts of Tomura. And with Tomura came thoughts of endless destruction and doom that would mean Katsuma being trapped in the underground of Tokyo forever.

But there was one thing he found that kept him away from the darkest recesses of his mind—

His eyes roamed the figure in front of him.

He smiled a bit looking at Katsuki's muscular back as the man talked. He was discussing the mission and their next move, but Izuku could barely care. Moore was his secondary worry now. Killing him was going to be easy, all they needed to do was convince the human trafficker that they didn't kill that guy in the woods and figure out when the cops were planning their raid.

Right as Izuku was surveying Katsuki's thick quads, suddenly Katsuki tilted his head at him and smirked.

"Did you get a good enough look?" Katsuki teased sarcastically. "I can turn to the side for you if you need another angle."

Izuku quickly turned away. "I-I wasn't looking at you. I was zoning out."

"Yah-huh. Sure you weren't." Katsuki rolled his eyes. "Well, what now?"

"We should wait until dinner when we see Shouto and Inasa again," Izuku suggested. "We'll poke around then with some questions. But uh, maybe we can relax in the lounge area? We have to pretend like we didn't dispose of the bartender in the woods so hiding away only makes us look suspicious right now. But if we go to the bar lounge and look ignorant, it'll seem like we don't know anything. Let me buy you a drink or something."

"Buy me a drink, huh?" Katsuki repeated with a hint of amusement.

Izuku furrowed his brow. Why was that weird?

With that horrible handsome grin, Katsuki leaned in and said, "Why does that sound like you're flirting with me, nerd?"

Izuku spluttered and blushed at the implication.

"I-I'm not!" Izuku denied swiftly. He threw his hands up defensively and shook his head. "I-I was only being nice."

"You sure? First you gawk at me and now you want to buy me a drink. Doesn't sound just nice to me."

"Nevermind, Katsuki," Izuku mumbled, his face totally red. "Why do you always make such crude comments?"

"I'm not the one offering to buy you a drink, Deku. Next time just ask me on a date."

Izuku spluttered. Heat burned through his cheeks at the thought of going on a date with Katsuki. He hated how he could easily imagine himself and Kacchan on a date here. There were so many options, and it would be so easy to—

No.

No. Izuku. Absolutely not.

"Just forget it," Izuku hissed. "Disregard that I ever offered."

He stood up quickly and walked right out of their room to hide his pink cheeks. Behind him, Katsuki laughed like a goddamn hyena. He walked up to Izuku, elbowed him in the side playfully and winked.

Quickly, all the melancholy in his body vanished.

Kacchan had grown up healthy, that's for sure.

A perfectly healthy menace.

By the time they made it to the bar in the lounge, Izuku found himself wanting to ask Katsuki all sorts of questions. He processed his shock successfully and now all he wanted to do was know Katsuki more.

He followed the pull in his heart and held Katsuki's hand gently. He hoped Katsuki wouldn't say anything about it, and he was right. Katsuki held his hand right back with slight confusion—but he didn't make a move to pull away.

Izuku took the extended kindness and began asking Katsuki questions.

Did he still live in Tokyo?

What kind of music did he listen to?

Was he super popular and always surrounded by a ton of people?

Izuku asked every question he could think of. With every answer he got, it made his heart swell with happiness.

"I lived in a lot of places, honestly, but I settled down in a city near Tokyo," Katsuki answered with a shrug. "Ain't telling you which city though."

"I listen to a lot of alternative music and jazz as well," Katsuki answered as he ordered another pineapple cocktail.

"I was popular but not for reasons you think," Katsuki chuckled. "I was well known for beating other kids' asses."

Izuku smiled with each new detail. He got lost in Katsuki as they chatted and was entirely unaware he was tracing small circles on top of Katsuki's hand.

As he watched Katsuki eat the pineapple from his drink, it was obvious he really liked pineapple. Izuku immediately perked up, looked Katsuki up and down, and was once again overjoyed by how large and healthy Katsuki was.

At that, Izuku's nurturing nature took hold. He wanted to keep taking care of Kacchan so he plucked the pineapple from his drink and handed it over happily.

Blinded by the nostalgia, Izuku thought Katsuki would eat it like a normal human. But he was sorely mistaken when Katsuki grew suspicious. Izuku paused under his gaze and when Katsuki began to suck heavily at that pineapple, Izuku was bluntly reminded that Kacchan was Katsuki.

Izuku froze, entirely taken back as Katsuki licked, sucked, and practically fucked the goddamn fruit. Katsuki began to poke at him, and then without fail, leaned forward until their lips almost touched.

Izuku was about to lean away but then Katsuki said something that flipped Izuku on his head:

"You've been awfully nice to me all day, and that usually means one of two things," Katsuki whispered, dropping his voice seductively low. "You either pity me after what I spilled during the camping trip, or you want to fuck me. Which is it?"

Izuku's brain went haywire when he suddenly envisioned them desperately kissing and imagined their usual push and pull melting into intense, passionate sex.

Then immediately a vision of Chisaki bombarded Izuku.

The brakes slammed on Izuku's thoughts with mental skid marks across his brain. Izuku graciously reminded himself that his body was spoken for, and eighty million yen was in play.

Izuku straightened himself out and stayed away from temptation.

ᔓᔓᔓ

He was saved from the situation by Moore and Koizumi coming up to them at the bar. The pair of men invited them into a private lounge for a game of billiards. This was clearly a test and Izuku was so happy how easily he and Katsuki passed.

It was a miracle, really. Six days and Katsuki was finally behaving like the perfect husband. They passed all the questions Koizumi and Moore gave with flying colors thanks to Katsuki's impeccable performance.

"You're doing great, darling."

"That's my husband, he's so talented."

"I love how fast you pick up on things. How did I get so damn lucky?"

Izuku knew it was all fake, but he wished it wasn't.

Every word was accompanied by a grin that was so bright Izuku thought he might go blind. He watched as Katsuki kept his eyes on him the whole time. They circled the pool table perfectly in sync and it made Izuku's heart both hurt and soar high in the clouds.

When they were left alone, Izuku found himself admiring how great Katsuki was.

Katsuki's eyes tethered with his and he kindly offered to teach him how to play billiards.

Then it rapidly divulged into something else. Izuku didn't know how or when—but the lessons in billiards began tumbling down the path of temptation that he was trying so hard to stray away from.

The sexual tension between them boiled over like a volcano.

Katsuki's hands were now cuffing both his wrists, pinning him on the pool table. His pelvis was pressed flush against Izuku's backside, and he used his whole body to cage Izuku in.

One flash of Katsuki's fiendish smile and all rational thoughts were lost.

Maybe losing his virginity bent over a billiards table wouldn't be the worst thing in the world.

Katsuki buried his head into the crook of his neck and Izuku's eyes fluttered closed. Soft lips grazed against his skin and left fire along his jugular. Izuku's breath hitched at the new sensation, and his touch starved body wasn't ready for it. His legs quaked viciously at the sudden intensity when Katsuki kept grinding into him.

"You didn't answer my question earlier," Katsuki whispered hotly against his flesh. "Which is it, Izuku? Fuck me or pity me?"

Katsuki rolled his hips harshly and Izuku shuddered.

Izuku short circuited, overwhelmed by the new sensations. "Shit. Kacc—K-Katsuki, wait—"

Suddenly, Tomura's ringtone cut through the air.

And holy hell.

The sound was the equivalent of a throwing bucket of ice water on his cock.

Izuku's eyes bulged wide at what he was doing. He sprung up, broke free of Katsuki's grasp and staggered at the sudden switch from warm to cold. He whipped his phone out of his pocket, and saw '117'. Instantly his boner began to deflate. Izuku modestly put his hand over his crotch and excused himself to take the call.

Izuku shakily breathed out. How was it possible that Kacchan grew up to be sex embodied? It was maddening.

He pressed answer and held the phone up to his ear.

"Hello?" Izuku asked quickly. He hoped that his breathlessness wasn't noticeable.

"Sorry I missed your call," Tomura said, not noting the tightness in Izuku's tone. "I was cleaning up the absolute mess of a trip we had."

"What happened?" Izuku questioned, hoping to give himself some time to catch his breath as Tomura talked.

"Well, long story short, One has a grudge that's stuck on his tail. Some years ago he offered a freelancing hitman that went by the alias 'Loud Cloud' a potential partnership to operate as an associate for The Academy. It comes back to haunt him periodically."

Izuku frowned but was intrigued slightly by the lore. "Why did he do that? One doesn't believe in working with outsiders."

"You're right, he doesn't. But he did it on purpose," Tomura explained. "At the time The Academy wasn't the first option clients went to. He needed to stomp out the competition by killing them off, but in a way that would just make it seem like everyone else was bad at their jobs. This way he would look better."

Sounds like One, Izuku thought. He was a perfectly conniving snake.

Tomura continued, “He would offer to work with his competition under false pretenses and befriend them. Then he would send them on very brutal assignments that he knew would be fatal. Loud Cloud was one of these and whoever that bastard’s best friend was is still trying to figure out what agency was responsible for sending him on such a dangerous mission.”

“How long ago was this?” Izuku muttered.

“Before we both were born, so nothing to really worry about,” Tomura said. “If whoever it was hasn’t been able to get their foot in the door now, they won’t ever.”

“Thirty years is a long time to hold a grudge,” Izuku said thoughtfully.

“Hate is the strongest emotion,” Tomura lectured. “But how’s the Moore assignment going?”

“It’s going fine,” Izuku lied. “The cops here are trying to raid the resort and arrest Moore. I am trying to figure out when the police raid will be so I can exterminate Moore before that.”

“Good.” Tomura let out a long exhale. “Let me know when that will be so I can give Chisaki an estimate of when you’ll be back. He wants to make sure he has a full week available.”

Izuku swallowed. Now he was entirely sobered up.

“Okay,” Izuku whispered. He hung his head a bit. “Sounds good.”

He wearily looked over his shoulder at the door that held Katsuki on the other side.

ᔓᔓᔓ

With every ounce of self-control he possessed, Izuku gathered himself well enough to escape Katsuki’s temptation. He made up some excuse about wanting dinner and practically ran out of the room.

Dinner provided useful information. They learned the police raid would be in four days, and somehow, by a stroke of luck, Japan’s traveling carnival was in town. Izuku almost didn’t believe his ears at how perfectly it all aligned.

Izuku took the carnival as an undeniable sign from Fate to tell Katsuki the truth.

He could see it now: they would be walking hand in hand underneath the Ferris wheel, and Izuku would get them alone. He would reveal the truth and Katsuki’s beautiful red eyes would go wide. All the years of nostalgia would envelope them like a cocoon as they were reunited at the same place they were torn apart.

It would be perfect, like a novel.

Izuku smiled to himself.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they made their way back up to their room, Izuku was admittedly dead tired. The lack of effective sleep was catching up. In his hazy head, all the events of the exhausting day were swimming together: finding Kacchan, the gentle touches, the smiles, the strange sexual tension and then finally, the carnival.

It was a lot to process.

“You’re really fucking sleepy huh?” Katsuki asked with a hint of mirth.

Izuku nodded with his eyes closed.

“Extremely, I can barely think straight,” Izuku muttered with a light yawn. He grabbed a fresh set of pajamas, a towel, and started to make his way to the shower. “If I’m not out in twenty minutes, please come check on me. I sometimes fall asleep in the shower when I’m tired like this.”

“Will do. Good night, Izuku,” Katsuki said a little too happily.

“Goodnight, Kacchan,” Izuku replied.

Both men froze.

“...What did you call me?” Katsuki asked slowly.

All the happiness in his voice vanished.

Izuku’s blood went cold, and he now was wide awake. He whirled around to Katsuki when he realized his mistake.

Hurt, mortification and betrayal were written all over Katsuki’s face.

Quickly Izuku tried to fix it. He tried to tell him, but Katsuki’s pain was too big for any words to get around it. A storm kicked up, and Katsuki proved to be the typhoon Izuku thought he was.

Katsuki’s face twisted into a nasty scowl as pure hatred for Izuku poured from him. All the stab wounds, bullet holes, and punches were nothing compared to this. Izuku tried to get him to calm down, but it was useless.

“Listen to me carefully because I don’t deal with bullshit like that,” Katsuki threatened. “People like you don’t get to use that nickname, so you need to erase it from your goddamn memory.”

Like a stone being thrown at a glass house, Izuku’s armor cracked under those words.

“People like me?” Izuku echoed. “What does that mean?”

“It means fucked up people like you.” Katsuki’s words sliced into him and damaged Izuku’s deepest insecurity. “People who don’t fucking flinch when I snap a man’s neck. Fucked up people who murder a man in cold blood in front of another. Fucked up people like you who have been a goddamn thorn in my side for years. You don't get to corrupt that memory for me with how fucked up you are because I already am fucked up enough to taint it myself."

The pain spread slowly. All the cracks spread around Izuku's heart until it shattered.

He'd been right. Katsuki would not want to know it was him. He hated him. Kacchan hated him. Shame, hurt, and disgust for himself weighed further on Izuku's broken heart until his face crumbled.

"I'm going to go get some air, don't wait up for me," Katsuki whispered. He hung his head away to hide his eyes.

Izuku watched as Katsuki walked out of the room. He slammed the door behind him hard enough that all the pictures on the walls rattled.

Izuku stayed rooted in place, unable to move.

The perfect scenario he had put together about telling Katsuki it was him at the carnival disintegrated in mere seconds. It was wiped away under the notion that his life was not a perfect novel. There would be no magical reunion.

And worst of all, the boy from his childhood grew up to be a fucking asshole.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Katsuki didn't come back for hours.

Izuku sat alone in the room. He stared blankly at every single heart on the wall. They mocked him. They laughed in his face how he would never possess real love, or even feel it. He wasn't worthy of it, and it would remain forever out of his reach.

The new heaviness of emotions in Izuku's ribcage was too much. He held his hand up above his heart and clawed at his shirt. When the feeling transformed to mimicking lead sitting in his gut, Izuku did the only thing he could do to relieve it.

He grabbed his violin case and left.

He found the private rose garden maze in the back of the hotel. It was beautiful. Every bush twisted upon itself in a lovely interwinding way. Izuku dragged his body down every path that was paved with brown gravel and silver stones. Each way he turned was a new arch way that was something directly out of his daydreams.

Izuku stopped when he came to the mouth of one opening. It was a perfect circle, and in the center was a marble fountain donning a sculpture of a weeping woman cradling a large vase that had a steady stream of water. Izuku's eyes softened as he looked at the unique art. He understood her pain somehow and was drawn to it, so he sat underneath her.

Izuku took out his violin and began to play.

He played the one song he knew by heart, The Dance of The Love Birds.

He closed his eyes and allowed himself to be carried away. With every note he saw their lives. He saw Katsuki when he was a child, and now as an adult. With the increasing tempo he saw Vienna and with the low notes he saw their fist fights. It all mangled together like the song in complex layers.

"…Izuku," Katsuki whispered uneasily into the dark night. "It was you?"

Izuku's eyes snapped open, and he stopped playing abruptly.

He turned harshly to see Katsuki standing there with his eyes irritated and bloodshot exactly like his. Izuku had a visceral reaction. He needed to leave because he couldn't take any more heartbreak right now.

He staggered as he tried to quickly pack up his violin. He rushed to do it and get out before Katsuki could say anything hurtful—

Katsuki ran forward and tried to stop him, but Izuku was always quicker.

"W-Wait—Izuku—"

Izuku gritted his teeth as tears fell from his eyes. He couldn't do this right now. He didn't want to be called a goddamn freak. Izuku slipped out of Katsuki's grasp and darted into the dark maze. He didn't look back as he tried to leave the ghost of his past behind him.

It hurt. Why did it hurt?

"Izuku!" Katsuki called out with desperation. His voice cracked at the end, and Izuku hated how it pulled to him. "Izuku—fuck. Wait—"

Suddenly, Katsuki grabbed both of his arms. Izuku hissed through his tears as he was yanked backwards by the whirlpool of a man. Izuku twisted his body immediately to escape, and his violin went crashing down to the ground.

Then it began: the push and pull they were always tethered to.

They began colliding like two twin stars about to implode on impact. Every time Izuku thought he got free, Katsuki dragged him back and forced him to stay. They always were like this: Izuku running and Katsuki chasing. Now they were back in that rhythm, but Izuku couldn't do it tonight.

He couldn't hurt himself like this anymore.

"G-Get off of me," Izuku's broken voice begged.

Katsuki gritted his teeth and shook his head. "J-Just wait a moment—"

"—No, let me go you asshole—"

The next few moments were a tidal wave. Izuku harshly yanked himself away one more time and tripped in the process. But because Katsuki's grip on him refused to let go, the two of them went toppling down on the soft grass. Katsuki landed on top of him, still trying to pin him to stay still.

They struggled back and forth like coarse, clashing waves in a storm.

It was only when Katsuki wrapped his arms around Izuku from behind, restraining his arms to his sides, did they finally stop.

Izuku could barely hear anything over his heartbeat. Izuku dropped his head in defeat, too tired to continue and too tired to face what Katsuki's reaction to the truth might be.

"Please." Izuku's voice was hoarse and heavy. "Let go."

"I can't," Katsuki replied in the most raw, broken voice.

It stunned Izuku. Katsuki was on the edge of breaking down, and his hands were shaking like he was terrified.

"I can't let go. I've been trying my whole life, but I can't," Katsuki said shakily.

Katsuki's hold on him melted from keeping him captive to hugging him desperately. Izuku froze during this shift.

Katsuki hugged him closer, and tears hit the back of Izuku's neck.

Slowly, Katsuki's whole body began to rock like he was stuck in a storm. He nestled Izuku closer and all of Izuku's temper was extinguished. His fears collapsed on themselves and his need to flee vanished when he felt Katsuki's heart beat out of control.

They stayed there, not moving, simply listening to each other breathing. Izuku lifted his own hand to place over Katsuki's trembling one.

"Is…is it really you?" Katsuki questioned with a splintering crack. "Was it you that year in Tokyo?"

Izuku hesitated, terrified that all his worst nightmares were about to come true with the next word.

"Y-Yes."

Izuku turned around in Katsuki's arms and faced his fears.

"Did you know?" Katsuki asked. "This whole time?"

"No." Izuku shook his head and screwed his eyes shut. "I figured it out at the campfire when you mentioned being called 'Kacchan'."

"Why didn't you say something sooner?"

“I—I don’t know,” Izuku whispered. He opened his eyes and set his vulnerable gaze on Katsuki. “I-I thought about saying something. All night and all day today, I wanted to tell you, but I didn’t know how. E-Especially after all this time. It was messing with me. Like really messing with my head. You have to be feeling weird about all of this too, aren’t you?”

“Of course. It feels like—”

Fate.

Izuku waited for Katsuki to say that word.

But it never came because Katsuki didn’t believe in fate.

“It feels like a really big coincidence,” Katsuki finished, tapering off into a whisper.

Izuku gazed at him, not believing that a coincidence was the correct word choice. But he didn’t want to push it.

“Yeah. A coincidence,” Izuku whispered.

Katsuki stared at him for what seemed like forever. Izuku wished he knew what he was thinking, but all he could think about was sleep. Tiredness tugged at his eyelids, and he waited for the hammer of Katsuki’s outburst to hit. But nothing came.

“We should go back upstairs,” Katsuki whispered instead.

Katsuki subconsciously drew closer, and his eyes were expressing a million and one emotions.

But neither anger nor disgust were there.

ɯɯɯ

Seventh Day in Paradise

When the next day came it felt like a dream.

Izuku was awoken by the smell of savory food and green tea. He was immediately on edge, and when he saw the time, he completely panicked. Never in his life had he slept in on an assignment. He started flailing around, but stopped when Katsuki calmly told him to relax. Izuku paused for a moment to take in everything.

Somehow Katsuki was already awake, fully dressed and he was ushering in two full platters of food.

Then Katsuki revealed the food to be Izuku’s favorite: Katsudon.

Izuku stared at the steamy egg and pork cutlet in utter surprise. Did Katsuki remember what his favorite food was somehow or was this a stroke of luck? Izuku could only recall mentioning that katsudon was his favorite food once during dinner rather offhandedly.

Katsuki sat down at the tiny table in their hotel room, poured two cups of tea and picked up his chopsticks.

Izuku was confused. Why wasn't Katsuki yelling?

"Are you just going to stand there or are you going to eat?" Katsuki asked, mildly impatient.

"S-Shouldn't we be working on taking out Moore?" Izuku responded wearily.

Katsuki frowned. "I think Moore can wait a day or two. Shouto basically hinted the police raid isn't for another four days. We have time."

Izuku nodded before shyly walking over to the table. "Right."

When he sat down, Katsuki kept stealing glances at him. He eyed him up and down like he was from an entirely different dimension.

They ate mostly in quietness that was full of curious stares and shy looks on Izuku's behalf.

As he chewed on the juicy pork cutlet, Izuku felt a bit guilty for thinking Katsuki's reaction to him would be volatile. He assumed the worst in him, and he was pleasantly surprised to find Katsuki was not disgusted in the least bit. Katsuki was shocked, first and foremost, but overall, he radiated that he was eager to get to know Izuku.

After they finished eating, they stayed cooped up in the room all day answering each other's questions that had been burning in their minds for over a decade.

"What happened? O-Or where did you go?" Izuku whispered, barely inaudible. "I know you mentioned your mother b-but I…I worried something bad happened to you that day. I thought maybe someone kidnapped you at the carnival because I was late. Or worse."

"My mother came and found me that day," Katsuki answered. "She said we would come back —but we never did. She feared ever setting foot in Tokyo again for some reason so…we didn't."

Izuku was sad, but happy to know Katsuki went straight to where he belonged that day.

Izuku gave a forced smile. "I-I'm glad you found her again."

"I came back to Tokyo when I was thirteen," Katsuki confessed. Izuku's breathing stopped slightly. "I went to the church, and it was still there. I—I went inside of the nook."

At this, Izuku averted his eyes. He thought about the note he left as a child that scribbled the words "I love you" on it.

Then Katsuki asked the question that'd been teetering on his own tongue.

"What about that older brother of yours?" Katsuki's voice wobbled. "Did he ever stop hurting you?"

It pained Izuku to hear it, but he saw no reason to lie. “No. He didn’t.”

Katsuki hung his head and clasped his hands. He gave Izuku a look that was worth a thousand apologies.

“I’m…I’m so fucking sorry, Izuku.”

“You have nothing to be sorry for. It’s not your fault,” Izuku said earnestly.

“It is. I left you there. You were being hurt, and I left you.”

“But you were a kid,” Izuku emphasized. “You were a kid who was left abandoned in a giant city waiting for an irresponsible adult to come back. Then she did. You did what any child would’ve done in that moment if they were reunited with a parent who loved them. S-Some things in life aren’t controllable for us all the time. This was one of those things.”

Izuku didn’t blame Katsuki at all.

Katsuki’s mother, no matter how capricious, loved him and ultimately, she did come back for him. If Izuku’s mother ever decided she loved him and did the same, he probably would go with her too no matter how old he was.

“Do you still see your brother?” Katsuki asked after a stretch of silence.

“Um. Yes. Our living arrangements are complicated,” Izuku confessed, slightly nervous. “But —I try my best to put distance between us for obvious purposes.”

At the mention of Tomura again, Izuku realized Katsuki was going to want to know more about his mysterious home life. But he hadn’t thought that far ahead. How would he tell Katsuki about The Viper Academy? Should he even tell him?

“Is that the reason you took this type of job? To try to get away from him?” Katsuki dug further.

“No.” Izuku frowned. Where did that come from?

“But you said you do this job to survive,” Katsuki said slowly as if it was obvious.

“I do,” Izuku said. “But he has nothing to do with that.”

“Then why?” Katsuki exasperated. “Why would someone as kind—or was as kind as you—go into this type of shit? Willingly?”

Izuku soured at the mention of free will.

People who believed everything in life was a choice inherited a privilege they would never truly grasp.

“I don’t fucking get it,” Katsuki continued. “You were so kind, gentle, and well off. You weren’t meant for this type of life. I always thought you would go on to be a teacher or go into a profession that helped people. Not kill them."

The internal battle going on in Katsuki's head was evident and Izuku could do nothing but sadly watch.

Part of him hoped that on the day they would be reunited, Kacchan would be accepting of him—all sides of him. But as Katsuki sat in front of him now, Izuku didn't think that was going to happen. This was exactly how Tomura said others would react if they knew the truth.

He kept his mouth shut about how he was raised to kill.

"I'm sorry I didn't turn out how you wanted me to," Izuku muttered sarcastically. "I know you think I'm fucked up but please understand not everything in the world is a simple choice. My apologies for tainting that memory for you."

Katsuki licked his lips and shook his head. "I didn't mean it like that."

"You did," Izuku bitterly cut off. "It's fine. I know I'm fucked up, alright? I get it. I always had a feeling you would be disappointed about what I am if we ever met again. I know I'm not normal."

"I'm sorry," Katsuki said quietly. "You're not any more messed up than I am. I actually always assumed you would be disappointed in me if you saw what I grew up to be."

"I'm not, if that helps." Izuku gave him a sad smile. "I'm really just happy that you grew up. I assumed you were dead. Y-You hadn't taken any of your stuff with you, and I struggled to understand why you didn't want to bring your favorite toy with you if you had left. Knowing you're alive is…all I could really ask for."

Katsuki's eyes softened to a level Izuku never thought was possible.

"I shouldn't have snapped on you like that yesterday," Katsuki apologized. He placed his hand above Izuku's tenderly. "I was out of line."

"No, it's alright. You should've," Izuku rebutted, trying to ignore how his heart sped up at the slightest bit of contact. "I hadn't said anything. As far as you knew I was simply some guy who you've been fighting with for years using a nickname that was dear to you. It made you uncomfortable. And if it still makes you uncomfortable, I won't ever use it again."

Katsuki stared at him like he suggested throwing a puppy in a volcano.

The visible hurt in his eyes was potent and immediately Izuku regretted ever suggesting never saying Kacchan again.

"I don't care if you use it or not," Katsuki mumbled and averted his eyes to the side. "That's your choice, I guess."

Izuku's heart skipped a beat, still unsure if that was a yes or a no.

“If you don’t mind, I would love to hear about your life after the carnival day,” Izuku whispered with a smile to skillfully move the topic off himself.

“Sure, on one condition,” Katsuki wagered.

“What would that be?”

“You buy the next round of food,” Katsuki said. The corners of his lips tugged upwards ever so slightly. Not a full smile, but enough that it made Izuku smile more at him in return. “I’m still starving.”

“I think that’s manageable.” Izuku laughed slightly.

Katsuki leaned in and Izuku’s heart fluttered. The light caught the emerald on Katsuki’s ring finger, and suddenly the matching wedding rings were taboo but right. Shyness crept into Izuku when Katsuki tenderly smiled at him all the way.

They were officially reunited and deep in Izuku’s heart, he never wanted them to be torn apart again.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Once the awkwardness wore off, their reunion was wonderful. The rest of the day they spent catching up, and Izuku allowed Katsuki to tell him about his life after the carnival. There was so much to Katsuki that unraveled.

But particularly what stood out is when Katsuki began talking about his mother.

The shift in his demeanor was plain as day. Izuku could feel the heaviness that was chained to Katsuki’s heart when he thought about his mother, and it brought Izuku sadness too. Then Katsuki explained more of the details surrounding her death. And Izuku was mortified to learn she was murdered by a drug lord who lied about what an assignment was.

If there was one thing Izuku hated, it was clients who lied about assignments.

Tomura, One, and Nine encountered a few of them over the years. They were truly the slimiest people with wicked grins. Their grubby hands would perpetually put assassins at risk like they were nothing but disposable property. It usually happened because these types of weasels were too cheap to pay full price for whatever they wanted done.

Any time it happened, Izuku undoubtedly felt bitter afterwards.

If Katsuki’s mother died by the hands of someone as grimy as that, then Katsuki deserved to get his justice.

“What was his name?” Izuku asked. He was angry on Katsuki’s behalf knowing her life was unnecessarily cut short.

“Akaguro Chizome,” Katsuki spat the name like it was rotten. “Ring any bells?”

“No,” Izuku said honestly. “I’ve never heard of him.”

Izuku imprinted that name into his memory: Akaguro Chizome.

He tried to search in his head for such a person, but he drew a giant blank.

Izuku was familiar with countless people in the Tokyo underground and all their affiliates, but he never encountered a Chizome. If he had, Izuku would point Katsuki in his direction and happily supply him with the ammo.

“I hope you’re planning on getting even with him,” Izuku said. “He shouldn’t be allowed to get away with that if he was the person who lied about what the assignment was.”

“I’m going to get my revenge when I have the time,” Katsuki said. “Right now, I’m focused on the assignments I’m given. Ironic in a way. I took this job to keep us both alive, but it wound up causing her death. When the moment comes, I’ll go back for that bastard and all his goons.”

Izuku nodded. “Good.”

The love Katsuki held for his mother was admirable. His eyes would soften whenever she was mentioned. And when her death was brought up, the pain Katsuki endured could be felt across the seven seas. Because of that, it was easy to conclude that Katsuki deserved his revenge.

Izuku hoped Chizome’s death was as agonizing as everything Katsuki had to go through because of her murder.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the sky was a dust orange, they found themselves in a flow of normalcy. A broken piece of Izuku was mended together stitch by stitch with every smile Katsuki gave him.

It was like long lost friends finally coming together and it was the most tranquil Izuku ever felt. Katsuki was shaping up to be the perfect blend of what he thought Kacchan would be like: courageous, funny, and charming.

As he talked to Katsuki though, he wondered if his previous asshole demeanor was all just a facade. The switch from last night to now was leaving Izuku with a bit of whiplash. There was always softness in Katsuki that peaked through his prickly outside, but now it felt like it was entirely gone with the reveal.

It was nearly the day’s end, and they hadn’t left the room. Izuku could bask in Katsuki’s presence for the rest of his life, potentially. And that realization made his chest feel like it was scorched with powerful yearning.

Jirou stopped by the room to drop off the comics they briefly discussed during dinner and Izuku felt like a kid again. Suddenly, it was only the two of them back in the abandoned church with the smell of burnt candle wax filling the room. The dusty cobwebs were a sign of safety and the foggy stainless glass illuminated everything in speckles of rainbows.

They read through the comics like old times, and even built a tiny tent like they used to.

While under the covers, Izuku's heart was working overtime.

Listening to Katsuki read to him healed him more. He never knew he would be so relieved to see Katsuki literate. Katsuki was healthy, strong, and smart. Izuku couldn't help himself when he compared the side of his hand to Katsuki's bicep while Katsuki read. He could barely wrap his fingers around the taut muscle, and it made something in his core hum with delight.

When Katsuki finished reading, Izuku delicately cupped Katsuki's cheek. He slowly stroked Katsuki's skin and appreciated every second that they spent together.

Katsuki's eyes locked on to him at the touch and he shifted in slightly closer.

It was here that Izuku was suddenly conscious of the position of their bodies.

They both were turned inwards, laying on their sides. Katsuki held his head propped up with one hand as he leaned over Izuku's head that was resting on the pillow. Their legs were tangled with Katsuki's long limbs locking him in. Every soft breath grazed against Izuku's lips, beckoning him to Katsuki.

Just when Izuku thought they couldn't get closer, they did.

Katsuki leaned down by an inch.

His tempting eyes went half lidded and he was gazing at Izuku in a way he never had before. Yesterday, Katsuki's gaze was clearly laced with lust and every time he blinked, Izuku was sure he undressed a bit of him with his eyes.

But now, Katsuki was staring at him like he was someone precious.

It nearly looked like Katsuki wanted to kiss him dearly.

"W-We should get ready for bed," Izuku said quietly, suddenly feeling shy. "It's getting late."

"…Okay," Katsuki whispered. His raspy voice grazed the bottom of his vocal cords as they stared into each other.

Katsuki didn't make a move.

Izuku didn't either.

Like forbidden fruit hanging from a tree, Katsuki dangled in front of Izuku. Izuku was torn on whether he should lean in or lean away because all he wanted to do was sink his lips into Katsuki's and have a quick taste.

Ultimately, his nerves got the better of him in the heat of the moment. He'd never really been kissed, and from what it seemed like, Katsuki was an expert. Izuku decided he needed a minute to think and weigh out what was going on in his head.

He quickly excused himself and headed straight for the shower.

While the hot water beat down on his back, Izuku rested his heavy head against the tiled wall. The coolness of the surface contrasted the burning need that rattled in his core.

Izuku ghosted his fingers over his lips, still able to feel Katsuki's hot breath lingering there.

Like a small seed, the thought of kissing Katsuki took root inside of his mind. It sprouted tiny, but strong roots with just a sprinkle of curiosity to keep it watered. Izuku always wondered what it would be like to kiss the terribly handsome stranger he met in Vienna. Even more so, he always wished to kiss Kacchan if they ever were reunited. Now he had two for the price of one foul mouthed blond.

Izuku nervously jittered his leg in the shower as he began to weigh all the different variables at play.

Once he came to his conclusion, Izuku shyly smiled.

Neither Chisaki and Tomura would ever find out if he kissed Katsuki and this was something that he wanted to do for years.

Besides, one small innocent kiss couldn't hurt anything.

Eighth Day in Paradise

When Izuku woke up the next day, he was determined to get his dream kiss.

Something between them shifted dramatically and it was both frightening yet exciting. Their new energy was docile enough to test the waters and do something that Izuku would call absurd under any other circumstances. But under these, very real fateful circumstances, Izuku decided to say it was like the stars were aligning.

Because what better way to have his first real, adult kiss than with the same person from his childhood?

It would be like a souvenir or something of the sort at this point. Izuku reasoned that they didn't have to go any further than an innocent kiss. Plus, after what was uncovered, it would be almost purely sentimental.

Izuku struggled to reason it fully because all he really knew was that he wanted to kiss Katsuki.

Figuring out the aftermath could come later.

They needed to wait until nightfall for the carnival, but Izuku already knew he wanted to kiss Katsuki at the top of the Ferris wheel.

Was he once again painting a picture-perfect scene that was straight out a novel? Sure. Could anyone blame him? No. Especially not Katsuki since he was the whole reason he was hyper fixated on romantic gestures.

When nighttime came, Izuku spent a crazy long time agonizing over his outfit in the bathroom.

What clothes would make him look the most kissable? Katsuki always squinted if there was too much bright pink in his outfit. Maybe the color gave him a headache, Izuku nervously concluded. He decided to choose his white blouse and dark jeans to be easy on the eyes.

But now, he needed to think about the rest of the outfit. What shoes would allow for maximum height difference to make sure Katsuki had to lean down like Jack did in the Titanic movie?

He clutched his head in pain when a headache zapped him.

This was all so painstaking. Izuku groaned lightly when his messy hair didn't curl the way he wanted.

"C'mon, you're holding up everyone," Katsuki shouted from the other side of the bathroom impatiently. "That bird's nest of yours wasn't combed all day yesterday. You're not going to make it look nice now."

"Fine, fine. I'm coming," Izuku grumbled.

He stepped out of the bathroom unsure if he looked kissable. But the second Katsuki saw him, all Izuku's fears melted away.

Katsuki's eyebrows shot up and there was massive surprise plastered across his face. His gorgeous red eyes roamed up and down Izuku's figure, and for once Izuku didn't mind being ogled. He was happy to have Katsuki's attention on him and he hoped he could keep it for the rest of the night.

"This is the part where you tell me I look hideous," Izuku flirted with a light hint of sarcasm.

He nervously smiled and fidgeted with the ring on his finger.

"Yeah," Katsuki whispered, still dazed. "I suppose it is." There was a trickle of silence as they regarded each other. "This is also the part where you tell me to stop staring."

Izuku nodded distantly and echoed his words. "I suppose it is."

Izuku ogled Katsuki right back and was unsurprised that he was once more dressed in all black. But it suited him well and made his eyes and hair stand out.

Katsuki cleared his throat and walked towards him with a hint of blush adoring his cheeks.

Katsuki held his hand out and Izuku happily took it.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They both stared up at the candy-colored carnival sign. It flickered perfectly in sync as opposed to the last time either of them saw it, Izuku assumed. The smell of buttery popcorn, salty pretzels, and flavor filled treats wafted directly into his nose. He closed his eyes to let it sit in his chest and he exhaled into pure relaxation.

All around were colorful crowds of people passing them by. Some were people Izuku recognized from the resort. Some were holding hands and others were bulking together in groups. Everyone was giggling and pointing towards the rollercoasters and large Ferris wheel in the background.

It was exactly how it was all those years ago.

This was an alignment that Izuku planned not to waste.

Mina and Eijirou took it upon themselves to give everyone fuchsia colored feather boas. At first Katsuki made a disgusted face, but Izuku was so delighted because this only added to the moment. He tickled Katsuki's nose with the end of his boa and made the other man pause and laugh slightly.

"Let's have a good time tonight," Izuku said with a candid grin. "What do you say?"

Katsuki smiled at him how he used to and squeezed their interwoven hands. "Alright. Let's have some fun."

Izuku put his heart glasses on and his world was tinted with rosy-hues. He grinned from ear to ear as he decided to view everything the way he always wanted to: hopelessly romantic.

As they walked around the carnival, their whole group had a blast.

The bright pink boas they slung across their shoulders made Izuku giggle in delight. It was a perfect evening as everything fell into place. Izuku got to see his first aerobatics show and Katsuki won the strong man competition. There was even a point where Izuku was able to win Katsuki a teddy bear and it made him grin with delight at how Katsuki really did like the stuffed animal.

The new intensity of emotions in Izuku's chest suddenly felt at home for the first time. And also for the first time, Izuku didn't repress how he was feeling. He felt pure joy when Katsuki smiled at him. He screamed in excitement while on the rollercoaster. And he was happily amused when they decided to do Bumper Cars and Katsuki rammed his car into his over and over.

And lastly, Izuku experienced a daunting, carnal want when Katsuki went apple bobbing.

It was a stupid bet originally. Inasa offhandedly mentioned being the master of apple bobbing and for some reason Eijirou decided to make it a manliness competition. He rushed to take Momo, Katsuki, Inasa, and himself to the front and the four people from their group lined up.

They stood with their hands placed neatly behind their backs. In front of them was a giant barrel of red apples floating on top of water.

“Is there a prize if we win?” Katsuki asked the worker.

“The prize will be a giant plate of churros!” The employee announced.

Like magic, the carnival worker materialized a plate full of several dozen churros stacked high to the sky. Izuku’s eyes must’ve gone so wide because they suddenly felt dry. He gasped in amazement before he could stop himself, and in turn earned a curious glance from Katsuki.

Izuku didn’t notice when Katsuki studied him for a split second then cracked his neck.

“Alright, listen up, Extras. Those churros are mine,” Katsuki suddenly declared. “You all might as well give up now.”

“So overly cocky,” Inasa said with a hearty laugh.

“Confidence is very manly!” Eijirou agreed with a bright grin. “Love the enthusiasm for churros!”

“On your marks, get set, go!” The carnival worker yelled and then blew his whistle.

Izuku couldn’t peel his eyes away. Katsuki dunked his head in and out of the water with a speed he didn’t think was possible. He expertly maneuvered the apples from the barrel of water to the basket beside him like he’d done this a million times before.

The water went almost everywhere in his hair, and it dripped down his shirt and pants. Izuku forgot how to breathe, and he didn’t even notice a full minute passed.

When the whistle blew to signal time was up, Katsuki had an apple in his mouth.

He immediately locked eyes with Izuku in the crowd with his hair dripping wet, and his shirt clinging to his chest. The thin black fabric was nearly see-through now because Izuku perfectly saw the dips and hills of his chest and abdomen.

“Ladies and gentlemen, we have ourselves a winner!” The carnival worker announced while pointing to Katsuki.

Katsuki smirked fiendishly with his teeth in the apple and winked at Izuku.

Izuku glanced down at the basket beside Katsuki, and it was the fullest out of everyone. No one else even came close. All the other competitors gave Katsuki a round of applause and were impressed by his dunking skills. Katsuki soaked up the praise like the arrogant sponge he was.

He stood up straight with earned smugness and ran his hand through his drenched hair. Izuku bit his lip as his heart skipped a beat.

Katsuki then took the apple out of his mouth with one hand, and with the other grabbed the giant plate of churros. He walked over to where Izuku was and politely handed the mountain of sweets to him.

“Here you go,” Katsuki mumbled. “All for you.”

Izuku was surprised. He looked down at the giant plate and grabbed it.

“You don’t want any?” Izuku asked.

“I hate sweets. I’ve always been more of a fruit guy.”

Katsuki held up the apple. He tossed it playfully before catching it and chomped a healthy bite out of the side.

Izuku watched as Katsuki sunk his teeth in the fruit and beads of water dripped down from his hair. Izuku’s eyes roamed down to Katsuki’s soaking wet chest that was at his eye level and bit his lip. He admired the way his silver chain was now glistening.

Any reservations about kissing Katsuki were fully gone with the wind.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After they finished gorging themselves on churros and cotton candy, they all decided to take a spin on the Ferris wheel.

“Have you ever been on a Ferris wheel?” Izuku asked as they stood in line. He teetered back and forth on his toes as he stared up at Katsuki.

“Nope,” Katsuki said with a pop at the end. He turned his head to smile at Izuku. “This will be my first time.”

“Me too. I guess we can experience it together.”

When it was their turn to get in, the carnival worker helped them inside of the pink cart with a welcoming smile. Izuku scooted in happily and Katsuki took a seat beside him. Izuku watched as Katsuki plopped the teddy bear on the side they didn’t sit on.

Izuku briefly examined the cart through his rose-tinted glasses and his heart clutched. It was perfect for his first real kiss. Twinkling fairy lights glittered atop the roof of the cart, and it brilliantly set a romantic mood.

Katsuki turned to look at the window as they started slowly rising up.

“Are you enjoying the sights?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki turned to look at him and it sent a jolt all the way down to Izuku’s fingertips.

“I am,” Katsuki agreed. “You seem like you’re enjoying yourself a bit more.”

“I think so, hah.” Izuku grinned timidly and shrugged his shoulders. “Only attempting to make my best of it while we’re here.”

“…Did you ever think about coming here? After I disappeared?” Katsuki asked as they rose higher in the sky.

“Of course. I thought about it all the time, I always wanted to go to this place.” Izuku tilted his head at him. “I know this is silly, but I thought a lot about coming back here with you. It feels…nice that we’re here. Together.”

Katsuki’s gaze softened and he confessed, “Me too. I…I thought about it a lot when I was a kid too. Sometimes I even imagined that if I found this carnival again, you’d just be here. Waiting. Especially because we always kept rambling about all that silly shit. The stuff about always coming back to each other.”

Izuku’s hope leapt to new heights.

Katsuki chuckled and bashfully rubbed at his nape. “It’s fucking stupid, I know, given that’s not how marriages work and we were just kids clinging to some dumb thing that made us happy.”

To Izuku, it wasn’t stupid at all.

It was more than perfect, and it made him happy in a way he had never experienced before. Knowing this whole time Katsuki wanted to see him again just as much as he did was groundbreaking. It was like two long lost jigsaw pieces finally coming together after being broken and tattered while away. Yet somehow, despite all the wear and tear they still fit together.

“Y’know, it’s fascinating,” Izuku whispered, looking at Katsuki through his pink glasses. “How it all worked out.”

“What do you mean?”

“Despite everything, we still came back to each other.”

“I guess we did. Didn’t we?” Katsuki whispered.

The look Katsuki was giving him now was enchanting. He was so sure Katsuki would want nothing to do with him once the cat was out of the bag, but he was dead wrong.

They were reunited and slowly everything was patching together.

Izuku’s heart clutched. He wondered what this meant for future assignments where they were always bound to run into each other repeatedly.

Fireworks went off in the background and illuminated everything. The glitter decorated the sky and the lights above Katsuki’s head curved along his handsome face perfectly. Izuku inched his fingers forward to search for Katsuki's as they neared the top of the Ferris wheel.

Slowly, their hands interlocked, and their bodies moved like magnets. Katsuki's gaze from last night returned, and this time Izuku steeled his nerves. He looked at Katsuki's lips and leaned in slowly despite his racing heart.

Katsuki's other hand cradled his face lightly and Izuku leaned into the touch.

It felt right and his breath hitched when Katsuki took a finger and began playing with a curl in his hair. Izuku stared at Katsuki through his rose-colored glasses and closed his eyes when the other man leaned down fully.

Izuku gathered every ounce of courage and leaned in to kiss Katsuki.

"This…This is my last assignment," Katsuki whispered right before Izuku's lips touched his.

Izuku's eyes snapped open.

Everything halted.

The creak of the metal machine scratched through the silence.

Izuku leaned back to get a better look at Katsuki as his brain processed the words over and over again.

Katsuki's face was etched with guilt.

"What do you mean this is your last assignment?" Izuku asked, not wanting to be right. "Last like you're being fired?"

"Last as in after this I'm retiring for good," Katsuki whispered. "I filled my quota and contract requirements."

Izuku struggled to grasp the concept but slowly he understood it—and it threw him straight out of the fantasy he was living. Izuku made a distressed expression as he slowly slid the rose-colored glasses off his face to look at reality. The lights weren't as bright, and the fireworks didn't seem as dazzling anymore.

"Does that mean you'll stop overlapping on my assignments?" Izuku murmured.

"Yes," Katsuki said. He clenched his fists in his lap. "I'm moving to the far countryside to settle down for a long time. I, uh, actually own a bit of property out there that I don't use. I was going to set up in that town. It's quiet. Safe. Y'know, normal."

Normal.

That word anchored Izuku back to his world. He stared at Katsuki and viciously understood they were not the same. They did similar jobs, but Katsuki basked in the light of free will while Izuku did not. Izuku's heart broke in half when he weighed out every likely outcome. Each scenario he ran through his head landed at the same terrible ending.

"…We're never going to see each other again after this. Are we?" Izuku whispered.

The Ferris wheel began its descent down and so did Izuku's heart.

Katsuki's face crumbled and he quickly said, "I mean you could—"

Katsuki stopped his words.

Izuku waited.

And waited.

He waited the same excruciating way he waited for that year in Tokyo. But the extension never came. His shoulders slumped when he realized he was stupid for thinking Katsuki would offer him to come visit him. He felt even stupider for thinking that would even be possible.

Even if Katsuki did extend the offer—how would Izuku ever sneak around Tomura to go see an outsider?

Quickly, the cart began to feel suffocating when neither of them talked. Izuku tried to suppress the tears that were coming on, but it was as effective as a single man trying to stop a dam from breaking all by himself.

And when that dam inside of Izuku broke, everything rushed through.

They were finally reunited and now they were about to be ripped apart again. How did they squander all these years together not knowing it was each other by their side this whole time? Why was it only now, on Katsuki's last assignment, that they were finding out?

It wasn't fair.

None of this was fair.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The desire in his chest putrefied into bitterness the second they stepped off the Ferris wheel.

He could barely look at Katsuki or hold his hand. If he did either of those things, then what Katsuki said would be true. He didn't want to face the truth yet, not when he was supposed to be having fun. But all around him were couples laughing and kissing. They hugged each other and smiled with such pure, unreachable love.

All Izuku could do was gaze on with envy and he put his rose-colored glasses back on.

To avoid growing green with jealousy, Izuku found himself a lifeline by clinging to two things: denial and Mina.

Mina's energy was magnetic, joyful, and what Izuku needed right in the moment. He followed her lead and pretended to be as happy as she was. She made him laugh, giggle, and told a bunch of jokes that Izuku never heard. It was a nice escape in a way Izuku never anticipated. Maybe in a different life they would have been the best of friends.

After a round of cotton candy shots in the carnival pop-up bar, Mina looked over her shoulder discreetly at their group. She grabbed Izuku's wrist and pulled him off to the side away from the rest of the group.

"Is everything okay, Hiroji?" Mina whispered quietly once they were alone.

"Yeah, everything is good," Izuku said quickly and entirely unconvincingly. His voice was several octaves higher than usual, and he could tell Mina didn't buy it. "Why do you ask?"

Mina cradled his hand softly with hers. "You've just been on edge it seems like. Did something happen on the Ferris wheel?"

Women's intuition. It was never wrong, and he had Himiko to thank for teaching him that lesson. He decided to weave in the truth to avoid being caught in a lie.

"While we were on the Ferris wheel, Taro told me he got a new job offer," Izuku said, thinly veiling the truth. "The location is…far. I worry about not seeing him much when he takes it. I-I feel like he's going to forget me."

Mina leaned in and hugged him tightly. "You're not forgettable at all Hiroji and Taro loves you very much."

Izuku wished that were true.

Then suddenly, Mina gasped like she had an idea. She pulled back and flashed him the brightest grin in the world.

"Oh! You know what you should do!" She exclaimed. "You two should get married again!"

Izuku rapidly blinked out of his daze. "H-Huh?"

Mina grinned wider. "Sometimes Ei and I go through some rough patches. Whenever we do, we get married again to remind ourselves where our center is. We've been married in twelve countries now with the same vows."

Izuku was very very surprised to learn that Japan's #1 happy go lucky couple experienced rough patches. But there was comfort in knowing their bond was as strong as they were and they always sought ways to keep it solid.

"That's very sweet of you two to do," Izuku said.

"You and Taro should do it," Mina pushed. "Trust me, it works wonders. There's even a marriage booth here you two could go to!" She jutted her head to the window of the bar.

Izuku peaked out of the window and there it was. In pink and yellow cursive font, the words "Marriage Drive Thru" sat with sparkling pink hearts blinking on and off. Each letter was encased by a row of lightbulbs that dazzled against the night sky, beckoning everyone to come inside and a long line of couples shuffled around the corner.

Izuku nervously laughed it off. “I’ll consider it.”

Of course he didn’t. It wasn’t a real solution to their problem, so he didn’t think about it further.

ᔓᔓᔓ

As the night went on, Mina took it upon herself to make sure Izuku forgot his sadness.

She eagerly led him back to the bar and pounded back vodka shot after vodka shot like a champ. Right next to her in perfect sync was Eijirou and afterwards they encouraged their whole group to gather on the twinkling dance floor. Izuku danced up and down to the rhythm of the songs until bliss finally won against sadness.

He kept dancing and drinking, fully desperate to drown his sorrows even more.

Time slipped by him. He hadn’t kept track of his alcohol intake by mistake and his lethal guard was brought down by the weight of the emotions in his chest that he was unfamiliar with. He never felt sorrow this big, and as a result it took a toll on him.

The minutes passed accompanied by an egregious amount of alcohol and Izuku’s vision swayed.

He giggled entirely out of control as he chased the warm feeling in his stomach when Jirou hugged him. He took one more shot with the encouragement of Inasa who pinched his cheek.

His thoughts started to swarm together like a prism of light. Then he took one look at Katsuki and found himself lost again. Katsuki was sitting off to the side, not dancing. He was wrapped in the shadows staring at him with a crestfallen expression.

Now all Izuku could see was young, skinny Katsuki who was shivering in the cold without a jacket.

Like always, he went to him. Izuku tried to walk over to Katsuki and his whole vision blurred. He said some words he didn’t remember and pouted. He heard Katsuki’s voice go in and out and saw the glint of their wedding bands.

Suddenly, Katsuki carefully used both hands to slide the rose-colored glasses on top of Izuku’s head.

Izuku saw Katsuki plainly, and he faced the truth he didn’t want to. In two days, they would separate again, possibly forever, and that would be the final chapter for their story. Izuku stared at Katsuki longingly. He mourned all the memories they didn’t have a chance to create.

He interlaced their fingers and pulled himself close to Katsuki.

“You make me happy in a terrible way,” Izuku gently confessed.

Izuku leaned all the way into the only person he ever wanted. His head bopped with drunkenness as he rested their warm foreheads together.

After that, it all became a blur.

Mina came back over, insisting that she buy them one more round, and Shouto and Jirou were both pink in the face from drunken laughter. Inasa was patting some of the sweat off his body in the warm room with a pink napkin. So much was happening around them, but all Izuku could think about was Kacchan.

Suddenly the next thing Izuku knew was that they were dancing together.

They were in the middle of the room as everything swirled and bent out of shape. Izuku looked up at Katsuki and saw the boy he used to know. He did the one thing he wanted to do ever since he found him.

He hugged Katsuki tightly and slowly Katsuki embraced him back. They leaned into each other as they used one another for support. Katsuki’s cinnamon musk blanketed him and Izuku took it upon himself to wrap his arms around Katsuki’s neck.

He didn’t want to let go.

He dug his fingers into Katsuki’s shoulders.

He couldn’t let go.

The last thing Izuku remembered was staring at the words ‘Marriage Drive-Thru’ outside of the window.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Ninth Day in Paradise

The most wonderful dream came to Izuku that night.

It was painted like Van Gogh’s Starry Night but with bright pinks, purples, and reds. All around him were tiny hearts as melodic church bells rang in the background. He was standing at an altar in the sky with Katsuki hand in hand as they recited the same beautiful vows they made when they were kids. After they said ‘I do’ they shared a kiss so passionate doves began singing in falsetto and it rained down white rose petals from the sky.

Then with all the delicateness of a sledgehammer, Izuku’s dream was shattered into tiny fragments as he was thrust back into reality.

Suddenly he was cold, shivering, and his head felt like it was run over by a steamroller. Izuku heard a deep groan of disgust as he tried to blink his eyes open.

“Katsuki?” Izuku groggily called out, recognizing that sound of grouchiness. “Are you awake?”

“Yeah, I’m up,” Katsuki said with new hoarseness.

Izuku peered around the all too bright room to see Katsuki was in the bed with the same clothes as yesterday. Then he looked down at himself to see the same. His shirt was unbuttoned slightly and only one of his socks was missing.

Izuku groaned as he struggled to figure out why he was even wearing a sock. He wore flats last night.

“Do you remember what happened yesterday after the bar by any chance?” Katsuki muttered.

At this, Izuku sat up all the way. He tried to think and all he could remember was Mina shoving drinks in his face and dancing with Katsuki. After that, there was nothing but a black hole staring back at him.

“No,” Izuku grumbled tiredly. “I blacked out when Mina gave me my fourth shot of vodka and some fruity sounding drink. I had no clue they would be drinkers like that. Their tolerance is higher than anything I’ve ever seen.”

“Yeah. Leave it up to the fitspo couple to be extreme rage machines,” Katsuki grumbled. “Fucking pink and red lunatics.”

Izuku mumbled in agreement, grabbed his head, and plugged in his dead phone.

Katsuki made him extraordinarily stupid, Izuku noted. This was the first time he ever blacked out on a mission, and he felt sticky and disgusting for doing so.

He prayed on Hiryu’s grave that they didn’t let their real names slip.

Izuku squinted as he looked at the lock screen on his phone that was decorated with a picture of him and Katsuma. He tiredly sifted through his pictures folder to piece together what happened. He came across several blurry images of him and Mina mostly, and some sloppy shots of him and Katsuki holding up their wedding rings together under pink lights.

But Izuku came to a halt when he noted the background of the last picture. He zoomed in with two fingers and saw how the set up was the same church from his dream.

Izuku’s nose scrunched in confusion.

“Izuku…” Katsuki suddenly called his name from across the room.

Izuku peered towards his faux husband to see Katsuki standing there holding a small piece of paper in his hands. His eyes were wide with shock as if someone told him someone else died.

“Why the fuck does this marriage certificate say Bakugou Izuku and Bakugou Katsuki?”

Katsuki whipped his head to him and turned around the paper.

Izuku's eyes bulged at the bold lettering that said, 'Official Marriage'. He stared at the paper in front of him and the pretty blue ribbon that was stamped at the top with a golden emblem.

"Maybe it's not real," Izuku said easily because it couldn't be real.

"What the hell do you mean it's not real?" Katsuki snapped back. "It looks real as shit, Izuku. It even has the official stamp of Nago, Okinawa on it and says, 'marriage is legally recognized in the country of Japan'—and it has our goddamn government names on it."

Katsuki sat down on the edge of the bed, put his head in his hands, and then tossed Izuku the piece of paper.

Izuku wearily picked it up, and the longer he inspected the piece of paper, it did seem more official than he liked to believe. The neatness of it was something only found with government documents and that for sure was the official stamp of Nago, Okinawa.

Izuku began sweating slightly.

"I-It could be one of those fake marriage thingys!" Izuku reasoned.

Plenty of carnivals had fake Marriage booths. This was totally something fake. But then he noted the fake surname 'Bakugou' that was tacked on and was a bit more relieved.

"W-We should go find out where we got this from—it might not even be legally binding," Izuku rushed to say.

Katsuki scowled. "And if it fucking is?"

Izuku's face twisted in confusion. He didn't utter a word as he glanced between Katsuki and the piece of paper as if it was obvious.

"I-It can't be," Izuku spoke at a very slow pace. He bored his eyes into Katsuki because there was no way— "Your surname isn't actually Bakugou, is it? I thought that was fake."

"Of course it's my real surname. Why would I lie about that?"

Izuku's heart dropped, and he stared at Katsuki in horror.

"But why would you use your real surname for an assignment?" Izuku hissed. "Th-That's plain reckless and extremely poor undercover behavior. I don't ever reveal my real surname or first name on assignments—"

"—Look, the surname thing, sure. I probably should've checked in with a fake one," Katsuki quipped unhappily. "But, in my fucking defense, I figured this would be a one and done type of assignment: a bullet in that scummy bastard's skull from a rooftop in the dead of night and then I would leave. I didn't anticipate I would get up close and personal with the son of a bitch. And neither did my supervisor—but here we fucking are."

Izuku sat in disbelief at how badly Katsuki was trained.

He checked into a resort where he was going to kill someone using his real surname? He couldn't understand the sheer recklessness of that. But worse he couldn't comprehend the fact that if that was Katsuki's real last name…

…Then that meant…

Izuku stared at the name 'Bakugou Izuku' in a new, horrifying light.

He clutched the roots of his hair and held back a scream.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Much to Izuku's dismay, the surprises didn't stop there.

When he went to the bathroom, he found his entire chest and neck covered in hickies. Worse, it seems like drunk Katsuki did the hickies in the shape of a sloppy heart, with an extra emphasis on one above his right nipple.

Izuku groaned loudly as he examined his tender skin.

He couldn't decide if he was angrier about Katsuki's last name actually being Bakugou or if he couldn't remember getting his first hickey.

Why did nothing ever work out in his favor?

ᔓᔓᔓ

By the time they made it to breakfast, Izuku was sweating through his shirt. He told himself that there was no chance the marriage certificate was real because that would require them to be so stupid that a new definition of the word "morons" would have to be made.

He tried to keep his smile pinned neatly on his lips, but it was hard when their Paradise Crew told them what transpired last night. Not only was Izuku's choking kink tossed out in the open, but it seemed like Katsuki thought his ass was nice—which was news to him.

But much to their relief, it seemed like their drunken selves didn't spill their real identities.

Instead, drunk Izuku and Katsuki simply wandered off somewhere after mentioning that they needed to get married again. Which then triggered a memory in Izuku's head. He remembered smiling at Katsuki and leading him out into the night. Then quietly in the back of his mind, he remembered what Mina said before he blacked out.

"You two should get married again!"

Izuku's heart plummeted into his stomach. Oh. Oh no.

"And where did we go exactly?" Katsuki asked.

“To the Marriage Drive Thru at the carnival,” Jirou answered simply.

Izuku wanted the ground to swallow him whole.

ɯɯɯ

When they arrived at the Marriage Drive Thru it was like standing in front of the doors of hell. Izuku just never thought they would be colored pink.

They walked in and it was something straight out of a comedy movie. The plastic chapel was a bootleg version of what was in his dream with trash everywhere. With the help of alcohol this place seemed like a magical scene from a movie, but now in plain daylight it was clearly cheap and reeked of nicotine.

They walked in, found the owner whose name was Yasuo and quickly cut straight to business.

It was the worst-case scenario.

“All marriages done here are as official as any other marriage sealed elsewhere,” Yasuo told them as if he was offended. He turned his nose and mustache up at them as he crossed his arms. “We use a civil officiant and bring all the proper paperwork for convenience. All documentation is real and submitted to the city for permanent record every morning. If you’re married here, you’re married legally.”

Izuku forgot how to breathe as the shock immediately settled in.

Izuku began to turn a light purple in the face from lack of air and when he finally gasped for oxygen, he stumbled on the uneven ground. His knees buckled from sheer disbelief, and he quickly scrambled to grab onto a bench for purchase.

The pounding in his head tripled as their screw up came crashing down.

They were married.

Legally.

Everything twisted on its head. All Izuku could feel was Tomura preemptively breaking his nose.

He gagged as he felt this morning’s breakfast moonwalk itself back up his throat. Izuku quickly slapped his hand over his mouth and held his stomach. He was going to hurl then and there on the dingy pink carpet from stress.

“Is there a problem?” Yasuo asked. “If you would like, I could show you the tape from the wedding. For legal purposes, we document all weddings that happen here and then give every couple a copy for sentimental reasons. But, uh, I remember you two didn’t exactly wait for me to give you your copy.”

Izuku finally gathered courage to look at Katsuki.

Katsuki's face was paler than usual, and he was holding his forehead in disbelief. Katsuki's eyes wearily turned to him and suddenly, guilt rocked into Izuku's core. There was no doubt in Izuku's mind that Katsuki hated him now.

Izuku bit his lip and looked back at the owner.

"S-Sure," Izuku said in a whisper.

ᔓᔓᔓ

In Izuku's wildest dreams, he always wanted to have the perfect romantic wedding.

There would be white roses everywhere and an orchestra playing The Dance of The Love Birds in the background as he walked down an aisle made of glass that was perched above clear, running water. Flowing down from above would be hundreds of pink and yellow lilies as he marched forward to meet his true love.

But always in the back of his mind the person waiting at the end of the aisle would be Kacchan.

Which is why this tape was something surreal to witness.

He watched the flat screen TV, still in shock, as he and Katsuki stumbled on the screen drunk. They were clutching each other's hands endearingly and kept the other one steady. The camera focused in and out and then zoomed in on them shifting through a brown trunk of costume attire.

Izuku watched himself pick out a red bowtie and then watched Katsuki pick a green one. They pointed to the stained bowties, then to their shining wedding rings and snickered happily. Both were too drunk to tie their bowties properly—but neither of them seemed to care as they laughed.

Then Izuku watched himself reach for a white wedding veil, giggle slightly, and then don it on himself like a crown.

"Do I look pretty?" The Izuku on the screen slurred through his drunken speech.

The TV Katsuki nodded eagerly and stared at him in a way Izuku always imagined Kacchan would if they were ever reunited.

"The fucking prettiest."

They walked up hand in hand towards the aisle with a man who was dressed in black slacks and a blue and purple Hawaiian print shirt. Offbeat wedding music played from somewhere and Izuku could identify the tune as the clichéd 'Here Comes the Bride' melody.

They stopped in front of the Civil Officiant holding hands and gazing into each other lovingly. It was here Katsuki lowered his head as if he couldn't bear to witness what was to come on the tape.

But Izuku couldn't look away.

He watched as they signed several disclaimers and waivers. Then the Civil Officiant started reciting the magical words to bind them to each other. They were beautiful words Izuku had listened to and read a hundred times over in different media.

Now, he was watching himself listen to the words with hearts in his eyes. He was starring in a romantic movie with a love interest he had dreamed about for years. It should be a dream come true to see himself inserted in what was always a poor coping mechanism for his dull life.

But there was not an ounce of happiness inside of him witnessing this.

"You may now say your vows," the Officiant said.

Katsuki furrowed his brows and returned his eyes back to the screen.

"I promise to always come back to you, darling," the Katsuki on the screen said seriously. He gripped Izuku's hands tightly in his and slightly wobbled with a plastered grin. "I'll find my way back to you, again and again and again. I promise to always be by your side and I'll fucking kill anyone who gets in the way of us."

The officiant gave Katsuki a weary glance at the casual mention of murder. But to Izuku it felt like a love poem because it was so uniquely Katsuki. Izuku saw himself stare at Katsuki with hope, and he leaned into him tenderly.

"And I promise to always come back to you too," Izuku watched himself say. "I'll always find my way back to you."

"Promise?" Katsuki whispered desperately.

The drunk, unfocused gaze in their eyes sobered for that split moment. Everything slowed as Izuku watched them look at each other. It was then that the marriage didn't feel like a mistake, but rather a long time coming, and it was bizarre how genuine it quickly came across.

"I promise, Kacchan." Izuku stared back at him with equal gentleness. "I missed you. I'm so happy we found each other again just like we said we would."

"With that, do you, Bakugou Katsuki, take Mamushi Izuku to be your lawfully wedded husband?" The Officiant on screen asked. He glanced between the two men like he was witnessing something pure.

"I do," the Katsuki on screen said.

The officiant turned to Izuku with a smile. “And do you, Mamushi Izuku, take Bakugou Katsuki to be your lawfully wedded husband in return?”

“Of course, I do,” Izuku laughed lightheartedly. “Kacchan has always been my husband.”

“Then I now pronounce you Bakugou Katsuki and Bakugou Izuku!” The officiant said happily.

Izuku clenched his jaw when tears pricked at his eyes. He watched his first kiss from the third party.

It was something divine.

The solemn yearning in Izuku’s heart became stronger as the TV Katsuki tenderly cradled his face. They kissed each other like nothing else mattered as their eyes fluttered closed.

His eyes began to burn from not blinking.

The drunken Izuku was a carefree version of himself that didn’t seem held back by the shadowy strings orchestrating his life. He looked like he didn’t fear Tomura as he embraced Katsuki.

Any other time Izuku would have been appalled to know this sloppy, cheap marriage was how he was hitched. It went against every single fantasy he dreamed of, but instead he found himself transfixed and not because it was perfect, but rather because it was Katsuki who he was marrying.

Out of all Izuku’s wildest dreams, Katsuki really was the only one that mattered.

It was a damning realization because come tomorrow, they would be separated again, and this accidental marriage would be just that: an accident.

Izuku lowered his head away from Katsuki.

It suddenly hurt too much to look at him.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Talking about divorce was harder than it should’ve been.

There was an underlying feeling of wrongness about covering up this marriage, and it was evident in Katsuki’s attitude as well. They were finally reunited, and they were about to cut the cord once again, but this time willingly.

After they spoke about logistics, Katsuki gave him their marriage tape so he could destroy it. But Izuku wasn’t sure he could do that as he thought about what was on it. It was proof that maybe in another life Katsuki didn’t hate him. It was also evidence that his first adult kiss was with the one person he always wanted it to be with.

When they got back to the room, they danced around each other in an embarrassed tango.

They started to prepare for killing Moore by sharpening their blades and counting their bullets at the table in their room. Izuku methodically stacked his ammo and thought about which way to kill Moore with tender care. But as he put a bullet in each gun's chamber, it felt like striking away time on their limited minutes together.

"Do you want to talk about what happened on that tape?" Katsuki finally asked.

"Only that I'm sorry for getting drunk and suggesting that we get married," Izuku said quietly. He took out his knives and started carefully sharpening them. "I shouldn't have drunk so much, I should've cut myself off. I'm never that irresponsible on assignments usually—you probably hate me even more right now."

Katsuki let out a quick, sharp laugh. "Surprisingly, I don't think I hate you."

Izuku stopped sharpening his knife and raised his eyebrows.

"You don't?" Izuku asked.

"Naw, I don't think I do," Katsuki reaffirmed. He shrugged as he began to load the bullets in his handgun.

Butterflies of hope and surprise tickled the inside of Izuku's stomach. He searched Katsuki features for any signs of a lie. But all he found was an authentic, lovely grin staring back at him.

"Don't get me wrong, you're still a little shit," Katsuki said with a light chuckle. "But I'm glad we found each other again after Tokyo. Even before I knew it was you, I don't think I entirely hated you. I wanted to but I don't think I ever did. You were annoying and aggravating but—I didn't hate you. Besides, we both decided to get married. I signed that shit just as much as you did. We both fucked up, it's a shared responsibility."

Hearing that made Izuku suspend every belief he had of Katsuki.

This whole time he thought Katsuki hated him, but he didn't. It was enlightening to see his own emotions mirrored. It put their interactions over the last eight years into a new, softer light.

Izuku's expression grew more compassionate. "If I didn't know better, I would say you're getting soft on me."

"Don't fucking push it," Katsuki scoffed. He narrowed his eyes with a playful frown. "I said I don't hate you, doesn't mean I've forgotten eight years of flopped assignments because you shoved your gun in my goddamn face."

Izuku laughed lightly.

The awkwardness of the moment was easily brushed away. Izuku decided to simply enjoy their last day together.

Right as Izuku was about to go back to focusing, Katsuki suddenly moved his chair directly next to him. Izuku curiously peered at Katsuki, but Katsuki didn't lead on to anything as he shuffled in closely. Katsuki reached down and pulled Izuku's chair closer as well with a grin.

The heat from Katsuki's body rolled off his shoulders onto Izuku and their feet knocked together. Izuku thought it was a mistake, but when Katsuki purposefully locked their legs together and didn't move, Izuku's heart started to beat at a dangerous tempo yet again.

Katsuki really didn't hate him, after all this time.

As they continued preparing for the mission, Izuku couldn't help but steal shy glances at Katsuki. Katsuki did the same, but with a lot less shyness and he winked at Izuku as he leaned in closely.

Every now and then Katsuki would rock his legs, which would rock Izuku's. The gesture was so playful Izuku couldn't help but giggle as he cocked another one of his guns.

"I'm happy I got to spend this week with you, Katsuki," Izuku confessed quietly. There was a need inside of his chest that spread down his limbs as he looked at Katsuki. He yearned to reach out and hug the man in front of him so much it hurt. "It was nice getting to know you. As both Katsuki and Kacchan."

Katsuki warmly studied him, and he smirked.

"I'm glad I could spend this week with you as well." Katsuki leaned in slightly, locking their legs a tad bit more. "Weird how that all worked out, huh? Can't believe I'm a little disappointed this is our last night together."

Upon hearing those words, Izuku's heart clenched as if there was a hand around it.

It squeezed as he tried to take this moment to memorize Katsuki to take with him for his departure. But it didn't feel like it was enough. He wanted a kiss. He wanted his Kacchan. He wanted to be touched by Katsuki so badly it burned.

But more importantly, he wanted a say in what happened to his body.

Dangerous desire sparked under his belly. His eyes crawled up and down Katsuki's figure and stopped on his lips. Katsuki stared at him right back with the same amount of desire with those tempting eyes.

Izuku briefly considered Tomura and Chisaki.

He was torn between free will and obedience. Then he felt the ghost of Hiryu push him with both hands and awaken the spiteful side of him. It surged forward and showed him a flash of the drunken, carefree version of himself. He remembered the passionate, beautiful kiss on the tape and decided he was tired of watching movies. He was tired of reading books. He was tired of experiencing the things he wanted from the outside looking in.

Izuku wanted to live it.

He reached out and took a bite of the forbidden fruit.

Nothing else mattered as they were swept away under a tidal wave of dangerous flirtation. They danced around each other until their lips collided.

The kiss was everything Izuku thought it would be. He clung fiercely to Katsuki as their union became more and more intense. With every passing second, Katsuki breathed life back into the emotions Izuku had starved for oxygen.

They broke apart and Izuku took a deep breath.

Suddenly Izuku felt wholeheartedly alive.

Every broken feeling inside of Izuku pieced back together as Katsuki took him apart.

Katsuki worked him open with such delicious care that all his nerves washed away with every lick, suck, flick and kiss. Then Izuku's senses skyrocketed when Katsuki slowly pushed into him from behind. Inch by inch, Izuku was filled with all of Katsuki's needs.

Then it happened. A piece of Izuku that had never been touched before was found by Katsuki. Pleasure he never imagined bloomed inside of him and raked across his body. Izuku knew he made the right decision when Katsuki planted soft kisses along his nape and started to roughly fuck him with purpose.

In an instant, their bodies molded into a brutal erotic rhythm that was uniquely them. Delicate but feverish. Attentive yet dangerous. Every powerful thrust and ragged breath were perfectly in tandem with their twisted sonata.

Rapture seized him by the throat and Izuku became overwhelmed. His touch starved nerve endings were set ablaze as Katsuki brought him to the peaks of the heavens twice. Izuku didn't even know that was possible.

Then his whole body violently shook when he peaked a third, impossible time with intoxicating ecstasy at the same time Katsuki came inside of him. With their synchronized orgasms came the final blow resuscitating all his emotions.

One by one every single forgotten emotion inside of Izuku toppled over each other in a stampede.

He sobbed instantly as his vision went white.

Katsuki immediately wrapped his arms around him, pulling him against his chest. Loud sobs tore through Izuku's throat as he leaned on Katsuki for support. He blinked rapidly, unsure of what was happening when his body convulsed with countless ripples of euphoria.

"I got you, darling," Katsuki reassured. He tightened his grasp as Izuku gave one more full body tremor. "There you go, feel it all the way through you. You're doing so fucking good."

Izuku keened at the praise and his cock spurted a dribble of cum once more. Katsuki kept going, offering up sweet nothings in Izuku's ear as he became doused in overstimulation.

He was sweet. Kacchan was so sweet.

“I’m so lucky I got to have you like this. Thank you,” Katsuki whispered. Izuku closed his eyes and another wave of pleasure traveled down from his head to his chest and landed at his toes. “I’m going to kiss you all damn night.”

Izuku wanted that too. His toes curled as he gasped and pushed back on the cock inside of him. His knees gave out but he didn’t want this beautiful feeling to end.

With gentle care, Katsuki lowered them on the mattress as he slid out of Izuku. He carefully cradled Izuku and stroked his hair affectionately. Lovely kisses peppered across his temple, his face, his cheeks. Izuku soaked up each one as he slowly came down. He leaned into the warm arms embracing his body and relaxed fully.

As he laid there breathless and dazed, he thought about how sex was more intense than he ever imagined. It was as if he had given more than just his body to Katsuki. He had offered up pieces of his soul that he would never get back.

They were gone along with his eighty-million-dollar virginity.

ɯɯɯ

They lay there under the covers after they came down exchanging kisses and touches. Izuku thought he would feel the weight of regret, but he didn’t.

Katsuki was the right person, he always was.

Katsuki played with his hair and counted his freckles, kissing each one. They made no move to look at the clock or acknowledge their limited time together. Izuku’s hand explored Katsuki’s body as he traced some of his veins and he kissed a scar above Katsuki’s heart.

Katsuki lifted the palm of Izuku’s hand and left a tiny kiss above the scar there.

With that simple motion, there was a line crossed. They waltzed right over it and didn’t dare look back. Whatever barriers were up between them came tumbling down as if they both took twin sledgehammers to the wall and broke it into tiny fragments.

Izuku measured his hand against Katsuki, and their matching rings glimmered in the soft moonlight together. Izuku realized they could take these off now—but then Katsuki slowly curled his fingers, intertwining their hands.

The gesture was so pure it made Izuku’s heart sink further into yearning.

“Thank you,” Katsuki whispered into the dark room. He stroked Izuku’s freckled skin with his thumb, and Izuku relished the coarseness he might never feel again. “I meant to tell you that earlier. Thank you for being there for me that year in Tokyo. It means a lot to me. You —” Katsuki sucked in a deep breath. “You saved me, when no one else was there.”

Izuku smiled back at him.

“You saved me too.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Last Day in Paradise

The alarm went off for their mission to begin at exactly 01:00 sharp.

There was a dark emotion in Izuku that took control now that they needed to switch back into lethal mode. The vacation of his dreams was done with and now it was time to check back into reality.

Their plan was straight forward: Get to the headquarters on Ie Island, kill Moore, and stage the scene to look like a twisted love affair gone wrong.

Afterwards, they would change into hiking clothes and go to the hiking area on Ie Island. They would act as though they were there enjoying some early morning hiking when the police raid hit since there would be little time between killing Moore and checking out of the hotel for good.

When Izuku turned to Katsuki, he couldn’t stop himself from feeling concerned. He looked at Kacchan up and down and watched as he dressed himself. The urge to straighten out his shirt and comb his thick hair for him tingled at his fingers. He followed it and smoothed out a wrinkle in Katsuki’s shirt with shaking limbs.

But Katsuki quickly steadied his shaking hands and reminded him that he didn’t have to worry about him anymore.

They set off for their mission knowing it was the final time they would be together.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Once they made it to the headquarters every hair on Izuku’s body stood up tall. An eerie feeling settled in like spiders lurking underneath his skin. Izuku almost forgot what it was like to be in the presence of true evil after a mere ten days.

They easily cut their way through the sea of bodyguards and were able to execute their plan of attack perfectly until one particular guard swiped at Izuku’s chest. He moved a slight second short and the fabric of his body suit was sliced open. The flap leaned forward to expose his mark.

Izuku forgot about his mark somehow. He tacked up the piece of cloth without much thought.

While Izuku put down the bodyguards, Moore and Koizumi tried to flee into a panic room like cowards. Katsuki was able to land two bullets into Koizumi, dropping him to the ground. But he was not quick enough to stop Moore in his tracks.

Without sparing a single glance, Moore ran away and left behind Koizumi.

Izuku could see the bitterness rake across Koizumi's face when he pinned him down with his foot.

Katsuki chased after Moore but came back empty handed. They deduced that Koizumi must've known where he was, but he was a tough shell to crack. The power of love, Izuku figured. It would make you nearly die for the person.

They tied up Koizumi in a chair and began to interrogate him. It went on without a blip until the slashed part of Izuku's body suit fell forward.

The number 217 was on full display.

Izuku quickly slapped the fold back up, but it was too late.

"Wait—that tattoo," Koizumi whispered, sounding astonished. His eyes inched wider and wider by the second with recognition. "I recognize that type of tattoo. You're from the Viper Academy. Aren't you?"

Izuku almost put a bullet in Koizumi's mouth out of reflex. But then remembered they still needed him.

"Tell us where Moore went," Izuku hissed dangerously. Izuku's nostrils flared, he cocked his gun and pointed it directly at Koizumi's face. "Now. I won't ask again."

"What number are you? I didn't get a good look," Koizumi said lazily. He seemed not to care that he was staring down the barrel of a loaded gun. "200s I think I saw? Was it above 250 or below?"

"His number...?" Katsuki whispered carefully.

Horror sunk into Izuku like a thousand knives when Koizumi began chuckling like a mad man in the chair. Katsuki turned to him, perplexed at what was happening and Izuku felt like his whole world was going to fall apart.

He tried to shut Koizumi up but was stopped by Katsuki grabbing the barrel of his gun.

Then his worst nightmare came true when Koizumi revealed what kind of monster he was.

"If that's his number, then his mother sold him to Peter when he was under the age of five because she couldn't handle taking care of a child, needed money, and wanted a discreet way to continue on with her life."

Every word was a razor blade skating across his skin.

"At the time, we were helping parents who had some unfortunate life circumstances start over by getting rid of children they couldn't or simply didn't want to take care of. Not all took the offer to give us their kids. But some did—seems like his mother did. Which means he's the 217th child to be sold to the Viper Academy."

Izuku wearily looked at Katsuki who didn't look at him at all.

Katsuki tensed up like he was disgusted and Izuku wanted to rewind time and cut Koizumi's tongue out. The closure he had gotten from their last night together was shattered by the same man who ruined his life before.

Izuku's hands began shaking.

"What? Is this news to you?" Koizumi taunted Katsuki. The twisted man was smiling past the blood trickling from his nose. "You must not be from the Viper Academy then, you're far too stunned. But I'm curious, you two are killing partners and you didn't know he was groomed for this?"

Katsuki whirled his head and he looked ghastly.

Tears were threatening to spill any second from Izuku's eyes as his shaking grew worse.

Quickly, Izuku snapped out of it. He violently snatched his gun out of Katsuki's hold and took a large step backwards, unable to meet Katsuki's eye out of shame. His skin began crawling as if he was made of dirt and worms were weaving in and out of his pores. He was filth. Katsuki knew he was nothing more than a killing machine and freak.

He snapped his mask off his face when it felt like he was in that glass box back in Tokyo.

"Izuku. You're shaking," Katsuki whispered.

Katsuki turned Izuku around and forced them to meet eye to eye. Shame gnawed at Izuku's stomach lining when the red eyes he'd grown to admire so much were looking at him so differently. He wasn't Deku now. He wasn't even Izuku. He was something else and the horror in Katsuki's face was indisputable.

The tears that were holding on for dear life spilled down Izuku's cheeks.

"S-Sorry. I—" Izuku started. He stared around the room, struggling not to lose it. "G-Give me a minute to re-balance and I'll be fine."

"Is what he said true?" Katsuki asked slowly. His grip on Izuku's shoulders tightened when Izuku couldn't answer. "Tell me it's not fucking true," he desperately whispered through his gritted teeth and his nostrils flared. "You chose this life…right? You weren't forced into it?"

Izuku tried to pull away, but Katsuki dug his fingers into Izuku and forced their eyes to meet.

"Izuku. Answer me," Katsuki commanded forcefully.

"I—I didn't want you to know."

Izuku's voice shattered as he clenched his teeth.

He hung his head low as his whole life flashed before his eyes.

He thought about all the cherished moments he held with Katsuki from Tokyo to now. Dancing in front of the violinist to singing in the park as kids. He thought about how they slowly danced on the boat and their shared moment watching the sunset. He thought about all the things he wanted to stay haloed by innocence. But now it was all tainted because Katsuki knew what kind of terrible person he was.

Izuku hesitantly glanced up expecting the worse—

—and Katsuki's expression was something fearsome.

His pupils were restricted down into tiny dots to the point his eyes were only pools of blood red. Underneath the alarm lights, the hue of scarlet eyes appeared deeper and far more sinister. His lips were curled back, and he bared his teeth like some sort of animal.

A chill raked down Izuku's spine.

"...Go sit down until you stop shaking," Katsuki suddenly instructed a little too calmly.

Izuku was apprehensive. He backed up a bit, and Katsuki nodded at him in the most reassuring way that contradicted his homicidal gaze. Izuku slowly eased down in one of the luxe chairs in the room and stared at Katsuki. He was unsure of what was about to happen.

He followed Katsuki's tense shoulders as he grabbed a baseball bat off the wall. He tested the weight of the object in his hands and nodded as if he was satisfied. He swung the heavy item over his shoulder and all the disgust Izuku thought he would receive was directed towards Koizumi.

Katsuki's sharp eyes cut into Koizumi and the silver chain around his neck gleamed under the dark red lights. He began antagonizing Koizumi in a way Izuku never saw him do before.

Then a sliver of truth was revealed that Izuku never expected.

"I'm a fucking sadist at the end of the day," Katsuki admitted as he held the end of the bat to Koizumi's throat. "I've worked in this field for nearly ten years. It's hard not to enjoy it a tiny bit—especially when it's scum like you. Hell, I'm so cruel I'm sure you might've heard of me."

"No." Koizumi leered. "I don't think I have heard of an arrogant, blond hitman."

Katsuki cocked his head. "The Scarlet Eyed Killer."

Then like a switch, recognition sparked along both Koizumi's and Izuku's faces.

Koizumi's age lines tightened when his eyes grew wide and there was a flood of disbelief then finally horror set in. Katsuki smirked maliciously and pushed the bat further into the pale neck.

"Ah. There it is—the fear," Katsuki mocked cruelly.

He applied more pressure until Koizumi choked.

Izuku stared on in extreme curiosity as he thought about that gruesome murder that occurred five years ago. The gutting and crucifixion of Imasuji Goto was no easy feat. It took a high level of skill, precision and callous depravity. And it was Katsuki who did it flawlessly. Right before his eyes, Izuku witnessed the boy from his childhood shape-shift from a hitman to a wanted serial killer in mere seconds.

Katsuki's inner demon crawled free like Koizumi's torture was about to be his playground.

"So, you have heard of me," Katsuki chuckled darkly when Koizumi began squirming. "I'm sure you know then, I'm the person gangsters request by name when they need someone handled and want them to fucking feel the agony in every single bone. I don't do the job without pain unless instructed."

Katsuki leaned down and smirked menacingly an inch away from Koizumi's face.

"And guess what? I wasn't fucking instructed to for this assignment."

Then it began. Swing after brutal swing with the metal bat rained down on Koizumi in a ferocious storm. Every time Katsuki connected the bat with flesh, he made sure to break bone and make it hurt. Sickening cracks reached Izuku's ears as he witnessed blood spray into the air. It was barbarous, drawn out, and a method of torture that would leave Koizumi in pain up until his last breath.

Izuku couldn't look away as Katsuki drank up Koizumi's cries like they were an ether.

Something inside Izuku rumbled as Koizumi began struggling and caved in.

All of the secrets spilled from Koizumi's filthy lips as he handed over Moore's location in the building. He told Katsuki about the master key in his pocket as he sobbed woefully. Izuku tilted his head as he watched Katsuki calmly dig in Koizumi's pants and take out the golden key.

He pocketed it away and sat down the bat calmly.

Like the predator he was, The Scarlet Eyed Killer circled Koizumi and stood behind him. Slowly, Katsuki unsheathed his blade. It shone with the kiss of death in the dim, red lighting of the room. Izuku's adrenaline spiked and his back straightened.

Katsuki placed a hand on Koizumi's shoulder to steady him as he pressed the blade at his throat.

"The murder or the suicide?" Katsuki asked Izuku.

A litany of desperate pleas erupted from Koizumi. He wheezed out his last words that were bargains for his life. Money. Women. Men. All things that didn't really belong to him and Izuku wondered if this is how he begged his mother to sell him as well. Izuku found deep satisfaction when Katsuki gripped Koizumi's hair. He yanked on it to keep him still as he held the sharpened blade into his bobbing throat.

"The suicide," Izuku whispered. "Let him have his tragic ending for his tragic love."

Katsuki smirked and Koizumi screamed more.

“I think that’s a perfect ending for his story, darling.”

Katsuki’s intense gaze never left him as he slit Koizumi’s throat.

Not once did he blink. Not once did Izuku look away.

Izuku held his breath when the spiteful Viridian Viper inside of him snaked up his throat. It was awoken by Katsuki’s demon and beckoned him to join. Crimson blood dripped from Koizumi’s throat like steady rain. It poured down his shirt and trickled onto his lap. The way his eyes rolled back was so sickly satiating to the point it shocked Izuku at how gratified he was to witness this.

After Katsuki finished dragging his blade across the leathery throat, he wiped his weapon clean with a single, precise swipe of his other gloved hand.

Katsuki kept his eyes trained on Izuku as he walked forward. His aura was several degrees below zero and his handsome face was twisted in violent protectiveness.

“Let’s go,” Katsuki growled. “And when we find the other bastard, you land a blade right in his heart.”

They found Moore, and Izuku did exactly that.

ɯɯɯ

When they finished setting the stage for the murder-suicide coup Izuku couldn’t escape Katsuki’s eyes.

Something in Katsuki shifted gears and he was looking at Izuku like he was breakable. There was so much pity. Too much of it for Izuku to handle.

Shame began to nest between his ribs again by the time the sun came out. He felt naked and exposed beyond reason when they made it out of headquarters and into the forest. The beautiful sun was a reminder that this vacation was over, and it ended with Katsuki knowing something he never was supposed to know.

Izuku began to break from all the toppling stress.

It rapidly seemed as if everything began to catch up with Katsuki too.

Out of nowhere Katsuki asked, “Why didn’t you tell me?” His voice was so hoarse and trampled with disappointment that Izuku didn’t recognize it. “Izuku, why didn’t you fucking tell me? I feel like a goddamn idiot. All this time.”

“You weren’t supposed to know,” Izuku whispered through his gritted teeth. “No one is supposed to know that.”

“But why not tell me?” Katsuki shot back, and Izuku didn’t have an answer.

Katsuki tried to rush forward and stop him, but Izuku simply yanked himself out of his grasp. He couldn't face Katsuki right now.

"Izuku, don't fucking do that!" Katsuki snapped as he began crying too.

After that it was a mess of tears, confessions, and shouts.

They melted back into the hurricane they were together, but it was upgraded into a typhoon. They pushed and pulled and Izuku felt all the emotions in his chest pour out like a raging river. He found himself expressing things he never thought he could. But of course—it came easy with Katsuki. Katsuki made him feel emotion so easily that it was as if an entire childhood of beating weakness out of him didn't occur.

"It doesn't matter if I was trafficked," Izuku shouted at the peak of their argument. "If police showed up at my door they're not going to let me go because of some sob story. They would think I'm better off dead because it's too late for me."

Katsuki's eyes softened yet again and suddenly Izuku couldn't bear to look at him.

It hurt. Why did it hurt?

"You're more than capable of being kind, Izuku. I'm living proof of that."

Those were the words that broke a fragile part of Izuku.

"I know." Izuku chuckled sadly and clutched above his heart. "A-And that's what's confusing. When I'm with you, I've never felt like I was pretending. In Tokyo, I cared for you so much I knew it was real. B-But, I lost it after you left. Then when we met in Vienna, even though I didn't know it was you—I felt a flicker for a while. I pitied you, and I hadn't pitied anyone for a long time until Vienna. A-And now, h-here in Okinawa, I feel like I actually lo—"

Izuku's words halted.

He grew sad. Ah. This is why this all hurts so much.

He loved Katsuki.

"…Why am I telling you this?" Izuku whispered distantly. "We're never going to see each other again. You're going to go live the normal life you deserve in the countryside and I'm going to go back to my family in Tokyo. I-It doesn't matter how I feel."

Katsuki reached out and tried to stop him, but Izuku took off deeper into the forest.

"Izuku, wait—shit," Katsuki cursed behind him and tripped on a root. "Izuku! Wait!"

"—No. I'm d-done." Izuku shook his head and walked further. "This is done. I-I can't keep looking at you. It's starting to feel like I'm torturing myself with something I'll never really have. W-We should part ways early, I promise I'll send you what you need for the divorce, but I c-can't do th-this. You weren't supposed to know—"

Katsuki rushed forward and grabbed him, but the touch was like hot coals against his skin.

Izuku struggled against Katsuki, and once again it all felt familiar. Familiar like the last eight years of assignments. Familiar like the rose garden. Familiar, like they always were a push and pull of desperate forces compelled towards each other. But in this instance, it was unfamiliar in the sense that for the first time, Katsuki seemed like he couldn't let go.

They stepped in tandem in the tussle, and part of the ground cracked under their weight.

It happened quicker than either of them could think.

Izuku gasped when the ground underneath his feet gave out. He slipped backwards uncontrollably, and Katsuki yelled in sync with him as he went toppling forward, breaking through the surface.

They were falling rapidly and dangerously.

Izuku yelled in fear as they were swallowed by absolute darkness. He clung to Katsuki as they went down and Katsuki clung to him too. The plummet into the shadows was full of terror until Izuku's back hit the ground with mind shattering pain.

The sound of bones snapping like twigs tore through the air.

Everything in Izuku's body lit on fire and he screamed in agony.

Izuku cried out in pain when he suddenly was now as broken physically as he was emotionally. His emotional condition only worsened when Katsuki immediately began to tend to him, and Izuku wanted to push him away but couldn't. He watched through bleary eyes as the man he loved behaved in a way as if he loved him back.

Katsuki quickly set his ankle and gave him a pain killer. He tried to wipe away the dirt on Izuku's tear stained face and every action felt like cruel torture to Izuku. He indulged in the fantasy of being loved by Katsuki, and now here he was: a deflowered fool madly in love and accidentally married.

Izuku resigned to his fate when Katsuki pulled him against his chest. He focused on his breathing to try to distract him from the blistering pain that was dramatically blooming all over his body.

He leaned against Katsuki for what might be the last time and Katsuki held him tightly.

"I should've come back," Katsuki's voice broke in two as Izuku held on to him. "I wish I fucking came back for you."

Izuku wished he did too. But he didn't say anything because he didn't want Katsuki to feel guilty.

"Do you have to go back?" Katsuki asked, his face twisted with desperation.

“I do.” Izuku shook his head, exhausted. “Someone will notice quickly if I’m missing. There’s not really another alternative, and it’s alright. I’ve accepted this, Katsuki. Anything you think of in the next ten minutes, I have already thought of in the last twenty-five years of my life. It’s all the same path in the end.”

Information that usually could not get tortured out of him began to flow from Izuku.

He told him about the Governor of Tokyo and Moore’s connections with The Viper Academy. He even told Katsuki about his failed attempt at escaping when he was a child. He spilled on how they were raised to be cold and detached from the outside world and how he was defective in his family’s eyes.

With every word, a weight lifted from his chest.

Izuku suddenly felt light while lying in Katsuki’s arms. He looked up at the sun that was seated in the sky sadly and closed his eyes.

Katsuki lifted a hand to stroke his hair. He did this over and over to the point he calmed Izuku down. The calloused fingers tenderly grazed his cheeks and it nearly seemed like Katsuki loved him too.

Izuku closed his eyes as Katsuki continued to soothe him.

ɯɯɯ

Eventually, the police raid occurred.

When the Special Assault Team infiltrated the warehouse, they found a bloodied scene that puzzled them. After closer investigation, and interrogating the trafficking victims inside, it was chalked up to a sudden coup to take the White Dove business in a fit of passion and jealousy by Minoru Koizumi.

Izuku could barely keep his eyes open as he was overcome with pain both inside his heart and outside of it. They were still stuck in the pit. He felt Katsuki place a hand over his rapidly beating heart and he stayed still in order not to agitate his wounds further.

In the distance, the distinct sirens of the Special Assault Team inched closer.

Izuku blinked his eyes open and ignored the throbbing of his ankle. Katsuki immediately began screaming for help at the top of his lungs, playing the role of the distraught husband. Izuku almost thought it was real for a moment with the way Katsuki sobbed while screaming out in concern.

He’s gotten good at playing a doting husband, Izuku noted.

They were found by Shouto and eventually rescued from the pit. Katsuki hoisted him up in his arms effortlessly and Izuku allowed himself to be carried. He rested his head against Katsuki's chest and listened to the rapid beating of his heart. In the background Izuku heard police dogs, people crying, and could see the blinking blue and red sirens clashing with the bright and sunny forest.

He drowned out all the commotion as he focused on Katsuki's pulse.

Izuku leaned in closer to Katsuki and waited patiently for their final moment to come.

What a horrible way to end their reunion, Izuku thought bitterly.

"Okay, you can get medical attention here," Shouto said to Katsuki when they arrived at a medical tent. "Don't talk to anyone you see; we're investigating the crime scene."

Katsuki nodded like he didn't know what was happening. "Of course."

Izuku stayed quiet, not even acknowledging Shouto's presence. He found himself silently envying Shouto as he thought about how both their vacations were over for good. But unlike Izuku, Shouto got to go home to his real husband and live a normal life.

"Is he okay?" Shouto whispered.

"He's just—" Katsuki paused and thought about his words. "He's just in pain."

"I'm fine," Izuku finally spoke up. He snapped out of his daze, and turned to Shouto with a plastic, apologetic smile. "Sorry for being so quiet, my ankle is throbbing and it's hard to focus."

"No need to apologize for being hurt," Shouto said with a kind smile.

Izuku wished that were true because the second Tomura saw his injuries, he would be apologizing profusely.

Quickly a paramedic came up to them, gesturing with his hand to others in the background. They pointed to Izuku's ankle, and a white stretcher was brought out. Anxiety flushed through Izuku's veins when he understood this was their final moment. The second Katsuki put him down on that stretcher he would go back to Tokyo, they would get the divorce, and everything would continue in his life.

If this was a week ago, Izuku would have easily thought he'd see Katsuki again. But now he knew that wasn't going to be the case.

"Sir, can you place him down on the stretcher please?" The paramedic asked.

Katsuki didn't respond. He blankly stared at the stretcher as if it was a boobytrap.

"Um, Taro?" Shouto called out Katsuki's fake name.

That snapped Katsuki out of his daze. He wearily glanced at everyone. It clicked. Izuku could see the anxiousness pouring off Katsuki in waves. His faux—no. Not faux anymore. His real husband held him tighter in his arms and it was obvious he didn't want to be separated either.

“You have to put me down on the stretcher now,” Izuku said quietly. His hand gently caressed Katsuki’s shoulder as he looked up at him. “You have to let me go.”

Katsuki shook his head. “No.”

Izuku balked.

He reeled his head back and so did Shouto and all the paramedics. Izuku’s mouth dropped, and his ankle spiked with pain at that moment. He hissed at the throbbing burn when Katsuki held him a bit too tightly.

“No?” One paramedic said. Her face deeply frowned and looked between Katsuki and Izuku. “Sir, he needs medical attention right now—”

“—I mean, fuck, just hold on a damn minute,” Katsuki hissed. “I need to speak to my husband privately.”

Katsuki turned on his heel before any questions could be asked. Izuku was whipping his head between Katsuki and the medical tent, entirely disgruntled and in dire need of something other than Advil.

What was Katsuki doing? Izuku could do nothing but be carried far out of earshot of Shouto and everyone else around them. They were now on the edge of the chaos, still trapped in the crime scene tape. Katsuki finally stopped and then looked down at him with wild eyes.

“Katsuki?” Izuku hissed in a low whisper. “What are you doing? I’m in pain—”

“—Come back with me,” Katsuki said quickly before he could change his mind.

Shock, surprise, then finally sadness set in Izuku’s heart.

“I-I can’t do that,” Izuku whispered.

He thought about Tomura and could feel his brother’s grasp on him puppeteer his movements.

“Do you really think you can fucking work on assignments with as many broken bones you have right now?” Katsuki retorted. He was being pushy, holding onto Izuku uncomfortably tight like he might fade away. “What are you going to do about this, hah? Is your handler going to make you work through a broken ankle or some shit?”

“I do have sick leave believe it or not,” Izuku said with an edge. “I’m not treated like a slave. Injuries are frowned upon, but as long as I can prove I’m incapacitated, I’m allowed to have time to recover. I will just rest up before I get my next tasks.”

“Do you live alone?”

“Kind of, but what does that have to do with anything?”

“Is anyone going to help you while you recover?”

“Ye—” Izuku stopped.

Tomura would take care of him, yes. But he had a rule that for every broken bone Izuku acquired on a mission, he would break another in return to teach him a lesson in clumsiness. Izuku glanced down at his ankle, and he could feel that it was a bare minimum of at least four broken bones.

Suddenly, he wasn’t too sure he wanted Tomura to find out. Especially with the deal with Chisaki on the table.

“I-I’ll be fine,” Izuku muttered, curling into himself at the thought of his future punishment. “It’s not the first time I’ve broken a bone.”

“I can help,” Katsuki pressed on.

Izuku assessed Katsuki’s desperation wearily.

“Only until your ankle heals,” Katsuki quickly clarified. “I’m sure you’ll fuck it up worse if you have to do shit by yourself because you’re clumsy like that. I can take out the trash, clean, and all that junk.” Izuku tried to object but Katsuki spoke over him. “You need someone there to help you. You’re going to be on crutches, or in a wheelchair. You can’t just go fucking live alone for four months.”

Izuku stayed quiet.

His heart was hammering, and he was tempted once more by Katsuki in an impossible situation. He thought he would be satisfied with their one night together in this fake pink paradise, but Izuku somehow wanted more.

Then Katsuki held him closer and begged. “Please.”

Izuku was weak against Katsuki. He always was, and today was no different as he began trying to figure out a way to make Katsuki’s request come true. Could he disappear for four months? Was that a possibility?

Izuku considered it like it wasn’t insane.

“Let me return the favor and take care of you until your ankle is better,” Katsuki whispered. “Then we can go our separate ways. I promise.”

Izuku went from weary to wearily hopeful.

The longing inside of his chest called out for Katsuki and begged him to make it work. He thought about all the romantic novels and movies he watched and read. There was always a part where something would tear people away from each other. But it was overcome by the desire to make it work.

And this—it could work but it required Izuku to make an extremely dicey move.

“I-It would be risky for me to disappear that long,” Izuku muttered. “Especially with someone. Th-They can’t know about us. I could get in a lot of trouble for inappropriate copulation.”

“How risky would it be?” Katsuki asked.

“If they see me being friendly with someone, I risk termination.”

“I promise where we’re going would be isolated. You will be safe, no one will recognize you. It’ll just be me, you, and this plot of land with a garden and shit. It’s private.”

“It’s still pretty risky,” Izuku said. He suddenly remembered Aoyama and how he covered for him going to Spain once off the books two years ago. “B-But—I do have a favor I could call in, I suppose. One of my brothers owes me from a long time ago when I covered for him going out of range. He could cover for me going out of range this time.”

“Do it,” Katsuki said.

He thought about Tomura and Chisaki, but more so he thought about Katsuma. He still hadn’t come up with a plan to get him out and in a way, this would buy him more time. But it was a selfish motive too. He wanted to get to know Kacchan and understand who he was when they weren’t opposing forces. It was a big risk though if anyone ever saw them together—especially if Himiko did.

Their eyes met and Izuku could feel the bad decision stamp into his skin.

He decided to follow his heart.

“Okay,” Izuku said. He nodded his head, unsure but gradually smiled. “I’ll come back with you.”

Both of their hearts hammered at the highest tempo possible.

ɯɯɯ

The Night After Paradise

Izuku never would have guessed he’d be walking back into Tokyo with Kacchan. Much less never would he have thought Kacchan was the stranger who kept popping up in his life. If someone told him this, he probably would have thought they were on several types of drugs and brought them to a doctor.

But here they were, trotting down the crowded sidewalks of his hometown with him in crutches and Katsuki holding his bag. Tokyo appeared different now but somehow the same. The neon colors in the night scene illuminated with life and the car engines roared loudly. Clusters of bodies stacked together in a steady, fluid shuffle to whatever location everyone was off to in the late summer heat.

As they neared Hadeus, Izuku stopped short.

He cautiously peered at Katsuki's blond hair and red eyes.

There was no way he could bring him anywhere near his family after The Incident. He instructed Katsuki to stay out of sight and stay stationed in a cafe that was on the edge of Hadeus' boundaries. He tossed his bag over his shoulder with some struggle but managed as he limped his way into his skyscraper home.

Once inside Izuku took the elevator up to the penthouse level.

He hobbled down the hallway towards the double doors of his home. He was about to pull out his keys, but quickly recognized the sound of Tomura's footsteps coming towards the door from the inside.

Izuku held his breath and hastily shuffled around the corner out of sight. He pressed his back against the wall and looked up to the ceiling.

Tomura walked out of the penthouse with his three dogs barking loudly. Tomura sighed and shuffled his keys and his feet as he slammed the door.

"Yes, I should be hearing from Izuku soon, don't worry Chisaki," Tomura muttered while on the phone. "It seems like the Moore mission was completed with ease based on the news. I will get an update from Izuku soon as he comes and checks in."

Izuku held his breath as Tomura walked by.

The rowdy dogs were hogging all of Tomura's attention, luckily. They seemed hungry from the sounds of it, and Tomura walked off down the hall without noticing him. Once the elevator door dinged and Izuku heard the barking fade, he wobbled out of the shadows. He looked around and then glanced at the door.

He got inside quickly and knew he needed to work with haste.

He went straight for his room and packed his belongings. He switched out his clothes and stuffed everything to the brim. He packed about enough for a single month, but he assumed Katsuki had laundry wherever they were going off to hide.

After Izuku discreetly packed his bags, he snuck into Katsuma's room.

The lights were already off and Katsuma was neatly tucked into bed. The teddy bear in his arms told Izuku Aoyama was the one to put him down for the night. He limped over and studied his little brother's peaceful face. With delicate care, Izuku leaned down and kissed Katsuma on the forehead. Katsuma roused slightly and hugged his teddy bear tighter.

Part of Izuku wanted to wake him, but he knew that wouldn't be ideal.

He needed to sneak out quickly before Tomura noticed his presence.

Izuku crept down the halls with all the stealthiest he could manage on crutches. It was difficult. Every hobble he took was like sounding alarms this late at night, but he was able to pull it off with surprising ease.

He worked his way through the skyscraper to reach Aoyama's private suite.

He took a deep breath in and knocked.

Aoyama answered the door dressed in blue PJs holding a cup of coffee in his hand. He rubbed his eyes sheepishly and smiled weakly. His eyes landed on Izuku's injured leg and there was a bit of surprise in his face.

"Well, welcome home," Aoyama laughed. "I saw the news about what happened in Paradise, I guess you didn't make it out unscathed. Are you here to give a debrief? Tomura said he wanted you to wait until the morning to debrief with him."

Of course, Izuku thought bitterly.

Izuku cut straight to the chase. "I need to cash in the favor you owe me for when I covered for you going off the books to Spain that one time."

Aoyama frowned. He glanced down either end of the hallway and then pulled Izuku inside.

They quietly walked into Aoyama's suite that was decorated in navy blue. Izuku loved the various tech geek posters and how modern Aoyama's furniture was. They rounded the corner in the hallway to stop in front of a private room all the way in the back.

Upon entering, it was easily identified as Aoyama's computer room.

All around on every wall were large monitors and several desktops. Various live cameras' footage was running off the side on smaller screens and on the larger ones were rows and rows of data coding and files.

Aoyama shut the door, turned to him, and said, "Why are you cashing in that favor right now? Did you not get the memo about Tomura being on edge?"

"I did but I really need this favor," Izuku said. "I know it's a lot to ask, especially after Nine tortured you to get all that information on me during the incident—"

"Nine didn't torture me." Aoyama corrected. "Don't feel guilty about any of that, please."

Izuku paused. Then he said, "What do you mean?"

"Um, he only asked me what happened." Aoyama shrugged a bit. "I told him everything willingly, just to be clear. I care for you Izuku, but I am not willing to bleed for you. That's not a trait we share."

A beat of silence passed.

"I understand," Izuku said awkwardly. Aoyama was a viper at the end of the day. "That's my own…defect."

The word 'defect' didn't feel the same anymore.

“It is,” Aoyama said. “Now, what was the favor?”

Izuku shrugged the bad feeling off and whispered, “I need you to tamper with my tracker.”

“Wh-What?” Aoyama stammered. Beads of sweat gathered on his hairline. “What tracker? What are you talking about—”

“—Drop the act,” Izuku quipped in a flat tone. He dug his gaze directly into Aoyama, not backing down. “I know we have them. And since you’re the head of technology it makes sense that you have access to the data. Now, show me.”

Izuku made the conclusion about the trackers after The Incident.

When the numbness in his leg disappeared the second, he walked back into The Academy, Izuku knew what it was.

He had no clue when it was placed in his leg or exactly where, but it all made sense. The first clue was that Hiryu had been found quickly on his first escape. But not so quickly on his second after he clawed everywhere on his back to scrape something out. All that coupled with how Tomura so easily found him after he crawled through the sewage only pointed to one, devious thing.

Aoyama stared at him with feigned innocence for exactly ten more seconds. Then his expression shifted to being unamused.

“You really are too smart for your own good sometimes, Izuku,” Aoyama said with a sigh.

He sat down in a large blue chair. With three clicks of his mouse, the giant computer screen in front of Izuku changed. It lit up to a dark mode world map with hundreds of green dots and six yellow ones.

Izuku knew he was one of the yellow ones when he saw how many were clustered in Tokyo. Five.

But there was one yellow dot not in Japan.

Izuku took the mouse and hovered over that dot. The dot expanded to show a large headshot of Himiko.

“What is Himiko doing in Bangkok?” Izuku asked.

“She’s on a five-month mission,” Aoyama explained. “She started last week on a deep undercover assignment to dismantle a growing assassin school there. They ripped off The Viper Academy model and One wants them to be cut down at the legs so we don’t have any competition.”

Izuku strummed his fingers along the counter. He probed his tongue into his cheek as he thought about his next big move and how risky this might all be.

But Katsuki was worth every single risk.

“Switch our signals and make it look like I took the mission instead of her,” Izuku said. “And tell One I’m out on the assignment before you tell Tomura.”

Aoyama furrowed his brow, utterly shocked. “Why, Izuku?”

“…My ankle is really badly hurt,” Izuku said. He pleaded deeply with his eyes. “I shattered it in several places, and I want time to recover without Tomura around. You know how he gets when I come back with a stupid type of injury. I don’t really want to go through that right now, so I booked an AirBnB in isolation.”

Aoyama’s expression easily softened.

He glanced down at Izuku’s ankle cast and his bandaged wrist. He carefully assessed the damage.

“He would beat you blue for that type of injury,” Aoyama muttered a bit sourly. He began typing and gave Izuku a sympathetic glance. “I’ll try my best to cover for you. Where are you going?”

“I’ll be in a little town in the countryside,” Izuku said. “It’s private and isolated. It’ll be inconspicuous.”

“Perfect,” Aoyama said as he typed. “Thankfully Tomura couldn’t care less what Himiko does as long as she’s not in his sights. I’ll tell him she’s putting in PTO time for a while. Do you want me to watch Katsuma while you’re out?”

“Yes, please. After this I owe you big, okay?”

“Yes you do. Be safe. Don’t let him see you on the way out.”

Izuku watched as his and Himiko’s head shots both popped up on the map above their dots. With ease, their pictures swapped, and it now looked as if Izuku was in Thailand and Himiko was in Tokyo.

ɯɯɯ

Departure for Honeymoon

Izuku walked out of The Viper Academy with his bag and his hopes. He bought himself more time with Katsuki, but his original mission was not forgotten in his mind. He looked up at the tall skyscraper pensively. He tore his eyes away slowly when he sensed a peculiar pull shift in the atmosphere.

They walked out of Hadeus discreetly, and Izuku’s heart hammered with every step they took together down this new road.

“So where are we going exactly?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki’s smile grew slightly sad. “My mother’s home.”

Izuku reached out and held his hand tightly. “I’m sure it’s lovely.”

Chapter End Notes

Lemme know what you think below!!

It's been nice to fill in the gaps from Katsuki's POV in Izuku's :)) I'm super excited to kick off this fluffier arc :3 Scenes from the Honeymoon that weren't in Katsuki's will be in Izuku's to give more fun times and love between them. It's crazy to think we're going to be coming around the corner soon to lap Katsuki's POV and then nose dive into the pits of hell :))

Thank you so much for reading!!

Chapter 24: Amoroso

Chapter Summary

Amoroso (Stylistic expression) to play loving

Chapter Notes

Helloooo!! Welcome back to this choo choo train! First, thank you to the LOML Luna for Betaing! This stop and the next are well earned fluff after all the angst, I really love writing these two and having them fall in love all over again from Izuku's POV has been awesome :') can't wait for you all to read!

Warnings: Adult scenes and themes

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 24 — Amoroso

.

.

.

Izuku couldn’t tear his eyes away from Katsuki while on the train ride to Biei.

They were seated side by side and with every train stop, it became clearer just how insane this all was. He was practically running away with Kacchan for four months, lying to Tomura, and on top of that he was married. Izuku glanced down at their intertwined hands. Both of their fake rings glimmered under the small light above them.

Katsuki had his head leaned back on the head rest and half of his face was covered by a small, black face mask. His eyes were closed in a blissful nap. Izuku tried to relax as well, but he was too anxious. He needed to keep his ears peeled for the angry phone call he knew was coming.

Then as if Tomura could read his mind, the tell-tale ringtone sang into the air.

He pulled out his phone to see the number ‘117’ staring at him like a terrible omen. He knew this was coming and he practiced what he was going to say over and over in his head. With gentle care, Izuku slowly peeled himself away from Katsuki, trying his best not to wake him.

But the second he let go of Katsuki's hand, the man's eyes fluttered open.

Intense scarlet eyes homed in on him and Katsuki was visibly confused. Izuku's heart pulled, and he quickly told Katsuki he needed to go to the bathroom and he'd be right back. Katsuki tiredly grunted and went back to napping.

Izuku took his leave to slowly hobble down the narrow aisle of the train. He found the bathroom and locked himself in the small space. He leaned against the tiny wall and answered the phone.

"Izuku!" Tomura's voice boomed with wrath before Izuku could even greet him. He winced and held the phone away from his ear. "Why the hell are you in Bangkok right now on a five month assignment?!"

Izuku steadied his nerves as he recited the lie he practiced.

"One sent me here the moment I came back," Izuku said quietly. "We had a small verbal exchange before he left our headquarters. He was impressed by the Moore mission enough that he asked me to embark on this undercover assignment for him. I-I didn't feel like it was my place to question him or say no. Unless, you want to. I'm sure he'd be more receptive to you questioning him."

That final sentence was a ballsy bluff.

Like expected, the silence that followed was loud. Izuku knew Tomura was squeezing the life out of his stress ball right now because Tomura was brave but not brave enough to question a decision One potentially made.

"If that's what One wants, then fine," Tomura said through his gritted teeth. "You really should have told me about this before going. I do not like being left out of the loop on assignments, even if it is One. I'll allow it since it's already in the system. But I want you to know that I will be adding an extra week to the time you're going to be spending with Chisaki because of this."

Izuku swallowed.

It was beginning to shape up like every time he chose Katsuki, he dug his grave deeper into the pits of hell.

"Of course," Izuku agreed while tightening his grip on the phone. "I was going to suggest you do that as well to smooth it over."

He wasn't, but he needed Tomura to believe he wasn't avoiding this whole ordeal.

"Chisaki gave me his schedule for the next six months," Tomura said curtly. "Luckily, it seems like he has two weeks available five months from now. I'll get it blocked off with him immediately."

Tomura told him the exact date and Izuku tried not to let himself hyper fixate on it. But he felt the numbers carve themselves into his collar bone directly next to his mark and sealed his fate. Tomura said his goodbyes and Izuku did as well.

When he hung up, he stared distantly at the dirty sink in front of him.

Five months was a long way away. That was enough time to find the homes of the last cohort and work on a strategy to get them out. And it was also enough time to get to know Katsuki better before he was handed over to Chisaki like some object.

A lick of spitefulness nicked the back of his throat.

He was glad his real first time was with Katsuki.

First Month of Honeymoon

When they arrived at the estate it was a remarkable sight.

Standing in front of them like two guardians were large, metal gates riddled with rust. Beyond them laid a spacious garden of wilted, dead flowers and a pond in the center. Grisly moss overtook the surface of the water, and there were no signs of life anywhere.

But all Izuku saw were the past lives this place had housed.

He re-painted the scene in his mind to be full of ebullience.

The vision of whoever the Bakugou family was danced across his imagination. Laughter was probably like music as it bounced off the rickety walls and the savory smell of home cooked food would waft into the air as a warm welcome. It was easy to envision the calm, slow life land like this afforded a family and it made Izuku content knowing Katsuki was retiring here. Out of everyone Izuku knew, Katsuki deserved a stable life the most.

“It’s beautiful,” Izuku said honestly.

Katsuki didn’t say much, and Izuku wondered why. He then wondered why such a large estate was empty now, and seemed deeply neglected. Someone clearly had loved this land enough to invest in it, but somewhere down the line it all fell apart.

Katsuki sighed tiredly and led them through the front door.

Once inside, the smell of dust and cobwebs tickled at his nose. To normal people this would likely make them believe this place was a useless dump, but to Izuku it felt like the nook. He lived a lavish life most of the time, but with all the glitter came the price of pain. The only true tranquility he knew was that old, forgotten room that was covered in cobwebs.

They began to get settled in the home and it was then Izuku noticed sun-bleached spots on the walls. They were in the shape of small picture frames, but no photos were in sight. The presence of ghosts pushed against his skin when he ran his fingers across the worn surface.

He asked Katsuki if he grew up here and was surprised to learn he hadn't. Then furthermore, he was even sadder to know Katsuki was never given the chance to know his blood family outside of his mother.

That part made Izuku pause and take a good look at Katsuki.

It was then he realized there was a lot about Katsuki's life he didn't know.

"It's fine, let's not mention it. Alright?" Katsuki muttered after explaining. "It's only me living here now and that's probably all it's ever going to be."

Izuku took the hint to back off but that thought made him somber.

They continued to walk around the house and Katsuki showed him every room—except one. The room they didn't tour was closed off and the door was painted a whole different color. Red. Similar to Katsuki's eyes. Seeing his favorite shade of red made him excited a bit. He asked what was behind the door like it wasn't a big deal, but apparently to Katsuki it was.

"Don't ever step foot in there," Katsuki warned. "I mean it. I need to take that room apart and I would prefer to do it privately when I'm ready."

"…Okay. Sorry for asking," Izuku muttered. He eyed the closed door suspiciously. "I'm sorry. I didn't mean to pry."

"No need to be sorry," Katsuki said. He hooked his arm around Izuku's shoulders and led him away. "But leave that door shut. C'mon, let's fix up your room and handicap the house for you until the bedding is finished."

Izuku nodded in understanding, but as they rounded the corner he stole one last glance behind him at the red door covered in cobwebs.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After the miniature tour and washing clean sheets, they danced around each other slightly. Both their eyes were skirting downwards and Izuku rubbed his upper arm nervously. He saw Katsuki shift on his feet, as if wanting to say something as their unresolved feelings loomed between them.

However, one glance at Katsuki's beautiful eyes and Izuku decided to continue being brave.

He worked himself up to ask Katsuki to sleep in the same bed, and much to his relief, Katsuki eagerly agreed. The spark inside of Katsuki's eyes from his request was like a fireworks show, and soon they took their place side by side in the primary bedroom.

It should have worried Izuku how right it felt for them to lay side by side. Never in his life had he laid in a bed without the threat of Tomura around the corner or down the hall. But here with Katsuki, he found himself shrouded by peace and warmth.

The hammering in his chest was a brand new experience. His pulse was racing faster than any bullet he shot so Izuku followed the pull in his heart and slotted himself against Katsuki's side. Katsuki eagerly accepted him and wrapped his arms around him to pull him closer.

Izuku continued his bold streak and intertwined their fingers together.

They both stared at their rings in utter silence. It hurt Izuku like a pulsing cavity in his mouth to think about removing the ring. So he ignored it like many would with a cavity. He'd address it later when it was absolutely necessary to do so.

"Can we cross that bridge when we get there?" Izuku whispered before Katsuki could mention anything about separating. "We'll discuss…the marriage but not right now. I have something else on my mind."

Katsuki nodded. "That's fine. We can talk about it tomorrow."

Izuku cusped Katsuki's hand tighter. He thought about the daunting realization he came to after their headquarters mission. He felt strangely inclined to let Katsuki know.

Because that's what you did when you loved someone, right?

"…I," Izuku started but stopped.

He tried to press himself to say the words 'I love you' but found them glued to the back of his tongue. He glanced into Katsuki's eyes for a moment and his shyness came back full force. Suddenly all he could think about were the negative views Katsuki had on romance.

"…I like you, Katsuki," Izuku whispered delicately, downgrading his feelings a notch.

Izuku's anxiety rose to new heights as he laid himself bare. He looked at Katsuki whose eyes were now wide in shock.

"Do—Do you like me too?" Izuku asked cautiously when he was met with silence. "I-It's okay if you don't. I get it. You said you don't do all that type of stuff—"

"—I like you too," Katsuki blurted out.

Izuku's eyes widened too.

They both stared at each other in slight disbelief. Izuku nervously smiled as his heart rate sped up and he could feel Katsuki's heart do the same.

"Th-That makes me happy to hear," Izuku said with a bashful chuckle. "I thought for a second you were, uh, going to say you liked me but not like that."

"You think it'd ask you to come live with me for a couple of months if I didn't like you in that way?" Katsuki smirked. "Yeah, I wanted to make sure you're taken care of and healed, but I'll admit there's…other motives. Selfish ones." He gripped Izuku's hand tightly. "Is that bad?"

“No. I was selfish for coming here too.” Izuku’s eyes darted off to the side. “I-I wanted more time with you and this feels—good. I’m not decent at talking about myself or my feelings, but I feel like I’m supposed to be here with you.”

“You—” Katsuki licked his lips. “I feel like you’re supposed to be here too.”

Izuku couldn’t help but wonder what would have happened if they did run off together. Without the complications of reality between them, what would they be like? These next four months were their chance to know what could have been. It was a painful sentiment, but sweet nonetheless.

Katsuki began tenderly stroking his skin with his thumb.

“You know, I had a crush on you when we were kids,” Izuku confessed.

Katsuki let out a sharp laugh. “Hah. I figured.”

“What gave it away?” Izuku laughed too.

“Possibly the dumb fake marriage and giving each other kisses every day.”

“To be fair, the fake marriage was your idea.” Izuku grinned at the memory of young Katsuki teaching him about love. He leaned in and rested his chin against Katsuki’s chest and gazed at him adoringly. “Does this mean you had a crush on me too?”

“I didn’t realize it, but yeah, I liked you a lot,” Katsuki whispered. He traced a finger up and down Izuku’s spine and Izuku turned into putty knowing his feelings were possibly returned by a fraction. “I couldn’t stop thinking about you even if I tried. Then unfortunately I think I was crushing on you as Deku too over the years.”

Izuku’s eyes lit up. He quickly felt silly for ever thinking Katsuki hated him. They both liked each other, all these years.

“I was, uh, crushing on you too—over the years,” Izuku shyly confessed. “I looked forward to seeing the cranky guy with bad aim sometimes.”

Katsuki scoffed. “Bad aim? I have excellent fucking aim.”

“Sure you do.” Izuku chuckled. “But, I would secretly hope to run into you, even though it would mean I missed my mark.”

Katsuki raised a brow. “Really?”

“I thought it was obvious. I let you go every single time.”

Katsuki looked at him as if he never noticed.

And with that, their entire eight years of push and pull boiled down to something neither of them thought: mutual fondness.

But Izuku didn't dare confess about how much he loved Katsuki. He was still too scared that a confession of that weight would make Katsuki take flight and never return. His reaction to knowing Izuku loved him would be iffy because Katsuki was clearly adjusting to his new feelings the same way Izuku was. And besides, they had months to relax with each other. Izuku didn't want to ruin it.

The night continued on with them talking about various subjects, and Izuku was amazed how easily Katsuki was warming up without his emotional wall.

They discussed some of their encounters in a new light. Izuku smiled when Katsuki confessed to nearly asking him out on a date in Taiwan and in Vienna. And Izuku confessed right back how his heart stopped at the sight of Katsuki in Vienna.

Izuku anxiously brushed Katsuki's hair behind his ear when Katsuki's eyes fluttered closed. He watched as the man he loved drifted off to sleep in the middle of a story while their hands were still intertwined.

As he laid there watching Katsuki gently snore, it felt too good to be true.

Izuku half expected Tomura to barge through the door come morning. He lowered his head above Katsuki's heart and allowed the metronome to carry him off peacefully to his dreams in case the worst happened in the morning.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the next day came, Izuku was relieved to find no texts or calls from Tomura. He got confirmation from Aoyama that they were in the clear and he would give Izuku a heads up if anything urgent came to light. Other than that, Izuku could relax and let his ankle heal.

Izuku could barely believe it.

He stared at the canopy above the bed in shock. Somehow, his plan worked and Tomura was not kicking in the door. He glanced to his side to see Katsuki. The other man had his arms securely wrapped around Izuku's middle as he buried his face in Izuku's head of curls. He was peacefully sound asleep.

Warmth spread all over.

Izuku sat up and was careful not to wake Katsuki.

With gentle care, Izuku leaned over the side of the bed and pulled his backpack close to him. He reached down inside and grabbed his laptop, plopping it on his lap. He opened it and put the screen brightness down to the lowest setting as he began to type.

He decided this was the night to get to work in case the moment slipped past him. He already was derailed enough during Paradise. While he loved Katsuki, he couldn't forget the whole reason he took that assignment.

Izuku began to look up missing children reports in Japan and started his search.

It took a tedious amount of time. Finding the specific families for the five kids was harder than he thought, and his body rocked with nausea at just how many missing people reports there were. Dozens, if not hundreds, popped up daily.

He was able to narrow it down to reports of infants missing from hospitals five years ago. There he found about fifty open cases. They were from a number of various, scattered places. He meticulously went one by one to compare facial features of every child to the parents. Slowly, he uncovered the reports and was able to find four families and their new addresses.

Eri's family was still looking for her.

Kota's assumed he died.

Hana's was still searching but not actively, and the family had fallen apart.

Tamashiro's parents had gotten a divorce and were living separately.

And lastly, Katsuma's family was nowhere to be found.

Izuku clicked on article after article but it seemed like a strange dead end was prohibiting him. It appeared like Katsuma's family searched heavily for him the first year he went missing, and suddenly they vanished from the face of the earth without a trace. Izuku scoured social media for the mother or father but found nothing.

Worry gnawed at Izuku's gut, but he reassured himself it would be okay.

Katsuma's family was likely very private. He could try to get to Aoyama's advanced system back home and track them that way.

Izuku wrote down the information for the other kids in his tiny notebook. Once he finished, he powered down his laptop and tucked it back in his backpack. He turned to look at Katsuki next to him who slept the whole time. He snuggled back in and allowed himself to fall asleep peacefully for the first time in years.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they decided to get up, it was as if Izuku's body shifted out of viper mode for the first time in his twenty five years of life. He had no clue the human body could feel so pliant and sluggish.

They walked around the house and Katsuki immediately needed to take a phone call from his supervisor. Izuku took the moment to relax by the window in the kitchen and appreciate the summer day. The warm breeze swept through his hair as he leaned against the windowsill and the smell of fresh greenery filled his lungs.

When Katsuki finally got back over to him, they engaged in a small conversation. Katsuki let it spill that he was officially in retirement, but something was off.

Izuku was an expert of body language. He could see the slight slouch in Katsuki's shoulders and how his arms were closed across his body. Katsuki wasn't comfortable with the new adjustment in his life. When Izuku asked why, Katsuki revealed he wasn't used to relaxing.

That part pained Izuku.

He was curious what exactly happened in Katsuki's life that led him down the route of being a hitman. Based on the far off look in Katsuki's eyes right now, the story was nothing good.

"Let's get you used to resting," Izuku promised above a whisper. He intertwined their hands because that was all he could think of to help ease the anxiety. It worked like a charm. "You deserve to rest. What's the first thing you want to do in your retirement?"

"Probably grocery shop so we don't starve," Katsuki said. "Can't relax if we've got empty stomachs."

Izuku laughed lightly and leaned in all the way. He gripped Katsuki's hand harder as he grinned.

"Good point! Let's do that first then. Kacc—Katsuki."

Izuku's heart skipped a beat.

They stared at each other for a moment before they both broke out in matching blushes. Izuku's face deepened to a dark red and his grip on Katsuki loosened a bit. He was about to apologize, but Katsuki quickly gripped his hand tighter and leaned in.

"You can call me Kacchan if you want," Katsuki said gently in his lowest voice.

Izuku thought for sure he would melt right there. Katsuki got so close to his face that Izuku could see all the different kinds of reds swirling in his eyes along with passion.

"Really?" Izuku asked softly. "You said you hated pet names a while ago."

"Well." Katsuki cleared his throat. "Kacchan is fine. It's different."

"Okay." Izuku smiled. "Kacchan it is."

Katsuki then glanced down at their wedding rings, and Izuku followed his gaze.

There was silence so strong Izuku found himself in a chokehold from it. They could take these off now since they didn't have to fool anyone that they were married. But neither of them spoke a word as they studied the cheap, fake rings.

Katsuki began caressing Izuku's skin with his thumb. It was here Izuku decided that they didn't need to jump any hurdles, and they could take the moment to relax and appreciate each other.

The next two weeks consisted of Izuku watching Katsuki clean up the estate and make it into a home.

If his ankle wasn't fractured in several places, Izuku would have gladly helped. But he was more or less forced to sit and observe due to Katsuki not wanting him to hurt himself further.

He wasn't complaining though. He shamelessly ogled Katsuki as he plucked weeds from the garden with his shirt off. The sweltering summer sun beat down on them and sweat glistened along Katsuki's chest and back muscles.

Izuku bit his lip every time Katsuki took a pause to wipe his brow.

Katsuki would always glance over at him and give a playful wink if he caught Izuku staring. Izuku would then blush, bury his nose in his book and shyly peek over it to continue to watch.

At night during this peaceful interlude, they found themselves cuddled up on the couch with a fuzzy blanket. It was big enough to envelope both of them as they watched old, romance films. At first Izuku was shocked by this development. It was like entering an alternate dimension when Katsuki was the one to suggest they put one on.

"Which one of your sappy movies is the best gateway?" Katsuki randomly asked one night.

Izuku was stunned to near silence but still managed to say, "Uh, I think you might enjoy In The Mood For Love."

Katsuki nodded like he was a picky eater about to try a new food.

While watching the movie, Izuku noticed how Katsuki sat up right, more attentive at a specific scene. Su Li-zhen Chan and Chow Mo-wan were caught in the rain under a small awning, waiting for the storm to ease up. They were not facing each other as the pitter patter of rain droplets echoed through the night.

"I didn't think you'd fall in love with me," Su Li-zhen said quietly. Her eyes were pointed down to the puddle that was at her feet.

Chow Mo-Wan didn't speak right away. He smiled sadly to himself as he said, "I didn't either. I was only curious to know how it started. Now I know. Feelings can creep up just like that." He then turned to face her and held her hand. "I thought I was in control."

Katsuki pursed his lips, eyes tethered to the screen.

He then slowly grabbed Izuku's hand. He didn't let it go for the rest of the film.

After they finished that movie, it was an avalanche of romantic comedies, epic romances, and more. However, Izuku couldn't stop himself from watching Katsuki more than the screen.

The anti-romantic man seemed far more interested in the films than he should be, as if he was curiously studying the affection between the two protagonists.

Then on a particular night while they were in the middle of streaming The Notebook in the living room, Izuku found himself lying flat on top of Katsuki with his head against his chest. To their side was a bowl of freshly microwaved popcorn and an assortment of half eaten candy bars. Katsuki's eyes were glued to the television and Izuku's eyes were glued to Katsuki.

Katsuki's physique was something Izuku couldn't quite get enough of. It still blew his mind that this was the scrawny boy from the nook.

While the movie was still playing, Izuku discreetly took his hand and tried to wrap it around Katsuki's bicep. He then attempted to see how many of his own fists made up Katsuki's forearm and it was ridiculous. What did this man eat every day?

"I think you have a size kink, nerd," Katsuki randomly interjected. "Is that why you watch all this fan-service stuff? You thirst over all the unrealistically muscular guys?"

Izuku spooked a bit, caught red handed. He smiled sheepishly down at Katsuki who was grinning from ear to ear.

"I don't," Izuku said honestly. "I think it's only you that I like being this, er, big."

Katsuki let out a small 'pfft' as if he didn't believe Izuku. "Yeah right. There's no way you're watching all these dorky movies and not eye fucking the guys."

"It's true!" Izuku retorted quickly. "I-I'm not!"

"Ya-huh. Sure. You probably have a life sized poster of Fabio stashed in your room somewhere that you jack off to."

"Really," Izuku insisted. He began drawing circles on Katsuki's arm while blushing. "This might, um, sound strange, but it just makes me really happy to see you well fed and large? Especially after everything you went through, y'know. It gives me some sort of comfort knowing you grew up to be strong after you were so frail. I-I guess, what I am trying to say is, it makes me happy to know you're healthy after thinking the worst happened to you for most of my life."

Katsuki's smirk faltered.

His expression became incredibly serious and Izuku felt embarrassed for his ramble. He averted his eyes and let go of Katsuki's arm.

"Now that I say that out loud it's embarrassing," Izuku mumbled as he twiddled his fingers.

"…I never thought about it like that," Katsuki said quietly. "That's understandable."

"Really?" Izuku asked.

"Yeah." Katsuki lifted Izuku's hand and placed it back where it was on his arm. "Plus, it makes me a little glad to know I'm the only guy you might have a thing for. I tend to have a, ah, bad jealousy streak so this is going to my head a bit."

Katsuki smiled at him with a tiny blush along his cheeks.

Izuku blushed right back and kneaded Katsuki's skin. They continued to watch the movie and this time around, he took his time running his hands along Katsuki in slow, deliberate motions.

He appreciated everything about Katsuki as they watched the movie in silence.

The character Allie Hamilton was on screen, tears pouring down her beautiful face as she sat in her car. She clutched a letter from Noah in her hands as she read it. The gentle voice of her lover was in the background reciting Izuku's favorite quote from the movie.

"The best love is the kind that awakens the soul and makes us reach for more, that plants a fire in our hearts and brings peace to our minds. And that's what you've given me. That's what I'd hoped to give to you forever."

Izuku stole a glance at Katsuki as he soaked in the words with a new understanding.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The next week the estate was officially breathed back to life. There were no more cobwebs, only the smell of mint, cinnamon and various savory foods lingering in the halls.

Him and Katsuki grew into a routine during this time, and it was lovely. Izuku could feel his ankle get slightly better, but he was more focused on how relaxed Katsuki was. He finally was warming up to the life he deserved.

One day while laying under a tree staring up at the clouds, Izuku learned something new about Katsuki.

"I…I always wanted to make classical music," Katsuki confessed while looking up at one cloud that was in the shape of a violin.

Izuku shifted in the grass to stare at him curiously. Katsuki kept his eyes trained upwards, looking like the sky held many of his unanswered questions in life.

Katsuki continued to stare up as he said, "It's always something I kept pushing to the side all my life for more important things. But I've always had an interest in composing."

"Is it because of that old violinist we knew?" Izuku asked curiously.

Katsuki nodded. "I'm going to take a wild guess that's why you like to play violin as well."

"We're two nerds cut from the same cloth I think." Izuku laughed, feeling connected to Katsuki on a deeper level now. "Have you looked into classical music lessons? That could be a good step into your new life."

Katsuki shrugged. "Ah, no. I suppose I could. I never thought about it."

Izuku could see it now: Katsuki in his own private study finally living out his dreams as a composer. On the walls would be posters of famous composers. And at his desk would be hundreds of perfectly organized music sheets with notes that when strung together made the perfect melody.

Izuku smiled at the thought.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later that night, Izuku eagerly looked up Music Composition classes on his phone.

They were currently all settled in bed under the covers watching Casablanca on the new TV Katsuki mounted across the wall. The old black and white movie drew all of Katsuki's attention while he subconsciously drew hearts along Izuku's thigh.

"Kiss me," the actress on screen said breathily. "Kiss me as if it was the last time."

Katsuki squeezed Izuku's thigh as he watched the two lover's kiss in a desperate embrace. Izuku smiled at the action and clicked on link after link until he found one that was suitable. His eyes lit up at the fact these classes were within walking distance and affordable.

"Look," Izuku exclaimed happily. "Here's some classical music composition classes for you."

Katsuki turned to him. He slowly took the phone and read it. He looked at Izuku slightly surprised but clear excitement was gleaming in his eyes.

"This can be your second life, Kacchan," Izuku encouraged. "You should sign up tonight and we can go to the classes that start next month together. I'll just sit in the corner but I would love to see you do this. I can picture you as a composer already. You'd be so awesome at it."

"You really think so?" Katsuki asked quietly.

Izuku nodded in confidence. "I would bet my life on it. You'd be amazing at anything you put your mind to, Kacchan. You already have a great ear for classical music, I bet you're an amazing musical composer waiting to happen."

It took Katsuki less than a minute to pull out his laptop and apply to the class.

As Katsuki applied, Izuku heard the background of the movie whisper the lines, "That day you left Paris, if you knew how much I went through. If you knew how much I loved you. How much I still love you."

Izuku's heart clutched when he realized he related a bit too much to that. All that was needed was a small change from Paris to Tokyo. He ignored the pounding in his chest as he rubbed Katsuki's back lovingly and put his chin on his shoulder.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Shortly after Katsuki signed up for the music composition class, he suddenly was very eager to hear Izuku play violin.

“You should play for me,” Katsuki said a little too sweetly while they were out in the garden. He held a bundle of pink carnations that he plucked in his hands. He slowly leaned in and gave them to Izuku. “You did say you always wanted to play for an audience. I wanna hear you play.”

Izuku thought it would be an easy ‘of course I will!’ but found himself faced with complicated emotions. It wasn’t because he was nervous, he played for their clients many times, but this was different. He wanted to play for Katsuki all his life. But it was nearly dreamlike to have what was always a far off wish be directly in his grasp.

“O-Okay,” Izuku whispered while taking the pink carnations. “I’ll play for you.”

He could barely say no to Katsuki even if he wanted to.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later that night Izuku was full of nerves.

The sky decided to give them a steady downpour of rain. When it was like this, Katsuki enjoyed shutting off the lights and strictly using candles and the fireplace. Izuku took a seat in the wooden rocking chair by the fire while Katsuki splayed across the floor on the red rug.

Izuku looked between Katsuki and the damaged, white violin in his hands.

He stared at Katsuki for a long time, still unsure if this was all real. He studied the way the yellowish lighting hit Katsuki’s eyes and painted across his skin. His beautiful hair was softened in the light, drawing Izuku’s attention to his high cheekbones. The intense look pouring out from Katsuki’s alluring eyes was profound.

“This feels…” Izuku trailed off, unsure what the right words were.

“…Like a long time coming?” Katsuki supplied.

Izuku nodded sadly. He sucked in his breath and decided to take the first step.

He began to play the one song he always wanted to play for Katsuki. The Dance of The Love Birds.

He played it like he wished he did when he was eight. He imagined himself in the plaza by himself messing up the notes until his fingertips burned. They stung from the bitter cold, then slowly they began to ache from the summer sun. He practiced all that year until he got it right because this was the melody that brought them together. If he perfected it, Kacchan would hear it and come running back to him.

Just like before.

As Izuku strung his bow, a full year of bitter abandonment flowed through the low notes. And then when the notes went high, he channeled the hopeful feeling he always held inside of him that maybe one day he could see Kacchan again. And when he came to the end of the song, Izuku opened his eyes to see Katsuki there, staring at him like he was the most beautiful thing in the world.

A tear escaped and slid down Izuku's face, but quickly he wiped it away.

"S-Sorry," Izuku whispered as he hurried to hide his emotions. "I don't know what that was."

Katsuki slowly rose from the rug. He walked over to where Izuku was sitting and cradled his face in his hands. Without warning, Izuku's tears flowed down more and his chest convulsed slightly.

"I always wanted to play for you," Izuku whispered. "I used to dream of it all the time when I was younger. It's…It's why I started playing violin. I used to think if I played in the plaza, you would come back to me one day if you recognized the song. Even if you didn't recognize me."

They both searched each other's eyes for a long time until Izuku reached out for Katsuki. Just to make sure he was real and so was this moment. He ran his hand along Katsuki's captivating face. Then slowly, Katsuki stroked Izuku's tears away with his thumb. Katsuki leaned in like he always did and Izuku's heart clenched.

"You played beautifully, darling," Katsuki whispered.

Darling.

Katsuki said it naturally and seriously. Not a lick of sarcasm. No snideness. Not even a flirtatious incline that was meant to rile him up. He said 'darling' purely out of adoration for Izuku.

Izuku's heart swooned so deeply he knew he would never recover.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they went to sleep that night, the atmosphere was heavy against Izuku's soul.

Never in his life had someone called him such a sweet name with pure intentions. A small voice in the back of his head told him that Katsuki cared for him more than anyone. The quiet thought felt taboo because he always believed the person who cared for him most was Tomura.

"I'm the only person who would ever truly give a damn about you," was Tomura's constant mantra.

"No one cares for you as much as me," Tomura would always say.

"I know you best," Tomura regularly reminded him.

Izuku clung to Katsuki tighter as he struggled to grasp what the true meaning of ‘caring for another person’ meant. He thought he knew. But now he wasn’t so sure.

He thought it was care when Tomura stopped him from going to the basement. He thought Tomura held his best intentions in mind when he opened his eyes to the truth about Inko. He even assumed it was brotherly love when Tomura helped him pass The Cull.

It made sense. While cruel, his brother always looked out for him and he never left Izuku to the wolves.

Katsuki fell asleep first and Izuku gave himself a headache from thinking too much. He decided then to take a small stroll around the estate to give himself some peace of mind. Maybe hobbling would wear him down. Izuku carefully got out of bed and grabbed his crutches. He slowly limped out of the bedroom and took a small lap around.

At night the estate was calming. All the old hallways felt like a safety blanket wrapped around his arms. As he passed each room, he smiled thinking about all the memories they made already.

But he paused when he passed by one particular room.

He turned to face the red door Katsuki refused to touch. Izuku pensively studied the large spider’s web stretched across it that caught the moonlight. He peered over his shoulder down the dark hallway and decided one peak couldn’t hurt.

He wobbled forward and twisted the doorknob.

Nothing could have prepared him for what was inside.

The room was small, full of toys, and there was a window that was veiled with old white curtains. Sitting in the ledge was a forgotten vase of wilted carnations with evidence of decay crawling all over it. Off to the side was an old rug meant for a baby to crawl on and a broken crib.

But worst of all, above the fractured crib was the name ‘Katsuki’ in chipped, scarlet lettering.

Izuku’s heart dropped.

He tried to flick on the light but was met with utter darkness. His curiosity scratched at him despite knowing this was against Katsuki’s wishes. He carefully wobbled back down the hall to where he knew the spare light bulbs were and grabbed one.

He made his way back to the room and walked. Immediately something crunched underneath his crutches. He looked down, but in the darkness he couldn’t make out what he was stepping on.

Izuku found an old lamp, changed the bulb, and plugged it in.

The tiny blue lamp poured light everywhere. All around were old blankets, dust, and forgotten gadgets that were meant for a newborn. This was Katsuki's nursery. Izuku's heart clenched as he glanced down and saw pieces of old plaster shattered along the floor. He then squinted a bit when he could make out something. He leaned over a chunk that held an impression of a tiny toe.

And then his heart outright shattered when he realized the broken pieces on the floor were a plaster of baby feet.

Izuku lowered himself to the ground. He looked carefully at each smashed piece and found himself being able to connect a couple.

Suddenly, the door slammed open.

Izuku snapped his head up and found Katsuki's rage filled eyes glaring down at him. Pure fury roared in his face and Izuku felt a bone chilling ache stab into him.

"Ka-Katsuki," Izuku gasped. He put his hands up when he could see the anger in Katsuki rising like thick smog. "Wait—"

"—What the fuck, Izuku?" Katsuki seethed. "What the actual fuck?! I said not to come in here!"

Izuku held one of his hands up while the other curled around pieces of the shattered plaster. "I-I know but I wanted to see—"

"—No!" Katsuki cut off unkindly, raising his voice. "If I say not to come in here, don't fucking do it! This is my house. I don't even want to be in here right now—"

Katsuki's eyes looked around for less than a second, and they stopped at the crib.

Izuku sat on the floor stunned when Katsuki suddenly choked on his words and stopped talking. Then like he was experiencing a real life nightmare, his expression quickly bounced between anger and anxiety. Katsuki tried to speak but tripped up—something Izuku never saw him do—and it looked as if he swayed slightly on his feet.

Quickly, Izuku felt staggering concern. What was happening?

The longer he watched Katsuki the more everything felt wrong. Katsuki's eyes began darting around the room then his chest convulsed. Then Katsuki clutched at his shirt.

Oh.

Oh no.

Izuku recognized what was happening: Katsuki was spiraling into a panic attack. Izuku used to have them when he was a kid, especially that year alone waiting for Katsuki. The old violinist calmed him out of several of these on his worst days.

Now directly in front of him, Katsuki's own breathing was becoming unsteady in the same way.

Quickly, Izuku tried to stand up with the help of the dresser when he realized his mistake. He triggered Katsuki.

Izuku held the broken pieces of plaster close to his chest as he called out Katsuki's name over and over. But no words could reach Katsuki. His barrier of panic was building fast, and clouding his senses. Izuku wearily watched the man he loved in pain and did the last thing he could think to calm him down. He hobbled forward and tried to soothe him.

"Kacchan. I'm sorry—" Izuku lightly touched Katsuki's shoulder.

It happened in an instant.

Out of reflex, Katsuki shoved Izuku's hand away. He pushed with his natural strength, entirely not registering his surroundings or Izuku. Izuku's breath hitched as he lost grip of the shelf that was steadying him and he toppled backwards to the ground. Izuku gasped in pain as he fell on his wrist and his head hit the floor with a hard bang.

The pieces of the broken plaster rolled across the ground and Izuku screwed his eyes shut at the immediate throb he felt in his ankle.

"Shit. Shit," Katsuki whispered and he immediately snapped out of his daze. He dropped down to his knees and reached out to steady Izuku. "Iz-Izuku, I'm sorry."

"It's okay," Izuku muttered. He lifted himself up on his forearms and winced. "You didn't mean it. It was a reflex."

"No. It's not okay. I'm sorry. I'm so fucking sorry," Katsuki insisted. He quickly gathered Izuku up in his arms and inspected his wrist and ankle. Izuku felt guilty as ounces of regret poured from Katsuki's eyes. "I didn't mean to make you fall like that. I would never hurt you on purpose, fuck. I'm so goddamn sorry."

"You didn't hurt me, Kacchan. It was an accident. I fell." Izuku tried to smile to give him some reassurance that it would be okay. He sat up in Katsuki's arms and lightly touched his hand. "I shouldn't have come in here anyways. I get so curious sometimes...I can't help it but I didn't realize this room was…yours."

Katsuki wearily glanced around at the dust covered shelves and the scattered broken pieces on the floor. His breathing slowly evened out and Izuku felt Katsuki's hold on him tighten the longer they waded in silence.

"It…It's not mine," Katsuki said out after a stretch of silence and he hung his head. "I don't like coming in here, Izuku. I tried. So many fucking times. But I can't stand being in here."

The pain etched across Katsuki's face was too much. Izuku felt terrible. He shouldn't have come in here, he crossed a line.

"I'm really sorry," Izuku said. "I didn't mean to upset you. Let's get back to bed."

Izuku made a move to get up, but the arms locked around him kept him in place. Katsuki lifted his head and glanced around bitterly.

“It’s okay now,” Katsuki said. “I guess this helped rip the bandaid off. I have to do something with this room eventually, I can’t leave it as an open wound. I nearly had a fucking panic attack just stepping foot in here. I guess I’m more fucked up than I realize.”

“You’re not fucked up,” Izuku rejected gently.

“I am.” Katsuki scoffed. “Don’t even try to make me feel better. I’m fucked up but the worst part is I’m unnecessarily fucked up.”

Izuku pinched his brows together at that.

“What do you mean?” Izuku questioned.

“This room is proof my mother lied to me. All my goddamn life,” Katsuki explained. He looked up at his name written on the wall with such a strong disdain that Izuku was surprised. “I don’t want to be mad at her because she’s dead, so I avoid things that make me realize she screwed up being a mother.”

Izuku didn’t say anything. He let Katsuki continue to speak as he also glanced up at the lettering on the wall.

“It’s why I didn’t remember you right away,” Katsuki sourly confessed. “I chose to forget Tokyo for a long time because it made it easier to do what I needed to do. Then I avoided this estate because it makes me so goddamn angry to know I could’ve been here all this time, living a goddamn normal life…I used to justify that I was a monster because I had to be. But this—” He gestured angrily to his name on the wall. “—Rejects that.”

One word Katsuki used stood out.

“A monster?” Izuku softly questioned.

“Yes. A fucking monster,” Katsuki said the word dripped with bitter anguish.

Izuku never felt like someone was so wrong. But he let Katsuki keep going.

“But worst of all I feel like no one understands what I feel like,” Katsuki murmured. “I have colleagues who had really fucked up lives with no way around it. No path or outcome would change them from being the serial killers they are today. But there’s something so goddamn excruciating about knowing I didn’t have to be this fucking monster this whole time. I could have been normal…there was a way for me to be normal, but I didn’t have a fucking say in the decision.”

Hearing that last sentence, Izuku found himself faced to face with someone who was a mirror of his agony. Izuku knew the feeling of not getting a say in his own life all too well, and it broke his heart to hear Katsuki knew that feeling too.

Izuku gripped the hem of Katsuki’s shirt and leaned in. “…I get it.”

Katsuki made a confused face, and looked at him like there was no way they could be the same. “Izuku—”

“—No, really. I get where you’re coming from,” Izuku insisted. He licked his lips hesitantly, unsure if he should say what he was about to but he wanted Katsuki to know he wasn’t alone. “I went out and found my birth mother one day when I was thirteen.”

Katsuki stayed quiet as his eyes widened in shock.

“I thought that if I found her, she would take me in,” Izuku whispered. “I spent so much time building her up in my head, deluding myself that I was kidnapped and not sold,” Izuku said and his heart ached at facing this fact after a lifetime of ignoring it. “But when I found her, she was with her new family, and had a new baby. She—She made it very clear she didn’t want anything to do with me when I revealed I was her son.”

Katsuki sucked in a breath and held Izuku closer.

“It hurt more than anything I could think of,” Izuku whispered. His eyes glossed over, and tears started gathering inside of them. “She was living her new life with a new son. To this day I wonder what it would be like if I wasn’t given away. I…I keep track of them and she’s a good mom to him.”

Katsuki curled his fists tightly.

“I realized then I could’ve grown up normal too if I was born slightly different,” Izuku said bitterly. “I could’ve had that life, but it wasn’t my decision—and neither was yours. So, we’re the same,” Izuku concluded. “But be glad you made it through and now you get a shot at a normal life. Better late than never, right?”

He hoped Katsuki would understand that they were just two people cut from the same cloth.

Killers without a choice, but he wanted Katsuki to embrace his second shot at life.

Because Izuku would never have that.

“I’m sorry you had to go through all of that, Izuku,” Katsuki said in a soft rasp. He held on tighter to Izuku. “You didn’t deserve any of that. I wish I could fucking fix it for you. You’re much more than her decision.”

“And you’re more than your mother’s choices too I’m sure,” Izuku parroted right back, wishing to make Katsuki see that he’s not the ugly parts of himself. “B-But what I’m saying is we’re the same. I understand you, and out of anyone, I get it. We were both one decision away from not being…monsters. She hurt you by keeping this from you.”

Katsuki’s shoulders sagged forward, and Izuku carefully ran his hand through Katsuki’s hair.

Izuku scooted in to hug him and Katsuki slowly hugged him back. They both silently looked around the nursery. Then they tiredly leaned against the wall underneath Katsuki’s painted name.

Izuku could feel the ghosts of past decisions wander the halls. He wondered what life would have been like if Katsuki grew up here. He would've likely been happy. Well fed. Warm. But part of Izuku was sad when he realized that probably meant they never would have come across each other.

Suddenly, Katsuki hugged him and buried his head into Izuku's neck. Izuku was shocked by the vulnerable action.

"Are you okay?" Izuku asked carefully.

"No," Katsuki's voice cracked and he leaned in more. "I'm not."

Out poured all of Katsuki's heavy feelings. One by one they fell into Izuku's hands as Katsuki's well built defensive barrier came crumbling down. The weight of being in the nursery forced all of his secrets out of him—and Izuku was mortified.

He clung to Katsuki tightly when he was told about the multiple missed meals, and all he could see was the skinny fragile boy shivering in the cold. Next, Katsuki told him about how he never got a chance to flourish in school because he spent more time on other people's homework to help him pay for the bills. Izuku felt mournful for the loss of potential.

Then Izuku hurt so deeply it bottomed out of him when Katsuki told him that his first kill was when he was thirteen in order to protect his mother.

That was the same age as Izuku's first assignment.

Katsuki retold everything he went through from start to finish and didn't bother leaving out any details. He described how they bounced between motels. He elaborated on the cold nights. He shamefully talked about his mother's gambling addiction. Katsuki even told him how his mother and him buried a body and it was one of his most precious memories of her.

Then the biggest secret dropped: Imasuji Goto was his biological father. He murdered him because his mother revealed he used to beat her.

Katsuki all of a sudden made sense. Terrible, tragic sense.

The Scarlet Eyed Killer was simply a son who loved his mother enough to kill for her.

"I think what's most frightening is that I like it," Katsuki confessed with a terrified expression. "I like killing. I enjoy torturing scum because it's cathartic for me. I thought at first I was doing it reluctantly, but I don't think I am. Ever since my first kill, I feel like I sold my soul to this bloodthirsty monster inside of me."

Izuku didn't think it was a monster inside of Katsuki. He thought it was well earned anger.

Katsuki's whole life was void of stability, safety, and true compassion. He wasn't normal. He was forced to be an adult before his time and Izuku questioned if he ever had a childhood.

The hardships Katsuki faced in the world were heinous and it was no wonder he harbored so much unchecked anger. Because anger was the one emotion that always held your best interest in mind. Anger was survival and it lets you know when you are being mistreated. Then it gives you the energy to do something about it unlike sadness.

And considering what Katsuki had to deal with, he needed an abundance of anger to survive.

Izuku understood Katsuki so clearly at that moment. He was a lot of things, but a monster was not one.

Katsuki slowly peeled himself from Izuku's hold and his cheeks were wet with a light trail of tears. He wearily glanced at Izuku, and waited for him to say something.

"Katsuki…" Izuku spoke his love's name with a broken voice. Tears started to pour from his eyes as he thought about all the struggles Katsuki endured. "I don't think you're the monster you think you are."

"Yes, I am," Katsuki said. He averted his gaze shamefully. "How can you say that after hearing what I've done? Especially to my own biological father?"

"To me it sounds like you did it all in the name of protecting her." Izuku forced Katsuki to look into his eyes. "You did everything out of love. You're so loving, Katsuki. I think you're the fiercest, most protective person I've ever met. You deserve everything you want and more and it's okay to want it. Despite what you've done—Chizome should be dead for what he did to you and your mother."

Katsuki let out a shaky sigh. "You're the only one who seems to think that."

"I think your supervisor thinks it too," Izuku muttered. "But he is protecting you because he cares about you. Maybe you shouldn't kill Chizome yourself—but that man deserves his karma. And there are other ways."

Katsuki held onto Izuku's wrists tighter upon hearing that.

"Do…Do you care about me?" Katsuki asked.

"I more than care about you," Izuku whispered vulnerably.

'I love you,' is what he wanted to say but he kept the words close to his chest.

"I-I've cared about you since we were kids and I don't think I could ever stop," Izuku confessed. "Even in the years apart, I cared about you as the guy I met in Vienna. I will probably care about you even when my ankle heals and we go our separate ways." Slowly, Izuku leaned in and placed a delicate, light kiss on Katsuki's forehead. "You're not a monster. You're human."

"But I can't even be soft," Katsuki muttered. He shuffled in closely, trapping Izuku in his long limbs again. "No matter how hard I try I always hurt everyone I touch."

Izuku almost laughed at such a ridiculous statement.

"You're soft with me," Izuku said easily with a smile.

But Katsuki immediately seemed baffled, as if he never considered it. Izuku realized Katsuki's view of himself was heavily distorted so he decided to list all the beautiful moments they shared so far.

"I-I may not have spent a lot of time with you like others, but you're so soft with me." Izuku grinned affectionately and joy radiated through his smile. "You were soft when we were kids. You were soft at the hotel when you tried to pretend to be my husband. You were soft on the boat. On the beach. While hiking."

Izuku's face blushed slightly and his voice dropped into a quieter tone. "…Even in bed, you took care of me so nicely even though I was nervous. And even in the last month, you've been very soft with me."

Izuku wanted to mention more.

The truce from several years ago. That time Katsuki helped him escape out of the city. Even when they were in Vienna, Katsuki was soft. There were so many countless moments Izuku cherished in his memories that contradicted what Katsuki thought of himself.

"You can be soft, Katsuki," Izuku concluded with a gentle smile.

Izuku's words seemed to reach Katsuki and realization dawned on his face the same time the sun did. Golden light poured all over the room, lighting up everything.

They sat there for a moment, staring into each other's eyes. It was as if a new door was unlocked as they did this. Several lines were crossed and Izuku swallowed when his heart hammered out of control.

Slowly, Katsuki leaned in and kissed him.

This kiss was vastly different. It was deep and slow like Katsuki was taking his time mending their souls together. Like a needle and thread being woven in and out of him, Izuku felt his heart bind to Katsuki's.

Second Month of Honeymoon

The nursery changed their dynamic in a specific way. Katsuki showed his darkest parts and Izuku embraced the shadows with open arms. After that, they worked together to renovate the room into Katsuki's personal music study in perfect tandem. It represented his second chance at life, and with that clean slate came a new sort of air to Katsuki.

Izuku knew Katsuki could be soft, but he didn't know he could be so loving. Every action Katsuki did now was loaded with tenderness beyond what Izuku thought he deserved. It was hard to accept. Him, a born killer raised to slit throats, being showered in such pureness.

The pureness was in everyday things like doing the laundry. Or grocery shopping. Even when Katsuki started his music composition classes, Katsuki loved having him nearby just because.

The tiny domestic moments were so lovely. Izuku had no clue two people could simply live together in harmony like this.

Above all, one of Izuku's favorite things was when they brushed their teeth side by side.

It was silly when he said it out loud, but he couldn't help but find it to be fun.

The bathroom was built with two twin sinks and a large mirror. Every time they brushed their teeth they playfully bumped their hips or Katsuki would ruffle his hair. Today was no different.

Or at least, it wasn't until Izuku caught a glimpse of himself in the mirror.

He paused, leaned in, and noted there was a new freckle right below his eye. The spot overlapped with another making a sloppy, lopsided heart. It made Izuku unhappily churn. He lowered his eyes before he could get too disgruntled.

Katsuki stopped brushing his teeth and cut his eyes towards Izuku. He rinsed out his mouth with a hard gurgle and faced his way.

"Why do you do that?" Katsuki suddenly asked.

Izuku rinsed out his mouth and looked up innocently. "Do what?"

"Every time you look in the mirror you look away quickly." Katsuki frowned. "I haven't seen you look in the mirror longer than three seconds since we've been here."

Izuku blinked. "Oh. That."

"Yes. That." Katsuki raised a brow.

Izuku glanced off to the side. He nervously dragged his finger against the counter as he spoke his next words.

"I…I don't like looking at myself," Izuku whispered, feeling ashamed.

Katsuki frowned and cocked his head as if Izuku said pigs could fly. "Why not? You're beautiful, Izuku."

"I-It's not that, it's—" Izuku sucked in a breath when his insecurities started to sting.

"What?"

"My freckles," Izuku blurted out. He couldn't lift his head as his heart sang a low tune. "I know I told you about my mother that night in the nursery, but I…I didn't tell you the reason why. She said she found it hard to look at me because of my freckles. All I see when I look at my skin is a hundred little reasons why I wasn't given the chance to be loved."

Katsuki grew sad. "So you can't find your freckles beautiful anymore because of that?"

“I never found them beautiful in the first place.”

“…C’mere.”

Izuku was pulled out of his self-hatred when Katsuki stepped forward and cupped his face with both hands. Like steady rain, Katsuki began peppering kisses all along his cheeks, chin, and nose bridge. The whiplash of it left Izuku confused as he was given what felt like a dozen tiny love pecks.

Katsuki pulled back and looked into Izuku’s eyes.

“This is about to be the mushiest shit I ever said so no laughing,” Katsuki fore-warned with a slight glower. “But I won’t stand for all this self-deprecation.”

He turned Izuku to face the mirror and tilted his chin up. Izuku inched his gaze up to face their reflection. He saw them neatly together like a real married couple and it made his heart thump.

Katsuki’s expression then melted into pure adoration. He gently kissed the top of Izuku’s cheek bone where the new, heart-shaped freckle was.

“All I see when I look at your freckles is you,” Katsuki muttered as if he was trying his best to be soft with his words. “A hundred little reasons why I adore you and more stare back at me.”

That was probably the sweetest thing ever said to him.

Izuku’s heart melted. “I’m starting to question which one of us is the sappy romantic.”

“That’s still you,” Katsuki quipped with no bite. “But did you know the freckles on your back look like miniature constellations?”

Izuku raised his brows. “Really?”

“Mhm.” Katsuki lightly touched his shoulder and fiddled with his shirt. “Can I?”

Izuku nodded apprehensively.

Katsuki slid the oversized sleep shirt off Izuku’s shoulders to expose his back. It pooled at his hips, and as if he was made of stars himself, Katsuki carefully turned him around. Izuku’s heart raced as he looked over his shoulder into the mirror.

With his calloused fingers, Katsuki traced out the Little Dipper, Big Dipper, and the rabbit constellation inside Izuku’s back muscles. He took his time and admired the pathways he drew as if he really saw nebulas shimmering.

“How about every day I give you a kiss until I give you one for every freckle you have?”

“But I have new ones pop up all the time.”

“Then I guess I’m gonna have to kiss you forever.”

The promise of ‘forever’ hung over their heads and contradicted their predicament. Izuku looked at Katsuki, and even Katsuki was stunned by what he said. Izuku waited for him to retract the statement or make an amendment. But he didn’t.

Instead Katsuki smiled like he truly did mean what he said.

He gave Izuku’s shoulder a chaste kiss.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku looked at his freckles a little differently after that. Not entirely without the years of hatred he held for them, but now he saw the promise of forever hidden inside of them. When the next freckle showed up, he viewed it as a future kiss from Katsuki. He smiled and was able to look at himself a little longer.

The days began to melt away again and Izuku found himself in awe at how attentive Katsuki was. He cooked, cleaned, kissed him and watched every single movie Izuku loved. Izuku thought it couldn’t get any better than this.

Or at least he thought that until he was given the ultimate gift: a scene straight out of his favorite novel.

He didn’t catch on at first. Katsuki ran him a bath and when Izuku stumbled upon it, he staggered. It was exactly like his favorite book. But there was no way Katsuki knew that.

The lights in the bathroom were dimmed half way down, and the fragrance of various herbs filled the air. When he caught sight of the rose petals on top of the water and the candles, Izuku thought maybe he was drawing false conclusions.

But then Katsuki informed him that the bath was only for him.

Just like in the book.

Izuku finished the bath, put on the white silk robe that was hung up neatly on the towel hanger, and then he hobbled out to go find Katsuki. But as he walked, he found a trail of rose petals littered across the floor. His heart fluttered in disbelief and he slowly followed the path all the way out into the living room.

What was waiting for him was a scene he had read a thousand times over.

Directly in front of the fireplace was Katsuki, the man of his dreams. He was draped in a black robe with a white rose in his mouth. His sinful eyes captured the reflection of the fireplace as he laid on top of three layers of blankets. Beside him was a small line of soft pillows and cushions on the outer edges.

And rose petals were thrown everywhere.

“Kacchan?” Izuku called out.

Katsuki perked up and quickly he snapped into place like an actor ready for his role. While keeping eye contact, he slowly raked a hand through his hair while holding the rose between his teeth seductively.

“Wh-What is all this?” Izuku asked as he finally drew closer. He tried to soak it in, but he was in disbelief at what he was witnessing. Once he stood directly in front of Katsuki, there was no choice but to accept the truth. “This…This is exactly—this is the same as—”

“—Yes, it’s the same as your book,” Katsuki said. He took the rose out of his mouth and twirled it around. “It’s the scene after the mountain passage when they finally make it home. I read it all. Twice.” Katsuki’s grin widened. “I can see why you enjoy that part so much.”

Izuku was stunned into silence. He stood there, trying to comprehend that anti-romantic Katsuki was reenacting a scene from a romance novel. Willingly. Without a gun to his head.

Izuku slowly descended from his crutches down to Katsuki’s level. He carefully caressed a rose petal as if it was made of glass and picked it up.

This was the nicest thing anyone ever did for him—and he felt so bitter sweet about it. He always wanted love, but deep in the back of his mind he knew why he never pursued it like Hiryu. Izuku didn’t believe he deserved it. Yet here Katsuki was, giving it all to him.

“Do you like it?” Katsuki asked wearily. “If you don’t I can put this all away, and we can go to bed—”

“—No, I really love this,” Izuku whispered. His voice cracked on the ends, and his eyes were glossy. “Th-This is exactly how I pictured the scene. Everything is perfect, I-I can’t believe you did this.”

“I’m glad you like it,” Katsuki said quietly. He licked his lips, leaned in, and placed a warm hand on Izuku’s exposed thigh. “I…I would do this again if…it meant…seeing you smile.”

Izuku felt his heart jump to new heights.

“I thought you hated anything to do with romance?” Izuku asked softly.

“I guess it’s different when it comes to you.”

Katsuki handed Izuku the white rose and the wedding ring on his hand glimmered.

Izuku took the rose and the love inside of his heart for Katsuki doubled. Then it tripled. Then it multiplied so much that Izuku had no more measurements to express how much he truly did love Katsuki.

“Thank you so much,” Izuku whispered. The words ‘I love you’ burned him from the inside out. “This is the nicest thing anyone has done for me.”

Katsuki wordlessly smiled at him, picked up the two wine glasses, and handed one to Izuku. Izuku blushed deeply as he indulged in this romantic fantasy. He drank from the glass while maintaining eye contact with Katsuki.

When the bitter taste hit the back of his throat, Izuku choked a bit.

“What’s wrong?” Katsuki asked after swallowing.

Izuku wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. He started laughing and swirled the wine in the glass. “I don’t like the taste of red wine. I thought I would get used to it—but I guess I never have.”

Katsuki laughed from his stomach gorgeously and Izuku laughed too. So much for playing it exactly word for word. Their laughter mixed together in a chorus of joy as Katsuki shook his head. He took a couple big gulps of his drink before taking Izuku’s wine glass in his hand. He set them aside and smirked mirthfully.

“Let’s cut to the main part then,” Katsuki said with a hint of playfulness. “Not everything has to be done by the book.”

Izuku gripped the white rose tightly, knowing what was going to come next.

Katsuki shifted on the blankets and leaned in to grab Izuku by the waist. He dragged Izuku closer effortlessly and the heat in the room grew thicker.

“This is where the lovers intertwine,” Katsuki whispered as he undid the sash of Izuku’s robe. “They lose their virginity to the other, and they take it really slow and become forever bonded.” Katsuki kissed the tattoo on Izuku’s collar. “In sickness.” Another small kiss on his heart shaped freckle. “And in health.” A caress of the skin. “Until death do they part.”

Izuku’s breathing quickened, and his core spiked with taboo desire.

“Are you nervous again?” Katsuki muttered directly against Izuku’s lips. He smirked mischievously. “I promise I’ll make sure I’m gentle. I know how delicate virgins can be.”

“I’m not a virgin anymore,” Izuku quipped quickly, having a small visceral reaction to the word ‘virgin’. “And I’m not delicate.”

“I know. But c’mon, let me enjoy this.” Katsuki chuckled lightly and stole a kiss. “Still can’t get over my handsome virginal husband who waited until marriage for me all these damn years.”

Well. When it was put like that, Izuku found it romantic. He smiled at the thought and blushed at the title of husbands. Izuku laughed lightly and reddened when he found himself wanting to hear it again.

“Katsuki. You’re making me feel embarrassed calling me your husband.”

“Do you not like being called that? Husband suits you.”

Katsuki's voice dropped several octaves and Izuku squirmed. Hearing Katsuki refer to him as 'husband' fed a specific side of Izuku, one that he tried so hard not to indulge too much. This was simply a role-play but it was blurring a fine line between make believe and what Izuku always wanted in real life.

He felt himself grow increasingly excited at the thought of being married to Katsuki.

Slyly, Katsuki glanced down and noticed Izuku's cock growing hard and he grinned.

"You really fuckin' seem like you're enjoying it," Katsuki noted.

"I-I am," Izuku whispered shyly.

He was teetering on the edge of a forbidden line as he thought about potentially being married to Katsuki in all seriousness. After the last few weeks, he wouldn't mind it. In fact, he wanted to be wed to Katsuki. That thought scared him because he probably was alone in wanting that.

Izuku whispered, "You don't think it's odd considering we are legally married by accident? It feels taboo to use it like this."

"We're alone, who will judge us?" Katsuki questioned.

Katsuki snaked a hand underneath Izuku's robe to teasingly rub the inside of his soft, freckled thigh. The sensation soothed all Izuku's over thinking as he was tempted down yet another dangerous pathway.

"No one," Izuku said breathlessly.

"Exactly."

Izuku's eyes fluttered closed as Katsuki's hand snuck closer to his erection.

"If you like it, I can call you my husband in bed." Katsuki brushed their noses together. "This is between us, it's private and intimate. You're my darling husband right now and I'm yours."

Izuku nodded hesitantly and decided maybe Katsuki was right. He closed his eyes and allowed his body to loosen up all the way. He fell head first into Katsuki's temptation happily. He dropped the rose off to the side and wrapped his arms around Katsuki's neck. They kissed deeply, tongues sliding across each other sweetly.

"Try saying it," Katsuki said into the kiss. "Call me your husband."

"Y-You're my husband," Izuku whispered.

"And I'm going to take such good fucking care of you tonight," Katsuki rasped hungrily. "Bakugou Izuku."

A fiery need consumed Izuku's every waking thought as he gave into his forbidden fantasies. It gave him a deep satisfaction to acknowledge his current surname was the name of the man he loved.

Just like in the book, their bodies caramelized together in a perfect simmering molding. It was lovely in every way Izuku remembered from his first time. Each kiss, stroke, and lingering caress lit his nerve endings a blaze. He indulged in the scorching feeling, more than willing to be burned alive by Katsuki's passion.

Izuku moaned softly into their joined mouths as their body heat swelled. Every kiss Katsuki planted on his skin was given with delicate care. Izuku was stunned at how vastly different this time was from the first as Katsuki handled him with expert tenderness.

But he accepted it all the same, always willing and ready to take Katsuki in.

Katsuki worked him open with just as much care as before and sweet love trickled across Izuku's body. The slow burn of ecstasy hit his core like a meteorite searing into the earth. As if Katsuki knew every inch of his skin, he hit all the right spots in an instant.

Izuku reached his peak immediately with the way Katsuki hit deep with pressure at just the right spot. Not once did Katsuki's burning gaze look away as Izuku came and when he slid Izuku on his lap, an unexpected heartstring tugged inside of Izuku.

Katsuki looked at him like he was everything as he slowly lowered him down onto his cock.

Izuku relished the addictive feeling of being stretched wide open. Every thrust Katsuki gave was filled with need and Izuku ground down with just as much longing. The slow build of their pleasure took a hold of him as they rocked back and forth. They were face to face and chest to chest with every push and pull as bliss built.

Their motion drew out combinations of emotions Izuku didn't think was possible. Need melted with ecstasy. Longing mixed with devotion. Bottomless ruin meshed with yearning.

Both of their bodies shook together as the waves came crashing down on them.

Izuku cried out in a broken, high pitched moan when he peaked a second time. He came harshly into Katsuki's fist at the same time Katsuki snapped his hips in a perfect, precise motion against his sweet spot.

Witnessing Katsuki's orgasm was a gift Izuku would never forget.

He seized up fully, and his mouth dropped open as he came harshly inside of him. A throaty groan spilled into the air as he buried himself to the hilt and locked their bodies together.

Tiny rose petals stuck to their skin and Izuku wished he could capture this moment forever.

"That was so amazing," Izuku mumbled, entirely dazed.

Izuku's hands intertwined with Katsuki's. He laid a simple kiss on top of his husband's wedding band.

“Did you like it soft like that?” Katsuki asked. His chest heaved as he kept Izuku trapped in his arms. “I tried my best to make sure I was gentle.”

“I did, that was different in a good way,” Izuku said happily.

“I can keep doing that for you, if you enjoy it more than me being rough.” Katsuki smiled and drew tiny hearts on Izuku’s skin. “I should’ve done this for your first time and made you feel all special and shit.”

“I liked it the way we did it before too,” Izuku clarified. He squeezed Katsuki’s hand in his reassuringly. “I wouldn’t have changed how I had my first experience because I had it with you. That’s all I really wanted, Kacchan. I don’t mind either way as long as your lips are on mine.”

Katsuki seemed surprised. “Really?”

“Mhm.” Izuku grinned. “I especially like it when your hands are on me—” Izuku paused and guided Katsuki’s hand up to his neck. He assisted in clasping the large fingers tightly around his throat until it was a near perfect necklace. “—like this. I have more than one type of fantasy but they’re all involving you.”

He felt Katsuki’s cock inside of him jump back to life. His husband didn’t remove his hand and his eyes were boring into Izuku so intensely.

“What else have you been interested in?” Katsuki asked carefully like he was in a trance.

Izuku bit his lip shyly.

He thought back on a memory where Jin said he experienced an encounter that changed his life. His older brother had come back from the Circle of Lust one day right before their family dinner. He was blissfully dazed and mentioned he engaged in a session with a dominatrix who he claimed changed his brain chemistry.

He went to see her several times after that. But that day he mentioned something that always had Izuku curious.

“…Have you ever heard of edging?” Izuku carefully asked.

A dark, sharp chuckle escaped from Katsuki. His husband gave a depraved smile and happily choked Izuku lightly, pulling him by his neck to draw his lips close.

“We’re about to have a lot of fucking fun. Aren’t we?” Katsuki nearly growled.

Izuku nodded and raked his nails down Katsuki’s back. They shared another heated kiss as Katsuki clasped his hand firmer while moving their lips together.

In the comfort of this bubble, Izuku allowed himself to believe they were truly happily married.

After that it was like a floodgate of desire was opened and out poured all their craving. Their skin was pressed together constantly and both soft and rough touches were exchanged. Izuku felt like he was a whole new person. How could one man have this much influence over him?

Every time Katsuki so much as looked at him, weakness hit the back of Izuku's knees like a baseball bat.

He found himself frequently on all fours moaning and getting happily fucked. If he wasn't on his side, back, or belly, he happily was on his knees with a cock down his throat. It was difficult at first given Katsuki's size, but once he got the hang of it, Izuku wanted to taste Katsuki until the essence of him was permanently soaked into his tongue.

He'd do anything for this man.

Which is why when Katsuki plopped down a cardboard box in front of him on their bed, Izuku became intrigued.

"What's in there?" Izuku asked when his husband didn't make a move to open it.

The mischievous smile pinned on Katsuki's handsome face grew brighter. Then he said, "A shit ton of sex toys."

Izuku spluttered. "S-Sex toys?"

He straightened his back, completely caught off guard and blood burned at his cheeks.

"And other things," Katsuki tacked on.

Katsuki reached down and finally opened up the box. Izuku was astonished. Staring right back at him was an absurd amount of candy g-strings, rope, and all different kinds of dildos, plugs and vibrators. But one thing made Izuku burn with embarrassment.

"Is that doughnut flavored lube?" Izuku chastised.

Katsuki nodded with a snicker and Izuku nearly threw his slipper at him.

"I thought it would be fun to use given our little baking incident." Katsuki laughed. "Plus, you would have the most delicious cream-pie if we used this. You wouldn't be able to keep my mouth off you."

Izuku's cheeks burned. "You really love cream pies, don't you?"

"They're one of the sweetest joys of life."

"When did you even buy all of this?" Izuku asked.

"When I went out shopping the other day," Katsuki answered. "I stopped in a sex store. I was only trying to buy lube, but when I was in there I realized there might be things you could enjoy. I figured we could try some stuff out. I would really love to take care of you while you explore different sexual things."

Shyness crept its way in as Katsuki began to unpack the box. His husband neatly laid out all of the various toys and items for Izuku to see in a straight line. He placed a heart shaped plug between the bright red rope and scented massage oil.

Izuku suddenly felt excited but deeply nervous. He wanted to try things with Katsuki but he lowered his head a bit as he looked at all the toys. He began to question his level of experience when he saw something that looked like a string of beads. What would that even be for?

Katsuki seemed to notice this and paused his organization. He reached out to tenderly stroke Izuku's leg.

"Or we don't have to," Katsuki quickly added, fully sincere. "I just figured you might like some of this stuff, but we don't have to do anything you're not comfortable with. We can take it at your pace and explore however you want. Don't feel any pressure."

"I want to," Izuku said. "I-I'm just not sure where to start?"

"Pick something," Katsuki said softly. "We'll start wherever you feel most comfortable."

Izuku bit his lip as he looked at everything splayed across their bed. He figured starting with something he was familiar with would be good. With full confidence, Izuku pointed to the red rope.

Katsuki's eyebrows shot up a bit, but then a wicked grin settled onto his lips.

"Great choice there, darling. Let's get started with this tonight."

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku squirmed in anticipation on the couch.

They were feet away from the fireplace and it was the dead of night now. All around them the windows were closed and not a single noise interrupted their moment. Izuku had been stripped naked of all his clothes, and so had Katsuki.

Katsuki was standing in front of him, cock directly in Izuku's face. It was erect and hanging low by the force of gravity. Izuku bit his lip as he studied all the bulging veins and his tongue twisted with the urge to latch himself on to it.

Katsuki glanced down at him and slowly began to stroke himself. He pushed the tip to Izuku's mouth, smearing a trail of pre-cum across the plump lips. Izuku's tongue darted out to taste and Katsuki groaned at the sight.

"Do you wanna give a quick suck, darling?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku nodded eagerly. He opened his mouth, happy to accept his husband in. The action amused Katsuki as he inched forward to drag his tip against Izuku's awaiting, wet tongue.

Izuku moved his head down the length, and the sheer thickness of his husband filled him up as he began to graciously suck. Katsuki groaned at the sensation and buried his hands into Izuku's head of curls. He gently pushed his cock in further. Immediately, Izuku adjusted his jaw to be wider. He bobbed his head sensually, inching Katsuki's cock further and further back into his mouth until the hot tip hit the back of his throat.

Katsuki began to move his head for him, thrusting in slowly.

"Get it nice and wet, darling," Katsuki groaned. "Suck it like you want me to fuck you with it."

At that, Izuku was inspired. He pushed his thighs together when heat suddenly spilled into his belly. He bobbed his head quicker and whined when Katsuki gripped the base of his curls with vigor. Izuku hallowed out his cheeks, drawing out a deep curse from his husband as he swirled his tongue around. He sucked harder and slowly Katsuki's cock sank into his throat.

The sound Katsuki made from this was marvelous. He staggered a bit, amazed as Izuku deepthroated him eagerly. He then used both hands to grip Izuku's head and slowly sank his girth into the tight, wet, passage over and over. Izuku felt himself get turned on by the erotic sounds of his husband above him. Hearts were surely dancing in his eyes and Katsuki began to stroke his hair and praise him.

"Damn, you're a quick learner," Katsuki moaned.

He rocked his hips lightly as Izuku pulled back and gave a long, wet suck. He began to get more into it, and lifted his hands. With both, he twisted the base of Katsuki's girth and the kitten licked the tip. Upon hearing a moan, Izuku began to blow Katsuki exactly like he was taught. He defaulted to sucking and pumping, and above him Katsuki was groaning and cursing.

The hot length in his mouth throbbed and Izuku squirmed as he tried to take Katsuki back down his throat. But he was stopped when Katsuki let out a loud curse and quickly snapped his head back by his hair. Izuku gasped at the sudden movement and a dribble of spit slid down his chin.

Katsuki let out a shaky breath and stared down at Izuku with wide, dilated eyes.

"Good fuckin' boy," Katsuki praised. "I think you definitely deserve to get cock after that."

Izuku keened as Katsuki manhandled him beautifully. He was careful with his body, and made sure not to bump or agitate his broken bones. Izuku was tenderly flipped on his belly and above him, Katsuki straddled him with one leg on the couch and the other off to give him leverage.

Katsuki then reached for the rope that was laying on the ground.

All of Izuku's sensations spiked in anticipation.

"Have you fantasized about tying me up often?" Izuku cheekily questioned.

He peeked over his shoulder to stare up at his husband. Immediately, a chill ran down his spine at the sight of Katsuki looming over him with his giant cock hanging down. Katsuki tested the tension of the rope with a sharp tug in both hands.

"I think we both know the answer to that one, Deku," Katsuki teased.

He gazed down at Izuku in a way that was loaded with heat. With both hands, Katsuki forced Izuku's arms behind his back and his calloused fingers dug into the supple skin. Izuku squirmed, every touch felt magnified to new extremes already. When his elbows touched behind his back, the tension added on to his growing arousal like a stack of heavy bricks inside of him.

It only took a moment for Katsuki to wrap one of his hands around both of his wrists to hold him tight. Large. That was Izuku's first thought. His second thought was how tightly Katsuki was restraining him and his cock began to twitch to life.

He drank in the way the rope felt against his skin. There was a burn to it that teetered between interesting and uncomfortable. It made him dangerously curious. Next, his breath hitched as Katsuki fastened the rope around his wrists and up his forearms like a red snake binding to his flesh.

Izuku closed his eyes as he felt Katsuki tie a double knot. Then a triple and there was some other sort of intricate knot made that he couldn't make out without seeing.

Curiously, Izuku experimentally tugged his wrists apart to test the strength. He could barely budge. A strange, new type of satisfaction rattled in Izuku's core and his cock grew fully hard.

"This is very secure," Izuku praised and blinked a couple of times. "Much better than that one time you tried to tie me up."

Katsuki barked out a sharp laugh and said, "Don't even get me started on how mad I was that you got away that day."

His smile transformed into a feral smirk as he reached down and viciously pulled Izuku up on his knees. Izuku choked a bit, surprised at Katsuki's strength as he was forced backwards on his hunches. Katsuki continued to wrap the rope up Izuku's arms and circled it several times across his chest in an intricate design.

"I couldn't believe you wiggled your way out, I was so sure I caught you," Katsuki said as he made a couple more knots. The material grazed across Izuku's sensitive nipples and he bit his lip when a tingle of pleasure spilled down his body. "After that I spent days in my room fuming and practicing tying knots so that next time I caught you—" Katsuki fastened the rope with a fierce tug. "—You couldn't run away from me."

The way Katsuki said that last bit was like warm honey in the throat. Smooth, slow, and sweet in a dark way.

He glanced down at his chest and marveled at Katsuki's handiwork. It was beautiful. He moved slightly and with the way Katsuki criss-crossed the rope it stimulated his nipples with every movement. Izuku let out a shaky breath as he began to get stimulated.

"I don't, ah, think these are the types of knots you tie to capture your enemy," Izuku said when he nearly moaned from the sensation on his chest.

"They are when you were my enemy," Katsuki said huskily.

He finished tying the rope and pressed his chest against Izuku's back. He slowly dragged his hands up and down Izuku's thighs, making Izuku shutter at the feeling. Izuku relaxed fully onto Katsuki when his rough hands began kneading into him.

Katsuki leaned down and ghosted his mouth over Izuku's jugular.

"Y'know, I used to have this fantasy," Izuku breathlessly confessed. He licked his lips as Katsuki gently sucked at his neck. "I-I used to imagine there would be a day where you finally caught me, and when you did…you, ah, would fuck me."

Katsuki paused.

He slowly turned Izuku's head to look at him and there was a profound hunger in his eyes.

"Surprise to hear that, not going to lie," Katsuki said. "But I admittedly have a similar one. I used to dream about the day I finally got you in my hands. I tried to tell myself I would kill you, but really, I know it would end with us having brutal hate sex."

Izuku's cock twitched at the idea.

What a missed opportunity. Too bad they didn't have any more shared animosity.

"Maybe when your ankle is better we can role-play that," Katsuki suggested. "Until then, let's focus on this. If there's ever a moment you want out of the rope, say so, okay?" Katsuki muttered against his skin.

Izuku nodded. "Okay, I will."

At that validation, Katsuki dragged his hands up to touch Izuku's soft nipples.

The feeling pulsed down his chest, and Izuku softly moaned when Katsuki used his thumbs to rub circles on top of them. He pinched them greedily and pulled them slowly. Izuku arched his back when one hard tug made his cock ache. He moved out of reflex to grab at his erection but was met with the burning sensation of rope and groaned low.

Katsuki moved like he had nowhere to be. He played with his chest and sucked at his neck, dragging long sensational touches up and down. He put one hand by Izuku's mouth and pushed in his fingers lightly as he twirled one hard bud in his other hand. Izuku happily took the fingers in his mouth and graciously sucked on them, wetting them.

He breathed out heavily through his nose when he felt another wave of erotic pleasure trickle through him. Katsuki removed his fingers from his mouth with a wet pop and used them to slowly circle the hard nipple on Izuku's chest.

Izuku tried rocking back on Katsuki and slowly Katsuki's hand sank lower and lower until he grabbed for Izuku's hard on. Izuku moaned slowly as his husband pumped him long and teasingly. The heat from Katsuki's palm wrapped him and Izuku whined as he tried to thrust into the fist.

Katsuki then moved his other hand downwards to Izuku's backside.

He carefully maneuvered him forwards and spread his legs across the couch cushions. Izuku heard the tiny sound of a cap clicking as Katsuki worked behind him. Next the wet tantalizing sensation of a finger coated with slick lube rubbed at his entrance at the same time Katsuki gave his cock a generous pump. Izuku groaned as Katsuki pushed his way in with one finger and pumped it.

Izuku moaned in a way he would be ashamed of later when Katsuki pushed in two fingers and softly pushed against his prostate. The pleasure gripped him instantly. Izuku gasped and dropped his head as he was stimulated from both ends.

Katsuki pushed into Izuku mercilessly at different angles until he found the right one that made him groan the loudest.

"Feeling' good?" Katsuki whispered against the shell of his ear.

The words added to the growing flame and Izuku nodded eagerly. "I-I am."

"You're about to feel even better."

Izuku's stomach flipped, and the feeling of electricity raced down to his toes. Katsuki quickened his movements, egged on by Izuku's breathing. Izuku rocked his body back and forth between the two overwhelming sensations and the rope cut across his sensitive chest.

He jerked when his belly coiled more and Katsuki pumped him quicker. He fucked his fingers directly against his sweet spot and Izuku's thighs began quaking from waves of pleasure. His mouth dropped in a tiny 'o' shape as he felt the burn inside of him grow into an overwhelming storm.

"Ka-Kacchan," Izuku whispered. "A-Ah—I think I'm going to cum."

He struggled against the rope but found himself restricted. And that just made him groan in pleasure more. He was at Katsuki's mercy and he loved the thought.

"Yeah?" Katsuki groaned and ground into him from behind, forcing his fingers deeper to milk Izuku's prostate. "You gonna cum for me, darling?"

Izuku nodded with a breathy moan and ground back on the fingers as Katsuki slipped a third in. The fullness of three digits was like liquid lightning. His legs shook with euphoria and his back bent into an arch. His orgasm climbed and climbed as Katsuki finger fucked him and pumped his throbbing cock faster. The pleasure raked across his nipples, back, arms, and toes.

And right when the elation compiled to topple over into nirvana—

—Katsuki removed his fingers.

Izuku groaned at the whiplash as the pleasure in his body retreated. It left behind an empty burning sensation that was close to the feeling of coals on the inside of his stomach. In a desperate attempt to follow his orgasm, Izuku jerked forward and just like that, he sent himself toppling down on the couch. Izuku tried to move to touch himself again but was reminded once more he didn't have the use of his hands.

"You really thought it would be that easy tonight?" Katsuki darkly chuckled.

Izuku tried to grind into the cushion and Katsuki shot a hand out to grab the rope. The world Izuku saw was flipped as he was laid on his back, legs wide open. Katsuki looked more than pleased with him as he spread Izuku's legs wider and took his rightful place in them.

Izuku felt nearly lightheaded from the orgasm denial.

"Kacchan," Izuku said his lover's name like it was his lifeline. He arched his back off the couch and unwillingly his body twitched at the friction of the rope rubbing his chest. "Pl-Please let me cum."

Katsuki 'tched' as he rubbed the thick head of his cock against Izuku's hole. Izuku spread his legs further, waiting for it to be pushed in but instead Katsuki only lightly placed it at his entrance. He leaned over Izuku with his sharp-toothed grin.

"I don't think so," Katsuki chastised in a low voice. "I'm going to make you crazy for it. Now beg, Izuku."

"I-I need you," Izuku moaned. "I want you in me so badly, please."

Izuku felt himself flutter as Katsuki pushed his cock into him. The tip opened him up and caught on his rim. The delicious sensation radiated a promise of unfathomable pleasure and Izuku sighed and spread his legs more.

But then Katsuki's pulled right back out.

Izuku groaned loudly from the back of his throat as Katsuki did it again and again, sinking in further each time. Izuku began squirming and whined when the tip barely brushed his sweet spot.

"That was a weak ass plea. Try again." Katsuki darkly chuckled.

“Split me open,” Izuku said with a moan mixed in. He arched his back and stared straight into Katsuki’s eyes. “Fuck me until I see stars I’m begging, please. I-I need you so much. I need your cock.”

“You sound like you’re about to lose it,” Katsuki groaned.

“I-I might,” Izuku said helplessly. “I need the feeling of you giving it to me.”

Katsuki bit his lip. “You love being filled up don’t you?”

“I love being filled up by you.”

He knew that was the chord to strike to make his possessive husband go as mad as him. As expected, Katsuki’s expression became overwhelmed with lust and he began to stroke Izuku’s cock.

The large hand practically swallowed his length whole and it tightly wrapped around the base. Ripples of fervor stacked on top of Izuku’s denied orgasm, bringing him back to the top quickly. Izuku didn’t understand what was happening as every pleasurable sensation doubled then tripled as Katsuki finally sank in deep enough to push against his prostate.

The pleasure inside of him swelled at the seams and so did the desperation this time. He clenched down on the slick girth inside of him as Katsuki finally buried himself to the hilt. Izuku shuddered when his husband rolled his hips, pushing directly against that spot that made him lose his mind.

Katsuki moved to lift Izuku’s legs over his shoulders and carefully held his cast still. He then tightly held the other leg in a vice grip. With no warning, Katsuki reeled back and thrusted back in sharply, immediately setting a pace that was fast and brutal. Every thrust was punctuated with hitting Izuku’s sweet spot, pouring more and more pleasure over his body.

Stars scattered across Izuku’s vision as he was fucked with purpose. He whimpered and tried to push back against the cock driving into his tight hole.

Flickers of addictive heat bloomed inside of him again as Katsuki kept his pace. He gained momentum with every powerful thrust, and began lifting Izuku’s hips as he fucked him with intense force. Izuku threw his head back as his breathing skipped and his chest convulsed. Katsuki leaned forward, not stopping his hips, and rolled both of Izuku’s nipples underneath his thumbs and gave them both a light flick.

Izuku’s legs immediately quaked and he arched into the feeling.

“Damn,” Katsuki cursed low as he pounded into Izuku. “Every time I play with them, you clench around me, it feels so damn addictive.”

Izuku couldn’t find the words to respond. Instead a small litany of moans, pleas, and loose syllables of Katsuki’s name poured from him. He screwed his eyes shut as Katsuki continued to roll his sensitive buds under his fingers again. Izuku twitched with a moan and Katsuki ground his hips against Izuku, pushing his cock deeper.

With every thrust Izuku climbed higher and higher until his voice began to climb too. His lips quivered when his mind was drowned in the feeling of Katsuki everywhere. The coil tightened inside of him again and several wonton pleas escaped. The tension inside of his core spiked and he clenched down on the thick length inside of him as his own cock began to spasm.

Then as quickly as it built, it left and Katsuki swiftly pulled all the way out.

Izuku nearly sobbed as Katsuki none-too-gently buried inside him again in one swift motion, The ledge he was teetering on was intense and he felt his orgasm rise and fall like a flood. He begged for it to be let out as he tried to grind down but Katsuki kept him perfectly balanced at the intensity of his peak. But he never allowed him to reach it fully.

“Isn’t this what you wanted?” Katsuki teased as he began to slowly fuck Izuku. “Edged to the end of oblivion by your husband’s cock?”

“Ye-yes,” Izuku nearly cried.

Katsuki thrusted his hips and punched out a gasp from Izuku. “Say it louder.”

“Yes!” Izuku said with more force.

Katsuki reached for the rope splayed across Izuku’s chest and pulled, snapping Izuku on to him.

“Fuck!” Izuku nearly screamed as he threw his head back. “Kacchan!”

He was pulled back on Katsuki over and over. The delicious feeling built inside of him again and he found himself wiggling and moaning. And just like before, Katsuki kept him perfectly balanced between oblivion and searing pleasure.

Each time Izuku thought he was going to cum, he was denied. Every time Izuku thought they would slow down, he was wrong. All the push and pull Katsuki gave him made Izuku dive into a sea of rapture until all he could think about was Katsuki touching him and being inside of him.

“Ka-Kacchan,” Izuku sobbed. “Please. Please. Let me cum on your cock—”

His mind began buzzing as their speed picked up. The sheer force began to make his whole body tremble and the tension from his restraints dug into him. Long strips of pre-cum oozed out of Izuku’s tip and Katsuki reached down to stimulate his cock.

“You should see the way you’re dripping, darling,” Katsuki cooed.

Izuku’s world spun in an instant when his knees were pushed into his shoulders, perfectly folding him in a half. The hot pre-cum dripped on his stomach and from this angle Izuku could perfectly see the way Katsuki’s cock was splitting him open. It was absurdly lewd, and Izuku’s breath quickened at the sight of his hole perfectly wrapped around the veiny cock.

Katsuki doesn't let up as he slams into him from this angle, perfectly aligned with the spot that makes Izuku see the heavens. Izuku was a mess now. Sobbing, twitching and moaning as he is given the perfect view of himself getting fucked and his cock being fondled. The sound of their skin slapping together mixed with their breathy moans and Izuku couldn't take his eyes away from their joined bodies.

Then Katsuki gave in.

The tell-tale deep groan that Izuku learned to love spilled into the air. It was throaty and accompanying it was Katsuki's hips jerking with vigor. Izuku purposefully clenched his hole around Katsuki, and the reaction was instant. His husband's nostrils flared and his hand pumped Izuku vehemently.

"F-Fuck," Katsuki moaned. "You're so goddamn tight."

Izuku clenched again, and Katsuki fucks him harder. It's a mesmerizing sight to see the way Katsuki's cock disappears inside of him. Then with one more clench, Katsuki begins to desperately jerk him off. Izuku breathes like he's panicking as he finally feels himself reach higher to his peak and the promise of an orgasm is finally on the corner.

"You ready to cum now, darling?" Katsuki panted out shakily.

"Ye-Yes!" Izuku answered quickly. "Please! Please, Kacchan!"

Katsuki snapped his hips several more times and Izuku orgasmed first.

He moans loud enough that his voice cracks in two and his core tightens as his muscles spasm. The peak he reached felt like a compiled burst of all of the denied orgasms in one. It's a ruinous wave of oblivion that crashed down on him like nothing he felt before. The sensation seared into his soul and Izuku cried as his cock throbs with heat. Ribbons of his own warm, cum squirted across his chest, nipples, and face. He gasped at the tantalizing sensation.

Katsuki's intense gaze watched the whole thing. The sight of Izuku decorated in his own essence sends him directly over the edge.

Izuku feels his husband bury his cock impossibly deep inside of him and his hot cum fills him to the brim. Izuku gasped at how lovely it felt and subconsciously tightened around Katsuki to feel the radiating warmth. Katsuki groaned and grinded down as Izuku's body milked him of his seed. Katsuki's body shook as he tried to give several deep thrusts before he collapsed on top of Izuku.

It takes several beats of silence for them to get their barring.

Katsuki carefully slid out of Izuku but didn't move as he kept Izuku bent in half. He locked his hands around Izuku's knees and kept him where he was. He tentatively studied Izuku's hole that was dripping cum while Izuku was panting heavily.

Briefly, Izuku wondered what was going through Katsuki's head when his husband didn't make a move. He just watched Izuku's hole clench and unclench with the creamy liquid oozing out. It trickled down his backside and across his sack.

Suddenly, Katsuki's tongue shot out and gently licked his hole. Izuku jumped instantly.

"Katsuki," Izuku groaned, and his husband began to lick him again and again.

Katsuki breathed out through his nose as he buried his face further. He generously enjoyed the cream-pie of his husband at languid speed. He took his time and Izuku gasped at the flicker of over-stimulation that trickled down his spine when Katsuki gave a long, hard lap.

When Katsuki's tongue dove into him Izuku wiggled in his restraints as he began to be aroused back to life. The sensual way Katsuki's wet appendage massaged him and the obscene sounds of him swallowing filled the air. Izuku screwed his eyes shut as he endured the post-rapture sensation.

When Katsuki finished, he pulled back and gave Izuku's sack a suggestive flick of the tongue. Katsuki wolfishly grinned and Izuku knew he was damned.

A sex demon. He married a sex demon.

"Sorry," Katsuki said half heartedly as he wiped his mouth. "I couldn't resist that one."

He thumbed at Izuku's hole, letting him know he wasn't finished with him.

"Did you like the rope?" Katsuki asked, completely out of breath.

"I loved it," Izuku whispered back.

He stared at Katsuki's thumb that was gently applying pressure. A loving smile stretched across Katsuki's face as he moved his finger gingerly. His husband's eyes were beautifully dilated. Izuku knew his eyes were as well and they laughed lightly between each other.

"What's next in that box?" Izuku asked eagerly.

Katsuki grinned from ear to ear. "So fucking much. Do you think you could go again?"

Izuku's cock jumps back to life as he sees Katsuki sink his thumb back inside of him. "Ye-Yes. I could go all night if you keep this up."

"Perfect." Katsuki laughs. "Let's do the candy g-strings."

They burned through the edible underwear in twenty four hours. Izuku was sure some type of spell had come over them but he was happy to give into it. He partly considered that maybe Katsuki was an incubus, or half incubus at the very least. Because it felt like every time they had sex Katsuki's desire to have him grew stronger and stronger.

Later that evening, they laid side by side under the covers quietly.

They were cuddled, both turned inward and Izuku thought he could lay there forever. Katsuki's eyes were closed and he traced small hearts on Izuku's back.

"Are you going to read your book?" Katsuki asked, his voice was groggy with sleep. "You haven't touched it in a while."

Izuku hadn't even noticed, but Katsuki was right. He glanced over at the small night stand by his side of the bed. Laying there was his forgotten book slightly crooked on top of the wooden surface.

"You're right, I guess I'll read it a bit before bed," Izuku replied.

"M'kay," Katsuki muttered. He wrapped his arms around Izuku's waist. "Good night, darling."

"Goodnight, Kacchan."

Katsuki dozed off within a matter of seconds and Izuku smiled at the soft snoring. He grabbed his book on the night stand without rousing his husband and began to read a bit. He waited to be wrapped up in the magical spell it always held over him. His feet would suddenly feel like they were transported elsewhere and he could escape into the fantasy he adored so much.

However, he found himself not inclined to run away into his favorite world tonight.

He looked beside him at his husband.

He knew then he didn't need his fantasy world. The reality he wanted to experience was laying right beside him for the first time. He didn't need some eloquent sentence about the soul to tell him that this was because life with Katsuki was worth being present for.

This tiny sanctuary of happiness was a fantasy world of its own and Izuku didn't want to escape from it.

Chapter End Notes

Lemme know what you think below! Next chapter has the same new scenes, adding to the plot, and fluff between these too as they fall dangerously in love. Thanks so much for reading!

Chapter 25: Grazioso

Chapter Summary

Grazioso (style indicator) to play gracefully.

Chapter Notes

Hellooooo welcome back :)) This chapter is a big chunk of hurt and comfort with some fluff. I'm super excited for the next three chapters. Without further wait, hope you enjoy!!

Warnings: Adult Scenes and Themes

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 25 — Grazioso

.

.

.

Third Month of Honeymoon

The change of season snuck up on Izuku. He hadn't noticed when the leaves shifted from green to orange because he kept his eyes trained on Katsuki the whole time. When he bothered to finally pay attention to his surroundings, all of the trees were decorated in rich oranges, reds, and yellows.

He missed the change of seasons during their unlimited time together. So far it consisted of doing various things that were on Izuku's bucket list.

It made Izuku beam with light because little did Katsuki know, Izuku made that list as a bucket list to do with his future husband in his head. He thought it would be something private to keep in case one day he was fortunate enough to get married.

Now here they were, bound to one another and basking in married life.

They had a picnic. They did pottery. Izuku was even surprised when they baked together and made flower crowns. It was everything he could hope for as they did all the mundane things

Izuku wished to do in another lifetime.

Every event was full of domestic grace, even the one they were doing right now: spending time at a mall.

They were currently in a store that both Izuku and Katsuki loved. They decided they both really liked it after discovering this store stocked a lot of red and orange sweaters. It seemed like after Izuku gave Katsuki that one compliment, it was a green flag for him to buy more and more in that range of hues.

The amount of reds and oranges in Katsuki's closet almost rivaled his blacks now.

Izuku watched as Katsuki walked over to a clean, deep red suit and touched the fabric of it. He inspected the seams and assessed the durability with a small tug of his hands.

"What do you think of this?" Katsuki asked. "Most of my suits are black, and an orange suit would make me look like a goddamn clown, so how about red?"

Izuku hobbled over, and did the same thing Katsuki had done. He smiled up at his husband with a nod.

"I think you would look amazing in this, Kacchan," Izuku replied. "Where would you wear it though? It's kinda too high class for everyday wear."

Katsuki shrugged. "I dunno, anywhere fancy I guess. Maybe we can go to an orchestra one day and have the chance to dress up."

Izuku smiled at that thought. "Okay, I can't wait to see you in this suit!"

Katsuki took the suit off the hook and they continued to walk around. He kept a steady hand positioned at the small of Izuku's back to help steady him as he tried to walk with only one crutch. Overall, Izuku's ankle was getting better. It hurt less and Izuku was far more mobile now. There wasn't much left to heal, and truthfully he probably didn't need the crutch and cast anymore.

But Izuku didn't want to entirely admit that to himself. If he took the cast off, it was a signal that his time here was done.

As they wandered around the store, they came by the accessory section. Izuku looked at some of the sparkling jewelry and the glittering light of one bracelet caught his eye. They walked over to the section together, both of them focusing on different things.

Izuku picked up a tiny silver bracelet that he thought would probably make Katsuma ooh and aah. Dangling from it was a circular pendant and Izuku was pleasantly surprised to find it was a discreet locket. He smiled as he took it off the rack and held it up to the light.

Next to him Katsuki was surveying the leather belts. He glided his finger across several of them like he was considering an idea. Discreetly, he cut his eyes to Izuku and then unhooked one off the rack.

Katsuki gave his signature mischievous grin and held it up.

“You said you wanted to try something rougher in bed, right?” Katsuki asked with flirtation laced through his voice.

“Oh. Yeah—”

Izuku’s words died off the moment he came face to face with the belt.

A strange, unfamiliar feeling like prickling needles jabbed at his back. He suddenly became hesitant for reasons he was unsure of. But he glanced at Katsuki and bent under his need to please. He forced a tight lipped smile and nodded quickly.

“R-Right, I did!” Izuku said with an unsteady laugh. “Ho-How would we use a belt exactly? L-Like you would hit me with it?”

Katsuki looped the belt around his hand and Izuku grew stiffer by the second.

“Spank you with it,” Katsuki corrected and snapped the belt between his hands.

Izuku stilled his nerves when they jumped at the intense sound.

“Y’know how I sometimes spank your ass with my hand while we’re in the heat of the moment,” Katsuki continued. “You said you really liked the sting of that right?”

Izuku took a deep breath in and nodded with a sweet smile. “I-I do like it when you do that.”

“This will be kinda similar but more intense with a harsher sting. We can go over safety but I think you would enjoy it.”

Katsuki’s eyes were brimming with raw sexual excitement. This was clearly something he would be into, and Izuku knew it was something he should be into as well.

But he wasn’t so sure why he was feeling—off about the concept of a belt being used. A large part of him didn’t want to do this, but he told himself he didn’t want to disappoint Katsuki. He buried his own opinion and smiled.

“Okay, let’s do it,” Izuku said with forced confidence.

“Perfect. We can try a round tonight to see if you like it.”

Katsuki kissed the side of his head and they continued their shopping.

Izuku tried to be happy the rest of the time, but he found himself feigning a plastic, fake smile. A looming feeling close to dread was compiling at the base of his body and suddenly his arms were sore.

ɯɯɯ

They got home and Katsuki immediately set the mood.

They put away all the food and clothes they bought from their errands and Katsuki led him to their bedroom. Izuku nervously fidgeted on the comforter as Katsuki spread his legs for him and slotted between them.

Diving straight in, Katsuki gripped the base of Izuku's neck and tilted his head. The forceful action immediately surged heat straight down into Izuku's core and when Katsuki's lips connected with his skin, he lightly moaned. He spread his legs further when Katsuki's rough hand began to palm at his erection, moving in slow, generous circles.

"Right th-there," Izuku whispered breathlessly when Katsuki began to suck a hickey above his pulse.

He gripped Katsuki's hair and pushed his face in. Katsuki riled at the encouragement and began to rub Izuku's cock harsher through his jeans.

Izuku was all the way hard now, and the vulnerability of intimacy began to wash over him. He fluttered his eyes closed as the feeling encompassed him, surrendering to it fully.

He let himself be pushed backwards until his head hit the soft mattress, and Katsuki raked his hands up and down his sides. It tickled, and made him feel exposed. Izuku wiggled on the bed, waiting for more to happen, but nothing occurred right away.

Suddenly the warm hand on his neck disappeared, making him open his eyes again. He watched curiously when Katsuki snaked a hand down.

But when the hand returned, it was grasping the leather belt.

Izuku stiffened.

Visions of Tomura's face twisted in fury, anger, and repulsion flashed before his eyes.

Katsuki tenderly kissed his forehead and leaned up in order to loom over him. His husband easily wedged a knee between his legs, planting it directly against his erection. Izuku stifled a moan as he was stimulated while his body strangely seized up.

He tried to tell himself to enjoy the feeling but was unable to the longer he looked at the belt. It taunted him. As if it had eyes itself, he felt like it was glaring at him and telling him how weak he was. He tried to look away as Katsuki began to rock their bodies, but he couldn't.

Izuku's heart palpitated.

"With rougher play like this, it's extremely important to be communicative," Katsuki said. He smirked down at Izuku and pressed his knee into his crotch, rubbing it in slow circles under his shin. "You gotta be very vocal, okay? If it's too much, say 'red'. Got it?"

Izuku didn't nod or say yes. His eyes were trained on the belt in Katsuki's hand.

Katsuki frowned at the lack of response. "Izuku, did you hear me?"

Izuku couldn't talk. He tried to, but a lump in his throat was preventing him. His nostrils flared as he tried to stop himself from crying but it was useless. Out poured tears he didn't want, and visions of Tomura's face distorted by wrath suddenly replaced Katsuki's.

"Izuku?" Katsuki's voice sounded worried and far away. "Wh-What's wrong?"

Quickly, Katsuki glanced between Izuku and the belt. He moved it slightly and with it Izuku's eyes moved as well.

Katsuki cursed under his breath and hid the belt under the bed.

Once the object was gone, Izuku's breathing spiked with panic. Katsuki moved off of him and tried to shake him out of it, but found himself fruitless. Izuku screwed his eyes shut as his whole body shook and unwanted tears streamed down his face.

He meant to say something, but instead of words a loud, heartbreaking sob ripped from his lips. Izuku was horrified as more sobs tumbled out and he quickly lifted his hands to hide his face.

Katsuki was saying his name over and over again, with increasing urgency. But Izuku couldn't respond as he was transported across the worst parts of his memory.

It'd been five years since Tomura hit him with a belt, but somehow he still felt the welts on his skin as if they were cut into him yesterday. He heard every cruel thing Tomura said as he struck him over and over. Years of pain stacked on top of him and all Izuku could do was hide his face in shame.

Why was he crying?

Why couldn't he get it together?

Katsuki lifted him off the bed and secured his arms around him. He was trying his best to comfort Izuku as he quickly shuffled them further into the mattress. Izuku found himself unable to meet Katsuki's gaze. He failed him. They were supposed to be having fun but his defect got in the way.

Katsuki leaned his back against the headboard as he kept Izuku tightly secured. He wrapped his hands around Izuku and pressed Izuku's head against his chest to try to soothe him. He patted his hair and rocked back and forth with a terrified expression.

"It—It's okay, I'm sorry," Katsuki apologized with a splintering crack in his voice. It was clear he was unsure of what to do and Izuku felt like he screwed everything up. "I'm so fucking sorry, we don't have to do that, okay? Fuck it—f-forget it. It's done."

"I—" Izuku tried to speak but a wrenching sob overshadowed the words. "S-S-So—Sorry—"

"You have nothing to be sorry for," Katsuki corrected firmly. "I shouldn't have suggested that shit in the first place."

"B-But you wanted to," Izuku cried. "I-I ruined it."

“I don’t want to do anything that you don’t want to do, Izuku,” Katsuki whispered. He caressed Izuku’s hair more and pain crept into his words. “We never have to do that again.”

Izuku cried harder.

The vulnerability of the moment mixed with his searing memories. He tried to tell himself that it was fine, and he needed to snap out of this, but he found it impossible like climbing a flat wall. He dug his fingers into the bricks of his mental block but couldn’t scale it to find his way to the other side.

As Katsuki continued to ease him, Izuku felt disgusted with himself as a person and a viper. He didn’t deserve this type of treatment, and he couldn’t figure out why Katsuki always handled him with such care.

After what felt like an eternity, Izuku’s crying slowed up a bit. His eyes were sore every time he blinked and Katsuki hadn’t moved an inch. In fact, he rested his head against Izuku’s and kept his grip on him tight.

Izuku lifted his head, and was mortified to realize the sun had gone down. They were sitting in the dark by themselves. He inched his gaze up, horrified at what happened and he looked at Katsuki with deep remorse.

Katsuki was looking back at him, concerned beyond Izuku’s understanding.

When Izuku finally found his voice, he offered up the tiniest “sorry” he could manage.

Katsuki didn’t say anything.

Quietness filled the room and very carefully Katsuki rubbed his shoulders. His eyes darted all over Izuku’s face, body, and lingered on the faint scars that were on his arms. He seemed like he was about to be sick as he carefully wiped away Izuku’s tears with his palm.

“Was…Was it that Academy?” Katsuki whispered and his face twisted with fear.

Izuku seized up.

Years of violent silence training gagged his throat and told him to shut up. He felt the bluntness of Tomura’s hits and the gnawing pain of famine kick in his stomach. He stared into Katsuki’s eyes and was too frightened to move. But it seemed like his terrified silence said it all.

Katsuki carefully leaned in and chose his next words with care. “…Did that older brother of yours ever beat you with a belt?”

The question was pointed well enough that it was a yes or no. And no matter how much Izuku tried, he couldn’t lie to Katsuki. The wrongness of that felt like acid against his tongue and it started to overpower the resistance of talking about his upbringing.

Slowly, Izuku hung his head and nodded.

Katsuki gave a heartbroken sigh and hugged him. The simpleness from the warm touch made Izuku break down again. He tried to stifle his crying this time, and bit his lip to keep it in. But it poured out, slipping past the cracks in his armor.

“S-Sorry, th-this is so stupid,” Izuku said through his crying. He viciously wiped his tears away. “I feel so stupid, this never happened before—I-I don’t know wh-why I’m reacting like this—”

“It’s okay, Izuku,” Katsuki comforted.

“It’s not,” Izuku said. He shook his head as he buried his head in his hands. “It’s not okay, it’s weak. I’m sobbing over the sight of a belt. I’ve seen a thousand belts and—I-I’ve never reacted before—why now? Wh-Why am I being weak now?”

“—Hey,” Katsuki quipped. He frowned, grabbed Izuku’s hands, and pulled them down off his face. He made Izuku look him in the eye and Izuku quickly turned away. “It’s not weak. Don’t say that.”

“But it is weak,” Izuku whispered. “I’m weak and defected and this proves it. I shouldn’t be crying over something so trivial like this. I never cried over it before, I shouldn’t be crying about it now.”

Katsuki took a deep breath in and looked around the dark bedroom. He held onto Izuku’s wrists tighter and then shifted to interweaving their hands. Pain was pierced through all his handsome features and Izuku felt so bad for causing this much of a scene.

It was then Katsuki finally looked back towards him with genuine concern.

“Sometimes…” Katsuki whispered quietly. “Sometimes, when you are used to a certain type of treatment, you know it’s bad. But you don’t realize how bad it is until you’re away from it for a long time and you start to feel the change in your nervous system.”

Izuku furrowed his brow and slowly, his crying eased up. He looked at Katsuki’s raw, painful expression and his hands trembled.

“Th-That’s what happened with me and my mom when I moved out,” Katsuki confessed. “I always knew it was terrible while I was in it, but the second I moved out I realized just how much of it was wrong. Like I thought maybe fifty percent of her actions were horrible but when we separated, it went up to eighty. Things I accepted as regular every day occurrences, were actually really fuckin’ bad.”

Izuku listened carefully.

“After I moved out, I started feeling this hardened rock in my throat any time I was around her again,” Katsuki said, and his eyes grew glossy. “That never happened before, y’know? Then shortly after I started having visceral reactions to small things like the smell of rotten food. Even the idea of people paying their bills late pissed me off. I began to be so damn irritable when any of my clothes gained a hole and I got this weird need to shower three times a day."

When explained this way, Izuku understood what Katsuki was getting at. He thought about everything Katsuki told him in comparison to what he was saying were triggers for him. Izuku knew triggers existed, but he didn't think about the fact that he could have them as an adult.

He was a viper after all—he wasn't supposed to be affected by such things.

"A reaction like this is normal when you've adjusted to…not being around who is hurting you," Katsuki concluded. He held on to Izuku's hands tighter. "Your body is trying to protect you from experiencing that pain again when you react to things associated with that person. It's warning you."

Izuku swallowed thickly.

His body was warning him against Tomura?

A long, uncomfortable stretch of silence passed. Izuku hung his head, lost in his thoughts while also too afraid to let go of Katsuki's hands. They sat there for a while before Katsuki pulled his attention again.

"Do…Do you want to talk about it?" Katsuki asked gently. "I try my best to not push you, and I want you to open up at your own speed about what you went through. But Izuku, this is really fucking serious. It would be good to confide in someone. To…confide in me. I want to be here for you."

Every lick of his upbringing was snapped into place at the thought of telling Katsuki everything.

He wanted to say yes and open up to Katsuki the same way Katsuki had done for him—but something deeply ingrained in him prevented that from happening. Like a swift hammer raining down on a nail, everything he wanted to say stayed pinned in place.

He glanced up from under his bangs. There, he saw the deflated way Katsuki's shoulders sagged at the lack of response.

It hurt him.

Izuku tried to find a sliver of confidence to speak about one thing. The most important thing he wanted to share with Katsuki.

"My…brother," Izuku said and pushed through the heaviness of his tongue. "His name is Tomura."

His heart was hammering and Katsuki perked up. He leaned in, listening intently.

"He…was in charge of me growing up," Izuku whispered. "If I messed up something, he would be the one to decide how I would be punished. Sometimes it would be quick punches to the face, or slaps. Oftentimes he gave me the cold shoulder and refused to acknowledge me for days. But if I messed up badly by his standards, he usually chose the belt to punish me."

Izuku looked down at his shaking hands as it became difficult to speak.

"I would…" he whispered. "…I would have to kneel down with my shirt off and he would strike me on my head, shoulders, arms, and back over and over. My punishments were always…hours. And if I cried, he added on more time."

Katsuki's face twisted with mortification. His eyes went wide and he looked sick to his stomach.

"Izuku," Katsuki whispered his name like he was reading it on a grave. "You—You don't still go through that, do you?"

Izuku shook his head.

"But does he still hurt you in other ways?" Katsuki pressed on.

Izuku grew stiff and lost his ability to speak once more. His eyes darted all around when he realized how deeply their upbringing drilled obedience inside of them. But he didn't want to hurt Katsuki by shutting him out.

He nodded the best he could as an answer.

Katsuki worked his jaw. His eyes were caught between horror, fear, and anger. The three emotions mixed like a dangerous concoction ready to explode and Katsuki seemed like he was about to boil over any minute now.

Izuku felt so ashamed for the drama he caused, and he wanted to continue telling Katsuki how sorry he was. But before he could, Katsuki pulled him into another embrace.

This one was full of protectiveness, and Izuku closed his eyes to let himself be held as he came down from his stressful state.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Somewhere along the line, Izuku fell asleep. All he remembered was crying and feeling like Katsuki's arms were the only safety shield he had against reality.

When he woke up, it was the dead of night. He turned to see Katsuki was not in bed with him, instead he was crouched down at the bottom of the closet. Izuku squinted in the dark room and was able to make out Katsuki holding a small, cardboard box. With a level of anger, Katsuki was huffing and dumping something inside at rapid speed.

Izuku craned his neck and his eyes widened when he saw what was sitting inside the box.

Belts.

Izuku pressed his lips in a thin line. "You don't have to do that, Kacchan."

Katsuki paused and peered over his shoulder to Izuku. His eyes were an agitated red and his brows were pulled down displaying how pissed off he was.

“It’s fine,” Katsuki replied curtly, leaving no room for argument. “Don’t worry about it. Go back to sleep.”

Katsuki wordlessly put the last belt in the box and tightly packaged it up. He lifted himself up from his crouched position and gave Izuku a stern stare. Izuku wanted to protest, but the sharpness of Katsuki’s eyes were burning with resolve and he knew there would be no arguing.

Katsuki walked out of the room with the box to somewhere unknown.

Izuku never saw another belt in the house after that.

When the morning came, Izuku felt like he was wearing a cloak of shame.

He hadn’t meant for his emotions to cause such a dramatic scene. It made him feel oddly bare, being laid out like that and having such a strong defect highlighted. He felt weak. He felt vulnerable. And he hated feeling like either of those things. All his life, he worked hard to go against his emotions in order to protect himself. Because every time they slipped through, something bad happened—and the outcome was never good.

And Izuku didn’t want Katsuki to feel burdened in the same way Tomura always was.

They didn’t speak much, and Izuku could practically see gears turning in Katsuki’s head. His husband was always a man of little words, but he made up for it in the confidence of his actions.

Izuku silently sat at the kitchen table as Katsuki prepped breakfast. When he put the plate in front of Izuku, Izuku couldn’t help but crack a small smile. It was his favorite breakfast dishes: Tamagoyaki, pickled cabbage, and grilled salmon.

Katsuki sat down and poured a cup of coffee for them both.

After they finished eating, Katsuki finally spoke up.

“You know we have to talk about what happened last night, right?” Katsuki said firmly. “I don’t believe in avoiding serious shit like that.”

Izuku licked his lips. Of course, Katsuki faced everything head on in life. He was always the chaser while Izuku was the runner.

“Ri-Right.” Izuku sucked in a deep breath and bowed his head. “Um. I’m really sorry about breaking down like that. It won’t happen again.”

Katsuki scoffed immediately and shook his head. “That’s not what I meant at all. Were you feeling uncomfortable about the belt from the start, like from the second I proposed the idea?”

“I was,” Izuku admitted honestly and averted his eyes. “But you seemed so excited to try. I figured it…it would be something worth doing if it was what you wanted to do.”

“But what about what you wanted? Why didn’t you speak up sooner?”

“I—I didn’t consider that as an option. I don’t usually…have a choice in saying no to things so speaking up doesn’t come naturally to me.”

Katsuki frowned so deeply he probably gained a new facial wrinkle.

A trickle of silence found its way between them as Katsuki probed his tongue into his cheek.

Truthfully, Izuku hadn’t considered saying ‘no’ to anything in a long time. The very few times he voiced what he didn’t want, he was promptly run over. He found himself deeply hurt, or in a fist fight with Tomura, whenever he voiced his opinions, so he stopped being so opinionated. It was always easier to go with whatever was being asked of him.

“Izuku,” Katsuki whispered. He reached for his hand with a weary expression. “If there’s anything that makes you uncomfortable even in the fuckin’ slightest, you can speak up and tell me, okay? I won’t get mad. I won’t even be disappointed or frustrated.”

The concept was new.

Izuku stared at Katsuki waiting for the gotcha moment. There was always a fine print when it came to men, especially the powerful ones. However, several beats of silence passed and there was no catch.

“Your opinion matters to me,” Katsuki whispered. He caressed the top of Izuku’s hand and his expression melted to gentleness. “It matters a whole lot to me. As long as you’re around me, anything you want, we can do. And shit that you don’t want, we don’t have to. Okay?”

Izuku’s heart was directly hit and he unwillingly shed tears. Katsuki held his hand tighter and scooted in closer to wipe the onslaught of sadness away.

As he silently cried, Izuku had no clue he was holding so much in.

It felt like he was truly living in a fantasy at that thought. Between Tomura and his viper family, there was no room for his wants or needs. He’d only been able to harness his new found bravery in the name of Katsuma and the other kids back home.

Izuku realized then if the new cohort never came along, he might not have ever defied Tomura. He wouldn’t have bravely asked for the Okinawa mission, and he wouldn’t have found the courage to ask Aoyama to tamper with his tracker. Izuku would have never reconnected with Kacchan because he would have never thought to take a stand for himself.

He always acted for the sake of others.

He looked at Katsuki and found himself inspired slightly. Katsuki was always brave, and he frequently put himself first in the grand scheme of things. He voiced what he wanted and barely backed down when he felt like he was in the right. Izuku thought Katsuki basked in a light of bravery that he always admired, and maybe, just maybe, Izuku could learn to bask in it too.

“Okay,” Izuku whispered, hands shaking at the thought. “B-But it might take me a minute to get used to voicing my opinions. I haven’t done much for myself. Being with you was the first choice I really ever made that would be considered slightly selfish.”

Katsuki beamed at Izuku’s willingness to try. He leaned in closely and offered up his signature lopsided smile. Izuku couldn’t help but return the gesture and he felt Katsuki begin to rub off on him.

“We can practice,” Katsuki reassured. “It’ll take time like you said, but we can start small and work our way up until you feel comfortable being more vocal about your wants and needs.”

“How would we start practicing?”

“Tell me something you don’t want. Right now. We can start small.”

This was a decent level of ridiculous. But Izuku wanted to follow Katsuki’s lead and learn how to grasp life by the wheels. He looked around the kitchen and found himself staring at the dark liquid in the mug on the table.

“I…I don’t want coffee,” Izuku confessed in a small voice. “I don’t like it.”

“Really?” Katsuki said, surprised.

“Y-Yeah. I only drank it because I was told caffeine will help keep me focused for missions. A-And you seemed to like it a lot once we got here so I kept drinking it whenever you offered it to me. But I prefer tea.”

Katsuki nodded with a grin and slid the cup of coffee away from Izuku. “You got it. You never have to drink a drop of coffee as long as I’m around.”

It was such a small thing, but Izuku was relieved. He smiled at his husband and his heart began to hammer out of control.

“Anything else you don’t want?” Katsuki asked.

“I—” Izuku licked his lips as he stared at Katsuki. He pondered a thought he was unsure he should follow, but the warmth of Katsuki’s hand guided him to speak what was on his mind. “I-I don’t want you to look at me differently because of this.”

Katsuki shook his head. “Of course I wouldn’t.”

“Then can we go back to the bedroom and…” He bit his lip and gave a shy squeeze of the hands. “I still want to, just not with a belt.”

Katsuki's face lit up and he nodded. He smoothly shifted into his bedroom eyes and leaned in to carefully lift Izuku's chin for a kiss.

"Of course," Katsuki whispered. "No extra shit today."

The moment they locked lips, Izuku sighed into the kiss and found himself overcome with shaky relief. Katsuki's tongue swiped at his bottom lip, asking for permission and Izuku gave it. Ounces of passion seeped through their skin and tethered them together in a delicate interwinding. Katsuki deepened the kiss, and Izuku immediately wrapped his arms around his husband's neck.

It took two seconds for Katsuki to gather Izuku in his arms and hoist him up.

They broke apart and both smiled as Katsuki began to walk them back to their bedroom.

Izuku blushed happily as he was laid down on their bed and Katsuki joined him. They both began to strip themselves naked and Izuku was overjoyed how nothing really changed. A simple boundary was set and he was content to know they would never have to cross that bridge again. As Izuku threw away the last of his clothing, he eagerly watched as Katsuki did the same.

Once they were both nude, their bodies melted against one another and Izuku enjoyed the familiar warmth it brought him. Instantly, a tantalizing rush took hold of him as Katsuki reached down and grabbed his erection. He moaned softly as Katsuki pumped him with one hand and reached for the half empty bottle of lube with the other.

Pleasure raked across his body as Katsuki's hand engulfed his half hardened cock and twisted at the tip. He spread his legs automatically at the sound of the tube uncapping. Katsuki squeezed it over him, and Izuku relished the tingle of the slickness dripping down on to his sensitive length. The erotic sensation spread in a chain reaction as it rolled up from his belly to his head.

Izuku searched for Katsuki's cock, and when he found it he began to stroke it in sync with how his husband was pleasuring him. Katsuki groaned and lathered a generous amount of lube all over his thick erection as well. They both pumped each other as they laid on the bed, staring into each other's eyes.

Izuku felt his toes curl as the pleasure began to build. He bit his lip as the intensity of Katsuki's gaze and stroking grew more passionate with every passing second. With a particular flick of the wrist, Katsuki made him twitch with intense arousal. Izuku shuddered on the bed as he arched his back and his mouth dropped open.

"What do you want?" Katsuki asked like he was starving. "Do you want to cum like this?"

"No." Izuku moaned and shook his head. "I-I want to cum with you inside of me."

Katsuki nodded eagerly. He quickly retreated his hand and a shaky breath slipped past Izuku's lips. Warm fingers slipped down Izuku's body to find their way at his backside. They probed politely and Izuku easily spread his legs as beads of sweat began to gather at his hairline. His hand that was gripped around his husband's cock switched to slow, sensual strokes as Katsuki rubbed two fingers to wet his entrance.

Katsuki pushed in easily. Izuku's hole was well used from the last three months, forming around Katsuki's fingers like they were meant to be there. This made Katsuki wickedly grin at how smoothly he was able to penetrate Izuku and dove straight for his prostate, pulling out a gasp.

"Your body is so well adjusted to me now," Katsuki complimented with a hint of hunger. He rubbed down on Izuku's sweet spot and kissed his forehead when Izuku gave a full body shudder. "This little hole of yours is a perfect fit now."

Izuku moaned loudly as his husband fucked his fingers in and out. His eyes fluttered closed as he was slowly teased and pushed into a drowning sea of rapture. With every push, ripples of pleasure charged through him. His nipples perked to life and all the nerve endings in his body jumped with euphoric electricity. Izuku's chest began to rise and fall like the growing tides as Katsuki fingered him at his leisure.

When Izuku opened his eyes again, Katsuki was staring at him, drinking in his erotic facial expressions.

The look in those eyes made Izuku surge forward and capture Katsuki's lips for a kiss. The sweetest of Katsuki's tongue brushed against his, making Izuku whine into their joined mouths.

They kept kissing, desperate for the other as Katsuki eased his wet fingers out. Izuku wrapped his arms around Katsuki at the same time Katsuki wrapped his arms around him. They broke apart and Izuku dragged his lips across Katsuki's jaw, nipping at his skin along the way.

As he worked, sucking and sinking his greedy teeth into his husband's neck, Katsuki flipped Izuku's body on top of his and made him straddle him.

Izuku froze and realized the position they were in was one they hadn't tried yet.

He pulled back and looked down at his husband who was underneath him. Absolute mischief was dancing in Katsuki's beautiful eyes as he flirtatiously wiggled his eyebrows. Izuku slid back a bit as he sat up, and Katsuki's thick cock slotted between his cheeks.

Izuku bit his lip as he looked down at Katsuki.

"I got you," Katsuki encouraged. "Pleasure yourself at your own pace."

Izuku blushed as he looked down at his husband's chest. From this angle he had the perfect view of Katsuki's earnings from his intensive workouts. Sweat was making his skin glisten as his silver chain stuck to his collarbone. It riled Izuku up a bit, seeing his husband laid out like this. But more so, he loved the feeling of Katsuki's hands planted directly on his waist, helping keep him steady.

Izuku splayed his shaky hands across Katsuki's chest, one on each pec and he slowly lifted his body the best he could with his cast. Katsuki helped him, lifting him high enough to press his wet tip against Izuku's backside.

Izuku bit his lip as he was lowered down gingerly. The slickness of his husband's cock stretched him all the way open and Izuku's breath hitched higher and higher with each inch that sank into him.

They both softly groaned when Katsuki was successfully inside.

Izuku steadied his breathing as he experimentally rolled his hips. It was a low grind, and it didn't quite hit his sweet spot right away the way Katsuki always knew how. Izuku shyly looked down at Katsuki who was watching him as if this was something straight out of his wildest dreams.

"Take it easy," Katsuki whispered. He lovingly drew hearts along Izuku's hip bone and slowly nodded. "There's no rush."

Izuku slowly nodded as well. His chest filled up with a warm sensation as he began to test out the feeling of riding Katsuki. He worked at various combinations of different speeds and angles. He felt embarrassed as he rocked his hips in all sorts of ways, and each time he found something almost right, Katsuki praised him.

It was a strange feeling being in control of the pace like this, but Izuku found he liked it. He gained another wave of courage and slowly lifted himself up high and then slid back down.

The throaty groan he elicited from Katsuki was down right erotic.

Izuku wanted more of it so he did the same motion again. As a reward, he got the same reaction. Egged on by Katsuki's raspy voice, Izuku began to bounce lightly, fucking himself on his husband's cock. He slowly found the rhythm that worked and Katsuki smirked up at him with full lust blown eyes.

"There you go," Katsuki groaned, hitting the lowest part of his vocal cords.

Izuku's heart swelled at the validation and he tried to go faster. In the process he angled himself by accident—and when he landed down, Izuku cried out loud as the tip of Katsuki's length struck directly against his prostate.

Izuku's breathing staggered at how good it felt in this position. He angled himself just right and he did it again, and again, and again until he was greedily bouncing up and down on Katsuki. Katsuki's groans mixed with Izuku's moans as they found their rhythm and bliss took over both their faces.

Izuku's head of curls beautifully moved with his motions as he rode Katsuki eagerly. It felt so good Izuku hadn't a clue that they were missing out on this. Every impale was punctuated with an addictive wave of pleasure as Izuku struck that spot inside of him over and over. He wanted more and lost himself to controlling his own pleasure.

“Darling,” Katsuki moaned and Izuku tingled at the pet name. “You look downright sinful from this view.”

Izuku shivered at the praise and his body tightened. Katsuki’s toes curled at the action and he bit his lip seductively.

“You like it when I praise you, huh?” Katsuki asked through his panting.

“Ye-Yeah.” Izuku nodded bashfully, and ground down.

“God you feel so tight, darling,” Katsuki drawled out. Izuku’s breath hitched at the words. “You’re so so amazing at riding my cock.”

Izuku rocked his hips faster as the words slid down his body like viscous honey.

“You’re going to make me cum like this,” Katsuki continued to praise. “Keep going. Pleasure yourself on me the way you want it. I’m loving this so damn much.”

The large hands on his hips were sinking in so deeply helping Izuku fuck himself senseless and Izuku never felt so wonderfully in control of his body before. He cried out loudly as he reached new highs and below him Katsuki stared up at him like he was witnessing something beautiful.

“Whose cock is it, darling?” Katsuki asked through his groans.

“Y-Yours, Kacchan!”

Katsuki shook his head and slammed his hips upwards, shocking Izuku with the force. He ground upwards into Izuku and the sensation filled Izuku’s body with so much crazed pleasure he rolled his eyes back.

“Wrong,” Katsuki corrected through a fierce hiss.

He thrusted into Izuku again, drawing out a beautiful moan. He took one of Izuku’s hands and guided him to touch where their bodies were joined. Izuku bit his lip at the wetness and how far stretched he was.

“This cock buried inside of you right here, is yours.”

Izuku furrowed his brow. “Mine?”

Katsuki rocked their bodies, and they both gently moaned. “Yes. Yours. Try saying it.”

“It-It’s mine,” Izuku moaned as he presumed to bounce again. He struck his pleasure button and his toes curled at the thought. “This cock is mine.”

Katsuki smirked and nodded. He bit his lip as Izuku picked up speed again and began to fill their bodies with tantalizing ripples of pleasure. The sound of slapping flesh echoed throughout their bedroom as Katsuki held on tightly to his husband who was losing himself to the feeling.

“Exactly,” Katsuki agreed. He took Izuku’s hand, guided it to touch himself, and groaned at the way Izuku immediately began to stroke his own length. “This cock is yours. And you know what you can do when your husband’s cock is fucking this sweet ass of yours?” He began to meet Izuku’s rhythm, doubling their euphoria and Izuku’s core tightened with heat. “You can tell me to go faster, slower, harder—anything your beautiful ass wants.”

They held deep, burning eye contact as Katsuki said this and it lit everything in Izuku on fire. He moaned loudly and fucked himself with fever on the thick length. The tantalizing excitement echoed through his limbs and Izuku wanted more so badly.

Izuku screwed his eyes shut and shyly commanded, “F-fuck me harder.”

Katsuki began to fuck him harder.

“D-Deeper!” Izuku instructed and Katsuki did just that.

Izuku was vehemently rocked on top of Katsuki and his eyes were nearly crossing as he was over stimulated. One large, powerful thrust moved his whole body. He gasped as his free hand lost balance and shot forward for purchase. He grabbed Katsuki’s silver chain and tugged it by accident but decided he liked the feeling. He tugged it again, and found it made Katsuki rock deeper. So he did it again and again and again.

Katsuki groaned as Izuku stayed in control of his chain as he rode him without shame.

From his fingers to his toes, Izuku was radiating searing heat all over as his prostate was milked. He stroked his cock faster as he bounced vigorously, climbing to his peak. His moans built on top of each other as he squeezed the base of his cock at the same time he tightened his hole around Katsuki. He felt himself nearing his orgasm and looked down at his husband.

Izuku brazenly tugged Katsuki’s chain. “Open your mouth.”

Katsuki did exactly that while holding eye contact and the sight sent Izuku over the edge.

His orgasm hit him like a tsunami and drowned him down in pleasure. He impaled himself one last, powerful time and it pushed out a loud moan from the back of his throat. Izuku screwed his eyes shut as he arched his back and came. His cock pulsed and ribbons of cum shot out to spray across Katsuki’s chiseled chest, chin, and some of it landed directly in his mouth.

Katsuki fiendishly grinned and swallowed Izuku’s cum. He shot his tongue out to lick up the warm liquid that landed on his lips. He buried himself deep, and unleashed his own cum into Izuku’s tight, welcoming body. Katsuki closed his eyes in beautiful rapture as his orgasm pulled through his bones.

Izuku watched, soaking in every detail. He knew there would be bruises on his hips tomorrow, and he eagerly wanted more. The seeping warmness of Katsuki’s cum filled him slowly, like a rising sun. He loved it, and he adored how it made him feel so full and appreciated.

Izuku limped forward and he put his head on top of Katsuki's chest. They both breathed heavily as Katsuki wrapped his arms around him. The cock inside of him slipped out with a slick pop and they both laughed lightly.

"Did you like that?" Katsuki asked, entirely out of breath.

Izuku nodded tiredly. "I did. I really liked that."

"Perfect. What do you want to do next, darling?" Katsuki kissed the top of his head. "I know you still have a couple rounds in you."

Izuku leaned back and gazed down at his husband lustfully.

"Can we do doggy next? I-I really like when we do that and you do, y'know, smack my backside hard." Izuku whispered the last part.

Katsuki laughed lightly. "We absolutely can do that."

Katsuki leaned in and gave him a quick kiss on the lips and placed a hand on his thigh. By accident, his fingers brushed against the sensitive area of Izuku's inner leg and Izuku giggled. Katsuki grinned at the lighthearted action and brushed his finger against the spot again, and Izuku let out another stifled chuckle.

"All playfulness aside, do you like it when I touch you here?" Katsuki asked carefully.

Izuku nodded happily. "I do."

"Okay." Katsuki kissed him again. "Just double checking. Still can't get over how you have such a sensitive spot on your already sensitive body. So damn cute."

Izuku laughed as Katsuki continued to toy with that part of his thigh. They melted into each other easily and Izuku appreciated how safe he felt.

"Thank you, Kacchan," Izuku said earnestly. "For everything. Thank you for listening and helping me to try to feel confident."

"You don't have to thank me," Katsuki replied. "If we have to go our separate ways after this, I want you to leave with feeling like what you feel and say matters. Because it does."

It didn't slip by Izuku how Katsuki used the word 'if'. It hung in the air the same way 'forever' did and they both assessed the other one carefully. He hadn't outright said it, but Izuku knew Katsuki was carefully tempting him into staying. He had successfully tempted him into several things now, and this would be the final nail in the coffin.

As Izuku thought about everything that transpired the last twenty four hours, Izuku was considering staying now. Heavily.

Maybe after he got the kids out, he could actually find a life of grace with Katsuki.

ɯɯɯ

The rest of the day consisted of doing things Izuku wanted to do and Katsuki happily obliged.

There even was a ridiculous part where Katsuki made him sit down and practice saying ‘no’ in various forms. Some of Katsuki’s favorite ways to say no were “fuck off” and “kiss my pale ass” but Izuku wasn’t sure he would take that approach quite yet. He settled for the more polite ways to get his point across.

By the time the night sky was full of stars, Izuku felt slightly more reassured in how to be more straightforward. Katsuki told him it was okay to be selfish, and if he felt like something was right he should blaze forward with all his might. He shouldn’t compromise and never allow himself to be shrunken down for the sake of others who want to dim his light.

It was all good advice, and Izuku felt confident in what he wanted now. Because after today, the one thing he wanted for himself was to find a way to keep Katsuki in his life.

He didn’t want to part ways.

Katsuki gave him his courage today, but he also gave him something else.

Izuku probed the sensitive area on his leg. Tingles raced down to his toes.

Izuku peaked over to make sure Katsuki was fast asleep. His husband was sprawled out on the bed, frowning in his dreams. The second Izuku saw the forehead crease between Katsuki’s eyes set in place, he knew Katsuki wouldn’t wake up unless shaken.

Izuku quietly rose up, and limped himself to his duffle bag. He pulled out his fang shaped blade, and the tiny locket he purchased for Katsuma then limped towards the bathroom.

Once inside, he locked the door and sat down on the closed lid of the toilet. He wriggled out of his pajama pants to expose his inner thigh. He touched it exactly like Katsuki has done so many times already. He sucked in a deep breath when his skin tickled.

Izuku pressed his fingers in deeper and held back from laughing out of joy and frustration.

Katsuki pinpointed his tracker.

Izuku thought about what Katsuki said about taking control. Somehow down the line, Katsuki pointed him directly to the path that he needed to truly do exactly that.

He leaned over to the sink and opened the bottom drawer. With shaky hands, Izuku gripped the first-aid kit and popped it open. He placed down the locket and took the bandaging out. He wrapped it around his upper thigh and tied the knot solidly until he felt his blood flow cut off.

He set down a towel underneath him and neatly placed out everything he needed. Needle. Vinyl stitches. Antiseptic. He took off one of his socks and placed it in his mouth as a gag.

Izuku held up his blade and unsheathed it slowly.

He swallowed in anticipation at what he was about to do. He closed his eyes and waited until he felt a numbness in his leg. As he did this, he imagined a life with Katsuki still in it. Beautiful red eyes and blond hair would still be a part of his wretched existence after everything was said and done if he played this correctly.

Without the tracker directly in his body, he could leave it somewhere and freely move about.

Even better, he could easily slip past viper security and no one would be able to tell he was delivering the kids back to their parents if he could manipulate the location of his signal. He could warn the families ahead of time to get far away and potentially change their names. He could then slide back to the academy like he had no idea what happened and maybe even visit Katsuki on weekends.

As defiance pulsed through Izuku's veins, the ghost of Hiryu appeared for the first time in months. Izuku nearly forgot about his haunting, and the shadow of his dead brother lurked in the corner curiously, watching him with those blackened eyes.

"Tomura was wrong when he said you were his mini me," Hiryu's ghost quipped. "It looks like you're mine."

Izuku hesitated slightly, remembering how Hiryu's fate ended. But then he shook it off as he thought about both Katsuma and Katsuki. He wanted a better life for not only Katsuma now, but himself too. He tested the numbness of his leg and it felt like pricking needles.

Perfect.

He bit down hard on the sock in his mouth and he fought against all his instincts. With one hand he gripped the area of flesh and with the other he pressed the tip of his blade to the center of the sensitive spot.

With every inch of courage he possessed, Izuku sunk it in.

He cried in pain into the sock as his mouth watered in agony. He dug the blade slowly into himself and blood dripped down onto the towel on the floor like a slow metronome.

Izuku screwed his eyes shut and pushed through with the help of imagining a future with Katsuki. He saw his husband's lopsided smirk and how he would gently call him 'darling'. He saw them dancing together and playing violin music. He felt the loving caress of Katsuki's hands against his skin and heard his voice encourage him.

When the tip of his blade connected with something metal Izuku's heart stopped.

He pulled out the blade, and grappled quickly for the tweezers. He dug them in surgically, hissing at the terrible feeling of being pried open. He slowly poked for the tracker, and when he found it, ripples of pain shot across his nerves. Izuku's breathing drew close to hyperventilating when he gave a brutal tug.

Out came the tiny chip covered in blood.

Izuku held it up to his eyes and slowly began to laugh through his tears.

How small was the thing that stole both his and Hiryu's freedom.

Izuku trembled as he placed down the tracker onto the towel below. He carefully tended to his wound and wiped it clean. He hissed at the horrible sting of antiseptic and gritted through the pain of self inserted sutures. He cut the thread and bandaged up his wound with tender care.

After he cleaned up the scene he locked the tracker into the tiny locket.

Izuku's chest was pounding. His vision slightly swayed as he held up the bracelet to the light. It shone like it was freedom embodied, capturing the tempting glitter of free will that it promised. Izuku smiled half way as he thought about a future that allowed him more wiggle room.

Off on the corner, Hiryu's spirit lightened up. His forgotten brother smiled at him, and disappeared.

Izuku did it. He removed his tracker in tack.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The next day Izuku stashed the locket in his bag. He buried it deep so there was no room for it to be tampered with.

When Katsuki eventually noticed the bloodied bandage around his leg, he was rightfully alarmed. Izuku wrote off his injury to him slipping and falling in the kitchen by accident in the middle of the night. He explained that he'd been trying to chop up some leftovers, and his knee gave out suddenly and made him topple over.

Katsuki was mortified. He fawned over Izuku like he nearly died and tried to inspect the wound, but Izuku brushed him off. Izuku quietly deflected and told him he would be okay, and he didn't want Katsuki to worry about something as small as a cut.

Katsuki seemed to only half believe this, but he didn't want to push Izuku it seemed like.

Over the next week, Katsuki was gracefully kind with him. Izuku found himself feeling more emboldened as the days went by. He was happy a trait of Katsuki was rubbing off on him in what he felt like was a positive manner.

It was now a sunny, fall day. He was patiently sitting in the kitchen as he waited for Katsuki. He'd been told to sit still and wait for his husband to join him—but he was taking forever.

"Kacchan?" Izuku called out impatiently when he heard some rustling. "What are you doing back there?"

"Just sit tight will ya," Katsuki grumbled. "I'll be out in a minute!"

Izuku sighed and shook his head. Katsuki was acting weird all day. First, he left the estate without telling Izuku and next he came back and acted like Izuku couldn't see what was inside the bags and boxes. He supposed this is what he got for being secretive about his injury.

Then suddenly Katsuki rounded the corner.

Izuku's eyes went wide.

His husband walked into the kitchen extremely slowly, balancing a cake in his hands.

"Happy birthday, you fucking nerd," Katsuki announced with a lopsided smirk.

Izuku's jaw dropped.

Staring back at him was a three-tier vanilla cake with strawberries and chocolate drizzled along the sides. The various layers had different types of cookie crumbles spread across the tops and the sweet smell wafting off of it watered Izuku's mouth.

Katsuki carefully placed it down on the table and Izuku's heart stopped at the words 'Happy birthday, Izuku!' that was written across it in icing.

"B-Birthday?" Izuku parroted. His nose scrunched and his hands curled into himself wondering if Katsuki forgot exactly when his birthday was. "Kacchan, it's November. My birthday is in July."

Katsuki chuckled and ignored the comment. Then he quickly reached behind him and exposed the bright green sash that read 'Happy Birth!' in big, white lettering.

"Yeah, yeah, I know when your damn birthday is," Katsuki quipped. "In case you forgot, we have celebrated it before, and I have a decent memory sometimes." He pulled the sash over Izuku's head, and Izuku couldn't believe what was happening. "Now we get to have a second celebration together."

Izuku's eyes repeatedly darted between Katsuki, the cake, and the sash.

"B-But why?" Izuku questioned, unsure. His heart began to clutch because Katsuki's kindness kept compiling. "I don't really understand why you're—wh-why you're doing all of this suddenly."

"Because on your bucket list you wrote 'have a birthday party'," Katsuki reminded him. He took out a single candle from his pocket and a lighter. He lifted up the two items before sticking the candle on top of the cake. "I know it's not the right day, but I figured this is the least I can do to make up for Tokyo. It was the last thing on your bucket list. We officially completed it."

Katsuki lit the candle.

Tears welled up in Izuku's eyes. They completed the list of everything he wanted to do as a married couple. Somehow, Katsuki made sure to give Izuku everything he wanted, and taught him how to speak up for himself in the process.

Katsuki turned to Izuku, and his grin was wiped off his face.

“What are you crying for?” Katsuki asked as gently as he could. He sat down quickly and looked at Izuku. “Is this too much?”

“Sorry,” Izuku sobbed slightly, he didn’t even realize he began to cry. He pressed his palms into his eyes and shook his head. “I-I’m sorry I didn’t mean to cry. I-I love everything.” Izuku removed his hands and stared at Katsuki once more. Emotion overcame him as he saw everything he ever wanted laying in front of him. “You got the cake I like, the sash, a-and—” Izuku hiccuped lightly. He wiped away more tears furiously. “You got me everything I-I put on my dumb list.”

Katsuki grabbed Izuku’s hands. “Of course I did. Now, blow out your candle and make a wish—that is, if you have one. Do you have something to wish for this time around?” Katsuki asked.

Izuku’s smile was fragile, threatening to fall and shatter. “I do have a wish this time.”

Izuku turned to the candle and he watched the flame dance under his gaze. He smiled as he saw the one person he wanted most in the world smile back at him. Izuku closed his eyes and made his wish.

I wish to stay this happy and remain with Kacchan the rest of my life.

Izuku breathed in and blew out the candle full of hope.

Katsuki smiled, clapped lightly, and cheered. He gave deep howls like he was Izuku’s biggest fan and successfully made Izuku laugh with a blush. They cut the cake together, and Katsuki made sure to give Izuku the biggest piece he could possibly eat in one sitting. Katsuki hurried to play upbeat music in the background and two tiny birds chirped from the windowsill.

As they laughed and ate cake, Katsuki perked up with a large smile.

“Hold still, I’ll be right back,” Katsuki quickly said.

He ran into their bedroom and returned with a giant box that was wrapped in royal blue paper. There was a large red bow on the top and Izuku’s heart leaped out of his chest at the sight of a small tag that read ‘For: Bakugou Izuku.’

Izuku clasped his hands together and teamed with excitement.

Katsuki handed the box to Izuku, and said, “For my darling husband.”

Izuku smiled happily and ripped open the box. When he dug his fingers into the wrapping paper he gasped in surprise at the sight of one of his favorite things.

“Books?” Izuku exclaimed happily. He held up one and immediately blushed at the sight of the cover. “Oh! Romance books!”

“Yup. By the same author of that really old one you carry around,” Katsuki pointed out. He proudly leaned back as Izuku’s eyes sparked to life. “Turns out they have a lot of new series out. I figured you’ve been too busy to ever look into their newer stories, but I got you all the recent ones so you can have a big ol’ nerdy field day.”

Izuku smiled until his cheeks hurt.

“This is exactly what I wanted,” Izuku said honestly. “Thank you so much, Kacchan. Ah, I can’t wait to read these. I-Is it okay if I look through a couple of them now? Just too skim!”

“Go crazy, darling,” Katsuki encouraged.

Izuku squealed slightly and began thumbing through all the fresh pages.

As he did this, Izuku couldn’t contain his excitement. He started looking at the dictation and found that the author changed the way they used similes and Izuku was so stoked to read how much they’d grown as a writer.

Katsuki watched him and tilted his head.

“What about these plots do you like so much?” Katsuki asked innocently.

Izuku bashfully scratched his cheek. “Ah, it’s a bit much to explain, there’s a lot going on.”

“Explain away. I’m all ears.”

So Izuku did. He happily started talking about the plot to his lover and found Katsuki was hanging on his every word. The intense way Katsuki was listening to him was something Izuku never experienced before. Usually he kept to himself about his interests, shamed at how much he loved the things that brought him joy. But of course, Katsuki made him feel safe enough to be himself fully.

Katsuki propped his chin on his fist as he leaned in closely.

Izuku’s heart fluttered at the sight. When he was about half way done explaining the plot of the two star crossed lovers, Katsuki sat up straight and cleared his throat.

“Izuku,” Katsuki interrupted. “In your romance books, how did the characters know they were in love?”

“Ah, it happens gradually,” Izuku answered easily. He drew invisible circles on the table as he smiled happily. For once he was able to share his hobby without ridicule. “There’s never a moment where the character declares they start loving the other person. They slowly start to realize little things or cues as they fall progressively in love.”

“Tell me. What are the cues?”

“How come?” Izuku questioned innocently. “Are you interested in the books now too?”

“Something like that,” Katsuki said. He leaned in close to Izuku and gave him his full attention. “Maybe I was wrong about romance being bullshit and all. The bit of the book I did read was really great and we had a lot of fun afterward, hm? Maybe I need to be more open minded.”

Izuku grinned wide, and his eyes filled with admiration.

He and Katsuki were really fated, weren’t they? He was teaching Katsuki how to be romantic and Katsuki was teaching him how to be brave. They fit together so well, and Izuku could only imagine what more they could learn from each other in the future.

Their future.

His heart simmered with the affection he carried for Katsuki, and he soon was explaining how he knew he was in love. Not anything to do with his books.

“Well, usually the first sign is their heart speeds up around the other person,” Izuku said tenderly as he thought about the way he always felt his ribcage rattle at the sight of Katsuki. “Then they look at the person in a new light. Almost like viewing them for the first time and how they can fit in their life in ways they didn’t consider before.”

Izuku thought about their new future together that was right around the horizon.

“And when they touch, they don’t want to let go of them.” He caressed Katsuki’s hand. “Then finally, they can’t imagine their life without them.”

It was all true, and exactly how he knew he was in love with Katsuki.

Katsuki nodded and smiled. “Thank you. That was helpful.”

“Of course!” Izuku giggled. He hugged one of his books as he thought about sharing more with his husband. “If you want to talk more about the books, let me know. Maybe we can even read them together. You have a great read out loud voice.”

“I might take you up on that offer, darling.”

Katsuki smiled and so did Izuku.

Izuku eventually began reading the start of a book. The day continued and they moved from the kitchen to the den. Izuku laid comfortably in his lap and Katsuki held him close the whole time. They draped a fluffy blanket over their bodies to counter the autumn chill in the air.

Katsuki casually watched TV as Izuku read in his arms.

As he was deep into chapter five of the new series, Katsuki randomly cleared his throat and reached out to take one of his hands. Izuku paused his reading and looked up at his husband, who was blushing deeper than he ever had before.

Izuku was about to ask him what was wrong, but before he could, an abrupt banging on their door occurred.

Both Izuku and Katsuki's heads whipped at the sudden sound and the banging grew louder and louder until it nearly sounded like the door cracked under pressure.

"Bakugou!" A loud voice Izuku had never heard before ripped through the air. "Bakugou, I saw your stupid ass hair's silhouette in the window. Open up, otherwise we're kicking this door down!"

Alarm immediately surged through Izuku. It sounded like whoever this was intended on killing Katsuki.

"Shit," Katsuki hissed. "Shit. Shit. Shit."

He scrambled upright and Izuku did too. Izuku stared at Katsuki confused, searching for an answer to what was happening but Katsuki didn't say a word as he frantically looked around the den. Did Katsuki make an enemy somewhere in his career that would've tracked him down? It would make sense—

"I know you hear me!" The voice yelled again, a lot shriller. "You're going to open up on the count of ten and I am dragging you back to HQ if it's the last thing I do. I am tired of cleaning up your mess!"

HQ? Izuku paused. This was someone Katsuki knew.

"Who is that?" Izuku harshly whispered.

"It's my fucking coworker," Katsuki groaned.

Izuku's mouth dropped in confusion. Why on earth was Katsuki's coworker banging down his door like he had no manners? Then suddenly the force of the banging grew more violent and Izuku was taken aback at the way the door nearly bent under the sheer force.

"One," The man started counting. "Two—"

Katsuki shot up, grabbed Izuku and hoisted him in his arms. Izuku gasped in shock as he dropped his book and was hurried out of the living room at record speed.

"What are you doing?!" Izuku yelped.

"Hiding you," Katsuki answered hastily.

"Hiding me? Why are you hiding me?" Izuku questioned.

Katsuki skidded around the corner quickly and darted straight for the bedroom. Izuku further sank into confusion as he looked around.

Katsuki stopped in front of the closet and swiftly opened the door with his foot.

“Because—”

“—Five!” Katsuki’s co-worker yelled impatiently. “Six!”

“Fuck,” Katsuki groaned and he swiftly put Izuku in the closet out of sight.

He scattered and grabbed two fists full of clothes off their hangers. He rapidly tossed them on top of Izuku in a poor attempt to conceal him and Izuku burned with unease. Would it be that big of a deal if they were seen together?

“I’ll explain later once I get them to go away,” Katsuki said as he plopped one more pile of clothes on Izuku. “Stay here and don’t let them see you under any circumstance, okay?”

Izuku had a sock on top of his head, staring at his husband like he was crazy. “I can’t meet your coworkers?”

“—Eight!” The coworker called again. “You’re about to have to replace your door, Bakugou!”

Katsuki made a pained face. “No, you can’t meet this one. He isn’t exactly friendly.”

“Nine!” The coworker’s voice was close to a pitch that could break glass.

At that tone, Izuku decided not to take it personally. Maybe whoever this was he didn’t want to meet anyways. What kind of person kicked down their colleagues door? Izuku nodded quickly and fell in line. He grabbed a bunch of sweaters off their hangers and began piling them on himself until he was fully invisible to the untrained eye.

Once Izuku was simply a pile of sloppily organized clothes, Katsuki slammed the closet door and hauled off.

Izuku sat in the darkness underneath all the dusty clothes as stiff as he could.

“Ten!” The coworker screamed.

Suddenly quietness filled the air.

Izuku could hear three distinct voices, one of them being Katsuki’s but he could barely make out the muffled words. He sat hidden in the dark, feeling oddly ashamed. As time passed, Izuku wondered how long this would take. Minutes? Hours?

Suddenly, a tickle brushed at his nose. Izuku wiggled his face and tried to push down the rising feeling of a sneeze. But the dust that was collected in the closet began forming together and filled into his airways. Izuku wanted to curse. Katsuki hadn’t done a very good job at cleaning out the closet it seemed like.

Izuku quickly put his hands over his mouth and nose and tried his best to stifle a tiny sneeze.

He froze and held his breath. It was barely audible and he hoped that no one would have heard that.

But of course, fate had her plans. Izuku screwed his eyes shut when he heard an unfamiliar set of footsteps creep into the bedroom. These were not Katsuki's footsteps. His lover had a confident stride and every time his shoe hit the ground, it was like he knew where he was going. These footsteps snuck into the room like they were trying to find something.

Quickly, Izuku's worst nightmare came true when the closet door slammed open. He stayed unbearably still as nothing happened. Then a hand rested on top of his covered head and peeled away the layer of clothes.

Immediately Izuku came face to face with a blond man with periwinkle eyes.

Izuku gave a sheepish, friendly wave at being caught. "Hello."

Quickly the stranger's face twisted with murderous intent.

"You," The man growled.

The hairs on Izuku's hair stood up and he quickly switched gears into his viper mode. He tried to ask for the man to wait but it was no use. A hand shot out and roughly grabbed him by his hair. Izuku yelled in surprise when he was dragged out of the closet and a swift uppercut connected with his jaw.

Pain blistered in his mouth with the taste of iron.

Izuku's eyes widened at the attack—Katsuki was right. This guy was not friendly.

Izuku rebounded and twisted the best he could out of the grasp with his disadvantage. He staggered as more vicious blows rained down on him and Izuku began fighting right back. They grappled at each other in a tussle of powerful punches and swift kicks. His world tipped on its side when he was suddenly thrown across the room into the dresser.

Izuku cried out as his spine bursted with sharp pain.

The furious blond charged at him and Izuku dodged, ducking under the man's arms. Izuku went on the defensive and quickly jabbed at the man's pressure points. He watched as the left side of the man's body seized up tightly and used the opportunity to slam his elbow into the side of his head.

Izuku moved to do the same to the right side of his body, but staggered as he tripped over his own cast.

Due to his disadvantage, the stranger recovered, and Izuku yelped as he was tackled out of the bedroom into the hallway.

Izuku's world flipped when he was whirled around like a frisbee and hurled to the ground with enormous strength. He slid on the newly polished floors, and cried out as his ankle cracked upon impact.

White spots danced across his vision.

Everything was happening too quickly. Izuku could barely grasp it. Why was this guy attacking him so intently inside of Katsuki's home? What did he do to him? Izuku winced as pain crackled through his body. He heard the cocking of a gun and whipped his head to see the man was wasting no time and aimed the barrel directly at him.

Izuku scrambled and rolled across the floor to dodge two swift bullets.

When Izuku stopped his motions he suddenly could see Katsuki staring wide eyed in horror at the scene. Next to him, there was a purple haired man gazing down at him with the same murderous contempt as the other stranger. The second man drew his gun, pointing it at Izuku. Izuku scrambled backwards, eyes wide and heart pounding. His leg throbbed all the way through and within two seconds, the blond man placed his gun directly on his forehead.

Izuku's eyes widened in fear.

Suddenly, a blur of Katsuki bum rushed the man about to kill him. Izuku flinched as Katsuki elbowed the man in the face and blood sprayed everywhere. Everyone in the room froze, and their eyes went wide.

The bullets meant for Izuku's skull whizzed past him and sank into the couch instead.

The blond man groaned in pain as his head was snapped backwards by the inordinate force used. The dark crimson liquid dripped from his nose, but that didn't stop Katsuki as he promptly disarmed the man and kicked him backwards on the ground.

Katsuki took the gun in his own hands and pointed it directly at the purple haired man as he stood between Izuku and the line of fire.

Both strangers stared at Katsuki in horror.

"What are you doing, Bakugou?!" The blond stranger yelled furiously. He cupped his now broken nose, attempting to halt the profuse bleeding. "I found him hiding in your closet—"

"—And what were you doing in my goddamn bedroom?" Katsuki snapped. He walked backwards, stationing his body directly in front of Izuku on the ground. He didn't take his sight off the purple haired stranger who never lowered his gun away from Izuku. "You said you needed to use the bathroom."

"I heard someone try to suppress a sneeze," the blond hissed and staggered upright. "And it turned out to be him! He's trying to kill you—"

"—He's not." Katsuki cocked the gun. "He's harmless."

The tension in the room prickled like needles. Each stab punctured the four men, and the pressure was suffocating as everyone surveyed each other. The two newcomers stood side by side in disbelief as Izuku slowly sat up on his hunches, entirely protected by Katsuki.

Izuku glanced up at Katsuki who was fiercely towering over him.

“Harmless?” The purple stranger parroted cynically. “This is the same guy you said you would gladly torture if you got the chance. You even detailed how you would skin him alive and tear off his fingernails. Move aside so we can get this over with.”

Izuku froze.

Katsuki said that?

“No. Back off.” Katsuki gritted his teeth and toyed with the trigger. “Point that gun elsewhere. Now. I’ll explain once you calm down.”

“You can’t be serious.” The purple haired man tried to reason once more. “Listen to me. This is clearly some type of ploy to kill you—”

“I said point the gun elsewhere,” Katsuki venomously warned.

“Bakugou. You’re really dancing the line here.”

“And I’ll dance right fucking over it in the next second if you don’t put your gun down.”

Silence stunned the room.

All eyes, including Izuku’s, were staring wide at Katsuki. Izuku was stuck between terror and realizing what was happening. Katsuki was defying some sort of order protecting him, and it was very clear these two men somehow knew who he was yet he had no clue who they were.

Suddenly, the lethal intent in the blond stranger’s eyes left the longer he stared at him. The man’s gaze flickered between Katsuki and Izuku as if piecing something together. His eyes narrowed in on the bruise along Katsuki’s jaw line that Izuku left the other night.

The man’s shoulders sagged. He sighed and grabbed the barrel of the other man’s gun. He slowly lowered it for his companion, who was now giving him a perplexed stare.

“They’re fucking,” the blond said. He turned to Katsuki and looked him dead in the eye. “Aren’t you?”

Izuku wearily stared up at Katsuki and Katsuki wearily stared down at Izuku. Neither of them spoke, but their eyes translated a thousand sentences.

“Oh. You’ve got to be kidding me,” the blond exasperated when he saw the lovesick stares. He groaned and threw his head back. “You’re more than fucking. Of course. Nothing is ever simple with you.”

At this, the other man seemed mortified. “Bakugou. Is that true?”

Katsuki lowered his gun and quietly helped Izuku off the floor. Izuku whimpered a little, lifting his ankle off the ground and leaned all the way into Katsuki. The two of them exchanged long stares and Izuku could feel as if this was something that was not supposed to be known.

He waited for Katsuki to deflect based on the look in his eyes, but instead his husband wrapped his arm around his midriff to help balance him. He turned back to his coworkers.

“We’re involved, yes,” Katsuki said firmly.

The blond man flew a hand up and turned around. The purple haired man stared at Katsuki like he grew a second head.

“This is debauched,” the purple haired man accused. “You’re seriously trusting your dick to the guy who has tried to kill you for eight years?”

“He never tried to really kill me,” Katsuki corrected and Izuku was happy Katsuki finally understood that. “And we’re officially done with all of that. Things between us are… complicated.”

“Cursed,” the blond stranger corrected. “Things between you are cursed.” He walked into the kitchen and shoved paper towels up his nostrils to collect the blood. “And what about Aizawa? Did you even stop and consider what would happen if he found out about this match made in hell? He’s going to beat your ass.”

Izuku recognized the name Aizawa as the name of Katsuki’s supervisor.

His husband told him about his supervisor that night in the nursery and suddenly this all made dreadful, awful sense. Somehow Izuku never considered that even though he kept Katsuki’s existence a secret from his family, that didn’t mean Katsuki had done the same.

His coworkers and supervisor probably knew him as Deku.

“This is why I haven’t called to check in,” Katsuki explained. “Him and I have figured out some stuff between us. It’s a lot to explain but Aizawa will understand once I tell it all.”

“No, Bakugou. He won’t,” the purple haired coworker spoke. The look of eerie caution in his eyes was ignited high. “Aizawa understands a lot of things, but this—” He angrily waved his hand at Izuku. “—Will not be one of them. You weren’t there when he gave out the kill orders. Aizawa wants this pest dead for some other reason that he said he can’t disclose. This is no longer an issue between the two of you, it’s a company issue. Plus, he killed Rin Hiryu. How could you forgive him for that?”

Izuku stiffened at the mention of his dead brother.

But worse, he realized there were kill orders against him.

Instantly, Izuku’s defenses went through the roof and his viper was raised awake. This was no longer a simple run in or misunderstanding. These men wanted him dead—and Izuku could not afford to die right now. He was poised in a way that was partially behind Katsuki and his hand was curled into a fist, ready to strike.

“I’ll make him understand,” Katsuki said and he held on to Izuku harder. “Once I explain it to him—”

"—If you explain anything to Aizawa, he will kill your homicidal boyfriend," The blond quipped. He wasn't looking at any of them as he leaned over the sink. His shoulders crept up to his neck and he gripped the counter until his hands were white. "…Are you happy, Bakugou?"

No one expected the question.

Katsuki recoiled, and the purple haired coworker turned his head towards the other at the strangeness.

Izuku weighed what was happening. Whoever the blond was, his body language shifted and he was assessing what exactly him and Katsuki were. Izuku wearily glanced at Katsuki, unsure what his answer might be.

Katsuki looked back at him with the purest of expressions. "Yes. The happiest I've ever been."

Izuku's heart squeezed. He wanted to say 'I am too' but he knew him chiming in would help nothing.

The blond coworker nodded silently. He strummed his fingers.

"Then you will keep this a secret," the blond said unhappily. He turned around with an understanding expression but he cut his eyes towards Izuku with intense distrust. "And we will keep this to ourselves too. If this shit runs into the ground then so be it, that's your mess to clean up. But otherwise, this whole fiasco between the four of us never occurred."

"What?" The other coworker hissed. He whirled on his companion, face twisting in anger. "Have you lost your goddamn mind? We're not keeping this a secret from Aizawa—"

"Yes. We are." The blond coworker shot a challenging glare.

They stood in an intensely matched grid lock. Izuku could nearly see the electricity between them zap in dominating jolts. It roared up and down, and they quietly pushed each other in a way that only people who knew each other well could do.

The blond co-worker walked up to the other with his shoulders squared out. On his face was a raw, sternly angry but soft emotion.

"Let him be happy," the blond murmured, nearly inaudible.

That seemed to be the ice water on the fire. Slowly, the purple haired coworker's anger snuffed out and he looked at Katsuki in a new light. There was a kinship there as Katsuki silently pleaded with him too. Then the man's eyes assessed Izuku with unease.

"Fine," The purple haired coworker agreed without looking at anyone. He pushed his gun back in his holster and folded his arms, fuming. "If this goes wrong—which it will—don't fucking come to us about it, Bakugou. We can keep this a secret between us on one condition: you're coming back with us tonight to HQ. You're going to close out immediately."

“Okay. I’ll come with you,” Katsuki agreed.

“We’ll be waiting on the porch,” the blond coworker said. He began to push his companion by the shoulder towards the door. “Take all the time you need.”

The two left, leaving Izuku and Katsuki alone.

Izuku uncurled his fist and Katsuki sagged his shoulders. They both stared down at Izuku’s ankle and gradually the weight of what had just happened sunk in.

“C’mon, let’s get that fixed up before I go,” Katsuki whispered. He lifted Izuku in his arms with regret heavy on his mind. “Sorry he threw you like that.”

Izuku couldn’t reply.

The weight of feeling like a burden was heavy against his mind.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku watched from the bed as Katsuki quietly packed a backpack for all the things he needed for an overnight trip.

He took his cellphone, keys and wallet and even an extra pair of clothes. Next, he moved to pull out a giant suitcase and briefcase that was full of different types of guns and weapons. The deadly steel shone under the light of their bedroom and Izuku was promptly reminded that Katsuki’s deadly era was coming to an end.

Then with a heavy heart, Izuku watched Katsuki take off his wedding ring.

It was like being pushed into the deep end of a pool. Izuku had been ignoring that they weren’t really married this whole time, and he didn’t want to acknowledge the green tint that was slowly growing on his finger from the cheap metal.

Izuku toyed with his wedding band as he thought about the kill orders hanging over his head. He wondered how long had Katsuki been given the instruction to take his life? He knew he shouldn’t be upset over such a thing. It made sense. He got in the way of Katsuki’s missions many times, and Katsuki very bluntly exclaimed he was going to kill him in Vienna, Taiwan, and during countless other encounters.

But now that he was so deep in love, the concept made Izuku uneasy.

“Will you be okay by yourself?” Katsuki asked as he put on his leather jacket.

“I will,” Izuku said with a forced smile. “I didn’t know I caused you so much trouble. I’m sorry.”

“Don’t worry about it,” Katsuki reassured. He walked around the bed to sit next to Izuku. He placed his hand on top of Izuku’s and squeezed it. “Those assholes will get over it and what my supervisor doesn’t know won’t hurt him. I’ll get the kill order stuff sorted out too.”

Izuku's smile faltered. He pinned up a fake smile the next moment.

"Okay, Kacchan."

Katsuki gave him a loving kiss and patted his head. Izuku watched sadly as Katsuki parted away from him and left. He heard the footsteps of the man he loved fade and the front door closed shut. Izuku looked down at the birthday slash he was still wearing and felt his heart hum low.

He slowly took it off and looked at it plainly.

He and Katsuki were always good at playing pretend, weren't they? They played pretend husbands as kids and in Okinawa. Even now, they somehow were legally married but still pretending like the weight of the world wasn't outside ready to rip them away from each other. It wasn't even Izuku's birthday, but they pretended like it was for the sake of it.

Izuku wondered if they would ever have the chance to stop playing pretend.

ᔓᔓᔓ

That night, Katsuki didn't come home. It was odd to be alone again after so long. Izuku tossed and turned all night and shivered despite not being cold. He desperately wanted to hear Katsuki's voice, but he realized he didn't have a phone number to call. He only wanted to ask if he was alright but he didn't have any information to do so.

In fact, he didn't actually have much information about Katsuki besides this address.

Izuku apprehensively dwelled on this. What would happen to them after this? Could they keep on pretending on weekends and Izuku's off weeks? Would that be fair to Katsuki to keep him in some half baked relationship when he could go on being normal with someone who could actually provide all their attention? Truthfully, no. It wouldn't be fair.

Izuku turned his head to the side to glance at his duffle bag. He thought about the locket that held his tracker.

He chewed on his bottom lip as the stress he'd been ignoring the last three months gnawed its way up his throat. He began analyzing various scenarios and found some hopeful cracks. He had successfully gotten away with disappearing for three months. And Katsuki cared about him just as much.

Maybe they really could find a way to be in a relationship—

Suddenly, a strange sound echoed from outside of the bedroom.

Izuku sat upright instantly. He cut his eye to the door when he heard an odd metallic clattering. He knew it couldn't be Katsuki. His husband would have walked straight through the door and announced he was back in order to disarm Izuku.

When it sounded like something dropped to the ground inside the house, all Izuku's viper instincts snapped into place.

Izuku slowly peeled away the covers and carefully reached for the nightstand on his side of the bed. He grabbed his gun out of the first drawer and checked to make sure it was loaded with bullets. Six. He made sure to keep that in mind as he cocked his weapon when the noise drew closer.

Izuku swung his legs off the side of the bed and stood up.

He was mindful of the way his casted ankle dragged and used his well trained leg muscles to keep it hovered off the ground. The deadly venom in his veins made his eyes fully constrict to see perfectly in the dark. Without making a noise, he slid open the door to the bedroom. He kept his gun forward as he checked around every corner on high alert.

By the time he made it to the kitchen, Izuku's mind was reeling. There was a window with a lock snapped off but no person to be found.

Who would be breaking in?

He figured it would be Katsuki's coworkers again. They might've lured Katsuki away and circled back to finish the job on their kill orders like good, loyal hitmen would.

But Izuku got his answer of 'who' when suddenly all the hairs on his neck stood up.

Izuku cut his eye down the long, dark hallway on his right. He leaned his head four millimeters to the side at the sound of a knife cutting through air. It whizzed directly past his ear, slicing the split ends of his hairs and sunk into the drywall behind his head.

Izuku's eyes narrowed when Himiko emerged from the shadows with her signature grin.

"Long time no see, baby brother," Himiko said. "Glad to see your vacation didn't make you lazy."

The very last thread of ignorant bliss Izuku was holding on to slipped away.

Himiko was back in Japan, and she was here in Biei. Izuku's eyes darkened and he positioned himself on the offensive. He didn't lower his gun as he studied his deadly sibling across the way.

"What are you doing here?" Izuku asked without any friendliness, and his heart rate sped up slightly. "I thought you were in Bangkok until January."

"I was supposed to be," Himiko said with a shrug. She tilted her head to the side and put her hand on her hip. "I finished a while ago. Imagine my surprise when I got word that you haven't been home in months and imagine how even more surprised I was to learn everyone thought you were the one on the Bangkok mission."

Izuku gritted his teeth and his heart rate sped up. He wasn't ready to leave. He didn't want to leave, he wanted to stay here so badly with Katsuki but he knew his time was now officially thin if Himiko was making her appearance.

Suddenly, Izuku felt the shadows of Hadeus stretch across Japan and begin to pull him back to Tokyo.

“I didn’t say anything by the way,” Himiko snarked. “It was a nice vacation of my own to be home without the stench of your cologne clogging up the hallways.”

“So now what? You came all this way to drag me back?” Izuku asked.

“Oh, please,” Himiko exasperated. “You really think I was the one who gave two shits about you disappearing?”

A single footstep changed the whole mood.

Izuku’s skin crawled with goosebumps as his eyes cut down the blackened hallway.

Out from the shadows came Tomura. His mouth was taut and his hands were behind his back. All the venom in his eyes was directed to Izuku as he walked forward.

“Hello, Izuku,” Tomura said. “Seems like you’ve been resting up well after expending all that energy to lie to me.”

Izuku hobbled backwards and his back hit the wall. Fear stronger than anything he ever felt gripped the length of his spine and twisted it under the sheer gravity of how screwed he was. Tomura was standing in Katsuki’s kitchen and rolling off of him in waves was a subzero temperature that threatened to brutally kill anything he laid eyes on.

And his eyes were directly on Izuku.

Immediately, Izuku tensed up and he hung his head away. He screwed his eyes shut, waiting for Tomura’s unchecked wrath that was surely going to rain down on him. He waited. Then waited some more.

Then carefully, he peaked open an eye when nothing occurred. Tomura was watching him with such a blank expression Izuku had no clue what was actually going through his head.

Tomura finally made a move, and both him and Himiko flinched slightly. But it was nothing because all Tomura did was flick on the light.

Brightness poured all around the kitchen and Izuku immediately shielded his eyes from the sudden shift. He rapidly blinked, waiting for something to happen. He watched, fully on guard as Tomura finally looked away from him.

His brother strolled around, looking at the dirty dishes and the various foods that were sitting out on the counter. Tomura then swiped his finger on the seat of one of the kitchen chairs. He inspected his finger for any collected dust before sitting down and crossing his legs. He folded his hands on the table and returned his eyes into Izuku.

Izuku stayed silent. Himiko wearily looked at Tomura as well.

He was far too calm.

“Aren’t you going to make us tea?” Tomura impatiently asked. He gestured to the pot on the stove. “It’s rude to not offer any hospitality to family after we’ve traveled all this way.”

This was a ticking bomb.

Izuku hesitated. But then he did like he was asked. Without a word, Izuku hobbled towards the stove silently and began making the tea. He played down the gun on the counter and then discreetly slid the wedding ring off his hand. He gulped heavily as he tried his best to not be suspicious and hide the ring in the cabinet as he grabbed a tea packet.

He knew sencha was Tomura’s favorite so he pulled out that one as his breathing skipped. He poured water into the pot with shaking hands and turned on the fire. It flickered and danced in the dim lighting under the tension in the room.

When the tea was properly prepared and ready, Izuku made two cups.

He handed one to Tomura and one to Himiko quietly.

A small throb in his ankle told him it was time to sit down. He did so slowly, choosing a chair directly across from Tomura. Himiko stood behind Tomura’s chair with curious eyes as she sipped on her tea. Tomura sipped the first bit of his tea and rolled his shoulders. He enjoyed his tea in silence as Izuku drowned in horrible anxiety, waiting for his brother to snap.

Then Tomura placed the cup down and folded his hands.

“Izuku,” Tomura said calmly. He tilted his head and narrowed his eyes. “What do you think you’re doing?”

“I’m…resting up,” Izuku admitted. He fiddled with the hems of his sleeves. “I hurt my ankle on the mission and wanted private time to heal.”

“Aoyama did say you were checked into an AirBnb,” Tomura replied slowly and looked down to Izuku’s ankle. “And it does seem like you actually hurt yourself. So you do need the time off.”

Tomura sipped his tea again. He then put down the porcelain cup and his expression twisted with rage.

“But this is not an AirBnB,” Tomura venomously pointed out. “This estate is registered to a Bakugou Katsuki, who just left here a couple hours ago. He is twenty five. Born in Tokyo and works for a so called laundry mat that handles ‘dirty business’ when it’s really a disguise for a hitman agency.”

Izuku seized up and all the blood in his face drained.

“And he’s blond,” Tomura added distastefully. “How long have you been dating him?”

Izuku shook his head quickly. “I-I’m not, we’re n-not together—”

“—Don’t lie to me right now, Izuku. It’ll only make things worse.” Tomura tightened his hand on the tea cup. “I pulled a picture of him and Himiko confirmed that he was the loose end she saw you hesitate to kill all those years ago. How long?”

Izuku glanced at Himiko and she averted her eyes.

Izuku held his breath and clutched his hands in his lap. He tried his best to hold back his tears as he knew crying in front of Tomura would help nothing. He blinked rapidly, and his heart hammered its way into his throat.

“We only recently started g-getting to know each other,” Izuku whispered with a half truth. “We connected in Okinawa after recognizing each other from various assignments. He offered to let me stay here until my ankle healed. We’ve been…spending time together but we’re not in a relationship.”

Tomura’s sub zero stare dropped to lethal lows. “What is our number one rule, Izuku?”

“No contact with outsiders,” Izuku answered quietly.

“And why do we have this rule?”

“Because outsiders are cruel, greedy and vicious people. They would think we’re monsters, and try to hurt us.”

“Exactly,” Tomura replied back viciously. “You are a viper, Izuku. No one understands vipers except other vipers. Any casual contact with the outside world puts our entire family at jeopardy—it puts you at jeopardy. Staying here with this stranger is directly putting your life at risk. I have spent too much fucking time saving your ass over and over again for you to carelessly do something like this.”

“I’m sorry,” Izuku replied. “I-I only wanted to get to know him.”

“Why?” Tomura snapped back. “Why was it so important for you to get to know this man that you put the deal with Chisaki on hold for months, have the audacity to lie to me, and on top of that you dragged Aoyama into your goddamn mess?”

“I—” Izuku stuttered. I love him. “I only wanted to get to know him. I was going to come back once my ankle healed. I figured it would be harmless to rest here instead of home. Chisaki wouldn’t want me in my broken state anyways.”

“What a stupid conclusion,” Tomura cut down. “Did you ever consider that this stranger would hurt you if he knew what you were?”

“But he wouldn’t hurt me,” Izuku replied earnestly. He shook his head, and love sick thoughts clouded his thoughts. “He’s similar to us—”

“—Similar? Do you really think he would ever look at you like you are similar to him?”

That struck a chord.

“He already does,” Izuku said with wavering confidence. “You said so yourself he worked for a hitman agency he won’t bat an eye about how many people I’ve killed. He’d be accepting of it. He'd be accepting of me.”

Tomura halted at that.

He raised a brow, and straightened his back. He then quietly assessed Izuku with his head sideways, as if connecting two dots. His brows furrowed deeply and his eyes shifted to a cold, unwavering glare.

“Izuku…Do you view this man romantically? Answer yes or no.”

Izuku didn’t say anything right away. He stared at his brother and his frigid gaze bored back into him. Izuku could tell Tomura already knew the answer.

“Y-Yes,” Izuku whispered. He realized where this was going and his heart plummeted into the darkest part of his body. “Pl-Please don’t hurt him. Please. I’ll do anything but don’t touch him. I-It was my idea to come here with him. He doesn’t know anything.”

Himiko looked at him like he had gone mad but Izuku pushed forward. He didn’t care how much he had to grovel, or if he needed to get on his knees and beg. He would happily give his body to Chisaki if it meant Katsuki remained out of reach from his blood thirsty family.

“Why would you offer to protect a stranger like this?” Himiko whispered, her eyes were stretched wide. “This guy would never do the same for you.”

“Because he loves him,” Tomura answered simply and Izuku’s stomach dropped. “He’s the blond boy you mentioned that morning of The Incident, isn’t he?”

“He is,” Izuku said. He pressed his lips in a thing line and curled his fists. “And I mean what I said. Please, don’t touch him. I don’t care what you make me do but stay away from him.”

Tomura scoffed and rolled his eyes. “There it is, the root of this delusion. You probably have made yourself believe that he cares for you, right? All because you knew each other as kids for a measly amount of time?”

There was something sinister about the way Tomura proposed the question.

Izuku nodded, unsure where this was going.

Izuku quietly said, “I know he cares about me.” He mustered up some of the courage Katsuki had gifted him as he found his voice to talk about what he wanted. “M-Maybe everything we were taught about outsiders wasn’t all the way true. There can be exceptions and Katsuki is one of the few people who cares about me like you do—”

“—Enough.” Tomura held his hand up.

Tomura then reached down into his leather satchel.

He exhaled tiredly and revealed several red folders. He slammed them on the table with a reverberating force that made Izuku jump slightly. The color on all of the folders were faded slightly and they had wear that was indicative of them being old.

Izuku stared at the folders, not understanding where this was going anymore.

“If you want to test how much he cares for you, then show him this,” Tomura said calmly.

Tomura slid the first red folder in front of Izuku.

Izuku took it with caution. He apprehensively stared at Tomura who stared right back with all the patience in the world. Izuku opened it up and froze. He blinked. Clipped to the top of the stack of papers was an old photograph. He had seen once before for a brief period of time five years ago. He vaguely remembered seeing this on the night before The Incident after Himiko had tauntingly waved it in his face.

It was a worn photograph of a blond woman with red eyes holding pink carnations.

Izuku was confused why Tomura had brought this but stiffened the longer he stared at the photograph. As he studied it, suddenly an eerie family resemblance settled in that he didn't have the time to register before. Katsuki’s face overlapped on top of hers perfectly. The high cheek bones. The lopsided smirk. The dangerously sharp red eyes. Even their hair was the exact same shade of ash blond.

Dread, fear, and horror sunk in like three blades into Izuku’s core. He inched his eyes over to read the name.

Bakugou Mitsuki.

A gut punch like no other slammed into him and all the air was rocked out of his lungs.

Chapter End Notes

And here we goooooooooo! rubs my angsty little hands together Buckle in!! We're diving straight into hell :) Please let me know what you think below!! I am SO excited for the next string of chapters. Next one is the last Honeymoon recap and then it'll flip right into present and we're going for a roller coaster right into hell :^D

See you in the New Year!! :)

Chapter 26: Legato

Chapter Summary

Legato - (style indicator) Smooth and connected.

Everything becomes connected in the end.

Chapter Notes

Hellooo! Welcome back to this very special chapter that is officially the end of the recap from Izuku's POV. :)) I was super excited to write all of this and see everyone's reactions!!

Buckle in :)) and also be sure to check out the songs for this chapter! I've been really excited to share them because i think all three fit super well. :)

Warnings: Heavy warning on the angst

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 26 — Legato

.

.

.

“No,” Izuku whispered. He gripped the red folder in his hands so tightly that his fingernail markings etched into the material. Pieces of paper crumbled under his grasp and Izuku’s spirit was overtaken with terrible understanding. “N-No, th-there’s no way th-this is true. Th-this can’t be t-true.”

But it was.

He re-lived it all. He knew how her blood sprayed when the bullet exited through her skull. He knew exactly the way her fragile body hit the ground and how her eyes rolled back. Each detail was stamped into his memory because this particular assignment is what kicked off Tomura’s ascension to power.

He killed Bakugou Mitsuki.

He killed Katsuki's mother.

He struggled to believe it. Izuku thought about all the promises he made to Katsuki in the past about how he would kill Chizome for him. Yet they had both gotten it wrong—the real killer had been right in the room with them the whole time.

Izuku forgot to breathe while he stared at the documents. When he remembered to, his chest was tight. Izuku sharply inhaled and slowly covered his mouth with his hand in horror.

Izuku knew he was a snake who caused countless funerals. Infinite coffins were stacked on top of each other every time he bared his fangs and put a tally mark in his book. But he never imagined Katsuki's mother was one of those tally marks. His dreams of a future with Katsuki broke and scattered like fragile glass as he tried to grasp what he had done.

He tried to think of a million different ways to tell Katsuki the truth but all he saw was whirlpools of endless pain.

Tomura stood up. He walked behind Izuku and placed a heavy hand on Izuku's shoulder. He then said, "Do you really think your precious blond would still love you if you told him you were the one to kill his mother?"

Izuku grasped for straws.

"B-But Chisaki," Izuku whispered, breathless. His eyes began to burn as tears poured down. "Ch-Chisaki is the one who ordered the hit. I only pulled the trigger—h-he'll understand—"

"—No. He won't." Tomura gave a true look of pity like an older brother. "He's not going to see it any differently, Izuku. You both are going to be guilty in his eyes, maybe not symmetrically but still guilty. The hitman and the requester are both to blame when someone is killed."

Tomura slid over the other folders on the table.

One by one Tomura opened them and forced Izuku to look at each and every picture. What was waiting inside were some of the most gruesome images Izuku ever laid sights on. Countless men were photographed in the dark with disfigured bodies. Each one was bloodied, maimed, and missing some sort of limb.

There were at least fifty bodies in total. One included a man cut deeply in his intestines, the knife was left behind with a note and part of his face was dissolved by acid. His long neck was unnaturally bent with bones sticking out.

"All of these are cases Bakugou Katsuki was hired for within the last three years," Tomura explained. "Some of his more secretive assignments that his company agreed to and he was paid a handsome amount of money to pull off. Did you know his specialities are torture and hunting?"

Izuku thought about what Katsuki said while tormenting Koizumi.

“I specialize in tracking and torture. It’s a selling point of my portfolio that I never leave a loose end.”

Tomura plucked a particularly lurid photo from the stack and held it up.

“He’s a loose cannon already nicknamed The Scarlet Eyed Killer,” Tomura said with heavy caution. “What he did to his own biological father will be light in comparison to what he’ll do to you when he finds out you put the bullet in his mother. And I don’t even want to think about what would happen to Chisaki. This man will kill everyone involved in his mother’s death—and you are included in that. He will not spare you if this gets back to him.”

Izuku began trembling.

His whole spirit, body and mind were quaking down to the last fiber as he wrestled with coming to terms with what the real truth was. He replayed that night again and again and again in his head and the more details he recalled, the worse it became.

As Izuku stayed paralyzed in his memories, Tomura sighed and began packing up the folders. He shook his head and gave Izuku’s shoulder a tiny, sympathetic pat.

“This is why we do not mingle with people outside of our circles, Izuku,” Tomura lectured. “You never know who will want you dead for what you’ve done. It’s unfortunate you’ve fallen in love with him, but you will get over it with time. Now, clean up the dishes and I’ll take a look at your ankle so I can decide what to do next.”

White noise cut through Izuku’s eardrums.

“You killed the mother of the only person who cared for you so purely,” the voice of Hiryu harshly whispered in the back of his head. “You don’t deserve him.”

As if he was a wind-up toy, he proceeded to do as Tomura said while dazed. Hot, burning tears rolled down his face as he stayed deathly silent. He made no move to speak or engage with either of his siblings as he gathered the empty tea cups and brought them over to the sink.

He washed the cups silently as his tears rained down into the dishwater. In the ripples he saw his and Katsuki’s life. He re-lived pulling that trigger and he saw that bullet shattering Katsuki’s heart in the process.

Izuku terribly wondered how much Katsuki cried when he discovered her body.

The burden of murder weighed Izuku down until he leaned over the sink. Lightheadedness rolled over him and his limbs went numb. His head dropped below his shoulders as he clutched the tiny tea cups in his hands.

What had he done?

“What is that on your shoulder?” Himiko suddenly asked.

Without warning, a small finger hooked under his shirt collar. Cold air hit Izuku's back as the fabric was pulled down. Izuku recoiled quickly, snapping his body against the opposite side of the counter. He slapped a hand over the area and stared at Himiko with wide, horrified eyes.

A chill stabbed into his side when he realized what she saw.

Katsuki had left a trail of love bites along his shoulder last night.

She was staring at him in shock. Izuku's heart palpitated and he rapidly shook his head to warn her not to say anything—but it was too late.

"Holy shit—did you finally get laid?" Himiko exclaimed with humor, not understanding the weight of what she said.

"What?" Tomura viciously cut in.

Both Izuku and Himiko turned to see Tomura at the table glaring into Izuku like never before. Izuku immediately pressed himself further into the counter. He stumbled as all the color drained from his face and his stomach dropped to new lows.

"N-No, she's wrong," Izuku quickly lied but it was pointless.

Tomura stormed over, pushed Himiko aside and yanked Izuku forward by his shirt. Himiko staggered backwards, confused.

"Wait, is that bad?" Himiko questioned.

She furrowed her brows looking between the two of them waiting for an answer. But she never was acknowledged as Tomura was deadlocked on Izuku.

Quickly, Izuku began rambling apologies, excuses, lies—anything he could think of to spare himself but it was pointless. Tomura pulled down his shirt to the side to expose his shoulder. Izuku tried to fight it and struggled against Tomura as tears blurred his vision.

Then the sound of fabric stretching and seams breaking tore through everyone's ears.

All the evidence of Izuku's and Katsuki's forbidden intimacy was put on full display.

Tomura's nostrils flared.

"You fucking slut," Tomura seethed through his gritted teeth.

Izuku had never seen Tomura lose it so fast. Usually Tomura was cold and calculated with his anger, but this time it was boiling and impulsive as if he'd been pushed to the brink.

When the slap came, pain splintered everywhere on Izuku's face.

It held all of Tomura's strength and viciously turned his head with so much force that he fell to the ground instantly. His stomach became nauseous from the velocity his body was moved.

In the next moment, before he could even open his eyes, Tomura's hand was sinking into his hair and twisting it in a vicious death grip.

Izuku screamed in pain as he was dragged by his hair across the floor. He sunk his fingernails into Tomura's hands, kicking the whole way trying to get him to let go.

Horror at what was to come dawned on Izuku as the back door was kicked open. His eyes snapped open to see Himiko following, entirely confused at what was occurring. Izuku was dragged down the stairs and out into the open field of higanbana flowers. One by one, Tomura's feet destroyed them along the way in his spiteful stampede.

Izuku twisted his head to see where Tomura was heading—and much to his horror, in the distance he could see Tomura's black car parked off the side of a dirt road.

"N-No!" Izuku screamed. "Please! Stop!"

"Quit struggling!" Tomura yelled and gave Izuku's hair a harsh tug. "This shit ends now! You're coming back to Tokyo today!"

Izuku twisted his body. He struggled against his brother as he was pulled harder. Izuku dug his bare heels in the dirt as he tried to make himself heavier with force.

"N-Not yet! Please! Not yet!" Izuku yelled at the top of his lungs.

"Shut up!" Tomura snapped. "This proves you're incapable of making smart decisions, Izuku! What about the deal with Chisaki! Huh?! You gave away something that can't be taken back! What'll happen when Chisaki can tell!"

"He won't be able to," Izuku quickly replied. He shook his head desperately with wide eyes. "I promise he won't!"

"You shouldn't be promising anything. All that complaining you did and you still ran off and behaved like a damn whore. You have hickies from that serial killer all over your body. What if someone else sees these marks and it gets back around to him?! Hah? Did you think about that?!"

"Then let me stay here until they heal," Izuku tried to bargain. His heart sank as they came to the middle of the field and closer to the car. He shook his head and threw his body to the side as hard as he could. "Don't make me go back just yet, please! I-I can't leave him Tomura—I can't. He'll be hurt—"

"—So fucking what?! He will hurt you!"

Tomura whirled around towards Izuku with fury burning in his eyes. His lips curled back as he finally stopped his stride. He let go of Izuku and squatted down to his place in the dirt. He leaned in and his eyes darkened from the shadow eclipsing his frightening features.

Izuku shakily lifted himself up on his arms and hissed when Tomura roughly grabbed his face. As Tomura's fingers dug into his jaw, Izuku's heart pounded nearly out of his chest.

“After everything I’ve done to protect you, do you think I would lie about this, you stupid slut?” Tomura harshly questioned. He shook Izuku’s head as if trying to knock sense into his skull by force. “That man will gut you from the inside out and chop your body up. Think! Fucking think with your head for once! He doesn’t have any allegiance to you, he will flip on you when he discovers you killed his mother!”

“He won’t—he won’t hurt me,” Izuku whispered.

He believed it with all his heart as memories of him and Katsuki’s beautiful time spent together flickered through his head. All the memories were tainted now however. Each lovely memory shifted from bright vibrant colors to be stained with the crimson red blood of Bakugou Mitsuki. Sickness slid up Izuku’s throat as he thought about how much he directly hurt Katsuki.

“I’ll tell him the truth and whatever happens, happens,” Izuku whispered painfully.

He could feel Katsuki’s pain from finding out the truth already seared into him. It would be full of agony and the pain that would be wedged between them would be as wide as an ocean.

Izuku knew he would probably lose Katsuki after this—the love of his life would probably never talk to him again. And Katsuki would be very well within his right not to. But Izuku didn’t believe Katsuki would hurt him in the way Tomura was insisting.

“He-He’s soft with me,” Izuku said with a crack in his voice. “He wouldn’t hurt me if he knew the full truth. Not after everything we shared—he won’t hurt me like you think. He’s different.”

Silence.

Tomura stared at him with not an ounce of understanding.

“Just because he fucks you doesn’t mean he cares about you,” Tomura said slowly and evenly.

Izuku recoiled and shifted uncomfortably. It felt wrong to have that part of his life picked at by his brother, and the part of his brain that did take Tomura’s warnings seriously began to unfortunately listen.

Because Tomura always somehow knew best in the end.

“He will never care about someone like you,” Tomura warned. “He merely lusts after your body because that’s how men are. They lie and say sweet words so you give yourself to them without hesitation. That’s what I have been protecting you from for years.”

Izuku screwed his eyes shut and shook his head. Tomura quickly stilled his movements by tightening his grip on his chin.

“Why do you think I discouraged you from having sex for as long as possible?” Tomura continued and his tone became harsher. “Or why do you think I took a whole damn year to shift through men who may be well suited for you? Do you think I did it for the hell of it? No.

I did it because your bleeding heart would easily confuse lust as love and I wanted to protect you from heartbreak. And this thing with this Bakugou man proves I was right to keep you from all of this."

"No," Izuku bit back bravely. He shook his head but something inside of him tilted uneasily at what Tomura said. "Katsuki isn't like that. He's honest and sweet—"

"Oh, spare me. He's an average fucking man," Tomura scoffed. He narrowed his eyes and tilted his head. "With the way you look, do you really think he didn't consider shortcuts to get in your pants like everyone else around you has? He's no better than the cat callers on the street you've been rejecting for years. And the second he finds out you killed his mother, the thread of infatuation that's binding you two together will break." Tomura snapped his fingers. "Just like that."

Izuku unfortunately could image it.

He could see the weight of the truth breaking what he and Katsuki shared into thousands of unsalvageable pieces. Katsuki would cry. He would cuss. He would scream and rightfully lash out. But worst of all, he would break down into a void of sadness that Izuku never wanted him to endure ever in his life.

He only wanted the best for Katsuki and now Izuku knew that it wasn't him.

For some reason, that was the thought that tore him apart.

Izuku began to shake and all the heaviness of the situation finally made him buckle. He lowered his head forcefully away from his brother. He was fearful of showing this much emotion in front of Tomura, but he couldn't stop the waves from coming even if he tried. Because when it came to Katsuki, Izuku was nothing more than a human.

Izuku sobbed so loudly he shocked himself and Tomura.

He tried to cover his mouth with his hands but several more ugly sobs slipped past his fingers. He dropped his head between his trembling shoulders and screwed his eyes shut. Tears slid over his face, hands, and down his cheeks onto the petals of the higanbanas beneath him.

He cried his heart out in front of his brother as the ache in his chest grew as large as a black hole. The pain threatened to swallow him whole and he wished he could undo what he'd done to Katsuki.

For some reason, Tomura let him cry.

Tomura didn't speak, scold him or make him stop. Tomura let Izuku humiliate himself with his sadness pinned on full display for anyone to see and hear. It reminded Izuku of the time when he was thirteen and had freshly found out about Inko.

And exactly like when he was thirteen, his brother exhaled roughly and sat back on his hunches.

Izuku dared to open his eyes and he saw Tomura's empty eyes fill up with pity—true pity. The emotionless veil lifted from over Tomura's face to reveal sympathy so profound Izuku never knew he held it inside of him.

Izuku suddenly felt small and unsure.

Tomura leaned in and ran his calloused fingers through Izuku's hair. The touch comforted Izuku in a horrible, familiar way and his crying turned from sobbing to softly weeping.

They sat there and his brother gave him an inch of the mercy he somehow retained solely for Izuku. Tomura let Izuku cry for however long he needed as they sat on the open field together. The wind howled in the background and Izuku could do nothing but mourn the relationship he and Katsuki barely had the chance to start.

"You really do love him, don't you?" Tomura muttered quietly.

Izuku whispered, "I've loved him my whole life."

Tomura pressed his lips in a thin line at that confession. He shifted to sitting cross legged and tiredly rubbed the bridge of his nose. He studied Izuku carefully and then looked down to his ankle. He reached forward to touch it and made a quiet calculation in his head.

Tomura then cut his eyes across the field to the estate.

Izuku followed his gaze and stiffened when he saw Himiko standing there with wide, shocked eyes. The wind tousled through her golden hair as the moon painted light across her delicate features.

She heard the whole thing.

"Himiko, go inside before you catch a cold," Tomura suddenly commanded.

She looked between the two brothers and did as she was told. She put on her emotionless mask and closed the door behind her.

"I'll let you stay here until your ankle is healed on three conditions," Tomura said once Himiko was inside. "But you must follow the conditions fully. Are we clear?"

Izuku's sniffling slowed up and he snapped his head upright in shock. He stared at his brother, confused but was not about to question it.

"W-We're clear," Izuku quickly agreed.

Tomura dipped his hand into his pocket and pulled out a small, red handkerchief. He began wiping Izuku's tears from his face with a tinge of disgust.

"The first is you never mention this man again after this. This sickly infatuation dies here," Tomura said sternly. He moved to wipe Izuku's hands that were wet from his crying. "The second condition is you will play a delicate virgin for Chisaki and make sure no one suspects anything else. I'll handle Himiko and ensure she keeps quiet about all of this."

He put the handkerchief away and Izuku nodded sadly.

“And the last condition is that you do not say a word to Bakugou about the role you or Chisaki played in killing his mother.”

Izuku halted.

His eyes widened by several fractions and his heart broke further.

“I know you want to ‘do the right thing’ and be honest, but that’s your defect speaking,” Tomura quickly cut down before Izuku could object. “I can not afford to have you maimed, kidnapped or mangled before the consummation with Chisaki. And I need Chisaki in one piece to give me the transfer of power. If that loose canon blond knew about what both of you did, it would be a pain in my ass. And above all, I do not want you getting hurt. Do you understand?”

Izuku didn’t say anything right away.

The concept of keeping the truth away from Katsuki felt impossible. How was he supposed to look him in his eye knowing he was the one who put a bullet in his mother? How could he kiss him?

But Izuku nodded, taking the extension of kindness Tomura once again showed him.

“I understand, Big Brother,” Izuku whispered. “I won’t say anything about it.”

His words signed an invisible dotted line and the obedience that Tomura installed in him zipped his lips tight.

Tomura nodded his head satisfied with the answer. He plucked a piece of dirt out of Izuku’s hair and flicked it away.

“I’ll be back to collect you in several weeks,” Tomura said. “When I call, be ready to leave within the hour. No questions about it. If you resist, I’ll kill that Bakugou where he stands and put a permanent end to all this foolishness.”

Izuku lowered his eyes. He blankly nodded.

Static as loud as a storm cut through Izuku’s ears as Tomura stood up. He said something, but Izuku didn’t exactly hear it. Tomura walked across the field to the estate. When he came back he had Himiko with him and the stack of red folders in his hands. Both his siblings stood still, looming over him with cold, unmoving gazes. Izuku glanced up at them, and felt terribly small and weak.

Izuku noted how quickly the pedestal of bravery Katsuki placed him on crumbled in the presence of Tomura. So much for standing on his own.

“Get inside and get some rest, Izuku,” Tomura commanded before turning on his heel. “We’ll see you soon enough.”

Himiko gave Izuku a long, wordless stare before following behind Tomura. Izuku watched as they got into Tomura's car and drove off.

When the vehicle was out of sight, Izuku tried to force himself to move. But he couldn't. His body slightly trembled and his stomach was seasick. He stayed where he was in the open field with the autumn wind cutting into him.

He closed his eyes and curled into himself. Everything hurt from the inside out as he fully began to process all the information. The ugly truth bared its teeth: He had killed Katsuki's mother. He stayed in the field with his eyes closed as he went over every scenario to try to tell Katsuki. He searched for the least painful way that would save Katsuki some of the misery—but he found nothing.

There was no way to tell Katsuki without irreversibly hurting him.

When Izuku opened his eyes he flinched.

Sitting staggeringly close to him was the phantom of Hiryu.

His body mirrored Izuku's. His blackened eyes were leaking dark liquid similar to tears. Izuku blinked once and then blinked again wondering if the figment of his imagination would go away.

But it didn't.

It stayed closer than it ever did before and cried dark tears the same as him.

"Tomura might be right," Hiryu's phantom whispered. "If you could kill me, then Katsuki would be able to kill you."

Izuku screwed his eyes shut to block out the taboo thought. But the longer he stayed alone with himself, suddenly all the scenarios of telling Katsuki the truth twisted on each other. Every scene became darker and more distorted as the visions mixed with the gruesome red folders Tomura had shown.

"He could kill you easily," Hiryu's ghost added. The voice split like it was two people speaking, one Hiryu and the other Tomura. "What if he never really liked you? What if it was lust this whole time?"

Izuku choked on a small sob as he tried to will away the dark thoughts. He shook his head and tried to tell himself Katsuki cared for him and Tomura was wrong. They were fated and always held each other's best interest in mind. Even when they didn't know who the other was for eight years, they cared.

That had to mean something, right?

Maybe Katsuki couldn't kill him in the same way Izuku could never kill him. Maybe it was truly fate?

“But what if it wasn’t?” The phantom continued to twist the knife, speaking only in Tomura’s voice now. “What if he only cares about your body like everyone else? Slitting your throat would be nothing to him because you are nothing.”

All the information from the night crammed into Izuku’s brain in one go, tripping and mingling together in a terrible concoction. But worst of all he could see it—he could see Katsuki hurting him. It was easy to imagine after so many years. He knew how Katsuki’s face would contort with the flame of killer instinct in his eyes.

“Katsuki could hurt you,” Tomura’s dark voice echoed in his head. “And he will once he discovers what you did.”

Izuku sobbed softly as he became lost in his mind.

All night Izuku circled the drain in his own personalized version of hell.

He was tormented with distorted voices, visions, and bloodied scenarios of the future. He stayed stuck in the middle of the field of blood colored flowers, imagining himself to be drenched in the same shade of red. He unwillingly imagined Katsuki maiming him over and over while cruelly saying how he could never love someone who killed his mother.

Izuku tried to snap himself out of it, but with every attempt he plunged himself into being further hysterical. It was too much to accept the truth of what he’d done—and each time he thought about the way Bakugou Mitsuki’s body dropped to the cold ground, the more he realized how much he did deserve to be hurt.

The night passed and Izuku didn’t register that the sun had come up. His body shook with exhaustion as he curled into himself, crying softly. He held his head as all his dreams were torn apart limb from limb.

Suddenly, the sound of his name teleported him back to his body.

“Izuku!” Katsuki called.

Izuku violently flinched and whipped his head up.

He turned his bloodshot eyes to see Katsuki standing in the morning glory. Beautiful rays of light shone down on him, making him seem as if he was made of glitter and his perfect red eyes were bright with light.

Izuku averted his gaze quickly, feeling like he didn’t deserve to look upon Katsuki.

Izuku clammed up as Katsuki approached. Guilt as heavy as gravity crashed down on Izuku when Katsuki immediately kneeled down to his level. His worried eyes darted all across Izuku’s figure until they finally landed on his face.

“What happened?” Katsuki asked wearily. “Why are you out here crying?”

Izuku quickly wiped his tears as the voice of Tomura echoed in his head and controlled him.

"Do not say a word to that Bakugou about the role you or Chisaki played in killing his mother."

Izuku's throat slammed shut on command and he felt like heaving. His brows furrowed tightly together in intense tension as he tried to will himself to say the truth—but the hold Tomura held over him was stronger. He flickered his eyes down to Katsuki's bare wedding finger.

Suddenly, all the violent scenarios that his imagination conjured up came rushing back.

One particular one of Katsuki sinking his blade into his neck stood out.

"You would never hurt me…would you?" Izuku asked, barely above a whisper as he tried to push away the gruesome picture.

He wanted to reaffirm his feelings that Katsuki would never hurt him. Maybe this way he could prove to the side of him that heeded Tomura's warnings that there was nothing to fear. It would be safe to tell Katsuki the truth and Tomura's warning wouldn't have as much of a hold on him as it did.

But unfortunately, Katsuki seemed taken back.

His whole body halted movement and he searched Izuku's face.

"Of course, I wouldn't," Katsuki said off-handedly but it wasn't convincing enough for Izuku's cautious side to back down. Katsuki took a closer look at Izuku's ankle, but Izuku gripped him tightly—entirely desperate.

Katsuki frowned and asked, "Where is this coming from?"

"I'm—I'm only wondering," Izuku replied. "The time we spent here meant something for you?"

Katsuki nodded. "It means everything."

"A-And no matter what, you wouldn't—no, couldn't—kill me?" Izuku sobbed.

Katsuki was wearing an expression of shock and disgruntlement. He frowned deeply and nearly seemed offended by what Izuku was suggesting. He helped Izuku wipe away some tears and sighed.

"I would never try to kill you," Katsuki promised.

Izuku's voice was nearly found again after having it so violently snatched away. He tried to say the truth about what he learned, but found himself hindered once more by the obedience in his chest. Dark warning glares from Tomura appeared and he could see his brother shake his head slowly in discouragement.

With the vision of Tomura came the reminder of Katsuki's co-workers.

"B-But what about the kill orders you have on me?" Izuku asked, trying hard to dissolve all the layers stopping him from outright saying the truth.

"Those were only because you butchered Rin Hiyru and kept messing with assignments," Katsuki said a little too flippantly. Now Hiryu's ghost was sitting next to Katsuki reminding Izuku that he pulled the trigger and murdered his own brother. "That shouldn't be surprising. All that is in the past now, I told you I would get the kill order shit straightened up. My ex-colleague is working on clearing it soon when he can."

"He's probably always been wanting to kill you," Hiryu's ghost whispered with Tomura's voice. "Maybe it'll be like ticking a checkbox when he finally hears about what you've done."

Izuku felt deeply sick.

"How long did you have the orders?" Izuku continued to press.

Katsuki pursed his lips to the side, seemingly running out of patience for Izuku's random assortment of questions. "I was ordered to kill you the second I saw you after Madrid."

At that, Izuku became hopeful. He said slowly, "But you never did."

"Because I wasn't trying to blow my goddamn cover with Moore looking at us as hard as he was."

Izuku clammed up again. He withdrew and the side of him that heeded Tomura began to put its shield up.

"So would you have killed me if Moore didn't get involved?" Izuku asked quietly.

Katsuki opened his mouth, then he closed it. He caressed Izuku's shoulders lightly. "Izuku, where is this coming from? You're worrying me. You never answered why you were out here crying in the first place."

"Please, answer the question," Izuku said. His voice splintered entirely as his hold on his sanity slipped.

Katsuki took a deep breath in. He made a cringe face as if it made him pained to admit what he was about to say.

"Yes," Katsuki said and some of Izuku's hope fell out to the bottom of his body. "If we hadn't run into Moore, I would have attempted to kill you. But that's irrelevant because I had been trying to kill you for years. That shouldn't be surprising or a testament to anything."

Izuku nodded in understanding, and the side of him that took Tomura seriously strong-armed the control of his body. His throat officially slammed shut and the truth was not making its way out any time soon.

Katsuki ‘tsk’d under his breath and shuffled in closely to Izuku to hold him with one arm.

“C’mon, Izuku. This is stupid,” Katsuki said, ignorant of the inner battle inside of Izuku’s head. “That’s the past and we’ve always been at odds until recently. But everything is different now and that’s good. So, what if we had crossed some issues in our line of work? I had no clue who you were before.”

“Funny isn’t it?” Hiryu’s ghost cruelly whispered. “Even when you didn’t know it was him you still loved him. But it’s not the same. You’re not special to him the way he is to you.”

The darkened thought made Izuku’s chest tighten.

“I could never kill you, even when I didn’t know,” Izuku whispered, barely audible. “I-I th-thought it might be the same.”

“I’m sorry,” Katsuki whispered and kissed Izuku’s forehead. “I’m really sorry that I can’t say I felt the same when you were only Deku to me—but I can say that now and that’s all that matters. You’re the only person I’ve ever felt this…close to. Shit happens, feelings change. I would never try to kill you again if that’s what you’re worried about. Nothing could change that.”

Izuku looked at Katsuki and asked, “Nothing?”

“Nothing,” Katsuki reassured.

Izuku didn’t believe that was true as he thought about Bakugou Mitsuki. The truth banged its fist at the closed part of his throat and tears welled up inside of Izuku’s eyes. He stared at Katsuki and he wanted to say sorry—but couldn’t.

So instead Izuku hugged him. He tried to translate all the remorse that was burning inside of him as if Katsuki could feel it through his skin.

Katsuki was clearly confused, but he didn’t say anything further. He did as he always did and smiled at Izuku. He ran a hand through Izuku’s messy curls and then stopped. He shifted to plucking out stray leaves and lone higanbana petals that were stuck in Izuku’s thick curls.

“Now that your irrational fears are settled, why were you out here in the middle of the field crying?” Katsuki asked once more. He unhappily dug out more dirt and petals. “A little fucking concerning, don’t you think?”

Izuku thought about Tomura. He smiled sadly.

“It’s nothing to worry about,” Izuku explained quietly. “I tried seeing if I could walk on my own. Looks like I can’t yet.”

ɯɯɯ

As the day went on, Izuku learned guilt was like a rolling tide washing over a rock. With every wave that came over him, a piece of him was withered down and washed away. All he wanted was to be carried away under the tide and rightfully drown in his sorrows like his guilt told him he deserved.

Katsuki continued about the same like nothing happened. And of course, why wouldn't he? He didn't know the truth. But Izuku found it difficult to look at Katsuki or even be in the same room as him.

Over the course of the next two days, Izuku started to withdraw.

He put space between him and Katsuki because the warnings from Tomura rang in his head like deafening echoes.

He felt stuck. But despite all of that, he knew he would only ever hurt Katsuki if he stayed in his life. Every second he stayed in Katsuki's presence was a true snake-like deception. And Izuku didn't want to continue deceiving Katsuki so he decided he would begin the separation process.

It was time to get back on track to getting the kids out anyways.

On the third day after Tomura's visit, Izuku knew they had to discuss their impending divorce.

It would be the first step in rightfully ridding Katsuki of him and getting back on track to get the kids out.

They were having dinner in the kitchen and Katsuki was making chicken curry on the stove. The savory smell beckoned to Izuku but the emptiness in his chest was stronger. He had no urge to eat as he stared down in his lap in deep thought.

The radio was playing in the background and a subject caught Izuku's attention.

"We are interviewing a survivor from the Okinawa human trafficking tragedy. She is speaking out," the voice of a news reporter announced. Both Izuku and Katsuki sharply cut their eyes towards the tiny device. "Now tell us, what did you see again? This seems to conflict with the original police reports."

"There was a man in all black with blood-colored eyes," the wobbly voice of the witness whispered. "His eyes nearly glowed in the dark—and he moved so fluidly through all the rooms. He saved us from those monsters, like an angel of death reaping all of their souls."

Katsuki pressed his lips in a thin line and Izuku frowned at the description.

Angel of Death?

He cut his eyes over to Katsuki and felt a chill run up his arms.

"Do you think this could potentially be the work of the mysterious Scarlet Eyed Killer?" The reporter probed. "The description of his eyes combined with the amount of blood shed matches—"

Katsuki quickly turned the radio off.

“Sorry,” Katsuki grumbled and went back to cooking. “I don’t exactly feel like reliving that. I still get fucking hives thinking about the cages and red rooms. Plus, I don’t really want to hear if I have another goddamn nickname. First The Scarlet Eyed Killer, now The Angel of Death? It’s too much.”

Izuku didn’t have quite the right response.

He contemplated a little too long on Katsuki’s violent side and wordlessly looked back down towards his lap. It was here that he caught sight of the scar on his palm that he received from Katsuki.

He traced it slowly, realizing that the scar was from the same night Izuku killed Katsuki’s mother.

It was proof Katsuki had both kindness and violence inside of him. They bloomed together, intertwining like growing vines covering the depths inside of his soul. It had been such a split second decision and showed how fast Katsuki could go from killer to savior.

Izuku wondered if Katsuki hadn’t shown him kindness that night, would Mitsuki still be alive? The answer was likely no. Realistically, another viper would’ve gone back and finished the job. Chisaki wasn’t a fan of loose ends.

But why did it have to be him who did it in the end?

“Because you’re not destined to be together,” the distorted voice of Tomura whispered.

Izuku lowered his head further and dug his fingers into his scar. He reasoned they were always bound to go their separate ways after this. This makeshift honeymoon wasn’t supposed to be a permanent fixture and they needed to face reality.

“Katsuki,” Izuku whispered without glancing up. He braced himself to say words he never wanted to. “We should get the divorce this week.”

Several beats of silence passed.

Izuku frowned at the lack of response and finally lifted his gaze. He saw Katsuki stirring the pot with no sign of acknowledgement of what he said.

“Katsuki. Did you hear me?” Izuku asked gently.

“I heard you,” Katsuki mumbled.

“…And?”

Katsuki sucked in a deep breath. He clicked off the stove and turned around with a determined stare.

“And I don’t want a divorce.”

Had this been a week ago, Izuku would have probably been thrilled yet terrified. He would have known it wasn't realistic but would have found a way to make it work. But now Izuku was stone cold sober, off cloud nine, and thinking pragmatically. But he was more surprised that Katsuki wasn't.

He looked at Katsuki sideways. "Wh-What? We can't stay married—"

"Why not? We like each other. A lot. We get along fucking splendidly or whatever the hell it's called. Why would we get divorced?"

Izuku stared at Katsuki and Katsuki glared right back at him. It quickly dawned upon Izuku that this was going to be an argument. He folded his arms to steady his nerves because he knew Katsuki was an immovable object.

"So, what's your plan?" Izuku muttered, slightly agitated that this wasn't going the way he thought. "We secretly date in between my assignments and build up to justifying being legally married?"

Because that's what Izuku's plan had been.

"My plan is you don't have any more assignments," Katsuki corrected.

All thoughts inside of Izuku came to a screeching halt. He stared at Katsuki like he'd gone mad because that was an insane, absolute solution. Katsuki really assumed he could simply leave his life as a viper? Vipers didn't get to stop working. They either died or they ran away and then died. There was no such thing as retirement.

Katsuki walked towards him, pulled a chair out and sat down at eye level with him. Izuku's heart thumped with love at the way Katsuki was looking at him. It was so soft and gentle and Izuku knew he didn't deserve any of it.

"Izuku. I want you to stay here with me," Katsuki said firmly.

He grasped Izuku's hands, and it transported Izuku far back to that year in Tokyo.

For a moment it felt like they were both seven again, hopelessly holding onto a false marriage that would not pan out in the real world. Izuku wanted to say what he said back then, but as the murder of Bakugou Mitsuki sat on his heart, Izuku knew there was only one answer.

"I have to leave, Katsuki," Izuku whispered. "I can't stay with you."

A piece of him broke seeing how Katsuki's face crumbled.

"But you shouldn't go back to that place," Katsuki tried to reason. His grip on Izuku's hands grew tighter, the same way they had that day in the nook. "Don't you like it here with me?"

"Of course I like it here but you're not making sense."

“No. You’re not making sense,” Katsuki snapped. “You have an out, Izuku. Why go back to a place where you’re fucking abused? You could stay here, and we could figure out a way to keep you away from people who would track you down. Look. I asked my supervisor about disappearance help—”

“—I don’t get to disappear, Katsuki,” Izuku cut off. He pulled his hands out of Katsuki’s and shook his head. “My life isn’t simple like that and going through some disappearance program won’t work for me.”

“Well, we can make it fucking work. How do you know if you don’t try? Hah? At least give it a shot.”

Izuku’s eyes welled up. This fantasy they were stuck in was truly torture of what would never be.

Izuku shook his head fast. “No. Katsuki, stop. That isn’t realistic—”

“—Realistic?” Katsuki huffed, frustrated. He leaned away from Izuku in disbelief. “Staying somewhere where you’re free versus a place you were fucking sold to isn’t realistic?”

Izuku gritted his teeth to keep from crying. “No. It’s not.”

“Y’know what—if we’re going to rip the reality Band-Aid off, let’s.”

Izuku’s heart thumped as Katsuki’s dangerous eyes locked onto him. Sitting inside of them was a violence that hadn’t been directed towards him in months. It made him still and then pause as visions of Katsuki hurting him flickered in the back of his mind.

Katsuki leaned menacingly into Izuku’s face, and they locked in unmoving stares. Katsuki curled his upper lip as he spat his next words.

“I’m not allowing you to go back to somewhere that forces you to kill.” Katsuki glowered. “I will triple deadbolt all these doors and break your limbs before I allow you to go back to somewhere like that, Izuku. And I fucking mean it.”

At that, Izuku became uneasy.

He leaned back a bit, realizing Katsuki’s eyes translated that he was telling the truth. Not an ounce of a lie or over exaggeration was there. Katsuki had full intentions of breaking his arm and legs if he made a move to leave.

“Especially when you should have been with me,” Katsuki continued. “You should’ve—You should’ve been with me all this time. Me leaving Tokyo was a mistake and we can correct it now. Why else would we have come across each other again all these years? It’s—”

Fate.

Izuku waited for Katsuki to say that word yet again.

He waited and waited, and maybe if he heard it he would believe they were truly fated if the other half of him did too. But the word never came because Katsuki didn't believe in fate and Izuku was beginning to question if he believed in it anymore either. Because if fate was him killing the mother of the only man he ever loved, then maybe Izuku had fate all wrong.

Maybe Katsuki was right in the end. There was no such thing as fate, only consequences.

"But you did leave Tokyo, and I didn't. That's reality," Izuku whispered. He looked down at his hands and traced that scar on his palm again. "We can't correct how we branched into different paths. No matter how much I wish we could, we can't and I'm pushing my limit, Katsuki. My time is basically up. I borrowed all the favors I could to stay here for as long as I can, but I can't stay any longer and we can't stay married."

Izuku's voice was pained beyond his years as he tried his best to push Katsuki away.

"Who the fuck do I have to kill if you need to get out?" Katsuki begged viciously. "That big brother? Your supervisor? The fucking Governor? I don't give a damn how many throats I have to slit if it means you don't go back to the place that you were trafficked to. Do you hear how insane that sounds?! You want to stay here, don't you?"

Izuku flinched at the mention of Tomura. A lifetime of beating made him turn his head away from Katsuki.

"Nothing in my life is about what I want," Izuku said solidly to remind himself exactly what he was.

"But if it was—you would want to stay here with me, wouldn't you?"

"Of course, I would."

"Exactly. You like it here. You want this type of life as badly as I do, and we fit together so fucking well."

Katsuki gently took Izuku's chin and turned his face so they could see each other. Izuku's wall was crumbling, and his emotions were beginning to be laid bare. He finally dared to look into Katsuki's eyes and all he saw was Mitsuki.

"You're more than a passing moment in my life and you know I'm more than that to you," Katsuki whispered and gently stroked Izuku's chin with his thumb. "These last few months were proof of how our lives should be—we should be together; we always should've been, and I don't want to let you go."

He cusped Izuku's face with both hands and held eye contact. Izuku's heart hurt as Katsuki wordlessly pleaded so deeply for him to give in to temptation once more.

"Please, Izuku. Stay with me this time," Katsuki begged.

And those were the words that broke him.

Izuku was pulled in every direction by different, intense feelings. On one end was Tomura. Another Chisaki. He even felt the strong hold of Hiryu and the cold grasp of Mitsuki. The most painful pull was Katsuki, tugging on his heart strings while everyone else was grabbing at his skin.

But worst of all, Izuku felt Katsuma holding on to him.

His face crumbled. He sobbed and lifted his trembling hands up to Katsuki's. He grasped Katsuki's wrists and slowly lowered their hands down onto his lap. He wished things were different but he had to leave for the better of everyone involved.

"I can't stay because there are kids," Izuku confessed.

He pulled that card and held it up in hopes that this would make the separation easier.

He never got around to telling Katsuki about the issue of the new cohort—and he secretly hoped he never had to. He knew that with Katsuki's passionate protectiveness, Katsuki would want to help. And one of Izuku's fears was anchoring Katsuki into the same pits of hell he was trapped in.

But maybe if he knew Izuku needed to leave to help others, then he would let him walk out that door without a fight.

"…What?" Katsuki whispered.

His eyes widened and Izuku could see his perspective did as well.

"A-At my home, in Tokyo—there's kids." Izuku tried to stop his tears and clenched his jaw. "I can't leave them there alone, Katsuki. I can't. I have one I'm supposed to watch over. I'm his big brother like my big brother is to me. His name is Katsuma and he's so soft. I can't leave him there to be broken and hurt. Or worse, killed."

"Have you been trying to get them out?" Katsuki asked, suddenly very sober on reality.

"Of course I have," Izuku said. "I could never forgive myself if I let them do what they did to me to them. I can't fix what occurred, but I can prevent it from happening again."

"Then let me help," Katsuki easily offered, but that wasn't what Izuku hoped he say. "I have the information of someone named Nana who might be able to get us a lead on what to do." And with every word Katsuki spoke, Izuku felt his patience grow thinner and thinner. Why wasn't this easier? "I can go back with you to Tokyo, and we can do it together and then we can—"

"No!" Izuku snapped angrily and tore himself away from Katsuki. "Just fucking stop!"

Katsuki slammed his fist on the table. "Are you serious?! Why are you so damn insistent on us being separated again?!"

"Because you're out!" Izuku's voice boomed on all the walls.

Katsuki was stunned speechless at the sheer volume that erupted from Izuku.

“You’re finally out, why would I drag you back in with my own mess?!” Izuku continued with a heavy heart. “Don’t you get it? This is why I have been trying to help you get set up. You’re done! You’re free! You can start all the way over! You deserve to be normal—at least that way one of us can be!”

Izuku’s chest heaved as he caught his breath.

His lips pulled back as he curled his fists. Guilt for ruining Katsuki’s life began to rot him from the inside out. He couldn’t accept Katsuki’s help now. Not after finding out he was the one responsible for making Katsuki an orphan.

“I’ll never be normal,” Izuku admitted gravely. “There is no contract or number of years for me to be released. This is who I am and between the two of us, only one of us is a real sinner and it’s not you. I have done t-terrible things, Katsuki. Shit I can’t undo no matter how much I wish I could and because of that, I cannot stay here. I want to do right for you, Katsuki and I’m not right for you.”

“You can’t decide what’s right for me—”

“—Believe me on this one,” Izuku whispered. “We’re not meant to be together.”

Izuku would never say out loud how much that hurt him to admit.

Katsuki didn’t say anything back.

Instead, he curled his fists and his frown hardened to the point Izuku saw new frown lines crease into his skin. Katsuki didn’t blink. He didn’t move. His eyes stayed sharply homed in on Izuku, and Izuku wondered what was going through his head as he showed no signs of emotions further.

The kettle on the stove top went off, reminding Izuku there was tea going. It whistled shrilly in their uncomfortable silence.

“You don’t mean that,” Katsuki hissed. “And you’re not fucking going back alone if I can help it. If you leave out of here without me, I am going to be right behind you whether you like it or not.” He stood up angrily and went back over to the stove to prepare two plates. “This conversation is done and we’re not getting a divorce.”

Izuku angrily wiped his tears away.

There was no point in responding. Katsuki was too stubborn and there was no way for him to see that this was the right move like they agreed to in the first place. It was here that Izuku realized the only way he would likely leave with his bones in tack was by catching Katsuki off guard.

Izuku watched as Katsuki walked back over to the dining table and unceremoniously shoved him his plate of curry and took a seat again.

They ate in silence and barely looked at each other.

Fourth Month of Honeymoon

Over the next few days Izuku tried to find ways to come out with the truth.

He tried practicing it in the mirror and even went over how to deliver it in his head. He tried to push past the part of him that was scared of Katsuki lashing out. But it was like coming in contact with a steel, Tomura shaped wall.

Every time he tried to tell Katsuki the truth face to face, all he saw was Tomura and those red folders.

Izuku kept his distance because of that and found himself reading again. It made him sad a bit, now that he understood this was his coping mechanism. But as he looked at the words on the page, he came across an idea: he could write the truth in a letter.

And technically—that wouldn't be saying anything. It was a tiny loophole in what Tomura instructed and the idea of writing the truth was easier than speaking it.

Izuku tried to write over the next day or so. He tried and tried to scribble the words in his notebook but nothing felt right. The first version felt too self-pitying. The second came across too emotionless. He ripped out pages from his notebook repeatedly, and began to grow angry with himself that he didn't know how to properly capture what he wanted to say.

The night after his fifth attempt at writing, Izuku tossed and turned.

He was unable to go to sleep as visions of Mitsuki's bloodied body haunted him. Izuku looked over at Katsuki who was sound asleep and decided to lock himself in the bathroom. He had stashed his notebook in there earlier so he could write without interruption. He quietly tried to scribble more words but was still unsatisfied with every sentence.

In a fit of frustration, he threw the notebook against the wall. He sobbed as he pushed the heels of his palms into his eyes and curled into himself on the ground.

"Wh-Why did it have to be this way?" Izuku sobbed angrily. "I don't understand. I don't want it to be like th-this."

But it was, and he needed to come to terms with it one way or another.

In the morning, Katsuki seemed sad. They hadn't cuddled since the fight and had been sleeping butt to butt in awkward silence. Usually Izuku got out of bed before Katsuki would say anything, but this time Katsuki turned over and lightly rubbed Izuku's shoulder.

"Good morning," Katsuki said quietly.

Izuku turned over and his heart clenched at how dejected Katsuki seemed. Izuku now felt guilty for causing Katsuki distress with his emotional withdrawal.

“Good morning, Kacchan,” Izuku said quietly. “Did you, um, sleep okay?”

“No,” Katsuki answered honestly.

Izuku didn’t either. He pressed his lip in a thin line and resisted the urge to say sorry. Katsuki then leaned forward and wrapped his arm around him. He kissed Izuku’s temple and rested his head against him.

“Look. I know you’re still upset from our fight, but how about we go somewhere together later today?” Katsuki suggested. “I would really like it if we went back to normal. I don’t think I like us being mad at each other like this.”

Izuku didn’t either. He knew that there was no way to go all the way back to the way they were, but Izuku didn’t want to give Katsuki anymore grief and pain.

“Okay,” Izuku agreed. “I-I don’t like us being mad at each other either.”

They smiled quietly at one another.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they got dressed and ready to leave, Katsuki was strangely calm. He was giving Izuku a quiet smile as he tied up his fall boots.

“Where are we going?” Izuku asked as he pulled on his fall jacket.

“You’ll see when we get there,” Katsuki explained, mumbling under his breath a bit. He smiled at Izuku and pulled on his leather jacket. “Are you ready to get going?”

Izuku nodded and grabbed his crutches. He needed to use them again to stabilize himself after finding sharp pain radiating up his leg. He assumed it was a minor setback after the encounter with both Tomura and whoever Katsuki’s coworker was.

Izuku began to hop on his crutches towards the door. Right when he was about to leave for outside, Katsuki stopped him. He squatted low as a signal for Izuku to get on his back. Izuku felt hesitant, still feeling the looming sensation of guilt crawling all over his bones.

But one look from Katsuki made Izuku climb on.

They walked outside into the higanbana field together. Izuku quietly rested his tired head against Katsuki’s, and wrapped his arms and legs tightly around him. It was still dark outside and before sunrise. Everything was silent in the gentle darkness as they traveled through the field of flowers towards the back of the estate.

Awaiting them at the edge of the field was a dense row of trees. Izuku thought maybe they would take a turn towards the road, but instead Katsuki stepped right into the forest.

Izuku was quiet and Katsuki was too. The howling wind blew through their hair when they were fully engulfed in the shadows. Above them were trees shaded in vibrant reds from the turning of seasons.

As they walked further in, Izuku felt Katsuki grow tensor with every step. His shoulders locked up and his heart rate skyrocketed. Izuku's attention was officially piqued when they found a stone pathway in the forest. They followed it all the way to a bridge that passed over a tiny stream. The echoing of the morning birds and running water were the only sound as they trekked deeper in the scarlet forestry.

"What is this place?" Izuku asked quietly.

"It's…better to show you."

The stones turned to an unkept, white marble path that looked as if it hadn't been tended to in years. The crunch of Katsuki's feet on the leaves under his boot pierced the silence.

When they arrived at the clearing, it was chilling. Izuku's breath caught at the sight.

Endless rows and rows of tombstones were neatly aligned with green moss overrunning them. Higanbana flowers naturally grew here too, making the dirt floor of the forest seem like it was painted red. In the back were the older tombs, reaching towards the sky as if they were alive and pointing to the deities in the questionable heavens. Those held the most moss covering them, swallowing whoever's name was written.

Then gradually as the rows pushed further and further to the front, newer tombs could be easily distinguished. They were a deep gray. Spots of stone peaked from underneath the thick green and on the tombs were names that faded away from the harshness of nature through the years.

In the utmost front row were three tombs. The newest ones.

Izuku could feel the eyes of ghosts looking straight into his soul.

Katsuki took a deep breath in. The wind cut through them again, and Izuku glanced above to stare at the strangely enchanting sight of thick vines hanging down from the treetops. The vines spread all around like veins, reaching and connecting every tomb.

Katsuki walked up to one grave and grew quiet.

The subtle etching of the name 'Mitsuki' was faintly visible.

Izuku's eyes went wide and his stomach dropped.

"This—This is…" The words trailed off, but he didn't need to finish.

"Yes. It. I…I moved her here when I found this place," Katsuki confessed. "It felt right to reunite them after they had spent a lifetime apart. Maybe they are finally making amends on the other side, or at least that's what I tell myself to feel better. Who knows if this was the right thing to do?"

Izuku hugged Katsuki tightly.

This felt wrong on many levels. He shouldn't be here, much less looking at her grave. He was trespassing on the sanctity of grounds like this.

Carefully, Katsuki let Izuku down. They both sat on the thick forest floor as the red leaves swayed above them. Izuku stared at Mitsuki's grave stone and saw how there was a tiny detail of carnations engraved into the stone. That small drawing made Izuku realize how good Katsuki was deep down. His heart was too pure for this world really, even despite his violent tendencies.

Izuku turned to Katsuki and smiled sadly.

"You did the right thing," Izuku said quietly. "You have a good heart, Kacchan."

"I hope I do," Katsuki muttered, unsure. "This is the only place I didn't have the real strength to come back to, more than the nursery. I feel guilty sometimes, living in that house and not paying my respects to the people who left it here for me."

Katsuki turned his eyes to the other two tombstones next to his mother. Izuku saw the names 'Ren' and 'Hina' were fainter than 'Mitsuki'.

"Do you ever wonder what they were like?" Izuku asked.

"All the time." Katsuki smiled a little. "I try to pick out which parts of my mother's personality belonged to who and it—it makes her feel complete."

Izuku lowered his head, paying respect. He remembered the way Katsuki's mother was smiling and eating popcorn on her couch and then the lovely way she was singing and cleaning right before he pulled the trigger.

A pain too large to describe took a hold of Izuku as he asked, "…What was she like?"

"She was a hurricane," Katsuki grumbled fondly. A lopsided smirk bloomed on his face. "Funny. Risk taker. Energetic. Secretive. Loud. Irresponsible. Caring in her own way."

Katsuki seemed to carry many of her traits.

"She sounds like she was nice." Izuku whispered. "I can tell you loved her a lot."

"I did, but I also resented her too," Katsuki admitted. "You know that type of resentment you feel guilty for, but it sits inside of you anyways. I used to ignore it all the time because I never want to hate her but…I think I'm finally accepting that two truths can exist at once. I loved her fiercely. But I resented her quietly."

The wind blew between them, shaking the leaves and swaying the vines above their heads.

"I…I brought you here because this is the last part of me, Izuku."

Katsuki turned inwards towards him and there was fountains of guilt pooling out of Izuku. It tripled and the waves grew larger and larger until Izuku could no longer keep his head above the water.

Katsuki took Izuku's hand in his and gripped it tightly as he continued speaking.

"There's nothing more I think I can show you or tell you. You have all of me and this is the most vulnerable I've ever been with anyone. I know you don't like to talk about yourself a lot —and I can respect that because it is easy to see certain things hurt you to think about. But I want you to see all of me because I trust you—entirely."

Izuku sadly smiled as another wave of guilt rocked him.

He tried to say the words of the truth but he couldn't. He couldn't bear to hurt Katsuki here, where his mother spirit rested. Instead Izuku embraced him and buried his face into his neck. His hands threaded through Katsuki's hair and he held back tears.

"Thank you for trusting me enough to bring me here," Izuku whispered. "I trust you too."

ᔓᔓᔓ

A large bit of Izuku's anxiety was buried after that. Katsuki trusted him, and Izuku trusted him too. This proved Katsuki would never hurt him no matter what Tomura insisted. As the sun rose, Katsuki said he wanted to check if something was still in the back of the graveyard.

He quickly walked away, and left Izuku alone in front of the grave of Mitsuki.

Izuku stared at the grave and without much effort, he imagined Mitsuki in front of him smirking in the same way Katsuki always did.

She was beautiful.

"I'm sorry," Izuku quietly confessed. He lowered his head and plucked four flowers from beside him. He tied them together with a small vine to create a makeshift bouquet. "I'm so sorry for what I did. I'll do everything I can to make it up to you and your son."

He placed the tiny bouquet on the grave and bowed his head all the way to the ground.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Katsuki came back, he gathered Izuku and led them to the back of the gravesite.

The Bakugous who lived here before them clearly cherished their family lineage. Katsuki's ancestors made the family grave site something extraordinary. They made death seem peaceful and like it was a work of art instead of something gloomy and morbid.

A small lake was found the further into the grave site they went, and there was an all-white gazebo poised like a lone soldier who survived years of grief by itself. It was overrun with vines and dusted with red leaves. It was perfectly stationed next to the lake, giving a sanctuary to rest.

Katsuki wandered near it, and they sat inside. Wordlessly, the two of them watched the sunrise together. It wasn't the first sunrise they witnessed with the other, but this one was different. The rosy dusk bled up from the ground and into the water. It spread all over like harmless fire, covering everything in its warmth.

Both of them stared quietly.

Izuku studied their reflections in the water. He stared and stared as if they would shape shift into two people who might have a shot of being together. Then as the sun rose fully, a part of Izuku melted. He and Katsuki began to talk about the future, and what it would be like to live in different lifetimes together.

Katsuki's brilliant grin rivaled the sun behind him as they talked. In this elegant moment, Izuku could picture a million lifetimes with Katsuki. He knew they must've had great ones before this, and how beautiful their love must have been to stretch through different universes over and over again. Izuku hoped that when their next lifetime came around, it would be better and more gentle than this one.

Katsuki turned his body towards Izuku, and he took his hand. Then Katsuki dropped three words that would forever change the shape of Izuku's soul.

"I love you, Izuku," Katsuki confessed.

Izuku's eyes softened, and his tears poured down. His heart soared higher than ever, and he could feel the part of him that ever doubted how Katsuki cared for him fade away.

"I love you too, Katsuki," Izuku confessed back.

The weight on his chest lifted and released him. Everything clicked together as he looked at Katsuki in that ethereal moment. They were truly two souls crafted from the same tragic substance and their lives were so smoothly connected in every way.

Izuku understood now; In both love and pain, they were one.

After exchanging 'I love yous', Izuku found peace.

The side of him that was made doubtful by Tomura into believing Katsuki didn't care for him was vanquished. It was slain with the glimmering sword of Katsuki's love and Izuku never felt more cared for in his life. But because of that, it was the exact reason he couldn't stay in Katsuki's life.

He felt secure enough to let Katsuki know the truth through writing. When they got home later that night, Izuku found the words to put into a letter as if Katsuki's kiss breathed them into him.

That night in the bathroom, Izuku poured his heart into writing his goodbye letter.

He wrote down everything and left out no detail. From start to finish he detailed what happened the day of The Incident. Izuku took full responsibility for his role in it all and promised to kill Chisaki for both Katsuki and Mitsuki. Izuku even detailed the deal that was on the table regarding his so-called ‘virginity’ and how he would use that to get close to Chisaki. He would easily find a slow but steady way to kill him.

He wrote about how he would send signed divorce papers to the estate when he could. He apologized in a million different ways.

As Izuku finished writing the lengthy apology letter, he hesitated on the last line. His hand shook as he thought about doing something that would either damn him or truly give Katsuki peace.

Izuku wrote down his cell phone number.

If Katsuki needed more closure after reading this, Izuku knew he owed him that much.

When he finished, the letter was ten pages long and covered in tears. Some blotches of blue ink bled with the wetness on the paper, making some words run like a watercolor painting. Izuku shakily folded up all the pages and tucked them neatly in an envelope.

He wrote ‘To: Katsuki. From: Izuku. The truth about your mother and why I needed to leave’ on it and sealed it shut.

After that, they went back to normal.

Izuku was able to accept his sin and take it in stride. He told himself he owed Katsuki happiness in his last few weeks with him and not to burden him any further. So Izuku smiled, he laughed, they were intimate and Izuku made sure to bring his husband all the joy in the world as a form of repentance.

The first week after their love confessions, they traveled around like they used to.

Katsuki happily gave him piggy back rides everywhere and Izuku peppered kisses all along Katsuki’s cheekbones. They finished trying all the various cuisines they set out to taste and every dinner was romantic as could be.

“You should come back to these,” Izuku said happily. He smiled across at his husband at the candle lit table in the Thai restaurant. “They’re so good!”

It made Izuku’s heart sing with joy when Katsuki taped the list of their favorite restaurants to the fridge the next day.

The second week after their love confessions, Katsuki composed his very first song.

Katsuki had been in classes for a while now, and he wanted to give it a shot. What he wrote was a violin solo that was somehow soft yet sharp. Mysterious yet vulnerable. When Izuku played it for Katsuki it felt like his husband somehow captured the real essence of what the word ‘juxtaposition’ meant. Izuku wondered what inspired it.

“You’re going to make the most beautiful songs,” Izuku said when he finished playing. “I can’t wait to hear what you create.”

He smiled thinking about the music-filled future Katsuki would have. Izuku had no doubts he would hear his husband’s songs being played in some lavish concert hall.

After that, Katsuki began to construct a series of violin solos.

The third week after their love confessions, they watched a string of Izuku’s favorite romance movies.

They snuggled up on the couch every night and Izuku showed Katsuki all the reasons why these particular films he adored more than others. He analyzed the movies down to the very last montage, saying that nothing was done at random. He did this because he could see Katsuki’s eyes twinkle whenever he talked about his own passions. He figured he could afford Katsuki one last happy moment like this.

The fourth week after their confessions, Izuku helped him plant a bundle of pink carnations in the backyard.

After learning pink carnations were Mitsuki’s favorite, Izuku found that it would be a good sign of respect to plant some. They put a bundle next to the garden, but still far away enough from the house that it wasn’t always such a painful reminder. For this, Katsuki expressed gratitude.

He lovingly hugged Izuku and told him thank you.

ɯɯɯ

Last Day of Honeymoon

When Tomura’s call came, Izuku was reading on the porch with the pitter patter of rain to keep him company. The ringtone usually gave Izuku a jolt of anxiety, but this time it was the saddest hymn he ever heard. Izuku slowly closed his book and answered the call with a heavy heart.

“Hello?” Izuku whispered.

“It’s time,” Tomura said calmly. “Be ready to leave in an hour.”

Izuku looked out at the rain clouds. “Okay.”

Tomura hung up and Izuku slid his phone in his pocket. He placed his book down slowly as his fingers began to tremble ever so slightly. He hunched forward in the wooden rocking chair and his eyes glazed over with raw emotion. He took one last look at the beautiful garden in the middle of the estate and said his quiet goodbyes to it.

With patience, he unwrapped his cast and finally removed it. The air against his skin was rejuvenating. He was fully healed.

Izuku tested walking and he was given no trouble. He rolled his ankle experimentally and was mildly disappointed how quickly time passed. It didn't feel like enough—but Izuku knew it never would be. The only amount of time with Katsuki that would truly be satisfactory would be forever.

Izuku walked back inside, leaving the book on the porch as he began to make his way to the bathroom. He pulled a blank mask of emotions for what he needed to do. He opened the medicine cabinet and pulled out his special cherry chapstick.

It was laced with a small, harmless chemical that Izuku himself was immune to.

Three years ago, Ibarra made this chapstick for him to use on his seduction and kill missions. In theory, a simple kiss and his target would be knocked out. But Izuku never used it because he had no desire to kiss and kill.

Now, he was going to have to use it for the very first time on Katsuki.

Part of Izuku didn't want to. But he knew walking out that door with Katsuki awake would be impossible. Katsuki kept his promises, and he would break Izuku's bones if he tried to leave here without him. And if Tomura arrived in a struggle like that, Katsuki would be six feet deep in the graveyard with the rest of his bloodline within the minute.

Izuku breathed in slowly as he coated his lips in the poisonous gloss.

He straightened his shoulders like a soldier and wandered back into their bedroom. Katsuki was sitting on the bed politely, flipping through the black folder he had brought back from his old headquarters.

Izuku's heart rate jumped to a new high when Katsuki smiled at him. Like always.

"Did you enjoy reading your book?" Katsuki asked gently.

He put the black folder on the nightstand to give Izuku all his attention. Izuku's eyes flickered to the black folder and then back to Katsuki with a loving smile.

Izuku nodded sweetly. "I did. The rain really made me feel like I was in the atmosphere. Only thing that would have made it better was if you read it to me, Kacchan."

"I can read a chapter to you tonight, if you really want." Katsuki smiled back at him and Izuku's heart clutched. "I'm happy you're enjoying all those novels. They were super hard to find, turns out you're not the only nerd fighting to read those sappy books."

Izuku climbed in the bed and snuggled closely to his husband one last time. "Thank you again for finding those for me."

Katsuki snaked an arm around Izuku's waist. "Of course. Anything for you, darling."

Izuku's eyes flickered with deep longing at the mention of 'darling'. He realized then he would never hear such a sweet name from his love's lips again. Izuku smiled gentler and his eyes became shinier in the dim, bedroom light. His hand pushed forward, touching Katsuki's cheek bone. He grazed it so lightly, trying to memorize the shape of him.

Katsuki turned his body inwards and smiled lovingly with half hooded eyes.

Izuku then cupped Katsuki's cheek and leaned their foreheads together.

"I love you so much," Izuku whispered rawly.

"I love you too, darling," Katsuki muttered back.

Katsuki pulled Izuku close to him and both of their eyes naturally closed. The pounding in Izuku's chest hammered until his limbs ached as he relished in their last embrace.

He tried to memorize everything. He took a deep breath in and the sweet smell of cinnamon filled his lungs. He brushed Katsuki's soft blond hair backwards and loved the way his skin was warm. His husband always ran hot. The firm arms encircling him were gentle in a way Izuku knew he would crave for the rest of his life.

Then Katsuki leaned in.

Izuku closed his eyes as his husband kissed him softly.

It was time.

Izuku kissed him back slowly.

Katsuki opened his mouth and tilted Izuku's head when he tasted the sweetness of his chapstick. Izuku steadied himself and pushed into the kiss. His shaking hands gripped Katsuki's shirt and Katsuki was swept under the feeling of their union. Katsuki bit at Izuku's bottom lip and his tongue swiped at the inside of his mouth as if he was trying to get a better taste. Izuku's heart became heavy as he shifted from holding Katsuki's shirt to cradling him.

They broke apart and Izuku sadly smiled at his soon to be ex-husband.

Izuku watched with a broken heart as Katsuki's face went from loving to confused. He swayed slightly and his cheeks became warmer. He blinked progressively slower and slower until his head lulled with its weight.

"Iz—" Katsuki's eyes widened when his tongue was heavy. He grasped urgently at Izuku's shirt; fist tight. "Iz-Izuku—"

Izuku held Katsuki's hand.

Tears now steadily streamed out of Izuku's beautiful green eyes and they dropped directly onto Katsuki. Izuku broke down as he watched Katsuki try to say the words "don't cry" in broken syllables.

Even now, Katsuki still loves him so purely and fully. Izuku held him as Katsuki's grip on him went slack and his arms dropped to the mattress like a lifeless doll.

"My time is up." Izuku's voice cracked. "I'm sorry, Kacchan. I love you so much."

A lone tear escaped out of Katsuki's eye as he slowly slipped into an unconscious state. He went completely still and the heaviness of his weight dragged Izuku down to lay on the bed. Izuku wiped away the tear from Katsuki's cheek and broke down fully. He cried into Katsuki's chest as he clung to him.

All the waves of guilt dragged him under as he clutched the man who would soon no longer be his husband. He wanted to thank Katsuki for allowing him to know who he was past the layers of their reality and who he might've been with him. That was a gift he could never hold or even quantify.

Maybe in the next life they could be happy.

ɯɯɯ

When he finished crying and gathered himself, Izuku packed up all his belongings. He wiped his face and put on his emotional armor. Right as he was packing his last sweater, he looked at the nightstand where the black folder was. Katsuki mentioned this several times, it was supposed to be a way out for people who were in desperate need of disappearing.

Curiosity prickled at him as he looked at it.

Izuku checked his phone. There were a few more minutes until Tomura arrived.

He walked over to the black folder and opened it.

Immediately, Izuku didn't understand the scribbles inside. It was a cluster of sticky notes, tabs, papers and photographs of people who he'd never seen. There was an old black and white picture of a woman with black hair and dark eyes. Attached to her photo was a yellow sticky note that read 'Nana?' in Katsuki's hand writing in red ink.

Izuku flipped through the papers some more and his eyes widened with each piece he put together. Katsuki was right about this. People could use this to disappear and get far far away from whatever danger was chasing them.

He then read one fine printed detail that said Nana was able to help ten people at a time. She couldn't take on more than that because of the time constraints and the effort it took to forge legal documents. An idea clicked together in Izuku's head reading that.

He glanced at Katsuki on the bed sadly. Izuku sighed and kissed Katsuki's forehead.

He really was an angel.

“I’m sorry,” Izuku whispered against Katsuki’s warm skin. “I know you wanted to use this on me, but it would help someone else who deserves it more.”

Izuku closed the black folder and proceeded to pack it in his suitcase.

He could use this for the kids and their families. He had always been thinking in the back of his mind what would happen after he delivered the kids back home and how safe would their families really be. The kids were old enough to talk about what they were raised in. And as far as The Academy was concerned, five was old enough to be killed for talking.

But this—if he found Nana and gave her the information on the kids and their families—they could all go on and lead safe, happy lives.

Izuku pressed his lips in a thin line and took one last look at Katsuki. His hands trembled as he placed the envelope of his letter between Katsuki’s fingers.

He neatly folded Katsuki’s hands over it and gave Katsuki’s cheek one last goodbye kiss.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku waited on the porch with his luggage for Tomura to arrive. He held his head down as the rain poured heavier with each passing moment. When the sound of a vehicle approaching reached him, Izuku lifted his head.

He saw Tomura’s luxury black car park close to the gates of the estate. His brother stepped out wearing all black and holding up a black umbrella. In the passenger seat Izuku could see Himiko sitting inside with her arms folded. She sported sunglasses on her expressionless face.

Tomura walked up to the gate and Izuku picked up his bags. He walked out of the gates and Tomura took one of his bags without saying a word. They loaded up the car and closed the trunk with a heavy thud.

Izuku stared blankly at the trunk. He felt strange, like this wasn’t really happening. Or he wasn’t really here. A warm hand slid over his shoulder and Izuku turned to see Tomura gazing at him with genuine pity.

“This is for the best,” Tomura said.

Izuku nodded quietly. He looked over at the estate and felt like he wasn’t finished yet.

“Can…Can I take one last look around?” Izuku whispered. He stared at the thick forest in the back. He thought about Mitsuki. “I want to say goodbye to one more person.”

Tomura followed his gaze to the woods. He pursued his lips to the side but sighed in defeat.

“Okay,” Tomura agreed reluctantly. “One last look around but that’s it. Then we go home.”

Izuku and Tomura walked away from the car and towards the gravesite.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Through Golden Eyes

Himiko watched from inside of the car as Tomura and Izuku walked away. A bitter, putrid feeling tangled inside of her heart at the sight.

Izuku was let off easy—yet again. Izuku always managed to somehow be the one goddamn viper who didn't have to be perfect in order to survive. All because he got lucky and got Tomura as his Big.

Himiko gazed on with envy as Izuku and Tomura took a fucking sentimental stroll around the estate. She didn't need to hear to know it was probably because Izuku wanted 'one more look around' before departing. Always such a pathetic weakling. If this had been anyone else to run off with a goddamn outsider, they would have been gutted.

But because it was Izuku, he was saved.

Himiko glared at the estate, and wondered what life would have been like to experience that type of love. She had no doubt that whatever Izuku and that stranger Katsuki shared was potent and untouchable. But she couldn't help but feel deeply hurt as she thought about it.

Izuku and Katsuki cared for each other ever since they were kids.

It mirrored how she used to care for Sen in a similar way.

Sen was the boy from her childhood who was supposed to be her other half. Not in a romantic sense, but in a true, binding sibling love. Her Big Sister Kuin was always cold. She never felt like family, and the other vipers in their home were nothing but strangers to Himiko too.

Everyone's eyes would always pass her up unless she was displaying some sort of vicious act of bloodlust. All she wanted was to connect with someone, and she had. The very first true, human connection she ever felt was with Sen.

It happened on the day her Big Sister told her they were going to be killers at the tender age of five.

Her Big Sister Kuin made it no secret to her in the same way Jin made it no secret to Sen. Those two were never quite good at following the rules aboutt keeping the cohorts in the dark until they were ten. When both she and Sen grasped that they were being raised to kill, they knew they needed each other to survive the hell they were going to endure.

During those days in the basement, she would be beaten, starved, and locked in dark boxes. The only light she could cling to was the thought of Sen, her true brother, to help her through. And every day Sen waited for her. He would be standing there with everything she needed to help heal her wounds when no one else did. Like a real brother.

She thought they would grow up together and be two sibling souls who understood each other through everything. They were going to have each other's back and be safeguarded from the world by their fierceness.

But instead she was burdened to be alone for the rest of her life because Izuku stole her one life line.

And every day after, she was forced to watch as Izuku got let off easy.

When Himiko messed up, she was sent to the basement where their caretakers would torture her by breaking bones and pulling fingernails. But when Izuku messed up, Tomura took him up to their room and gave him a simple spanking with a belt. Then some nights, Tomura would even make Izuku his favorite ramen right after. It went on like this.

Himiko needed to be a perfect viper. Izuku got to be riddled with imperfection.

Himiko couldn't indulge in any fantasies. Izuku has a library of banned books.

Himiko couldn't feel love anymore. Izuku loved someone all his life.

The hypocrisy of higher standards she was held to wasn't fair—and because of that Himiko hated Izuku with every fiber of her being.

All she wanted was for Izuku to be dragged down to her level and feel what it was like to be truly alone in the world. He was always protected by that damn Tomura and now she learned he was always loved by this Katsuki. Izuku didn't know what it was like to be a real viper, and because of that she never would consider him family. Their suffering was not symmetrical.

She watched Tomura and Izuku disappear off to the back into the trees. The scornful look in her eyes amplified once they were out of sight.

She unlocked the car door.

She grabbed for her backpack and walked up to the door of the estate. The hate inside of her was boiling over, and there was no one else to blame except Izuku. Maybe if he never killed Sen then she would know compassion and reasoning like he did.

But he stole that away and now all she could feel was spite.

She picked the lock on the estate easily and slithered inside.

The quaintness of the home was nearly admirable. It was cozy enough for two and smelled like freshly baked pie. She curiously wandered into the bedroom to peer at Katsuki who was passed out on the bed. Dried tears were clinging to his cheeks as his body twitched in his unconscious state.

She scoffed at how pathetic he was too and was about to leave until something caught her eye. She walked up close to Katsuki and saw a letter neatly folded in his hands. She leaned in closely to see it was signed with 'To: Katsuki, From: Izuku' in shitty handwriting.

Himiko reached forward to pluck it from Katsuki's limp hands and opened it. A massive hill of papers greeted her and she leisurely skimmed the pages. As her eyes scanned through the paragraphs, she realized this was a detailed recounting of the death of Bakugou Mitsuki and an apology.

Every detail from that night was listed: How Izuku didn't see the folder and didn't know what Mitsuki looked like until he held up the sniper rifle. He even wrote that he tackled Himiko to stop her out of a strange instinct, which led to him running away for a short couple of hours.

Himiko was even surprised to learn through this letter how Tomura held a blade to Izuku's throat and forced him to pull the trigger. He had no clue what Mitsuki's name was at the time of the murder, or even when they spent time together. He said if he knew he would have confessed right away.

However, despite all this, Izuku reasonably stated he took full responsibility.

Himiko could tell Izuku gave this letter a lot of thought. It was almost admirable how well written it was. But she didn't bother to read more when it began to get too mushy for her liking.

When she stopped her skimming, she was surprised that even she found the letter to be touching despite her no longer having a heart to touch. Hell, Katsuki could potentially find the situation to be understandable if he read this. Then his stupid little heart would likely forgive Izuku if given appropriate time.

Himiko curled her lip in disgust at that thought.

She unzipped her backpack, tucked away Izuku's letter and pulled out the red folder for Bakugou Mitsuki that she had stolen from the records back home.

If what Tomura said was true, then Izuku's loose cannon of a boyfriend would come to kill him the second he opened this. Because without the explanation and just the plain, cold facts the situation looked terrible.

After all, misunderstandings were the number one relationship killer in romantic novels.

And even if Katsuki didn't succeed in killing Izuku, what better way to break Izuku's bleeding heart down into pieces? No hopeless romantic could emotionally recover from being nearly murdered by the person they loved the most in this world. It would be a taste of poetic tragedy and the cherry on top would be potentially blowing up whatever deal Tomura brokered with Chisaki.

Fuck them both.

She walked back into the kitchen and went straight for the sink. She wet her fingers slightly. Carefully, she flicked droplets across the folder to make it seem like Izuku was leaning over this sobbing his cry baby eyes out. It would be believable if his predictable ass tears were involved.

Her slender hand sat down the red folder on the kitchen table neatly.

“Rip his goddamn heart out, Katsuki,” Himiko whispered with scathing vengeance.

Chapter End Notes

buckles you in and pats your head

Thanks so much for reading!! Let me know your reactions below :)

Chapter 27: Senza

Chapter Summary

> Senza (Qualifier) - To be Without
>
> Izuku learns to learn what it is like to be without Katsuki.

Chapter Notes

> Hellooo!! Welcome back to this choochoo train of angst!
>
> First, thank you to the LOML Luna for betaing!! Secondly, I'm so excited to kick off this part of the fic :)) Small note, I know couple of people were asking about Katsuki's POV and his POV will come back eventually. The plot hinges on staying in Izuku's POV for a while longer, but there will be a flip to Katsuki and then it'll go to alternating POVs :) Thanks for your patience!
>
> I hope you all enjoy!!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 27 — Senza

.

.

.

The rain storm picked up as soon as Tomura began driving away from the Bakugou estate.

Izuku sat quietly in the backseat while Himiko sat in the passenger side with Tomura next to her. The two of them chatted while Izuku watched as the sanctuary he'd grown used to faded into its surroundings.

His eyes never left the home as it grew smaller and smaller until it was no longer visible.

A sharp pain hit his chest the second he could no longer see it.

Izuku held back from crying as all the memories from the last four months danced in front of him, vivid as ever. He could hear Katsuki's voice and feel his callus touch. He could see his smile and smell the warmth of home cooked meals that they shared every day.

A new, unfamiliar emotion settled inside of him. It snuck into his body and wedged its way between his logic and his sanity. Izuku leaned his head against the window when suddenly it felt too heavy to keep upright.

His chest ached once more and suddenly Izuku knew what he was feeling.

He was experiencing his first heartbreak.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku stayed silent the whole ride back to Tokyo.

He didn't utter a single word, not even when prompted by either his brother or sister. He didn't speak not because he was pissed at them, but more so at himself. A list of regrets began to pile up. Should haves. Could haves. Would haves. He reviewed every painful flop he had done within the last month with agony.

Funny how now that he was separated from Katsuki, he felt like he knew how he should have handled everything. Hindsight truly was 20/20.

There was a piece of him that regretted not giving Katsuki the letter sooner. How could he have acted like everything was fine that last month? Izuku was utterly disgusted at himself for how well of an act he put up in Katsuki's face despite knowing what he did.

He really was a snake—wasn't he?

When they made it back into the city limits, Izuku felt nearly blinded by the neon lights. He squinted and lowered his head away from all the pulsing electronic screens.

"We're home," Himiko said a bit too cheerily. She turned in her seat to grin at Izuku with half mooned eyes. "Glad you got to enjoy a little vacation before getting right back to work."

Izuku lowered his head away from her. He leaned back on the leather seat to try to close his eyes. He heard his brother and sister murmuring in the front, probably about him.

When Izuku opened his eyes again, he caught Tomura looking at him through the rearview mirror.

“This is for the best, Izuku,” Tomura suddenly said. “Trust me. You’re going to forget all about this soon. We all make mistakes in life but we move on.”

“Well, Vipers don’t make mistakes,” Himiko added snidely. “But of course, Izuku does.”

Izuku had no energy to rebuttal.

By the time they reached the tall cluster of skyscrapers they called home, it was storming. The thick clouds trapped Tokyo in what felt like a dense snow globe of downpour and the sky was hardly visible. They circled around the back of their home and headed towards the garage area.

When they pulled into the driveway, Tomura clicked the button on his keys to open the black gates. They opened up slowly, perfectly welcoming them home with open arms.

Tomura pulled up straight to the back door, and both Izuku and Himiko made a move to get out once the car stopped.

“Izuku, you stay put,” Tomura commanded. “Himiko, you can go inside. Have a good rest of your night.”

Izuku frowned. He watched quietly as Himiko got out of the car like she knew what was about to happen. She held up her blood red umbrella, turned and said her goodbyes to them. She spared Izuku a single, knowing glance before walking away.

When Himiko was safely inside, Tomura began driving again—right out of the gates.

Izuku sat up all the way, confused. “Where are we going?”

“You are going to your new home,” Tomura replied. “You no longer live in the Viper Complex anymore.”

“What?” Izuku exclaimed. “What the hell do you mean—”

“Language,” Tomura harshly cut down. “Do not fix your mouth to use foul words towards me. Ever.”

Izuku bit his tongue. He had picked up cursing so flippantly from Katsuki. He lowered his head in respect and his heart rate increased.

“I’m sorry,” Izuku whispered. “I was surprised. Wh-What do you mean I don’t live in the complex anymore? What about Katsuma? How will I take care of him?”

“I moved both you and Katsuma to my oceanside property,” Tomura answered. “After I got the King Cobra title and salary, I started investing in real estate. I have a private house on the outskirts of Tokyo with enforced security. That’s where you will stay from now on.”

Izuku's mind began racing a mile per minute.

He was being isolated.

Never in history had a viper who was not a handler lived out of their complex. Hell, even Nine lived in the penthouse that they were staying in. Ms. Nagant and One were the only ones from their family who lived off the premises. But they were both still nearby.

This closeness was a key part of their family dynamic. It was to ensure that they were always together and had each other to train, talk, and rely on. It eliminated the need for social interaction outside of their own kind.

"May I ask why?" Izuku whispered. "This is…not protocol."

"Because of that dangerous blond," Tomura said curtly. "I told you I need you safe until Chisaki gives me power. So in the meantime, you will remain in a place that I know is well guarded. You will have no missions and you're not permitted to go outside. I'll have Jin and Ibara run errands for you until the day comes."

When they got back on the highway Izuku barely felt human. Instead, it was like he shape-shifted into some object being placed under lock and key.

Tomura glanced at him through the reflection and shook his head.

"Don't be so ungrateful, Izuku," Tomura lectured impatiently. "It's a whole house. You and Katsuma will practically have it to yourself. There's a pool, a room for each of you, and more. Besides, this way you'll get to spend unlimited time with Katsuma after neglecting him for so long to go act like a whore."

"Right," Izuku muttered. He forced himself to agree to avoid conflict. "Thank you for thinking of my safety."

"I always do."

After a few beats of silence, Izuku asked, "How long until the deal with Chisaki comes?"

"It's officially three weeks away."

Izuku probed his tongue on the inside of his cheek. He leaned back into the leather seat once more and resigned himself. He gazed back up at the sky through the window and caught the sight of several beads of rain that bled into each other.

Three weeks of isolation.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they arrived near Tomura's private property, it was as remote as he promised.

They drove to a wooded area where the road turned nearly dirt like until they arrived at spiked, silver gates. They were lined with intricate details of horned vipers, mimicking the endless viper tattoos that were inked on Tomura's skin.

Tomura pulled up to the keypad and punched in a code. Slowly, the new gates opened for them to reveal a well-kept driveway. They drove up the pavement until the sight of a luxurious home came into view.

It was embedded into the side of the cliff and appeared posher than the homes in the magazines Izuku would sometimes flip through. The sleek all black color had silver accents and large dark colored curtains blocked off the glass windows that were stand-in walls.

As they drew closer, Izuku could see several familiar faces.

All of the guards were lower ranked Vipers. They stood around the entire perimeter with long rifles, hand guns, and even katanas secured to their backs. They were dressed in all white and their sharp eyes were homed in on the car as they approached.

Tomura parked his vehicle in the front and the gates behind him closed.

Izuku slowly got out of the car with his umbrella opened. Tomura popped the trunk and they both grabbed for his bags. As they walked up the luxe stairs to his new home, Izuku felt all the eyes of the lower ranked Vipers on him.

Some of them whispered to themselves and others gave him a cold stare.

Tomura unlocked the doors and upon entry Izuku looked around. Everything was decorated exactly to Tomura's well refined tastes. All black, leather and minimal decor. It was sterile just like their primary home and Izuku immediately missed the coziness of the Bakugou estate.

"C'mon, let me show you where everything is," Tomura said.

They both took their shoes off, put down their umbrellas, and began to walk around.

Izuku stayed quiet as Tomura showed him all the different rooms. Four bathrooms. Five bedrooms. Katsuma's bedroom was right next to Izuku's and there was a home movie theater. At the very top of the house was a sunroom filled with plants, and the kitchen was a rustic modern decor with four stoves.

It was perfect, really. Packed to the brim with everything someone could want.

There was so much space here that if this was a mere six months ago, Izuku would have been thrilled.

He finally got his own home separate from Tomura—but now all he could feel was loneliness. Even with all this extravagance, nothing would feel like home ever again now that he knew what it was like to be with Katsuki. And now he knew, all this glitter they were bathed in was nothing more than shackles made of silver and gold.

"And lastly, this is your new library," Tomura announced when they approached the last room.

Izuku snapped out of his mindless daze when the door pushed open.

Endless rows and rows of books towered over them. The shelves reached up to the high ceiling, covering the entirety of three out of four walls. On the fourth wall was a large window shielded by black curtains and there was a sleek reading chair tucked in the corner.

Izuku walked into the center of the room, slowly. He looked up at the endless books.

“I figured this would be something you would like,” Tomura said. “All romance novels. Now you can indulge in your defective fantasies whenever you please without the need to go out searching for it.”

Izuku turned to Tomura. His brother was gazing at him waiting for his response.

Izuku quickly faked happiness the best he could and bowed respectfully.

“Thank you for always thinking of me,” Izuku whispered.

“Of course,” Tomura said. “Now, I have to get back to the penthouse, but in the meantime I have asked Jin and Ibara to come by in the morning and drop off groceries for you and Katsuma. They’ll come by once a week to give you two fresh foods and if there’s anything you need, contact Ibara directly. Okay?”

“Okay,” Izuku said in a small voice.

“I have to get back to Tokyo now. Get a goodnight’s rest, Izuku.”

“You too.”

Tomura spared one more pity filled glance and walked away. The door to the library closed, leaving Izuku there by himself in the middle of the room.

Izuku stayed still, waiting until he heard the front door open and shut. When he was officially alone in this large house, the numbness finally settled back in. The heartbreak that had found itself a home in his chest was back again, and this time it ached to be tended to.

Izuku turned to the books behind him to give his hurting soul what it wanted.

He walked forward and grabbed the first book at eye level. He opened it, read the first few lines and then placed it on the ground. He did this again and again until there was a pile next to his feet. He tried to gather all the books he might begin with, hoping to shove something inside of him to satisfy this void in his chest like he always used to.

With a light wobble, Izuku sat down on the expensive carpet.

He began to read the first book he picked out. He viewed the words through his bleary vision, hoping this would be the fix to drown out all the memories that were tormenting him. He read the first line, but immediately compared it to a memory he shared with Katsuki.

He kept on reading, but soon found himself unwillingly comparing every scene to real life.

Izuku figured it was this one book that didn't quite meet his needs so he put it down. He grabbed for the next one but the same thing happened. More memories overshadowed the scenes and made it impossible for him to get swept away in the fantasy world.

Izuku then grabbed for the next book and then the next and once again the next.

Izuku read passage after passage and discarded every book the moment it failed to catch his interest. Every sentence fell flat and no scene spoke to his heart the way it used to. What used to inspire hope now only added to the growing void deep inside of him. The ache in his chest was hungry and it was demanding to be fed—but no book could satisfy him.

Izuku stopped his motions.

He placed down the book in his hands in his lap and gazed up at the endless wall of novels.

It was then Izuku understood why this wasn't working.

None of these stories would ever really compare to his and Katsuki's.

Izuku now accepted that his romance books and movies were all coping mechanisms. Every beautiful metaphor and simile he read was a lazy patch job for the hole inside of him. He thought if he piled enough whimsical stories on top of the void in his heart, he could ignore the emptiness inside of him for the rest of his miserable life.

But he made one miscalculation. He never expected to know what it really felt like to be loved. To be held. To be wanted so deeply that he felt it through all his past lives. He could never go back to simply daydreaming about romance as a concept now that he knew the concrete thing.

No story he would ever indulge in again could hold a candle to the love Katsuki had shown him.

And now, nothing could ease the ache in his chest except one, singular person.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku walked up to Katsuma's room with his bags.

He only meant to peek in, but was surprised to see Katsuma's big brown eyes peeking at him from under the covers.

Izuku's heart lit up and his eyes brightened immediately. He playfully cocked his head at his little brother and immediately Katsuma giggled and waved.

"Hi 'Zuku!" Katsuma whispered and kicked his feet a little under the covers. "I-I missed you so much!"

Izuku grinned ear to ear. He placed down his bags and walked over to Katsuma. Immediately, the ache in his heart quelled a little.

“I missed you too, buddy,” Izuku said. He sat down beside the tiny bed and stroked Katsuma’s hair. His little brother glanced towards the door. Izuku turned to look over his shoulder too, and understood who Katsuma was checking for. Izuku turned back to Katsuma and gave a sad, reassured smile. “He’s gone. It’s going to be only us from now on.”

At this, Katsuma seemed nervous but happy. “Only us?”

Izuku hummed and nodded. “Yup. Sometimes Jin and Ibara will come by but it’ll be just me and you, buddy. Now, what are you doing awake? It’s so late.”

“I heard the door open and then I heard your voice,” Katsuma replied shyly. “I…I wanted to see you. It’s been a long time.”

“I’m sorry for going away,” Izuku said. He painfully smiled as the ache in his heart for Katsuki tripled. But he shoved it down as he looked at the small child in front of him. “I…I got distracted.”

“It’s okay, you’re back now,” Katsuma replied happily. “Did you have fun while you were away?”

“I did. I had the most fun I ever had in my life,” Izuku said with a woeful undertone. He laughed lightly and blinked back the sting of tears. “I’m really happy I got to go away for a while.”

“Can you tell me about it?”

“How about I tell you in the morning? You need your sleep.”

Katsuma bit his lip. He looked down at his small fingers and fiddled with them nervously. “Can…Can you sleep in here with me? This house makes me scared.”

“Of course I can,” Izuku agreed without a second thought. “Let me go get my blankets and we can have a sleepover.”

Katsuma grinned wide and happily clapped his hands together. Izuku laughed and leaned in to hug him, but right as he did, Katsuma lifted his arms from under the covers. Izuku’s eyes stretched wide in horror and his heart dropped to his lowest parts.

There was a yellowish purple bruise wrapped around Katsuma’s arm.

“Katsuma, h-how’d you get that mark?” Izuku immediately exclaimed.

Quickly, the excitement drained from his little brother’s face. Katsuma sunk further into the blankets and quickly hid his arms as if he was ashamed. Izuku stared in horror as what felt like a mirror of his younger self did exactly what he used to.

Suddenly, the ache in Izuku’s chest twisted into anger. Rage, even. His nostrils flared at the thought of someone hurting Katsuma while he was away.

“Katsuma. Tell me now,” Izuku said sternly.

“I…” Katsuma started and stumbled over his words. “Me and Kota were playing and I fell when he pushed me. I hurt my knee and I started cr-crying. Then brother Jin punished me for crying. He said it was bad and that I should have pushed Kota back. He said if I cried again he would punish me more.”

Izuku’s anger flared so intensely it almost startled him.

Never before had such pure disdain swallowed him so quickly. It overpowered all the sadness that was in his body and hollowed out his empathy. It seared at all his broken insides and his eyes homed in on the bruise.

His miserable childhood flashed before him. He could vividly remember every slap, punch, and scratch Tomura inflicted on him. The mere thought of Jin daring to put his hands on Katsuma without his permission made Izuku furious.

Without effort, Izuku imagined breaking Jin’s hands. He could feel the ghost crunch of each bone under his fists and a part of him yearned for it.

“Next time one of them touches Katsuma you should kill them,” The voice of Hiryu said in the back of his mind.

At that taboo thought, Izuku quickly shook his head and snapped himself out of it.

In order to calm himself back down, Izuku tended to Katsuma’s wound. There wasn’t much he could do since it was already so old which made him upset with himself.

He should have been here to prevent it.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later that night, Izuku laid on the floor beside Katsuma’s bed in a heap of blankets.

Katsuma was fast asleep but Izuku was wide awake looking up at the blank ceiling. Izuku realized now that he needed to get Katsuma and all the other kids out immediately. They were coming of age and Izuku would never forgive himself if Katsuma began to carry the same traumas as him.

He considered the order of things.

As much as he wanted to get Katsuma out now, he understood he couldn’t. Tomura had guards waiting at all exits of this lavish prison. He needed an opening where he could get all the kids in one go, and potentially disappear for at least a week.

With his tracker now separate from him, Izuku knew this would be easier. But he wouldn’t resume assignments until after the consummation with Chisaki.

Which meant in order for Katsuma’s future to be secured, he needed to let Chisaki have his way with him.

Izuku's stomach turned sick at the thought. But as he looked over at the sleeping child next to him, he knew he would have to entertain Chisaki the best he could if he wanted to get out of this house. Then immediately after, he needed to get Katsuma out before the power exchange could be complete.

Izuku was still unsure what kind of chaos would rain down once Tomura got that seat at the Underground Council. From what he remembered, Chisaki wasn't signing any of the papers until after he got what he wanted.

But then there was the matter of killing Chisaki.

Chisaki was at the top of his death list and it was a priority to strip his life away from him. However, when he killed Chisaki he would likely be hunted down and eventually found out. Izuku sucked at his teeth as he went over every scenario he could in his head.

There was only one real option: he would have to flee.

No matter what, in the end, the only answer was Izuku disappearing after both things were finished if he wanted to keep his life.

If this had been before Katsuki, Izuku likely would have simply accepted death. But now that he knew what it was like to truly live and not simply survive—Izuku was unsure if he wanted to die. He wanted to experience a beautiful life more and if that meant blowing up everything before going, he would light up everything with glee.

Izuku concluded that the kids came first, however.

He would get the kids out and directly after doing that, he would go and kill Chisaki. Then he would disappear.

After all that was said and done, Izuku would accept whatever fate waited for him.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When morning came, Izuku admittedly was checking his phone.

He refreshed his empty call log over and over, slightly disappointed but not surprised. The poison he gave Katsuki should have worn off by now, and likely he would have read the letter. Part of Izuku was hoping Katsuki would call and cuss him out immediately, but nothing came.

Shortly after Izuku got Katsuma ready for the day, Ibara and Jin came with bags of groceries just like Tomura said.

Upon entry, they greeted each other. Ibara hugged him warmly and Jin ruffled his hair. Izuku tried his best to hide his disdain for Jin and kept a forced smile pinned to his face. When Jin's back was turned however, Izuku glared daggers into the back of his skull.

Right before they were about to leave, Izuku politely asked his siblings if they wanted to stay for breakfast. He insisted since they had traveled all this way. He wanted the company a bit, but also he wanted to hear about what was happening at home.

Ibara and Jin both happily agreed and sat down at the steel table with Katsuma.

As Izuku chopped vegetables, Jin and Ibara chatted behind him about casual matters.

“So, Izuku. How was Bangkok?” Jin asked with a grin.

Izuku paused his chopping and turned around. Part of him was surprised Himiko hadn’t told Jin the truth, but Izuku realized Tomura likely threatened her to stay quiet.

Izuku gave a meek nod and said, “It was good. I ate a lot of tasty street food and had some fun in Phuket.”

“Ugh, I’m so freakin’ jealous.” Jin exasperated. He threw his head back and dramatically slouched in the chair. “You have the Thailand glow, I can practically smell the happiness radiating off of you. Next time bring me with you!”

Izuku laughed and nodded. “I will.”

“So. Are you excited about getting with Chisaki soon?” Ibara then interjected.

At that, Izuku froze.

His eyes widened and he glanced between them as he said, “You two know about that?”

“Well duh,” Jin said with a shrug. “Most people in the underground know about it by now. After you were gone to Bangkok for so long, a lot of your regular admirers were wondering where you were. They started talking about how they missed ogling your big pretty green eyes and taking bets on who would pop your cherry first. And I guess that made Chisaki possessive.”

“Yeah,” Ibara agreed. She smiled gently and tilted her head at Izuku. “Chisaki started saying how you were off limits to everyone but him to all his Yakuza men. And you know how the grapevine works. One person tells another and another and another. Next thing you know, the rumored affair of the beautiful Viridian Viper and the most powerful Yakuza heir in history is running around like wildfire.”

“Might as well be the closest thing to a royal wedding Hadeus will ever see,” Jin said with a slight snark. “A lot of people are invested in how it’ll go between you two.”

“He’s hosting a big event, y’know,” Ibara said and Izuku’s eyebrows flew up on his face. “A masquerade ball with an orchestra and everything. He said he wanted to make your first night together an event no one would ever forget.”

Izuku swallowed. He shifted uncomfortably on his feet a bit.

This was quite a big show for his ‘deflowering’. It nearly felt like a coming out party for him and Chisaki dating rather than a perverse business arrangement.

“That’s very kind of him,” Izuku said quietly.

“Very,” Ibara agreed. She grinned. “You’re very lucky to have caught his eye! Ah, my little brother has the Yakuza Heir fawning over him. How exciting.”

“All of this is a bit flashy if you ask me,” Jin muttered. “But, you boost his social currency in a way. And vice versa. Way to aim high, Izuku. I’m impressed.”

“You even found someone Tomura approved of,” Ibara added sweetly. “That’s what’s most important.”

Izuku forced a shy smile and went back to chopping.

As he sliced each carrot on the cutting board into tiny pieces, he imagined them to be Chisaki’s greedy fingers.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The first week alone in the house was quiet and quaint.

Neither he or Katsuma were particularly fond of the cold mansion, but they enjoyed the solitude away from their ruthless family.

It was here that Izuku got to see Katsuma’s shy personality slip away a bit. He was more openly himself without the other vipers looming over him. They happily played pretend, dressed up, and ran around the large home as if they were on a safari.

As they did this, Izuku still periodically checked his phone.

In hindsight, he wished he had asked Katsuki for his number. But he knew it was for the best like amputating a dead limb that would only drag him down in the end.

When a full week passed and he still hadn’t heard from Katsuki, Izuku presumed Katsuki read his letter and decided he wanted nothing to do with him. It made sense. Admittedly, Izuku thought Katsuki’s temper would make him call.

An inkling of him was looking forward to hearing Katsuki’s voice, even if it was yelling at him. Part of him even hoped Katsuki would stay true to his promise to always be chasing behind him.

But this was somehow worse.

At the end of the week, Izuku kept his promise that he put in the letter and drew up the divorce papers.

He had the documents specially ordered and mailed to the mansion. He signed them with a numbness and quietly put them in an envelope. As he wrote a fake return address and the Bakugou estate's address on the front of the envelope, he felt a piece of his soul be mangled.

It felt like an important part of him was losing circulation, strangled by his guilt.

A single tear escaped and landed on the paper and he quickly wiped it away.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Jin and Ibara came to the mansion again to deliver food, Izuku privately asked Ibara to put the envelope in the mail.

She nodded, not questioning anything and put the document in her purse. As if she could sense something was wrong, she quietly rubbed his shoulders that morning and offered to cook breakfast for them instead of Izuku.

Izuku appreciated this in silence as he took a seat at the steel kitchen table. The cold surface pressed against his skin exactly matched the numbness in his core. He sat next to Katsuma who was toying with his iPad playing a colorful game for kids.

Izuku then decided to redirect all his energy to Katsuma. He needed to keep focused on the most important things for now.

"How is everything back at home?" Izuku asked quietly.

"It's hectic," Jin answered seriously. His usual goofy demeanor was gone as he strummed his fingers on the table. "Someone nearly breached our security systems recently."

"What? How is that possible?" Izuku asked, entirely surprised.

"We don't know," Jin said quietly. A crease in his brow formed as he stared at the steam coming from his tea cup. "Clearly, it's not the first attempt to hack into our network, but it was a rather advanced one according to Aoyama. The system glitched for exactly two seconds and someone nearly got in through the garage gate without triggering the alarms."

"We got security footage of someone in all black circling around the building," Ibara added. She walked over to the table with a plate of food for Katsuma and Izuku. "It was a man. A bit tall and built but he covered his face, hair, and all his skin with jet black clothing. He even wore visors to cover his eyes."

"Is there any clue who it was?" Izuku questioned.

"The list of suspects is too fucking long," Jin groaned. "Between all the people the Yakuza, the Governor and The Academy have pissed off, it could honestly be anyone. But it has to be someone fucking stupid to have the gall to test the Vipers."

"The important thing is whoever it was didn't make it through," Ibara said. "They must know about our inner workings, so it must be someone who had some sort of business with us. Tomura is interrogating people now."

She sat down with her and Jin's food and sighed.

"Yeah," Jin muttered. "We tried to catch the guy, but the fucker sped off on an unmarked motorcycle and his maneuvering was a bit too expert to keep up on foot. By the time we mobilized in vehicles, he was gone in the rush hour traffic. And you know how dense Tokyo can get."

"That's…" Izuku paused at an unsure thought. "Strange."

"It is," Jin said. "Count yourself lucky Tomura moved you out. You can relax here on the oceanside in peace while everyone at home is running around trying to find the guy. But it's not a big issue. No one can take us on. The fucker must have a death wish to go poking at the nest."

Izuku began to quietly eat.

The topic shifted to something else naturally. Overall, Ibara and Jin didn't seem too phased by the attempted break in. But Izuku couldn't help but wonder. He thought back to Okinawa and remembered how easily Katsuki hacked into Moore's systems to get blueprints of Ie Island.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The second week alone in the mansion, Izuku finally began to get used to the quiet.

Him and Katsuma went swimming in the indoor pool and found an enjoyable routine. Izuku's heart filled with light every time he saw Katsuma smile and was overjoyed to be giving Katsuma happy memories instead of painful ones.

Half way through the week, Izuku's phone buzzed in his pocket for the first time while he was getting snacks from the kitchen. He pulled out the device quickly. His heart began hammering like a drum as he thought it might be Katsuki.

But it wasn't. He clicked open the text app to see Ibara's contact instead.

[199]: I put that envelope in the mail for you. If you need anything else, let me know.

Izuku deflated. His eyes dulled as he typed his response.

[You]: Thank you so much, I owe you one

[199]: It's no problem :) Tell Katsuma hello for me.

Izuku put his phone away.

He wandered into the living room with a bowl of popcorn like a lost soul. He wordlessly sat down on the cold leather couch next to Katsuma who was watching some sort of cartoon. He sunk into his thoughts as he stared at the figures on the screen.

Why was he so sad that Katsuki hadn't reached out? He knew he didn't deserve to be.

By the end of the second week, Izuku accepted the fact Katsuki likely hated him. He knew the divorce papers should have made it to Biei by now. It was likely that Katsuki signed them and submitted them to the local ward office.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Jin and Ibara came by for the third, and final time, Izuku could feel something was different. The air was chillier and felt thinner. He couldn't quite place it, but something shifted in the atmosphere.

This time, Jin cooked breakfast for them while Izuku and Ibara relaxed at the table. His two siblings were casually chatting and laughing about missions they had recently gone on. They also kept Izuku in the loop with everything happening back home.

"They never found the guy by the way," Jin said as he placed all the savory food on the table.

"Really?" Izuku questioned.

"Yup," Jin said with a pop of his lips. "Dude vanished with the wind. Not a trace left behind."

"I'm sure it's nothing," Ibara interjected. She waved her hand and began eating. "The poor soul probably realized what he was doing and crawled back to whatever hole he came from. He must be smart to value his life and leave us alone."

Izuku hummed in agreement but truthfully he was slightly astonished.

No one had really gotten away that easily after poking at Vipers. It took a lot of effort and skill to do something like that without leaving behind any evidence. Especially after making a hasty getaway.

Without much effort, Izuku's mind wandered to how Katsuki perfectly killed Imasuji Goto without a trace.

ᔓᔓᔓ

As the third and final week came to a countdown, Izuku found himself revisiting all his lovely memories with Katsuki.

Before he left Biei, Izuku had taken the DVD of their vows and all the pictures Katsuki had hung up around the estate. Originally, he had taken these items with the intention of destroying them. He wanted to make sure there was no proof of their forbidden union, just in case it somehow circulated back to Chisaki.

This was done out of love, because he didn't want Katsuki to be put in harm's way.

But Izuku couldn't bring himself to go through with killing all the evidence.

Instead, he found himself fondly looking at everything. He watched the DVD over and over again because now it was the only romantic movie he cared to see.

Izuku sat on the couch with the box of pictures while in the background the video of him and Katsuki's vows ran.

Beside him Katsuma played with his toys on the floor by the large window that served as a wall. In the background the thick cluster of trees blended in with the night. Katsuma mumbled to himself and giggled as he made silly sounds with his toy cars.

Izuku half paid attention to Katsuma as he gazed at the photograph in his hand. It was of him and Katsuki wearing flower crowns, laying on the grass. They had cheesy grins on their face and the look in both of their eyes seemed so hopeful. Izuku lightly traced Katsuki's smile with his fingers while listening to Katsuki's voice in the background.

"I promise to always come back to you, darling," the Katsuki on the screen said sweetly.

Izuku looked up from the picture and studied the way Katsuki's beautiful eyes gazed at him at that moment. Izuku wished he could be transported inside of the TV as the Katsuki from the past gripped his hands tightly.

Izuku smiled sadly as they both slightly wobbled with matching plastered grins.

"I'll find my way back to you, again and again and again," TV Katsuki announced. "I promise to always be by your side and I'll kill—"

Suddenly, Katsuma screamed out.

Izuku was startled so hard he dropped the photograph. He whirled his head to Katsuma who was backing away from the window. Katsuma's eyes were wide with fear as he scrambled up to his feet. He rushed towards Izuku and hugged his legs.

"Wh-What's wrong?!" Izuku asked hastily.

He stood up quickly and hoisted Katsuma up in his arms. His little brother buried his face into his neck and clung tightly to him.

"Th-There's a monster outside," Katsuma exclaimed with a terrified voice. "With sc-scary eyes!"

A cold chill slipped down Izuku's spine.

Izuku cautiously glanced at the window. He slowly got his handgun from under the couch cushion. He held Katsuma up with one arm as he expertly cocked his gun with one hand.

He approached the window with caution and squinted.

Truthfully, he could barely see anything past the glare from the lights inside the house. It was too dark outside to see anything past the blackness that was shrouding the trees. He tried to listen for something but it was impossible. The wind outside was howling like an animal in its own right.

Izuku came face to face with the thin glass and tried his best to see outside but found nothing but his own reflection.

However, a feeling he couldn't shake stuck to him.

"…What color eyes?" Izuku asked carefully.

"Red," Katsuma meekly answered.

A prickle jabbed at Izuku's neck.

He quickly glanced over to the TV that had Katsuki's smiling face on it.

He returned his eyes outside the window. His heart skipped a beat as he felt like his vision began to play tricks on him with the distorted blurry shapes he was seeing. Izuku stayed rooted in the same spot until nothing arrived. Izuku then gripped the gun in his hand and furrowed his brow.

Izuku backed away from the window, holding Katsuma closer. He quickly went to the front and back doors to see if the guards were still outside. He peaked out the windows and saw the guards were all there, making their rounds.

They were poised like nothing happened. All of them had their guns loaded, lazily talking between each other as they walked around the perimeter.

"Was it one of these guys?" Izuku whispered to Katsuma.

"No," Katsuma said confidently. "It was a monster with red eyes."

Izuku frowned.

Part of him knew he should do the adult thing and tell his little brother there was no such thing as monsters. But this type of outburst wasn't like Katsuma. And Izuku knew all monsters were based on real things. While it may not have been a supernatural creature, it very much could have been a person.

And frankly, that was far scarier.

ɯɯɯ

Later that night, Izuku slept in the room with Katsuma with the lights on. When his little brother was fast asleep, Izuku went back with his gun to the living room window and looked out of it. He waited and waited, trying to assess what exactly spooked Katsuma that badly.

But he saw nothing yet again.

However, deep into the darkness, Izuku was unsure if it was a shadow or a figure he saw shift in the distance.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the day of the consummation finally came, Izuku tried his best not to be nervous. He was picking at his hands and jittering his legs all morning.

The moment Tomura finally arrived at the door, a gust of cold wind blew in with him. Behind him was Aoyama with a tiny, small smile.

Izuku shivered slightly as he greeted his brothers at the door.

They both greeted him back, and Izuku took a moment to take in both of their appearances.

Aoyama was dressed in casual blue sweats. His hair was messy and in his hands was a bunch of the usual gear he carried around for babysitting. Tomura on the other hand was dressed as if he was going to the most important event of his life.

Tomura was wearing an expensive black and silver suit. His tie was of silver snakes and his earrings were black studs. Hanging on his shoulders loosely was a jet black winter coat that had mink fur around the collar. His hair was neatly combed back into his signature half up half down style with a red hair tie.

However, what was in his gloved hands is what caught Izuku's eye the most.

"What is that?" Izuku questioned.

He pointed at the giant black box that was donned with a dark green ribbon.

"A gift from me," Tomura replied. He jutted his chin to the stairs as he took off his shoes. "Let's go up to your room."

Aoyama smiled at him as Katsuma ran up and greeted them all. The excited child waved at Aoyama and wearily glanced at Tomura. Tomura didn't seem to care, or mind. In fact, he seemed happy that Katsuma feared him. Aoyama playfully smiled at Katsuma and took his tiny hand in his. They both waved goodbye to Izuku and walked towards the living room where all the toys were.

With a heavy heart, Izuku then turned around and began walking upstairs with Tomura behind him. When Tomura shut the door Izuku felt the timer begin to count down on his life changing.

Tomura laid out the large black box on the bed and undid the ribbon. He lifted the lid up and pulled out one of the most gorgeous pieces of clothing Izuku had ever seen.

A black high collar lace shirt unfurled from his hands. It held an intricate pattern of vipers woven in and out of the design. At the collar was a dark green necktie that was a shade of viridian so deep it nearly blended in with the black color of the lace. To match it, in the box laid a pair of sleek black slacks, a formal black blazer, and a viridian pocket square that matched the neck tie.

“I got this custom made for you a while ago,” Tomura said as he handed Izuku the shirt. “It’s tailor made to help emphasize all your best qualities.”

Izuku noted there were no buttons on the front of the blouse. Confused, he curiously turned it over. A long string of velvet green buttons ran down the back.

“This is…intimate,” Izuku muttered.

“I figured a garment that you would need assistance getting out of would be something Chisaki would enjoy,” Tomura said. “It’ll help him feel like the dominant man he pretends to be.”

Izuku didn’t say anything to that.

He glanced down in the box and saw his masquerade mask. He placed down the shirt in exchange for the mask and glanced it over.

It had the same intricate design as the shirt but with one slightly different touch: emeralds.

Gorgeous emeralds shone under the light. They were embedded into the sides of the mask, lining the cut out for his eyes. Surely this was to draw attention to one of his better physical features. Falling from the bottom of the mask were long strings of emeralds beaded together into tassels. They would act like a thin veil over the lower half of his face.

Izuku had to admit it was beautiful. But it was beautiful in the worst way.

“Let’s get you ready,” Tomura said when he saw Izuku come to a complete stand still. “Chisaki will be here to pick us up in two hours.”

Izuku gripped the mask tightly as Tomura placed his hands on his shoulders.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Tomura fastened the last button on his shirt, Izuku felt like he was wrapped entirely in new skin. The clothes were soft against his flesh and it hugged every bit of him perfectly.

They stood together in silence in front of the full length mirror. Izuku barely recognized himself with the way Tomura dolled him up. He used cherry colored lip plumper and added concealer to smooth out his face. Izuku was surprised his brother knew his way around blush and eyeshadow when he expertly added a bit of rosiness to Izuku’s cheeks.

“How do I look?” Izuku whispered.

Tomura pushed a curl behind Izuku’s ear. “Expensive.”

Tomura picked up the mask and tied it to Izuku’s face, adding the final finishing touch.

Izuku's eyes glanced away from his reflection and Tomura placed his hands on his arms. He rubbed them lightly, trying to soothe some of the tension out of him.

"Thank you for doing this," Tomura said sincerely. "After this is over, we'll have more power than you can imagine and things like this will be a thing of the past. The second I get a seat at that table, I'll begin to run the underground in a way that I think is proper. And us Vipers will be at the top of the food chain soon."

Izuku nodded, and the light jingle of his mask bounced with him. "I understand."

Tomura then got a call. The quickness in which Tomura answered the phone told Izuku it was only one person. His suspicions were confirmed when he recognized the muffled voice on the other end as Chisaki. He heard him say that they were on their way and would be at the mansion within thirty minutes.

Tomura agreed and then asked to discuss some sort of last minute condition.

Before Izuku could hear what it was, Tomura excused himself. He walked out of Izuku's room to talk privately on the phone and shut the door.

As Tomura soon was out of sight, Izuku went over to his nightstand.

From his drawer, he pulled out the tiny silver bracelet with the locket that held his tracker.

He quickly glanced at the door and secured the bracelet around his ankle and tucked it into his sock. He pulled down his pant leg over the chunk and took a deep breath in. He rushed over to his suitcase and quickly shoved his notebook, laptop and the black folder with Nana's information inside. He zipped up his suitcase tightly with trembling hands.

Izuku looked at himself in the mirror one last time and let out a shaky exhale.

"Let's get started," Izuku whispered to himself.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They walked out of the mansion into the cold night and Izuku shivered immediately. The wind cut straight through him and left a frigid touch behind.

"Looks like winter arrived early this year," Tomura muttered as he shifted on his feet. "Usually that's an omen for bad luck. Be mindful not to jinx anything tonight."

Right as Izuku was about to respond, he suddenly heard a rustle in the distance.

He turned his head at the motion. An ominous feeling of intense eyes watching them sink into him like a knife. He blinked rapidly when the feeling was strangely familiar and whirled around to the density of barren trees in the back.

"Did you hear that?" Izuku asked quietly.

“I did,” Tomura said, but he didn’t seem phased. “There’s a lot of wildlife out here. The early winter winds are probably making them move around for hibernation.”

Izuku’s lips pulled into a tight frown. He waited for the rustle to happen again—but it didn’t.

“An animal that only moves once?” Izuku questioned, unsure.

“It’s probably just spooked, Izuku,” Tomura grumbled with short patience. He then lifted up his own small, black mask that was composed of silver etchings and tied it around his face. “Now, look forward. They’re here.”

Izuku turned his head to see the expensive gates of the mansion open wide.

Pouring in came a long line of unmarked black cars.

At least ten vehicles drove up in front of the mansion in perfect unification. Each was freshly washed with perfectly shined golden rims. Izuku didn’t see too many vehicles that rivaled Jin’s sports car collection, but these definitely did. He supposed if there was anyone who had wealth to envy, it would be Chisaki.

In the middle of the cluster of cars was a long, expensive limo. The side was embellished with a golden sigil of the Shie Hassaikai.

The limo pulled up directly in front of Tomura and Izuku. When the window rolled down, awaiting him with a perfectly sharp smile was Chisaki. He was wearing a simple black and gold masquerade mask.

Izuku and Tomura both bowed in sync and said respectful greetings.

The driver of the limo got out of the car and hurried around to take Izuku’s bag. He carried it off to the trunk and tightly shut the lid. He came back around and politely smiled as he opened the door for them.

The interior of the limo was lined with regal leather seats. Chisaki sat inside patiently along with two bodyguards, and the white haired man Izuku recognized as Chisaki’s assistant.

All of Izuku’s anxieties manifested in that single moment and became glue at the bottom of his feet. He was stuck, frozen in place.

This was really it.

Tomura gave the small of his back a light push, making him step forward to get in the limo. As Izuku climbed in, he couldn’t shake the feeling of being watched.

He glanced at the dark gathering of trees one more time. Then he slid into the limousine all the way to the window.

Tomura climbed in after him, sliding in to sit next to Izuku. Across from them, the Yakuza members sat silently. Izuku sniffed lightly when he got a whiff of the faint smell of cigars lingering in the space. The driver shut the door, locking them in and soon the entourage of expensive cars began to drive.

Izuku watched out the window of the limo as the mansion began to grow smaller and smaller in the background.

He saw the tiny silhouette of Katsuma in the front window right before the gates shut tight. As they drove deeper into the night to the city, Izuku turned to look at Chisaki. His future bed mate's eyes were glued to him like he was a prize dangling on a string.

"You look ravishing, Izuku," Chisaki complimented with his voice as smooth as velvet. "A mask made of emeralds does your beauty justice."

"Thank you, Mr. Chisaki," Izuku said quietly. "My brother picked it out."

"Well. Your brother has good taste," Chisaki agreed with a light chuckle. "Also, please. Call me Kai. I told you that last time we spoke."

Izuku began to respond but was cut off by Tomura.

"He'll start to call you Kai after the papers are signed," Tomura said curtly. He folded his hands neatly over his crossed legs and cocked his head. "Did you bring the documents?"

"I did," Chisaki replied tightly.

He looked at Tomura with a level of annoyance. But the second he glanced at Izuku it melted away. He snapped his fingers and in a dash of lightning, his assistant pulled out a leather briefcase.

The assistant revealed a thick stack of neatly organized papers. He began to slowly hand them to Tomura one by one with a clipboard. With every stack of papers he gave, they discussed business conditions for being a Pillar on the Council.

It slowly dawned on Izuku what was happening: Tomura had somehow negotiated getting everything signed before the consummation.

Which meant that he went into power effectively-immediately.

White noise sliced through Izuku's head as he watched his brother sign dotted lines.

Everyone's voices muffled as Izuku stared in horror at every signature Tomura gave. He wearily glanced between Tomura and Chisaki as his thoughts began racing. He wrung his hands tightly in his lap. The ticking time bomb to get the kids out began now.

Izuku quickly turned his head to the window to hide his distress.

As they began to approach Tokyo, the density in traffic picked up. The Yakuza cars perfectly surrounded the limo in the front, the back, and on the sides.

Izuku stared out the window watching the busy people and buildings go by as quickly as his thoughts.

“Papers are all officially signed,” Chisaki’s assistant said after several long minutes. He smiled stiffly and bowed his head. “Welcome to The Underground Council, Mr. Mamushi.”

Chisaki smirked as he shook hands with Tomura. He chuckled and said, “You’ll need an official code name now for joining the Council. Have you decided on what that will be?”

Izuku cut his eye to his brother.

The void inside of Tomura’s eyes grew hungrier. He tilted his chin down and smirked with dark pleasure.

“I choose the name of Shigaraki,” Tomura said confidently.

A new type of cold washed over Izuku.

Izuku saw the greed in his brother’s eyes grow exponentially as he looked at Chisaki. No longer was Tomura seeing Chisaki as a person. Instead, he was viewing Chisaki as the first step in his total control of Tokyo.

Izuku felt woozy as he shifted in his seat. He gripped his dress pants and turned his head away again once they hit a red light.

But this time when he looked out the window, awaiting him was a biker dressed in scarlet right beside his window in the car.

Izuku was taken back by the closeness.

Somehow, the biker had snaked his way between the limo and the Yakuza car on the side. The biker’s gear was a vivid shade of red. It matched perfectly with his bike that was also the same shade. Running down the sides of the bike were thick black lines. To top it off, the helmet was the same color of red with a black visor.

On the biker’s back was a large black backpack and Izuku squinted when he felt like he saw some odd shape protrude from the material. Izuku stared longer than he meant to, and as if the biker could feel his eyes on him, slowly the biker turned his head.

He looked dead at Izuku.

Goosebumps formed along Izuku’s spine in a straight line. He reeled back from the window and his heart rate increased.

He stared at the biker and the biker stared at him.

An unspoken electricity surged in the air and suddenly Izuku grew confused. The biker revved his engine and tilted his head. The light turned green, and in a flash the mysterious biker took off. Izuku glanced at the license plate naturally and found it was unmarked.

Izuku furrowed his brow.

He stared after the biker that was swallowed up into the endless sea of traffic and neon lights.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they reached the venue, it was something right out of a book.

Izuku was almost amazed by how lavish it was. Almost.

It was a popular ballroom venue that had bright, green lights illuminating the whole structure. The marble architecture of the building had old renaissance angels engraved into it.

Hundreds of people from the underground scene ambled about in masquerade attire. Everyone was waiting outside to get in but Izuku felt queasy for an unspoken reason.

When the limo pulled up to the front of the venue, Izuku immediately recognized some of the poorly covered faces. Most of the people here had strong political ties to the Yakuza. Or they were simply just Yakuza.

The driver opened the door and Chisaki and Tomura were the first to get out. Izuku waited until the bodyguards and assistant got out of the limo and then emerged.

Immediately when he stood up straight, all the level of chatting died down to whispers. Izuku looked up to see a sea of people gawking at him, Tomura and Chisaki.

Chisaki held his arm out for Izuku to hold. “Shall we?”

Izuku swallowed all his distaste and grabbed Chisaki's arm. He coyly smiled up at the man and Chisaki’s eyes lit up like fireworks.

Izuku glanced at his brother, and Tomura was giving them quiet approval. His shoulders were relaxed, and in his eyes danced a new found sense of control that wasn’t there before. Izuku’s heart was sinking steadily as he saw Tomura breathe in like he was already drunk on power.

Izuku was officially fearful of the future.

They began to walk into the venue, cutting the line.

Izuku noted how top notch the security was. Trained Yakuza guards were poised with guns all around the perimeter. They held fierce stares and sharp frowns as their cunning eyes scrutinized the crowd.

Izuku watched as one couple was turned away from the entrance. They burst into tears when their names failed to be on the provided guest list. They exclaimed that they were friends of the Governor, but it was no use. Security booted them off to the side and told them to get lost.

When Chisaki’s entourage made it inside, Izuku’s ears were graced with the lovely sound of violins.

They checked their coats in the front then made their way around. Several people stopped to talk to Chisaki and Tomura. Many of them wanted to be in their good graces. Everyone complimented Izuku for looking exquisite and told Chisaki he was a lucky man.

After a few conversations and having to force himself to drink a glass of red wine, the three of them began to walk to the center of the venue. They strolled up to the intricate golden railing next to the spiral staircase.

Izuku gawked at the dance floor down below.

It was jam packed full of people in their best formal masquerade attire. Women in dazzling gowns and diamonds fluttered across the marble floor while men strutted like peacocks. From high above, people in private boxes looked down and watched the orchestra play on the lit up stage. Every classical music instrument Izuku could think of was poised like a deity in the front of the large room.

Izuku curiously noted how everyone was wearing light colored neutrals only or all black. It must've been part of the dress code.

He was the only person wearing a pop of green.

Tomura then spun on his heels and turned to them with a rare smile.

"I'll leave you two alone for the rest of the night," Tomura said with ease. "If anything happens please feel free to call me. Otherwise, enjoy your time together."

Chisaki bowed politely to Tomura. "Of course. Thank you so much, Shigaraki."

Izuku could see the hint of glee spark in his brother's eyes at the recognition of his new name. Tomura turned to Izuku expectantly and Izuku politely bowed as well.

"Thank you, Big Brother," Izuku said quietly. "I'll see you soon."

Tomura nodded and spared them both one more glance before disappearing into the dense crowd. Izuku looked down at the people below and could see a couple looking up at him. They squinted as if trying to make sure he was who they thought.

"There's a lot of important people here," Izuku said offhandedly when he caught sight of the Governor. "I didn't think this much of a crowd would show up."

"Well, when one has managed to get their hands on Hadeus' beautiful Viridian Viper, they don't exactly keep it a secret. Do they?" Chisaki replied cheekily.

"I suppose not," Izuku muttered.

Chisaki laughed a bit and then began to lead them through the crowds. At a point, Chisaki laced their hands together, pulling Izuku in close to his side. They walked down the spiral stairs to the center of the floor together. As they descended, multiple people parted for Chisaki and bowed. They greeted Chisaki like he was royalty and they all regarded Izuku like he was a first place trophy.

They took to the floor and immediately began dancing to the alluring beautiful song.

Izuku and Chisaki gazes tethered to each other in the middle of the dance floor. They started a soft waltz in tandem with the rest of the glamorous crowd. Their heated eye contact was unmoving as they swayed with the rhythm.

Izuku knew Chisaki was imagining taking him apart in the bedroom. He could feel Chisaki daydream about what type of moans he would make or how he quivered with the right touch. In the same breath, Izuku imagined taking Chisaki apart too—but in one of the more grisly ways he could think of.

Limb by limb preferably.

Half way through the dance, Chisaki pulled Izuku close. Their chests pressed together and Izuku could feel the body heat gather between them.

"You know, I was very sad when you took that mission in Bangkok," Chisaki said. He continued to lead their dance without missing a beat. "My feelings were a little hurt to say the least. Usually people are jumping to get in bed with me. But you ran away to a different country, for months."

"Sorry," Izuku apologized. He steeled his nerves as he kept eye contact. "It wasn't anything personal Mr. Chi—I mean Kai. It was only business."

"So I was told."

That didn't sound like he was very much convinced.

"In the time you were away, I came to learn your brother Tomura is quite protective of you," Chisaki said, moving the conversation in a way he wanted. "Is this how he usually is?"

"Yes," Izuku replied. "He's been this way since we were young."

"I suppose that's a good thing. Family is important." Chisaki's eyes then lowered to Izuku's lips. "Does he usually control all your affairs?"

"Yes, he does. Tomura is very competent."

"Does this include who you date?"

"I—I'm not allowed to date without my brother's permission," Izuku said honestly.

"That's what I heard. But, after talking with your brother more, he tells me the reason why is because you don't want to date. Mainly because you're a hopeless romantic and find casual flings unappealing." Chisaki leaned in a bit. "Is that correct?"

"Ye-Yes," Izuku answered, stammering from the sudden strangeness in their conversation. Why had Tomura let his defect slip up to Chisaki of all people? "Th-That's correct."

“So, you must not be my biggest fan right now then. Considering the terms of our arrangement.”

By accident, Izuku stared at Chisaki in bewilderment then quickly fixed his expression. He skirted his eyes down. Chisaki twirled him in a large spin and Izuku found himself tongue-tied.

“You can be honest with me,” Chisaki teased. He smiled in an eerie manner as he pulled Izuku close to him once more. “I enjoy honesty from the people I go to bed with. Every day I have people surrounding me telling me what they think I want to hear. But I never really know people’s real intentions. So be truthful with me, Izuku. It’ll benefit you.”

Izuku slowly tilted his head away from the Yakuza heir, unsure of what exactly to say.

But when Chisaki’s grip on him grew almost painful, Izuku gave in.

“No,” Izuku bit out. “I’m not your biggest fan at the moment, Kai.”

Chisaki chuckled with a large, satisfied smirk. “You hate me, don’t you?”

“Yes,” Izuku whispered so low even he had a hard time hearing himself.

But Chisaki heard him. He heard him loud and clear because in the next second, he stopped dancing all together. He held Izuku close, and brought their lips an inch apart. His breath tickled Izuku’s mouth past the emerald tassels and the glint in his eyes amplified to new heights.

Izuku watched as a particular type of sadistic pleasure twisted inside of Chisaki’s smile.

“Good,” Chisaki whispered across Izuku’s skin. “I felt a little bad after learning you’re a hopeless romantic, admittedly. It suddenly all made sense why someone like you, who gets people thrown at your feet every day, was a virgin.”

Izuku felt Chisaki’s hand slide down the trail of buttons that lined his back. His hand stopped directly at the hem of his shirt and slowly began to knead small circles into his body.

“How about we make a deal,” Chisaki proposed. “I will try my best to make the next two weeks utterly romantic for you. And in exchange, you keep an open mind about seriously dating me after this.”

Chisaki might as well have barred his neck for Izuku to slash, because he exposed a weakness plain as day: he was romantically interested in Izuku.

Izuku’s eyes flickered with murderous intent. Luckily for him, Chisaki was too blinded by lust to see it.

“We would have to probably sneak around for that to happen,” Izuku whispered. He switched his demeanor and turned on his coy, seductive kill switch. “If my brother knew…” Izuku put on a show and shyly glanced over to where Tomura was across the ballroom chatting with a circle of people. “He would…try to instigate his terms.”

Chisaki's eyes followed Izuku's and glanced sideways at Tomura. Then he returned to gazing at Izuku with a devious smirk.

"That's possible," Chisaki said slyly. "I can arrange for us to have meetings no one else knows about."

"Really?" Izuku asked bashfully. "You would do that for me?"

"Of course. I've been waiting to get my hands on you for a long time. If there's any chance of you being mine outside of this arrangement, I will make that happen."

"Okay," Izuku said. "We have a deal then."

A perfect deal for Izuku to gain a discreet opening to kill Chisaki.

Izuku smiled sincerely in that moment, happy how easily that fell into his lap.

Chisaki looked more than satisfied too. His golden eyes peered down at Izuku full of promise for the future.

He lifted one hand with tender care. He brushed aside the emerald tassels that covered Izuku's mouth. Izuku's heart rate sped up as he saw the look in Chisaki's eyes dive further into carnal desire. His gaze went half lidded and the hand on the small of his back pressed flat.

"May I kiss you?" Chisaki asked.

Izuku nodded hesitantly and braced himself. He wrapped his arms around Chisaki's shoulders and Chisaki wrapped his arms around Izuku's waist.

Izuku fluttered his eyes closed and tried to let his mind wander.

When Chisaki's lips landed on his, Izuku pictured himself elsewhere. A beach, or even a coffee shop. But when the kiss forcefully deepened, it brought him back to the reality he couldn't escape.

It was sickening. Chisaki's tongue felt like a worm in his mouth.

Izuku screwed his eyes shut as he let the man in front of him take what he wanted. Izuku half kissed Chisaki back, trying to sell the under-experienced but willing persona his plan hinged on. Chisaki seemed ecstatic with Izuku's poor attempt to return the kiss.

He eagerly threaded his hand through Izuku's hair and took the lead.

As Chisaki continued to take and take, Izuku unwillingly compared the kiss to Katsuki's.

While Katsuki's kiss was as hot as fire, Chisaki's kiss was uncomfortably lukewarm. Katsuki always worked their mouths in tandem, while Chisaki forced his way in. Katsuki was perfectly in tune with his needs, while Izuku was unsure if Chisaki knew he had any. Izuku hated the way he smelled suffocating, expensive cologne instead of subtle cinnamon.

But most of all, Izuku missed the perfect coarseness of Katsuki's hands around his throat.

When they broke apart from the kiss all Izuku could think about was Katsuki.

His heartbreak re-emerged and dragged him down. He tried to ignore it but it doubled, then tripled. It transformed into a pile of broken bricks in his ribcage and the sharp edges cut him every time he moved.

It was overwhelming. Izuku missed Katsuki more than he could manage.

But Chisaki was staring at him with clouds of lust blinding his vision.

"How was that for a first kiss?" Chisaki arrogantly asked.

Izuku's eyes began to sting. "I-It was perfect."

Happy with that answer, Chisaki leaned in again. Izuku braced himself once more. But right as Chisaki was about to steal away another piece of Izuku's pride, he was stopped.

"Mr. Chisaki," One of the Yakuza bodyguards called out. The burly overly tattooed man came bum-rushing forward, pushing through the crowd. "We need you right away. There's an issue on the third floor."

A vein instantly popped in Chisaki's forehead. He turned his head slowly to his employee and narrowed his eyes.

"Can't you see I am a bit busy with my prize?" Chisaki dangerously warned.

"I know but this can't wait," The guard replied.

The guard leaned in and whispered something into Chisaki's ear. Izuku strained to hear it but was unable to. He only caught the single words of 'bodies' and 'upstairs'. Whatever was said, must have been urgent. All the lust drained from Chisaki's face and extreme seriousness enveloped him.

"Excuse me for a moment," Chisaki said to Izuku. He offered an apologetic smile and backed away. "This shouldn't take long."

He squeezed Izuku's hand affectionately before walking away with his guard towards the stairs.

Izuku watched as Chisaki disappeared into the dense crowd. People began curiously glancing between the two of them.

He caught Tomura's gaze from across the room and there was a potent amount of confusion stricken across his brother's face. Izuku shrugged, holding his hands up. Tomura sighed and quickly followed off to the direction Chisaki disappeared to.

As Izuku stood alone in the room of strangers, the sudden pain inside of his chest began to grow. It weighed him down, making gravity feel like it was tenfold. He touched his lips. The kiss might as well have burned.

He was left feeling deeply violated and he wanted to peel the first layer of skin off his lips.

He tried to hold it in, but he became nauseated.

Izuku glanced around at the hundreds of prying eyes.

They picked at him and every whisper felt like a nick directly slashed into his skin. Without warning, Izuku's chest became uncomfortably tight. The lace around his neck grew itchy. Izuku breathed out as he tried to steady himself. But the walls of people around him felt like they were closing in, and it became terribly difficult to focus.

Izuku blinked rapidly and immediately his memory filled with Katsuki.

Katsuki's smile. His laugh. His voice. His haunting eyes. Izuku even swore he saw a blur of ash blond hair in the crowd coming towards him. That's when he knew he was going to lose it.

The sickness sitting inside of his stomach moved upwards.

"E-Excuse me," Izuku whispered to the person that was standing in his way.

Izuku pushed through the crowd with wobbly legs towards the back corner. His vision swelled as his heart rate picked up. His breaths became short and quick because everything felt too close. Izuku stumbled into the back of the large room where there were less people. He desperately leaned against one of the marble pillars that was shrouded in a bit of shadows.

He watched as the happy people on the dance floor continued about their lives. He was jealous of them. How lucky they were to seem so free and willing to be here. He gazed at one couple, watching them dance.

They melted into a vision of him and Katsuki swaying back and forth like they had on the boat in Okinawa. Izuku wanted that back. He wanted it back so badly.

He wanted his husband.

He leaned against the pillar fully and lowered his head. His eyes stung with tears as he thought about Katsuki. How had things gotten so messed up? Why hadn't he spoken the truth and they could have worked something out? Izuku's regrets nearly made him fall to his knees right there on the floor.

Then suddenly, a hand snaked its way around his throat from behind.

Izuku's tears stopped as did his breathing.

The calluses of the hand were in a pattern that Izuku knew by heart. He had felt this hand around his neck many times in many different ways. He knew the shape of it like his own soul. It fit perfectly around his throat as it took its rightful place there like a king to a throne and squeezed until it hurt.

Izuku choked as he was yanked backwards. He was pressed flush against an all too familiar body.

Rough lips grazed the shell of his ear and that dangerously deep voice spoke.

“I found you, darling.”

Chapter End Notes

Kyuuka smiles at you as she buckles you into a car. She tests the straps of the seatbelt for security, making sure you can't get out. She ties your hand with two ropes that are labeled 'angst' and 'extra angst'. Then right as you're about to ask what's happening, she pushes the car right over the ledge of a cliff.

You scream as you tip over right over the steep drop.

((Thank you so much for reading!!)

Chapter 28: Dissonance

Chapter Summary

Dissonance (tempo modifier) lack of harmony among musical notes.

Chapter Notes

Helloooo! Welcome back to this very special chapter :) It's going to set the stage for this final section of the fic and all future chapters! I'm really stoked to have you guys read it! Going to jump right in because it's a doozy. Please regard the tags and warnings with seriousness!

Warnings: Graphic Depictions of Violence, Character Death, Darker themes

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 28 — Dissonance

.

.

.

The moment he heard ‘darling’ in that dangerous, raspy voice, Izuku’s heart fluttered.

It was an automatic reaction, primal almost. Like a call to bring him home to where he belonged. He felt instantly light on his feet with newfound butterflies tickling his stomach.

But Izuku’s second reaction was led with logic. He thought that his ears must have been deceiving him. He assumed his cruel brain was playing a trick, like it had many times before. Surely, his grief was causing him to hallucinate Katsuki like he hallucinated Hiryu.

But the figure pressed into his backside did not vanish. It did not fade. It stayed rooted in place, breathing in and out like a real person. Izuku’s vision vignetted as he craned his neck to stare behind him. Looming directly over him was the man of both his dreams and nightmares.

“K-Katsuki?” Izuku whispered in disbelief. His eyes began to stretch wide. “You—You’re here?”

Katsuki cocked his head at him and raised a brow. “I am.”

Izuku didn’t know what to say.

He was rendered speechless and all he could do was drop his mouth open.

His mind began to race a mile per minute. What was Katsuki doing here? Why hadn’t he called? How did he get into the building? How did he even know he would be here, of all places? But more so, how had he reacted to the letter? Is that why he was here? Did he come all this way to discuss everything inside of it?

No. He must’ve come here to discuss his mother. That would make the most sense.

As Izuku stared at Katsuki, a million questions burned into his head and he became dazed.

But a single whisper from beside them brought him back to reality.

Izuku glanced around at the hundreds of people on the dance floor. Some of them were still ignorantly flocking about. But others were studying him—specifically the crowd that was Yakuza. Izuku then sharply cut his eye to the sides of the room where the bodyguards were aligned. Many of them kept their eyes on him.

Or more specifically, they kept their eyes on him and Katsuki.

His stomach dropped to the ground and he snapped out of his daze all the way. It clicked then that this specific crowd was a recipe for disaster. Because the second Tomura or Chisaki came back and saw Katsuki, it would be like lighting a room full of dynamite.

Izuku turned around slowly and the grip on his throat went slack.

He tried to remain calm in order to not draw any more attention from the bodyguards. All of which were very much armed with loaded guns.

But it was hard, as tonight was the night meant for all eyes to be on him.

Out of his peripheral vision, Izuku saw a handful of Yakuza shift cautiously. Their eyes homed in on Katsuki when he stood closer to Izuku. It was here Izuku knew Chisaki must’ve given orders to make sure a mindful eye was kept on his ‘prize’ tonight.

Izuku thought fast on his feet. He cut his eyes down the vacant hallway around the corner. It was near the bathroom areas and void of prying eyes.

Running purely on instinct, Izuku grabbed Katsuki’s wrist.

“We can’t be seen together here,” Izuku whispered hastily. He jutted his head to the side where the hallway was. “Let’s go over there.”

Izuku tugged on Katsuki’s wrist and tried to lead them away.

But Katsuki stayed as still as a rock.

When Katsuki didn't budge, Izuku grew confused. He looked back towards Katsuki with a questioning glance. He pulled on him again, but was unable to move the sturdy man. Izuku nervously gazed up at the stairs, hoping that neither Tomura nor Chisaki came down them.

"K-Katsuki, seriously," Izuku said with added urgency. His eyes darted at all the people who were now staring at them. "We—we can talk but not here. We can't be seen together right now."

"Since when was it a crime to be seen with your husband?" Katsuki asked carefully, with a slight bite.

Izuku halted.

"Husband?" Izuku parroted. He looked at Katsuki sideways, thinking about the divorce papers he signed and delivered two weeks ago. "We're…We're still married?"

Katsuki glowered. "Of course we are."

Izuku barely had time to process that bit of information because the expression in Katsuki's face became alarming. His red eyes were illuminated with a dark flicker of light. They simmered on low heat and burned with an unmoving gaze.

Izuku let go of Katsuki's wrist when his gut told him something wasn't right.

It was here Izuku finally assessed Katsuki's appearance.

Katsuki was wearing the scarlet suit they picked out together a few months ago. It was slightly scuffed, and there was a subtle bulge peeking from the inside of his blazer. If someone got as close as Izuku was now, they could probably make it out to be several guns hiding inside of his blazer.

But more alarming, the black tie around his neck was stiff—like it was lined with a knife. And he was wearing a white porcelain mask that only covered one side of his face. It was cracked down the middle, leaving a jagged edge. Originally, Izuku thought the mask had small, decorative red spots on it.

But when one of the spots moved, dripping downwards to leave a trail, Izuku realized he was wrong.

It was fresh blood.

All the hairs on Izuku's body stood up.

"Why don't we have a dance, darling?" Katsuki asked in a lilting voice. He gestured behind him to the open floor. "I've always wanted to dance with you properly."

Katsuki gently held out a hand for Izuku to take, tempting him.

But Izuku continued to stare at him sideways.

He couldn't place it, but his intuition was telling him this felt wrong. Almost as if the ground beneath his feet tilted ever so slightly, leaving him a little unbalanced. Izuku nervously peaked around and saw several people looking at them.

He glanced up at the stairs once more. He decided the sooner he gave Katsuki what he wanted, the sooner he could get them out of sight.

He reached for Katsuki's hand and immediately their fingers laced together.

Izuku tripped a bit as Katsuki pulled him close. Slowly, Katsuki began to backtrack to the center of the floor. They stopped at the exact spot where Izuku was moments ago with Chisaki. Once they made it to the center of the room, Izuku felt bizarre.

There were so many questions Izuku wanted to blurt out. But he didn't get a chance as Katsuki began a dizzying tango.

They kept their gazes tethered as they swayed, pulling close. The rush of body heat and intimacy blossomed between them as they locked stealthy, cat-like steps. Katsuki's eyes drank him in. Izuku looked at him right back as Katsuki's hand raked the curve of his back. They whirled, not breaking eye contact and then Katsuki dipped him low, almost to the ground.

Izuku couldn't help but swoon.

But then Katsuki's eyes grew more intense. As he lifted him up he asked, "Did you know all along you were the one who killed my mother, Izuku?"

Izuku stumbled in his dance steps. His heart raced faster and his fingers became clammy. He knew his letter did not exactly explain how he found out about the murder. He only wrote that he wasn't aware of who she was.

"No," Izuku answered honestly. His heart became heavy with guilt and he sadly looked into his love's unreadable gaze. "I didn't know the whole time—"

"—Then how long did you know?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku tried his best to keep up with Katsuki as he changed the pace. But Katsuki was now making sharp movements hard enough to make Izuku dizzy. Everything immediately blurred in a blend of bland colors as he was whipped around and around.

"I found out the night you went to retire," Izuku whispered.

At this, Katsuki's unreadable expression flipped. True hurt spread across his beautiful features. It stuck so deep that Izuku knew it would never leave.

"You knew for the entire last month we were living together?" Katsuki whispered angrily. "And you didn't think to tell me?"

He slowed their dance and all the blurred surroundings came back into focus. Izuku looked around, dazed and dizzy. He cut his wobbly eyes up to the stairs and luckily found no sign of Chisaki or Tomura.

But his anxiety spiked when he realized all the guards were looking at them now.

Izuku swallowed.

“I…I was going to. B-But I was too afraid,” Izuku confessed. He was acutely aware of how useless a ‘sorry’ was in this moment. His own expression crumbled and the ache in his chest begged to ease Katsuki’s heartbreak. “I wanted to. I did—I couldn’t find a way to come out and say it. I’m so sorry Katsuki. I’m really really sorry for everything. If I could take back what I did, I would. I didn’t know it was her. I-I swear. I know that doesn’t excuse anything.”

The groveling didn’t seem to reach Katsuki all the way. There was a wall of hurt around him that was nearly unbreakable.

“You’re right. You’re pathetic sorrys don’t excuse anything.” Katsuki’s pained expression dived into a level of untapped anger. “Why didn’t you just fucking tell me instead of letting me believe it was Chizome?”

“Because I was scared of hurting you,” Izuku admitted honestly.

Katsuki’s raw expression twisted with a snarl. His chin lowered menacingly and the mask on his face nearly slipped off.

“Bullshit,” Katsuki snapped. “Bull fucking shit. If you cared about hurting me, you wouldn’t have had that scum’s tongue down your throat five seconds ago and who knows however many times now.”

It was like being backhanded. Izuku’s eyes widened, feeling undoubtedly hurt that Katsuki would throw something that wasn’t his choice in his face. He told him. He had explained the Chisaki deal very well in his letter; he was sure. But the fury in Katsuki’s eyes continued to blend with unbridled jealousy.

“Now. Let’s try that again. Why did you not tell me, Izuku?” Katsuki demanded.

“Because I was scared,” Izuku whispered, holding back tears. “That’s the truth.”

“But of what?” Katsuki demanded, raising his voice.

At the sharp volume, Izuku unwillingly flinched.

And immediately Katsuki stopped dancing all together.

With that single flinch, a revelation dawned on Katsuki. His menacing scowl fell to the ground. In its place was only the look of a sad, misunderstood human. Katsuki silently stared at Izuku in disbelief.

“You were scared…of me,” Katsuki whispered so low Izuku strained to hear it. “Did you think I would hurt you if you told me? Even after everything?”

Yes, was the answer that automatically came to Izuku's mind. But it wasn't said in his voice. It was said in Tomura's. He paused, and his thoughts flashed back to Tomura's warnings. Then his thoughts flashed through all of his and Katsuki's precious moments. Specifically the time in the nursery.

And in that moment, Izuku's biggest mistake became crystal clear. Hindsight was truly 20/20 and Izuku saw his worst miscalculation up close now.

Katsuki leaned away from Izuku, shocked at the lack of denial.

His eyes darted all around Izuku's face as he filled in the blanks. Soon, Izuku's silence was enough of an answer. Katsuki's expression crumbled into heartbreak the longer the silence stretched on.

When Katsuki's eyes became glossy with tears, Izuku wanted to reverse time.

Tomura's noxious warning had gotten in the way of his better judgment. His brother's manipulative words twisted the one fact Izuku always thought to be true: Katsuki was soft with him.

Of course Katsuki wouldn't have hurt him if he'd been upfront with the truth. Katsuki valued honesty and Katsuki said he trusted Izuku right in front of his mother's grave. He opened up about his painful past and confided in Izuku how he was feared by so many people in his life. He was feared by his friends. His coworkers. His supervisor.

Even Katsuki's own mother had been afraid of him.

But the only person who wasn't was Izuku.

Izuku made sure Katsuki knew he could be soft. Izuku took Katsuki's hands and showed him they were capable of more than reaping blood. He embraced all bits of Katsuki, even the darkest parts.

But now, with the help of Tomura, Izuku accidentally stabbed Katsuki directly in his most vulnerable insecurity.

"No," Izuku said rapidly to cover up his dire mistake. He began shaking his head furiously as the hurt in Katsuki's eyes became so overpowering he felt it in his soul. "No. No, Katsuki. I-I'm so sorry I didn't think that at all—"

But it was too late. Katsuki's hurt morphed into something truly fearsome in that moment.

It grew winged armor, fangs, and shrouded itself in the anger Katsuki always used to protect himself. A single tear drop fell out of Katsuki's eye and took all his reasoning with it. In its wake, the tear left behind a dark leer crafted of violent jealousy and depravity.

"You did," Katsuki said in a deep, steady voice. More tears fell. "You're scared of me. Because I'm a monster, right?"

Izuku's heart nearly flatlined.

Katsuki's eyes darkened and Izuku felt the wall of anger go to new heights. There was no reaching Katsuki now. His eyes narrowed and Izuku watched as his pupils constricted down into tiny dots.

All that was left in his eyes was an unnatural amount of scarlet.

"You were scared enough to poison me so I wouldn't be able to hurt you," Katsuki continued. With every accusatory word he spoke, hate gathered in his tone like a tsunami. "And then you came running to Tokyo for protection from me in Yakuza scum's arms. But worse of all, you went and cuddled up with the man who requested my mother's murder without a goddamn shred of decency."

The words strangled him in the face and he shook his head more.

He tried to ignore the way Katsuki's hold on him was growing more and more intense.

"No," Izuku exclaimed past his wincing. "N-No! That's not what this is at all. I told you in my—"

Izuku yelped out loud when Katsuki's fingernails tore through the material of his blazer. The sharp tips sunk into his skin, drawing blood. Izuku's heart dropped and he tried to move backwards away from Katsuki. But it was no use. Katsuki's grip was as strong as an iron fist.

Izuku's warning senses began to go off like blaring alarms.

He wildly looked over at the guards who were now walking towards them. All the guards put their hands to their waistbands, reaching for their guns.

"K-Katsuki. People are watching," Izuku begged. "This isn't the place to do this. There's too many Yakuza members here. They will kill you."

"They can try," Katsuki replied callously. His eyes glazed over with vengeance. "Because if everyone in the world thinks I'm a monster, then fine." Katsuki's mouth curled. "I'll give them the bloodiest monster they've ever seen."

Izuku looked into Katsuki's eyes, and his blood ran cold. His Kacchan was no longer reachable.

In his place stood The Scarlet Eyed Killer .

"Hey, you!" One guard yelled out. He grabbed Katsuki by his shoulder and forcefully spun him around. "What do you think you're doing—"

The guard didn't have the chance to finish his sentence.

All of Katsuki's killer reflexes clicked into place at that moment to show his full throttle form. With unnerving speed, Katsuki reached into his blazer, pulled out a loaded gun, and aimed it directly between the guard's eyes. He pulled the trigger before the next word could even be uttered.

Blood splattered across both Izuku's and Katsuki's faces.

Horrified, shrill shrieks erupted all around the room.

Katsuki's bone chilling gaze sliced towards Izuku. In the reflection of his eyes, Izuku could see Mitsuki's death echo. It was here Izuku knew there would be no reasoning with Katsuki right now—but he also knew he couldn't die.

Not before Katsuma was safe.

Immediately, Izuku took the defensive.

He snatched his body away from Katsuki as Katsuki whirled his gun on him.

Izuku ducked into the stampede of people as protection and bullets began raining down like hail. People surrounding him screamed out as they were shot. One man dropped straight to the ground, dead. His body was lost to the crowd as hundreds of people stepped on him to flee.

Multiple hands began pulling on Izuku. He whirled around in the chaos to see four Yakuza guards on him. They surrounded him in a tight formation and forced him to duck behind them. They shot back at Katsuki but Katsuki moved with an unnatural speed. It was as if his feet were being carried by his fury.

Katsuki shot down person after person, trying to clear a path to Izuku.

All the Yakuza body guards came flying out from around the corners with rifles. They shoved people out of their way as they began unloading. Katsuki gritted his teeth and his eyes became violently wild as he went on the defensive. He ducked behind a pillar as they surrounded him, but his aim remained true.

He landed multiple kill-shots with formidable accuracy.

The Yakuza guards surrounding Izuku dragged him through the stream of people attempting to flee. They went straight for the stairs, trying to get him to safety.

One guard looked at Izuku seriously as he shoved him up the stairs. "We need to get you out the building—"

But then a bullet cut clean through the guard's skull.

His eyes rolled back and Izuku became soaked with his blood.

Three more bullets drove through the air and landed in the other three guards' skulls. Izuku's heart dropped as he toppled to the ground with the weight of the dead bodies. One body twitched on top of him, pouring out blood from the wound.

All the guests began desperately climbing over him towards the exit. Izuku hissed out loud when one person stepped on his hand and several others stepped on his back.

He looked up terrified as he was beginning to be left behind. Izuku stayed low to the ground, allowing himself to be trampled. He protected his head from too much injury as a new wave of cries filled the room with several more gunshots.

When the worst of the thick crowd felt like it passed, Izuku crawled up the stairs. He used the body on top of him as a shield as he stayed low, careful not to be seen by Katsuki. When he made it to the top, he was covered in blood and bruises.

His whole body shook with terror as he glanced down at the dance floor.

Katsuki was going toe to toe with ten more guards.

His husband's movements were as sharp as his killer gaze.

He absorbed all the hits like he was made of concrete. His punches and kicks were backed by all his overwhelming strength.

He slammed one guard into a pillar, cracking his skull. He then broke another's wrist in a twisted dance. Following that, Katsuki snapped one man's neck with a quickness and then stabbed another in the heart in a continuous, fluid motion.

Izuku had never witnessed this level of brutality from Katsuki. But from this distance, Izuku could see it was beckoned forward by revenge.

Katsuki was collecting the blood toll for what happened to his mother.

Izuku crawled on the carpeted floor and shakily stood up. He quickly moved, using the railing for balance. His heart pounded in his chest as his head throbbed.

His instincts went into overdrive to survive. He needed to keep pushing forward for Katsuma.

People shoved him out the way in a fury of movements. Izuku stumbled on his feet as his shoulder was savagely pushed. All around in the chaos, the well dressed people scattered like frantic ants. Some ran for the door. Other's ran for hallways. Some even began trying to climb out the window.

Izuku took one more glance down at the dance floor.

He caught sight of the last man being killed by Katsuki. Katsuki slammed a vase over his head, then cut the man's throat with a precise slash of his blade.

Izuku recognized the blade in Katsuki's hand.

It was the one engraved with his mother's name into the handle.

The body dropped to the ground, leaving Katsuki as the last man standing. He lingered in the middle of endless dead bodies catching his breath. They circled around him, covering the floor. Where there was not a cold limb there was blood.

In that horrible stillness, Izuku understood. He could vividly see what Katsuki's purpose was: he was born to paint the world in deep shades of scarlet. Whether that red was from love, passion, or blood—that was still unknown.

Katsuki's murderous eyes cut up to Izuku.

They locked stares.

Without breaking eye contact, Katsuki cracked his neck. He took off the porcelain mask to fully reveal his terrifyingly handsome face that was doused in wrath. He discarded the fragile item to the ground, and it shattered upon impact.

He shrugged off his blazer to unveil a hidden holster of loaded guns and knives.

Izuku immediately ran and Katsuki began to chase after him.

Izuku hightailed it for the exit with his pulse pounding in his ears. He ran as fast as he could but when he rounded the corner, he came to a skidding halt.

He caught sight of Tomura and several dozen more Yakuza bodyguards. They were running towards the exit too from the opposite direction.

Izuku's limbs went cold when he saw the murderous look on his brother's face. Tomura's eyes were set at subzero, scanning the chaotic crowd for the culprit. In his hands was a long rifle, locked and loaded.

Izuku snapped his head to look behind him.

He could see Katsuki cutting through the crowd coming directly for him. He was shooting down Yakuza member after Yakuza member that tried to stop him.

"Shit," Izuku cursed.

He backtracked and ran away from the exit, leading Katsuki away from Tomura.

He dodged several bullets from Katsuki that cut through the air and landed in the walls. Izuku did his best to steer Katsuki away from the exit and deeper into the venue. With quick speed, he sharply cut down one grand hallway that was empty. It was filled with several other banquet halls and aligning the golden walls were large paintings and mirrors.

Izuku glanced behind him to see Katsuki running right on his heels, reloading his gun.

Then suddenly the lights cut off. Sirens bounced off every wall and red, danger alarms began flashing.

Izuku heard distant yells and he knew the building was going into a lockdown. The Yakuza were about to do what they did best. They were about to hunt down who was responsible. No one would be allowed to leave until the person was captured.

Izuku ran through the hallway faster. He picked up his speed, knowing Katsuki was always heavier and slower. The flashing red lights barely illuminated the way as his eyes hastily darted around. His lungs were set ablaze as he tried to think on his feet.

He cut down another hallway and came to a flight of stairs. Izuku flew up them at record speed to the second floor. He weaved in and out of different hallways, going deeper and deeper. He sharply ran down one hallway, and was met with a dead end with only a single door.

Katsuki's footsteps were closing in as Izuku tried to unlock the door.

But the door didn't budge. Izuku rattled the handle desperately.

He heard Katsuki get closer and Izuku rapidly shifted his approach. He bluntly threw his shoulder against the door with all his weight. The wood shook. He did it again and again, until he broke open the door with pure strength.

He tumbled inside the room the same second blistering pain sunk into him. Izuku yelled in agony as a bullet cut clean through his upper arm.

He fell inside the room, and gasps echoed out.

Izuku swiftly lifted his head to see a room full of at least twenty people in formal attire. They all had their guns pointed at the door. But the second they saw him, they lowered their weapons.

Some of the people were dark haired with golden eyes but others were clearly Yakuza body guards. The guards had rifles strapped to their backs and menacing leers. Off to the side were plates of food and a game of darts, as if they were enjoying their own private party before the chaos.

Izuku moved to get up on his feet and grabbed his arm where he was bleeding.

Katsuki fired off more bullets at him and Izuku stumbled as several nicked him. The people in the room began to scatter when Katsuki came into view, gun blazing. Izuku ran further into the private suite when he saw the Yakuza guards reach for their rifles.

Izuku dived for the back room when discord broke out.

He wildly searched for an exit as a cacophony of yelling erupted behind him. He could hear bullets, smashing and fighting occur at deafening octaves. Izuku knew he didn't have much time. He ran towards the window. He stumbled to unlock it when pain shot up his arm from where he had been shot.

Izuku hoisted up the window and the cold, winter air smothered him. It cooled down his sweaty skin as he climbed out of the window and onto the fire escape.

The wind howled and rocked the metal structure. Izuku stood on the rustic ledge, balancing himself delicately. He looked down below, and from up here he could see everything. There was a small crowd of people who made it out before the doors locked. Dozens of police cars were gathered about but worse—Izuku could see Jin and Ibara slithering down below.

Abruptly, the gunfire behind him stopped.

No screams. No sounds.

Mortified, Izuku glanced over his shoulder.

Katsuki emerged from the darkness like he was crafted from shadows. In his hands was one of the Yakuza's rifles, and his face was sprayed with blood. The scarlet colored alarms blinked on and off, highlighting his razor sharp cheekbones. To Izuku, Katsuki looked stunning in the worst way. Like a crimson stained angel of death who was prepared to hunt him to the ends of the earth.

Katsuki's scarlet gaze locked on Izuku and he aimed the barrel right at him.

Izuku began to climb up the fire escape with haste as bullets flew past him. Running on pure adrenaline, he flung himself up several stairs at a time. The zing of bullets slamming into the metal fire escape reached his ears and made his heart pump quicker and quicker.

From the ground level, he heard someone yell, "Up there!"

On instinct, Izuku glanced down as he ran upwards. From this vantage point, he could see Jin pointing above, directly at Katsuki. Katsuki began climbing the fire escape and chased right behind Izuku.

Ibara's face sunk into a serious gaze. She swiftly took out her cellphone and began to make a call.

Unexpectedly, a third body crawled out of the window. It was one of the Yakuza guards, covered in blood and holding his stomach. He aimed his gun directly at Katsuki and fired off several bullets.

Katsuki staggered, getting nicked in the process. He ignored the man as he forged forward to follow behind Izuku.

When Izuku climbed onto the roof, he looked around desperately.

His brain began forming quick connections. At lightning speed, he pieced together a solution that would keep Katsuki out of Viper grasps. Tomura would snap Katsuki's neck if he saw him. And who knows what Chisaki would do if he recognized him.

Izuku whirled his head to the side and there, he saw his solution.

Towards the back were three, large rooftop exhaust vents. They were gooseneck shaped, and big enough to each fit a body. As Izuku's idea formed, the sound of bullets cut into his ear drums. He looked behind him to see pure madness.

Katsuki and the Yakuza guard were gridlocked in a tumultuous tussle.

This bodyguard was bigger than the others. He was more muscular than Katsuki with a tattoo of a spider web over his eye. He landed several sharp punches to Katsuki's jaw, which Katsuki ate with a grit of his teeth. Izuku staggered backwards as they swiftly began a deadly exchange of knives and punches.

But Katsuki's exhaustion was beginning to show. His breathing was harder and his hands were slightly shaking. His precision was slipping, creating sloppier blows. And this was all his opponent, who still possessed all this energy, needed.

Unknowingly, Katsuki gave the bodyguard an opening. In the blink of an eye, the bodyguard grappled for Katsuki. He picked Katsuki up and slammed him on the ground with terrifying strength. Katsuki choked and spit up blood. His eyes bulged and Izuku's protective senses went off seeing the red liquid drip from Katsuki's lips.

The bodyguard grappled for Katsuki again.

He dragged him to the edge and prepared to throw Katsuki off the roof.

Right as he lifted Katsuki up, Izuku's body moved. Izuku raced forward, shoulder butting the larger man. Izuku bit the inside of his cheek to get through the pain in his throbbing arm. He used all his strength to shove the man off of Katsuki.

This caught the bodyguard by surprise. He slipped and with a single yell, fell over the side of the building instead.

A bloodcurdling splat echoed out when he hit the bottom.

Izuku whirled on Katsuki who was now coughing up blood and holding his side. He looked in pain as his face scrunched and he groaned. Instinctively, Izuku kneeled down. He reached to help Katsuki with his wounds. But, before he could get close, Katsuki grabbed for his knife.

Izuku saw the glint of the metal in enough time to lean back. The tip of the blade grazed Adam's apple lightly and all the dread in Izuku's gut surged forward.

Katsuki really was trying to kill him.

"Katsuki!" Izuku screamed out as he dodged more attempts to gash his neck. "Wait!"

He scrambled backwards as Katsuki pushed forward.

The look in Katsuki's eyes was cold now, like he would never return from the depths of his malevolence.

Izuku stood up and so did Katsuki. He swung on Izuku and Izuku ducked under his arm. While twisting his body in a twirl, Izuku struck several pressure points on Katsuki's side. This made Katsuki seize up briefly. But the anger inside of him controlled his movements like he was being possessed.

Katsuki grabbed for the very last handgun in his holster and cocked it.

“Katsuki! Please, wait a moment!” Izuku yelled more when Katsuki began to fire off the gun.

To defend against him, Izuku stayed closely pressed to Katsuki’s back. This was done in order to not give Katsuki a clear shot. He stayed hidden in Katsuki’s blind spot as Katsuki kept trying to whirl around.

“Please, Katsuki! We-We can talk—”

“Shut up!” Katsuki viciously yelled. “I don’t give a fuck what you have to say! After I kill you I’m going to gut your new boyfriend and make you both pay for what you did to my mother!”

Katsuki reached behind him and grabbed Izuku’s arm. With all his strength, he flung Izuku in front of him and pulled the trigger.

Izuku shrieked as a hot bullet landed in his leg this time. He harnessed all the adrenaline in his blood to dodge the next few shots. He fought his way back to close range with agile maneuvering. Once he was back to hand to hand combat with Katsuki, Izuku decided it was time to put an end to this before Tomura appeared and killed them both.

Izuku and Katsuki began to dance again, but this time it was an exchange of deadly intent.

Every movement was blurred with their lightning quick speed. Each punch and kick Katsuki gave, Izuku blocked like they were in an off kilter waltz. He ducked, twirled, and twisted Katsuki’s limbs.

Then Katsuki tried to grab for his face, but instead got a fist full of the emerald tassels on Izuku’s mask. Izuku yanked backwards, and the mask broke. Tiny, pretty gems scattered to the ground and the forgotten mask fell to the floor.

Izuku cursed. He dove into advanced defensive techniques. He tried harder to make sure Katsuki didn’t get a grasp on him. He knew this fight would be over in a second if Katsuki pinned him. Katsuki’s strength was not something Izuku could easily counter.

Izuku reluctantly ramped up his fighting and was finally able to wrap his hand around Katsuki’s wrist. He kept it in a tight, binding hold. Katsuki tried to shake him off by twirling him several times.

They locked brutal, fiery glares.

Izuku forced the angle of Katsuki’s wrist to bend unnaturally. Every time Katsuki tried to aim and shoot him, Izuku maneuvered Katsuki’s wrist and made each bullet land anywhere but in him.

Izuku counted down until Katsuki was finally out of bullets.

When the final bullet failed to land in him, Izuku wrangled Katsuki’s arm with both hands. Using both his speed and strength, Izuku pulled Katsuki’s arm backwards. He did this until he felt Katsuki’s shoulder pop out of its socket.

Katsuki screamed, and Izuku screwed his eyes shut to drown it out.

Without skipping a beat, Izuku disarmed the gun from Katsuki with the twist of his wrist. Then he hit Katsuki in the side of the head with the blunt end of the weapon twice.

Katsuki stumbled. He gasped and grappled for Izuku.

Izuku gritted his teeth with tears pushing at his eyes. He powered through his heavy heart to hit Katsuki in the head once more, using all his strength.

The final blow landed with a hard crack and knocked Katsuki out cold.

All the roaring rage came to a halt, like water being thrown onto an open fire. Katsuki fizzled out, and the whiplash of the sudden silence made Izuku choke.

Katsuki's arms dropped to his sides. He slumped to the ground in a hard thud.

Izuku panted as he dropped the gun and fell to his knees next to Katsuki.

All the pain he was holding back washed over him in an instant. Everything in his body was lit on fire, down to his bones. His arm and leg throbbed around the lead inside of him. His head was pounding and he could barely hear anything past the coursing blood in his veins.

He wearily glanced at Katsuki's unconscious face in horror.

But before Izuku could process what happened, he heard footsteps coming up from below.

Quickly, Izuku stood up and gathered the gun. He stumbled on his feet, swaying with the wind. He leaned down and expertly popped Katsuki's shoulder back into place. He knew that it would be swollen later and hated himself for how he continually hurt Katsuki so much.

With the strength he had left, Izuku gritted his teeth and dragged Katsuki's body over to the large, metal vents. He grabbed a hold of the gate on it and ripped it off. Izuku gathered Katsuki in his arms and tried his best to lift him.

Katsuki was heavier than he imagined. It took a great deal of effort to hoist him up, and Izuku nearly failed. But he pushed through because he had to.

Through his tears, Izuku managed to put Katsuki in the vent legs first. He winced when Katsuki's body dropped inside clumsily like a rag-doll. He hit the ground of the vent, a metal gate that was securely attached. Izuku tossed the gun in too, and it landed on Katsuki's folded lap.

Next, Izuku took off his blazer and placed it over Katsuki's figure inside the dark vent. He covered him up well enough so no one would see anything but darkness if they walked by.

Then Izuku picked up the gate and put it back and place, locking Katsuki inside temporarily. He had no doubt Katsuki would get out of here the moment he woke up. But at least this way he would be kept safe from the Yakuza and Vipers if he stayed unconscious long enough.

Izuku stumbled back to the other side of the roof. Immediately, his knees buckled and he fell to the ground. He curled up on the cold concrete when his bullet wounds began to sting. He lowered his head and his erratic heart made his arms shake.

He made it just in time.

The door to the roof kicked open and out poured Tomura and a handful of bodyguards. They were armed and ready, pointing the barrel of guns all around the rooftop.

Tomura stalked over to Izuku and yanked him up to his feet by his shirt. Izuku winced and it was here that Tomura finally saw his bullet wounds.

The glare Tomura gave him was paralyzing.

“Where is the fucker who did this?!” One of the Yakuza yelled. His eyes were burning with fury as he whirled on Izuku. “We got a call that the culprit was chasing you up to the rooftop.”

“He—He got away,” Izuku panted out. He grabbed his arm and tried to slow the bleeding. “He jumped to the next rooftop that way.”

Izuku pointed in the opposite direction of the vents. Across from this rooftop, there was another building that was in range. It was believable enough that someone who was highly skilled could make the leap.

Everyone’s eyes turned to look at the other rooftop and one of the Yakuza cursed under his breath.

“And you didn’t think to catch him?” Tomura seethed. He narrowed his eyes at Izuku.

“He was too heavily armed,” Izuku deflected. He lowered his eyes, hoping the lie wasn’t too obvious. “I didn’t have anything on me to fight back. I needed to fend for myself the best I could, and I think I scared him off but that’s all I could accomplish.”

Tomura’s glare dug into him, seemingly unconvinced. He knew Izuku had more than enough skills to apprehend a single assailant, no matter how heavily armed. But when the Yakuza men began making calls and repeating what Izuku had said, he let it go. For now.

The Yakuza men began their pursuit in the wrong direction and Tomura grabbed Izuku by the nape. Izuku’s shoulders crept up at the controlling hold but he allowed his brother to steer him down the rooftop.

Izuku resisted the urge to look back at the vent.

His gut sank to new lows as they left, leaving Katsuki hidden in the dark.

ᔓᔓᔓ

“What the hell do you mean no one caught the shooter?” Chisaki shouted.

“I-I don’t know,” one of Chisaki’s men replied. His weary face was astonished as he stood in the middle of the room. “We tried searching for him but he was g-gone. We couldn’t find where he went.”

Izuku kept his head down.

They were all at The Viper Academy, in the lowest floor of the basement. The Academy was the closest Yakuza associated safe-hold to the venue. So, Chisaki demanded everyone be given sanctuary here until this mess was figured out.

The room they were in was large enough to fit about twenty people.

In this deepest floor of the Academy, the rooms were made of concrete and so were the hallways. No light could get in. It was a long string of connected hallways that was composed of various, barren rooms.

Growing up, this is where punishments were held. But because there hadn’t been a large cohort in so long, these rooms were now repurposed for private meetings and holding chambers.

Izuku was leaning against the wall next to Ibara.

She tended to his bullet wounds. Everyone else around them was deathly silent.

Across the room stood Chisaki, the few guards who somehow lived, and some of the other Yakuza members in Chisaki’s entourage.

On the other side of the room were the Vipers. Tomura leaned against the wall with his arms folded and Jin was eerily silent as well. Himiko, Aoyama, and several lower ranked Vipers were in the room too. They had been called in for added protection in case the mysterious killer possessed enough gall to follow them.

Tomura was examining Izuku with an unreadable expression.

Izuku remained as still as a corpse.

He barely could look at anyone in the room. His once beautiful outfit was ruined. Blood was matted into the lace and there were holes in his pants and blouse from where Katsuki shot him. Bruises from being trampled on were marked up and down his face and he had a busted lip.

“No one leaves this place until we find who is responsible,” Chisaki commanded as he paced around. “And I mean no one.”

Izuku had never seen him like this. The usually apathetic man was now brimming with hatred.

He kept his heated gaze locked on his Yakuza men. All of which kept their heads down, clearly ashamed.

“I lost five family members tonight. Five!” Chisaki shouted at his men. “My cousins, my aunt, and uncles from my father’s side are all dead! And no one could even bring me a semblance of the killer?!”

He paced as he began to bite at his fingernails.

“That man must have come with a vendetta to slaughter my family,” Chisaki whispered scornfully. “He somehow found the private room they were in within a mere matter of minutes. Not only that, he killed forty of my best men. Forty. And several guests! How is it possible that this man killed about fifty people and then escaped?!”

“I suspect he received inside help,” One of the Yakuza men with brown hair answered. “Someone must’ve let him in and then told him where your family was in the building.”

Chisaki bit his nail down to the stub. “That makes sense. We need to find the traitor—tonight. Shigaraki, do you have databases and computers down here that we could use?”

Tomura tore his gaze away from Izuku.

He shifted upright and cleared his throat. “We do. They’re around the corner. Aoyama can assist in showing you the equipment if you need.”

“Perfect,” Chisaki said. He looked expectantly at four of his Yakuza men and then mockingly gestured towards the door with his hands. “Well? What are you standing there for?”

The four all hurried out of the room. Aoyama followed behind them quietly at a quick pace.

“I’m going to go make some private calls to the rest of my family,” Chisaki announced angrily. He turned on his heels and snapped his fingers. His assistant materialized at his side. “I’ll be back in a moment. But no one leaves in or out of this basement until that fucker is found.”

Chisaki left the room as his assistant handed him his cell phone.

All the Vipers and the few Yakuza who remained looked at each other. They began to pick up in conversation, discussing the absolute mayhem that occurred. It’d been a while since that amount of bloodshed was done by anyone who was not the Yakuza. Much less on Yakuza territory.

As everyone discussed their theories, Izuku was stuck frozen knowing the truth.

Katsuki hadn’t come there for Chisaki’s family. He came there for Izuku and Chisaki themselves. Izuku accidentally led Katsuki to that room in his attempt to keep him far away from Tomura.

He touched the shallow cut on his Adam’s apple. It was where Katsuki’s blade almost sliced him. He tried his best to process what happened, but the truth was horrifying.

Katsuki tried to kill him.

He tried to kill him because Izuku broke his heart. He tried to kill him because he thought Izuku betrayed him. He tried to kill him because Izuku let Tomura convince him of the worst. Izuku held back tears as he relived the way Katsuki cried right before diving off the deep end.

He closed his eyes solemnly. Izuku blamed no one but himself.

Not even Katsuki.

He should have never listened to Tomura, that was now evident. This cracked his concrete belief that Tomura always knew best. Because for the first time ever, Tomura got it wrong. Lethally wrong. If Izuku led with his first instinct and told Katsuki the truth upfront, none of this would have happened.

When Ibara finished wrapping him up, Izuku thanked her quietly. She smiled and sighed.

“Sorry your special night with Chisaki got ruined by drama,” Ibara muttered. She patted him on the shoulder lightly. “I’m sure you’ll get a redo once this is all sorted out. He really likes you, y’know. I doubt he’ll let anything get in the way from you two being together. He’s been looking forward to it for so long.”

Before Izuku could respond to her, Tomura walked over and grabbed Izuku by his elbow. He wordlessly dragged him out the room, ignoring all the other people who stared after them.

Izuku could guess what was about to happen. They turned down two hallways out of ear shot. Tomura peered around, making sure they were alone before speaking.

“The description of the killer was blond hair and red eyes,” Tomura whispered firmly. “And there are a handful of witnesses who are saying that they saw him talking with you right before he began killing everyone.”

Izuku didn’t say a word.

“Did you tell Bakugou you and Chisaki were the ones who killed his mother?” Tomura questioned. “Like I said not to for this exact goddamn reason?”

“No. I didn’t say anything,” Izuku whispered. “I didn’t speak a word to him.”

He kept himself calm in his loophole of truth. But Tomura narrowed his eyes, clearly not believing him.

“You better hope for both your sake and mine, they find nothing that ties you to him,” Tomura said in a low, serious whisper. “Otherwise Chisaki is going to start demanding heads. Our heads.”

Izuku swallowed.

He glanced to the side wearily. This was a horribly sticky situation. But at the forefront of his mind were the children. Discord was about to happen and they would not be safe soon.

They returned to the room and Izuku thought quietly about Katsuma.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They weren't allowed to go anywhere.

The Yakuza stayed posted in front of the door, watching them all with untrusting eyes. And more so, because of the deaths in Chisaki's family, the consummation was once again postponed. The Yakuza had tossed his overnight duffle bag in the corner off to the side.

They sat in the room for hours waiting for Chisaki's posse to figure out who it was.

By now, all the Vipers sat down at chairs and gathered around the two tables in the room. Tomura was dead silent, typing on his phone sending emails. Izuku and Aoyama sat quietly next to each other. And off to the side, Jin, Ibara and Himiko were all talking about what happened. They gossiped about texts they were receiving from others in the Underground scene.

Apparently, people were already referring to what happened as the Scarlet Masquerade.

It fits. A neutral colored masquerade decorated in vivid shades of red—by a man who showed up wearing scarlet. If there was anything Katsuki stayed true to, it was his alias.

Izuku nervously jittered his leg with his hands folded in his lap. His stomach felt like he was on a boat rocking back and forth on a turbulent sea. He hoped it wasn't in Fate's plan that Katsuki was found out. He didn't want Katsuki to be hunted by the Yakuza—but.

Given what happened tonight, Izuku wondered who would really be hunting who.

He eyed his duffle bag in the corner.

Izuku turned to Aoyama with a forced smile.

"Where's Katsuma?" Izuku questioned with mild anxiety. "If you don't mind me asking."

"Oh, I dropped him off upstairs with the other kids," Aoyama explained. He leaned against the table with a sheepish smile. "A lower ranked Viper is taking care of them in the meantime until Chisaki tells us we can go."

"Ah. Okay," Izuku muttered. He gave a stiff smile. "Thank you."

Right as Aoyama seemed like he was about to ask something, the door to the room crept open. All their eyes turned. Walking in was Chisaki, his assistant and the four Yakuza men who had gone down to the database room. Chisaki's assistant was holding a large stack of papers in his hands.

"We found him," Chisaki announced.

Everyone's attention piqued while Izuku's heart dropped. He hoped they got the wrong guy.

Chisaki walked forward with his hands behind his back. He stopped in the middle of the room.

“It took a while. Turns out he’s clever,” Chisaki sincerely complimented. “He knocked out all the security cameras inside with a hack that looped the footage. There’s no proof of him inside the building but—based on descriptions from witnesses, we think we found him on CCTV footage near the venue.”

Izuku nervously wrung his hands.

“We got a clip of him with a hat and mask on,” Chisaki’s assistant said. The white haired man’s regal air encased him as he joined Chisaki in the middle of the room. “He was walking across the street to the back of the venue around the same time several guards were killed on the third floor. We were able to cross check our databases with the footage. We found a couple potential matches for an identity. But out of all the matches, only one had a solid motive to do something like this.”

“Bakugou Katsuki,” Chisaki spat.

Izuku’s stomach dropped straight to the ground.

He did his best not to give any reaction. Both Himiko and Tomura cut their eyes to him and then to each other. His brother and sister turned on their emotionless masks. Chisaki kept on speaking.

“He is the only child of Bakugou Mitsuki. I ordered for her to be killed five years ago for owing a debt.” Chisaki glowered. “Seems like both mother and son will always be thorns in my side up until the day they die.”

“Alrighty then,” Jin said eagerly. He gave a signature thumbs up with a bloodthirsty smile. “We have a name. Time to go bring him in—”

“—I’m not finished yet,” Chisaki interrupted. He held a single finger up and tilted his head. “There was a tiny, tiny detail in Bakugou Katsuki’s records that makes this all more… interesting. We didn’t even see it in the first pass. It was so small that I think most people would have overlooked it if they were not searching for it.”

“…Exactly what detail would this be?” Tomura questioned cautiously.

“Well,” Chisaki said and his eyes became dark. “Since he killed members of my family, I was searching for his family members. I wanted to kill them and make it even. A life for a life, if you will. But, he’s an orphan and has no known living relatives.”

Chisaki’s assistant then thumbed through the documents he was holding. He plucked a particular piece of paper from the stack. He handed it to Chisaki.

“However,” Chisaki drawled out. “It turns out he’s married—to Mamushi Izuku. Who is now legally listed as Bakugou Izuku.”

He turned the paper for everyone to see.

All hell broke loose.

Tomura's eyes went wild as he stood up fast enough to knock over his seat. Every Viper in the room began saying there must have been a mistake. Except for Himiko. She whirled on Izuku with disbelief etched into her face with her mouth dropped open. Ibara tried to be reasonable as always. She aided Tomura and Aoyama in saying that there was no way that document was real.

But Izuku could recognize the document from his seat. It was a photocopy of their marriage certificate plain as day.

He had forgotten marriages were public record.

Izuku's heart urged him to make a sprint for the door. He needed to flee, grab the kids and make a run for it. However, his logic told him there was no real point in putting up a struggle with this many Yakuza in the room.

Dreadful acceptance began to make itself home in Izuku.

Tomura stalked up to Chisaki and grabbed the piece of paper out of his hands.

"No," Tomura whispered. His eyes stretched as wide as the moon as he read the document. He violently shook his head and scowled. "This has to be a set up. I would have known if my little brother was married—"

"—Look at the date," Chisaki pointed out. "This was the week right after we made our deal. Then he disappeared without notice on an assignment. It's very clear this was done on purpose. For what reason? I'm not sure. But your brother likely conspired with that fucking lowlife to harm my family. It's obvious."

"Izuku, tell them that you're not married," Aoyama urged. He looked flabbergasted. "They must have gotten something wrong. It could be a mix up in the records."

But Izuku knew there was no use in denying it.

Chisaki was giving him a tyrannically, furious glare.

As the weight of being caught flooded into Izuku, he squeezed his hands together. His fingernails bit into his skin painfully. His heart ached as he anxiously wanted to get to Katsuma. But knew he couldn't. And just like that, everything came crumbling down on top of him in a single night.

The Yakuza seized Izuku immediately, folding him down over the table with excessive force. He clenched his jaw through the pain and he was manhandled towards the exit with his hands behind his back.

Izuku didn't resist.

"I want him locked up in one of the holding cells in the other rooms," Chisaki demanded loudly. He turned his heated glare on to Tomura's frigid one. "As repentance for what happened tonight, you will execute five Vipers. A family member for a family member. Those are my terms."

Tomura curled his fist. "What?"

"What do you mean what?" Chisaki mocked. He tilted his head at Tomura. "Would you rather I take back my offer for your seat at the Tokyo Underground Council? Because trust me, that can be done as well, Tomura. I would prefer not to do that since I was sincerely looking forward to working with you. But, he's probably not even a virgin, is he?"

Chisaki turned his nose up at Izuku.

"And to think, I kissed his filthy mouth," Chisaki spat. "For such perfect beauty, he really is a goddamn snake. But you all are, aren't you? Especially you, Tomura. I will have to really reexamine the deal we made. You sold me on him under false pretenses."

"No. I didn't. I swear I didn't know," Tomura defended. He didn't look at Izuku as his anger rattled. "None of us knew about this."

"Luckily, I don't give a damn," Chisaki quipped. "The only thing I care about is you bringing me five cold bodies to my home before sunrise. And I want them to be important bodies, not simply anyone. Your makeshift family will feel the same pain as mine tonight. Then we can call it even."

Chisaki cut his glare towards Izuku. His greedy gaze raked him up and down.

In the back of his eyes was a flicker of sourness. It mirrored a spoiled child who hadn't gotten to play with the toy he had been promised. Izuku could tell Chisaki had never been denied anything. And for the first time in his life, Izuku had denied him a way. Led him on, even.

It was here Izuku knew what was next. Because if Chisaki couldn't have him, no one could.

Chisaki's eyes continued to burn into Izuku with a contorted selfishness.

"And Izuku will be one of those bodies," Chisaki hissed.

ɯɯɯ

Izuku was beginning to think that omen for winter coming early was true.

How horrific his luck had been in the last string of hours. Not only did he have Katsuki hunting him, now Chisaki was demanding his head. Everything was twisted about in an awful web of entanglement.

He tucked himself further in the corner of the holding cell.

He was still in the basement, several doors down from where everyone was. He could hear yelling down the hall from Chisaki and Tomura. Their voices were clashing like different elemental titans in a battle. Tomura was no doubt trying to talk Chisaki off the ledge. But from the sounds of it, it wasn't working.

Izuku eyed the lock on the cell. He needed to get out of here somehow and get to the kids.

Soon, the yelling died out. Several people began to walk his way. He recognized a handful of the footsteps. Jin. Ibara. Himiko. Tomura. But others he didn't. His heart rate increased when he heard Tomura say, "Wait here for a moment."

The door slammed open, and Tomura flew in like a storm. He looked fit to kill Izuku with his bare hands.

"Stand the hell up," Tomura commanded. "You're going to tell me what the fuck is going on right now."

Izuku lifted himself with a light wobble. The exhaust in his bones was beginning to rear its head as he walked to the front of the cell.

"You got married? To that fucking lunatic?" Tomura seethed with words so sharp Izuku felt them cut into his skin. "What the hell were you thinking?!"

"It was an accident," Izuku admitted meekly. "We were blackout drunk."

"Then why did you not get a goddamn divorce?"

Izuku wished he had an answer for that. He truly didn't know.

That was the one detail that didn't align when Izuku recounted everything that occurred tonight. If Katsuki was so hellbent on killing him, why hadn't he filed the divorce papers? What was the point of remaining married if this was what he was going to do?

Something didn't quite seem right. And his intuition was gnawing at him because of it.

"I…I don't know," Izuku said honestly. "I sent him the divorce papers after everything, but he never signed them I suppose."

Tomura's eyes narrowed further. "You sent them to that estate in Biei?"

"Yes. I-I guess he really didn't want a divorce."

Tomura let out an angry huff and rolled his eyes.

"How could you fuck up this badly, Izuku?" Tomura nearly yelled. "This has got to be the biggest misstep you've ever made. Now other Vipers are going to pay the price for your mistake. Everything was set up perfectly."

"Perfectly?" Izuku parroted. Anger swelled in his chest. "How was any of this perfect?"

"It was all perfect until you went and married the violent serial killer."

“Maybe it was perfect for you.” Izuku glared at Tomura. Tears gathered at the bottom of his eyes from the jab at Katsuki. “I never wanted the arrangement with Chisaki. None of this would have happened if you had found something else—anything else—that Chisaki would have wanted. But no, you gave him me instead!”

Izuku’s voice cracked on the last word. He hated how tears slipped down his face.

“And Katsuki would have never done what he did if I had told him the truth like I originally wanted to,” Izuku said pointedly. “Now everything is a mess because of you. But at least you might still keep your seat at the table, right? Like always, you got everything you wanted,” Izuku concluded with distaste in his voice.

Tomura scoffed. He looked at Izuku like he was deeply naive.

“I didn’t get everything I wanted, Izuku,” Tomura whispered with a snarl. “I wanted to keep you safe and I wanted to merge us with the Yakuza.”

Izuku’s anger faltered from confusion.

He blinked rapidly to clear his bleary eyes.

“What do you mean merge with the Yakuza?” Izuku asked cautiously.

“All those years ago, when I said I can get power through Chisaki, I genuinely meant through him,” Tomura explained in a hush volume. “When we merge with the Yakuza, Vipers will skyrocket up the ladder in the Underground. And I would be able to dethrone that spoiled brat in less than five years as the head of The Tokyo Underground Council once I got on the inside of the Shie Hassaikai.”

There was that word that defined Tomura’s life: Power.

Power was all Tomura cared about. Izuku saw now, he was always a means to an end for Tomura’s struggle to power in a way. Izuku wondered where Tomura’s lust for power ended and his affection for him began. Or if they were even separated at all.

Maybe to Tomura, they were the same thing.

But the concept of merging the Vipers with the Shie Hassaikai was far-fetched. Not even Izuku really understood how Tomura thought he was going to pull that off.

“And how would we merge with them?” Izuku asked half heartedly.

“Think. Historically, how do powerful families usually merge together?”

Izuku went still. His skin dropped several temperatures as he shifted to look at Tomura sideways. Tomura’s eyes continued to sink into him. He waited with patience for the answer to come to Izuku. Steadily, only one thing came to mind.

Marriage.

Izuku's eyes began to creep wider and wider.

A light as bright as the sun shone down on all of Tomura's actions. The last few years flashed before Izuku's eyes from an entirely new angle.

He revisited how Tomura used to meet with One and Chisaki alone. Then he thought about how Tomura privately went out of his way to get close to Chisaki. He gained Chisaki's respect and trust under Nine's nose.

He recalled how Tomura stopped hitting him right after Chisaki laid eyes on him. Then Tomura went out of his way to fix his skin. He even made Izuku seem desirable to all of Hadeus. But more importantly, he made it known he controlled Izuku.

Selling his virginity specifically to Chisaki was a forceful way to bring them together. The seat at the table was simply a stepping stone to be seen as equals so that when Tomura proposed the merge, he would be taken seriously.

Izuku replayed the conversation he had with Chisaki on the dance floor. The strangeness made sense now. Tomura told Chisaki about his defect on purpose. He wanted to make sure Chisaki knew Izuku was capable of romantic feelings, unlike other Vipers.

Which opened the door for things such as dates. And ultimately, led to marriage if the cards were played right. It's why Chisaki went out of his way to host a giant ball. Even promised two weeks of romance. It was all done in order to try to woo Izuku.

Then finally, Izuku recalled what Tomura said to him right before he left for Okinawa. He thought it was strange, but he never fixated on it too much. Until now.

"Maybe if you're lucky he'll buy you again and it'll bud into some sort of ritual," Tomura had said. "I would allow you to date, if it was Chisaki."

"You…You never intended for me and Chisaki to be a one night thing," Izuku whispered, horrified. "Did you?"

Tomura's cold, calculating gaze grew frosty. He narrowed his eyes on Izuku and lowered his chin. The scar over his eye crinkled and the fangs on the tattooed vipers on his neck seemed deadlier.

"No," Tomura admitted. "I didn't."

Izuku's body hollowed out.

He shook his head slowly and backed away. He pressed himself against the wall to get the furthest away from Tomura as he could be.

"I practically gave you Chisaki on a silver platter tonight," Tomura angrily remarked. "Do you know how much I went out of my way to constantly talk you up to him? I made you sound like the most precious thing on this planet to possess."

Izuku shook his head. He tried to block out Tomura's words, but he kept going.

“Chisaki is deeply infatuated with the concept of you because of your beauty,” Tomura said. “You know this. It’s the never ending tango between beauty and power. The most powerful only liked to be coupled with the most beautiful. It makes sense to people like Chisaki for their future spouse to be an unobtainable beauty that only they could get.”

“N-No,” Izuku whispered. He shook his head more. “That’s going too far, Tomura!”

“It’s not too far, it was me looking out for you,” Tomura countered. “It would have been a win-win for everyone. Chisaki would have his trophy. You would have your romance. And I would have Yakuza level power. If you simply went along with what I set up, you would have gotten the fairy tale romance you’ve been craving all your life with the most powerful man in Japan.”

“You’re insane,” Izuku spat. His heart began erratically racing. “A marriage between us would have never happened because I would have never agreed to that!”

“You would have if you were never in love with that goddamn blond,” Tomura hissed. “I have always tried my best to accommodate you because of your defect. But I’m done. A marriage between you and Chisaki doesn’t have to have your consent because you missed the part where your opinion ultimately doesn’t matter.”

Tomura’s eyes darkened and the scowl on his face grew.

“If Chisaki still asked me permission to have you, I will gladly give it,” Tomura promised. “And if everything goes correctly with my help, it would lead to the final business deal between us: a marriage. Then we would all be family after that—and family nepotism is the easiest access to power. I learned that from the novel of yours I read so long ago.”

Izuku felt sick to his stomach.

This whole time, Tomura was setting him up to be a goddamn Yakuza bride.

What’s worse, Izuku feared that Tomura could still arrange for that to happen. Tomura and Chisaki were friends, in a twisted fashion. Tomura held a certain persuasion over Chisaki. It wouldn’t take too long for Tomura to convince Chisaki marrying Izuku would be the best way to own him.

But then Izuku remembered: he was already married.

And now, because of that, Chisaki wanted nothing to do with him.

Tomura truly calculated everything down to the last detail. All except for him and Katsuki being wildly stupid.

Slowly, Izuku began seeing the irony in all this.

Izuku laughed a bit, and Tomura grew confused. Izuku laughed some more as he continued to think about it all. His and Katsuki’s dumb, accidental marriage was a full on blockade to Tomura’s path to total power.

Tomura narrowed his eyes. “Do you really think you should be laughing right now?”

“I’m laughing because your merge won’t ever work,” Izuku said. He chuckled sadly, thinking about his husband. “Chisaki wants me dead. He said it himself. And besides, he’ll never touch me now that he thinks I’m not a virgin. That was my whole appeal to him, wasn’t it? And I doubt that he’ll be happy with marrying another viper. He thinks of them as merchandise.”

At that, Tomura cruelly scoffed.

“Oh, Izuku,” Tomura said his name in a low, guttural drawl. “I have always found a solution to clean up your messes. Haven’t I?”

Tomura backed away from the cell and Izuku’s laughter died off.

“Now. I’m going to go negotiate with Chisaki,” Tomura declared as he headed to the door. “I’ll come up with a solution out of this, and get my way. Like I always do.”

Then he stopped. He glared at Izuku from over his shoulder.

“And Izuku—” Tomura said. “I want you to know, you will be severely punished for all of this; For going to Okinawa. For getting married. For lying and running away with that psychopath and throwing away your virginity. I will make sure you feel the weight of your deception for the rest of your life.”

Tomura exited the room, leaving him alone with that looming threat.

The weight of all the night’s events hit his shoulders. Steadily, Izuku slid down to the ground in fear.

Because even with all this mess, Tomura was right. He did always find a way out of impossible situations. Tomura’s skill to slither out of any fiasco with his silver tongue and brute strength was unmatched. He was something to be feared because he kept all his promises.

Which left the warning of a brutal punishment hanging over Izuku’s head.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku looked up when the door finally opened after several, long hours.

In walked all that remained of The Viper Seven. Beside them were several lower ranked Vipers holding rifles.

Ibara was wearing an indifferent expression that matched Jin’s. Himiko was suppressing a smile, as if she was enjoying all of this. But Aoyama seemed slightly skittish. He was looking down at the ground while he hugged his arm.

Tomura stood in the middle of the room.

“Well,” Tomura said. He clicked his tongue. “I got to keep my seat on the Council and I settled with Chisaki who the five Vipers to die will be.”

Tomura paused and turned his spiteful eyes on Izuku.

“Congrats, Izuku,” Tomura said. “Chisaki agreed that you can keep your life. But only on two conditions. The first is that you fully cooperate with the Yakuza and help lead them to where Bakugou is so they can put him down. The second is that you will now be spending two full months with Chisaki. If you don’t do either of these, they will collect your head. But of course, I told them you would be happy to oblige.”

Tomura, once again, found a way to save Izuku’s life.

However, Izuku held off on his reaction.

The atmosphere in the room was more suffocating than thick smog. Izuku walked up the front of the cell and grabbed the bars. He wearily glanced around at all his brothers and sisters. When Aoyama couldn’t lift his head, everything seemed off. Izuku then glanced at Ibara and she averted her face away from him.

“Who is being executed?” Izuku asked quietly.

“It’ll be the children of the last cohort,” Tomura said. “Five lives in exchange for five lives.”

Gravity twisted and wrangled Izuku’s whole body. At the same instance, time stopped.

“W-What?” Izuku gasped. “No—”

Tremors more violent than a roaring tide overtook Izuku. Several memories of Katsuma happily running around flashed before him. Then all the joyful times burned at the edges, swallowing Katsuma up whole. The fire consumed Katsuma’s future and all that remained was blood.

“No,” Izuku choked. His eyes stretched wide and his grip on the bars tightened. He shook his head violently as he stared at Tomura bewildered. “N-No you can’t!” Izuku yelled. “They’re kids! Why?! Why would you choose them?!”

But all Tomura did was stare back at him blankly.

“Because Chisaki agrees killing the children would be a proper exchange,” Tomura said bluntly. “It’s sadistic enough that it satisfies him. We will have to start over entirely with raising a new cohort. But he wants that as a punishment for us.”

The ground under Izuku felt like it flat out slanted.

His world went lopsided in a horrible, queasy motion. He nearly fell, knees buckling as his body viscerally reacted.

“B-But they’re only children, Tomura,” Izuku begged. His grip on the bars tightened until it hurt. “They’re innocent in all of this. You can’t do this to them—”

“—I can and I will,” Tomura promised. There was no remorse in his eyes or voice. “The kids aren’t exactly old enough to be truly valuable to me anyways. It’ll be easier to raise a new cohort from scratch versus replacing an older viper who is needed on assignments. What’s a mere five years in the grand scheme of things?”

A mere five years.

Izuku stared at Tomura, horrified.

“No,” Izuku desperately whispered. His knuckles turned white from his grip. “N-No. Please. There has to be another solution.”

Izuku wildly turned his head to everyone else in the room for help.

“Aoyama!” He called. But his brother didn’t react. “Y-You’re not going to let this happen are you?”

Silence.

“Aoyama?”

Izuku’s voice cracked as he called for Aoyama once more. But he was only ignored. Izuku’s vision blurred, and the scorch of tears overtook him. He choked back a sob as he saw more happy memories with Katsuma burning in front of him.

He shook his head and whirled to the next person.

“Ibara—You can’t think this is the correct solution?” Izuku asked with a splinter down his vocal cords.

But she didn’t lift her gaze. She kept her arms folded and remained neutral by Tomura’s side.

Izuku outright sobbed now, unable to control it. Everyone stayed quiet as they let Izuku process the information. It was as if they knew this would be hard for him to accept. They waited out his emotional firestorm with patience.

“J-Jin,” Izuku called next. “Jin. Please. Please. You guys can’t be okay with this. Y-You can’t be.”

“It’s what Chisaki thinks is fair, Izuku,” Jin replied with a level of exhaustion. Like this was all too troublesome. He was the only one besides Tomura able to meet his eyes. But he didn’t have an ounce of compassion inside of them.

“We also can’t deny Chisaki what he wants,” Ibara finally spoke. She shook her head and kept her eyes down. “Besides, what Tomura said is right. We can always get another cohort. It’s the least impactful on us logistically. But, giving Chisaki the lives of five children will make him satisfied. It’s callous in the way Chisaki likes.”

The grasp Izuku had on the string of hope slipped.

It slipped down and down until he saw five, small graves aligned in a row. Katsuma. Eri. Kota. Hana. Tamashiro. He could see their headstones. This was the very thing he wanted to prevent and now he was locked in a cage.

Izuku turned to the last person there.

“Himiko.” He called her name like it was the final lifeboat setting sail from a wreckage. “Himiko. Please.”

She did not look nor say anything to him right away. She glanced at him once and then turned her head to the side.

Izuku stared in disbelief. How could they all be so complicit?

But he knew how. It was because they felt nothing. Absolutely nothing. This all simply boiled down to a five year waste of time for them. But to Izuku these were stolen children’s lives being tossed away. However, that’s how it always has been, hasn’t it? Lives thrown away so wastefully.

They would simply get more kids.

He could see it: Tomura would find another five victims. He would bend and break them; mold them to be new additions to their giant viper machine. No one would do anything. They would all stand by and watch as the viper consumed its own tail in an endless cycle of death. Every new addition truly was a new link in the chain to keep the viper fed.

Chunky, ugly teardrops fell from Izuku’s face.

Izuku glared at Tomura through the metal bars. Tomura stared at him right back, unfazed. Izuku seethed and his chest began to heave up and down. His core burned with rage as hot as a thousand coals. He hated the indifference in Tomura’s eyes.

Izuku banged on the cell bars, shaking them violently. “Let me out of here. Right now!”

“That won’t be happening,” Tomura replied sharply. He began to slowly slide on his leather gloves and flexed his hands. “I decided it’s best if you stay locked in here while we do what we need to do.”

“I’m sure you understand,” Ibara tried to comfort. “You’re a liability.”

“Let me out!” Izuku screamed at the top of his lungs. He banged on the bars more, rattling them furiously. “L-Let me see Katsuma! Please! Don’t do this!”

Izuku slipped into hysterics.

He began screaming and shaking the cage. All the memories from his childhood and Katsuma melted together into one. He not only failed Katsuma, but he also failed his younger self.

“Consider this your ultimate punishment, Izuku,” Tomura taunted heartlessly. “I hope losing Katsuma teaches you a valuable lesson. This is what happens when you deceive me. You should have thought twice before going behind my back.”

With those hateful words, Izuku pieced together that this was all Tomura’s idea.

The kids probably never even crossed Chisaki’s mind—but they definitely crossed Tomura’s. And he likely offered their lives as a terrible, twisted way to hurt Izuku. But because Chisaki was just as much of a sadist as his brother, he likely found it to be a grand idea and agreed.

“I won’t let you do this!” Izuku shrieked at a shrill volume. “I won’t! I’m not going to let any of you touch them!”

“Jin,” Tomura calmly called. He snapped his fingers and pointed to Izuku. “Handle him as we discussed. I’m going to go with Himiko to escort Chisaki home. He’s tired and wants to retire for the night and all his members would like to leave as well.”

“Got it,” Jin replied.

Izuku hyperventilated as Tomura began walking out the room.

Izuku’s eyes were wild as Tomura left. He watched one by one as Aoyama, Himiko, and Ibara left too. No one spared him a glance.

“Get back here!” Izuku screamed, spittle looped across the sides of his mouth. He banged and banged until he could feel the metal nearly give into him. “Tomura! Tomura!”

Then Izuku heard Jin move.

He whirled his head up to see Jin flipping a rifle. Jin took the blunt end of it and struck Izuku in the forehead in a single, hard blow from between the bars.

Izuku’s world went dark as he dropped to the ground.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku groaned as he slowly blinked open his eyes.

It was blurry. Everything was in double vision and out of focus. Izuku gasped as he turned over on the dingy floor. He lifted his head, and in the distance he saw double vision of a figure. The person turned around at the sound of his groan.

It was Jin, smiling. There were two of him looking down at Izuku with a malignant gleam in his eyes.

“Ah, good. You’re up,” Jin cackled. “Right on time. I was about to wake you.”

Izuku fought against the queasiness in his stomach. He lifted himself up on his wobbling arms and gradually the world around him came back into focus.

The double vision of Jin he was seeing vanished, snapping him into one figure. He was wearing his all black fighting gear now, and there was a gun on his waist holster. On his back were his two katanas, crossed like an X.

Hooked to his belt were keys in a large, rustic circle.

They dangled, and Izuku could piece together those were the keys to his cell.

Jin sauntered over with a whistle and squatted down to Izuku's level. He smiled languidly.

"Yakuza boogeymen are all gone," Jin said. "Tomura and Himiko are with Chisaki. But Tomura put me in charge of watching you. He wanted you to make sure you were awake so you could be able to hear them die from far away. Y'know. As part of your punishment."

The distant sound of giggling children reached Izuku's ears.

Every nerve in his body went on high alert. Izuku scrambled upright and adrenaline surged through his limbs. He grabbed the bars of the cell and stared wide at the door. He heard the sound of tiny feet marching.

"Jin, listen to me. Stop this before it's too late," Izuku begged. "Don't let Tomura go through with this."

"Sorry, Izuku," Jin said. "You brought this on yourself. You have a lot of explaining to do to the Yakuza after we put down the kids."

Izuku screwed his eyes shut.

"I'm sorry. Please, Jin. I'm really fucking sorry. I-I can explain all of it to Chisaki, but stop this. I'll do anything! Whatever he wants!" The sound of the kids was far away now. But they were still in close enough range that Izuku could hear them. "This is sick."

"Not sick enough if you ask me," Jin jabbed. He stood up and looked down at Izuku from over his nose. "This is Tomura's call anyways. He knew your defect would make you grieve for the kids, so. This is what you get for fucking up."

Jin walked away to go sit at the table across the way. His posture was as if this was just any other day. He kicked his feet up and pulled out his phone. He started playing a game on his phone, ignoring everything.

Izuku began crying angrily.

He heard the sound of children playing in the back and covered his ears. He dropped to his knees in the cell. He pressed his palms flat against his head. But he couldn't drown out the sounds of their voices. Izuku shook his head with fever. He did this over and over until he made himself dizzy.

Then a dark shadow stepped into view from out of the corner of his eye.

He crept his gaze to the side to see the ghost of Hiryu staring at him.

The bullet hole in the skull was wider now, and the eyes were fully inky like a demon. The ink ran over, spilling down his face like tears. In the reflection of Obsidian eyes, Izuku saw himself. But what was most unnerving was how close the ghost was—a mere few inches from his face.

“No,” Izuku whispered. He squeezed his eyes shut. “Not now. You’re not real. Go away.”

Jin turned his head and raised an eyebrow at the whisper. He paused for a moment then he went back to playing his phone game.

Izuku opened his eyes. He hoped there would be nothing, but there it was: the face of his dead brother.

The shadow was startling close, unlike ever before.

“Aish, this again?” Hiryu’s ghost mumbled. “That’s what you said last time you were locked in a cage with me. Have you really not figured out what I am yet?”

“You’re nothing but the side of me that feels guilty for Hiryu’s death,” Izuku whispered angrily.

This time, Jin put his phone down. He said, “Oi. Quit muttering to yourself, it’s creeping me out.”

Izuku ignored him, too compelled by the vision in front of him.

At the lack of response Jin grumbled under his breath. He waved his hand dismissively and said some obscenity about Izuku. He went back to paying attention to his phone and lit himself a cigarette with the lighter that was on his key chain.

“I’m far more than a guilty conscience,” The phantom said.

It tapped its own temple several times and slowly the appearance of Hiryu melted. It disintegrated down to reveal a shadow mirror image of Izuku. Its hands were covered in dried blood up to its forearms. In his eyes was a dark fire and its mouth was curled fiercely into a depraved leer.

“I’m your instinct to survive,” it whispered hauntingly.

Its ghost-like voice stretched through Izuku’s skull, starting on one side and ending on the other. It oscillated steadily from one ear to another as it spoke.

“I’m the desperate part of you that will do whatever it takes to live,” it whispered. “No matter the taboo consequences. I was born that day you killed Sen, we had met on the bus ride home. But I truly started to show my face when you killed Hiryu. Someone who loved you but you still killed him in order to save your own skin.”

The shadow glowered and tilted its head.

“You keep repressing me with useless guilt,” it chastised. “Stop it. You should never apologize for surviving. From here on out, we need to be in harmony from now on if you want to live.” It jutted its chin to Jin across the room. “Look at him.”

Izuku did.

He turned his teary gaze to his brother. Jin was laughing at his phone while the sound of the kids talking were in the background. He inhaled a puff from his cigarette and tutted the ashes on the table.

“What an arrogant, soulless creature.” The shadow said what Izuku was thinking. “What type of person would kill a kid? I’ll tell you, someone who isn’t a person. But a snake would do it. And they’re all terrible vile snakes.”

Izuku’s sadness stopped. His sorrow calcified down to its bare bones and hardened into fury. Then the feeling of a hook inside of his gut caught. It pulled and pulled until his rage came close to the surface.

“Ah. There’s that instinct,” the shadow said. It smirked at him. “I can finally feel you pulling from me again. That dire need inside of you to survive is so potent. But somehow, it’s bigger than before. Is it because you’re not surviving only for yourself now?”

Izuku thought of Katsuma. The rage in his gut pulled viciously.

“Tell me. Do you want to save them?” The shadow asked. “Do you want them to survive?”

“Yes,” Izuku whispered desperately. “I do.”

“Then accept me,” the shadow hissed. It leaned in with a menacing scowl an inch away from Izuku’s face. “Accept the violence you have in your heart when it comes to survival. Accept you are a cold blooded killer and if you do, I can get you out of here.”

The shadow held out a hand dripped in black ink.

With shaking fingers, Izuku grasped that part of his soul in a tight hold.

The shadow simpered and gave Izuku its ferocity.

It was like being electrocuted. Izuku was shocked wide awake, for once seeing himself without shame. The surge of all his instincts combusted into pure adrenaline. Every sense was heightened. His anxiety morphed into raw energy and his lungs expanded with a breath of new air.

For the first time, Izuku accepted himself.

The violence inside of him opened like floodgates. It poured inside of his body, overpowering his viper in its viscous, dark green liquid. The viper struggled and tried to slither out. But that shadow inside of him grabbed it by the neck. It pulled down the viper under the surface and drowned it alive.

His vertebrae stacked on top of each other, straightening out.

Izuku rolled his shoulders. He slowly stood up with his head lulled down. With steady hands, he took off his necktie and dropped it to the ground. He dragged his feet over to the front of the cell with his bangs covering his eyes.

Izuku leaned in and grabbed a hold of the bars.

Jin looked up again. He waited for Izuku to move, but instead Izuku kept his head down, hiding his eyes under his bangs. Jin scoffed and finally locked his phone. He put it face down on the table with a bang.

He walked over to the cell.

“Can you stop crying already? It’s getting annoying,” Jin jeered. He cringed at the tears running down Izuku’s cheeks. “Ugh. Himiko was right about you. You aren’t a real viper at all.”

“…You’re right, I’m not,” Izuku whispered quietly.

He snapped open his eyes and lifted his head. His pupils were constricted down into terrifying, tiny dots. It left nothing but a sea of viridian venom.

“I’m a viper killer,” Izuku snarled.

Izuku shot his hand out and an entire lifetime of Tomura’s lethal training snapped into place.

He grabbed Jin’s arm and pulled it through the bars. Jin stumbled, taken off guard. With unnerving speed, Izuku snapped back Jin’s arm on a metal bar. Jin screamed in agony as his arm was broken clean in two. Blistering pain radiated through him.

Quickly, Jin gritted his teeth as he tried to yank back his limb. But Izuku’s vicious hold was too tight.

Izuku’s nostrils flared as he sunk his claws deep into Jin’s flesh. He drew blood and showed teeth. Izuku’s poisonous gaze became feral as he looked down. He homed in on the keys rattling from Jin’s side.

Jin reached for his gun, but Izuku was quicker.

Izuku took a hold of Jin’s mangled arm and twisted it around. They both screamed out as Izuku flipped Jin’s whole body and slammed him down to the ground. The satisfying crunch of bone breaking amplified Izuku’s ambition.

Jin swiftly recovered, however.

He seized the gun at his waist. He aimed it at Izuku and pulled the trigger.

Izuku barely had enough time to dodge as the bullet grazed him. He ducked millimeters below Jin’s line of fire. The searing graze of the bullet hit his ear. He hardly felt it, though.

The rage inside of him consumed the pain like it was merely fuel.

Izuku grabbed Jin's other wrist and forced the gun to fire towards the ceiling. He then yanked the other arm into the holding cell with him. Jin groaned as his face hit the hard surface. Izuku yanked the limb again and again, making sure to hurt Jin. Then he gave the other arm the same treatment.

He snapped the arm against a metal bar until it broke clean.

Jin's body twitched violently. He began screaming for back up when the gun dropped out of his hands. It landed right into the cage. Jin tried to struggle away from Izuku. But Izuku held a steel hold on his broken arm. He pressed his fingers into the fragmented bones, wanting to make it hurt.

He wanted Jin to feel the agony he felt.

Izuku snatched the gun up before Jin could make a move for it.

Then, without hesitation, he pulled the trigger.

The loud gunshot was followed by deafening silence. The bullet ended his brother's life and Izuku felt close to nothing. The red liquid poured out of Jin's head and began to pool around him.

Suddenly, the sound of rushing footsteps came. Izuku's head snapped up when the door opened and in flew three lower ranked Vipers. He saw them as the filthy snakes they were and scowled.

They immediately fired their guns at him. Izuku ducked the bullets as fast as he could. Two grazed him but he pushed through the pain the way Tomura trained him to: make himself feel nothing.

He countered with three precise bullets and landed them in the other viper's kneecaps. They crumbled, like a pile of bricks. Izuku fired off three more right between their eyes.

Their bodies hit the floor with a satisfying thud.

Izuku worked with haste. He put the gun in his pant's waistline and ran over to Jin's corpse. He pulled at the body until it flipped over. There were the keys to the cell. Izuku grappled for them and hastily unlocked the door.

Izuku stared coldly down at Jin and eyed the Katanas. He took one in his hand, unsheathed it, and tested the weight.

His gaze grew more serious when he heard more people coming this way. There must have been Vipers in the hallways making rounds. Racing against time, Izuku sprinted out of the room. He followed the bouncing echo of children and took off towards it.

"Please don't be too late," Izuku whispered to himself as he picked up speed.

He rounded the corner and awaiting him was an attempt to inject him with a syringe. Izuku hissed and ducked back and the needle nicked him lightly. He recognized it as a paralyzer.

He was forced backwards and bum rushed by six more lower ranked Vipers.

The six of them tried to overpower him with skilled knife attacks. They were fast. Succinct and precise. But Izuku deflected with fluidity only someone who was in The Viper Seven possessed. He was top ranked for a reason, and he could see them realize it as soon as they began losing the struggle.

Izuku drew the katana and began to go on the offense. The clashing of metal bounced off the walls as Izuku cut into them. He slashed away at them, and blocked with the weapon in a way only Tomura knew how.

He proved in that savage moment that Tomura's efforts to shape him into a merciless killer were not in vain. They blossomed into the most brutal, protective killer instinct.

Izuku didn't blink as he rammed the katana through one of the Vipers' stomachs. His sibling choked up blood with wide eyes. Izuku then removed his blade, spun, and gutted another Viper behind him in the same motion.

Blood sprayed across his face and he reveled in it.

More Vipers came. Countless, flew from around the corners from their guard duty to stop him. But Izuku was unfazed seeing them.

Through his eyes, all he saw were complicit links in an endless chain of death. They were part of that spiraling viper that endlessly ate its tail. And if he didn't chop off the head, more innocent lives would be lost. So, one by one Izuku mercilessly hacked them down.

With every soul he reaped he broke the chain further and further.

One. Two. Six. Ten. Fourteen. Twenty. He killed them all with no regrets.

He slashed the throat of one Viper and cut off the arm of another, bleeding them out. When he was the last man standing, Izuku stopped to catch his breath. The hallway was packed with butchered, dead bodies of all his siblings.

For a fleeting moment, he wondered if Tomura would be proud of him. He was finally the killing machine Tomura always wanted him to be.

He gazed around with sub zero eyes, satisfied with his cull.

Izuku's rage dove further into oblivion as he stepped over the heap of limbs. His venomous gaze became more harrowing at the sound of one set of footsteps approaching.

He knew those footsteps. Light, like someone was gliding across the air.

Around the corner came Ibara.

She gazed around, shocked at what she saw. Then she looked up to meet Izuku's eyes. A flicker of emotions resurfaced in Izuku. But then he looked down at her hand. She was armed with her thorned whip.

She began giving him a pitiful stare like he was a lost soul. It was the exact stare she gave people before she killed them.

Izuku's gaze grew more intense.

Using training Tomura taught him, Izuku forced down the side of him that felt something for her. It worked. She was nothing more than an obstacle, another complicit link in the chain, and Izuku needed her gone.

"Move out of the way, Ibara," Izuku demanded.

"You know I can't do that, Izuku," Ibara replied softly. She unraveled her whip and it hit the ground with its heaviness. "Please. Stop and think. This is what the kids are destined for. Maybe in the next life they can find proper peace. But they won't have it in this one."

"I said move," Izuku threatened. He gripped the sword with both hands and took an attack stance. "I won't ask again."

"Your defect really has blinded you from logic," Ibara muttered sadly. She cracked her knuckles. "I'll be sure to pray for you after I put you into confinement. Tomura made it clear that you're not allowed to leave under any circumstance until Chisaki comes back for you tomorrow, so I won't."

She moved her fingers in the sign of the cross and struck.

Ibara's whip sliced through the air in a dangerous blur. It immediately came for him with its long reach. Izuku ran out of the way almost too late. The whip cracked next to his ear and he backflipped backwards to a safer distance.

Izuku knew to take the defensive. Unlike the Vipers he just culled, Ibara was far more skilled.

She proved herself immediately by lethally cutting her whip through the air again. And this time striking him. Blistering pain rippled through Izuku's arm from the thorns shredding his flesh.

Izuku hissed as he retreated backwards. But she kept going, aiming to cripple him. She landed several, horrible blows and he was covered in his own blood quickly.

He acrobatically dodged backwards and sideways, trying to calculate his next move.

She whirled as gracefully as a ribbon dancer and struck as deadly as a cobra. Strike after strike rained down like a storm. Then she was able to wrap the whip around Izuku's leg. She pulled with all her strength and Izuku flew. He was dragged through the blood on the ground towards her.

He saw in her hand a syringe of paralyzer. She was going to knock him out.

He dove further into his instinct to survive and struggled against the whip. Urgently, Izuku swung the sword and cut the whip where it was around his legs. He freed himself and scrambled up right. He hastily pulled out the severed section of whip that was sticking to his leg.

The thorns ripped through his flesh and Izuku ignored the pain.

He decided to go on the offensive. He sprinted close to Ibara while dodging some of her strikes. Those he didn't dodge, he ate with sheer will. When he finally was close range he steeled his nerve endings. She cracked her weapon again, and this time Izuku held up the sword.

The whip wrapped tightly around the katana like a snake and Izuku leveraged it to his advantage.

He used both hands to hold the sword from either end, allowing the blade to slice him. He yanked with all his strength.

She was pulled forward, and Izuku saw the opening to break another link.

He wrapped the whip tight around the blade with a twirl of his body. Then he whirled around her with his quickness. Ibara tried to move, but Izuku always had been the fastest of The Viper Seven. The whip followed Izuku's path and wrapped around Ibara's neck.

When it looped securely, Izuku gripped the length of the whip raw. He let the thorns sink into him as he absorbed the pain.

He pulled.

He squeezed his eyes shut as Ibara gasped in agony. The metal thorns from the whip sunk into her neck. Her eyes popped wide. She dropped the whip and fell to her knees. She grappled at her neck, trying to free herself. But she couldn't without being stabbed.

An onslaught of unwanted emotions hit Izuku. And he so desperately wanted to push them away. But instead, this time, he accepted them.

Blood trickled out of his sister's eyes as she looked up at him, gasping for air.

"I never was the defected one," Izuku whispered with tears in his eyes. "You all were."

Izuku gave a final, harsh pull. He felt a snap in the cervical spine.

Ibara's eyes rolled back as blood trickled down her neck. Her body dropped to the ground and Izuku's tears fell with her. His hands began to tremble as he saw the life slowly twitch out of her. He wished it didn't have to be like this, but it was. If she lived then she would enable Tomura in getting another cohort. And Izuku could no longer let this cycle continue.

The sound of Katsuma from down the hall returned Izuku's focus. He picked up the severed whip.

With the katana in one hand and the whip in the other, Izuku ran down the long hallway. He stayed on high alert. He expected more Vipers to come, but it seems as if he successfully cleared them all out for the time being.

When he reached the door with the kids, he kicked it open.

In the room was Aoyama and all the children.

Aoyama turned and his eyes stretched wide at the sight of Izuku. Izuku was now stained in blood from head to toe, his lace blouse entirely ruined.

Izuku glanced at the scene in front of him. With every detail, his heart broke more and more.

All the kids were sitting at the table. Their hands and feet were tied with rope. Worse, they had on noise canceling headphones. But they were laughing as if it was some sort of game.

In front of them was Aoyama, with a syringe in hand drawing from a bottle. The liquid was bright pink, bubbly and on its label was a snake symbol.

Izuku looked at the bottle and knew what it was.

It was The Viper Academy's biggest secret: Mamushi snake venom. It was the only poison they were not immune to. This was done on purpose in case a Viper needed to be put down quietly. It was a fail safe built into the system that only specific people knew about.

It's what Izuku was planning to use on Hiryu originally that night in Vienna.

Izuku looked at Aoyama sadly, unable to hide his disappointment in him.

All the kids were glancing between them, talking and calling their names. They now were confused. This game didn't seem so fun anymore and the sight of Izuku crying was upsetting Katsuma. But neither Aoyama and Izuku paid attention as they kept their eyes locked on the other.

"Aoyama," Izuku warned slowly. His tears flowed harder. "Put it down."

But Aoyama didn't. He glanced to the side and Izuku did too.

Sitting on the wall was a red button labeled 'emergency basement lock down'.

Izuku saw Aoyama inch towards it. Izuku held up the katana and stepped towards Aoyama as a warning.

"Izuku, don't be stupid," Aoyama begged. "C'mon. We both know this is what has to be done."

"Why?" Izuku asked. He took a step forward and Aoyama took a step back. "Why does it have to be done?"

"Because it's what Tomura said has to be done. And we can't disobey him or Chisaki."

"So you would kill the kids to appease them? Don't you feel bad for trying to take the life of a child?!"

"Of course I do, Izuku!" Aoyama screamed. He shook and his hands trembled as he held the syringe of venom in his hand. "Of course I feel bad! I loved them the same as you, but I am not willing to let your mistakes be the things that pull this family apart for good! The kids are going to be given as blood repentance so we can keep being a family. There will always be more kids!"

Izuku's heart broke clean in two.

This was a test. A test to see if Izuku should spare him, and Aoyama was failing.

"It doesn't have to be like this." Izuku tried once more. "Let me save them—help me save them."

Izuku put the katana down. He stretched out his hand to Aoyama, like he did so many years during The Cull.

But just like so many years ago, Aoyama stared at him like he had gone crazy for showing altruism.

"I'm sorry, Izuku." Aoyama backed away, not accepting the hand. "I'm not willing to bleed for you. I already told you that."

Izuku studied his favorite brother like all the colors drained from the world.

Aoyama stared at him right back with a reciprocated, disappointed expression.

His once vivid love for Aoyama shriveled down into nothing. Aoyama made it clear, he was going to kill the kids. Which meant he was as defective as all the other snakes Izuku needed to cull.

This, Izuku did not want.

But he needed to break one more link in the chain.

Aoyama made a run to press the emergency button. Izuku swung the whip and it wrapped around Aoyama's wrist right before he could press it. Aoyama yelled as the thorns sunk into his skin, piercing his flesh. Izuku yanked back the whip, pulling Aoyama closer to him. He picked up the Katana in the same motion. With no hesitation, Izuku swung the blade.

It cut clean through Aoyama's jugular vein and carotid artery.

Izuku dropped the whip and stepped back. He watched sadly as Aoyama scrambled to hold his neck. He pushed against the deep wound. But it was useless. Blood poured out from him and so did his life. He looked up at Izuku for help. But Izuku did nothing.

“I’m sorry I couldn’t save you in the end,” Izuku whispered sincerely.

Aoyama crumbled to the floor. He curled up. Blood soaked through his hair and painted his wrist red.

Izuku turned to the kids in the room.

An ache of guilt and overwhelming sadness stabbed through him.

He didn’t want to have to do that in front of them. But there was no other option. Maybe in the future, this would be a distant repressed memory. Like a foggy day dream they can only half remember unsure if it was a dream or not.

They all seemed particularly unfazed. All except Katsuma. Katsuma was looking at Aoyama’s twitching body confused with tears streaming down his face.

Izuku’s heart hurt more than he could express at that moment. But there was no leeway to focus on his emotions. It was only a matter of time before another Viper came from upstairs and noticed all the bodies.

He took the katana and cut each child free of their restraints.

They all looked at him, happy to see him. Izuku’s heart squeezed at their big eyes and smiles. He took off the headphones one by one. Immediately, Katsuma held his arms out for him to be comforted. Izuku squatted low to their height and hugged Katsuma tightly to him. He buried his hand in his hair to make sure he was real and safe.

He turned to the other kids, smiling past his tears.

“Who wants to go on a field trip?” Izuku asked.

ᔓᔓᔓ

There wasn’t much time, he knew that. Every second that passed inched all six of them closer to Tomura. Izuku held Katsuma in one arm as the tiny boy clung to his neck. In his other hand were Eri’s small fingers.

He told all the children to hold hands in an assembly line. He said they would play a game of ‘keep up with Izuku’.

As in, keep up with him as he ran frantically through the hallways.

He grabbed the single duffle bag that he packed before the masquerade. He flung it over his body with haste, and strung it tight to his form. On his way out, Izuku raided the bodies of the Viper’s he had killed for any supplies. He took as much ammo, money and guns as he could.

Then finally he patted down Jin's body. He searched for the one thing he knew Jin always kept on him: a key to his favorite sport's car. Izuku found it, and it shined with the promise of freedom.

Izuku stuffed the keyring in his pocket. He hastily headed towards the elevators.

When they finally made it up to the garage level, Izuku kept up a light jog. He ran past all the fancy cars and motorcycles. He repeatedly pressed the lock button on the keys until he heard beeping coming from one direction.

He turned on his heels and gestured for the kids to follow him.

They all ran to the car, full speed. When they got to it, Izuku knew which one it was. The car was a candy pink Ferrari Purosangue. Exactly Jin's tastes. Aligned next to it were more expensive, colorful cars that now will probably never be driven again.

Izuku popped open the trunk and flung in the bag, gun, money, and ammo. He rapidly took out the black folder he had stolen from Katsuki and his tiny notebook where he wrote all the kids' info.

He pulled out his phone next. With all his strength, Izuku smashed his phone on the ground. Next, he did the same thing to his laptop. He shattered the devices to tiny pieces, not chancing being tracked. He shut the trunk.

He loaded all the kids in the back seat and tightly buckled them in the best he could.

They all clapped and made jokes between themselves. He was overjoyed they were all convinced they were winning some pretend game. Everyone but Katsuma seemed fooled. When Izuku felt like they were strapped in safely enough for now, he closed the door. Izuku looked around frantically, keeping his eyes peeled.

Off to his side he saw a shelf.

He studied it. Then he saw a giant, red tub of gasoline sitting there.

A dangerous idea spun across his thoughts. He quickly walked up to the tub of gasoline. It was full. Izuku solidified his idea and threw the cap off. He began pouring out the gasoline onto the floor. His eyes burned from both the fumes and heartbreak. But he pushed through it. He dosed all of Jin's sports cars in the liquid.

Izuku then hastily headed towards the drivers side and strapped in. He splayed out the black folder on the passenger seat. All the details regarding Nana spilled out.

He looked at her picture, hopeful that she could bring the kids home.

Izuku turned on the car with his sweaty hands. He put it in gear.

His heart rate skyrocketed as he sped out of the garage. He put one hand on the wheel. The other was out the window, holding the jug of gasoline by the handle. Izuku made sure to trickle a trail of gasoline along the way.

When they breached outside, the winter winds poured into the car from the window.

Izuku looked back, and every memory lit up before his eyes. Misery. Agony. Everything blended together in a fury of over two decades of torture. All he wanted was to sear it out of his memory.

Bitter, green eyes gazed up. He glared at the penthouse.

With all his spite, Izuku tossed the empty jug of gasoline down to the ground.

He took the lighter off Jin's car keys.

He ignited the flame, and it danced in front of his eyes.

Izuku's resolve deepened and he flung the lighter down on the pile of gasoline.

It lit up. A beautiful, roaring line of fire began to eat its way towards the skyscraper. It followed the trail Izuku laid and soon, smoke began to form.

As everything caught fire, Izuku sped off. He hit the gas as hard as he could and didn't dare look back. If he did at that moment, he feared how much his heart would break.

The wind swept through all their hair as Izuku disappeared into the night. He sped all the way to the highway and only glanced in his rear view mirror once. There, he could see fire swelling. The smoke danced hand in hand with embers and reached towards the night sky.

Izuku gripped the wheel tightly when his heart became heavy. He reached down into his sock and ripped off the bracelet he had wrapped around his ankle.

He glanced down at the locket that held his tracker. His heart skipped a beat.

Then, he threw it out the window.

Izuku knew he had to hurry all the way to Nana. He couldn't make too many stops and he needed to lay low enough so that no one found him. There were, without a doubt, multiple people desperate to get him in their grasps. Chisaki. Tomura. And whoever else survived his chaos.

But there was only one person he worried about actually catching him—and it wasn't Tomura.

Scarlet eyes burned through all his thoughts.

Izuku knew Katsuki would keep his promise to always find him.

Again and again and again.

Chapter End Notes

locks doors and hides Thank you so much for reading! 💚🧡 Lemme know you're thoughts below—

Chapter 29: Sforzando

Chapter Summary

> Sforzando — (musical direction) to play a note with sudden, strong emphasis.
>
> Izuku and Katsuki have a contest of strength and speed. Which will be the victor in the end?

Chapter Notes

> Helloooo!! Welcome back :))
>
> First, I just want to say a huge thank you to the positive response at the last chapter! 🥹💕 I'm beyond happy everyone enjoyed the craziness. I'm still getting around to responding to everyone's comment from ch 28!! I'm so overjoyed you all liked it. I really loved writing the previous chapter and I also enjoyed writing this one :') this whole new leg of the fic I've been waiting for write for years. I hope you all enjoy what I have in store ^^ it's been such a long road LOL we officially hit 500k words <3
>
> Thank you all for sticking with this fic and always being so kind. I'm really appreciative of everyone who reads this story and comes along with me for these unhinged plots. I am rambling now so I will stop but truly thank you guys :')
>
> Without further wait, I hope you enjoy this chapter!
>
> Warnings: Graphic Depictions of Violence and Angst

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 29 — Sforzando

.

.

.

Izuku had been driving non-stop for hours.

During his exertion, the sky above him shape-shifted from a dark blue to a light lavender. It was a signal that the sun was coming up. The bloody trail of destruction he and Katsuki left behind them was likely coming to full light by now.

Everyone in Hadeus was probably talking about them. Or hunting them. Or more feasibly, doing both. It was going to be mayhem from here on out until the Yakuza got their hands on them.

But somehow, despite the looming dark cloud, Izuku only felt strangely calm.

He stared at the steadily rising sun in front of him.

The warmth that radiated through the windows felt like the hug he so desperately needed. And in a way, this sunrise was the light at the end of the long, dark tunnel he had been stuck in all his life.

He glanced in the backseat. All the kids were sound asleep, lost to their dreams. Each was leaning their heads on one another in uncomfortable upright positions. Eri was snoring the loudest, and Kota had his hand cupping Katsuma's cheek.

Izuku smiled sadly at them.

Even if this action cost him his life, he would be happy for it.

ᔓᔓᔓ

By the time they made it to the next major city, Izuku's eyes were beginning to burn.

He ran a shaky hand through his matted hair. The blood that had gathered on him from the Viper massacre was fully dried now. Bits of his siblings' blood were coming off like snowflakes from all over his body. It should have been off putting, but Izuku found it to feel freeing.

Before they got too thick in the crowds, Izuku pulled over on the side of the road for a breather.

The back of his eyes were beginning to hurt, signaling he had a migraine coming on. No doubt from all the emotions that he was repressing inside his chest. But he kept them on ice, not wanting to unthaw and face what he was feeling before they made it to safety.

Izuku glanced over at the black folder that was in the passenger seat. He pulled the item onto his lap with a shaky exhale and opened it.

The folder was chock-full of Katsuki's notes. There were dozens, no hundreds, of printed out papers. Every paper was some sort of clue or information that tied to Nana. Articles. Social media posts. Even some police reports were in here.

On the bottom of the stack was an extremely detailed map of Japan. It was large and needed to be folded several times over just to fit into the black folder. Out of everything, the map was the most scribbled on item. There were highlights, arrows, and erratic question marks next to circled towns in different colors.

From what it seemed like, it was difficult to figure out where Nana exactly was. This was probably done on purpose to keep her operations away from the wrong type of people. But luckily for Izuku, Katsuki nearly cracked the code already.

His cunning, intelligent husband uncovered that Nana's previous alias was Float. Her new one however, was still a mystery. But it was a mystery that laid within all this information Katsuki had gathered.

Written at the top were two words of the alias that Katsuki already decoded: One. All.

Izuku kicked up his feet and uncapped a pen with his teeth. He got to work. He began scribbling, scanning, and shuffling through all the info.

As he did this, he could feel a bit of Katsuki with him. Through these notes, Izuku felt how much of a perfectionist Katsuki truly was. He was extremely thorough and barely left any stone unturned. If there was anyone on this planet who could win a prize for being meticulous, it would be Katsuki.

Going through the information took a longer time than Izuku thought. When he felt even halfway through it, the sun was all the way up in the sky. He heard one of the kids rouse in the back. Izuku nervously looked out of his window, weary that some Viper would appear and try to drag them back to Tokyo.

But when all the kids were awake again, it clicked.

Izuku wrote the last word in ink next to where Katsuki had written the other two.

He stared at the page in disbelief.

One For All.

That was Nana's new alias.

A smile as warm as the morning sun shined across Izuku's bloodied face. He chuckled lightly, overjoyed. He and Katsuki cracked the code together in a roundabout way. They did always make a great team when they weren't at odds against each other.

Izuku examined the marked-up map. It was clear Nana didn't stay in the same city too long. But, from what Izuku pieced together, she moved with a pattern. There were seven different cities she frequented with an infrequent pace. But it was always the same ones in the same order. Sapporo. Aomori. Niigata. Kyoto. Fukuoka. Osaka and lastly, Okinawa.

And if Izuku was right, Osaka was her next stop.

He glanced up at the sign that read 'Welcome to Nagano!' And caught a second wind of energy.

He put it in gear once more and got back on the road.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They needed to make a handful of quick, discreet pit stops.

Turns out, traveling with half a dozen five-year-olds was more chaotic than he thought it was going to be. Everyone always needed to pee, and they were all a bit antsy from sitting in the car for so long. Izuku ended up making everyone switch seats because Kota kept biting Hana and Tamashiro kept sticking his finger up Katsuma's nose.

On top of this chaos, the winter winds were making everyone cold. Unfortunately, they couldn't exactly stop for supplies given Izuku's alarming appearance. So instead Izuku settled for dressing them in the clothes he had packed originally for Chisaki's place.

He pulled a thin, blue hoodie over his own body and put on sunglasses to cover his eyes. As for the kids, he packed exactly ten sweaters that he could work with. He layered each child in two sweaters, bundling them up the best he could.

Izuku couldn't help but giggle. They looked so cute and goofy in the oversized material.

They began asking him questions about where they were going. They even asked when they would be able to go back to training. Izuku nearly winced at that one. It was hard to skirt around the truth. But he simply said they were going to go stay with other family members.

When they finally made it to beautiful Osaka, it was twilight outside.

This type of dusk orange sky was Katsuma's favorite color. The whole car ride in, Katsuma could barely contain his excitement. He kept gasping and pointing at the way the orange color was spilling all over. It painted the grass, trees, and the glass buildings.

Then it slowly all faded away. The navy-blue night sky waltzed in and Izuku began looking for a place to park the car.

He wanted to park a bit away from where Nana was. His intuition was telling him it may be time to ditch the vehicle. Who knew how long it would be before Tomura or someone realized which car exactly was missing from the garage after sifting through the fire.

Izuku drove around a bit, then stopped when he saw the perfect spot.

It was a seven-story parking garage. It was secluded enough that it didn't draw attention and also fairly well hidden. No one would likely walk in it and be searching for a bright fuchsia sports' car.

Izuku drove up to the third floor, directly in the middle. He parked the car in the corner behind a pillar.

As they got out of the car, Izuku gathered the black folder and his notebook in his hands. He packed them up in his duffle bag and secured the bag to his body. For extra measure, Izuku pulled up the hood of his hoodie over his hair. He tucked any loose strands in wisely, so no peak of green was visible. He drew the draw strings tight and put on a pair of sunglasses over his eyes.

He put each of them in face masks to cover their faces the best they could. When he felt like they wouldn't be well spotted on camera, he got a move on.

They walked away from the car and began their journey into Osaka under the moonlight.

As they walked, Izuku clutched the map in his unsteady hands.

He led them to the street where he pinpointed Nana's Osaka operation must've been at. When he got there, it turned out it was not a street, but an alley. It was crooked and narrow but held a handful of people. He held on tighter to the children and told them all to walk in front of him holding hands.

As they walked through the alley, several people glanced at him oddly. The bit of blood on his face was likely making people gawk. But Izuku kept it moving, not daring to meet anyone's eyes.

He read every sign, looking for something that hinted to where Nana was. But when he reached the end of the alley, he became confused. He saw nothing. Izuku frowned and whirled around. He walked the length of the alley again.

Izuku walked up and down the narrow alley several times. Each time with increasing panic.

He thought he was going to go crazy. He looked up at the signs once more and clutched the map in his hand. He whirled around and the kids did too, spinning with him like it was a fun game. Izuku clenched his teeth as he re-read all the ads and signs on the tall buildings.

Then he saw a sign that read 'Lone Flora.'

Izuku stopped and cocked his head at it.

It was rather bland and didn't draw much attention like the other signs. It lacked any vibrant colors and was made of wood with unremarkable black lettering. The door it hung above was also plain. But it was made of steel and reinforced further with steel locks. But there wasn't even a door handle. Merely a simple sliding peephole.

The longer Izuku stared at the sign, he realized the words were an anagram.

One For All.

Izuku's heart skyrocketed.

He quickly shepherded the kids towards the door. He began to knock on it furiously, creating a loud banging noise. It didn't take long for footsteps to approach through the other side. Soon, the cover to the peephole slid open.

Izuku's breath hitched when he was met with sky blue eyes.

“Sorry we’re closed right now,” the man said. “Come back in the morning.”

“I’m here for One For All,” Izuku blurted out immediately.

The man’s eyes flickered with recognition. Now, he gazed at Izuku far differently. Like he needed help. The man looked to the side of Izuku, checking to see if anyone was behind him. Then he shut the slider and began to unlock the door.

Izuku stepped back and he felt his feet tingle with adrenaline. With a loud rusty sound, the steel door crept opened.

Awaiting him was a man larger than anyone he’s ever seen. Izuku struggled to stop himself from staring crazily. The man possessed striking canary blond hair and robust facial features. The look in his bright blue eyes was as warm as the sun.

“Hurry inside,” The large man quickly said.

The stranger glanced around out the door and then looked down to Izuku. He opened his mouth to speak but then stumbled. His eyes sparked with curiosity as he laid eyes on the five tiny children who were all gawking at him.

“Oh,” The man said. He blinked several times. “This is new.”

Izuku rubbed Katsuma’s head when the introverted boy hid behind his leg.

The other kids, however, were gasping in awe. They all huddled around the man and began poking at him.

Kota stepped forward and pointed up at the man. He tilted his head and asked, “Are you a Sasquatch? You’re huge and hairy like one!”

The man spluttered. Izuku quickly pulled Kota back and apologized to the man for him. He sheepishly smiled as he walked in, herding the children as he went.

When they were safely inside, the door slammed shut behind them. A new, cozy warmth greeted them like they were all longtime friends. The smell of freshly baked bread wrapped around the atmosphere. And the sound of affectionate laughter was everywhere.

Izuku stopped and drank in the sight. He didn’t know exactly what he was expecting but this wasn’t entirely it.

The secret hideaway was built like an izakaya. Red lanterns hung overhead and the walls were coated with old photographs. They were placed closely together, filling in the wooden walls like puzzle pieces. Off to the side was a long bar section and behind it was rows and rows of alcohol.

However, what threw Izuku off the most were just how many people there were.

There were dozens of people here, all with bright characteristics like nice smiles and sweet voices. Men and women were stationed around casually at wooden izakaya tables having a drink of beer. Some were eating from plates of food stacked like mountains. Others were gathered in cliques playing cards as they laughed and talked.

But most had their eyes glued to the one television that was mounted in the corner.

Izuku looked up to the TV too, curious what caught everyone's attention.

But his heart skipped when he saw his old home on the screen.

The once beautiful large collection of skyscrapers was singed black at the bottom. Where the parking garage used to be there was now absolutely nothing. It looked like an empty black void. It was charred as if someone set off a large bomb and ran away.

The news showed a clip of the actual fire and the roaring flames. Izuku offhandedly thought it looked beautiful, like a dazzling inferno swallowing up all the sickness inside of that building.

When they cut back to real time, there was a thick crowd gathered around the scene.

Everyone was wearing expressions of shock and wonder. Things like this didn't happen frequently in Tokyo, and when they did, they were the center of attention for months. Countless people were snapping photos while the police put yellow tape around the perimeter.

In front of the chaos stood a news reporter. She was graced with long black hair that swayed with the wind.

"The Governor of Tokyo's privately owned apartment complex has gone up in flames," the news reporter said into the mic seriously. "Some accounts are saying it was a likely case of arson. Luckily, the fire department was able to make it to the scene before the damage was too great. No one inside the building was harmed from the fire. Local authorities say that the Governor has decided he will be leading a private investigation and will not be involving law enforcement."

Izuku knew what that meant.

Vipers and Yakuza were going to handle this.

Izuku's eyes then scanned around. He looked at the crowd a bit wearily now.

He was slightly fearful that someone could recognize him. There was no doubt Tomura and Chisaki put out word through the underground that he was officially a runaway Viper—and runaway Vipers were always dragged back home. One way or another.

The large man who had let them in the building smiled at Izuku kindly. He gestured for Izuku to follow him through the crowd.

As Izuku followed behind the large man, all the kids crowded closely to his legs. They stared at all the people in quiet amazement. It was to be expected. They hadn't met other people who were not Vipers. This many new faces was probably both exciting and frightening.

Izuku kept his hand on Katsuma's head. The tiny boy clutched onto his leg with every step.

When they reached the bar across the way, the large man whispered something to the bartender. The bartender then glanced at Izuku once. He was immediately alarmed by Izuku's disheveled appearance.

The bartender speedily hurried to the backroom behind the bar.

A few short moments later, out walked Nana.

Izuku's breath caught. She was gorgeous.

Her large, deep purple eyes were kinder than anything Izuku had experienced. It was as if she was hugging him just by gazing at him.

She was fairly older now than in the photo. But he could tell it was her based on the tiny beauty mark below her lip. There were some aged wrinkles around her mouth, eyes, and lips. In her thick black hair were streaks of white. But her beauty was still as striking if not more refined now.

She gazed at Izuku without fear as she approached him. When she drew near, the sweet smell of peaches graced him.

Izuku was almost starstruck. Something inside of his chest swelled at the sight of her.

She smiled at him and tilted her head.

"Hello there," Nana said, with a voice lovelier than a thousand moons. "Nice to meet you. I'm Nana. I'm guessing based on your appearance you need to get out of town quickly. What's your name?"

Izuku blinked.

"I—" He tried to speak but suddenly all the emotions he'd been shoving down forced their way up. He blinked rapidly, surprised by the sudden pounding in his chest. But the longer he looked at Nana he felt himself grow more and more vulnerable. "I-I'm—M-My name—" Izuku choked.

He slapped a hand over his mouth in surprise. Nana's eyes grew softer.

When he tried and failed again, this time Eri spoke up. She said, "He's Izuku!"

Nana smiled down at all the kids and gave Izuku a delicate glance. "Well, thank you. What's your name?"

"I'm Eri," the small girl said.

Izuku quickly pulled himself together. He blinked back the tears and forced down his emotions.

“Ye-Yes, I’m Izuku,” he said quickly. He awkwardly laughed and pushed at his tired eyes. “Um, I’m here because th-they really need your help.”

Nana seemed surprised at that. She then glanced at all the kids in his oversized sweaters. She waved at Katsuma who hid behind Izuku’s leg more.

“I see,” Nana said a bit seriously. She looked at the large man and said, “Yagi. Can you take them to the booth to get comfy? I think I need to talk privately with Izuku for a while.”

The large man now identified as Yagi nodded. He squatted down and all the kids gasped. He smiled friendly and saluted them.

“Do you kids wanna get some food?” Yagi asked in an excited tone.

That seemed to catch all the kids’ attention. Even Katsuma. Katsuma looked up at Izuku unsure, and Izuku nodded and patted his head. He pushed Katsuma lightly towards Yagi. Katsuma shyly smiled and walked up to Yagi with the other kids.

“Yes!” Hana said happily. She clasped her hands together and her brown eyes shone. “I’m really hungry. We haven’t eaten all day ‘cause ‘zuku said we didn’t have any time, but he would give us food once we got to our other family’s place.”

Yagi and Nana stole a glance at Izuku.

“Well, surprise! You’re here!” Yagi said with a large grin. He widely opened his arms and did some movements of jazz hands. “Let’s get you guys some food. Who likes ice cream?”

A choir of tiny ‘me!’ chimed.

Izuku smiled weakly as Yagi led the kids to the other side of the izakaya. They all slid inside a comfy, large red booth with the kids bouncing on the cushion. Yagi bounced playfully with them as he began to ask them what they each wanted to eat.

Izuku observed with unmoving eyes. He was unable to tear his gaze away.

A warm, soothing hand rubbed his shoulder to ask for his attention. Izuku looked at Nana and it was here that Izuku realized he had been crying.

Nana wiped away a tear for him.

“Let’s get you cleaned up first, then we can talk,” Nana said gently.

ɯɯɯ

The first thing they did was have Nana help him out of his lace blouse. She didn’t ask any questions as Izuku took off his hoodie to show her the ruined, expensive top.

All the crusted blood made the buttons stiff, and she ended up needing to cut him out of it. As the knife shredded through the fabric, Izuku finally felt like he could breathe. Never in his life had he been more relieved to be out of an article of clothing. It was like shedding old skin.

He sourly gazed at it once he was freed. The pattern of vipers on it brought forth an unwelcome emotion. All he could hear was Tomura's confession about trying to set him up to marry Chisaki. Then he felt Chisaki's boney fingers rake down the buttons on his back.

The pain in his chest tripled. He threw the ruined blouse in the trash bitterly.

After that, Izuku was given medical attention for his wounds and patched up well. Nana allowed him to shower downstairs in a secret compartment that held rows and rows of tiny, skinny beds. Izuku presumed this is where people could spend the night as a pitstop before they left.

Nana gave him plain dark gray sweats to change into.

When he was settled in, Nana took him to a small room upstairs in the izakaya and locked the door. They took a seat at the only table inside that was directly below a warm, yellow light. She slid him a cup of tea and placed a heated blanket over his shaking shoulders.

"It's wonderful to meet you, Izuku," Nana said happily. She gazed at him up and down. "You have a nice name."

"It's wonderful to meet you too," Izuku replied. He bowed slightly. "Sorry for popping up so suddenly."

"That's alright. It's what my job is," Nana reassured. She then looked a bit more serious and calmly placed her hand on the table. "I have to ask. I don't usually like to assume, but those five kids can't all be yours."

"They're not," Izuku answered. "They're my…"

Brothers and sisters was the first thing he thought to say. But then he stopped. These kids weren't his kin. Not in the same way Aoyama, Ibara and Jin had been. They didn't belong with their discarded family. They were wanted and there was a home for them elsewhere in this hellish world.

Izuku cleared his throat and redirected his answer.

"They're missing kids that were kidnapped about five years ago," Izuku said firmly. "I need your help to bring them back to their families."

He reached down to his duffle bag and pulled out his tiny notebook. With shaking fingers, he opened it, despite the alarm that was now on Nana's face. He flipped through the pages and slid the notebook across from her.

"I-I have already located most of their families, I think," Izuku said a bit erratically. "Everyone is mostly still searching for their children. Pretty much all but one family was traceable. That was Katsuma's family. He's the shy one that was hugging my leg earlier. B-

But I think maybe his family is just more private. I have their info and such right here for you so you can have a starting point—"

"—Wait," Nana cut off his nervous ramble. She held a hand up and leaned away, entirely shocked. "Wait, wait. We have to pause." She pointed to the door, bewildered. "Those are missing children out there?"

"Yes," Izuku confirmed. He pleaded desperately with his eyes. "All of them were stolen as infants from separate hospitals about five years ago. I-I wrote down which hospital and everything. I have their old social security numbers—"

"Izuku. Hold on for a moment. Why are you not going to the police?" Nana asked wearily. "I feel like this is an issue for authorities. I don't serve in justice or reuniting people with long lost relatives. My service is for people who are on the run from dangerous people. Or people who can't go to the police. This feels…cut and dry. Missing kids go home."

"I can't go to the authorities," Izuku explained. His voice cracked and a lump swelled in his throat. He felt himself begin to clam up like always when it came to talk about how he was raised to outsiders. But he pushed past it by harnessing his desperation to get the kids to safety. "Those kids…they're…they were taken by The Viper Academy."

Familiarity echoed in Nana's eyes. She assessed him differently now.

Izuku immediately picked up on the distrust.

"Do you know that operation?" Izuku asked carefully.

"I do," Nana replied quietly. She spoke in such a low whisper that Izuku barely heard her. "But how do you know about that place? That's extremely confidential information. Not too many people discover that info and live to tell the tale."

Izuku licked his lips. He went against his entire nature to say, "B-Because I was raised there."

With trembling fingers, Izuku pulled down the collar of the sweatshirt. He craned his neck and showed her his mark. 217.

Nana's eyes widened.

"I'm o-one of the top assassins raised there," Izuku confessed, and his voice cracked. "All those kids were supposed to be our next cohort of trainees—But they were sentenced to be executed last night by the head of the Shie Hassaikai. I stopped it before it could happen. Then I-I drove all the way here, non-stop. Those kids really need your help. I'll do anything."

Nana was fearful now, but not of him.

"You interfered with an order from the Shie Hassaikai?" She asked quietly.

"Yes," Izuku replied.

He lowered his head and looked at his scribbling in the notebook. He pushed it to her, desperate to make this work.

“The kids’ families might need help disappearing because of that,” Izuku said. “M-My brother, Tomura, he’s the head of the operations in Tokyo for the Vipers. He’s a level of ruthless I don’t think the underground has seen before. He might try to track down the families if I just dropped them off at the doorstep—and he would have no issue committing familicide five times over. So, I-I need your help in giving the families a second option.”

“The option to disappear,” Nana filled in, understanding what Izuku was suggesting.

“Yeah,” Izuku agreed shakily. “I know it’s a far reach but…but they might take it if it means they can be happy together as a family again. You can explain what happened as much as you see fit.”

“The families would most likely take it,” Nana reasoned. Her face grew stern, and she finally took the notebook in her hands. She skimmed through the information. “Five kids…let’s assume and say that’s two parents each and potentially an additional child. That’s about twenty people who I would have to shuffle around.”

Nana strummed her fingers on the table. She pursed her lips to the side.

“Okay,” Nana said solidly. “I’ll do it.”

Izuku’s heart leapt.

“Really?” Izuku exclaimed.

“Yes,” Nana replied. “This is an urgent issue with children’s lives in the balance. I’m willing to help out the best I can. What about you? You need help disappearing too, I’m guessing?”

Izuku paused. He looked at Nana, unsure.

“I…I didn’t give myself much thought,” Izuku whispered. He idly scratched at the surface of the table with a finger. “I only wanted to bring the kids here so they could be safe.”

“You should consider it,” Nana encouraged. She reached across the table and gently held his hand. “You did a good thing. But I doubt the Vipers will let you go that easy, especially if the Shie Hassaikai is involved. You could be killed for doing this.”

Izuku nodded hollowly.

If only Nana knew how much trouble he was really in. Death would be too simple of a punishment.

He doubted that Tomura would kill him. Tomura viewed him as an extension of himself. Tomura killing him would be like Tomura willingly sawing off his own arm. His spiteful, controlling brother was more likely to throw Izuku in a glass box for the rest of his life than ever murder him.

But Izuku knew, box or not, there would be some sort of punishment awaiting him. It was going to be a mind shattering one that would ensure Izuku would no longer fight back.

Next, Izuku considered Chisaki.

In a roundabout way, he gave Chisaki the five lives of Vipers like the man demanded—and then some. The only issue left with Chisaki was the fact he set those conditions. Chisaki was a spoiled brat who wanted his prize one way or another. And Chisaki very clearly wanted Katsuki dead for what he'd done.

But then there was the matter of Katsuki.

Izuku could feel the cut on his neck sting a bit. Somehow, despite his own heartbreak, he still felt a protective urge call to him. Could he really leave knowing Chisaki was going to hunt and kill Katsuki?

A tug in his heart told him, no. He couldn't.

"Think it over," Nana said when Izuku went quiet. She squeezed his hand reassuringly. "I know it's a big decision to start over a new life. But you should really consider it given everything."

"I'll think it over," Izuku responded quietly. He tried to wrench his mind away from thoughts of Katsuki but found that he couldn't. He replayed the hurt look in Katsuki's eyes over and over again.

"Happy to hear that," Nana said. She then inhaled deeply and winced. "There is…one small hurdle, logistically."

Izuku grew weary. "What would that be?"

"The most people I usually take at a time is fifteen people max per month," Nana explained apprehensively. "Any more than that and I begin to risk raising red flags legally. I have to go through a lot of under the table hoops in order to craft new, fake identifications such as passports. And it takes a lot of work to set people up in their new life."

Izuku held his breath.

"I'm already going to be pushing it with a potential twenty people," Nana continued. "And given that this task requires extra effort on my end by locating people instead of them coming to me, I will be extremely busy. That means I likely won't be able to get around to helping you for another two months or so. Is that okay?"

Two months.

Izuku gazed off to the side. He felt caught at a crossroads.

"That's…okay," Izuku decided indifferently. "I can wait two months. I'll have made up my mind by then. I-I'll come meet you if I want to go."

“Okay,” Nana replied happily. “Are you sure you can lay low for that time and meet me in the next city? You might have to keep it moving in order to stay away from the Vipers and Yakuza.”

“Yes. I can do that. Okinawa, right?” Izuku asked.

“Right.” Nana leaned in and tenderly assessed him, “I usually stay in the same city for about a month or get a move on once I hit my maximum of people who come to me. But if you meet me in Okinawa in that window of time, I can get you set up. I’ll save you a slot. But if you don’t come, I’m going to assume either something happened, or you didn’t want to go.”

“O-Okay,” Izuku said. “Thank you so much. This means the world.”

“No need to thank me, this is what I do,” Nana said strongly. She sat up straight and stood up. “We’ll leave directly tomorrow night. I’ll embark with some of my team, and we’ll get this all sorted out. You can count on me. Now, let’s go back out with the kids and get you food as well. You have been through a lot.”

This was the first time since Katsuki that Izuku really saw kindness.

He gazed at her, and it was as if a bright light shone around her head.

She held her hand out for him, and Izuku hesitantly took it. It was warm and loving. He held on tightly to her as she helped him up. She wrapped her arm around his shoulders, and they began to walk out to the izakaya.

When they walked back into the crowd, Izuku felt overwhelming relief.

Across the way, Yagi was entertaining the children. There were straws poking out his nose and he was making wild animal noises. Every single one of the kids laughed. Even Katsuma. Their eyes were sparkling as they tried their best to clap in the layers of oversized sweaters.

When Nana and Izuku joined the kids and Yagi at the booth, they blended in with the convo.

More savory food was brought to the table and Katsuma shuffled into Izuku’s side automatically. Izuku hugged him back affectionately.

As they basked in this comfort, Izuku felt a glimmer of hope for his future. It was small, but it was there.

Maybe with Nana’s help he could finally be normal. She really was the key. She was like a remedy to allow Izuku to be cleansed of all his darkness.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they went to bed that night, Nana helped Izuku push together five of the beds.

They gathered the kids inside, and found enough blankets to pile up on top of them. All the kids were happy to be in bed. The comfort of the mattress plus a full belly put them to sleep immediately.

Izuku took a bed directly next to theirs. As he climbed in, his eyes scanned the basement. There were other people in the room now. Across the way, three people were curled up on different beds. Izuku presumed that these must be people who came searching for Nana and also needed help disappearing.

She really was a busy person, and Izuku wondered what these peoples' stories were. What were they running from? Or more specifically, who? He felt a bit more normal seeing this. It seemed like it was human nature to try to survive, even if it was by a thin thread of hope.

As Izuku's head hit the pillow, all the events of the last two days finally weighed down on him.

Mainly, the body count. For the first time in his life, he didn't have his book to tally the deaths. And they lingered on his skin as if they were imprinting inside of him.

He tried to push the somberness away.

All he wanted was to finally get a good night's rest. But every time he closed his eyes he saw a different face. First it was Katsuki's. Then it was Tomura's. Then Chisaki's. Jin's. Ibara's. Aoyama's. And the near twenty two others of his siblings that he murdered in cold blood.

With every new face he saw, they all lined up in a row. Everyone's expression was twisted in either pain or anger.

Or in Katsuki's case—both.

Izuku eventually gave up on resting.

He sighed and shifted onto his side, facing the kids.

Izuku blankly gazed across the way. He focused in on the dark corner behind the children. He half expected the ghost of Hiryu to be looming there. This was usually the time it would show itself: whenever he was feeling cornered and anxious.

But nothing came.

The inside of his mind was eerily lonely.

Izuku understood now that there would be no more ghosts. Ghosts were born from the ugly mixture of guilt and regret—and Izuku barely regretted what he did. He would do it again, if given the chance.

And because of that lack of remorse, Izuku could see things clearly. The first thing he processed was how his instinct to survive taking Hiryu's form was no coincidence.

Hiryu and Tomura had always been opposing forces. Truly two powerhouses that were always at odds because Hiryu hated Tomura. He loathed how he controlled Izuku. He detested how he treated them. He despised Tomura down to his last, spiteful breath.

But more importantly, Hiryu was the first person to ever warn Izuku against Tomura.

At first, Izuku simply thought all the snide remarks Hiryu's ghost would say were just echoes of his late brother's likely opinions. It made sense that Hiryu's ghost would bash Tomura. Or that it would butt in and point out Tomura's hypocrisy, lies, and selfishness.

But this whole time it was really his mind cautioning him against his big brother.

Katsuki was right all along.

His body had been severely warning him against who was threatening his life this whole time. It was trying desperately to get him to realize who the person hurting him was. Izuku was just unable to see it through his layers of shame and guilt Tomura instilled in him.

But now, he saw it all clearly: all Tomura did was abuse him.

A bitter tear slid out of Izuku's eye as he finally accepted this truth.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After a long night of battling his own thoughts, Izuku was able to get a tiny bit of rest.

It was mostly him resting his eyes. But whatever worked, he would take it.

He shook off the deep fatigue he was beginning to feel in his bones and pushed forward once more. He was thankful that there was adrenaline still coursing through his veins, and he was bitterly grateful that Tomura always pushed his endurance capabilities.

Izuku walked upstairs to the first floor of the izakaya in his sweats. He gazed around and noted how the izakaya was far different in the morning compared to how it was at night. There were significantly less people gathered around and in the background the subtle sound of smooth jazz played.

Nana was sitting at a corner table, scribbling something down with a black duffle bag at her feet.

Off behind the bar was Yagi, hunched over, carefully powdering pancakes. Wrapped around his neck was a yellow apron that read 'don't kill the chef' as he prepared multiple plates chock-full of breakfast food.

When the smell of blueberries and syrup wafted into Izuku's nose, it triggered his hunger. A loud, embarrassing growl erupted from him that could've been mistaken for a bear.

Yagi and Nana looked up at the sound, directing their attention to him. They both stifled laughs and grinned. Izuku nervously covered his stomach as if that would muffle the sound.

"Well, good morning!" Nana greeted Izuku happily. "Someone's hungry!"

Izuku nervously laughed. "Good morning to you too."

“Come sit!” Nana smiled gently and waved him over.

Izuku walked over to her shyly and took a seat next to her. She gazed at him with soft apprehension.

“So how did you sleep?” Nana asked.

“Ah, not very well if I am being honest,” Izuku answered sheepishly. He shrugged his shoulders and smiled at her. “But how did you sleep?”

“I slept well for the most part.” She leaned back in her chair and folded her hands on her lap. “I mainly stayed awake making sure to cross check some of the information you have jotted down. Luckily, you’re very thorough! I think I can do this for certain with the right people. I made several calls and some crew members are going to meet me at the dock at nightfall.”

Izuku’s eyes lit up. “That’s amazing news! Thank you so much again for doing this.”

“It’s no problem at all,” Nana replied back joyfully. “I told you before. This is what I do. Oh, speaking of.” She then lifted up the black duffle bag next to her feet and handed it over to Izuku. “I packed this for you, and this bag is specially made to be bulletproof. It should help you with the next two months—if you decide to come with me that is. If not, then it’s yours to keep.”

Izuku curiously took the bag. It was extremely heavy and he couldn’t immediately tell what was inside. He unzipped it a bit eagerly but his heart stopped at the sight of its contents.

Stuffed to the brim were several wads of yen, non perishable food, and clothing about his size.

Izuku instantly zipped the bag back up and whipped his head to Nana.

“I can’t take your money,” Izuku said, guilt heavy on his shoulders. He quickly shoved the bag towards her and lowered his head. “I-I should really be the one paying you. This is too much. I will try to manage on my own the best I can—”

Nana lightly pushed the bag back in Izuku’s lap.

Izuku’s hands began trembling slightly, shocked by how kind she was.

“Please. Take it,” Nana insisted. Her eyes grew as tender as if she knew Izuku his whole life. “If you really are one of the kids who was sold to that Academy, then I want to help you the best I can. I heard a lot of whispers about what happens inside of there. It’s a miracle you have retained even an ounce of your humanity. Even if you decide against using my services, you deserve to have the option. My job is to help people the best I can.”

Izuku didn’t know quite what to say.

How could someone be so loving to someone they didn’t know?

Izuku settled for saying “Thank you” but those two words didn’t feel like they were enough. He wanted to express gratitude as endless as the stars in the sky. But how did he do that?

“Also, I made a call for you,” Nana informed. “If you need a safe place to lay low for a while to recuperate, I found a perfect location. It’s in a small town called Shinonsen in Mikata District. All you have to do is drop my current alias at a bath house called Midnight Sento to a woman named Kayama Nemuri.”

Nana then wrote down the name and location on a page in his notebook. She ripped it out and handed it to Izuku with the utmost seriousness.

“She’s my affiliate and she said she can try her best to look after you. Okay?”

“O-Okay. Thank you again,” Izuku said, still shocked. He took the piece of paper, studying the neat hand writing on it in awe. “If it’s alright, may I ask you a question?”

“Of course, Izuku.”

“Why do you help people so much? This is…so nice. What do you get out of it?”

Nana gave a light, airy laugh and smirked at Izuku. “You really were raised at that Academy. Do you think every action has a selfish motive behind it?”

“Sorry!” Izuku spluttered. He shook his head quickly and waved his hands. “I didn’t mean to imply you were selfish—”

“I’m only messing with you,” Nana teased with a chuckle.

She then leaned back in her chair and looked at the surface of the wooden table. She studied the scratches on it like it told a story. Then like the sky, her bright expression slowly faded into dimness.

“But. You’re right,” Nana whispered. “I have a small, selfish motive behind all of this. Do you really want to know?”

“Yes,” Izuku said quietly. “I-If that’s alright.”

“It is,” Nana said. Her smile was gone now. “About thirty years ago, I had my heart broken. My only daughter had gotten married to the love of her life. She was his whole world; I’d never seen someone so in love. He doted on her every whim and they were a perfect match for each other. I was so excited to be a grandmother when they had their first born, and even more excited when they told me they were expecting a second.”

Nana paused. She sucked at her teeth and lowered her head a bit.

“But,” Nana whispered. “My beautiful daughter passed away giving birth to their second born.”

“I’m so sorry,” Izuku tried to comfort.

“It’s okay,” Nana said. She tried to smile but it was like her triumphant glow was fractured now. “Her husband…He never recovered from losing her. He tried to patch himself up with all sorts of distracting things. Excessive traveling, partying, drinking, then soon illegal mahjong gambling. The depressive hole he fell into was so deep no one could save him from himself.”

Izuku furrowed his brow.

How sad.

“He ended up losing all his money and going flat broke,” Nana said with a heavy sigh. “Because of that, I ended up taking the kids in with me. I was more than happy to watch over my grandchildren. It was like looking at two little miracles who were a reflection of my late daughter. I took care of them for about a year. Then one day my son in law came back, but only for the youngest.”

Izuku frowned. “Only for the youngest?”

“Yup,” Nana nodded dully. “I knew something was off, but I couldn’t tell what. He was calmer, like he decided something. I thought at first he finally decided to bond with his youngest child because that’s what he told me. And like a fool, I believed him. The next day I went to visit them both with fresh fruit. But when I got there, I found him hastily packing a suitcase of money and clothes to flee town. I asked him to give me back the baby if he was going to move, but—”

Nana’s face crumbled.

The age lines on her face became more pronounced as she lowered her head.

“—The baby wasn’t there,” Nana whispered dreadfully. “Little did I know when I gave him back his son, he had festered a deep resentment for the child for taking away his wife. He told me my grandson was gone and called him cursed. A-And that bastard had too much money in those bags for someone who was bankrupt for the last year. I began to put two and two together—and it was a sickening realization what type of evil he committed.”

Izuku stiffened.

Ice began to sickle in his veins at what Nana was hinting at. Her grandson met a similar fate as him, but somehow upon hearing this, he felt worse for whoever it was.

“I tried to go to the police, but it was no use,” Nana said desperately. “There wasn’t enough evidence to detain him and stop him from leaving. So, he vanished from town. Shortly after, he was marked dead in public records but I didn’t believe it. I think he was absorbed into the shadows with a new identity.”

Nana curled her fist on the table.

“I filed a missing person’s report for my grandson,” She said angrily. “But the police work so slow and are so useless. After that I began searching on my own. I tried to track down what he could have done with that poor child. That's when I came across whispers of this underground domain. People told me that my grandson was likely far gone, and I would never see him again."

A blazed, furious look in her eyes ignited.

"After that, I began learning more about the horrors of what really lurks beneath the surface," Nana spat. She regained her composure. In place of her sadness was now fury. "Yakuza, terrible gangs, political corruption, black markets and all kinds of other vile monstrosities. I-I couldn't stand by and do nothing. So I began to create my own network to counteract it: a way for people to leave the darkness they were trapped in."

Small, tiny tremors began to quake in Nana's fingers. Izuku reached out to grab her hand and steadied her.

She let out a shaky exhale and gazed at Izuku. Deep, unhealed sadness swirled in her eyes.

"To this day, I don't know where my grandson is," Nana concluded sadly. "But, I have a selfish hope that maybe one day, he will walk through those doors. And he'll ask for help to escape whatever darkness his father sold him into, even though it's been so long."

"What was his name?" Izuku asked quietly.

"Tenko," Nana answered. "But I fear his father might have said his name was something different. He always said Tenko didn't suit him because it sounded too nice for someone who killed his own mother. I have found no Tenko in all my years of searching."

Izuku searched his memory but found no Tenko either.

After that conversation, Izuku couldn't get the name Tenko out of his mind.

He hoped one day Nana could be reunited with her grandson, but he knew that was unlikely to happen. If he really was sold into the underground there's no telling where the boy was now. He might not even be in Japan or even alive.

The rest of the day went smoothly and Izuku watched Nana perform in her element. Boat loads of people came in and out of the izakaya, and Izuku curiously observed from his seat in the corner.

So many people adored Nana it seemed. Their eyes would light up like the moon when they saw her. Then their demeanor would soften as if everything was alright in the world. Others who came in were clearly hiding from someone. They kept their heads down and quietly thanked Nana as they shuffled down in the basement area.

While Izuku watched all of this, he learned Yagi was set to be Nana's future successor. He was going to be passed the torch next in helping keep this long connected network of people together. It was as if they were all guardian angels, and Izuku couldn't help but be inquisitive.

Half way through the day, Yagi left for the store. When he came back, in his hands were bags full of winter clothes for Izuku and all of the kids in their respective sizes. He even bought the kids backpacks for their travels.

Izuku's heart clutched a bit when he noticed Katsuma's clothes were the smallest.

They packed up their new clothes and Izuku consolidated all his items into his new duffle bag. He stacked the money Nana gave him in tightly to the bottom and then carefully loaded each gun with full ammo.

When he put on his new clothes, he had to stare at his reflection.

He wore loosely fitting dark black joggers, a black sweater and red dark running shoes.

When he pulled on his olive green winter coat, Izuku felt like a different person.

He tightly slung the bullet-proof duffle bag across his back.

Nana began to gather all the kids one by one. She neatly aligned them in a row as Izuku, and Yagi helped zip them into their winter coats.

Then when nightfall came, a sudden pain captured Izuku.

It was like it was already waiting inside of him. It only needed the right opportunity to rear its ugly head. The sharpness in his chest doubled then tripled until he felt it manifest itself as tears in his eyes. He paused while putting on the kids' backpacks when he didn't quite know what it was.

But it became overwhelming when he pulled a hat over Katsuma's fluffy head of hair.

Katsuma's big, brown eyes gazed up at him like he was the world. It was here Katsuma lifted his arms up, and Izuku knew why he was in so much pain. He was going to miss Katsuma more than he should.

Izuku smiled through the agony and picked up the tiny boy.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They made their way down to the large port in Osaka. There were endless rows of large boats, thick crowds of people, and countless cargo containers in sight.

Izuku observed as a larger than life crane lifted up one metal container and dropped it onto a white steam boat. It hit the surface with a loud, metallic thud that made all the kids gasp. In the background seagulls gawked and rolling waves added to the chaotic ambiance.

All the kids began pointing and tugging at his pants' legs. They asked him what everything was and where the boats were going. Izuku didn't have an answer, so he made up something to keep them occupied.

He smiled at their bubbling curiosity. They had never seen boats this big, and Eri said they were like giants wading in the water smiling down at them. Some boats looked like simple cruise ships. Others were speed boats and some were fishing boats. The latter seemed to be Kota's favorites.

After they walked down the wooden dock for a while, they came across what Izuku guessed to be Nana's boat.

It was medium sized, painted white and docked in a discreet corner of the bay. On the side of it were the words 'Lone Flora' written in cursive lettering. At the bottom, Izuku could see lines of round windows. Inside of them he could peek in and observe the living quarters that were below deck.

On the top of the boat was a crew of people barking orders at one another, preparing to set sail. One of the crew members spotted Nana, and then glanced at the rest of them. They waved at them with foreign friendliness that Izuku hadn't ever experienced. Izuku waved back, encouraging all the kids to do the same.

Katsuma shyly waved and then clung to Izuku tighter.

They walked up the pier to the boat and then made their way up the stairs to the deck. Once they were all gathered on the boat, Nana turned to him.

"Okay," She said. "This is it. Anything you want to say before going? Or was there anything you forgot?"

Izuku began to nervously jitter his leg. He hugged Katsuma a bit tighter as he gazed down at all the children. They looked up at him too, all so innocent and smiling.

His heart began pounding with that pain in his chest.

This really would be the last time he saw them.

"Hana and Tamashiro are a bit more quiet," Izuku said nervously. "Th-They're more independent. Hana has a tendency to eat and wipe her hands on her pants so she gets dirtier quicker. Tamashiro sometimes forgets to voice when he's hungry and he eats his boogers instead. Just tell him not to and he'll feel embarrassed and stop."

Nana smiled at him sadly, but didn't interrupt.

"Eri and Kota like to talk a lot so make sure to ask them a lot of questions," Izuku explained with a shaky laugh. "They can talk for hours and they also like playing with the other kids. If they're too rough with each other ju-just correct them. They don't know any better yet, especially Kota. He thinks it's good to push other people. A-And Katsuma likes to sleep with the lights on. He's really shy and gets scared easily—"

"—You've never said goodbye to anyone before." Nana touched his shoulder lightly. "Have you?"

Izuku was hit with a ton of bricks.

This was his first real goodbye—and he had not a single clue how to do it. He never experienced this before. Hiryu had abruptly left, and Izuku hadn't even said goodbye to Katsuki correctly. Every attempted farewell he experienced was sudden or half done, leaving behind several loose ends.

Izuku shook his head and the inside of his chest crumbled.

"No," Izuku whispered. "I haven't."

"Let's try to make this easier on you then," Nana said.

She squatted down to the children's level and smiled.

Nana then announced that they would be going on a field trip with her to meet their new family. All the kids seemed excited. Their adventure so far sparked their curiosity after being isolated for so long.

Nana began grand gestures and then told all the kids to say goodbye to Izuku. They did. They each gave enthusiastic waves and jumped up and down about seeing more family.

All except Katsuma that is. Katsuma's happiness stopped. He stared Izuku in the eye.

"You're not coming too, 'zuku?" Katsuma questioned in a small voice.

"I'm not," Izuku forced himself to say. His chest pinched tightly with heartbreak. "I'm sorry. I'm going to go somewhere else."

"Okay. But when will you be back? Are you meeting us there?" Katsuma pressed.

He kissed the top of Katsuma's forehead and smiled sadly at him. He decided to be honest. Katsuma was owed the truth and he deserved to start his new life without any loose ends.

"I'm sorry, Katsuma," Izuku said quietly. "You're going to be with your real family. They've missed you very much. Y-You won't see me again after this. This is the last time we'll be together."

The confused, distressed sound Katsuma made broke Izuku's heart. His large eyes watered and he shook his head as if he didn't understand what Izuku was saying.

"N-No, 'zuku, don't leave me," Katsuma begged. "Pl-Please don't leave me again."

"But you're going to go with your real family. I'm not your real f-family."

"You are. You're my brother—"

"—I'm sorry, Katsuma," Izuku said in a broken whisper. "I'm not."

Nana wearily looked between them and her watch. “We have to start getting a move on. I’m so sorry.”

Izuku tried his best to hand Katsuma over to Nana, but Katsuma fought against him.

Katsuma began wailing loudly for everyone in the vicinity to hear. He clung on tighter and didn’t let go.

Izuku’s heart strings were pulled so taut that they snapped in two. It took a great deal of effort to peel Katsuma’s small arms from around his neck. It hurt so much to make him let go. But Katsuma had to—for the sake of his life he needed to be freed from Izuku.

Izuku sobbed as he forcefully pushed the boy into Nana’s hands.

Katsuma called his name as he stretched his arms back out to him. He reached for Izuku, with tears streaming down his eyes.

Izuku couldn’t do this. He could commit many, unspeakable things, but this was not one.

He screwed his eyes shut as Katsuma called his name over and over again.

With every call to him, Katsuma sounded increasingly confused and it burned his ears. Izuku’s heart begged him to go back and comfort Katsuma in his arms. But he knew he couldn’t. He was a sinking ship and Katsuma needed to get on this lifeboat to safety.

Nana cradled the thrashing boy in her arms the best she could, but it was difficult.

Izuku turned on his heels quickly and fled. This was too much for him.

He heard Katsuma’s cries grow louder and louder as he hurried off the boat. Once he finally was on the pier again, he looked up.

In the distance, Katsuma was gaping at him. His face was full of hurt, betrayal and confusion. He clung helplessly to Nana with one hand and kept reaching out back to Izuku with the other. He looked so puzzled, and Izuku didn’t know what to do. He hadn’t considered this would be the hardest part of his mission.

The boat began to depart. The crew unhooked the ropes and started the engine.

Slowly but surely, they took off into the night.

Katsuma kept crying. His small hand switched from stretching out to Izuku, to sadly waving goodbye.

That was all it took for Izuku to finally break down. He waved goodbye too as the boat started to gain speed, going off into the beautiful ocean.

Izuku waved goodbye and so did Katsuma. They did this until they could no longer see the other.

Once all Izuku could see was a tiny dot on the water, his face crumbled. A hoarse sob choked its way out of his throat.

He had no clue goodbye could hurt this much.

ᔓᔓᔓ

It took several, long grueling moments for Izuku to stop crying.

Once he could no longer see the boat, he pulled his hood over his head and began to walk away from the pier.

As he walked, he wept. He let the emotions flow freely, unashamed for having them. He felt and welcomed the intense pain of separation inside of his chest. It was harrowing like a spear to the heart, but he let the agony work its way through his body.

All this time he had been focused on getting the kids out, he forgot he grew attached to them. Especially Katsuma.

Izuku entirely forgot to consider what it would be like to part ways with his little. He wondered if this is what saying goodbye was like. Was it always such a painful process? He suddenly didn't blame Hiryu anymore for leaving without a word.

Izuku comforted himself with the reminder that this was for the better.

Even if the Yakuza or Vipers caught up with him now, all five of those kids would be long gone.

With that, Izuku was able to keep his head up in the dense crowd.

He pulled out the folded piece of paper in his pocket.

He read the words 'Midnight Sento' that were scribbled in Nana's handwriting.

Izuku chewed at the side of his cheek. From here on out, Izuku understood he was going to have to make decisions for the sake of himself. There was no more Katsuma. No more kids. No more trying to fit in with a broken family that he never belonged to. There wasn't even Kacchan.

He was officially alone.

He decided that before he made any drastic decisions, he should go meet Nana's ally first. After a good rest he could finally decide on what to do with the mess he was in.

Izuku began walking, and pulled out the map that he was using once more.

He noted where the town Shinonsen was. It wasn't exactly close, but it wasn't too far off from Osaka. He could easily take a train up there and walk to the small town. But he needed to hurry before the last train of the night left out at 00:00.

Izuku began making his way towards the train station. But then he stopped when he realized he forgot Jin's katana in the car. He cursed slightly under his breath.

He stopped in the middle of the sidewalk, earning some grumbles from other citizens.

Should he go back for it?

Currently, all Izuku had were handguns and ammo. He'd been too much in a rush to grab another blade, which was the type of weapon he was most skilled with. One of the very first lessons Tomura taught him was that having both a blade and gun was essential on longer missions. Guns were only useful if they had ammo, and ammo always eventually ran out.

Blades, however, did not need reloading.

Given the amount of danger Izuku was in, he couldn't exactly rely on his limited supply of ammo to defend himself for two months.

Izuku pursed his lips. The smart thing to do would be to go get the katana.

He nodded to himself. He began walking in the direction of where he ditched the pink sports' car.

He was forced to take a slightly longer route. He left the car in the central heart of Osaka, Minami district. It was flashy enough that no one would bat an eye at a hot pink car sitting there for days. It was a digital fortress of neon ads on screens and lights similar to Tokyo.

Izuku began walking swiftly. He wanted to make sure he could get on the train before it left in the next two hours.

He ventured into the dense night market that was packed with warm bodies. Hundreds of individuals were shoulder to shoulder underneath the bright red lanterns. Booths from merchants aligned the narrow pathway as shouts promising tasty food spilled into the air. The savory street food filled his senses as he walked by, and the sound of small children giggling were in the back amongst the chaotic chatter.

Izuku held on tightly to the strap of his bag as the melody of wind chimes blew through. He could feel the crowd pulsing with elation, exhaustion and the temperature here was a bit thicker.

When he made it to the end of the long strip, it was like gasping for fresh air.

He then arrived at the parking garage at 22:40.

Once Izuku walked inside the dim building, he surveyed the area carefully.

It was quiet, and full of cars aligned neatly in rows. It should be safe, but he wasn't sure. A small tingle scratched at his ear, making some hairs on his arms rise. He quickly glanced behind him but found nothing.

The vastness of the parking garage echoed his footsteps as he walked to the third level. When he got up there, he saw the candy pink car exactly where he left it. He began to approach the vehicle but stopped halfway when he saw unusual movement.

A head peaked up from behind the car.

Soft blond locks came into view.

Izuku's heart sank.

He rushed to hide behind one of the large pillars in the parking lot as stealthily as possible. His heart began pounding loudly in his ears as he crouched low. He tried to make himself small.

The figure stood up to its full height—and it was Katsuki.

His eyes stretched wide in disbelief and every nerve commanded him to run. But his feet stayed rooted, unable to believe what he was seeing.

Katsuki brushed a hand through his hair and Izuku felt his heart skip a dreadful beat at the sight.

His murderous husband walked around the car to come into full view. He was wearing a red motorcycle jacket with a gray hood. His large hands were covered in black leather gloves that were embedded with rusted brass knuckles.

If Izuku squinted, he could see old blood stains on his jacket. On Katsuki's face was a pair of darkly tinted sunglasses and his black cargo pants were lined with multiple rows of pockets—full of weapons no doubt.

Izuku watched Katsuki closely, mesmerized a bit.

He really found him? So soon? He nearly couldn't believe it.

Katsuki pulled his backpack off his body and zipped it open. He reached in and pulled out a tiny item. Izuku immediately knew what it was: a tracking device. Katsuki used a finger to tip his sunglasses down to his nose. His burning red eyes scanned the device with razor sharpness.

Izuku silently observed Katsuki as he placed the chip on the belly of the car. He did it with expert handling like it wasn't his first time. He fiddled with it a bit. Then he smirked in a horribly handsome manner as it latched into place.

Izuku furrowed his brow.

It was incredible that Katsuki somehow located him before either the Yakuza or Vipers. But he couldn't comprehend how that was even possible? He beat Tomura, of all people, in the race to wring his neck.

Izuku was kicking himself a bit. He should have taken Katsuki deeply seriously whenever the man gloated about being good at tracking. Because he really was an expert hunter and Izuku was his current target.

When Katsuki cracked his knuckles, Izuku's survival instinct kicked in.

He decided very wisely to leave the katana. He would have to just find another blade elsewhere at this rate and hope he didn't run out of ammo.

Izuku began to back up and a small echo followed his subtle movement.

The sound bounced off the concrete walls of the dark parking lot. It was such a minuscule, non-alarming noise. But to the trained ear it sounded like someone trying to sneak away.

Immediately, Katsuki turned his head and Izuku ducked all the way behind the pillar.

Izuku held his breath.

Katsuki shifted on his feet.

Then the sound of the backpack being zipped up reached Izuku. He started to sweat nervously when heavy footsteps began to head in his direction. Hefty thud after hefty thud. But then they stopped.

Izuku waited.

He stayed deathly still as a bead of sweat rolled from off his brow down his temple.

He cut his eyes to the side and slowly inched his head to peek at the car again.

To his surprise, Katsuki wasn't there.

Izuku furrowed his brow, confused. He glanced around the area where the car was. Katsuki was entirely gone but Izuku hadn't heard him move. He craned his neck further and found no indication of Katsuki around the area. He looked up and he looked across the way.

Next, Izuku stayed as still as possible. He shifted to look the other direction around the pillar.

But when he turned his head, all he saw were red eyes, boring into him.

Izuku's heart skipped several beats and his whole body startled at the sheer closeness. Katsuki was crouching directly next to him. He sadistically smirked like a predator who finally cornered its prey.

"This is the part where you run from me," Katsuki whispered, breath gliding across Izuku's lips.

Izuku's veins surged with pure adrenaline.

Izuku took off and instantly Katsuki shot his hands out to seize both his wrists. Izuku tried to snatch himself out of the hold with all his might. But Katsuki's grasp was painfully firm.

Katsuki leered as Izuku began to struggle fiercely.

Izuku dropped his whole body to the ground, forcing Katsuki to fall with him. He kicked his legs up, hitting Katsuki straight in the stomach.

Katsuki choked out a loud gasp and his hold loosened. Using his legs, Izuku kicked Katsuki off of him and scrambled up right.

He took flight like he was gifted the ability of wind. He began running as fast as he could. Right behind was Katsuki, who wasted no time.

Izuku gritted his teeth as he surged forward, looking behind him only once. When he did lay eyes on Katsuki, Katsuki was as pissed off as the last time he saw him. If not more.

Katsuki then reached inside of his coat. Sharp, dark steel caught the dim light and Izuku's stomach dropped lower and lower. Katsuki took aim and fired off two bullets. Izuku zig-zagged the best he could in order to dodge. He hissed in pain as one searing bullet skinned him and the other one missed.

They reached the second floor going full speed and Izuku's eyes darted all around. He saw the ramp to the first floor, and he saw the stairwell. Izuku barreled in full speed into the stairwell door as two more bullets zipped past his head.

Izuku made it past the door and slammed it shut behind him. He raced to try to find the lock on the door—but his gut twisted when there wasn't one.

Shit.

A loud bang hit the door, and the sound rolled like thunder. Izuku's heart hammered as Katsuki immediately tried to kick the door open. Izuku let out a yell of effort as he pushed against the door to keep it shut. With every brutal kick Katsuki gave, Izuku jolted but didn't move.

Then suddenly Katsuki switched from kicking to pushing.

Izuku's eyes bulged wide at the sheer strength exerted. It was as if four men were heaving on the other side, coming straight for him. Izuku's arms began to shake as he harnessed all his will to hold the door shut.

But Katsuki was always stronger. Slowly the door moved in Katsuki's favor. Izuku's feet began sliding against the concrete and Katsuki began winning.

Izuku thought of a solution rapidly. He stopped pushing and immediately Katsuki stumbled in, nearly falling over. With rapid recovery, Katsuki moved to aim his weapon to take a shot. But he missed when Izuku crouched low to the ground and out of the line of fire.

Instantly, Izuku worked with haste. He punched Katsuki's midsection with all his strength, slamming his knuckles straight into a pressure point.

Katsuki staggered, grunting as he absorbed the painful attack.

He tried to grapple for Izuku, but Izuku was always faster. Izuku fluidly ducked through Katsuki's legs and whirled to kick him in the back in a succinct combo. Katsuki went tumbling forward, hitting the ground like a stone pillar that met its match.

Izuku turned and ran. He headed down the ramp to the first floor as fast as he possibly could.

Izuku glanced over his shoulder. He wanted to make sure there was decent distance between them. But Katsuki was nowhere to be seen—again.

Izuku's blood boiled with panic. He looked forward and began sweating out of sheer fear. He was beginning to comprehend that Katsuki out of sight meant nothing good. His husband was far stealthier than he ever gave him credit for.

Izuku was cursing over and over in his head. He should've never gone back for that stupid katana.

Right when he breached the first floor, the boom of a revving engine bounced on all corners of the parking garage. It echoed like eerie laughter floating around him. Then following the noise was the loud sound of tires burning against concrete.

The two sounds closed-in disturbingly quick, wasting no time. It took less than ten seconds for blinding headlights to shine behind him.

Izuku kept running as he looked back.

It was a vision straight out of hell. Katsuki was blazing towards him at full speed on his red motorcycle with a gun.

Izuku kicked it in gear.

He hit the highest speed he's ever run. He darted straight out of the parking lot as Katsuki gained distance.

Izuku stumbled out onto the sidewalk, knocking over several civilians who were all simply trying to enjoy their night. He yelled out apologies to people he zoomed past. Crowds of pedestrians all gasped and yelled at him as he ducked and weaved between all their bodies.

Katsuki skidded out onto the road. He weaved in and out of the cars, breaking the speed limit way past what was acceptable. Multiple car horns beeped at him as he ran a red light. Izuku kept his feet pounding against the concrete. He looked to the side and saw a blur of scarlet right on his tail.

Katsuki was catching up unnervingly fast.

But Izuku noted how Katsuki wasn't shooting. Instead, he was trying to get close for a clear shot.

That's when Izuku remembered something about his husband. Katsuki was never keen on shooting a seemingly innocent civilian. Yakuza and Yakuza related affiliates? Sure. But Katsuki never killed people he didn't find to be 'scum' unless paid.

Which gave Izuku the perfect out.

Right as Katsuki caught up to him, they looked at each other.

Time slowed for Izuku as their determined glares clashed as intense as lightning.

He could see the reflection of himself in Katsuki's helmet's visor. His eyes were overlaid with Katsuki's. As Izuku caught this visual, mixed emotions zapped him like a lightning bolt. Then Katsuki began to reach for his gun.

Izuku abruptly stopped running.

Katsuki's head whipped backwards as Izuku juked in an entirely different direction.

Izuku took off towards the night market. He knew it would be at its peak density this time of night. He heard Katsuki's motorcycle come to a violent, skidding halt. The pounding sound of running footsteps began to chase behind him.

Right as Izuku reached the entrance of the night market, he could see Katsuki behind him again. This time Katsuki was wielding his knife. He was fiercely gritting his teeth as he chased after him.

Izuku didn't slow down as he came in contact with the crowd. He said quick apologies as he began shoving people out of his way.

A litany of obscenities and screaming erupted as the two of them whirled through the crowd like a storm. People began parting like the red sea for their typhoon. Even the wind felt like it picked up with them, rattling the red lanterns above.

Everything began twisting in a blur of craziness. Crowds were yelling. Shop owners were grabbing their goods. Families were clutching their children. The white and red lights were nearly blinding as Izuku ran from his husband.

Izuku looked to the side as saw an upcoming merchant booth. It was selling fancy, decorative parasols. Izuku extended out his hand to grab one as he ran. Immediately the store owner screamed at him—but then she gasped when she saw Katsuki barreling through with a knife.

Izuku twirled on his feet and swung the parasol as if it was a blade.

Katsuki ducked and dodged swiftly. They began to maneuver around each other like trained aerobatic dancers. Izuku tried his best to get jabs in. He hit Katsuki's neck. His side. Then he slapped him upside the head with the hard item. He tried to hit him as hard as possible, but it was like Katsuki was made of stone.

For every jab Izuku was able to land, Katsuki blocked two more. He was quicker than he was at the masquerade and the determined fury in his eyes was stronger. Katsuki started matching Izuku's skilled footing and they began an exchange of back-and-forth hits and dodges.

Izuku began to stagger as Katsuki started to gain on him. He was swinging the knife in a way Izuku never saw him do, and with every attack, he slashed away at the flimsy parasol, wearing it down.

When the parasol seemed like it was about to break, Izuku cursed under his breath. He tried to turn and run.

But right as he tried to flee, his duffle bag was grasped in that iron hold.

Izuku yelped as he was brutally yanked backwards. He nearly fell but balanced on his heels. He tried to grab his bag back, but Katsuki was always stronger. Izuku used all his agility to whirl and in the same motion hit Katsuki's head over and over with the parasol.

It was here that Katsuki began to try to slash at Izuku's neck with his other hand. Izuku blocked all of the attempts like he was a delicate ballet dancer, light on his toes. They went around and around like they were forever caught in a dizzying circle.

Katsuki tried once more to go for the kill. He shot his hand with the knife forward.

Izuku acted on reflexes. He bent backwards and opened the parasol. Katsuki's fist and knife broke through the paper material. The point of the blade stopped less than an inch away from Izuku's face.

Izuku closed the parasol on Katsuki's arm and trapped it inside. He twisted in a swift motion, making Katsuki's arm bend unnaturally. Katsuki hissed as he tried to roll with the gesture. He was forced to let go of the duffle bag so he could follow the movement without breaking a bone.

But Izuku then tripped him up.

Katsuki lost balance and Izuku used the momentum to throw Katsuki. With a loud yell, he tossed Katsuki across the way into another merchant stand that was full of touristy clothes.

Katsuki's large body came crashing down on the wooden stand like he was a boulder.

Scandalized gasps breached both of their ears as Katsuki's heavy body broke the stand into pieces. Shelves began toppling down. Wooden planks clattered to the ground. In a dramatic fashion, endless skirts, shirts, and sakura flower print pants piled onto Katsuki like falling leaves.

Izuku didn't wait to see if that slowed Katsuki or not.

He took off running through the rest of the night market. Behind him he heard Katsuki scream his name with so much sheer anger it felt like the cry rattled the sky.

When Izuku broke free of the crowd, so many unwelcoming eyes were on him. Izuku looked for the port area and began running towards the boats.

He heard the impossible sound of heavy footsteps behind him and glanced over his shoulder.

Katsuki was gaining on him like a twister at full speed. He was throwing clothes off of him as he headed right in his direction. He tried to catch up, but Izuku was always faster.

Izuku sped around the corner straight for the docks. He saw most of the boats were gone now, and there was no time to hot wire a speed boat. Izuku's heart pounded faster and faster as his feet began to burn from exhaustion.

He pushed himself harder. Quicker. He groaned through the strain on his muscles.

Right when he thought he was out of options, he saw one boat that was leaving the pier.

A rope dangled off the back.

Izuku breathed in deep for oxygen as he gave himself one last push. Several more bullets whizzed by him, skinning his neck and legs. Izuku flinched but didn't waver. He leaned forward and briskly ran straight for the boat that was setting sail. He barreled down the dock and the wooden surface was creaking underneath the enormous force of his speed.

Katsuki was right behind him and Izuku could hear him try to speed up.

When Izuku came to the edge of the pier, he leapt.

Izuku reached his hands forward with all his will as he grabbed a hold of the swinging rope. It dropped with his weight before catching. He swung, then slammed into the hard surface of the boat with a loud thud. The taste of iron filled his mouth.

The burn on his palms tore through him as he began desperately climbing. Bullets sunk into the metal surface all around him and into his duffle bag. He gritted his teeth as he tried to pull himself to safety. He reached the top and was able to grab ahold of the railing and pull himself over.

Right as his body was about to drop to the deck, he screamed out in agony. A bullet sliced right through his bicep.

Izuku's body hit the wooden deck ungracefully. He clutched his arm in pain. He hissed as his muscles began to violently convulse.

But Izuku kept himself low to the surface and curled up. He looked up fearfully, hoping no one else was around. Much to his relief, luck was on his side.

The deck was empty. Plus, from the looks of it, it was a single fisherman's boat. Coupled with the overwhelming smell of raw fish, there were piles of nets, rods and crates placed off to the side and stacked like building blocks.

Then Izuku heard footsteps. Someone began to hastily run towards him.

Izuku desperately crawled over to the side of the deck full of wooden crates and tarps. He hid himself underneath one tarp that was lazily draped over a pile of crates. He crawled under it all the way and made no noise.

Through a slim crack, Izuku could see one singular fisherman come racing to the deck. The man whirled around with wide eyes, entirely alarmed. He gripped his wiry hair in confusion and paused however when he found nothing.

The fisherman squinted his eyes out to the pier and then stood there for a moment. Then two. Then as if he gaslit himself out of what he heard, the fisherman scratched his head.

The man turned around and Izuku nearly sighed in relief. He walked back to the front of the boat and continued to steer.

Izuku waited a minute. He tried his best to catch his breath, but it was like oxygen was avoiding him. His lungs were hurting as if someone set them on fire and filled them with smoke. Izuku leaned against a crate and clutched his arm tightly to slow the bleeding.

After a moment, Izuku peaked carefully from underneath the tarp. He briefly looked over the edge of the boat.

Standing on another end of the dock was Katsuki. He was calm like a quiet storm that knew its strengths to topple entire villages. He seemed so sure and stoic in his endless pit of hate standing there.

Katsuki's eyes then found him.

For a brief moment, they locked distant gazes.

Izuku's broken heart clutched with pain. The bitter, winter wind blew between them.

The soft sound of distant sound of police sirens began to head towards the pier.

He watched as Katsuki pulled his hood over his head. He didn't break their eye contact until he finally turned around. Katsuki began to walk quickly away from the scene. He disappeared into the mayhem of the night right as the blue and red lights approached.

Izuku's stomach sank to the lowest pits it'd ever been in.

Izuku jolted awake when the boat jerked to a hard stop.

The first thing that assaulted his senses was the smell of fish. It was potent and smothered everywhere, reminding him that he was on a Fisherman's boat. Following that he heard a cluster of voices down by the front. The people come towards the back and begin to gather items from the deck.

Izuku stayed as still as possible under the tarp as people began to work around him.

The fisherman spoke to someone, then as quickly as they came, all the voices were gone.

Izuku waited until the count of one hundred to move. He peaked from underneath the tarp to make sure he was alone and was relieved to find he was. There was no one else but him and the cold, howling wind.

Izuku stood up slowly on his wobbly legs. He groaned softly as all the muscles in his body protested loudly. His legs felt like they were ready to fall off at any given moment and Izuku nearly wanted that.

Izuku finally pulled his hand away from clutching his arm.

Bright red blood coated the entirety of his palm. He looked down to see a large blood stain soaked through his new winter jacket.

Izuku got off the boat and immediately used the dingy water in the bay to clean his hand.

He watched as the blood washed away like ink diffusing. As he studied the shapes the blood created in the water, he didn't want to think too much about it. He was terrified that if he closely examined his emotions now, his body might shut down into paralyzed fear.

Instead, he refocused. He needed to find a way to Midnight Sento immediately. As he did this he tried his best to ignore the trembles that were working their way through his fingers. He scanned the area, curious to where he was. It was still night outside, so they couldn't have gone far.

He got his answer when he turned his head fully and saw a wooden sign.

In white lettering it said, "Welcome to Sumoto, Hyogo."

Izuku hung his head in relief.

He was slightly closer to where he needed to go, but not terribly far from where he was at. Sumoto was located on Awaji Island which lay directly on the other side of the Osaka Bay. Which meant Izuku only needed to get back to the mainland and keep heading south.

As Izuku stood up, he instantly became light-headed. He staggered, nearly falling over right there on the pier. Izuku choked when spots danced across his vision and nausea landed in his stomach.

The fatigue officially caught up with him. Izuku closed his eyes until the spell passed. When he felt slightly better, he decided that he needed to rest for an hour or two. If he wanted to make it to Shinonsen without passing out, he needed to regain a bit of his strength that he just depleted from outrunning Katsuki.

As Izuku began to walk into town, he was reeling on the fact that Katsuki really did find him.

Izuku didn't know what he felt more: fear or genuinely impressed.

He decided it was fear. Katsuki possessed terrifyingly advanced tracking abilities that Izuku never was aware of. And because of that, he likely would not be able to spend too long anywhere.

Izuku hoped the boat getaway was ambiguous enough to throw Katsuki off his scent for a couple of days. Even Izuku didn't know where the boat was heading, and that fact alone meant neither did Katsuki. As far as Katsuki knew, Izuku was halfway north by now.

Izuku hoped that would be sufficient enough for him to get the hell out of reach.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Izuku wandered into the small city, it was decently sized.

There was a large hotel for tourists and civilians in the more populated area. Many of the shops and buildings however were closed this time of night.

Izuku looked at the main hotel and decided against it. He walked a bit further and made a long trek to the outskirts of the city for extra measure.

He found the smallest, most discrete motel he could. It was a bit shabby, and Izuku could tell it hadn't been taken care of in a long time. The sign flickered on and off and there were no cars in the parking lot. It likely had less than three stars on its reviews, which made it perfect for laying low.

Izuku walked into the motel door, and the bell chimed like a melody as he walked in. The first thing he was greeted with was the smell of old dust. The next was a lingering smell of nicotine. The smell was a bit moldy, as if moisture was embedded behind the faded floral wallpaper.

The man sitting at the check-in desk didn't even see him at first.

His large eyes were glued to his laptop and in his ears were a pair of wired headphones blasting noise. Whatever he was watching must have been intense because he adjusted his round glasses and leaned in to get a closer look.

As Izuku approached he noticed the man's oily comb over, and a slightly uncombed gray mustache.

Izuku politely stood there and then cleared his throat.

The man startled with a light gasp. He perked up, seemingly surprised to see Izuku. Then he quickly slammed his laptop shut and snatched out his ear buds. He stared at Izuku for a moment, as if confused as to why he would be here, of all places.

Izuku gave a stiff smile.

"May I have a room for the night, please?" Izuku asked.

“O-Oh yes! Of course,” The clerk replied. He was slightly antsy. “Give me just one moment!”

He cleared his messy space as he reached for the drawer next to him. When he pulled it open, Izuku saw a cluster of silver and gold keys slide around. Some were marked with green tape, others with red. Izuku furrowed his brow at how disorganized this all was.

“Do you have a preference for what kind of room?” The clerk asked while adjusting his glasses. “One bed or two?” He then sniffed the air a bit and leaned back. He wrinkled his nose and gazed at Izuku curiously. He scanned him up and down and finally saw the blood on his coat. “A room with a working shower, perhaps?”

Izuku blinked. He lightly sniffed himself. He flinched at the rancid smell of fish clinging to him. It only took a few seconds for his neck to burn from embarrassment. The stench from the fisherman’s boat must’ve rubbed off on him.

“One bed with a working shower would be nice,” Izuku answered quietly.

He silently wondered why a working shower wouldn’t be a part of the deal in the first place.

“Okay,” the clerk replied. He pulled out a silver key with a green piece of tape. “Here you go! Please remember to check out and return the key before you leave. Don’t make a mess!”

“Of course.”

Izuku took the key and gave the money for the night in exchange.

As he walked away, the clerk carefully opened his laptop once more and put his headphones in.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku walked the outside halls of the motel to his room.

It was emptier than a haunted house and quiet enough to hear a pin drop. He curiously peered inside the windows of the other rooms but found no lights on. He frowned deeply when a roach scurried from underneath the crack of one door.

When he reached his room, it somehow felt sketchier than the rest of the motel.

There was one bed and half of a washroom. There was no window in the bathroom and the only way in or out of the room was the door.

The linen on top of the bed was a spotted gray and yellow color, like it was once supposed to be white and turned colors from dust and questionable spills. There was a mirror on the wall that was slightly crooked and what felt like stock photos of roses were pinned on the wallpaper that was peeling towards the top.

The first thing Izuku did was close the blinds. The curtains themselves were also half done really. They were a single shear layer of material that barely blocked any light. Izuku made a note not to linger by the window too much and to get out of this place as soon as possible.

Izuku sighed and dropped his duffle bag onto the bed.

He turned on the light in the room, but the bulb flickered once and cut off. Of course. Just his luck.

Slightly irritated, Izuku stalked over to the small lamp that was on the wooden nightstand. When he twisted the knob, the lamp flickered a bit, but then found its power to stay on.

The tiny yellow light only filled half of the space. Izuku moved to check the drawers or the nightstand. At the bottom most drawer he found old, discarded items stashed inside. There was a crusted bottle of lotion, three sticks of gum, four cigarettes, half a used bottle of lube, and a lighter all tucked inside.

Izuku scrunched his nose.

He picked up the lighter, thought it might be useful, and tossed it onto the bed halfheartedly.

As he slammed the drawer closed, his body ached to be laid down. He felt the ache in his arm begin to demand attention and Izuku's legs were burning from too much use. Izuku tiredly unzipped his coat and began to strip down.

He lazily kicked his garments to the side of the bed and walked into the washroom.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku sat on the edge of the bed with a towel wrapped around his waist.

He applied pressure to his arm's bullet wound with a paper towel that was doused with disinfectant. As he did this, he kept his eyes peeled on the TV that played in the background.

He listened to the news to keep a watchful ear out for any stories that felt tinted in Yakuza or Viper like venom. Surprisingly, it seemed calm. There were no other updates about the fire in Tokyo and nothing else seemed to be happening. Which made Izuku a bit nervous.

He guessed both the Vipers and Yakuza were calculating their next move. Or maybe they had other priorities besides Izuku. Which Izuku slightly doubted for the Vipers. Tomura's only business sometimes was wrangling him like a true caretaker. His brother was definitely coming up with some plan to drag him back home.

The only news story that he saw that was cause for alarm was the one about 'Mayhem at the Osaka Night Market'.

There, like a pulsing sore thumb, were reports of the chase between him and Katsuki. All the footage was luckily blurry and it was far too dark for either of their faces to be caught. They were moving much too fast for people to get a good identifiable shot of them.

Instead, they looked like two blurs of green and red clashing like great waves.

They always were a storm together, weren't they? Izuku thought solemnly.

He watched the clips replay over and over until they finally disappeared. The news moved on to talking about something else entirely, and Izuku couldn't bear to pay it any mind. Unfortunately, his thoughts stayed fixed on Katsuki.

He pulled the paper towel away from his arm.

He took the moment to study the blood splotches soaked into the towel.

His wound stopped bleeding for the most part. The bullet cut clean through him, leaving no fragments. He was beyond lucky this bullet didn't shatter his bone or sever a major artery. Exactly like the other two times Katsuki shot him.

A tug in his stomach made him pause.

It was here that a peculiar thought crossed Izuku's mind.

For most of his life, he always assumed Katsuki had bad aim. All the years he and Katsuki took turns in shooting each other, they never landed a lethal one. Izuku knew why he couldn't; he had a mental block. But he always simply assumed Katsuki was poorly trained and that's why he never landed one.

However, after seeing Katsuki at the peak of his capabilities twice now, Izuku was beginning to wonder: did Katsuki really have as bad of aim as he thought?

Katsuki cleared out Moore's headquarters without harming any of the victims. And less than three days ago, he killed about fifty Yakuza without much effort.

Someone with bad aim wouldn't have been able to accomplish either of those things.

Izuku's thumb slid across the blood on the cloth in a slow caress.

He turned to look at his duffle bag beside him. It had several holes in it from where Katsuki's bullets cut through it, and even some light slashes. However, all these were indicative of the bad aim that Izuku was unsure Katsuki really possessed.

He inspected the bag out of curiosity. He pulled out a couple of the bullets that were lodged in the thick material of the bag. He couldn't stop himself from running his finger across one of the slashes. Izuku turned the bag over to see if there were any more bullets caught inside of it.

However, his heart stopped when he saw something that was definitely not a bullet.

On the belly of the bag was a small black chip.

It was identical to the one Katsuki put on the car.

Izuku stood straight up and snatched the chip off. The tiny metal teeth tore from the material of the bag and pricked his finger when he clutched it. He held it up to his wide eyes.

“You’re kidding me,” Izuku loudly exasperated.

It was blinking and it was working.

Izuku immediately crushed it against the wall into tiny pieces.

He stared in disbelief as the fragments fell to the ground. It clicked then that Katsuki must’ve stuck it on him while he grabbed his bag in the marketplace. In their tussle, Izuku hadn’t even realized it. Of course. That’s why Katsuki was so calm on the dock. Katsuki was far more thorough than Izuku ever thought.

He turned around frantically, glancing over his shoulder at the window.

Without a moment’s hesitation, Izuku began re-packing. He turned off the TV, killed all the lights and began shoving all his guns and clothes back into the duffle bag.

He quickly rotated his bag, eyes scanning all over. He carefully made sure that there were not any more trackers on it. Next he did the same to his coat and his pants. He found no more chips, but somehow that gave him less hope. Katsuki probably had more just waiting to tag on him.

His gut was actively twisting into several knots like it was a balloon animal being toyed with for amusement. He could feel the hands contorting his insides to belong to Katsuki’s. It was only a matter of time before that became true.

Izuku threw on the first pair of clothes he could put on and snatched his coat. He pulled out a single handgun, cocked it, and held it tightly in his hand.

He hastily put on his shoes, nearly tripping in the progress. He didn’t bother to tie them as he ran for the door with his duffle bag clutched in his hand.

But he froze in his tracks when a tall, looming shadow passed by the window.

Izuku looked up like a trapped animal. His heart skipped when he recognized the silhouette.

It was Katsuki with his wild hair and broad shoulders.

There was nowhere to run, and Izuku’s legs were shaking, begging to be given rest. He ducked behind the door as the shadow stopped. Izuku watched as the shadow paused and peered in.

Izuku melted into the corner and held his breath.

Katsuki shifted on his feet. Izuku paid close attention as Katsuki’s heavy footsteps suddenly shifted to sound like he was walking on clouds. Izuku silently noted how well Katsuki did that. He was really good at stealthiness when he wanted to be.

Izuku was grasping how all these years he had never truly been at the blunt end of Katsuki's lethality—until now.

The door began to rattle.

Izuku's eyes cut down to the shaking doorknob. Katsuki was picking the lock.

Izuku's heart palpitated. He quickly looked towards the other side of the room and began to quietly crawl on all fours with haste. Izuku swiftly maneuvered himself and his bag under the bed, completely swallowed by the darkness.

He put his finger on his gun's trigger, right as the door clicked open.

Katsuki's black combat boots came into view.

Katsuki stood there for a moment, scanning the dark room and then gradually he closed the door behind him. He quietly locked the door.

Izuku watched as his husband's feet carefully stepped around the room. Izuku could barely hear his footsteps.

Katsuki came near the bed and Izuku held his breath. Several intense heart beats quaked through him and then finally Katsuki passed the bed. Katsuki checked the closet, behind the dresser, and even under the desk. This was all done with eerie silence like he was made of air.

Next, Katsuki stalked over into the back towards the washroom.

Izuku gazed at the door that was now left unguarded with desperation.

It was only a matter of time before Katsuki checked under the bed.

Very slowly, Izuku began sliding against the carpeted floor on his arms. He was virtually soundless as he glided. He hauled his bag with him, and right as he made it halfway from under the bed, he suddenly was stopped by a terrifying force.

Two large hands wrapped around his ankles and yanked.

Izuku's heart sank straight down into his twisted gut.

Izuku gritted his teeth as he was pulled backwards with unprecedented strength. He tried to fight against it, but Katsuki was always stronger. He immediately twisted his body when he was pulled all the way to the other side. He aimed his gun directly at Katsuki's arm within point blank range. Katsuki tried to dodge, but Izuku was always faster.

Izuku pulled the trigger. Blood splattered across the wall and Katsuki screamed.

Izuku steeled his nerves at that specific sound because he hated Katsuki in pain—

Izuku tried to aim for knocking Katsuki out again. If he could do that, he could escape. Or he could tie Katsuki up and they finally sit down and talk properly.

He took his gun and swung with all his strength to hit Katsuki in his temple, but Katsuki countered.

He grabbed Izuku's wrist as if he knew he was going to do it. Katsuki gritted his teeth through the bleeding and twisted Izuku's hands backwards at a grotesque angle.

Izuku yelled in pain as he was forced to drop his gun. He quickly threw his body weight up and caught Katsuki in a headlock with his legs. He squeezed his thighs together until he felt Katsuki choke.

Katsuki let go of his wrists. He tried to pry Izuku's legs off. His fingernails dug into Izuku's muscular quads with terrifying force—but Izuku locked him in. Katsuki pulled frantically as Izuku's grip grew stronger and then he abruptly stood up.

Izuku hissed as he was lifted upwards at a disorienting speed. His whole world was tossed into an upside-down blur as Katsuki began to spin around. Izuku hoisted himself upright in the cyclone they were now caught in. He grabbed a hold of Katsuki's head and forced him further into his suffocating head lock.

As Katsuki tried his best to shake him off, Izuku wouldn't let go—no matter how much his legs were trembling. Katsuki then slammed them into wall after wall with brutal velocity. They shook the dresser, bed, mirror, and all the pictures on the walls.

Katsuki's fingernails scraped away at Izuku's thighs. But Izuku gritted his teeth through the pain and kept Katsuki locked in his confining hold.

Izuku began to grab ahold of Katsuki's hair and pushed him in further to his leg lock. He then repeatedly dropped the point of his elbow down on Katsuki's head in a frantic pursuit to knock him out cold.

It was here that Katsuki's attempts to shake him off grew more frenzied. He sunk his fingers into Izuku's hips and gripped tight. With bewildering speed, he threw both of them into the mirror latched to the wall.

The glass shattered and it sliced through the air. Izuku covered his face instinctively. He choked out as the glass broke against his head, legs, and arms. He lost his leg lock grip slightly. Immediately, Katsuki used the small opening and wrenched Izuku off. Izuku grunted as he was thrown down to the ground.

As he fell, he grabbed onto Katsuki and together they went tumbling down.

Both of their heads hit the floor with a hard thud. Both of them gasped for air.

They dizzyingly glared at each other, ready to make another hasty move but Izuku struck first.

Through his double vision he kicked at Katsuki, hoping he hit the right one. He did. Katsuki was knocked to the side as Izuku's foot connected with his face. Izuku tried his best to scramble upright in the glassy mess beneath them.

Then Katsuki tackled him. They went flying together into the nightstand and Izuku slammed his elbow back. He hit Katsuki in the neck. Katsuki choked. Izuku whirled around. He grabbed the lamp and smashed it against Katsuki with all the strength he had left. Katsuki hissed and fell. Izuku tried to run but was dragged down.

They dropped down together and began an all too familiar push and pull.

Izuku's blistering anxiety began creeping up.

He tried to fight against Katsuki. But it was the equivalent of struggling to keep his head above water in an unruly ocean storm. There was no raft. No safety. No one came to save him. Every time he thought he broke through the surface, he was hauled back down underneath and nearly drowned.

Izuku grappled for the bed to hoist himself up. Instantly, Katsuki's hand eclipsed his and dragged him down. The sheets came down with his failed attempt this time. The gray linen poured over them and Izuku wrestled it into wrapping around Katsuki's head. He pinned down Katsuki in a mess of tangles and was finally free.

Then there was a swift drag of a knife, cutting straight through the sheets.

Izuku tried to run for the door.

But he was stopped when Katsuki stabbed his knife through his pants' leg. Izuku was pinned in place, and he fell down at the sudden pull. The side of his body hit the floor with a loud bang. He looked up. He was mere inches from the door. Katsuki began to drag him back. Izuku kicked and yelled as he tried to crawl his way to freedom.

But Katsuki was always stronger.

Izuku was dragged away from the door.

They struggled against each other, and Katsuki began winning. Izuku tried to push him off to no avail.

Soon he found himself pinned underneath Katsuki, back to the ground. Katsuki forced his way between his legs and used all his body weight to forcefully keep Izuku in place. His hands struggled their way around Izuku's neck and squeezed.

Izuku gasped, eyes wide when the air was cut off from his lungs.

He tried to scratch Katsuki's hands off, but it was pointless.

He knew this chokehold. This was the first chokehold Katsuki ever put him in. It held no care. No tenderness and not an ounce of softness. They had come full circle. Deep down,

Izuku always knew that Katsuki's hands were destined to be forever wrapped around his throat, either in love or with murderous intent.

And it looked like in the end, it was the latter.

Izuku gazed up at Katsuki.

He found himself met with what was possibly the end of his life: red eyes and blond hair.

Everything suspended in time as he stared into those eyes. They pulled him in like always, forever his one true weakness up until the bitter end. As he sank to the bottom of the sea of scarlet, Izuku saw all the versions of Katsuki come to life in front of him.

They flashed before his eyes in reverse.

He saw this vengeful, steadfast Katsuki. Then he saw the broken-hearted Katsuki. Next he saw the Katsuki who said he loved him at his family's grave site. And then the Katsuki who called him darling so sweetly. The Katsuki who showed him who he was when he wasn't a Viper.

The Katsuki who drunkenly recited vows. The Katsuki who smiled at him for the first time. The Katsuki who teased him. The grumpy Katsuki who reluctantly held his hand. The Katsuki who helped him escape danger. The Katsuki who gave him his shirt. The Katsuki in Taiwan. The Katsuki in Vienna.

Then finally, he saw young Kacchan.

He remembered how he wandered into Izuku's life in the cold. He was shivering, no coat and crying for his mother.

He stared at present Katsuki in front of him, who was still grieving for his mother.

Izuku stopped struggling.

The air was leaving him quickly. But as Izuku lost himself to Katsuki, he was unable to keep fighting his ultimate weakness.

Once he began feeling lightheaded, a sad piece of him decided that this was okay. There was a bittersweet level of comfort in knowing this would be the end of his life. At least he would be put out of his misery doing the thing he loved to do most: staring into lovely red eyes.

Tears slipped out of Izuku.

Katsuki's expression faltered. He blinked rapidly a bit. Then quickly reverted back to his anger. He pushed forward in his resolve.

Izuku memorized this last version of Katsuki's eyes.

They were full of fury, blazing hot. The constricted pupil in the middle was like a burning coal simmering angrily in the ocean of scarlet. The bloodshot veins encircled the irises, stretching across the planes of white like broken glass. The veiny tendrils spread all over, making Katsuki's eyes appear like they were nothing but deep, endless red.

Izuku thought it was lovely.

As spots danced across his vision, his arms went limp and dropped to his sides. His head lulled and he blinked in long lags as his vision lost focus.

Izuku blinked once. Then twice. Then the third time he blinked, the eyes burning down on him wavered in their fury.

Katsuki stared down at Izuku and confusion struck him. A different emotion gradually fought its way up. Katsuki's eyes went wide, and his hands around Izuku's neck began to shake.

Black spilled into the sides of Izuku's vision.

He blinked once more, and Katsuki's pupils were no longer constricted. His pupils dilated all the way his hands around Izuku's neck loosened entirely.

Air slammed into Izuku's lungs like a baseball bat to the chest.

Izuku began coughing violently. He grabbed instinctively at his throat as the wind swept its way through him. His hands landed on top of Katsuki's, which were still resting around his neck.

He frantically blinked and suddenly he was being showered in hot tears. They dripped down one by one like rain droplets. Izuku's blurry vision focused to reveal Katsuki crying.

Katsuki was fighting a war.

He was gritting his teeth in anger, but his eyes were glossy with despair. Katsuki quickly wiped his face, as though he was frustrated with himself. He got rid of his tears before they could change his mind and he reached for his knife.

Izuku closed his eyes when he saw the blade come in view. He willingly craned his neck and screwed his eyes shut—but the blade stopped directly as it touched his Adam's apple. Izuku kept his eyes tightly screwed closed as he waited for his throat to be slit open.

But it never came.

He hesitantly opened his eyes again.

Katsuki's hands were shaking, and his tears were pouring faster. Katsuki's nostrils flared and it seemed like he was trying to force himself to do it. His eyes were darting all around Izuku's face. He searched Izuku's features as if the answer on how to take the kill would be written in Izuku's freckles.

Izuku sadly took Katsuki's shaking hand. He steadied the blade.

“It’s yours to take, Kacchan,” Izuku whispered past his quivering lips. “It’s okay. It’s always been yours anyways.”

Izuku tried to help guide Katsuki’s hand to slit his throat, but Katsuki’s hand didn’t budge. He was met with extreme resistance as Katsuki remained paralyzed in place. Gradually, Katsuki’s whole body shook more violently and then firmly clenched his jaw.

Then, he exploded.

It erupted at once as Katsuki screamed out a loud, frustrated curse. He snatched the knife far away from Izuku’s throat and his body rocked forward.

Izuku didn’t flinch as the knife was lodged into the floor next to his ear.

He stared wide eyed in shock at Katsuki who was staring right back with the same emotion. Tears steadily fell down on him over and over. Soon, they mixed in with his own.

“I—I can’t.” Katsuki’s voice broke in the most heartbreaking way. “I c-can’t do it.”

Katsuki’s face twisted and contorted with disbelief. He clutched the handle of his blade fiercely. His trembling fingers grasped tightly over the area where his mother’s name was etched.

His eyes were torn between love and hate. Guilt and rage. He struggled back and forth trying to decide which emotion would ultimately win. Then the victor finally showed itself: it was none other than sadness, draped in the years of grief Katsuki had never processed.

Katsuki’s face crumbled along with all his terrifying armor. All his walls of anger came crashing down as his body trembled like an earthquake. Katsuki screwed his eyes shut and turned his head shamefully away from Izuku. He choked out several, muffled cries as he bit his lip.

Then Katsuki hunched over Izuku, weeping. He rested their foreheads together.

All the anger inside of him boiled down. It evaporated into the air to reveal grief and mourning sitting heavy at the bottom of his body. It was dragging him down and he couldn’t lift his limbs.

Katsuki lowered his head into the crook of Izuku’s neck and his free hand threaded through Izuku’s hair softly.

“Wh-Why can’t I d-do it?” Katsuki cried as he clutched the handle of his blade tighter.

They both wondered why at that moment. It should’ve been so clear cut to kill the other. They both had plenty of opportunities, but they never did all these years. Because while Izuku was always faster and Katsuki was always stronger, they both were always weak for the other.

Izuku wrapped his shaking arms around Katsuki’s trembling body.

Izuku pulled him in close for an embrace, and Katsuki accepted it. Izuku held Katsuki as they both cried. He was unsure of what was going to happen after this. But all he knew right now was that he needed to comfort Katsuki for this single fleeting moment.

Then Katsuki's head shifted up. Their noses brushed from the close proximity. They looked at each other, eyes locked.

A split second of silence.

There was a primal pull at the base of Izuku's core. It was stronger than two magnets near each other, surged with the need to connect. As they held eye contact, all their high-strung emotions fused and snapped them together.

Izuku let out a shaky, unsteady breath. Katsuki's hand in his hair gripped tighter. Izuku's fingers dug into Katsuki's shoulders. Their breaths quickened together. Then they both closed their eyes right as Katsuki lowered his head and Izuku tilted his head up.

They locked into a ferocious kiss and together they tipped right over the deep end.

Chapter End Notes

(「•-•)「 pops bottle of champagne while I lock my doors 🍾

Thank you all so much for reading!! Let me know what you think below— 💜💜💜

Chapter 30: Fortepiano

Chapter Summary

> Fortepiano (Volume) — To play loudly then immediately play softly.
>
> Izuku and Katsuki have it out.

Chapter Notes

> Hellooo!! Welcome back to this choochoo train of angst :) This is a long awaited chapter! First, big thank you to LOML, Luna for betaing like always! She's a powerhouse 💜 Secondly, thank you all so much for your comments 🥹❤️ everyone is so kind! You're all awesome!
>
> Without further wait, here is the chapter :)
>
> Warnings: That looming "Knife Play" tag thats been sitting there forever finally comes into action in this chapter

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 30 — Fortepiano

.

.

.

As they pulled each other impossibly closer, Izuku's lightheaded mind flooded with mixed emotions.

Katsuki kissing him felt like a fleeting dream after so long. He trembled with the fact that Katsuki couldn't kill him. After all this time, he was just like Izuku. This groundbreaking fact reinforced all his beliefs about Katsuki. It made him press deeper into the kiss and his lucidity was buried under all the heavy emotions he was feeling.

His credulous heart seized the moment, not listening to his logic as they melted together.

The salty taste of their tears mixed in with the kiss as they plunged further into oblivion. Push and pull. Grab and clutch. They feverishly latched together like they needed the other more than air.

He had never experienced a kiss like this with Katsuki. They shared passionate kisses, soft kisses, even shy ones. But this kiss was staggeringly different. It was rough like nails and Izuku could taste the desperation sitting on the edge of both of their tongues.

When Katsuki grabbed his neck, warmth surged from the tip of Izuku's fingers all the way down towards his toes.

The growing heat mixed in with all his heightened emotions. His adrenaline became craving. His desperation twisted into want. And his terror transformed into exhilaration. It all swirled together into one final thought: he needed Katsuki. Now.

Izuku began grinding up on him. In response, Katsuki began harshly grinding down.

A breathy gasp was pushed out of Izuku's lips and into Katsuki's mouth. Katsuki did it again and again, pulling more breathless moans out of Izuku that he swallowed eagerly. Soon, this rhythmic movement became desperate rutting that was making Izuku flat out moan.

Tingles of pleasure began igniting like flames all over his skin. Izuku needed more. He wrapped his arms and legs around Katsuki, locking him in as they rocked. Then Katsuki gripped the nape of Izuku's hair in a tight hold and began rubbing their growing erections together fiercely.

Heat sparked awake like a fire being quickly fanned. Izuku gave a heady, light gasp as they began to frot frantically. He whined as his cock pulsed with waves of addictive pleasure and grew to a full hard-on.

The lingering fear began to hold hands with his pleasure. Together, his nerves spiked to new highs as he willingly offered himself up to Katsuki.

They broke apart for air only for a moment. The next second they were back to drowning the other.

Katsuki forcefully tilted Izuku's head and deepened the kiss. Izuku eagerly opened his mouth and allowed their tongues to slide against each other. They began moving their clothed erections together sensually, with purpose.

It was maddening. Izuku needed Katsuki closer. Katsuki needed to destroy Izuku. Both of their bodies ached to be buried in rapture. Izuku began rocking his hips upwards like an animal in heat, whimpering as they dry humped recklessly.

Katsuki pulled away from the kiss with Izuku's bottom lip caught between his teeth. Izuku hissed as Katsuki bit down, drawing a bit of blood. He sat up with Katsuki as Katsuki pulled hard. The pain trickled in, and with it a new type of euphoria. It pulsed in tiny hot white flashes as Katsuki kept his flesh between his teeth.

Katsuki let go of his lip and a tiny bit of Izuku's blood was coated on his mouth. He wiped it off his lips with the back of his hand. Izuku licked the blood up from his bottom lip, coating his palate in the taste of iron.

Katsuki's eyes darkened as Izuku's tongue darted out slowly.

After that, Katsuki began working quickly. He shrugged off his jacket and snatched off his shirt. The bullet wound from where Izuku had shot him was smeared with blood, but Katsuki moved as if he didn't feel it. He undid his pants' button and Izuku began to undress as well.

Izuku flung off his jacket like it was burning him. But when he made a move to remove his shirt, Katsuki's hand shot out.

Suddenly the point of Katsuki's knife was at the base of his chin.

Izuku froze and his breath hitched.

The sharp end of the blade nicked him a bit. Izuku carefully assessed Katsuki as an unexpected rush poured into him.

His vicious husband was inspecting him like he was prey.

Frightening red eyes began to roam his body and Izuku shuddered under the gaze. It felt like Katsuki's stare alone was burning right through his clothes. Katsuki then homed in on Izuku's bulging erection. He applied pressure to his knife a bit, and Izuku exhaled heavily through his nose.

His cock visibly jumped.

A cruel scoff erupted from Katsuki.

Deliberately, Katsuki leaned in until they nearly kissed. But they didn't. He stopped mere inches from Izuku's bleeding lip.

Katsuki's mouth twitched into an unkind smirk.

Izuku gasped as he was suddenly slammed backwards. Katsuki pinned him down to the ground again without any gentleness. Izuku barely saw the speed Katsuki worked with. Soon his husband had trapped both his wrists above his head with a single hand.

Izuku's heart skipped a beat when he looked up.

Katsuki looked as mean as could be.

Izuku's heart hammered as his ears thundered with his pulse. He squirmed as he became unexpectedly turned on further.

Katsuki tightened the grip on his wrists and moved to pull something out of his pants' pockets. Something small, translucent, and shiny came into view. When Izuku saw what it was, he held his breath. It was a zip tie.

Katsuki forcefully dragged him across the floor towards the bed.

He pinned Izuku down to the ground as he tied Izuku's hands to the leg of the bed frame.

He pulled the zip tie tight with force, and it cut into Izuku's skin slightly. Izuku's breathing quickened and his hard-on became painful.

He was scared, aroused, and intrigued. He squirmed on his back as his legs began shaking.

Katsuki held the knife up to his throat and then began to kiss him again. Anger as fiery as ten suns combined poured into the kiss. It seared Izuku's spirit as he welcomed it greedily. Katsuki nipped and sucked and Izuku hissed every time Katsuki meanly bit his lip.

Unhurriedly, Katsuki began to work his way down.

He scraped his teeth against Izuku's jaw, leaving the feeling of fire etched into Izuku's skin. He left various, possessive love bites as he kept his blade perched perfectly against Izuku's throat.

He moved his mouth down gradually, and he sucked hard at Izuku's pulse. Several dark hickeys were left in his wake that sent waves of pleasure straight down to Izuku's crotch. Izuku softly moaned as heat began to intensify between his legs and he ached to become undone.

Katsuki's teeth dragged down to Izuku's clavicle. He licked across his collar as if tasting him and Izuku strained against the zip tie at the tantalizing sensation.

He mewled in a way that made him burn with embarrassment but it egged Katsuki on. Katsuki rocked into him and sunk his teeth into his skin. Ripples of pleasure shot up Izuku's spine and his Adam's apple bobbed against the blade.

Izuku's body strung tight as he looked down at Katsuki.

Molten hot red eyes looked back up at him.

Katsuki moved the blade.

He dragged it down Izuku's abdomen at an excruciatingly slow pace. The sharp tip raked against Izuku leaving behind the feeling of an inferno. It teased him. Beckoned to him. Made him feel like his sanity slipped right through his own fingertips.

Katsuki took his time taking him apart as he circled his sensitive nipples with the blade. He followed the curve of Izuku's sides and languidly moved the blade as if he was ghosting out his name across Izuku's belly.

Then he hooked the blade under the end of Izuku's shirt.

Katsuki's eyes tethered to Izuku's.

With unnatural precision, Katsuki sliced Izuku's shirt open right down the middle. It fell open, exposing Izuku's already hardened nipples and heaving chest. The cold air of the room blanketed Izuku's skin and he began to squirm on the floor.

“K-Kacchan,” Izuku gasped as Katsuki latched onto his chest.

He moaned louder than before as Katsuki got to work. Katsuki began to litter his skin with possessive hickeys that matched the ones on his neck. Izuku groaned as Katsuki sucked and licked. He pulled at his flesh as he pressed the flat side of the knife against his abdomen.

It was cold, chilling, and downright terrifying. But Izuku loved it. He locked Katsuki in with his legs, urging on the tantalizing feeling. Everything about this was danger embodied—but it was just like Katsuki. Katsuki, Katsuki, Katsuki.

He moaned his husband’s name and closed his eyes as he became drunk on the feeling of Katsuki laying down dozens of hickeys. Then suddenly an unexpected pain hit him.

Izuku hissed as Katsuki bit down on his nipple then roughly sucked.

Izuku’s whole back arched off the floor as his legs shook. He harshly gasped as Katsuki kept going, not letting up. Izuku began calling out Katsuki’s name lewdly as Katsuki flicked his tongue and rolled the sensitive nub between his teeth.

Then a staggering cold touch hit the same bud. Izuku choked. His eyes flew open, and he looked down through his hazy vision.

Katsuki trapped Izuku’s sensitive nipple between his tongue and the dull side of the blade.

He lapped at the bud with his tongue and then immediately rubbed the flat side of the cold blade down on it. Izuku quaked. He was needy. Desperate even—feeling like he might explode.

Katsuki’s hungry eyes watched Izuku as he did this, and suddenly the deadly desire spiked between them. Katsuki moved to the other nipple and gave it the same, rough treatment. Izuku groaned from deep in his core as Katsuki swirled his tongue around his bud. Countless sweltering ripples of pleasure echoed down his limbs.

Izuku’s eyes fluttered closed as Katsuki continued to toy with his chest.

He jolted at every sudden movement, and then the blade shifted. It ran down the inside of his thigh and Izuku whimpered. He arched into the motion and spread his legs to welcome it.

Katsuki didn’t stop sucking on Izuku’s perked buds as his knife dropped low. He hooked the blade on the inside of Izuku’s pants’ leg and sliced upwards, just like he had done with the shirt. Izuku held his breath as Katsuki rolled his nipple between his teeth at the same time his clothing was shredded open.

His husband switched buds and pants’ legs. He did the same thing with more vigor. Izuku’s joggers were in pieces as they were cut clean off his body. His legs turned from trembling to outright shaking as the flat side of the blade inched up his muscular thighs.

Izuku’s chest became overwhelmingly sensitive as the knife crawled closer and closer to his boxers.

Then Katsuki pulled back from his chest, a trail of spit from his lip to Izuku's hardened bud following. He toyed with the knife a bit, like he was testing the resistance of Izuku's boxers against the sharp edge.

Izuku's half lidded eyes flickered back and forth between Katsuki and the blade.

Katsuki's mean expression deepened and Izuku's cock grew harder. His erection poked straight through the thin material of his boxers, so obvious now. It strained to be freed, twitching as pre-cum leaked out of him. Katsuki then moved his blade and pressed the flat side of his knife against Izuku's cock and rubbed it sensually.

Izuku softly moaned and spread his legs until he felt his muscles strain.

Katsuki rubbed Izuku's cock with the blade and Izuku felt like he was spiraling into madness.

With a feverish gasp, Izuku's eyes dilated fully as Katsuki cut his boxers off his body. His cock sprung free, and the shredded material fell to the side.

Izuku laid in the heap of his cut up clothes. He wiggled his arms that were above his head and squirmed slightly as his cock twitched more and more.

He was turned on so much it was hurting.

Katsuki's hungry eyes roamed his naked body. His husband then moved to finally take off Izuku's shoes and threw them elsewhere. He hooked his fingers on his own pants and boxers, pulling them down. In a fluid motion, he then undressed himself and his veiny cock hung free right in front of Izuku.

He began stroking himself, letting his pre-cum drip down onto Izuku's cock. Then he spat on his hand and began to pump Izuku vigorously.

Izuku screwed his eyes shut as Katsuki's large hand enclosed around his whole length.

There was no tenderness to it.

It was rough, hard, and it was full of too many emotions for Izuku to count. Izuku rotated between moaning and hissing as Katsuki squeezed his tip, pressing out a droplet of pre-cum. The spit worked only slightly and Izuku could feel a tremendous amount of friction—but he liked it. A scary amount.

Then with a loud groan from Katsuki, he captured Izuku's mouth again. They kissed hungrily as Katsuki switched from pumping him alone, to pumping their cocks together in a vigorous motion.

They both were drowned in gratification as they moaned into the sloppy kiss. Their pulsing lengths slotted together in feverish want. Katsuki squeezed their tips together and Izuku jolted against the zip tie as waves of elation crashed into him. Their dribbles of pre-cum mixed and Katsuki's thumb smeared the sensitive slit of Izuku's cock.

Izuku's toes curled, and his eyes rolled back.

"Th-There's lube—" Izuku gasped into the kiss, and his words were drowned in a hungry groan from Katsuki. "There's lube in the bottom drawer—"

Katsuki didn't stop kissing him or pumping their cocks as he dropped his knife. He began to clumsily fumble his hand towards the nightstand. He ripped open the bottom drawer and hastily felt around until he seized the bottle of lube.

They continued to kiss like they were lost in deep desolation as Katsuki uncapped the bottle with one hand. Izuku felt Katsuki's fingers start to head towards where he loved them the most.

He lifted his hips eagerly and Izuku keened when a generous amount of lube was applied to his awaiting hole. He waited for Katsuki's fingers to slip in as his body trembled with excitement.

But his eyes bulged wide when he felt the cold handle of Katsuki's knife press at his entrance.

Izuku's head snapped up but in the following second, Katsuki wrapped a hand around his throat and slammed his head back down.

Katsuki grabbed his neck in a lover's chokehold.

Izuku roughly exhaled as he was gagged. The handle began to slowly sink in, stretching him open. The danger of it coursed an extraordinary amount of adrenaline through him. With every inch his senses heightened, and Izuku began to feel instantly lightheaded from Katsuki's grasp around his throat.

Katsuki gripped the blade of his knife tightly and angled the handle down.

Izuku immediately gasped as his prostate was struck.

Euphoria lit up his nerves like blazing hot lightning. It captured him, making him tingle all over. Katsuki saw this and gripped his neck tighter, officially cutting off air flow.

Izuku began whimpering as Katsuki hit his sweet spot again and again until he found a rhythm. Every movement jolted him with a wave of mind-numbing pleasure that made his toes curl.

Katsuki's face twisted in a snarl as he bored his eyes into Izuku's sweet face that was contorted with ecstasy. Izuku's body rocked with every thrust and his eyes never left Katsuki's chilling gaze as he was roughly fucked on the handle.

All his limbs began to ignite with nonstop intoxicating rapture. It rolled over him in countless crashing waves that raced from his head to his toes. The sting of the zip tie around his wrists poured into him too, mixing with the elation.

Izuku's head began feeling like he was on cloud nine as Katsuki picked up the pace.

His orgasm built like a growing hellfire in his core with every thrust Katsuki gave. Heat so extreme that he thought he would explode from it. He gasped as a primal need deep inside of him awoke with every push in and pull out. It rattled his rib cage as he was brought closer and closer to the edge by Katsuki.

His belly stirred with fever as he tried to fuck back on the handle. He moaned past the grip around his delicate throat and arched his back as euphoria shot right into his bloodstream.

Izuku called to his husband in a choked-out gasp as his eyes began to roll back.

Katsuki was now feverishly fucking the handle relentlessly against his prostate. He made Izuku arch up and see stars. White dots danced across Izuku's vision as his head was filled with so much pleasure it made him dizzy. He screamed. He moaned. All his muscles tensed as his legs trembled violently.

Katsuki leaned over to watch Izuku's face be drowned in pleasure. He angled the handle just right to make Izuku jolt and quake more intensely. He observed, sadistically satisfied, as Izuku's hole tightened around the handle. Then he groaned when Izuku cried out his name like a wounded animal.

Izuku went cross eyed as he was overstimulated. He hiccupped and yanked against the zip tie several times, moving the bed with force as he tried to break free. Izuku blinked rapidly as his head overflowed with mind shattering pleasure.

What was building in the pits of Izuku's core wasn't like anything before.

He was caught at the highest level of blazing ecstasy as both fear and excitement held him up. He felt like any minute he could—

"—Cum," Katsuki harshly demanded. He pushed down the handle into Izuku's prostate with all his strength.

Izuku's body seized up.

His core tightened and the strong hold Katsuki held over him ripped his orgasm out of his body on command.

Izuku's feverish cries broke into a high, broken scream as he peaked. Ribbons of cum spurted out of his throbbing cock and landed across his chest. He sobbed loudly and his body convulsed violently at the unexpected orgasm that was ruthlessly fucked out of him.

Izuku's world went suddenly silent as temporary deafness cut into him. He blinked rapidly at the white noise that overtook his hearing.

His heart rate increased, and he rolled to his side, trying to curl up as he rode out his high.

Then he choked when the handle was replaced with Katsuki's thick cock in an instant. The difference in girth made Izuku moan loudly as Katsuki pushed in. There was zero time for recovery, his orgasm had barely finished, and his senses were being brutally overwhelmed again.

Katsuki grabbed his hair with one hand and with the other, he held the blade to Izuku's throat.

His body shook with unfathomable rapture as Katsuki struck directly against his prostate yet again. Katsuki did it again and again and again, not letting up for a single second as they began to fuck sideways on the ground.

Katsuki immediately set a brutal pace, overstimulating him.

Izuku's limp erection jolted back to life at the feeling of the knife against his throat. With every punch against his prostate, his weeping erection hardened until it was once again pulsing and upright.

The mixed sound of Katsuki's ragged breathing and his own messy cries were the first noises to breach his ears as his hearing came back. The lewd sound of their skin slapping together was next. With every thrust, Izuku's quivering lips spilled a mix of moans and Katsuki's name, as loud pleasure filled cries.

Katsuki's powerful thrusts began to fill with all his emotions.

Izuku felt the frustration, the hurt, the desire and the unchecked rage. With every ram into his sweet spot, Izuku took in every bit of Katsuki's soul. He welcomed all aspects of it as they melded together like two metals in a fire, fusing into one deadly weapon.

He was fucked thoroughly and without pause.

His second orgasm began to build, using the leverage of all his sweltering emotions. It climbed towards the ceiling, pulling him up with it. He pushed back on Katsuki the best he could, dragging the bed with him. Their movements became frenzied as Katsuki plunged in harder, then faster. He moved like he was trying to keep up with his emotions as he drove in and out of Izuku.

Then with a guttural groan, Katsuki gave several powerful staggered thrusts.

He pressed the blade tightly against Izuku's throat and gripped his hair as he came deep inside of him.

Izuku's legs quaked as he was filled up to the brim with Katsuki's cum. It poured across his insides and filled him with so much heat that his vision spotted white.

The euphoria came bombarding forward, ungracefully. It raked up from his toes to his core and down to his fingers. Then it coursed through his core and pulled him up to his second peak. Izuku helplessly cried as his cock spurted out dribbles of cum onto the carpet.

Katsuki cursed as he began grinding into Izuku like he couldn't stop. Izuku could feel he was still painfully hard. And because of that, his body responded like Katsuki's arousal was directly linked to his. His cock twitched again and again.

Izuku grinded backwards full of need. The blood pumping through his veins was filled with pure adrenaline as they rutted against each other.

Izuku heard Katsuki's heavy breathing increase. He then abruptly pulled out and stood up. He lifted the bed up with one hand and freed Izuku from his imprisonment from the bed's leg.

Izuku's rugged breathing grew heavier when instead of freeing his hands, Katsuki retightened the zip tie.

Katsuki then sat on the edge of the bed and planted his feet firmly against the floor.

He spread his legs and lifted Izuku up.

Izuku's head lulled as he was manhandled into Katsuki's lap in a reverse cowboy position. He bit his lip hard as his back hit Katsuki's solid chest and his husband's warm, wet cock slipped between his lubed-up backside.

Izuku barely had time to get his bearings before Katsuki gripped his waist and lifted him up. Izuku's body was hoisted up solely by Katsuki's unprecedented amount of strength. He held Izuku up and then perfectly aligned his tip with Izuku's cum filled hole. Katsuki sank Izuku back onto his awaiting length in a swift motion.

They both moaned loudly as Izuku clenched down in excitement.

Katsuki possessively grabbed a fist full of Izuku's hair with one hand and gripped Izuku's hip with the other in a bruising hold.

Izuku screwed his eyes shut and dropped his mouth as Katsuki began to bounce him up and down. Katsuki maneuvered him easily, like he weighed next to nothing. Izuku moaned loudly as his overused prostate was hit every time, and the sensitivity rippled across his body like rolling thunder. He twitched and jolted and begged for more with quivering limbs.

Every brutal thrust punched out a broken cry from his bleeding lips.

He twisted his hands against the zip tie as Katsuki held on possessively to his hair. Katsuki fucked him harder, faster, and began slamming his hips up to add to the merciless rhythm.

Sweat began dripping profusely all over them as their orgasm began to build again.

Izuku shook uncontrollably as he felt his body become close to putty. Cum dripped down his thighs and he greedily wanted so much more of it to fill him up. He clamped down on Katsuki's pulsing cock and a loud groan from his husband spilled into the air. Izuku did it again and the same response was elicited.

Then when Izuku did it a third time, Katsuki yanked his head back until Izuku choked.

Katsuki pounded into him so viciously that Izuku's whole body was encased with searing hot rapture. It pressed against his core like a blazing hot hand and ripped his next orgasm out of him without hesitation.

Izuku came dry with a scream loud enough to fray his vocal cords. He clamped down on the thick cock inside of him and Katsuki groaned loudly.

Katsuki seized up as he gave one, two, three more ruthless thrusts into Izuku. He held his final thrust up off the bed as he spilled his essence inside of Izuku's tight body. They both gasped as the feeling of hot cum mixed in with the rest that was already inside.

Katsuki dropped back down and fell backwards. Izuku toppled over and they both sighed loudly. Izuku's chest heaved up and down as he tried to catch his breath. His world was spinning, and he was sure he was about to be fucked into oblivion.

Without pulling out, Katsuki rolled their bodies to the middle of the bed and pressed Izuku belly down. Izuku's head hit the soft pillow as he breathed steadily in and out, sweat rolling down all parts of his body.

"We're very far from done, Deku," Katsuki roughly hissed against the shell of his ear. He grinded his hips down in a sensual wind, making Izuku's eyes flutter closed. "Bite a pillow if you need to."

When Katsuki's teeth sunk into his neck, it clicked why passion was always compared to fire. Passion was as insatiable as fire because it needed to endlessly consume in order to stay alive.

So Izuku let Katsuki consume him. He let Katsuki devour him with savage kisses, harsh love bites and possessive tugs of his hair. Every lick, flick, and stroke were a burning need that charred away parts of him—and Izuku wanted to be singed down into nothing.

Katsuki grabbed the headboard and began to fuck him like he hated him.

And Izuku fucked back like he needed it, teeth sinking in the pillow until it ripped.

ɯɯɯ

Izuku awoke to the bright blinding light of the sun spilling into the motel room.

He groaned and shifted while screwing his eyes shut. He sheepishly turned over, facing away from the window as it showered him in sun rays. Instinctively, he put his hand over his eye to block out the light so he could go back to sweet sleep. But he removed his hand slowly when all the events of the previous night came crashing into him gracelessly.

Izuku startled upright, surprised that it was daylight out.

How long had he been asleep? Out of habit, he checked his wrist for the watch that was not there. He winced at the reflex and then tried to search for a clock on the nightstand—but it was laying on the ground next to him, broken.

Izuku began to reorient himself.

He was on the ground, lying tangled in a heap of sheets.

Scattered across the carpet were dozens of glass fragments. They caught the light and sparkled in a threateningly beautiful way.

Izuku then cringed as he looked at the damage to the motel room. All the pictures were knocked off the wall. The bed was moved entirely out of place and slanted downwards. One of the bed's legs had broken because halfway through the night it had buckled under their powerful movements.

In short, the room had been demolished. If someone were to see this same sight, they likely would guess a fearsome storm tore through, leaving nothing whole in its wake. But it was not a storm.

Simply Izuku and Katsuki.

Their outlet of pent-up emotions resulted in hours of sex Izuku didn't think was humanly possible. He recalled the several rounds they had in the bed, against the walls, in the bathroom, and finally on the floor where he was at because at the end, they couldn't make it back to the bed.

Izuku glanced over his shoulder.

On the ground with him in the sheets was Katsuki. He was sitting upright against the wall with his arms folded. From the looks of it, he had been awake for a while. His shoulder from where Izuku had shot him had been wrapped up and tended to. He was chewing on his bottom lip as he stared blankly across the room at the discolored wallpaper.

Izuku moved to join him and immediately flinched when soreness shot up his back.

Izuku gasped lightly and made a pained face. His legs were screaming, and his back muscles were gone. He tried to delicately scoot himself upright, but sitting on his backside was straight out of the question. Instead, he settled for resting on his side. He propped himself up with one arm shakily.

He wasn't going to be able to sit right potentially for a week.

Izuku didn't know what to say. This was not what he anticipated happening at all. Far from it, honestly. And judging the way Katsuki was being silent, he didn't anticipate it either.

Katsuki seemed torn between two thoughts that had him in shackling, vice grips. Izuku could practically see Katsuki be physically tugged back and forth.

Izuku didn't blame him. His current emotional state was no better.

The number of mixed feelings twisting awake inside of him was countless. He couldn't even identify half of what he was feeling. It was all one big pile of mush inside of his chest, but all he knew was that he and Katsuki were finally back in each other's orbit—and the gravitational pull was lethally strong.

Katsuki shifted.

He raked a hand through his hair and gripped his roots in frustration. He glanced at Izuku once, stood up and kicked the sheets off to the side.

Izuku's heart clutched as Katsuki began putting on his clothes.

Katsuki kept his back turned towards him as he halfway dressed in his shirt and boxers. He then leaned against the wall across the way from where Izuku was at.

Izuku's heart palpitated.

Katsuki put distance between them.

Izuku now had no clue what was going to happen next. Was Katsuki going to resume hunting him? Was he going to use this weakened moment to kill Izuku while his guard was down and could barely stand? Or was he going to leave him here, and never bother with him again?

The last one seemed like the worst as Izuku stared at Katsuki.

Katsuki stared at him too.

They locked eyes and a sudden onslaught of emotions leaked out. Hurt. Pain. Anger. Longing. Each of these emotions took up too much space in the room, making it feel suffocatingly tight.

Izuku tried to smile, but the gesture wasn't returned. Instead, Katsuki pursed his lips to the side and fiddled with his fingers.

It was here that Izuku thought he heard a noise outside that sounded like a human.

His paranoia spiked because it could very well be Tomura or one of Chisaki's men finally catching up with them after who knows how long has passed.

Izuku skittishly looked at the window, glancing through the sheer curtain for any suspicious shadows.

Katsuki noticed this and followed his gaze.

They both waited a beat and the noise returned.

Izuku relaxed when he registered the sound was the wind simply rustling the trees. False alarm. He visibly deflated and Katsuki raised an eyebrow at him.

"So," Katsuki said simply. He cleared his throat and continued to idly toy with his hands. "Who else are you running from besides me that has you this jumpy?"

Izuku was having difficulty reading what exactly was happening.

There was a wall as high as the ceiling surrounding Katsuki. His eyes were a little blank, and he barely could maintain eye contact now. But Katsuki also seemed…receptive? At least he was talking to him now and not swinging a blade.

Izuku's hopeful heart thumped as he nervously fidgeted with the sheets below him.

“I-I’m likely being hunted by both the Shie Hassaikai and my family now,” Izuku confessed but then cringed. He tilted his head and made a small correction, “rather, the people who used to be my family, I suppose. The Viper Academy. Both are possibly coming for me.”

Katsuki furrowed his brow at that but still didn’t look up. “What did you do for that to happen?”

Izuku now looked down at the sheets. He pressed his lips in a thin line and said, “I stopped an order of the Shie Hassaikai. And in the process, I slaughtered a large chunk of other assassins from my academy. I haven’t run into either the Yakuza or Vipers yet but…it’s only a matter of time.”

Izuku lifted his gaze to look at Katsuki, and Katsuki still was looking down.

“What constitutes a large chunk?” Katsuki asked.

“Over twenty of my siblings,” Izuku answered.

At this, Katsuki’s distant demeanor broke. He whipped his head up, entirely surprised by what he heard.

“Twenty?” Katsuki parroted.

Izuku nodded slowly.

“I-I didn’t know many of them,” Izuku amended, but it still made him feel sad. “My unit was always sectioned off from everyone. But I had to kill three from my unit who I was close with the same night of the masquerade. My older brother, older sister, and my favorite brother, who I thought might be capable of saving. But he wasn’t.”

Katsuki was startled and his eyes stretched wide.

“What made you snap like that?” Katsuki whispered a bit sadly.

Izuku looked Katsuki seriously in the eye now. “At the masquerade, five of the people you killed were members of the Chisaki family. That set off a chain reaction and I had no choice but to intervene.”

Katsuki didn’t seem at all remorseful. He asked, “What kind of chain reaction?”

“A deadly one,” Izuku muttered. “Chisaki Kai is furious about his family members being killed, Katsuki. He figured out you did the massacre and wanted to even the score with the traditional Yakuza punishment: a life for a life. A family member for a family member. But you don’t have any family. Except—” Izuku paused, sucked in a breath and reluctantly pointed to himself. “—Me. Legally.”

At this Katsuki grew visibly confused. “We’re not related.”

“Our, ah, marriage,” Izuku muttered with a light blush. “It makes us legally family.”

“Oh.” Katsuki’s whole face sparked with realization. He nodded dumbly. “Right. We’re family. Legally.”

“The marriage certificate was on the public records, and he found it,” Izuku continued to explain. “Because of that, he jumped to the conclusion I had a helping hand in plotting to kill his family and maybe other Vipers. He decided five Vipers had to be killed to balance the scales. A-And then my brother offered to kill the five kids we have.”

Katsuki’s face distorted as if his stomach turned.

“Who thinks of something like that?” Katsuki hissed, disgusted.

“Tomura.”

Izuku spat his brother’s name with so much resentment that even Katsuki seemed taken back. He thought back to when his callous brother told him the kids were going to be killed. How simple it would’ve been for him. Izuku was becoming increasingly jaded as he recounted the indifference in Tomura’s eyes.

“My big brother Tomura thinks of something like that,” Izuku hissed, and his throat began to feel sore. “And I-I couldn’t let that happen. I couldn’t. I would burn down the whole city of Tokyo before I ever let that happen. So, I killed them. I killed every single snake that stood in my way, got the kids and ran.”

He waited for his throat to clamp up like always when he spoke of things he shouldn’t.

But to his surprise, it didn’t. It was slightly looser for once. The words were flowing with some resistance, but they were not trapped in his airway like they used to be. Izuku was stunned. He examined his emotions and felt his bitterness towards Tomura had grown.

It seemed like the less of an influence Tomura had on him, the more Izuku was able to find his voice.

“And where are the kids now?” Katsuki asked.

“They’re all safe with Nana,” Izuku explained sadly. “She’s taking them home to their families. I-I had luckily found her rather quickly thanks to your help. You, uh, figured out the bulk of the work and I just put in the last piece. Her alias was One For All. I tracked her down and we talked. Then she agreed to help reunite them with their families that they were stolen from. So, even if the Yakuza or Vipers find me, the kids will be safe no matter what.”

Katsuki’s eyes softened with every word Izuku spoke. He was touched, and Izuku could feel it. The blankness in his face receded back to show residual love.

Izuku’s heart skipped a beat.

The affection was so warm as it shined through Katsuki’s eyes. It beckoned to him and all Izuku wanted to do was jump forward.

“You did good,” Katsuki whispered. He squeezed his hands together and gave a pained, short head nod. “I’m…I’m really proud of you.”

“Thank you,” Izuku said quietly.

They held gazes for a long moment and Katsuki blinked back oncoming tears. He pushed the heel of his hand into his watery eye and then hung his head down. His hair shadowed his face as he went back to fidgeting.

Izuku wearily assessed Katsuki as his heart yearned for him. Izuku then sat up a bit more, wincing at the soreness in his backside. He nervously clutched the sheets in his lap.

“But—Katsuki. That’s not all,” Izuku said. “You’re in danger too.”

Katsuki scoffed and shook his head tiredly. “I’ll be fine.”

“No, Katsuki,” Izuku warned seriously and shook his head. “You won’t be. Chisaki very explicitly demanded he wants you killed for what you did at the Masquerade. Chisaki kills people who harm his family in creative ways. He’s the head of the Shie Hassaikai for a reason. He overhauled seven other Yakuza families and absorbed them into his own in a very violent, sadistic fashion. You need to be extremely careful. You’re in just as much danger as I am.”

“Chisaki is the one that needs to be careful,” Katsuki grumbled under his breath. “I’m more capable than you think.”

Katsuki didn’t seem the least bit threatened or worried. They awkwardly waded in a bit of silence. It was like they were both congested with too many emotions to pick out what exactly to say to the other. Then finally Katsuki exhaled and shook his head.

“Well. What is your next move, Izuku?” Katsuki asked quietly.

“I guess I’m going to keep it moving,” Izuku confessed in a small voice.

He studied Katsuki longingly. Izuku was suddenly trapped at those crossroads.

Izuku quietly confessed, “Um, Nana offered me a spot to go with her. She said she could help me get out permanently, like you wanted me to do originally. B-But that won’t be for another two months.”

There was a long pause.

Katsuki’s shoulders stiffened.

“Are you going to take it?” Katsuki asked.

“I-I’m halfway considering it,” Izuku whispered honestly. “That’s my only option if I want to live an okay life, right? I can’t go back to Tokyo, and I have nowhere else to go. Especially after all the killings I’ve done, I likely need protecting to cover up my past. Th-There’s no place for me anymore.”

Katsuki didn't say a word for a very long time. Instead, he kept his head hung away from Izuku. His shoulders were growing stiffer by the second as he processed the information.

"Are you sure?" Katsuki asked. His voice was low and quiet. "That's what you want to do?"

Izuku took a long pause as well. Something about this felt wrong.

But still, he said, "I think it is."

Another tense long pause.

"Okay," Katsuki said. His voice was tight. "Let me help you then."

Izuku perked up, and love leapt out of his chest. He stared at Katsuki who still had his head down. Izuku's heart began pounding and the drumming of his pulse shot through his ears.

"R-Really?" Izuku whispered, hoping this wasn't some cruel trick. "You want to help me?"

"Yeah," Katsuki said. He wrung his hands tighter. "Just lay low for two months, right? We can figure out a way to stay out of sight together. I can withdraw some cash to help us go dark and I have my motorcycle we can get around on easily. It'll be safer with the two of us rather than you trying to do this alone."

Izuku searched Katsuki's body language to see if he was being genuine.

But it was hard since Katsuki was still being standoffish. However, Izuku figured Katsuki was being like this for a rightful reason. Clearly even with the explanation in his letter, Katsuki had still been so deeply hurt by everything.

"Thank you, Katsuki," Izuku said gratefully. "Nana gave me the address for a place I could stay at in the meantime. It's called Midnight Sento, it's in a small town not too terribly far from here. It's a bathhouse run by someone she knows who can house us."

"This is nice of her," Katsuki muttered. But then he pursed his lips and tilted his head. "But realistically, you're going to need better security than laying low at a bathhouse. If you're going to stay out of their hands for two whole months, you need protection. Likely from trained, lethal bodyguards. I know my ex-supervisor has a safe harbor not too far from here. You'll be better protected in a place with other hitmen who are trained similarly to me."

Izuku chewed his bottom lip.

Katsuki was right.

Nana, while kind, did not have the same training to go up against forces like the ones he needed to stay away from. To depend on her associate, who he didn't know very well, would be risky. The friend could be just as kind, but kindness wouldn't be able to stop the Yakuza or Vipers.

Katsuki, however, had worked bodyguard assignments all his life. His company dealt in both lethal and protective services, and that was perfect for what Izuku needed.

“Would your ex-supervisor be okay with me using his safe house?” Izuku asked nervously. “Last I checked your old company also had a kill order on me.”

“I’m sure that’s settled by now. But if it’s not, I’ll just beg him,” Katsuki grumbled. “The old man has a soft spot for me.”

“Thank you so much, Katsuki.” Izuku then smiled sadly. “But what are you going to do? I know you think you can take on Chisaki head on, but he has a lot of connections all over Japan. Getting close to him isn’t going to be a simple thing—and neither is getting away. Y-You might need Nana’s help disappearing too now,” Izuku suggested meekly. “It’s something you should consider.”

“The only thing I am considering is killing Chisaki,” Katsuki pushed back with a bite. “You don’t need to worry about me, Izuku. I can handle myself just fine. I've taken care of myself my whole life. The only thing you need to worry about is laying low. So. Let’s get a move on to that safe house.”

The tone was sharp.

Izuku averted his eyes down to his lap and backed off.

“Okay.” Izuku nodded quietly. “Thank you again for being willing to help.”

“Don’t mention it.”

Katsuki reached over into his backpack, pulled out his navy-blue phone and flipped it open.

“I’ll be right back. I’m going to go make the call to get us set up,” Katsuki said. “Start getting ready to head out.”

“O-Okay.”

Katsuki stood up, grabbed his pants and put them on. He fastened the buttons and then headed to the door. He didn’t spare a look back as he walked, began dialing a number, opened the door and shut it.

While Katsuki was on the phone, Izuku was suffering from whiplash.

It was making his head spin how much Katsuki had simmered down. But even more so—his mind was reeling from the fact that Katsuki couldn’t kill him. He had the perfect opportunity, and he couldn’t do it. Even with Izuku trying to guide him to it.

In the end, Katsuki was just like Izuku.

But even more surprising, Izuku hadn’t expected this offer to help him. It seemed odd, and Izuku felt deeply undeserving of it. Because really, Katsuki didn’t need to do this. He could leave him at this hotel and decide Izuku was a thing of the past.

But instead, Katsuki was helping him.

How soft Kacchan was. Even through all this hurt, he still was abundantly soft at the core.

As he thought about all of this, Izuku tried to clean up despite his aching backside.

He felt bad for the motel owners. Him and Katsuki really did always leave a mess whenever they collided. Izuku neatly put the sheets back on the bed, and carefully put all the glass shards into a pile. He hung the pictures back up and winced when they immediately fell.

Next, he showered and got dressed in some of the clothes Nana provided him. He did his best to scrub out the blood in his winter coat. A faint stain was left though. No matter how much he tried to scrub out the red tint, a hint of it was still there.

By the time Katsuki finished his call, Izuku was waiting politely on the side of the bed.

Katsuki entered the room apprehensively. He met Izuku's gaze for about five seconds, then averted his eyes.

"Let's head out," Katsuki said quietly. He grabbed his coat and didn't bother to shower. "We're already going to be pushing it. The safe house is located on Oshima Island, which is fairly far south. It's about a five-hour drive, and the last ferry out to the island is in six hours."

Izuku nodded in understanding. "Okay."

He grabbed his duffle bag and stood up, ready to leave.

Katsuki began walking out of the room and Izuku followed behind him.

As they walked outside, Izuku noted how it was getting colder. Winter was approaching a bit faster than usual this year, and Izuku kept relating it back to bad omens. He tried not to shiver when some of the fierce wind snuck into his coat.

When they reached Katsuki's motorcycle, Katsuki began to unlock one of the storage compartments that was hooked on the side. He popped it open to reveal his backpack. Then he shuffled through all that to grab a black helmet. He handed it to Izuku without meeting his eye.

"Remember to hang on tight and lean with me," Katsuki said distantly. He kept his eyes focused on Izuku's neck that was covered in hickeys, refusing to look up at him. "If you need to pee, just tap me on the shoulder."

"Okay," Izuku said in acknowledgment.

Katsuki then turned around and began putting on his own helmet.

As he did this, Izuku's heart hurt a bit.

There was a specific pain that came with Katsuki not meeting his gaze.

Izuku followed the pull in his heart and reached his hand out. But when he saw how tense Katsuki's shoulders were, he stopped himself. He retracted his hand and clutched it to his chest. Izuku, disheartened, looked down to the ground.

He put his helmet on while gazing at the back of Katsuki's head. Katsuki got on the bike, punched in his GPS and started up the engine. He kicked the stand up in a fluid motion and Izuku began to secure his duffle bag to his person.

Izuku hopped on the back of Katsuki's motorcycle and immediately winced. He awkwardly shifted forward to ease some of the pressure from his tailbone and hooked his arms around Katsuki's midsection.

Immediately Katsuki tensed under his touch.

Izuku's stomach sank.

He bit his lip and quietly asked, "D-Do you want to talk?"

Or scream. Or yell, Izuku thought. Anything other than this.

"No." Katsuki rejected.

Izuku grew hesitant, but he had no time to disagree. Katsuki took off and Izuku held on tightly to him. They rode off at a swift speed in silence with the roaring winds following them.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The whole trip went smoothly because, well, Katsuki refused to engage with him.

It was hard to have a rocky time when there was no conversation. Izuku did his best not to say anything about it. He wasn't exactly in a position to push Katsuki into doing anything. But it was hard to ignore how much it hurt to be stone-walled by Katsuki.

The part of him that loved Katsuki more than air wanted to mend things—but the reasonable side of him told him to shut up and be grateful. He killed this man's mother who he loved dearly. It was a miracle Katsuki wasn't still trying to murder him for his part in everything.

So. Izuku didn't say anything.

During pit stops they didn't speak.

During the ride they didn't talk.

Even at red lights, not a word was exchanged.

Katsuki didn't meet his gaze at all and Izuku felt like he was being strangled in a much crueler way now.

They had about an hour left currently before they reached the port. At this rate, they were going to make the ferry—but as if fate had seen everything running a bit too smoothly, a literal obstacle fell into their path.

Both Izuku and Katsuki frowned when the traffic grew denser into the rural region they were heading towards. Izuku peaked from over Katsuki's shoulder and saw a long string of cars all sitting impatiently.

The sun was going down, yet no one was moving.

"What the hell is going on?" Katsuki harshly whispered as they came to a complete halt.

Katsuki tilted slightly and it was here they witnessed cars beginning to turn around and go other directions. Others began following those vehicles, and soon there were a handful of people turning back.

"Oh, fuck this," Katsuki muttered. "Let me go see what the holdup is."

Without wasting time, Katsuki began maneuvering his bike through the narrow spaces between cars. He earned some honks in the process but didn't give a single damn. He flippantly waved people off as he pushed through.

Izuku smiled a bit, he missed this. He always adored Katsuki's slightly crass attitude when it came to getting things done.

Katsuki cut his way through the traffic to reach the source of the problem. And when they did, it made both of their mouths drop wide with shock.

Police were everywhere, urging impatient people to back up.

Behind the officers on the narrow road was a string of trees that had toppled over. Their roots were torn from the ground, looking like a giant had tried to pluck them up. Amid all the blown over trees were several cars, trapped. They were piled up in a crash and one looked like it had rolled over entirely.

One officer with a notepad approached them when they saw Katsuki inch a bit too close. He put his hands up and motioned for them to back up.

"Sorry, but I'm going to need you to turn around like everyone else," the officer said firmly. "This road is closed. The high winds caused the trees to overturn and, in the process, trapped a couple of cars."

"Is there any way we can just get through?" Katsuki asked. He looked behind the officer at the chaos. "We're on a motorcycle we can weave around the debris—"

"—Sorry. No exceptions. You're going to have to turn around."

“But we need to go this way, it’s the only direct path there. We’re going to miss the ferry in the next hour.”

“I’m sorry sir, I can’t help you,” the officer reinforced. “The only thing we can suggest is following the rest of the detour. You’ll have to go around the mountain pass to get to where you need to go.”

The police officer pointed in the entirely opposite direction. Katsuki looked behind him at the rows and rows of cars now stuck in traffic trying to go the other way. He groaned loudly and dropped his head.

“You’ve got to be fucking kidding me,” Katsuki spat. But he did as he was instructed. “Always fucking something.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

They made it to the ferry too late.

Izuku bit his lip and Katsuki cursed loudly as they saw the boat take off right as they arrived. They stared at it and Izuku suddenly now felt nervous. The sun had set fully. It had officially been three days since he ran away, and that meant Tomura was likely drawing closer with each passing second.

Katsuki frustratingly put down the kick stand with his foot and hopped off the bike.

Izuku took off his helmet and shook his hair and then swung his legs over to one side of the bike. He leaned against it apprehensively, watching as their ferry sailed away without them into the dark ocean.

So much for getting to safety by the end of the night.

Izuku turned his attention to Katsuki.

Izuku watched as the agitated man snatched off his helmet and began typing in something on his navy-blue phone. He scrolled a bit angrily. Then he gave a long, tired sigh.

“Well. That really was the last ferry out to the island,” Katsuki announced, entirely annoyed. He held his helmet between his arm and his hip and leaned his weight onto one foot. “The next one isn’t going to be until 07:00 in the morning. We’re going to have to spend the night somewhere in the meantime.”

“At least we’re where we need to be,” Izuku tacked on, attempting to look on the bright side.

He gazed out to the land mass in the dark distance. His heart fluttered at the sight. His safety was just across that horizon. They were so close yet so far.

He turned his eyes to Katsuki, who still wouldn’t meet his gaze. Izuku tried to ignore how that made his heart clutch.

“Let’s hurry and grab a hotel,” Katsuki said. “I think I saw one back that way.”

“Erm, would it be okay if we do not go to a hotel?” Izuku asked in a single breath.

“What else would we do, sleep in the trees?” Katsuki asked sarcastically. “You got something against sleeping on a bed all of a sudden?”

Izuku winced and said, “I’ve been thinking about how a hotel room is hard to escape once you get cornered in it.”

At that, Katsuki scoffed under his breath. “You don’t say?”

“I would just feel better if we were in a place that’s a bit more likely not to get checked,” Izuku continued, ignoring the attitude. “I feel like motels and hotels are the first place the Vipers and Yakuza would look for us. Let’s try somewhere that wouldn’t be easy to guess.”

“So, you want to sleep in an abandoned building is essentially what you’re saying?”

“No. It doesn’t have to be an abandoned building. But maybe just not another sketchy motel.”

Katsuki sucked at his teeth. He rolled his eyes a bit then nodded as if he did agree. He gazed past Izuku tiredly into the dark distance.

“I think I saw what looked like a water tower not too far from here,” Katsuki suggested. “We can go there if that’ll make you more comfortable. It’s secluded, a good shelter from this bitter ass cold, and no one would be looking for us in there, I’m sure.”

Izuku perked up.

“That would work perfectly.” Izuku nodded. He held his arm and tilted his head at Katsuki. “Thank you for, ah, listening to me.”

Katsuki shrugged. “Yeah, whatever.”

Izuku chewed on his cheek.

His chest was beginning to feel uncomfortably tight. The pain inside of him was growing stronger the longer Katsuki was this frigidly withdrawn.

He couldn’t stop himself from what he did next. Katsuki had been looking down to the ground, and Izuku tried to tilt his head to meet Katsuki’s line of vision—but Katsuki turned his head away before they could connect gazes.

Izuku was stunned at the ornery action.

Katsuki put his helmet back on, slightly irritated. He got back on the bike and pushed up the kickstand.

“Let’s go,” Katsuki said distantly. “It’s getting late.”

Izuku hesitantly got back on the bike too. He shuffled in close, and the warmth from Katsuki's body heat contrasted the cold shoulder he was dealing with.

As he hooked his arms around Katsuki, once again, Katsuki stiffened.

Izuku's heart began singing a sad hymn.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they made it to the abandoned water tower, it was exactly what Katsuki said: secluded.

It was tall, rusted over a bit and there was a long, intimidating ladder that led to the top. Katsuki parked his bike off to the side in a row of nearly barren bushes and pulled out his backpack from the storage compartment. He hooked it over his shoulder and gestured with his head for Izuku to follow him.

They climb up the wobbly ladder with Katsuki leading.

The whole way up, the wind howled, pushing at higher speeds the further up they went.

When they finally made it to the top, they found themselves on a metal walkway. It circled all the way around the cylinder structure. Izuku stopped to look out across the horizon while Katsuki began searching for a way in.

He couldn't help but want to take in the sights.

He could see out across the small city they were in, and he wondered briefly if this could be some of his last moments in Japan. From up here, Izuku could see sprinkles of white and yellow light spilling from windows scattered across the night scene. There was sparse greenery in between all the small buildings that was slowly dying with the oncoming winter.

His eyes gazed up to the vast sky above.

The darkness here was deeper than any of the major cities, allowing for a clear view of the constellations. All the stars and planets mirrored dazzling glitter dusted across the atmosphere like a painting. Izuku turned his head to look over towards the ocean. His hair tussled with the breeze as he noted the water perfectly reflected the sky above, making it look like it was a sea of stars.

Had this been any other night, this could be considered romantic. But there was none of that now.

Izuku was beginning to lose his grip on his hopeless romantism.

"I found the door," Katsuki announced from around the corner.

Izuku turned his attention back to where it mattered. He followed Katsuki's voice and paced along the wobbly walkway.

Katsuki expertly picked the lock on the handle. The door popped open rather quickly and together they dragged the heavy obstacle open.

A gentle, blue light spilled out from inside.

Izuku peered in apprehensively.

The tower had a high level of water, and sitting at the bottom were blue lights that gave the liquid a magical glow. Suspended above it was an expanded metal flooring and a control station off to the side. The door led out directly into the metal floor level and there were more stairs up to a second floor.

Carefully, Katsuki took the first step in. He tested the sturdiness of the metal and when it checked out, he motioned for Izuku to come. Izuku climbed in and Katsuki closed the door behind them. The smell of moisture filled his senses as Izuku peeked through the flooring to the glowing water below.

He looked towards Katsuki at this moment. His breath caught a bit.

Katsuki was glancing down, studying the liquid below. The reflection of the water and light bounced off his cheek bones in a lovely manner. The blue contrasted his eyes but matched the distant gaze inside of them.

“The ambience here is sort of nice,” Izuku said gently. His voice echoed off the metal walls. “The light from the water looks pretty cool in here.”

Katsuki nodded dully. “Mhm.”

Izuku deflated slightly.

He pursed his lips to the side at the lack of reaction, but reminded himself that he had no real reason to be upset. Katsuki didn’t have to give him a response. Or a smile. Hell, Katsuki didn’t have to be doing this. He could have kept going with his mission to kill Chisaki, but here he was instead helping Izuku as a detour on his road towards revenge.

Katsuki knelt to the ground and shrugged off his backpack and jacket. He began pulling out a large, black sleeping bag from his pack. Izuku noted how the sleeping bag had some leaves and twigs in it like it had been recently used.

Izuku awkwardly kneeled too. He began to rearrange the objects in his duffle bag in an orderly fashion. He put his clothes on top and the harder items on the bottom to create a makeshift pillow.

With a slight huff, Katsuki laid out the sleeping bag. It wasn’t exactly big enough for two people.

Izuku waited for the uncomfortable tango they were about to do.

But instead, Katsuki stood up and turned his back.

“I’m going to go sit outside,” Katsuki muttered. “Don’t wait up.”

He left out before Izuku could respond.

Izuku stared at the door, conflicted. He wanted to follow, but knew he wasn’t welcome. He stared down at the makeshift bed in front of him. With a heavy heart, Izuku tucked himself inside the sleeping bag and rested his head against his duffle bag.

He shifted over, trying his best to leave room for Katsuki if he ever decided to come back in.

Izuku tossed and turned.

He looked at the door and his heart begged him to go out there too.

Then he looked to his side and saw Katsuki’s jacket on the ground.

Instantly, he was transported back to when he first met Katsuki. He saw him shivering in the cold without proper clothes. Without warning, Izuku’s heart really did begin to burn. Katsuki was outside in the winter cold without a jacket.

That was the breaking point for Izuku.

He got up and grabbed the article of clothing. With hesitation, he walked outside meekly, poking his head out the doorway. There he saw Katsuki. His legs were dangling over the side of the ledge as he leaned against the railing. He was gazing out across the tiny city with a distant look in his eyes.

Izuku cleared his throat.

Katsuki cut his eye at him and then immediately huffed. He turned his head away from Izuku coldly.

“Kacc—” Izuku stopped himself and quickly bit his tongue. “Katsuki. You, uh, forgot your jacket. I-It’s cold out here. You might get sick.”

Katsuki grumbled. He held his hand out and Izuku awkwardly gave it to him. Without moving his head, Katsuki put on the jacket aggressively, zipped it up tight and shoved his hands in his pockets.

Izuku nervously shifted on his feet.

“Are you going to stay out here all night?” Izuku asked shyly.

“I’m watching the door,” Katsuki quipped like it was obvious. “You can go back to sleep.”

“I-I can’t sleep.”

“Izuku. Go back inside.”

Katsuki sounded furious. His voice trembled as if he was holding back a thunderstorm inside of him. It broke Izuku's heart to see how much the love they shared disintegrated down into ashes. No, not even ashes. Nothing. It felt like there was now nothing between them.

Izuku broke.

He couldn't do this. He thought he could, but he couldn't. He needed Katsuki to speak. He needed him to communicate or take it all out on him. Because while Izuku could accept Katsuki's fiery anger, he absolutely could not deal with his cold shoulder.

He kneeled beside Katsuki and ignored the winds picking up speed. He reached his hand out and finally gripped Katsuki's shoulder.

Katsuki immediately tried to jerk away, but Izuku couldn't let go.

"Please talk to me," Izuku begged. "Please. Or look at me."

Katsuki shook his head. He shifted away from Izuku's warmth.

"I can't look at you," Katsuki hissed, but not angrily. His voice was hoarse with so much agony like he couldn't take it anymore. "The reason why I can't should be very fucking clear."

Izuku shuffled closer again. "I-I know, b-but please. Look at me."

He grabbed Katsuki's jacket and tugged. He begged him to turn around, but Katsuki began shaking his head and resisted.

"No. I can't do it," Katsuki hissed. Izuku pulled again, and Katsuki began losing his composure. "No." A pull. "I said no—" a tug. "Stop—"

"Please," Izuku's voice cracked.

"No. I can't do it. I can't. If I do it, then—"

"—Then what?"

"Then it'll all come out!" Katsuki shouted and his voice echoed fiercely through the night. He kept his body turned and slowly dropped his head between his shoulders. He then whispered, "I won't be able to stop it. Everything sitting inside of me will come out and I don't want that to happen."

"Let it out," Izuku whispered.

Katsuki shook his head. "But I don't want it to—"

"—You have to let it out. Please. Just look at me. Let it out and look at me. I don't care what happens or what you say. I'll listen and I'll take it all because I deserve it. Scream. Yell. Tell me to go to hell—b-but please. Take it out on me."

It took a long time.

Katsuki shook his head at first, resistant to what Izuku had suggested. But then gently, Izuku began to caress his shoulders.

With the help of Izuku's touch, Katsuki's final layer of armor crumbled down. It dropped to the ground to reveal the final layer underneath Katsuki's layers of anger and sadness: heartbreak. He gradually turned towards Izuku, inch by inch as if it pained him too much to do.

Then when his head finally turned and lifted, Izuku's heart shattered into a million pieces.

Tears were already streaming down on Katsuki's cheeks, making his skin shine with wetness. The puffiness around the rims of his eyes was so red it rivaled his irises. And his nose had burned pink from the nipping cold.

It was a harrowing sight. Katsuki was in so much pain it was devouring him from the inside out.

Then Katsuki finally looked him in the eye.

Izuku's heart drowned underneath the weight of Katsuki's hurt. It piled on him immediately, funneling directly into his chest through those searing red eyes.

The lid on all of Katsuki's bottled up emotions came right off.

"How could you, Izuku?" Katsuki's voice cracked on the last syllable of Izuku's name. "H-How could you look me in my eyes for that long knowing the truth and not say anything? H-How could you find it in yourself to lie after everything we shared together? I-I've been trying to wrap my mind around that specific fact—but I can't."

Katsuki tried to stop his tears. He clenched his jaw and his face crumbled like flimsy paper.

"I keep replaying that last month over and over," Katsuki wept. He shook his head and Izuku stayed quiet. "Then I keep trying to imagine if there was information that was that important to you, could I be able to keep it from you for that damn long? How could you fucking kiss me, have sex with me, and say I love you while knowing you were the one who killed her? How c-could you do all that? W-We talked about our deepest fucking insecurities and everything—"

Katsuki choked on his words like they were made of sharp metal. He sobbed more, and Izuku's heart collapsed into itself.

Izuku lowered his head in shame and an avalanche of tears rolled down from his own eyes. He knew Katsuki was right. The last month made him feel disgusting, like he had rolled around in mud and still got in bed with Katsuki every night.

"I-I'm sorry," Izuku said past his own tears. "I'm so so sorry. I know that was wrong of me, I-I shouldn't have deceived you like that."

“A sorry isn’t going to make it right, Izuku,” Katsuki sobbed. “You knew my mother was the one person my whole world revolved around and still didn’t say anything. You knew how much she meant to me. And I loved you, Izuku. That’s why I couldn’t look at you today. Because every time I look at you, I’m reminded how much I still love you despite everything.”

Katsuki’s fist squeezed shut.

“But then every time I look at you, I see this horrible sequence of events that breaks my goddamn heart,” Katsuki confessed. “I see us saying we love each other at my family’s graveyard where my mother’s body is buried. I see me saying I trust you right in front of her grave. Then I see me breaking down in the stupid nursery and telling you everything—absolutely everything—I’ve gone through. Th-Things I never told anyone else and things I wish I forgot. I laid myself bare for you and the honesty wasn’t returned.”

Izuku’s throat became sore. He pressed his hands in his lap and lowered his head.

“I-I’m sorry, I should have been honest with you,” Izuku whispered.

“Yes, you should have,” Katsuki agreed with a bite. “Never in my life have I felt this much love for a person, and that terrifies me. I thought that ma-maybe you could really be the first person to see me—”

Katsuki clenched his jaw, and his chest began heaving.

“I-I thought that maybe if I was open and honest with you, you wouldn’t see me as this monster like everyone else does,” Katsuki cried. “A-And you told me that night you didn’t think I was a monster. B-But still even after all that—”

Katsuki tried to bite his lip to stop the wrecked sob from escaping. But it forced its way out.

It was a cry so mournful like it had been accumulating inside of Katsuki for years. It sounded old, and harrowing.

“E-Even after all of that, when I asked you why you didn’t tell me the truth,” Katsuki cried. “You looked at me and all you saw was a monster. Y-You were scared. You were scared that if you told me the truth, I would hurt you. So why should I ever try to be anything different? Everyone I’ve ever cared about thinks I am this horrible, evil thing!”

Izuku shook his head. “K-Kacchan—”

“—But on top of that, you just left so abruptly too,” Katsuki hissed. “Knowing I have issues with abandonment! Yo-You didn’t even say goodbye properly because you thought I was a monster!”

He spoke over Izuku, and his words began to pick up speed. He whirled his hurt eyes on Izuku and now the sharpened blade of blame was laying inside of them.

“A-And then I woke up alone and paralyzed for hours!” Katsuki sobbed. “I was trapped in my fucking head for ages, crying out for you! B-But worst of all, you just nonchalantly left that fucking folder there for me to see! Wh-Why would you do that? Why would you think that was the way to tell me the truth, hah?! Why was I not good enough for a decent fucking conversation after I gave my heart to you?!"

Izuku had been intensively listening to every word Katsuki said, agreeing with each listed grievance.

However, his attention snagged on one particular word.

"Folder?" Izuku parroted.

Katsuki glared at him through his tears.

"Yes," Katsuki said. He leaned into Izuku's face, snarling. "The fucking folder you left on the kitchen table where you let me see how much you were paid to kill her."

Izuku blinked rapidly and leaned back. "What? I didn't leave a folder—"

"—Yes, you did," Katsuki yelled back angrily. He glowered fully, clearly pissed off that Izuku might be lying. "The red folder that was signed and approved by your fucking boyfriend. Which is the cherry on top of all of this shit, by the way," Katsuki hissed rapidly as his eyes went wild with hurt.

Katsuki kept going, gaining speed in letting out all his bottled-up feelings.

But Izuku was stuck, trying to piece together what the hell Katsuki was talking about.

"Because even after you abandoned me and left that folder I still tried to come and find you to talk to! I-I spent a week nonstop searching around Tokyo! I even went down in that dangerous ass underground because I was worried sick about you! I had no clue if you were safe because you didn't even bother to leave any contact information!"

With a bewildered expression, Izuku attempted to connect the dots. But several things were not adding up.

"But imagine my surprise when people knew exactly who you were and told me you were likely with Chisaki," Katsuki spat viciously. "The beautiful Viridian Viper and the goddamn Yakuza Heir: a perfect match made in Hadeus. And all these people were gushing about your budding romance and—"

"—Wa-Wait," Izuku said loudly over Katsuki.

Katsuki glared but stopped speaking. He waited impatiently for Izuku to say something.

"Katsuki—I explained the situation about Chisaki in my letter," Izuku whispered, slightly hurt. "There is no budding romance, wh-why would you ever believe that? I told you Chisaki bought my virginity against my will and my brother was forcing me to sleep with him."

With that, Katsuki's anger faltered.

His nose scrunched up and he looked at Izuku sideways.

“What letter?” Katsuki asked.

Izuku blinked.

“The letter I put in your hands after I left,” Izuku explained. “It was in a white envelope. I signed it with your name on it and everything.”

There was a long stretch of silence as the wind cut through them.

Katsuki’s anger slowly but surely was replaced with confusion. Katsuki leaned back. He stared at Izuku with increasing perplexity.

“What are you talking about?” Katsuki questioned. “There was no letter. You left the red folder. Not a letter. And it wasn’t in my hands, it was in the kitchen.”

“No. I didn’t,” Izuku shot back. He looked at Katsuki sideways too. “I left a ten page letter, explaining everything including the truth about your mother. I put it right between your fingers so when you woke up you would have it. I-I even put my cell phone number inside so you could call me if you wanted to.”

Katsuki’s mouth hung open, but no words came out.

His eyes darted off to the side, searching his memory.

Then he frowned deeper.

“…Izuku,” Katsuki said slowly. “I didn’t get a letter. There was nothing in my hands when I woke up.”

“But I put it in your fingers right before I left,” Izuku replied. His heart began hammering as the wind picked up. “A-And I never had access to archived folders. I had only seen your mother’s folder once. It was never in my possession. I couldn’t have left it.”

Katsuki blinked. “Then who did?”

They stared at each other, baffled.

They searched each other’s eyes, trying to find a lie. But they found no hint of deception. They were both telling the truth.

Now, a giant spotlight shined down on the rift between them. It was as wide as an ocean and full of countless, invisible gaps in information. If what the other was saying was true, then Izuku’s letter somehow disappeared while Mitsuki’s red folder magically took its place. And given the contents, it couldn’t have been a coincidence.

In that silence, it clicked for both of them. There was a horrible, malicious swap made.

Izuku furrowed his brow when he could only think of one culprit.

“I think…I think I know who did it,” Izuku whispered gravely. “My sister, Himiko. She must’ve switched them.”

Anger bit at the inside of Izuku’s chest.

He made a pained face as if he had been sucker punched ten times. Then he let out a shaky exhale and frustratingly scrubbed his hands down his face. He held his head in his hands to keep from screaming.

Of course. Of. Fucking. Course.

Himiko knew about Katsuki, and she had heard everything. Izuku reflected on the day he left the estate. He recalled when Tomura let him take a stroll around before they left. Izuku had taken his time, having difficulty departing. But when they did this, Himiko was in the car.

However, she clearly had come on a mission of her own and not stayed seated the whole time. And just like a true snake, she had discreetly bitten both Izuku and Katsuki with a lethal dose of venom.

Izuku lifted his head from his hands. Katsuki seemed entirely lost.

Suddenly now all the string of events from the last month made sense. Terrible, cruel sense. No wonder Katsuki hadn’t called. He hadn’t gotten his number. Or closure. Or even knew what really had happened. Did Katsuki even know about the divorce papers? Did he even get them?

Now Izuku was questioning everything.

Like a slap to the face, Izuku realized Katsuki knew nothing. That means if Katsuki never knew about Chisaki’s arrangement, then that means he witnessed Izuku pull down Chisaki for that kiss with no context. Katsuki probably watched them slow dance and saw the way Chisaki suggestively pawed at him and how Izuku let it happen.

But worst of all, this meant Katsuki learned about the truth of his mother through a red folder.

Izuku was now incredibly upset.

No wonder Katsuki was so hell bent on hunting him down—

“Hold on.” Katsuki’s eyes narrowed. The newfound confusion entirely overshadowed every other emotion they had just been feeling. “How many siblings do you have exactly? And why would she do something like that?”

Izuku cringed.

As he stared at Katsuki, he could see the enormous amount of information missing.

“I technically have about two hundred other siblings,” Izuku whispered.

Katsuki's eyes startled wide and he blinked rapidly.

"And she did it because she hates me," Izuku explained simply. "She wants to see me suffer for killing someone she cared about in our cohort. Our upbringing…it punishes compassion and empathy. The only thing she's ever known is pain and negative emotions. As a result, she's been holding on to resentment against me all her life to keep her going. So, this swap… it makes sense why she did it. She wanted to hurt me—hurt us."

Katsuki was stunned into silence.

As Katsuki stared at Izuku, all the anger in his watery eyes steadily quelled.

"You…You really left me a letter?" Katsuki asked in a strangled tone. "A ten paged one?"

"Ye-Yeah," Izuku whispered.

Izuku met Katsuki's eyes again, and the raw pain in both of their faces was potent. As the misalignment came into light, they both were equally horrified.

Izuku's heart churned bitterly.

Oh, how well Himiko had played this one, he thought. She got what she wanted, and Izuku was officially exiled. He was on the run, and she successfully turned the love of his life against him in the most vicious way possible—and she also destroyed Katsuki's heart in the process.

All with the simple switch of a letter and a folder.

He had to give it to her. She truly was a Viper.

"Wh-What was in the letter?" Katsuki asked. He looked aghast.

"Everything," Izuku sobbed, and his face crumbled. He couldn't stop the tears from coming out of him when he realized how hurt Katsuki must've been to find that folder. "I-I explained everything regarding your mother's death. I detailed the whole incident. I explained why I needed to go back to Tokyo for the kids. I even wrote about how Chisaki bought my virginity, and I was planning on killing him for you."

Katsuki's eyes stretched wider and wider with every sentence Izuku spoke.

Izuku kept going. The words were pressed out of him by the immense amount of sadness he was feeling.

"You're right about how I couldn't find a way to tell you," Izuku confessed. "My brother Tomura had come to the estate when you were away at your retirement party. He revealed the truth to me, and I broke down in a way I hadn't before. I-I hadn't known she was your mother, and when I did, I couldn't believe I played a part in hurting you that much. Then Tomura warned me not to tell you. He told me you would kill me if I did."

Izuku's pained expression tripled as he gazed down at his scarred hands.

“A-And Tomura has always had this frightening hold over me—” Izuku choked. “And because of that, there’s a piece of me that will probably always believe he has my best interest in mind since he’s saved my life so much. S-So when he told me not to say anything…”

Izuku trailed off, he couldn’t repeat his biggest mistake out loud.

“…You didn’t,” Katsuki finished for Izuku. “You listened to him.”

Izuku nodded mournfully.

“Th-That’s why I wrote the letter,” Izuku whispered. “I-I figured if I couldn’t say it out loud, I could try to in words. I-I read in a lot of books how characters gave each other these long romantic letters when words were too hard to say. And I thought it would be the next best option since I didn’t know what to do. I knew you deserved closure, but a large part of me was still underneath Tomura’s thumb. So, I mimicked what I saw in my favorite book to h-help me. L-Like I always do.”

Izuku lifted his gaze.

Katsuki was drenched in distress.

“B-But I know now, I should have spoken up and told you,” Izuku said sincerely. “I shouldn’t have pretended because if I had just—If I just gave you the same honesty back, none of this would have happened. Himiko wouldn’t have been able to swap the letter out and you wouldn’t have been hurt the way you are now.”

Katsuki didn’t say anything.

His eyes were darting all over Izuku, staring at him in such a heartbreaking way. Izuku half expected him to get up, call him stupid, and march back into the water tower.

But instead, Katsuki drew closer. He scooted in until their bodies were touching. He then carefully turned towards Izuku head on and then lifted his shaky hands. Katsuki then held Izuku’s face gently—just like he used to.

Izuku broke all the way down. He missed this touch.

He lifted his hands up to hold Katsuki’s wrists, and screwed his eyes shut. He dropped his head, but Katsuki kept it held up. Izuku tried to slow his crying as Katsuki forced their gazes to maintain contact.

“Izuku,” Katsuki said firmly in a hoarse voice. “I need you to tell me everything you’ve gone through from start to finish.”

Izuku held Katsuki’s wrists tighter. He became apprehensive on reflex.

“Izuku, please,” Katsuki begged when he felt the hesitance. He drew in close. “I need to know everything, leave out no details. I-I need to hear the whole story so I can grasp the full picture of what’s going on with you. C-Can you do that for me?”

With the help of the soft touch, Izuku felt like he could.

He held on tightly to Katsuki for courage as he said his next words.

“O-Okay,” Izuku agreed despite his instilled terror. “I-I can try, for you.”

Katsuki nodded frantically. He quickly stood up and pulled Izuku with him. There was an urgency in his action that Izuku hadn’t seen before. Katsuki clutched his hand tightly as he led them back inside of the tower.

He shut the door tight.

ᔓᔓᔓ

It took several long hours for Izuku to go through everything. And the entire time, Katsuki held on to his hand and helped him through it.

When Izuku needed to take a break, Katsuki let him. When Izuku stumbled on the harder parts—Katsuki was there to encourage him. They worked together in tandem to allow Izuku to get past his instilled silence.

They held hands through every grueling detail.

Izuku told it all and tried his best not to skip on any horrifying details no matter how much his throat wanted to clamp shut. But with Katsuki’s comforting aid, Izuku was able to explain his upbringing.

He discussed how they were raised and the entire Viper system: he explained how they lived very rich lives. They had the finest things, and they all lived in what was essentially a luxury apartment compound. But he explained that while on the outside they owned everything they could think of, it came with a heavy price.

And that price was their humanity.

He explained how they were punished for having positive feelings and displaying affectionate physical touch. He discussed the basement of torture for punishments. Then he talked about how Tomura had taken over his punishments when he was thirteen. He explained the belts, and then he explained the glass box that Tomura now preferred.

When he described how frequently he would be pushed to the brink of famine, Katsuki looked visibly ill.

He explained every part about The Cull. Then he discussed all his closest siblings—including Hiryu. That was a detail that seemed to make Katsuki extremely surprised then sad when Izuku explained why he had been designated for termination.

Izuku forced himself to talk about Tomura, Inko, and Nine. He explained his mental block, and why he couldn’t pull the trigger in Vienna or land a lethal blow in Taiwan.

Then he walked Katsuki through everything relating to his mother. Izuku told him of The Incident with graphic vividness so that Katsuki had all the closure he needed. It was here that Katsuki asked questions, and it pained them both to walk through it.

But they did.

They walked through it together.

Then Izuku explained in deep detail how Tomura sold his body to Chisaki in exchange for power. Then he explained how Tomura had been grooming him for the last five years to be married off to the Yakuza as a trophy so they could merge.

And finally, Katsuki had been stunned into silence as Izuku recounted the last event: him brutally massacring his own kin after the masquerade.

By the end of Izuku's life story, Katsuki was mortified.

Katsuki was staring at him now with so much pity and sorrow. But above all—understanding.

Katsuki's grip on his hand was tight and his fingers were trembling. But Izuku couldn't tell if Katsuki was trembling from sadness or anger. Maybe it was a mixture of both.

"Izuku. Has anything in your life ever been your choice?" Katsuki asked, entirely pained.

Izuku smiled sadly. He looked at the way the blue light painted across Katsuki's handsome face.

"Choosing to love you was," Izuku whispered like it was still a secret.

Katsuki's eyes softened.

They stared at each other with bittersweet melancholy as all the gaps were filled in.

"What would happen if they caught you now?" Katsuki asked, terribly afraid.

"I'm sure my Big Brother Tomura would force me to marry Chisaki somehow," Izuku answered. Sourness churned in his chest as he pictured the two men he now despised the most. He could feel their cold gazes burning into him and picking him apart. "He's probably with Chisaki now, convincing him I'm still worth owning."

Katsuki frowned a bit.

He tilted his head slowly. He opened his mouth, closed it. Then he looked off to the side as if a final piece of a puzzle was missing.

"What do you mean he's with Chisaki?" Katsuki asked carefully. "I thought you said you killed him."

"Huh?" Izuku tilted his head. "When did I say that?"

“Back at the motel, you said you killed your older brother.”

Izuku paused for a moment. Then he realized where Katsuki was misled.

“Oh, no. Sorry,” Izuku quickly apologized. “The nomenclature is all a bit confusing. Jin is who I killed. He was the agent named The Double Headed Viper. Jin is my older brother because he was a cohort above me. But my Big Brother, the person who oversaw raising me, is Tomura. He’s the one who beheaded our original handler, Nine, and took his position.”

“So, your current handler is…your Big Brother?” Katsuki clarified. “The one who has been hurting you your whole life is also your handler?”

“Yes.” Izuku hunched a bit. “I, uh, never realized that could be mixed up. The relationships inside of the Vipers are a little muddled I guess from the outside perspective. Bigs are in charge of a kid from the cohort below them, and they’re called Littles. So, Tomura was my Big and I was his Little. He raised me since I was two and he was seven.”

Katsuki blinked several times. “That’s…so young.”

“It was,” Izuku agreed. “B-But, yeah. Tomura has always controlled everything in my life—and I’m pretty sure the second he gets his hands on me he’s going to punish me. And then he’s going to send me off with Chisaki in order to appease him so he can get his merge. He needs me to complete his plans.”

Katsuki’s eyes began watering again. “I-Izuku, I’m so fucking sorry.”

“I’m sorry too,” Izuku whispered. His eyes began watering as well.

They studied each other. All the strenuous, unfiltered emotions they were feeling poured out.

Izuku looked at the man he loved and finally understood how much of a lifeboat Katsuki had been in his life. This whole time, Katsuki was the single raft who had kept him from succumbing to the darkness he was raised in. And still—even with that—Izuku wound up hurting him.

“I-I’m so sorry for everything, Kacchan,” Izuku said through his hoarse voice. “I-I’m sorry I didn’t say anything about your mom. I should have. She was so important to you, and I knew that. All this mess is my fault because I couldn’t see past how Tomura doesn’t always actually know what’s best for me—or even want what’s best for me.”

Izuku cried and Katsuki cried too. Izuku gripped tightly onto Katsuki and hung his head.

“I-It took losing you for me to really understand that a-and I’m so sorry about your mom,” Izuku apologized from the bottom of his being. “I-I wish I hadn’t taken the shot—I-I wish I didn’t do it, but I did. I did and now I hurt you. A-And I take full responsibility for my part in it. I understand if you could never see me the same—and I don’t blame you if y-you don’t want to speak again after th-this.”

Katsuki screwed his eyes shut and hung his head away.

The grief poured out of him in that moment, and they both stayed silent as they let it out. One by one both of their tears joined into the water below and created ripples that intertwined with each other.

After a long, loaded silence, Katsuki pulled Izuku in for a desperate embrace.

He wrapped his arms around Izuku's shaking body and Izuku clung back to him dearly.

They wept softly in the pale blue light, and they didn't let each other go. Katsuki's arms locked around him and his hand threaded through his hair. Izuku felt their hearts press together. He imagined Katsuki slipping away from him and his spirit broke underneath all the regrets he had.

Katsuki guided them down to rest. Izuku struggled to find it in himself to let go, so Katsuki took off his shoes for him. Then he did the same for himself while keeping one arm protectively wrapped around Izuku.

He shifted them over, gliding them delicately. They joined together in the small sleeping bag, fitting together like two perfectly broken glass shards. They laid their heads down together on the duffle bag, facing each other.

The whole time Izuku kept repeating apologies as he clung to Katsuki.

Katsuki stayed silent. He softly stroked Izuku's hair with his shaking hand.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Izuku awoke, it was to a blaring ringtone close to his ear.

He jolted awake, and so did Katsuki. They shifted in the sleeping bag with tiredness heavy on their eyelids. As they roused, Katsuki's arms were still tightly wrapped around Izuku. He grumbled unhappily as he pulled out his phone.

Katsuki frowned at the bright screen.

He sat upright, muttered an apology, and walked out of the tower to the outside.

Izuku stared after him. His mind was still hazy from sleep, and he tried to catch his bearings. He gazed up to the ceiling of the water tower with sore, puffy eyes. He checked his wrist out of reflex and then groaned at the lack of watch. He really needed to stop doing that. Or get a new watch.

When Katsuki came back inside, he was wearing a tight-lipped frown and fully alert.

"Is it time to head out to the ferry?" Izuku asked, still slightly groggy.

"There's been a change of plans," Katsuki said seriously. He walked over to Izuku with potent urgency and immediately Izuku sat up right. "Something happened on the island with the safe house, it's been compromised."

“Compromised?” Izuku asked. Panic made him very wide awake now. “As in, something bad happened?”

“Yup,” Katsuki said. “We need to get out of here as soon as possible. I tried calling my ex-supervisor directly to see if there was somewhere else we could go—” Katsuki winced and shook his head angrily. “—But that bastard is not answering his phone right now. Like always.”

Izuku’s stomach dropped. He was officially alarmed.

Izuku quickly got out of the sleeping bag and began putting on his shoes.

“So, making a list: as of right now, we can’t go near Tokyo,” Katsuki said as he started rolling up the sleeping bag in a bit of a hurry. “And we need to steer clear of Yokohama too. The estate in Biei is out of the question as well. Both those properties have my legal name attached to them so there’s likely a Yakuza waiting there to see if I walk in.”

“It might be dangerous to pass through Niigata as well,” Izuku murmured, mind racing a mile per minute. He helped Katsuki shove the sleeping bag back in the tiny case it was in. “That’s the Chisaki family’s original home city before they took over Tokyo. There’re deep roots for the Yakuza in that direction.”

“Noted,” Katsuki said diligently. He shoved the sleeping back in his backpack. “Start thinking of other towns we might want to avoid. Because right now, we need to get the fuck out of here immediately. I don’t know where we’re going to go but, we’re officially kind of on our own until I hear back from my supervisor.”

“We should go back north,” Izuku quickly suggested. “We can head to that Midnight Sento location that Nana gave me. It’s the bathhouse I was telling you about.”

“Right,” Katsuki agreed quickly. He slung on his jacket and backpack. “Looks like that’s our only option at the moment.”

Izuku pulled his duffle bag over him and zipped up his coat.

They headed out of the water tower swiftly. The morning sun made Izuku’s eyes hurt slightly, and he squinted in reflex. They descended the ladder with added haste until they finally hit the ground. They both walked over to the motorcycle with a quick urgency.

Katsuki put on his helmet quickly and then turned around to put Izuku’s on for him.

Izuku froze a bit, surprised by the affectionate action.

He looked up at Katsuki who was gazing down at him with a stoic expression.

Katsuki looked directly in Izuku’s eyes as he tightened the chin strap. He checked to make sure Izuku’s helmet was on securely with a light tug. In his eyes was contentment, but sitting at the bottom was sorrow.

Katsuki moved to get on his bike and Izuku followed behind him loyally. They slotted together and Izuku's heart began racing quickly. He looked over his shoulder out of paranoia and found nothing but the sunrise.

He gazed at the island off in the distance once more.

Izuku then hesitantly wrapped his arms around Katsuki. He braced himself for Katsuki to stiffen like last time. But he didn't. Instead, Katsuki leaned into the touch and embraced it. He revved the motorcycle's engine and pushed up the kickstand.

"To Midnight Sento we go," Katsuki announced determinedly.

Katsuki sped off towards the road and they embarked on their journey together.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so so much for reading!! Please let me know what you think below :) writing this story is getting funner and funner! 💜

Chapter 31: Dirge

Chapter Summary

Dirge (Type of song) a somber hymn or lament expressing mourning or grief.

A single name hangs above both Izuku and Katsuki's head.

Chapter Notes

Hellooooo Welcome back to this choo choo train! Thank you guys so much for all your kind comments on the previous chapter! I had a really busy last two weeks and I still need to reply back to everyone but here is the chapter!

Of course thank you the LOML, Luna, for Betaing!! I hope you enjoy :))

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 31 — Dirge

.

.

.

They had been driving for an hour. Rather fast, Izuku noted.

Katsuki was driving like a bat out of hell, swerving between cars like the rules of the road didn't apply to him. Izuku hung on as tight as he could, leaning with the sharp curves they took. Katsuki didn't elaborate on what happened at the safe house. But whatever it was, it must've been urgent enough that it made Katsuki leap to action with an impressive gust of speed.

Now, in record timing, they were in the next city over.

Izuku watched as Katsuki put gas in the tank. He was holding his helmet in one hand while steadying the gas nozzle with the other. His soft blond hair blew with the wind as they stood there. His jacket was zipped up tight, and his eyes—his burning red eyes hadn't left Izuku the whole time.

Katsuki pursed his lips and looked Izuku up and down.

“Let’s stop and grab breakfast,” Katsuki suggested suddenly. “I’ll pay.”

Izuku immediately shook his head and said, “It’s okay, I can make it to Midnight Sento without any food. We need to make it to a safe place before we’re recognized.”

“Izuku, I could feel your stomach rumbling like a goddamn earthquake against me,” Katsuki quipped. He dropped his head to the side entirely unimpressed and raised a brow. “You’re clearly hungry and we still have five hours to go before we get there.”

“Really. It’s fine,” Izuku insisted. “The faster we get there the better. Being hungry doesn’t bother me—”

Izuku choked on his words when Katsuki’s expression twisted into a terrifying scowl.

He tried to backtrack, but it was too late. He realized what he had just touched upon: his famine punishments. When he talked about them last night, Katsuki looked fit enough to hunt down Tomura at that moment and skin him alive.

Without saying a single word, Katsuki took the gas nozzle out of his motorcycle. He placed it back on the hook with a hard slam, making Izuku wish he could eat his words. Katsuki then began to walk up slowly to Izuku. The intense gaze pinned him down where he stood as if it was crafted of knives.

“You’re not going that long without food again ever,” Katsuki harshly whispered. “That’s not something you should have ever gotten used to.”

“O-Okay,” Izuku agreed.

“But we’ll be quick about it, alright?” Katsuki gently amended. The fierceness in his eyes gave way to sincere concern. “Sorry. I only want to make sure you’re fed. I feel a bit uneasy after hearing about that fucking box. That was really…disturbing.”

“I get it,” Izuku said. He averted his eyes down. “Thank you for, uh, being concerned.”

As if on cue, Izuku’s stomach loudly rumbled in perfect timing.

Katsuki stifled a small laugh and Izuku bashfully smiled. He scratched his cheek and blushed.

“I guess you’re right,” Izuku chuckled. “Breakfast does sound nice.”

The diner they chose for breakfast was very small and private.

There were a handful of people inside, but it was obvious that they were all quickly grabbing a bite to eat before going to work. Several professional men and women in business casual clothes dropped in and out. Others sat down for coffee and began typing on their laptops.

Izuku and Katsuki chose a blue booth in the corner. It was tucked away slightly and close to the backdoor. Katsuki had insisted on this seating in case they needed to make a quick getaway.

Izuku sat down first and slid towards the wall. He admired the vintage-like photographs hanging up as he put his helmet on the table. There were a lot of pictures of musicians, and some family photos were tacked on top of the soft blue wallpaper.

He patiently waited for Katsuki to sit down across from him.

But instead, Katsuki slid in right next to him. Izuku blinked twice, surprised.

Katsuki sat his helmet down across the table like what he did wasn't abnormal. He turned around, scanned the area, and then lazily put his arm around the seat behind Izuku. He crossed his legs and began to wait for them to be served.

He turned to Izuku, and finally caught his confused gaze. Katsuki raised a brow.

"Why are you looking at me like that?" Katsuki asked.

"Uh, you're sitting on the same side of the booth," Izuku pointed out. "Usually, you sit across the table."

"Ah." Katsuki gazed at Izuku seriously. "It's safer this way. In case someone tries to come at you, I can protect you easier. I usually do this type of technique when I serve as a bodyguard."

"Does this mean I'm officially your client?" Izuku asked, a bit cheekily.

"I guess so, huh?" Katsuki cocked his head, slightly amused. "Who would have thought? After years of being pissy about being put on bodyguard assignments, it came in handy in the end."

Izuku did his best to suppress the smile that bloomed on his face, but he was unable to.

It pushed through, and he beamed at Katsuki. As he did this, Katsuki held his eye contact in a lingering moment of silence. Beautiful scarlet eyes softened, and the contagious smile moved from Izuku's lips to Katsuki's.

They silently regarded at the other.

Katsuki's eyes dropped down to Izuku's lips. He then stared at the hickeys along Izuku's jaw line. A pull of tension caught in the air between them and the endearment in their eyes tangled together into one.

Then, as if Katsuki realized what he was doing, he snapped out of it.

His smile retreated and he awkwardly cleared his throat. His eyes skirted down to the table, and he scratched behind his head. He pulled away his arm that was perched on the booth and neatly folded his hands on the table.

The shift made Izuku's smile drop.

Despite talking through everything, a lingering awkwardness still encompassed them. It stuck to their clothes and imprinted against their skin like a shameful stamp. Because while everything was out in the open, the single fact remained hanging in the air: Izuku did kill Mitsuki.

Izuku was experiencing a new type of guilt. It was more potent than when he killed Hiryu and far heavier than when he murdered Jin, Aoyama or Ibara. This new guilt was sticky and heavy like a ghost was perched on his shoulder soaking him with judgment.

And all this shame pertained to respecting the memory of Mitsuki.

Because here he was: hopelessly in love with her son after he shot a bullet through her.

The more he thought about it, the more and more selfish he felt. It made him feel gross, like he was spitting on her grave and deliberately disrespecting the dead. Because even though there was a small part of him that advised him to leave Katsuki alone out of respect, the larger part of him that loved Katsuki couldn't.

And that was always their downfall, wasn't it? They were perpetually unable to leave each other alone. Even now, the pull between them that just happened was overwhelming—as if they needed to kiss the other.

But they were resisting because of the ghost in the room.

Because of this, Izuku easily thought about the situation from Katsuki's point of view. He wondered if Katsuki was experiencing a similar type of guilt. If he was in Katsuki's shoes, he might feel like he was betraying the memory of his mother by being kind to Izuku.

Izuku turned to face the empty side of the booth. Katsuki did too.

There was a long pause here.

Katsuki's brows furrowed. Izuku glanced down at his hands.

"Are we…okay?" Izuku whispered, unsure.

Katsuki didn't reply right away.

He opened his mouth as if to respond, but he didn't. His words visibly caught in his throat as he stared at Izuku's hands too. He searched the lines and wrinkles like they might hold the answer.

"I'm…processing things. That's all," Katsuki whispered sadly. He seemed painfully torn between two thoughts, yet again. "But yeah. We will be okay."

It didn't go unnoticed to Izuku how that was future tense, not present.

But still, he felt content with that answer. They had a long road to go, both literally and figuratively but they would be okay eventually.

They made it to the small city of Shinonsen without any incident.

The metropolis was secluded and protected by a jagged mountain range that looked as if it was crafted carefully by a sculptor. The tallest peaks were impeccably perfect, pointed high and the lows seemed as if they had been scraped out gently, allowing for a nestle of snow to catch in the pockets.

Inside the mountains were thick rows of tall trees hugging the buildings. Some were changing from green to brown leaves and others were barren.

Immediately upon entering, Izuku felt a shift in the atmosphere.

A sudden fog descended upon them. The cloud was thick, and it made seeing around a bit hard.

But the fog wasn't what offset Izuku, it was the lack of liveliness around them. Even though Shinonsen was a small city, most cities had a buzzing undertone because of the density in population. However, Shinonsen had none of that.

In fact, the mood felt more similar to a graveyard than to a town.

Judging by the way Katsuki slowed down the motorcycle slightly, he felt the shift as well.

They drove slowly, and as they glanced around, they noticed how the taste of solace was in the air. All around them were residents who moved incredibly slow.

Each individual moved as if there were little, tiny rain clouds above their heads. They barely talked or glanced up. All the citizens shuffled around without so much as a single glance to anyone around them.

When Katsuki came to a halt at a red light, they both observed closer.

"Who fucking died?" Katsuki whispered, wearily. "Everyone looks like their dogs got run over by a car."

"Yeah, it's…odd," Izuku agreed. He frowned deeply. "Every single person looks depressed."

Something about all this was off-putting, yet not too terribly concerning. They both put it in the back of their minds and stayed focused on their own predicament.

The light turned green, and they began to head down through the thick fog to Midnight Sento.

Green and red eyes peered up at the large, intimidating building. The roof was pointed in a traditional fashion, and the outside was painted black with trimmings of purple all around it.

Izuku fiddled with his bag as they stood in front of the gates that wrapped all around the perimeter like a fortress.

Katsuki adjusted his backpack and then nodded for Izuku to go in first.

Izuku hiked into the bathhouse with trepidation. When he pushed open the door, a melodic chime announced their presence.

The sweet, lovely smells of lavender, mint, and water welcomed them like a long-awaited hug. The lights inside were a dim, low lit purple and several candles were lit in the windows. There was a hint of humidity in the building as Izuku walked inwards towards the counter.

Katsuki and Izuku both glanced around curiously. They saw some employees shuffle by, and only a single man in a purple towel strolled down the hall.

“It’s basically empty,” Katsuki whispered. “Not a lot of customers?”

Izuku didn’t comment further. Something was bizarre in this town.

“Sorry! One moment!” A lovely voice shouted out from the back.

The sound of boxes tumbling followed and then more apologies. Then out zoomed a blur of black, white, and purple. A tall, beautiful woman who seemed like she could have been related to Nana approached them from behind the counter.

“Sorry about that,” the new woman approaching said with a laugh. “Was doing some inventory during the down time.”

She walked with a confident stride wearing thick, black rimmed glasses that highlighted her stunning sea-blue eyes. On her lips was a charming, subtle smile that was nearly a smirk and her hair was a coarse, thick black that spilled down her back.

She beamed at them, put one of her hands on her hips, and spread out the red fan in her other hand with a sharp whip. Izuku jumped a bit as she coyly hid half of her face and winked at him.

“Ah! New faces. Welcome to Midnight Sento! My name is Kayama Nemuri,” she said sweetly. “What kind of session may I offer you? We’re having a special today in the sauna to accommodate for the terrible news. If you’re here for my other services, all my slots are booked until next month.”

Izuku wanted her to elaborate on that last half a bit. But he stayed focused.

“Uh, we were sent here by Nana actually,” Izuku whispered. “One For All. My name is—”

“—Izuku!” Nemuri nearly shouted.

Her eyes ignited with shimmering sparkles and Izuku was shocked at the sudden onslaught of happiness. Nemuri clasped her hands together tightly then hurried from around the counter.

Izuku staggered backwards as she drew in close. She inspected him closely like a big sister and then sighed.

“Oh, you’re the poor boy she told me about,” She cooed protectively. She glanced Izuku up and down and flexed her hands like she wanted to coddle him, but clearly resisted from doing so. “Ah, you sweet thing. You look like you’ve been through hell and back.”

Right as she was about to say more, she finally noticed Katsuki out of the corner of her eye.

She paused, entirely surprised.

“And who is this?” Nemuri asked carefully.

“Aah, his name is Katsuki,” Izuku answered shyly. He gave a small smile and tilted his head. “He’s, uh, with me and in a similar situation.”

Nemuri cocked her head a bit, growing rightfully cautious. She then said, “Nana didn’t mention that there would be two of you. She very specifically only mentioned that there would be one young man, on the run who needed shelter.”

“It’s a new development since I saw her,” Izuku answered quickly. “He’s trustworthy and won’t say or do anything to jeopardize the situation, I promise.”

Nemuri still seemed apprehensive. “And how do you know each other exactly?”

“Katsuki is my…”

Izuku trailed off as he glanced backwards at the quiet blond behind him.

The various labels piled on his tongue like a traffic jam as he tripped on his words. Husband? Boyfriend? Friend? Bodyguard? Acquaintance? Ex?

Both Izuku and Katsuki studied each other for a moment. It was here they realized there was no proper label on what they currently had—even though they had just partaken in a marathon of mind-numbing sex less than two days ago.

At that quiet revelation, Katsuki averted his eyes and scratched behind his head.

Izuku stammered further, floundering entirely. He turned his eyes back towards Nemuri, and then heat stumbled into him deeply when he realized that her eyes now were homed in on the countless hickies all along his neck and jaw.

Izuku cursed himself. “H-He’s my—”

“—We’ve known each other since we were kids,” Katsuki finally spoke up. He didn’t meet Izuku’s gaze as he cleared his throat. “I promise I won’t cause you any type of issues. I want to make sure he’s safe as well.”

“Oh. I see,” Nemuri drawled a bit smugly while suppressing a smirk. She put her hands up and spared them both the awkwardness as twin blushes arose on their cheeks. “I take it you need to lay low as well for a while?"

Katsuki nodded quietly, bowed, and said, "Yes, if you don't mind taking me in as well. I would greatly appreciate it. I have the Yakuza looking for me just like him."

Nemuri gave a low whistle.

"Impressive," Nemuri murmured. "I must give it to the two of you for accomplishing pissing off the Yakuza and then getting out of reach. Well. I guess let's get you two troublemakers settled in. We're slow on business today so I can give you both a tour of your new home for the next two months."

Nemuri pointed to a long hallway with her red fan and a kind smile. She began leading them down the walkway as Izuku and Katsuki trailed behind her.

The two of them exchanged glances and then quickly looked away with pink tinted cheeks.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The bathhouse was impressively large. It was much bigger than it seemed on the outside, and it had already appeared to be a small castle by Izuku's standards.

Every hallway was illuminated by gentle candlelight or lavender colored lanterns. The floorboards were a dark wood that was nearly black, and each bathroom had its own special theme. One was Sakura bloom themed. Another was sunny beach themed, and Izuku's favorite was the one that was painted like it was a galaxy.

"This is the spa section and on the other side of the building are the washrooms," Nemuri explained as she pointed towards the various doors. "There's also a sauna in the back that you two are free to use as well after hours."

Izuku subconsciously kept close to Katsuki as they walked.

As they strolled up and down the various compartments, they encountered numerous employees in purple bathroom uniforms. Some employees smiled at them sweetly and others assessed them up and down to make sure they weren't trouble.

Izuku presumed that this was much more than a bathhouse when he caught sight of one heavily tattooed man. He had three scars running horizontally across his face and a mean enough glare to scare a bear.

Nemuri showed them the outside, and then brought them upstairs through a triple locked door.

It was here that Izuku's sneaking suspiciousness was confirmed. They walked up the steep staircase and soon were in a very lavish looking second floor. It was aligned with multiple rooms and perfect sunlight. Every door had a name on it, and at the end of the hall was one that read 'Mistress Midnight'.

The sound of people laughing echoed from all around while the sounds of various televisions played.

“These are the employee living quarters,” Nemuri explained.

She walked them down to the very last room that read ‘Guest Bedroom number four’ and opened the wooden door. Inside was a small futon, covered in satin black bedding directly in the middle of the floor. There was a tiny bathroom with a shower off to the side and a small vase of yellow daffodils placed next to the window along with a black chair.

All three sets of eyes glanced down at the futon on the floor and the single pillow.

“I only prepared a single bed,” Nemuri said with a flat chuckle. “I can grab an extra pillow, but I don’t have a second futon available right now. Everything else is occupied. I hope you don’t mind this until another futon becomes available.”

“That won’t be necessary. One bed is fine,” Katsuki said.

They shared a small quiet moment. Katsuki shrugged as if it wasn’t something to fret about. Izuku supposed it wasn’t at this point. No matter their lack of label, they had shared a bed so many times now it was basically second nature.

“Well, alright! Perfect then!” Nemuri cheered. “That completes the tour. Dinner will be ready in the grand hall in about an hour and after that you two can do what you want. My only house rules are that you both be inside by 22:30. No trouble making. Don’t bring strangers into the living quarters and don’t disclose to anyone the reason you’re staying here. Is that all clear?”

“Clear,” both Izuku and Katsuki replied.

“Good. Now, you can get settled in and tomorrow you’ll get to work.”

Izuku blinked rapidly and Katsuki cocked his head.

“Wait—work?” Izuku blurted out before he could stop himself.

“Oh yes! I forgot to mention that you’re both employed, congrats!” Nemuri belted out a laugh with her whole chest. She lightly bopped Izuku’s nose with the end of her fan. “This helps me pay for housing, food, and anything else you may need. You start your shifts in the morning with cleaning the baths, floors, and servicing guests. I’ll get you both your uniforms in the morning.”

Izuku smiled and nodded. At least they would have something to fill the time.

“Well go on, get settled in,” Nemuri said to them. She shooed them inside of the room slightly in a hurry. “I’ll see you two in an hour. I need to go back to organizing all the inventory.”

Izuku and Katsuki shuffled inside of the small bedroom. They said thank you with still a tinge of awkwardness from earlier sprayed on them. They accidentally caught each other’s gazes and blushed once more, making Nemuri give a cheeky smile.

She winked and slid close the door, boxing them in the room uncomfortably tight.

Katsuki sucked in a deep breath. He immediately dropped his bag unceremoniously down to the ground. It hit the floor with a heady thud and Katsuki kicked it into the corner with his boot, clearly exhausted from the drive up. He chucked his helmet into the corner on top of the bag and stripped himself of his coat immediately.

Izuku slowly moved to do the same.

He placed down his duffle bag, helmet, and coat in the opposite corner.

He stared at the small futon on the floor and back at Katsuki.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They uncomfortably waded in the room for a couple of minutes. When they began to choke on the awkwardness, Katsuki suggested they walk around to familiarize themselves with the building. Izuku jumped at the offer, not wanting to be held in that stuffy compact space any longer.

As they strolled, Izuku winced as pain radiated up his spine. He had been fairly good at ignoring it so far, but the ache in his backside was not subsiding the way he thought it was going to. He winced a bit as the limp in his walk was exactly the same as when they left the motel in Osaka.

He guessed riding on the motorcycle for so long helped nothing.

Katsuki seemed to notice it too and was discreetly hovering one of his hands in case Izuku fell.

By the time dinner rolled around, the sun was beginning to set earlier than it used to. The sky was a desaturated gray blue and the fog from earlier had thickened up like there was a gathering storm on the way.

They entered the grand hall side by side. Straightaway, the savory smells of food greeted them.

Inside was a large hall of tables, likely for guests. All of which were empty at this time of night, and sitting off in the corner were exactly two dozen people perched at two round tables all in bathhouse uniforms.

At one table was Nemuri. She was sitting closest to the window, munching happily on a sweet treat. All the people at her table were quiet, deep in thought. While no one acknowledged at each other, a large man in a red apron set steaming food down with a serious face.

Nemuri didn't seem to be bothered by the quietness, too far focused on eating her early desserts. She hummed happily as she chewed then turned to face them as they drew closer.

"Welcome! You made it just in time," Nemuri called out. She waved them down and pointed happily to the two seats next to her right side. "The food just finished cooking."

Izuku smiled happily at the warm welcome.

His heart jumped nervously at the kindness as he walked over to one of the empty chairs. He tried to keep a gentle smile graced on his lips as he pushed through his nerves. There were also many people looking at him and Katsuki now. Everyone was smiling, and all eagerly welcomed them with profound kindness that Izuku still struggled to understand.

Izuku chose the chair closest to Nemuri. He quietly said hello to all the other new people. Katsuki followed suit and said hello to the table full of new faces.

As Izuku slid in the seat, pain shot up his backside again.

He stiffened a bit, wincing as he tried to lean his weight off the main source of pain.

No one else around seemed to notice, all too busy with the heaps of food that were being shoveled on to their plates. But when Izuku glanced behind him, he saw Katsuki guiltily looking down at him.

Katsuki pursed his lips to the side. He then proceeded to lean over and tap Nemuri on the shoulder. She perked up and turned to him with a mouth full of food.

"Er, do you happen to have a seat cushion or pillow by any chance?" Katsuki asked in a low whisper so no one else could hear. "He sort of needs one to sit on."

Nemuri nearly choked on her food in surprise and Izuku's eyes went as wide as saucers.

"Of course," Nemuri quickly said as Izuku's face turned a deep, scathing red. "There's some off in the corner right there." She pointed towards the cabinet in the back of the hall.

"Thanks," Katsuki quietly murmured.

Without sparing Izuku a look, he walked over to that side of the room Nemuri had pointed him towards.

As Katsuki did this, Izuku thought his face was going to melt right off from the heat gathering in his cheeks. He so badly wanted to hide his face but resisted so no more attention could be drawn towards him.

When Katsuki came back, he had a light tinge of pink across on his face. In his hands was the world's fluffiest seat cushion. It was light purple with a floral design and golden tassels hanging off the side.

"Lift up," Katsuki commanded simply.

Izuku did so without a fight.

The embarrassment spilled from his cheek down to his neck and chest. The sweltering heat burned inside of him, threatening to consume him whole as Katsuki placed down the seat pillow and fluffed it a bit. When Izuku sat back down, his body practically rejoiced. It was as soft as a cloud.

Izuku visibly relaxed and his shoulders crept down from his ears. Katsuki smiled ever so slightly and took a seat next to him. He assessed Izuku dearly.

“Better?” He asked quietly.

“Better.” Izuku once again couldn’t help but smile shyly. “Thank you.”

“No problem at all, just glad you’re comfortable.”

Their gazes caught for a second and tender smiles were exchanged between them.

“Who are these two new additions?” Someone finally asked.

Izuku turned to see the owner of the velvety voice. It was a tall woman with short blonde hair chopped off at her ears. She had striking, gray-blue eyes that matched the way the sky was outside the window.

“I’m so happy you asked,” Nemuri replied cheerily. She slyly smiled at the blonde woman and then gleefully gestured beside her. “Everyone! This is Izuku and Katsuki. They’re a favor I’m fulfilling for a good friend of mine. They’re going to be staying with us for a while, so everyone be nice to them and don’t be too nosy. Give them their space while they’re here.”

The small warning tacked at the end seemed to make everyone nod in understanding.

“So nice to meet you both, I’m Ryuko,” the blonde woman said. She then pointed beside her at another blonde woman who had long hair that stopped at her waist. “This is my cousin, Takeyama. The big guy who is putting food on everyone’s plate is Sekijiro. He’s the house chef.”

Izuku smiled as Sekijiro filled his bowl up with savory noodles and vegetables.

Nemuri leaned in and whispered only for Izuku to hear, “Be sure to tell Sekijiro you like his cooking later, it’ll make him super happy. He’s been working on this broth all month.”

Izuku giggled a bit and smiled at Nemuri. He waved at everyone and said, “nice to meet you all.”

“Same,” Katsuki echoed. “Thank you for allowing us to crash here for a while.”

“It’s an open house really,” Ryuko explained. “Nemuri has done a great job at providing a perfect work-living situation for those who need it. It’s always a pleasure to see new faces. We have so many people coming in and out of here.”

Izuku waited for more explanation, but nothing came.

Everyone began eating quietly the second Sekijiro sat down. On the chef's face was an extremely dejected pain that mirrored across everyone.

Even Nemuri seemed to have this same type of sadness weaved in and out of her eyes. Hers was a bit more well-hidden as she tried to mask it behind over-enthusiastic smiles. But it showed through like true sadness always does.

"What's up with all the long faces around here?" Katsuki asked abruptly.

Everyone's eyes snapped up to look at them and Izuku resisted elbowing him in the side.

"Ah. Our mayor's daughter passed away," Nemuri explained sadly. "Sorry for the glum mood. Was it that obvious?"

"Just a bit," Izuku whispered. "I'm sorry to hear about her passing."

"It's okay," Nemuri muttered. "You have nothing to be sorry for. But everyone around here is going to be a bit gloomy for the next week or so I imagine."

"Did you all know her well?" Katsuki asked curiously as he ate.

"Yes," Sekijiro answered. The happiness in his eyes faded away like a glimmering star behind a cloud. "She was like the sun around here because she was this huge socialite. Everyone knew her and she would throw these grand fabulous parties for free and let people come and mingle."

"She was also preparing to be the next mayor," Ryuko added with tight lips. "We were all looking forward to it because she basically knew everyone by name individually. It made sense for her to be the next in line. She finally made this foggy city feel like a community."

Izuku noted how Ryuko's cousin, Takeyama, didn't say anything.

There was a distant faraway gaze in Takeyama's eyes as she pushed around the food on her plate.

"That's so sad," Izuku muttered. "I'm sorry for all of your losses."

"Thank you, Izuku," Nemuri said. She tried her best to smile and put up the happy-go-lucky persona she had carefully curated. But Izuku could see it wasn't sticking this time as much. "I guess everyone is just finding it tough to adjust without her because it happened so suddenly."

"If you don't mind me asking, how did she pass?" Izuku probed carefully, curiosity in bloom.

"It was a car accident," Nemuri answered gravely. "Car crash. The fog here gets so thick sometimes that it is hard to see. It was so heavy the day she was coming back from work, and it caused someone to veer into the opposite lane. They had a head on collision at high-speed leaving three injured, one dead."

The sound of skidding tires reverberated in Izuku's head. He unfortunately imagined everything.

"That's horrible," Katsuki muttered. "I'm really sorry you all are experiencing that."

"At the end of the week her father is hosting an impromptu lantern festival to honor her," Nemuri said. "It's something she would've liked, to bring everyone in the city together one more time. But she wouldn't want it to be all about her since her parties never were. Her gatherings were always honoring other people. So, this festival will be in her ways. Everyone attending is allowed to remember the memory of their own loved ones who have passed."

Both Izuku and Katsuki grew quiet.

A mountain of names appeared before Izuku.

He could visualize all the faces of his fallen siblings in front of him. They all wore pale, grisly expressions and were maimed in the very way he killed them. Aoyama's neck was nearly in two, while Ibara's was full of holes. Jin's skull was nearly blown open from a gunshot. And Hiryu was there, with the bullet hole between his eyes.

But standing in front of them was Mitsuki.

No wounds. No blood. She was as beautiful as the day she was killed.

Her name hung over both of their heads.

The silence between them became tangible again, and Izuku didn't dare look over to Katsuki. Guilt trickled down his sides. He hung his head, allowing his bangs to cover his eyes, and slowly began eating.

"She sounds like she was incredibly thoughtful," Katsuki whispered in a taut tone. Izuku nearly winced at the pain inside of it. "Her father must've known her very well to know this is something she would like."

"They were incredibly close," Nemuri said sadly. "Truly an admirable father-daughter bond."

Not another word was really said after that. Nemuri grew quiet. Ryuko distantly gazed out the window. Takeyama didn't touch her food. Sekijiro did his best to keep people's plates stacked with vegetables while wearing a dejected gaze.

They all sat there, suspended in grief.

ᔓᔓᔓ

As he showered that night, Izuku wondered if grief was a lack of gravity at its core.

People were anchors in each other's lives in some way, keeping each other tethered to reality. Some people even kept others connected to this earth. It wasn't uncommon that when someone died, sometimes their loved one simply couldn't go on without them. Some pass directly behind the person they loved. Or some spiraled into madness much like that violinist they used to know.

Izuku imagined all the people someone loved as anchors.

The weight of the anchor depended on the depth of the love they held for them. The more, the heavier. One by one, if the rope to these anchors is cut, then that would leave someone floating. They would be suspended in air—all by themselves mourning the loss of the ones who kept them grounded.

That's what this town felt like.

They had lost their anchor, and now, they were suspended in grief.

That's what Katsuki seemed like as well.

He lost his anchor five years ago, and he seemed suspended in grief ever since. Never moving on. Never processing it. To Izuku, Katsuki's grief over his mother remained so stagnant because his love for her was mixed up in so many other, sometimes conflicting, emotions.

Katsuki felt an abundance of responsibility for her yet suffered from her neglect. He had to push down his own needs day after day to cater to hers. He was a devoted son so much that he didn't have any other identity of his own outside of her. And because of that, she really was one of the only things keeping Katsuki tethered to reality.

Izuku turned off the shower and proceeded to get out. He dried his body thoroughly, re-bandaged his wounds, and changed into the one pair of pajamas Nana had packed for him.

When he opened the door, he got an earful of Katsuki on the phone.

"Sero, I don't give a shit if he's on vacation, you push me through to him right now," Katsuki hissed with his back turned to Izuku. "Tell him it's an emergency. Like a really big emergency involving the Yakuza. I fucked up big time. Please. Get him to call me."

Katsuki was standing only in his black boxers in the middle of the room. He had already showered and then informed Izuku he didn't exactly bring pajamas. So, he was going to be sleeping in his underwear.

Izuku moved to the futon and Katsuki glanced over his shoulder.

They held eye contact for a moment of silence. Izuku could see a soft, weary feeling pouring through those lovely red eyes. The person on the other end of the phone audibly sighed and said something Izuku couldn't hear.

Katsuki's eyes sparked and he began nodding eagerly.

“Okay,” Katsuki agreed quickly. “Thank you, Sero. Really, I owe you one. I’ll be waiting for his call.”

Katsuki said his goodbyes and hung up. He walked over to the nightstand and plugged in the charger to his black phone. He shuffled over to the futon as well and when Izuku got in, he was surprised to feel several more comforters laid down on top of the futon.

“I, uh, asked Nemuri for extra padding while you were in the shower,” Katsuki murmured. “Does it help at all?”

Izuku blushed the color of candy. He got into the covers and was pleasantly surprised at how cushioned the futon was. It was better than a cloud, it was like floating on air. He didn’t feel any ache in his legs and the soft surface was like a giant Band-Aid.

He smiled at Katsuki as he put his head down.

“It does help a lot,” Izuku admitted. “I can barely feel anything. Thank you again for taking care of me.”

Katsuki fiddled with his fingers slightly as he studied Izuku. He forcefully smiled and said, “of course.”

Katsuki walked across the room and turned off the lights. The pale moonlight skated across his skin, and Izuku looked at the fresh bandage wrapped around Katsuki’s gunshot wound. He turned to Izuku then and glanced at the sliver of space next to him.

Izuku scooted over the best he could, and Katsuki joined him in the bundle of comforters.

Their arms pressed flush against each other.

The warmth was like a blazing fire. Izuku always adored the way Katsuki ran hot, and even now, he wished he could cuddle into it more. He wondered if that would be weird, as they still hadn’t discussed anything.

They both laid on their backs looking up at the ceiling, unsure of what exactly to do. Izuku twirled his thumbs, trying to think of something to talk about. But when he racked his brain, he found nothing but Mitsuki staring back at him. His heart dropped instantly.

Izuku turned away to hide his pained expression.

“Goodnight, Katsuki.”

“…Goodnight, Izuku.”

In the middle of the night, Izuku was stirred awake by an arm wrapping around his waist.

It was familiar and he could tell the texture of the skin purely from memory at this point. He leaned into it through his sleepy haze and snuggled closer on the pillow automatically. He turned his body inwards, facing the heat that was radiating against him.

When he fluttered his eyes open, his heart skipped a beat.

Katsuki was awake, staring at him with lost eyes.

He was floating. Without gravity.

He looked so sad as he shuffled in more. He dragged Izuku closer, hooking his arms all around Izuku's body. Their legs tangled and Katsuki shifted so that Izuku was locked in. The closer he got, the more gravity seemed to return to his eyes. Their noses brushed for a moment, and Katsuki hesitantly ran a hand through Izuku's hair.

They looked at each other wordlessly in the dark.

Then Katsuki drew closer. He rested their foreheads together and closed his eyes once more. Izuku closed his eyes too, and he wrapped his arms around Katsuki's body. The heat sunk into him, and he felt like he could sleep peacefully again.

It was here Izuku felt his heart tug. It pulled in the direction of Katsuki fiercely, making him nuzzle in closer. Katsuki gripped him lovingly, as if afraid to let go.

This was the night Izuku realized Katsuki was his only anchor. He was more than that, really.

Katsuki was his gravity.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They were put to work bright and early. Nemuri came pounding on their door at exactly 7:00 in the morning with their uniforms. Izuku's was a size too big, and Katsuki's was a smidge too small for him.

She showed them the room they oversaw cleaning before guests came in today, and it ironically was the beach room. Fake plastic trees were stationed everywhere, halfway blown up and the walls were painted pink and sea-form green.

It reminded Izuku of Okinawa in a way. He suddenly deeply missed that trip, and how different everything had been back then. He looked to his side to see Katsuki staring blankly at the painting of the beach on the wall. He seemed dejected as well.

When they were handed the bucket and scrub, Nemuri patted them on the back cheerfully.

"You boys have fun!" She said in a sing-song voice. "Make sure to make it shine by nine!"

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku scrubbed the tile of the beach room with all his best efforts.

He tried his greatest to put all his strength in his motions until he saw the concrete between the tiles turn from gray to white. The work was surprisingly rewarding and gave him something to keep his mind occupied.

Curiously, Izuku looked across the way.

On the other side of the room underneath one of the fake plastic palm trees was Katsuki. He was squatting as he scrubbed with the deepest frown Izuku had ever seen on him. He glanced up and did a small double take at Izuku, who was gazing at him unabashed.

Katsuki awkwardly waved.

Izuku felt that pull in his heart again.

He blushed a bit and stood up. He grabbed his bucket and walked over to squat beside Katsuki. He began scrubbing next to him. They exchanged tiny, knowing stares, and quietly worked next to each other, side by side for the next hour.

About halfway through their cleaning, Izuku wiped his brow from sweat. These floors were far dirtier than he ever imagined. He checked the heart shaped clock on the wall and saw they had about an hour left. Izuku stood up to grab a cup of water.

But when he tried to step forward, he slipped backwards. He gasped when his heel connected with a wet bar of soap on the slippery tile.

Izuku's eyes widened, Katsuki's did too.

Izuku twisted easily to catch himself. He had good reflexes and tripping wasn't a big deal.

But instead of hitting the floor, he suddenly slammed into Katsuki who leapt into action to catch him. Their heads knocked together with an agonizing slam, and both yelled in pain. They went tumbling backwards into the blow-up palm tree behind them and it fell on them with a humorous bounce.

Izuku opened his eyes as Katsuki hissed.

Izuku winced as he pulled back. He tried to roll from off top of Katsuki but was locked in place by a protective hold.

"Holy fuck." Katsuki let out a groan of pain. "Why the hell is your head so hard?"

"My brother always said I have a thick skull," Izuku grumbled as he rubbed his head. "Not in a good way though."

"He was right. I think I'm seeing stars. Remind me never to be head-butted by you."

"Same for you, your head felt like a rock. Why would you jump in the way like that?"

Katsuki cringed as he finally opened his eyes. "I was afraid you were going to hurt yourself. I was trying to catch you but clearly that failed."

“But I have good reflexes, you know that.”

“I forgot for a moment.”

“You forgot I’m a trained assassin?”

Katsuki scoffed. He tried to quell a laugh, but it slipped past his lips.

“Ya, I guess I did forget, huh?” Katsuki chuckled. He laughed more, and it built up. He smirked a bit and shook his head. “Maybe you have to shoot me again to remind me. I’m so goddamn stupid sometimes.”

He kept laughing and soon Izuku joined in. Izuku sat up on Katsuki’s lap and Katsuki propped himself up with his elbows. With an amused smirk, the handsome blonde slapped the plastic palm tree away when it tickled his shoulders.

“You were just trying to protect me,” Izuku giggled. “Not the worst thing in the world.”

“Tell that to the concussions that we just probably gave each other.”

The laughter in the air was beautiful.

It mingled with a dancing melody as Katsuki doubled down. He threw his head back and snorted as Izuku tried to slap a hand over his own mouth. Naturally, Katsuki sat up more, and Izuku shifted to get off him, but Katsuki kept him seated.

Firm hands settled on his waist and held him in place as Katsuki leaned up all the way. He gazed down at Izuku lovingly, and the adoration was so potent in the moment as they laughed together.

Izuku tilted his head.

He was entirely enamored with how handsome Katsuki was with a grin on his face. He glowed like this, teeth on display and smile lines deeply dented. Izuku realized he hadn’t seen Katsuki this chock-full of happiness in nearly a month.

He missed this.

Izuku didn’t think much as he pushed a hair out of Katsuki’s face. But the second his fingers grazed Katsuki’s skin, it was like zapping all the joy out of the moment.

Katsuki stopped laughing.

His face sobered up immediately. He moved his hands off Izuku’s waist like he was being burned and leaned back.

They stared at each other and all the magic that had gathered died. Katsuki cleared his throat and Izuku’s heart nearly broke. He moved off Katsuki’s lap and hugged his arm. He hung his head away when he once more could feel the eyes of Mitsuki staring at them.

“You’re…having a difficult time being around me,” Izuku whispered, finally breaking the barrier on the unspoken issue between them. “Sorry. I’ll try to keep my distance.”

Katsuki whipped his head up, eyes wide. “Izuku, no—”

“I get it.” Izuku spoke over him. He shook his head, not wanting to be coddled. “I-I’m having a hard time too. But I imagine you more so, rightfully, since she was your mom. I don’t blame you at all, really. If it gets too hard, I can leave the room. Or we cannot speak for a while to ease the hurt—”

“—Izuku, it’s not that.”

Katsuki shifted to sit across from Izuku. He sagged his shoulders and struggled to make eye contact yet again. Izuku bit his lip and tugged at his wrists.

“You feel like loving me would be a betrayal to her, right?” Izuku whispered.

Katsuki didn’t say anything. But he didn’t have to, his silence and the pain that ran across his eyes was enough.

He turned his head away and quietly nodded.

Izuku hung his head. “I feel that way too, honestly. I have this overwhelming guilt for killing her and now here I am, in love with her son. I feel…selfish. And I don’t want to be selfish.”

“Me either,” Katsuki confessed with a wobbly voice.

Silence.

It stretched on, wrapping them both in it. Izuku looked around the room, suddenly feeling angry at the pink walls they were trapped in. How did they always wind up surrounded by the opposite of what they were feeling?

“But…the issue I have isn’t with you, specifically,” Katsuki muttered suddenly. “I’ve been thinking about a lot of things since the night at the water tower.”

Izuku lifted his head up. They made eye contact and Katsuki dropped his head lower between his shoulders.

“What type of things have you been thinking about?” Izuku dared to ask.

“Like how I’ve killed people’s parents too.”

Izuku’s eyes softened when he realized where Katsuki’s head was.

“My very first kill, he was a father,” Katsuki admitted quietly. “I orphaned his daughter according to my ex-supervisor. Then my very first mark, he was also a father. I had accidentally shot him right in front of his very young son, who was in the room. I didn’t even see the kid standing there until I checked through my lens after.”

Izuku imagined a small child leaning over the limp body of his father.

“I’m sure there’s more,” Katsuki whispered in agony. “I’m responsible for just as many parentless people in the world as you probably are. Because when I killed that guy when I was thirteen, I didn’t stop and consider if he had a family. All I knew is that it was sink or swim. Kill or be killed.”

“You walked in on that man with a gun to your mother’s head,” Izuku muttered. “There was no time to consider if he had a family, Katsuki.”

“Exactly,” Katsuki agreed. “And you had a machete to your throat when you pulled the trigger and killed my mother. It was killed or be killed then too because a mark is a mark, right? How can I blame you without being a hypocrite? But…I do feel guilty. Because while all those people were parents, my mother was still my mother. And my mother was spiteful.”

Katsuki ran his head through his hair and shook his head.

“She held onto grudges like a goddamn leech,” Katsuki spat. “She’s mainly where I get my attitude from—but. She also was a believer in new beginnings. She never thought it was too late to start over. She did it countless times. She lived more lives than I ever knew, and she always was prepared to take a new clean slate because she believed it was never too late.”

She sounded more and more lovely every time Katsuki described her.

“I’m so sorry,” Izuku whispered. “I know there’s no amount of sorrys that can heal what you’re feeling, b-but I don’t think I can ever express how truly sorry I am.”

“I know,” Katsuki whispered somberly. “I’m sorry too. I just wish I could talk to her. I want to know what she would want me to do in this situation if that makes sense. I keep trying to figure out what she would say, or what advice she would give to make this guilt easier—But…I don’t know. I can’t tell if she would choose spite or new beginnings.”

Tears welled in both of their eyes, and they looked at each other.

They didn’t move as they remained suspended in their grief.

Izuku thought about all that happened. He unwillingly found himself piled under all the guilt he was feeling. It was all too much and too wide. Like an ocean that had dried up and he needed to cross it to see the other side.

But all he could find was barren land that stretched so endlessly.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The next week passed with enough stale awkwardness that Izuku could potentially bottle it up and sell it.

During this time, Izuku wordlessly would watch as Katsuki checked his black phone repeatedly. He waited for the call that never came and Izuku was beginning to grow a bit worried. He hoped nothing happened to Katsuki's ex-supervisor.

They put their full heart into working to pass the time. There were little customers, however. Just like Nemuri said there would be. And the lack of business meant more time alone with each other.

As a result, Izuku and Katsuki did a strange shuffle around the other while still sharing a bed. Every night it was like they indulged in the guilty pleasure of each other's warmth, and in the morning, it seemed as if they wanted to wash it off.

Izuku didn't say much as this happened, and neither did Katsuki.

The pensive air around them was tangible enough that the other employees could practically see Mitsuki herself standing between them, keeping them apart.

When the night of the festival came, Izuku debated on going.

It seemed a bit odd for him to attend. Everyone he would light a lantern for, he killed, and he was sure that would earn him some rightful hauntings in the long run. He originally was going to stay in his room, or maybe re-clean the beach room, but Nemuri insisted that they both go.

"It's what she would have wanted," Nemuri said, referring to the woman who the festival was for. "I even got you guys the right size kimonos. We'll all be matching a bit, isn't that cute?"

Izuku didn't want to be rude and decline their host.

So here he was, putting on a purple, black and red kimono that matched Katsuki's. He tightened the sash on it and put the black haori over his shoulders.

Katsuki did the same, and there was an evident pensiveness tucked away on the back of his mind.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they arrived at the festival it was haunting in a beautiful way.

Hundreds, if not thousands, of people were gathered all around holding up lanterns. Each lantern in a person's hand mimicked a burning, lost soul. The tall buildings all around them were dimmed, as if they were giants closing their eyes in respect for the dead. The fog had thickened up, letting only what was near to be visible.

Nemuri led them to the front of the festival. There were a large crowd of people gathered, being handed lanterns and matches. Everyone was lighting a flame, and then heading towards the town square.

All the employees of the bathhouse grabbed a lantern and inscribed a loved one's name on the paper material.

Izuku stepped forward, but stopped when Katsuki didn't follow.

He turned back. Katsuki was standing there, as if frozen in time. He looked despondent as he glanced around at the many people all holding hands.

Woefully scarlet eyes looked towards Izuku.

"Should I get one?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku was surprised he was even being consulted.

He could see there was an invisible rope holding Katsuki back. But in the quiet part of Izuku's mind, he knew Katsuki needed something like this. This would be a healthy outlet to begin the course of processing his mother's death.

Izuku nodded, well assured. "I think you should."

Katsuki took his advice. He stepped forward in the line and took a lantern from off the table. The wind blew as he did this, and there was the feeling of a fog of ghosts hovering all over them. Katsuki looked down at the unlit lantern and then picked up the sharpie.

With an unsteady hand, Katsuki transcribed his mother's name.

Izuku resisted the urge to hold his hand.

Katsuki grabbed a match and together they walked into the crowd. They met up with the rest of the group from the bathhouse and all together they marched towards the town square.

When they arrived, there was an older man with thick silver hair standing on a stage. He was in front of a podium, gazing across the sea of citizens with the bluest gaze Izuku had ever seen. It looked troubled, and mournful beyond his years.

"That's the mayor," Sekijiro whispered to Izuku.

Izuku nodded in understanding. Now it all made sense.

When the tribute started, Izuku's heart clenched as he gazed around at all the people holding lanterns. He was one of the few who weren't. He wondered what the stories were in this dense crowd. Who lost someone and how? Were some of the people who Katsuki and Izuku affected in this crowd amongst them?

Izuku grimly pondered on the last thought. His eyes shifted to look down at the unlit lantern in Katsuki's hands.

The mayor gave a beautiful speech. It was full of love, hope, and a perfect tribute to his daughter who shined as bright as a star. Everyone around them was brought to tears, and it made both Izuku and Katsuki nearly cry as well.

The mayor then lit his lantern.

Like a domino effect, suddenly all the lanterns in the crowd began to light up. The space began to illuminate with yellow light in the dense fog. A clear visual of the rows and rows of people all gathered was revealed.

Katsuki exhaled shakily. He tried to light his lantern with the match. He failed the first three times, and Izuku could see the growing frustration begin to build. Katsuki wearily glanced around at all the new flames and his fingers began shaking.

Izuku stepped forward quickly. He held his hands out as a shield against the vicious wind over the small wick.

Katsuki looked up at him, surprised but thankful. His eyes softened as he lit the lantern without issue. Together they protected the flame as Katsuki safeguarded it with his own hand now. Izuku moved away and caught Nemuri looking at them both gently.

The mayor then stepped down and held up his lantern.

The elder man led the way with his head held high. He walked through the fog that surrounded them towards the river. Everyone began following, and soon they found themselves up where the river connected to the mountain. It flowed down from the beautiful mountain and traveled straight into the ocean.

Everyone began to spread out on either side of the long stream.

The fog rolled over the water like a whisper.

The mayor stepped forward first. From his position at the top of the river, he let go of the lantern holding his daughter's memory. He watched her leave, and there was something beautiful about the action. He observed with eyes full of love, not grief, as she drifted away.

One by one, everyone began to let their lanterns go as hers passed.

By the time her lantern made it to where Izuku and Katsuki were, it was a full collection of memories drifting by them. Hundreds of names from people neither of them knew, but they still felt bonded to. Izuku glanced around, and found everyone sharing hugs and sad, gentle smiles. The whole crowd was bonded in the one universal human experience: loss.

All the employees from the bathhouse began to let their lanterns go.

Soon everyone around them did the same.

They watched as person after person placed down a lantern, letting it go into the narrow stream. The beautiful red and yellow lights tangled with each other and mingled into the crowd.

Izuku noted how Katsuki held on to the lantern with his mother's name tightly. His fingers were trembling slightly, as if afraid to let go. The look in his eyes was close to a lost boy all alone in the crowd. He observed people do what he couldn't.

Nemuri then turned to Katsuki and placed a kind hand on his shoulder.

“Take your time,” she said gently. “We’re all going to go back to the bathhouse now. When you’re ready, head home. No curfew tonight.”

Katsuki nodded stiffly. Nemuri gave Izuku a knowing glance and Izuku mouthed ‘thank you’ to her.

The bathhouse employees left them there, and soon the crowd began to thin out.

Katsuki held the lantern close to his chest and Izuku didn’t push him.

They began to walk down the river in the night air side by side, watching all the lanterns light up the scene. When they came down to the end of the river near the ocean, they finally stopped. Katsuki stared out at the endless, dark horizon that was coated in fog.

Izuku counted each lantern in his head as their lights disappeared into the fog to the other side.

“Why did it have to be you?” Katsuki muttered. “Out of all people, why you?”

Izuku wanted to blame fate.

But he was truly questioning the concept of fate lately.

“I don’t know,” Izuku said instead. “I wish it wasn’t.”

“Me too,” Katsuki whispered.

Katsuki had been right about consequences versus fate. So far, all Izuku has done is face the consequences of his bloodied actions. He watched as Katsuki’s dejected eyes drowned more in his ocean of sadness. He lowered his head as he squatted down on the patch of grass next to the river.

Izuku joined him wordlessly, leaving enough room for the ghost of Mitsuki between them.

Katsuki painfully looked at the lantern in his hands. The yellow light illuminated his crestfallen face, making him appear younger than he was. A line of countless lanterns passed them by on the river. One by one they watched them go while the one in Katsuki’s hand stayed rooted in place.

Katsuki turned to Izuku.

“But even if it wasn’t you, another Viper eventually would’ve killed her, right?” He whispered.

Izuku flashed back to that night.

He remembered Himiko taking aim, and then stopping her.

“…Yes.” Izuku sadly admitted.

“And if I didn’t kill that guy when I was thirteen, he would’ve killed her.” Katsuki kept going, spiraling in his own endless void of thoughts. “And if I didn’t stop Aizawa, he would’ve killed her—and who knows who else.”

Katsuki clutched the lantern tighter in his hands as he began trembling.

“Y’know, I asked her once who would want her killed for owing a debt and she couldn’t even come up with a list. She said it could be anyone. Somehow, someone always would have likely killed her because she always had her past chasing her.”

Izuku pinched his brow together. “What type of past did she have?”

“That’s the thing, I don’t know.” Katsuki’s voice broke on the last word. “I will never know. That will always be an open ending for me because I realize I-I didn’t know my mom very well. But all I did know was that her gambling addiction put her in so much shit.”

Katsuki clenched his jaw.

“I still blame Chisaki for taking advantage of someone with an addiction. But I have to blame her a bit too, don’t I? All this time I thought she died because of a mistake I made—” Katsuki choked as he sucked in his lips. “When really, she died because it was a mistake she made. All this time, it had nothing to do with me.”

Katsuki shook his head and closed his eyes.

Izuku stayed silent and let Katsuki work through all the pain inside of him.

“She could never stay away from the things that put her in trouble,” Katsuki mournfully admitted. “No matter how much I wanted her to, she was always doomed from the start. And I think even my father knew that. It’s why his dying wish to a five year old was to take care of his mother. He knew she wouldn’t have been able to survive on her own—because her worst enemy was herself. B-But I couldn’t save her in the end…no matter how much we both loved each other.”

Katsuki looked down at the lantern in front of him like it was a puzzle.

The more he gazed at the flickering light, it seemed like the pieces inside of his head lined up more and more.

“My love for her was never enough and that always made me feel like I was never enough,” Katsuki whispered. “I cried, yelled and I screamed at her to be better. But she wasn’t capable. All I wanted was for her to live and see how much potential she had. She was the center of my world for so long and when she passed, I had no clue what to do with myself. I had never __”

Katsuki stopped at the words.

Izuku’s eyes grew full of pity.

He recalled when they first arrived at the estate in Biei. Katsuki back then had seemed so lost, like he was in his own body for the first time. He had never relaxed or taken the time to consider himself for more than a brief second.

“I had never thought of putting myself first,” Katsuki admitted. “I sacrificed my grades in school for her. I took that job for her. I didn’t even have time to go out and make friends outside of work. I did all I could to take care of us—because that was all I ever knew. Just… take care of mom and be a good, grateful son.”

A moment of silence.

Katsuki’s face dropped as if a revelation dawned on him.

“…And that always kept me away from happiness because I was so preoccupied with centering her. Didn’t it?” Katsuki whispered.

Izuku wanted to agree.

He saw so much of himself in Katsuki. They were a mirror of each other with vastly different shackles chaining them to a life neither of them chose. But he didn’t say anything. He wanted Katsuki to keep going and work through what he was feeling.

He shifted closer and hugged his arms around Katsuki’s shoulders as a silent form of support.

Katsuki leaned his head against Izuku’s as he continued to talk through his pain.

“Y’know, I never had hobbies because I was too worried over her,” Katsuki whispered. “I worked too much to enjoy life because I needed to pay for two of everything. Part of the reason I gave up on ever finding a relationship was because I felt like I wouldn’t find the time. My whole life was about her—and even now, it somehow still is.”

Izuku hugged Katsuki tighter as his own tears began to spill down.

“I know she loved me to the full capacity she was able to, and I loved her too. I always will—but even now in a twisted way, she’s still blocking me from happiness. My grief over her is keeping me away from you. I think…I think if I ever want real happiness, I need to stop centering her. Don’t I?”

“I can’t tell you how to live your life, Katsuki,” Izuku mournfully whispered. “You have to do what you think is right.”

“I know. But the happiest I ever was in my life was with you at the estate,” Katsuki confessed. “It was the first time I wasn’t focusing on her in my whole life. I thought it was retirement making me happy, but it was you.”

He lifted his head and pulled away from the embrace.

He looked at Izuku like he was the only anchor left in his life.

“I want to be happy, Izuku,” Katsuki said. A tear rolled down his cheek. “Do you think I’m capable of it?”

“I do.” Izuku wiped away the tear tenderly. “I know you’re capable of it.”

Izuku looked down at Katsuki’s trembling hands holding the lantern. It threatened to fall at that moment.

He scooted in closer.

Delicately, Izuku placed his hands over Katsuki’s juddering fingers. The roughness of his skin stood out as all the callouses from his years shook underneath Izuku’s touch. Slowly, Katsuki stopped trembling with help. Their fingers wove together on the lantern.

Katsuki stared across from Izuku lovingly. Izuku stared back at him too.

They didn’t shy away from it this time and embraced the love they had for each other at that moment.

It felt like there were arms around them both, hugging them like a third presence was with them. They both glanced down at the lantern. They gave each other a silent, loaded gaze and both of their hearts began hammering in tandem. Katsuki bowed at the same time Izuku did and together, they gently put the lantern in the water.

They sat there quietly, watching it go with the others downstream.

It floated away into the ocean, disappearing to the other side of the fog.

Later that night, Izuku found himself dreaming.

He usually didn’t have such vivid dreams, but for the first time in his life, he dreamt in rich color he knew he would remember it when he woke up.

He was standing alone in shallow water at sunset. All around him was fog, but the sky was a lovely, warm shade of pink. Like the color of blush, or roses. Maybe even carnations. The whole atmosphere glowed like someone purposefully painted the scene with every shade of pink they could think of.

He tried to walk around and discovered he was wading through a shallow pool or water that reached his ankles. It was chilling, yet warm. He looked up and somewhere in the fog he could see a blinking, yellow light in the distance.

A heat rolled from it, and Izuku found himself pulled to it like a moth to a funeral pyre.

He walked forward, following the blinking light. The closer he got, the warmer his skin became. He trudged forward, squinting through the haze.

When he finally arrived at the glowing light, it morphed.

The small light shifted into a long line and then spread. Izuku shielded his eyes from the blinding glow that took over him, and when he looked forward again there was Mitsuki.

She was glowing in a radiating warmth as charming as her smirk.

Izuku felt his heart stop.

He dropped to his knees in the water and lowered his head immediately. Even in a dream, he didn't feel like he deserved to look straight at her. He kept his head down and began muttering a sleuth of apologies. Then a warm hand touched him.

She brushed his hair and squatted down in front of him. A gentle finger lifted his chin and forced him to look into her overwhelming radiance. Her dream version had taken the form of the only picture Izuku had seen of her.

In her hair were petals of pink carnations and the smell of flowers wafted off her.

"If you want to make it up to me, I think I know what you can do," she whispered.

Her voice carried like a breeze. Gentle, powerful, and moved Izuku to tears.

"What is it?" Izuku asked desperately. "I-I'll do anything."

"Take good care of him for me," She whispered.

If hearts could melt, Izuku's would do so right there. He looked into her eyes and saw all the love she had for Katsuki flash inside of them.

"I can do that," Izuku promised. "I will do that for you."

Mitsuki smiled. She chuckled in the same way Katsuki always did. Her sharp, scarlet eyes gazed at him approvingly as she tilted her head sadly. In the reflection of her eyes, Izuku saw the movie of her and Katsuki's life. He saw her hold him as a baby, raise him as a toddler and then spend time with him as a teenager. She loved him as purely as she could and it transcended through her.

"You probably could do a better job than I ever could taking care of him," Mitsuki said a bit woefully. "Just make sure my brat is happy. And try to get him to relax, okay? He needs it. He's too young to act this old."

"I'll do the best I can," Izuku said with a small smile.

"Good. Now, I think it's time to wake up. He's waiting for you."

ɯɯɯ

Izuku startled awake with a jolt.

He lightly gasped as his eyes shot open, and he rapidly blinked away the haze of sleep that was wrapped around his mind. He glanced around the room he was in, completely thrown off from the dream. He stared and stared at the wall until he realized where he was.

Izuku sighed tiredly and grabbed his head.

What a strange dream, he thought offhandedly. But despite knowing it was just a dream, he couldn't help but feel oddly content about what was said.

"Take good care of him," the phrase echoed in his head.

Izuku gradually sat up on the futon and rubbed his eyes. He looked over to where Katsuki should be—only to find it empty.

He glanced up, and there was the missing blond. He was sitting in the chair that was by the window. The soft sunlight glittered into the room and spilled across his high cheekbones like a painting. His eyes were turned down, regarding a flower in his hands.

He was toying with one of the yellow daffodils from the vase in his fingers. He twirled it, admiring all the petals. Katsuki turned his eyes to him, and Izuku was frozen in place by how heavy with love they were.

Katsuki smiled at him, with teary eyes. "I think I finally figured out what my mother would say."

Izuku's heart skipped a beat. He looked back with all the love he had in his heart. "What do you think she would say?"

"Well, I think if she met you, she would tell me: 'Oi. Brat," Katsuki changed his voice at the end with an amused smirk. "Stop being such a dick and go be with that cute guy. I always wanted you to end up with someone sweet like that. Besides, it's a damn miracle someone so nice can tolerate you'." Katsuki chuckled lightly. "Then she would hit me on the head for everything I've done."

Izuku laughed a bit, and Katsuki smiled as well. Slowly, he watched as the handsome man stood up out the chair and kneeled on the futon next to him.

Katsuki gazed at Izuku sweetly and placed the daffodil behind Izuku's ear.

"She would have loved you, darling," Katsuki said with a gentle voice.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below! <3 This chapter made me cry a bit but it felt cathartic to write. I hope it was the same for all of you ^^ I hope you all have an amazing weekend!!

Chapter 32: Sempre

Chapter Summary

Sempre (Qualifier) - Always

Izuku and Katsuki promise each other ‘always’.

Chapter Notes

Welcome back to this choocoo train of angst!! I'm so happy to have you guys along for this ride!

First, thank you to the LOML, Luna, for betaing like always :D and secondly, I hope you guys enjoy this big helping of fluff ^^ <3 I'm finding I am enjoying just writing cute moments more and more as we go. It helps balance everything out well!

Without further ado, I hope you enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 32 — Sempre

.

.

.

Izuku didn’t take the flower out of his hair that morning.

He happily hummed as he put on his uniform and repeated Katsuki’s words to himself.

“She would have loved you, darling.”

That was more validation than he could ever ask for. He didn’t even know he needed it until that moment. But the thought that Mitsuki would have liked him made him content. He felt thankful that he was lucky enough to be with her son.

As he got primped for the day, the love in his chest for Katsuki bloomed into something novel. It transformed from a burning passion to what he always imagined the feeling of a safe home to be like: Soft. Familiar. Calming. He felt secure as he looked at his reflection in the bedroom mirror. His eyes fixed on the bright, yellow daffodil.

As he studied the petals, the words from his dream echoed in his ears.

"Take good care of him for me."

He would be sure that happened.

After everything, watching over Katsuki felt right. It was a duty bestowed on him and he accepted every bit of it. But as he pondered this, his thoughts came to a halt.

Izuku looked off to the side when Nana came to mind. The pull in his heart tugged yet again, and he knew the answer to if he could go with her was now, no. He couldn't. The concept of starting a new life without Katsuki, his anchor, felt like no life worth living at all.

As if in sync with his thoughts, Katsuki emerged from the bathroom.

He was fully clothed in the lilac uniform and his wild hair was combed the best it could be. But Izuku noted how his shoulders were stiff as he fiddled with his cell. He twirled the black phone tiredly and put it in his pants pockets.

"Still nothing," Katsuki grumbled.

"It's okay," Izuku said sincerely. He smiled at Katsuki as he walked up to him. "Don't stress out too much about it."

"I know but, ugh." Katsuki huffed and rubbed his forehead. "I would feel better if that grumpy bastard at least sent a goddamn text."

"Have you tried to contact anyone else?"

"Yeah. I've called all my old coworkers but they're all on assignments right now. Everyone said the same thing: that the old man should be coming back to the country soon-ish. Apparently, the guy took a no-contact vacation to the Bahamas per doctor's orders. Something about high blood pressure."

Izuku pressed his lips into a thin, pensive line.

He knew that should be bad news, but he wasn't feeling as anxious as he should.

As of today, it had officially been a full week since they arrived at Midnight Sento.

Part of Izuku was worried. But more so, a large part of Izuku was simply grateful for the down time. It was a miracle Tomura hadn't shown up to drag him back to Hadeus. Even more so a miracle that they hadn't been stopped by any Yakuza affiliates.

Izuku had an inkling of hope that they would be afforded as much time as Hiryu was. It had taken them two years to ever find him. However, Izuku corrected himself right after having that thought. Hiryu hadn't been a priority. Izuku, on the other hand, was. Izuku was always Tomura's priority.

But he shook off that thought. Izuku didn't want to jinx it by worrying too much.

"It'll be okay," Izuku decided to say. "Once he comes back to Japan, he'll call, and it'll be fine."

Katsuki shook his head. "I don't know how you can remain so calm right now."

"Well, when I'm with you it's easy to be calm."

Katsuki's worried expression now sparked to life with surprise. He blinked, and then a tiny, lopsided smile bloomed on his face. With a delicate touch, he adjusted the daffodil behind Izuku's ear.

"You always say the sweetest damn things," Katsuki replied softly. "Did you want to keep the flower in your hair all day?"

"I did," Izuku smiled back at him. "Is that silly?"

"Not at all," Katsuki replied.

His eyes glimmered with an idea, and he held a finger up to signal 'hang on'. He walked over to his backpack and shuffled around for something. In his fingers he grasped a tiny object and walked back over to Izuku. He grinned, fully satisfied with his mini mission as he held up a bobby pin.

"Hold still," Katsuki murmured.

He leaned in and carefully pinned down the stem to Izuku's fluffy head of hair. When Katsuki pulled away, he admired Izuku like he was a painting he put the finishing touches on.

"There we go. Won't move an inch for the rest of the day," Katsuki said proudly.

A sudden pounding on the door rattled them both. They jumped a bit and whipped their heads to the loud, abrupt sound.

"Oi! You two are on sauna duty today!" Nemuri shouted from the other side. "Hurry up and get downstairs! You're already five minutes behind schedule!"

"We'll be down in a minute! Sorry about that!" Katsuki shouted back, matching her volume.

The banging subdued and they waited until the sound of her footsteps were out of ear shot. They turned to each other and snickered.

"C'mon," Katsuki said. "Let's hurry and get to work for the day."

They smiled at each other as they walked side by side out the room.

The sauna side of the bathhouse was officially Izuku's least favorite of all the rooms. Mainly because it took forever to clean. By the time they made everything sparkle the way Nemuri liked, Izuku could feel early on-set arthritis knocking at his joints.

The sauna section itself was enormous, filling an entire space large enough for at least a hundred people. Off along the sides were various themed saunas that each piqued interest in their own unique way. One sauna was shaped like an igloo, and it was entitled 'Ice Sauna'. Another next to it was made of pure wood and engraved with delicate designs on the inside. This one was called the 'Bamboo Sauna'.

It went on like this: The Charcoal Sauna, Salt Sauna, Ocher Sauna.

Then lastly the Amethyst Sauna, which was composed of an entire floor of rocks.

It was unique because the inside walls were encrusted with lavender gemstones while the door was glass. It was small enough for a duo and the temperature went up to an alarming 150C.

"It's broken," Nemuri had warned them when they first serviced this room. She had pointed very seriously to the temperature control pad on the side. "Regulation is that saunas absolutely cannot go above 75C, otherwise people can literally cook alive in here. But there's a giant warning on the inside to let people know."

Izuku thought about this as he cleaned the glass door for the Amethyst Sauna. He curiously looked at the control pad on the side that had a giant 'DO NOT TOUCH' sign on it in bright red lettering.

Izuku squatted down and wrung out his purple towel in the bucket.

Katsuki was polishing the tiles next to him. He peered at him occasionally with apprehensive eyes. Behind them was a litany of questions, waiting to be said. Then the first one finally came.

"Have you made up your mind about going with Nana or not?" Katsuki asked in a whisper. "I know you said you were contemplating it. But I think you really need to take it."

Izuku paused and hesitated. He stumbled visibly on his words and looked down to the murky water in the bucket.

Izuku's brows furrowed together. "I'm still not sure."

"What do you mean you're not sure?" Katsuki bit back. He put down his scrubber and leaned into Izuku's line of vision with a stern glare. He took Izuku's chin with his fingers and lifted his head. "Izuku. You have gotta take it. There's no way you will be safe from that evil ass brother of yours otherwise."

"I know but something is keeping me here," Izuku shamefully whispered.

"What? What could be so important that you don't want to get to safety?"

"...I don't want to leave you, Kacchan," Izuku admitted.

Katsuki's eyes widened with shock. He blinked rapidly at the admission, then his whole face softened.

"You've been unsure about going because of me?"

"Is that bad?" Izuku asked desperately, truly not knowing. "I don't want to leave you, Kacchan. I can't. I feel as if I physically can't. Every time I even think about it, my heart hurts in this awful way. How can I go on to a new, happy life knowing you could still be in danger? Or worse, killed?"

Katsuki's eyes grew sad, and he dropped his hand. "Izuku…"

Izuku whipped his head away quickly. He knew what Katsuki was going to say.

"I know, it's stupid," Izuku quickly blurted out before Katsuki could. He shook his head and screwed his eyes shut. "I know it's such a stupid damn decision. But I can't leave you like this, Katsuki. I care about you too much. I'm staying and you can't make me change my mind."

He waited for Katsuki to shout at him about how priceless this opportunity was.

But it never came. In place of a lecture, he got tender hands rubbing his shoulders. Izuku opened his eyes, and Katsuki fixed him with a subtle, pained smile.

"I was actually going to agree with you," Katsuki admitted. "I don't want to part ways again either."

Those were words Izuku wasn't prepared to hear. He perked up, surprised and unsure.

"Really?" Izuku questioned.

"Of course." Katsuki offered up a smile that felt like a half-lit moon. "I've had some time to process everything, sort of. Not fully, but enough. I've gone over a shit ton of scenarios and analyzed all the probable outcomes. And in every one where we're parting ways, I fuckin' hate it. It feels wrong, y'know? Like something really nasty is in my mouth and I get this lump in my throat. So, yeah. We should stay together."

He didn't realize he needed to hear those words from Katsuki. As they sunk in fully, Izuku was overcome with relief. Swiftly, as if every star aligned, it all clicked together like lock and key. His future that used to be so murky was now crystal clear, and the visual in front of him was the two of them.

Izuku asked right away, "Does this mean we should start looking for places to go since Nana is off the table?"

“Oh, no. You’re definitely going with Nana,” Katsuki shot down. “There’s no chance in hell I’m letting that not happen.”

Izuku frowned. “But you just said—”

“—I’ve decided I’m coming with you.”

Everything stopped.

Izuku’s eyes widened at that implication: Katsuki was going to start over with him.

And starting over meant leaving everything behind, including Katsuki’s burning need for revenge.

The spite that lived inside of Katsuki was like a pile of coals fueling his fire. It was deeply rooted, clearly inherited from his mother. Spite was one of Katsuki’s main reasons to live and because of that, Izuku questioned if it would be so simple for Katsuki to switch gears.

“You were right about the situation with me and the Yakuza,” Katsuki continued. “I’m in as much danger as you are. Now that my head is clearer and shit, I can think more logistically. I need to disappear as well if I ever want a chance to be happy and normal.”

“But what about Chisaki?” Izuku asked, unsure. “You said you had a plan to kill him, you can’t abandon that.”

“Forget I ever mentioned that,” Katsuki replied. There was a bite in his voice, but not towards Izuku. It was for something else. “There is no plan. Your safety is far more important.”

“But you’ve been craving revenge for your mother for years,” Izuku emphasized. “If you want, we can go try and kill Chisaki ourselves then try to get back to Nana in time.”

Katsuki didn’t say anything right away.

He took a long, thoughtful pause. It was as if he was picking his words carefully from a shelf and arranging them together.

“Going anywhere near Chisaki is too dangerous, Izuku,” Katsuki said, surprisingly levelheaded. “You shouldn’t be anywhere near him—especially after everything you told me. It’s too dangerous for you.”

“But…your mom,” Izuku whispered.

Solemnness clouded across Katsuki’s face.

“I know,” Katsuki agreed. “As much as it pains me to let that scum keep living, I gotta. The thought of never seeing you again is more painful than letting him live.”

He lifted his gaze and grasped one of Izuku’s hands. He folded the smaller hand inside of his own two large ones and smiled at Izuku with a gentle yet sad resolve.

He said solidly, “if I have to choose between a lifetime of happiness with you or a brief moment of revenge, I choose you. It’s what my mom would have wanted for me, I’m sure. But more importantly, it’s what I want for myself.”

The words struck Izuku in the heart.

“Are you positive?” Izuku whispered. “I don’t want you to regret this down the line.”

“I could never regret you, Izuku.”

Tears gathered in Izuku’s eyes. His heart was singing, melting, and soaring all at once. His hands began to lightly shake, and he placed his other hand on top of Katsuki’s folded ones. They looked at each other full of promises, and Izuku felt the shift in the air.

“Let’s promise to never let go again, okay?” Katsuki proposed. “Even if we decide things don’t work out between us down the line, I want us to always be in each other’s lives. No matter what.”

He smiled as his own eyes grew full of tears.

“Okay,” Izuku agreed with his whole heart. He smiled back at Katsuki and two tears of happiness slid down his cheek. “I promise to never let you go, Kacchan.”

“Always?” Katsuki asked.

“Always.” Izuku promised.

The longer Izuku gazed at Katsuki, he saw all the lovely versions of him flash before his eyes. They flickered like a montage in a black and white romantic movie. Every version of Katsuki was coated in stardust and woven with daydreams. They presented themselves in chronological order, from the young Kacchan to the present-day Katsuki.

But now, he saw the future Kacchan. He had age lines and snow-white hair that told the story of their battles and all the turmoil they overcame.

Izuku couldn’t wait to meet him.

“We’re finally going to get a shot of that new life together,” Katsuki said. “I guess it’s time to really start thinking about that flower shop of dead roses we said we were going to open, huh?”

He laughed, full of joy as he wiped Izuku’s tears away. Izuku nervously chuckled with him as he held on tightly to Katsuki. He clung to the lifeline in front of him as he began to imagine their beautiful future that was truly now possible.

“Yeah, I guess we do, don't we?” Izuku chuckled back at him. “Maybe we should start thinking about a name for it.”

He began shaking, trying to fully calm down but it was impossible. He was really getting his happy ending. It was so close and in reach for them—for once. They were finally aligned and all they had to do was make it to Nana. Together.

Katsuki gathered him for an embrace and Izuku's heart thumped loudly.

Warm. That was Izuku's first thought. Katsuki's whole body was always so warm in a welcoming way. Izuku memorized this feeling, as this would be his new home. He embraced Katsuki tightly and couldn't contain the joy that bubbled inside of him.

He laughed. He cried. He smiled as he pulled Katsuki closer and closer. Katsuki pulled away briefly, and his eyes were full of stars. The future of hope he held in them shone through as he touched the daffodil in Izuku's hair lovingly.

"Can I kiss you?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku nodded and caressed Katsuki's cheek. "Please do."

They leaned forward, and locked lips in a tender kiss.

It felt like finally coming home.

ᔓᔓᔓ

By the time lunch came, there was a visible pink bubble surrounding Izuku and Katsuki. It was warm and built of sickly-sweet stares. They walked through the hallway towards the dining hall hand in hand. Their joined arms swung lightly in tandem with their stride as they made their way to their normal seats.

When they finally sat down with everyone, neither of them let go and held hands under the table.

"Good afternoon, everyone," Izuku said cheerily. "I hope the morning treated you all well."

Katsuki gave a curt, short nod of acknowledgement to everyone. "Good afternoon."

"Well good afternoon to you too," Nemuri said curiously. "Someone's in a good mood."

"Ah ha, yeah I suppose so," Izuku said aloofly.

His head was too chock full of daydreams to really focus. He smiled happily at Katsuki. In return, Katsuki tried to hide the stupid grin on his face by rubbing his nose and sucking in his lips.

Curious glances were exchanged across the table.

Then Sekijiro came out of the kitchen. He was balancing several plates of food on his arms like he was in the circus. Everyone began hooting as the burly man set down all the food. An alluring steam rolled off the piles of vegetables and Izuku couldn't help but lean over and take a big inhale.

As they began eating, Izuku noted the difference in the atmosphere now. After the lantern festival last night, everyone's moods were beginning to lift like the fog outside. Smiles were flashed around the table as they discussed the influx of guests into the bathhouse this morning.

Izuku popped fruit after fruit in his mouth. The sweet taste of strawberries was always his favorite way to start his lunch. When he ate the last strawberry on his plate, Katsuki immediately noticed.

"Did you want some of my strawberries?" Katsuki asked Izuku. "You finished yours pretty fast."

"Oh! Sure, if you don't mind," Izuku agreed happily. "I love strawberries so much. I always eat them super quickly."

"Yeah. I know, nerd."

Katsuki gently smiled and pierced one piece of strawberry with his fork. He held it up and moved it towards Izuku's mouth without a second thought.

Naturally, Izuku let himself be fed. They had done this a lot while Izuku's ankle was healing. At first Izuku had been shy about it, but now it was as natural as breathing since Katsuki enjoyed doing it so much. Izuku happily hummed as he chewed on the fruit and Katsuki gladly gave him several more slices.

Silence captured the table.

Izuku peeked up to see all four sets of eyes gazing at them.

"Did you guys have a good cleaning session or something?" Nemuri teased, holding back a smile.

It dawned on him what they had done—in front of people. A blush as hot as coals lit up his cheeks. They tried to go back to eating regularly but everyone kept staring at them. Katsuki huffed and put down his fork with a scowl when it went on too long.

"Why are you all looking at us like we have roaches on our faces?" Katsuki blurted out.

Immediately, Izuku elbowed Katsuki in his side. "Kacchan—"

"—What? It's true. Look at them, they're all stupidly gawking." Katsuki dramatically waved his hand towards all the snickering people. "Go on. Spit it out, extras."

"Extras!" Sekijiro belted out. He grinned brightly at Katsuki. "What a funny term, I like you."

"Sorry, you have to excuse him," Izuku quickly apologized. He put his hands up in defense and shook his head. "He's not the best with people."

“Honestly, I’m just glad to see some of your personalities coming through,” Nemuri laughed. She leaned back in her chair and smiled brilliantly. “I was beginning to wonder if you two would be like knots on a log after sulking around here for a week.”

“So, you’re just observing us like wild animals?” Katsuki jeered.

“Sort of,” Ryuko said. She shrugged her shoulders. “We’re staring at you because we’ve all been wondering what you two are and uh, this happiness is a new development.”

“I guessed best friends,” Takeyama said with a kind smile. “But now I’m unsure. I don’t think best friends feed each other like that.”

“You don’t have the right kind of friends I think,” Nemuri replied. She winked at Takeyama and wiggled her eyebrows. “I spoon feed my friends all the time.”

Takeyama didn’t seem amused. She scoffed and said, “Which friends? The ones who call you ‘Mistress Midnight’ or the ones you’re actually friends with?”

“Both.” Nemuri replied cockily. “Do you want to be one of those friends?”

Jokingly, Nemuri held up her fork that had a piece of egg on it and tried to feed it to Takeyama. The other woman huffed and slapped the utensil out of her face.

“I guessed boyfriends of the sorts with a complicated past,” Sekijiro said, ignoring the scene. “I see the way you two are with each other. It’s very soft.”

“I think you two are exes,” Ryoku added. “Not to be rude but the tension was thick enough to cut with a knife. It was choking us all for the last week on top of everything.”

“So—which is it?” Takeyama pressed.

Both Izuku and Katsuki sat there, flabbergasted. What nosy people.

“Well,” Katsuki said. He scratched his cheek and winced a little. “None of those, technically. We’re legally married so we would be classified as husbands, I suppose.”

Confused, strangled sounds erupted at the table.

“Oh my god! What!” Nemuri nearly shouted, drawing the attention of the other people in the dining hall.

Takeyama’s eyes bulged. Nemuri’s mouth dropped. Ryoku hummed as if that made total sense. Then unexpectedly Sekijiro turned to Ryoku and held his hand out in a ‘gimme’ motion and grinned wide.

“Pay up,” Sekijiro demanded with a smirk. “Guessing that they were boyfriends was close enough.”

Ryoku pushed Sekijiro’s hand away. “Absolutely not. Married is not the same as dating.”

“Wait, you’re really married?” Nemuri asked. She assessed them as if that didn’t make complete sense. “For how long?”

“I-I guess about five months now,” Izuku answered. He turned to Katsuki with nervous flutters in his stomach. Katsuki was gazing at him tenderly and looking him up and down. “But we’ve known each other a long time.”

“Ah, so you’re still newlyweds,” Takeyama said. She was smiling at them kindly now, eager to know more. “This is so cute. You must tell me about your first date. I always love hearing about them when people are married.”

Izuku froze. Katsuki stiffened.

It dawned on them that they had very much done no such thing. The two of them were always simply around each other, colliding like opposed natural disasters.

“Our timeline has been complicated given, y’know, life circumstances,” Katsuki grumbled.

There was enough edge in his voice that communicated ‘back off’ and everyone took the hint. Takeyama and Sekijiro made the subject change to gush about what a cute couple they make while Ryoku smiled quietly at them.

Izuku began to wonder, did the carnival in Okinawa count as a date? It had felt like one until the Ferris wheel. But then he thought about their time at the estate. Every day seemed like a date, and truly Izuku felt like they had been in a relationship after a while.

They had confessed their feelings—but he guessed they never actually made it official.

Izuku looked at Katsuki beside him who was talking to Takeyama.

He began blushing thinking about asking Katsuki to be his partner. It felt silly at this point, but the romantic side of him craved it. He lightly put his hand over Katsuki’s on the table and decided not to worry about it. They moved at their own, unique pace.

When Katsuki entwined their hands, they both missed the weary gaze from Nemuri.

After lunch they began the second part of their days. Katsuki, Ryoku and Sekijiro were put on inventory duty since they could do most of the heavy lifting. Takeyama and other employees Izuku didn’t know very well serviced private rooms.

During this time, Izuku always went off with Nemuri. They would be in the backroom organizing out the different soaps, towels, and snack trays that would be given to guests later in the day.

Truthfully, this was the part of the day Izuku had grown to appreciate the most. Or as much as he could. He was still getting used to this new sense of freedom he had. But it was hard, like trying to adjust to a state of gravity-less limbo.

It was odd to use his hands for some other type of work that didn't involve bloodshed.

But he found that filling his time with tedious tasks helped. This way when he counted the nth purple towel, he didn't have too much room to unwillingly mourn the life he left behind.

That was the scary part. Occasionally this past week, he found himself unintentionally missing Tokyo. He figured that was the point of their upbringing though, right? He missed the comfortability of the king-sized bed and all the food he could imagine. The luxury bathtubs and showers with a room big enough for four people had made a padded life.

But really, he mostly missed Katsuma's smile.

The brotherly love they cultivated kept him grounded.

More so, he missed Ibara too and how they would dress up together. He thought fondly on the days she would gush over putting different products in his hair and dolling him up. He also missed Aoyama. He missed the way Aoyama would play card games with him late at night. He even missed Jin to an extent, if only for the routine familiarity of his crude humor.

But worst of all, a tiny part of Izuku missed Tomura.

He didn't want to.

He wanted to loathe Tomura with every fiber of his being. He wanted to spite him and only see the horrible, sick side of his brother. But there was a single fiber in him that did miss Tomura. It was the small child version of him that would cry in the middle of the night and then be hushed back to sleep by his brother. It made him angry with himself.

But he tried to take it in stride. Because even though he now hated Tomura, Tomura always was going to be the person who raised him. Whether he liked it or not.

As he pondered this, Izuku delicately folded the purple towel into the shape of a swan.

He pointed the wing, and proudly surveyed it. Then he carefully placed it on the shelf alongside the other hundreds of swan-towelettes he had created.

Nemuri was beside him, but she was unusually quiet. Normally she would be talking his ear off and gushing about what a good listener he was. But instead, she seemed apprehensive.

"Izuku, can I ask you a very serious question?" Nemuri suddenly said.

"Of course," Izuku replied.

"Nana mentioned you were raised in the Viper Academy, is that actually true?" Nemuri asked, cutting straight to the point.

She turned to him with a straight face. She was dead serious and seemed terribly concerned for him.

“It is,” Izuku said seriously. He straightened his back and tightened his lips. “That wasn’t a lie, I swear.”

“You don’t seem like it,” Nemuri noted cautiously. “I used to know someone from there when I was still in my assassin days. They were not kind. They were deliberately cruel. It was as if they went out of their way to be horrible and you’re not like that at all.”

“I had some external influences growing up,” Izuku admitted. “Specifically, Katsuki. I retained a large part of my empathy because of him.”

Nemuri nodded, but still was visibly confused.

“Who did you know exactly?” Izuku asked. “Usually, we’re not supposed to mingle with outsiders. It’s surprising you know someone.”

“I don’t know her personally, she tried to kill me on several accounts. I never found out her name, but she had the number 21 under her eye. Do you happen to know who that is?”

He did.

“Yes, she’s one of the heads of the academy,” Izuku answered past the lump in his throat. “Ms. Nagant is what she goes by if that’s something you want to know. She’s one of the top assassins in her own cohort and manages the logistics in the academy because of how thorough she is.”

“Thorough is one goddamn word for it,” Nemuri muttered. She crossed her arms and frowned. “She ruined my life. I had run into her on a mission and overheard about that Academy while hiding. I was found out and she basically hunted me down to the end of earth until I needed to go into hiding. I gave up being an assassin because of her. Nana had to help me cover my tracks and set me up here for the last twelve years.”

“Does that mean you were the one who told Nana about The Academy?”

“I sure was,” Nemuri said sternly. “I must admit, it really is confusing that you’re as sweet as you are. I don’t have the best impression about snakes.”

“Thank you, I think.” Izuku smiled the best he could.

“But with that being said, I think you should come with me.”

Nemuri’s eyes hardened into a familiar lethality. Izuku recognized it, he had seen it several times in Katsuki and even in Tomura. It was beginning to dawn on Izuku that Nemuri was no average person.

She jutted her head towards the door and then led him out into the hallway. As they walked, on the way they passed Katsuki and Sekijiro who were carrying five large boxes each. Izuku gave a tiny wave and Katsuki winked at him as they crossed paths.

Nemuri caught this and looked between them with increased weariness.

They came to a stairwell Izuku had always passed but never used. It led down into the basement.

“I should have done this earlier, but I was distracted by the mayor’s daughter’s passing,” Nemuri said as they walked down the long staircase. “But today, seeing how close you and Katsuki are, I finally understand the full gravity of this situation.”

“What do you mean by our closeness?” Izuku asked, unsure.

“I mean Katsuki is a weakness for you and vice versa,” Nemuri said. “There’s strength in numbers but there’s also clear Achilles heels. When you expose your heart strings to your enemy, you give them an opportunity for them to control you through them.”

Izuku sucked in a breath at that.

He knew now why she was so concerned—and he was suddenly disturbed too. She was hinting at the very real possibility that Katsuki could be hurt, or captured, in order to control him.

“I understand what you’re saying,” Izuku agreed. “We’ll do our best to keep sharp.”

“Good. I’ll also try my best to help make sure that’s possible.”

When they finally came to the belly of the basement, all that awaited them was a dark purple door.

It shined like it was made of gems. Nemuri opened it with a black key and pushed the door open.

She flicked on the lights and Izuku was taken back by what was on the walls.

Floggers. Underwear. Condoms, dildos, and a plethora of vibrators in different colors were sitting on shelves. Directly next to what was possibly the most impressive collection of flavored lubes were different whips. And next to those, hanging up like a first-place trophy were ball gags.

Izuku made a strangled, confused sound and froze on the spot.

Nemuri turned towards him, entirely confused as to why he was confused.

Izuku clasped his hands together and took a step back. “I-I don’t think me, or Katsuki need anything from here. There might be some sort of misunderstanding. We’re married but—”

“—Oh! We’re not getting anything from here, silly,” Nemuri replied. She laughed and waved her hand at him. “We’re going to my other room. Sorry about that. We have to get through my secondary business rooms first to go where we’re heading.”

Izuku nodded stiffly as he stared at a pink leash that said ‘princess’ on it.

He blushed so hard he was sure he was going to be red the rest of the day.

Nemuri chuckled and waved him in. “C’mon, this stuff isn’t going to bite you.”

Izuku followed behind the tall woman with his head lowered. He tried his best not to stare too long at the different items. But it was hard. He had a terribly strong sense of curiosity, and he couldn’t help but peek.

There were several things in here that made Izuku’s ears burn from the implication of how they could be used. He recognized some of these things from the box Katsuki had kept under their bed at the estate. But many of these toys he had no clue what they could be for.

Once they made it out of the quasi sex store, they passed through another dark hallway. They walked by one red room that was perched off to the side. Izuku curiously peeked in the open door and was further scandalized to see a sex dungeon.

Izuku quickly averted his eyes and covered his mouth.

They finally came to a halt at the very end of the hallway. Nemuri had led him to another room that was all the way in the back, unlabeled. She unlocked it with the same black key and Izuku realized why she had brought him down here.

All along the wall were weapons.

Each wall held a different assortment of weapons. On one wall were countless guns. On the other was the most beautiful arrangement of blades Izuku had ever seen. And on another were maces and other weapons that would be classified as expensive such as the guando.

“These are all from my old assassin days,” Nemuri explained, slipping back to seriousness. She stepped forward and grabbed the long guando off the wall. She sentimentally dragged her finger up its pole. “I don’t have much use for them anymore since I was forced into retirement. But I keep it here in case my past ever decides to come knocking on my door.”

“Your blade collection is beautiful,” Izuku complimented. “A lot of these are super rare.”

“And they’re made of even rarer metal,” Nemuri replied. “Ryoku and Takeyama come from a very long line of blacksmiths. They know how to make a blade that cuts cleanly through flesh and bone with ease. What’s your preferred weapon type?”

“I usually always had twin blades or was equipped with small knives. But I didn’t have time to grab anything other than guns before fleeing.”

“Well then, help yourself,” Nemuri urged.

She stepped to the side and let Izuku have at it. He suddenly felt timid, almost hesitant. But he looked at the tall wall that held over a hundred blades and felt a semblance of home. Two blades in the middle caught the light and Izuku’s attention.

He stepped forward, drawn to it like a siren song.

They were long, black daggers that were coated in obsidian and curved ever so slightly.

They reminded him of Hiryu in a way, and this alone made Izuku pick up one of them.

“Ah, I see you have great taste,” Nemuri said with humor. She stepped forward as well and smiled at Izuku. “I used to love these. They were my favorite choice of weapon when I was your age. They got the job done amazingly.”

Izuku turned his head towards her. “I can choose something else if they’re sentimental to you.”

“Nonsense,” Nemuri shot back and shook her head. “They’ll get good use from you, I’m sure. But I do have one condition that I ask of you if you’re going to take my favorite blades.”

“What is it?”

Nemuri picked up the other blade and handed it to him.

“Make sure to kill a lot of snakes,” she commanded scornfully.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku thoughtfully looked at the twin blades while in the guest bedroom. He stared at himself in the blackness of the blade and could only find his shining green eyes.

After hearing Nemuri’s story, he wondered how many other people’s lives had been poisoned by the venom of his family. Their reach was further than Izuku ever really knew. And that made him all the wearier. Because if the Vipers were this terrifying, that only increased the chances of Chisaki wanting a merge as much as Tomura.

With careful hands, Izuku wrapped up the twin blades in a sweater.

He also packed in dozens of tiny knives Nemuri found for him. He felt shielded again, happily equipped with what he knew he could be nearly unstoppable with.

Right after he packed up all the blades, he assessed the bag and a sense of paranoia finally kicked in. He then quickly unzipped it and grabbed the twin blades. He secured them, entirely unseen, in the back of his uniform’s sash for easy access and let out a shaky breath.

He checked the blue clock in the room. His small break was over.

ᔓᔓᔓ

He went back downstairs with a head full of viper related thoughts and Katsuki.

On his way back to the inventory room, he spotted Katsuki peeking around with something hidden behind his back.

Katsuki turned his head around like he was looking for someone, and when his eyes finally landed on Izuku, his whole face lit up with a smile. Izuku waved happily as Katsuki began walking towards him and soon, they met in the middle of the hallway.

“How’s the second half of your shift going?” Izuku asked.

“Good, good,” Katsuki said. He shifted on his feet awkwardly. “Me and Sekijiro had a good talk about life and stuff.”

“About life?” Izuku laughed. “I think this is a first. I’ve never seen you open up to someone you recently met. What did you guys talk about that thawed your shell?”

Katsuki didn’t answer. Instead, a slightly pink blush graced his cheeks as he searched Izuku’s eyes.

Izuku tilted his head, confused at the silence.

Suddenly, Katsuki cleared his throat and brought what he was hiding forward. Like a giant ray of sunshine, a massive bouquet of bright yellow flowers filled Izuku’s whole vision. A gorgeous combination of daffodils, marigolds, and roses sprung to life in front of him.

“For you,” Katsuki said quickly with his lopsided grin. “They match the one in your hair.”

He gently handed the flowers to Izuku and smiled fully.

Izuku took the flowers, totally caught off guard. “O-Oh, thank you, Kacchan. These are beautiful.”

“Exactly like you,” Katsuki added smoothly. “A perfect match.”

Izuku blushed deeply and hid his face behind the flowers a bit. The heat sank down from his face to his neck and Izuku laughed nervously.

“I almost forgot for a moment how shy you are with compliments.” Katsuki chuckled. He peeked around the flowers to get a better look at Izuku while wearing an attractive smirk. “You really are a little nerd sometimes. Why does being called beautiful make you blush? I know for certain everyone calls you beautiful in Tokyo.”

“It only makes me blush when you say it,” Izuku admitted. “I don’t know why, but it’s only you.”

Katsuki’s eyes softened and he stepped forward with confidence. They met eyes for a tender second.

“Do you want to go out on a date with me?” Katsuki asked.

Izuku felt himself short-circuit. He blinked rapidly and stared wildly at Katsuki. “A date?”

“Yeah, an official one.” Katsuki leaned in, making Izuku blush more. “I realize we did this all sorts of fucked up and you like all that lovey dovey stuff.”

“But we went on plenty of dates while we were in Biei,” Izuku said. “A lot actually. I think we even went back to that Thai place fifteen times.”

“But those weren’t really dates,” Katsuki emphasized. “We were only going out for dinner. There were no flowers or whatever type of sappy shit they do in the movies. I think one film you made me watch had a boom box or something? I don’t want you to miss out on that stuff, you love it too much.”

“That’s very sweet, but we don’t have to do all that for my sake, Kacchan,” Izuku said. He thought it was nice that Katsuki was thinking of Izuku’s romanticism. “I’m happy being with you wherever.”

“Okay, but what if I kinda like the idea of trying to woo you?” Katsuki admitted shyly. Now it was his turn to blush as he rubbed his neck. “I’ve been thinking about it since lunch, and it would be kind of nice to make you blush and swoon over candlelight dinner. It sounds sort of…intimate or whatever.”

It was here Izuku realized Katsuki really was a romantic. Izuku nearly stopped breathing at the revelation. Underneath all that tough exterior, Katsuki was as hopelessly eager for romance as Izuku was.

“Okay,” Izuku said softly. “I’ll go on a date with you, Kacchan.”

“Really?”

“Yeah, of course.”

Katsuki grinned as bright as the sun. Izuku had never seen such love and light spark in his eyes as he did in this moment. Katsuki seemed like he could barely contain himself as he straightened out his posture and took a flirtatious pose.

“Okay, get ready for the best date of your life, nerd,” Katsuki playfully teased. Izuku laughed and Katsuki tilted his head at him. “Hey—I mean it. I don’t like to half ass anything, and that includes this.”

“I believe it,” Izuku grinned back, mood lightening all the way. “When is this date then?”

“Tonight. I’ll come pick you up from our guest bedroom right before dinner.”

Izuku made an amused face. “Pick me up? From inside the bathhouse?”

“Mhm. I’m a real gentleman, don’t you know?” Katsuki winked at Izuku. “Be sure to wear whatever you think is the fanciest stuff you own. I might go bathhouse chic tonight; it seems to be all the rage right now.”

Izuku laughed from the bottom of his belly when Katsuki brushed off the collar of his uniform.

“I think I might go bathhouse chic as well,” Izuku teased. “I hope you don’t mind us matching.”

“I don’t think I would mind at all. Matching outfits already on the first date? I think we got most of these extras beat in the romance game.”

Izuku chuckled genuinely and Katsuki did too. The melodic laughter mixed and a light around them glowed the same as the flowers in Izuku’s hands. When the chuckles tapered off, they looked at each other as soft as a sunset.

Suddenly, Sekijiro’s booming voice yelled Katsuki’s name from down the hall. He called to him to help him move some shelves downstairs and Katsuki yelled back in an equally loud voice. Katsuki turned to Izuku with a light in his eye.

“Okay, that’s my cue to get back to work,” Katsuki said, reluctantly. He began backing away and did a two-finger salute. “I’ll see you later tonight. Don’t be late for our date!”

“Wouldn’t dream of it,” Izuku yelled, shouting after Katsuki as he took off down the hall.

When he was out of sight, all Izuku could feel was warmth.

He gazed down at the lovely flowers and truly understood the depth of Nemuri’s warning. They had finally found a clear path to peace, but the price of it might cost them everything if they were not careful.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later that day, Izuku did exactly as they planned.

He waited in their room and spruced himself up. He readjusted the flower behind his ear and made sure to brush his curls in a way that complimented him.

There was an underlying giddiness to all of this Izuku had to admit. He finally was going on the date with the person he always wanted. The circumstances might not have been the best, but any scenario with Kacchan always felt right.

When Katsuki knocked on the door, Izuku felt his heart jump.

He smoothed out his uniform and answered the door with a smile. Awaiting him was Katsuki, also in his uniform. His hands were clasped behind his back and there was a tinge of pink along his cheeks. He glanced Izuku up and down and then nervously rubbed his neck.

“Damn,” Katsuki said with a tiny chuckle. “I probably should have saved the flowers for now, huh? I messed that up somehow, didn’t I?”

“You can make up for it by giving me your hand,” Izuku replied with a flirtatious smile. “You don’t always need to give flowers on the first date.”

Katsuki dryly chuckled. “Got it Mr. Romance Expert.”

Katsuki extended his hand and they both clasped on tight. As they walked down the hall together, Izuku couldn’t help but grin like a fool. His cheeks were beginning to hurt as he leaned into Katsuki.

“Y’know, this is my first real date,” Izuku admitted shyly.

“Well that makes me a lucky guy, doesn’t it? I’ll make sure to give you the best date you’ve ever known.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

They stopped at the Galaxy room. Katsuki opened the door and sitting inside was a romantic setup that soared far beyond even Izuku’s expectations.

The whole room was dimmed, lights low enough that it allowed the projected stars to really have their moment. In the middle of the room on top of a plush black comforter was a kotatsu bearing a purple blanket. Three candles sat in the center and already on the tabletop a delicious meal of various fish, vegetables, and steak was laid out.

Izuku was taken back.

“This is amazing,” Izuku whispered. “How did you put this together in such a short time?”

Katsuki smirked, beyond pleased with himself. “Sekijiro was kind enough to make us his best dishes tonight. I told him I wanted to give you a nice dinner date but was disappointed since we can’t exactly step foot outside for a while.”

Katsuki led him by their joined hands towards the table and they sat down across from each other. As Izuku made himself cozy on the plush pillow, their legs tangled underneath the blanket covering. He also noted the bottle of white wine on the table and the white roses gently littered around.

Izuku gazed up at the twinkling stars and felt a sense of wonder flood into him. It felt like they weren’t in a bathhouse anymore, but a beautiful point of time that was their own.

“Thank you, Kacchan,” Izuku said sincerely. “Really, thank you. This is so nice.”

“You deserve nice things,” Katsuki replied simply. He popped open the bottle of wine and poured them both a quarter glass. “Let’s eat up, darling.”

Izuku felt himself swooning, and it was obvious that didn’t go unnoticed to his ‘date’. A pleased spark ignited in Katsuki’s eyes, and he grinned at Izuku coyly. He playfully rocked their joined legs as he pushed the glass of wine towards Izuku.

He had to give it to Katsuki because he was right. This was a fun thing to do.

They blended into a natural conversation and laughed about their day at work together.

Katsuki admitted that Sekijiro got him to open up by talking about their marriage. He said once he started talking about it, everything else came out easily. Katsuki mentioned how he now understood Izuku was a soft spot for him.

Izuku smiled at that. He sipped on the white wine and felt more special than he ever had in his life.

Later in the conversation, Izuku couldn't hold back from explaining the sex dungeon in the basement that he saw. Apparently, this was hilarious because Katsuki practically howled in laughter.

"You couldn't tell that she was a dominatrix?" Katsuki laughed.

"N-No!" Izuku shot back. He shook his head furiously and harshly whispered, "how was I supposed to know that?!"

"Oh. There were definitely hints. She even talked about her 'other services' when we first arrived and how she hand feeds her friends. C'mon. It was like, right there. Damn, I forget you're a little bit innocent until moments like this."

"I am not innocent," Izuku snapped back with no bite. A rosy blush filled his cheeks. "O-Or at least I'm not anymore. I'm only a little undereducated about stuff like this."

"Stuff? Kinky sex you mean?"

"Shh, keep your voice down, Kacchan!"

Katsuki continued to nearly bend over in laughter.

They finished up their meal and Izuku felt warm and full in the best ways possible. The stars in the background against Katsuki's warm color palette was truly lovely to him. As he stared across the candlelight, Katsuki cocked his head.

"I think this is the part where you continue to teach me how to be in love," Katsuki mentioned after they finished their meal. "Isn't that the deal we made?"

Izuku let out a short, amused scoff. "You don't need any more pointers, Kacchan. You've watched all the same movies I have now and you're doing a great job at this so far."

Katsuki shrugged. "Doesn't hurt to make sure I'm doing it right. So, what type of questions do people ask on first dates typically?"

Izuku decided to humor him. He hummed thoughtfully and placed his finger on his chin.

"Well. Usually, they try to get to know each other and see if their futures align well," Izuku explained. "A lot of questions typically happen here, and they enjoy each other's company to see if they're a good match."

"Basically, we're feeling out the vibe?"

"Sure, ya. We're feeling out 'the vibe', hah."

"Well. How about this, I'll look up some of those corny first date questions and we'll go down the list to make this authentic."

Izuku smiled, shook his head but didn't stop Katsuki. His date pulled out his black phone and began typing and scrolling. Izuku watched as Katsuki's face contorted with a couple varying emotions. He frowned then scrunched his nose and frowned even deeper as he began to aggressively scroll.

Izuku tilted his head. "Are none of the questions good?"

"Not that. I think we both know a lot of these already."

He turned his phone around to show Izuku some of the questions. With his pointer finger, Izuku leisurely scrolled down the list.

Favorite color? Red. Favorite food? Anything Spicy. Passions? Classical music composition. What does a perfect weekend look like to you? Izuku already knew Katsuki would want to have a slow morning, listen to a classical music record while eating and then go hiking.

"Wow, you're right," Izuku laughed. "Seems like we've already done a good job at getting to know each other."

"We're killing it with this whole romance thing," Katsuki charmingly said. He turned his phone back around and then kept scrolling. Then he stopped with a curious hum. "Ah. Here's one that I think is pretty good. What would you say is your worst habit?"

Izuku thought for a moment then said, "I think my stuttering is my worst habit. I don't think I'll ever get rid of it fully."

"Really? You think that's your worst habit?" Katsuki frowned deeply. "I think the way you stutter is cute. It's very, Izuku. Plus, it lets me know when I officially made you flustered."

Izuku's face burned. "Th-That's not true."

Shit.

Katsuki grinned. "Sure it's not."

To hide his embarrassment, Izuku shyly tucked a hair behind his ear and cleared his throat. He looked at Katsuki expectantly and said, "well, now it's your turn. What would you say your worst habit is?"

"I think I would say my cursing," Katsuki answered easily. "I can't stop it if I tried—and I really did try. My coworkers set up a swear jar for me once, a nickel for every swear word. I wound up losing twenty dollars within the day. They said forget it because they didn't want me to be broke by the end of the year."

"Interesting," Izuku said without thinking. "I was going to say the way you chew."

Katsuki's eyes bulged. "Hah? My chewing?"

"Only sometimes!" Izuku quickly amended. He nervously chuckled and tried to hide behind a sweet smile. "You smack loudly when you're not really thinking. I remember a moment at the estate you basically attacked the steak you cooked like a caveman. It was horrible. I had to put in my headphones to stop from throwing my slipper at you right there."

Shock took over Katsuki's face. His mouth dropped open and he looked falsely scandalized. "Oh my god. Okay, noted. I eat like a fucking caveman. Thanks for that."

"I'm sorry!" Izuku apologized but couldn't help but laugh. "I didn't mean anything bad by it! The chewing is a little bit endearing."

"Oh no. Don't try to smooth it out now," Katsuki quipped back also with a laugh. They both chuckled and Izuku tried to slap a hand over his mouth as Katsuki began to eat the next bite of his meal quietly. "Next question. What's your favorite childhood memory?"

This was an easy one.

"Every moment in the nook with you," Izuku said. "I loved reading to you. Every time there was a word you didn't know, I felt so happy I could tell you what it was. I know you called me a nerd because of it, but it was really the highlight of my days and got me through adulthood."

Pain flashed in Katsuki's eyes.

"What was yours?" Izuku tried to say, shifting the topic off his depressing childhood.

"Mine is the days we would dance under the light of the stained glass," Katsuki whispered.

Izuku's eyes were now filled with pain as well. He realized that even though they had only spent a year together in an abandoned building, they were the highlight of each other's childhood. In a way, that was sad. Comforting, but sad.

A distant smile graced Katsuki's lips as he took a small sip of his wine.

He said, "there was one day it was so bright outside, so the colors were super vibrant. You were humming The Dance of the Love Birds and giggling as you twirled around under the spots of red, blue, and green. I had stopped and watched you spin around and around."

Katsuki smiled, lost in the memory. He dragged his finger thoughtfully around the rim of his wine glass.

"I think that was the moment I knew I wanted to always be around you," Katsuki finished softly.

Izuku reached across the table to hold Katsuki's hand. His date clasped back, and they looked at each other with a silent understanding.

After that, they continued down the list. Eventually they found a couple other questions that they thought were good. They learned more about each other and now, Izuku felt like he was beginning to really know Katsuki in and out.

"Alright. Last question: What kind of house would you want?" Katsuki asked.

“Is that on the list?” Izuku questioned. “That seems like kind of a heavy first date question.”

“Naw, it’s not on the list,” Katsuki admitted. “I’m asking because I’m thinking ahead. If we had the chance to choose, what kind of home would you want to live in?”

“I never gave it too much thought,” Izuku said. He leaned forward and looked at the flickering flame that danced between them. “Something modest, maybe.”

“Modest?” Katsuki asked. “You want something small?”

“Yeah. I’ve lived in a large penthouse for so long that I don’t equate luxe with happiness anymore,” Izuku explained. He tried not to frown, but the sourness slipped in. “Something fancy would make me feel…trapped. I think a small home would be good, and potentially near a lot of greenery. Maybe a forest in the back?”

“That sounds great,” Katsuki agreed. “I think the countryside would be nice for us.”

For us.

Izuku liked the sound of that, and he could picture their future home fluidly.

Katsuki cleared his throat and then jutted his head behind him. “I think it might be time for the second round of the date I have planned.”

“What would that be?” Izuku asked curiously.

“Dessert and a bubble bath.” Katsuki grinned wide. “I figured that would be great to wrap up the night since we have unlimited access to this stuff.”

Izuku couldn’t help but blush. “Hah. That does sound amazing, you think of the best ideas.”

Katsuki cockily smiled, stood up, and gestured for Izuku to follow him to the other side of the large room.

On this side of the room, Izuku was surprised to see one of the tubs already filled with steaming hot water and lilac bubbles. All around it were lavender candles that were lit and a tray of Izuku’s favorite desserts was perched near the edge. The water reflected the projected galaxies and beckoned to them to get lost inside of its void.

Katsuki carefully walked around to the radio that was inside of the wall and began to tinker with it. He turned it on, and the sound blared through the speakers overhead. He searched through the stations until he stopped on one that was playing classical music.

Izuku smiled as he watched his date’s face turn satisfactory. Katsuki spun on his heel and smirked at him.

“Some mood music,” Katsuki said flirtatiously, dropping his voice.

Izuku bashfully giggled. “The perfect kind.”

Katsuki walked over to the bath and put his fingers in to test the water. He hummed happily and said, “Great. It’s still hot. Did you want to get in?”

Izuku nodded. “I do, as long as you join me.”

“Oh, I wouldn’t dream of leaving your cute ass in there alone.”

They both began to strip down a little too eagerly, and neatly placed their clothes off to the side. Katsuki got in first and Izuku studied the way his date’s muscles danced under his skin. He couldn’t stop the way his eyes crawled down Katsuki’s back.

Scars were littered all over, and he noticed so many new ones. The ones that stood out the most were the fingernail marks from a week ago. They were from when Izuku broke free of the zip ties and clawed his hands down Katsuki’s back during their passionate night.

Katsuki dipped into the water fully and leaned against the edge. He let out a shaky breath and then beckoned for Izuku to get in with him.

More than happy to follow him, Izuku slowly got in feet first.

The searing heat against his skin startled him at first then he slowly adjusted to it. He smiled the whole time as Katsuki snickered. When Izuku finally was able to get fully seated in the water, he felt like he could turn to putty right there. He exhaled, and all the tenseness in his body wafted away with the steam.

“Holy shit,” Izuku exhaled. “This feels amazing, Kacchan.”

“Damn good, right?” Katsuki chuckled and waded towards him in the water. “I knew this is something you would like. You’ve been wound up tighter than a goddamn jack in the box and same for me. We both needed this for sure.”

Izuku playfully pushed the bubbles around and smiled at the sweet aroma.

He looked at Katsuki and made quick work to put some on top of his head. He giggled as he made a fake bubble beard on his date and Katsuki tried to stifle a laugh. He stole a quick kiss from Izuku, putting bubbles on his face too. They began to sink into the water and push around the glittery soap without a care in the world.

After doing this, Izuku eyed the gunshot wound on Katsuki’s arm that was wrapped up. A hint of guilt bit into him and Izuku couldn’t help but pick up his hand and lightly touch the bandage.

“I’m sorry about this, by the way,” Izuku said.

“You have nothing to be sorry for,” Katsuki corrected. “You were only shooting out of self-defense.” Katsuki reached down in the water and lightly touched where Izuku’s gunshot wounds were as well. “I’m the one who should be sorry. And I am. I’m really, really fucking sorry.”

Izuku was about to speak, but a lump of sadness hit his throat. “I-It’s okay.”

Suddenly, he was then gently guided to sit down on the underwater seat. Katsuki positioned himself behind him, and Izuku nuzzled directly between Katsuki's legs, allowing himself to be swallowed up in the water. He leaned back as Katsuki's arm wrapped around him.

The song on the radio switched to something softer.

He gazed up at the countless twinkling stars above them as Katsuki began kneading different parts of his muscles. The strong, calloused fingers lingered the most on his legs, pressing into the deep tissue of his thighs that was tight from the injuries.

Izuku closed his eyes, shuddered, and tilted his head back against Katsuki's shoulder.

A light kiss was planted on his temple. "Feelin' good?"

"Ye-Yeah," Izuku answered, a little breathless.

Katsuki pressed his fingers in more. "Let me know if there's anything else you need."

They enjoyed the silent moment, and Izuku took the opportunity to knead his fingers into Katsuki's body too. They laid there, soaking up the warmth. When the stillness felt like home, Katsuki spoke again.

"Well, I guess that leaves one more question for the night," Katsuki said in a low voice. "Will you officially be mine, Izuku? If you say no, I get it. I won't be mad."

Izuku's heart filled with what he could only describe as a golden radiance. He smirked up at Katsuki and poked his cheek.

"Ah, I don't know. It is only the first date," Izuku teased, lightening the mood. "You already have me naked in a bubble bath massaging my legs. Don't you think we're moving a bit too fast?"

Katsuki shrugged. "We'll move at whatever pace you like."

"Then of course, I would love to be yours," Izuku said joyfully. "Will you be mine as well?"

"I've always been yours."

Izuku's eyes filled with unconditional love, and it was returned to him tenfold. He sat up from his position and turned around to face Katsuki. Protective arms wrapped around his body and held him closely. Love filled the room as Izuku leaned his weight lightly on top of his date with a grin.

"So should I call you my husband or my boyfriend now?" Izuku asked.

Katsuki scoffed. "Husband for sure. There's no way in hell I'm getting downgraded to boyfriend."

"Okay, good. I'm happy to hear that because I think husband suits you."

“Damn right it does. It suits you too, Bakugou Izuku,” Katsuki said happily.

Izuku’s heart soared high. The excitement he felt was profound and he couldn’t stop himself from leaning in and nuzzling their noses together. To his surprise and delight, Katsuki nuzzled back and stole a quick kiss. They looked at each other with refreshed, new eyes and all Izuku wanted to do was bask in this type of joy.

If this is what they had to look forward to in their new life, Izuku was more than willing to do whatever it took to make sure they got it.

Then one last curious thing crossed his mind.

“I do have a small question for you, since we’re on the topic of our marriage,” Izuku asked.

“Of course,” Katsuki replied, and drew hearts along Izuku’s skin. “Ask away, darling.”

Izuku bit his lip and said, “Did you ever get the divorce papers I mailed to you? I had asked my sister to send them, but I'm having some doubts they ever made it to you. However, she wasn’t the type to go through people’s mail, and she always did me favors when I asked her.”

Katsuki frowned and sat up a bit. “Uhh, I never got any divorce papers.”

“Really?” Izuku tilted his head. “I sent them to the estate.”

“I haven’t been there in a full month,” Katsuki admitted. “I left out the second I was able to move again. I went to Yokohama, got my tracking gear from my apartment there, and headed straight for Tokyo to find you. If she mailed them, they’re probably sitting in my mailbox.”

Izuku thought about it for a moment.

He hummed and reviewed the night of the masquerade in such a different light. Wow. They had been so heavily misaligned and didn’t even realize it.

Now, Katsuki made a sour face. He asked in a mildly indignant tone, “Wait. You actually tried to divorce me? And you did it through the goddamn mail?”

“I thought it was the best thing to do at the time?” Izuku cringed and offered up an apologetic smile.

Katsuki’s mouth dropped open, officially offended. “You nerd. I can’t believe you—”

He shook his head and began to relentlessly tickle Izuku. A surprised gasp shot out from Izuku’s mouth, and he flailed in the water, causing it to splash everywhere. He tried to get away through his laughing fit, but Katsuki held him in place as his fingers feathered up and down his sides without mercy.

“K-Kacchan!” Izuku squealed out through his laughter. He tried to wiggle as the bubbles flew everywhere. “I-I’m sorry! Have mercy!”

“Nu-uh! Not until you promise not to try to divorce me like that ever again,” Katsuki chastised with a wicked smirk. “I told your ass I didn’t want a divorce, you thought I was joking about that?”

“I-I’m sorry!” Izuku laughed uncontrollably. More water splashed around, and bubbles kicked up into the air. “I’m sorry, I promise not to divorce you like that ever again!”

Katsuki smiled and brought their noses together as Izuku cooled down from his laughter. He cupped Izuku’s face and planted a tiny kiss on his nose.

“Good. Sorry to say, but I think you’re stuck with me,” Katsuki said.

Izuku smiled and returned the kiss. “I wouldn’t have it any other way.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

That night, they went to sleep, and it felt like they washed off all the anguish that was trapped inside of their bodies. They laid side by side giggling and whispering all night, riding the high of their ‘first date’. When they went to sleep, they fell into their slumber holding hands.

The next morning when they woke up, they were still in the same mood.

Izuku couldn’t wait for more memories like these.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The next day, they decided to keep on ‘dating’.

This time, they had their first official date as husbands, and made an excuse to have another private dinner. Nemuri didn’t mind. In fact, she seemed happy to see them giddy like two lovebirds fluttering around the bathhouse.

For this date, Katsuki took him to the Sakura Blossom room.

The pink hues all around made Izuku feel like they really were in some type of romantic novel. They ate Izuku’s favorite meal and laughed at different memories and jokes. They found themselves discussing random topics like major events and even their favorite types of comedians. They discussed fashion, places they would like to travel and more.

Truly, they found themselves aligned in more ways than one. It was like aligning two halves of a whole.

During this date, Izuku felt like he was growing closer to Katsuki in a way they hadn’t before.

While their time in Biei had been beautiful, it was full of avoidance. At that time, neither of them wanted to pop the bubble they were hiding in. Which ultimately made them live in a fantasy—but here there were no false illusions. They had laid themselves bare and it was a level of raw intimacy Izuku had never experienced.

And from the sound of it, Katsuki shared his sentiments.

“I feel like I can talk to you about anything,” Katsuki muttered suddenly. He leaned across the candle lit table and rested his head against his hand. “I don’t know why I said that, but it feels true.”

“I get what you’re saying, Kacchan,” Izuku said, returning the sentiment. “I also feel like I can talk to you about anything. It’s really nice, right?”

Katsuki hummed as he took his hand. “It is. This is so corny, but I always knew you were someone special to me, but now I feel like you are my person.”

“I feel like you’re my person too.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

On their next official date, Katsuki had taken him to the Apple Picking room. There were no real apples in this room, the walls were just painted like they were. On the shelves were bath bombs that were shaped like apples, and they were all decorated with cute, tiny green ribbons.

During this date Izuku felt them finally solidify. Like concrete hardening after being laid down, their bond had strengthened and in return, so did their connection. They were becoming deeply in tune with each other.

It was this day Katsuki was grieving his mother more than the previous days. Katsuki hadn’t said it outright, but Izuku could tell. Of course, Izuku had sensed it before, but today he could see it clearly. The sag in Katsuki’s shoulders was like there were weights tied to him and his responses were slightly off like he wasn’t fully paying attention.

His husband was clearly in his head, and Izuku knew it could only really be about one thing.

In the middle of their date, Izuku spoke up.

“You’re feeling sad today, aren’t you?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki didn’t seem surprised or try to deny it.

“Yeah,” Katsuki whispered. “I, uh, woke up feeling more sluggish today. I’m not sure why, but I missed my mom this morning. It’s stupid I know.”

“It’s not stupid,” Izuku eased. He grabbed Katsuki’s hand and stood up. “Let me show you something.”

Katsuki let himself be led.

They walked out of the Apple room and went to their bedroom. Izuku grabbed a blanket and then they both put their jackets on. Izuku zipped Katsuki’s up tight and wrapped the newly bought scarf around his neck and face.

They headed straight upstairs for the rooftop hand in hand.

Izuku laid out the blanket on the rooftop and they laid down on it together.

The fog had lifted progressively over these days, giving way to a crystal-clear sky above. Every star was in view and the full moon was shining down on them.

“Try counting the stars and think about your mom,” Izuku instructed. “It might help a little bit.”

Katsuki did. He silently counted them in his head and Izuku did too. Slowly but surely, they fell into a place of comfort as Katsuki pulled Izuku in closer for warmth. Izuku could feel Katsuki’s heartbeat slow down and his body ease.

After a long while, Katsuki let out a shaky, but relieved breath of air.

He turned to Izuku and the tenseness that was caught in his body was gone.

“Thank you,” Katsuki said quietly. “I don’t know why but that weirdly helped. How did you know to do that?”

“Hiryu sometimes would find a rooftop and we would count the stars together in silence,” Izuku explained. He held Katsuki’s hand as he rubbed circles against the soft part of his skin. “I never understood why he did that until after he died. Whenever I found myself grieving him more than usual some days, I counted the stars like this and took a moment to reflect on the life we had shared. It helped ease the pain.”

Katsuki thoughtfully looked up above. He understood what Izuku was saying and squeezed his hand.

“…I’m sorry about what happened between you and Hiryu,” Katsuki said. His voice was hoarse, and there was a trapped pain inside of it that was still working itself out. “All those times I jabbed at you about killing him in the past without knowing the full story…I know it must’ve hurt.”

“It’s okay, Kacchan,” Izuku whispered tenderly. He turned his eyes back up to the Big Dipper. “On days like this we can count the stars together if this helps. No need to rush, talk, or even think. We can count the stars until the ache in your chest eases and lay here all you like.”

“Okay. But we must make sure to do the same for you,” Katsuki corrected. “On the days you feel heavy too, we can take our time.”

Izuku smiled sadly. “I think I like the sound of that.”

They silently counted the constellations above side by side.

“You got a new freckle here, darling,” Katsuki unexpectedly whispered.

Izuku turned his head to Katsuki who was looking directly at him. His eyes were watery, but no tears fell. The way his eyes were trained on him, made Izuku realize Katsuki hadn't been counting the stars this whole time—he had been counting his freckles.

Katsuki leaned over and kissed his cheek where the new freckle was.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After a full week of dates as husbands, Izuku and Katsuki were in tune with each other on a different wavelength. It was new to Izuku to be this in sync with someone who was not from his family.

The mood in the bathhouse was different now too.

Everyone had fully lightened up and their personalities shone through the glum fog.

Nemuri and Takeyama fought like siblings, and Ryuko was as cool as a winter breeze. She handled any outbursts with ease like it was a regular day whenever her cousin and Nemuri got into a small argument. Sekijiro was as strong as a mountain but as lovable as a teddy bear. Izuku had to resist the urge to squeeze him every time he started gushing about a new dessert he made.

In this small group, Izuku was finally understanding why people were kind to each other.

He was still getting used to it, but he thinks he sort of understood it now. Being kind to those around him made him feel safe, maybe even fortified them as a unit. He trusted the other employees here and that let him sleep a little bit better at night.

But even more so, they had fun together.

Katsuki slammed down a card on the table with a smirk and it triggered a choir of groans. Takeyama nearly screamed in disbelief as she scrubbed her hands down her face.

"Are you kidding me?!" Nemuri shouted as she threw her hands up in disbelief. "No, there's no way! You're cheating!"

"Nope, I'm not," Katsuki replied with a diabolical chuckle. "I'm just that fucking good at Monopoly. Sucks to suck, extras. Now give me your property."

"This has to be some type of witchcraft," Sekijiro said seriously. He frowned deeply and over-analyzed the board that was covered in Katsuki's little red houses. "I've never seen anyone who plays this game so methodically. What makes you so driven to be this amazing at this?"

"What can I say? I like money," Katsuki smugly answered.

Everyone erupted in a laugh as Katsuki moved a piece on the game board.

Izuku watched the game progress happily as he shifted himself on Katsuki's lap. There weren't enough seats in the living room area, but Izuku didn't find it weird to sit on Katsuki's leg like this in front of everyone. They all didn't seem to mind either as they were far too engrossed in the game.

His husband tightened his one-armed hold on him in the commotion as he started yapping off to Nemuri in another cocky rant. When Izuku adjusted again Katsuki turned and looked at him.

"Are you comfortable?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku nodded happily. "Of course. Are you comfortable?"

"I got the cutest damn guy in the world on my lap and I'm whipping everyone's ass at monopoly, of course I'm comfortable."

Katsuki grinned wide and playfully bounced Izuku on his leg. Izuku laughed and leaned into his husband to give him a small kiss. A rise of whistles erupted from in front of them and Izuku grew a little bit shy but buzzed with happiness.

It was nice being around people who supported him and Katsuki. He never knew that was something he wanted until now.

As the game of Monopoly continued, it resulted in Katsuki winning it all—which surprised no one.

They all began to clean up the mess they had made from hanging out after hours. Once the game was put away, it was here Izuku and Katsuki noted that they were the only ones still in their uniforms.

"Oi, what are you all dressed up for?" Katsuki asked.

"Oh! There's going to be fireworks tonight in town," Takeyama said with a wide grin. "It was short notice but nearly everyone is heading down to the port area to watch."

Izuku tilted his head. "What's the occasion?"

"None, really," Ryuko replied. She shrugged her shoulders with a gentle, graceful smile. "The mayor is feeling better, and he wants to do something to lighten the spirits of the town. Fireworks before it gets too cold is the perfect thing."

"You two should join us!" Sekijiro urged. "You've been holed up in the bathhouse for a whole two weeks."

"Hey, I said no pushing them," Nemuri snapped quickly. "They can stay inside if they want to."

Both Izuku and Katsuki grew quiet at that.

They hadn't stepped foot outside longer than to take the trash out since the lantern festival. While fresh air would've been nice, they were both growing more and more paranoid. Izuku kept the twin blades hidden in the back of his sash now and Katsuki also did the same. His husband strapped a gun on his body with his chest holster that was hidden inside his uniform.

The heightened paranoia was mainly because they were finally back at a good place. It was very easy to see what they had to lose now. And risking that all by going outside didn't seem worth it.

"Fireworks do sound nice," Izuku mused then he gave a sheepish smile. "But it's okay. Kacchan and I will stay inside. We don't mind it here, really. The place is big enough to feel like its own world."

"Agreed," Katsuki said simply. "We'll be okay."

"Hey," Nemuri said. She walked up to them and put a reassuring hand on Izuku's shoulder. "If you want, you can sort of see the fireworks from the sauna room. The large window there is pointed at the ocean so you can see where the fireworks are going to be."

Izuku perked up all the way.

"That's a good compromise," Izuku agreed. "Thank you, Nemuri!"

"Anytime," she replied. She nodded her head at them both. "Well, we're going to head out. When I come back, I'm going to wipe the floor with you in Uno, Katsuki. This isn't over yet."

"Hah, sure." Katsuki smirked. "We'll see about that. I'm the king of board games in this damn house."

ᔓᔓᔓ

Once everyone was gone, the two husbands had the quiet bathhouse all to themselves. They shut off the lights in the living area and headed up to the Sauna Room. They both sat down on the ledge of the window that jutted out. The two of them faced each other, knees lightly touching.

The window was big enough to nearly cover the whole wall, and Nemuri was right. It gave a perfect view of the sky near the sea. Izuku leaned against the window, soaking in the cool surface that contrasted the humidity in the room.

He turned his gaze to see Katsuki staring at him pensively. The emotion in his eyes was far different from the light mood they had experienced moments ago.

"Is something the matter, Kacchan?" Izuku asked.

Katsuki opened his mouth and then closed it. His brows furrowed together, and pain struck across his face.

“I’m…I’m really fucking sorry, Izuku,” Katsuki whispered. The words were as heavy as a mountain and made Izuku freeze.

“Sorry for what?” Izuku asked for clarification.

“I’m sorry for blaming you, for hunting you, and for trying to hurt you,” Katsuki said. “I’m so goddamn sorry.”

He shuffled in closer and Izuku was deeply taken back that this was coming up now. But Katsuki was more than serious. He took Izuku’s hand in his own and they began to shake with a monumental amount of guilt.

“My stupid ass anger blinded me,” Katsuki continued. His eyes teared up as he searched Izuku’s freckles. “I lost control and I wound up becoming something I never wanted to be—I kept…I kept forcing myself to hunt you despite this voice screaming in my head not to the whole time.”

“It’s okay, Kacchan. I forgive you,” Izuku said. “Between Tomura and Himiko, the situation was manipulated beyond our control. If I hadn’t listened to Tomura, Himiko wouldn’t have been able to steal my letter. I don’t blame you at all for the way you snapped.”

He tried to steady Katsuki’s hand on his own. He wanted to bring them back to the light mood they had been in.

“But you should blame me,” Katsuki insisted. His eyes pleaded for a lick of hate. “My temper is so fucking bad sometimes, especially when it comes to my mother. She’s always been the biggest trigger for my rage, and I exploded exactly like my old supervisor thought I would. And he was fucking right—I did take it out on someone I didn’t want to.”

Katsuki tightly grasped his hands and Izuku’s heart squeezed.

A wave of unwanted tears pushed at Izuku’s eyes. He wanted to tell his husband it was okay because he didn’t want to think too hard about what had happened.

“And Izuku—I-I almost—fuck.” A small tear rolled out of Katsuki’s eye. “I almost killed you. And then I nearly made a really bad fucking mistake—”

“—but you didn’t kill me,” Izuku said, finally speaking up.

Katsuki shook his head. “No, that’s not what I’m saying. I’m saying that I nearly—”

“—Kacchan, please. Listen to me,” Izuku interrupted. He waited for Katsuki to bulldoze the conversation, but his husband didn’t. Instead, Katsuki looked down into his lap like he was riddled with guilt. “Do you still want to hurt me?”

“Of course not,” Katsuki replied.

“Do you think you’re still capable of hurting me?”

“No. I could never.”

“Then we’re okay,” Izuku whispered.

He lifted a hand to wipe the lone tear from Katsuki’s cheek. His husband screwed his eyes shut in pain like his head was pounding. Katsuki tried to speak once more but Izuku shook his head and spoke first.

“What’s in the past, let’s leave it in the past,” Izuku suggested, feeling reassured. “The fact that you couldn’t go through with it despite having a perfectly good reason too, shows what’s inside of your heart. I mean, Katsuki. I killed your mother. That’s not a small thing. But even without hearing about my life, you still couldn’t kill me. T-That speaks volumes in my opinion. You didn’t even need to know about the letter or how I was brought up to not kill me.”

“Izuku…” Katsuki mournfully said. “I think you’re brushing this off too quickly.”

“Maybe I am,” Izuku whispered. “But we could both be caught in an endless spiral of sorrys if we’re not careful.”

He wanted nothing more than to make sure they were happy. They were so close to happiness that Izuku didn’t want to jinx it now.

“At the end of the day, all that matters to me is that you couldn’t do it,” Izuku whispered. He smiled sadly at his husband. “I tried very, very hard to kill you in Taiwan. B-But I couldn’t. I wanted to kill you; hell I wished you died in Vienna right after I left you there to bleed out.”

Katsuki shook his head. “But that’s not the same—”

“—It is. And if we keep punishing ourselves, we’re never going to be happy. Don’t you want to be happy together?”

“Yes…I want to be happy with you so badly.”

“Then let’s.”

It clicked then what Katsuki probably needed to hear.

“The truth is we both hurt each other, in so many ways,” Izuku said sadly. They met unwavering gazes and both looked struck with guilt. “We betrayed each other, we broke each other’s hearts. And on several occasions have shot, stabbed and, in my case, poisoned each other. But all I want now is to start over because we’re at such a good spot. We love each other so much, don’t we?”

“We do,” Katsuki agreed quietly. “I love you more than I ever thought was possible.”

“And I feel the same.” Izuku’s eyes watered. “And I know our lives are all tangled up, but we can keep apologizing forever if we keep on like this. We’re not too far from Nana now, and all I want is a clean slate. I know it’s selfish because there’s so many crimes I’ve committed, and I’m very much probably not worthy of a normal life. B-But I want it. I want to be normal, and I want to bury the past.”

“You deserve all that, Izuku,” Katsuki agreed.

“And you deserve it too, Kacchan. We can be sorry the rest of our lives or we can be happy together and try our best to leave the past in the past.”

It was a silent plea.

Izuku knew Katsuki probably wanted to talk more about the Scarlet Masquerade and the days following it. But the sad lump in Izuku’s throat didn’t. To him, looking back on it was now too painful and too much. They had been so misaligned that it was dreadful.

But at the end of the day, Katsuki couldn’t kill him, and he still offered to help him.

Izuku didn’t want to accidentally conjure the past back up by discussing it too much. He wanted new memories—warm ones that made him feel as lovely as their ‘first dates’.

“Okay,” Katsuki said, voice still laced with pain. He smiled the best he could and nodded. “Past is in the past from here on out. I forgot you can be so damn wise.”

“Only sometimes.” Izuku smiled.

“More than sometimes.”

Right on cue, the fireworks went off. They both turned their heads to see the dazzling hues of blue, red, and purple light up the night sky.

The crackling sound was loud, filling up the whole bathhouse as their world was illuminated.

Izuku watched silently. He appreciated the moment of calmness, and the joy people were finding in their own dark times. He wished that he could be like this small town: mighty and work through all his troubles. He wanted to harness their strength and come out on the other side better for it.

As the roaring fireworks continued, Katsuki squeezed his hand.

They turned to each other, appreciating the way the other one’s skin lit up with the varying colors.

“I love you, Izuku,” Katsuki said.

“I love you too, Kacchan,” Izuku replied.

Forgiveness was a funny thing, Izuku realized. It had the power to mend, but also the power to transform someone completely. They both had forgiven each other, and the strength that gave them allowed them to overcome the mountain that was between them.

The pull inside of Izuku’s chest told him to lean in. He did so slowly and went for a kiss. Katsuki saw this, and he leaned in too. The hammering in his chest as they drew near told him this was it. This was something more than passion. More than acceptance or love.

This felt like—

The singing of metal cut through the air. Both Izuku and Katsuki stopped, right before their lips touched as a sharp knife sliced between them, right where their kiss would have connected. The star knife sank into the window between them, nearly shattering it with countless little cracks spreading all over the glass.

Both of their heads whipped towards the entrance and all the hairs on Izuku's body stood up.

"Well, isn't this heartwarming?" Himiko hissed.

Izuku's breath caught as she walked into the room all the way. Behind her was nothing but pitch-black darkness and in her eyes was the same. The usual spark of mischief or sick delight that was inside of her blood-colored eyes was gone.

Nothing but the pure intent of homicide could be found.

Panic shot through Izuku's veins.

"Katsuki," Izuku harshly whispered as he began reaching for his knives in the back of his sash. "That's Himiko."

His killer instincts flipped on, and so did Katsuki's.

Deadly scarlet and viridian eyes both restricted down at the same time. The temperature in the air began chilling as the colors from the fireworks flashed on and off through the large window.

Katsuki stood up slowly and Izuku began to do the same.

The air shifted as Himiko scowled at them like they were nothing but worms in her life. She took an offensive stance and began readying her weapon of choice that was a long chain with a blade melded to either end. Along her arms were rows of daggers and star knives decorating her bright red body suit.

Carefully, all three assassins assessed each other's movements. The ticking down on the clock above felt like grains of sand as Katsuki took an offensive stance as well.

Izuku shuffled in closer to Katsuki and his heart began hammering at how quickly their rest time was up. He knew two on one should likely work in their favor, but Himiko was a force of nature worth an army. Even going toe to toe with her would be difficult with the two of them.

In an attempt to draw first blood, Katsuki quickly reached for his gun.

But the sound of a second pistol cocking made him freeze.

Both Izuku and Katsuki cut their eyes to the side entrance. Another set of footsteps approached them from there. Heavy thud after thud came, and Izuku's eyes widened with each step. He recognized those footsteps. His heart dropped to the lowest pits of hell and the tall figure came into light.

It felt impossible.

“Aw, don’t look so surprised, baby bro,” Jin chuckled cruelly. “You didn’t think The Double Headed Viper would go down that easily, did you?”

Chapter End Notes

Aaaannnd we're back into the frying pan :^D hides Thank you so much for reading and commenting! Let me know what you think below :)

Chapter 33: Consonance

Chapter Summary

Consonance (tempo modifier) agreement and harmony among musical notes.

Izuku and Katsuki work in harmony, but they are not the only ones.

Chapter Notes

Hellooo!!! Welcome back to this choo choo train of angst! First, so so sorry for the lateness on this chapter. I had hit a small wall with this chapter because I was struggling to find myself to write it to my liking. I found myself re-structing, re-writing over and over. I pretty much did this until I was satisfied :') I like it now after many revisions and Luna, out Beta angel, has reassured me it's good to go.

I got a bit fixated on it and found myself without time to replay to comments. But I am doing so now! I hope you enjoy!! I am very nervous now, but I might been over thinking it.

Without further wait, I present to you everyone's favorite lethal lovers!

Warnings: Character Death, Minor Character Death, Graphic Depictions of Violence and Excessive blood.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 33 — Consonance

.

.

.

Izuku could hear his heartbeat. His vision pulsed with every step Jin took forward.

Like the dawn of a sun he never hoped to see, Izuku comprehended he hadn’t finished the job. Every single berating Tomura had ever given him about sloppy work pounded against his skull. Instantly, he hated himself.

Tomura always taught him to double tap a close-range gunshot kill. It was important to make sure a vital artery was severed. His Big Brother emphasized this because there was always the tiniest chance that someone could survive a gunshot. Solely because a bullet could be off a single millimeter from lethality.

And now, like a real ghost, Jin was back to haunt him as the embodiment of his sloppiness.

His elder brother was wearing bandages everywhere. There was a bloodied one covering his left eye. It stretched across his whole head and Izuku could see where he went wrong. Both of Jin's arms were wrapped up too. But there were no slings or stents to help the fractured bones stay in place. Jin walked as if he wasn't injured at all.

But when he came closer, Izuku sensed something about Jin was off.

His brother seemed slightly unbalanced. It was as if he was keeping himself upright with effort. It was here that Izuku noticed Jin fight off a small limp. His unnerving smile fell for a moment to show a split-second indication of frustration.

Immediately, Katsuki noted it too. He gripped his gun tighter.

It was now evident Jin was weakened from the previous assault. But Izuku drew the rapid conclusion that his brother was likely pumped up on an obscene number of painkillers and pure spite.

"What? You're not going to greet your dear ol' brother and sister after we've come all this way?" Jin taunted. "Especially because you left home in complete fucking disarray. Hell, you could at least apologize for killing Ibara and Aoyama like they were goddamn animals—and trying to kill me."

An arrow of guilt pierced through Izuku.

"You all gave me no choice," Izuku hissed.

"There's always a goddamn choice," Jin snapped. "And the choice you made is protecting some snot nosed brats and this outsider over us." He glared at Katsuki. "But I'm sure that's just your M.O. by now. You shot me in my beautiful face and then stole my katana? What a fucking good way to piss me off."

This was bad.

He looked over to Katsuki who was clenching his jaw—he knew it was bad too.

Two on two was always tricky.

Over his shoulder, Katsuki wearily glanced at him and Izuku glanced back. Katsuki's gun was still aimed at Himiko, but his sister was being eerily quiet. She assessed Katsuki carefully and tightened her grip on the chain in her hand. Her eyes then glided around, studying the room.

Her calculating stare lingered on the broken sauna gauge on the side of the Amethyst Sauna.

“Please, let us go,” Izuku attempted to reason. “We’re going to be leaving, and I promise you we’ll be out of your lives forever.”

“I think you’ve forgotten who Tomura is.” Jin scoffed, pointed at Katsuki, and said, “And by the way, Chisaki wants you buried six feet deep.” He then pointed his finger at Izuku. “And he wants you to come back with us to Tokyo. Fortunately for you, Chisaki decided he still wants his green-eyed prize.”

Unexpectedly, Himiko laughed. A small slip of maniacal chuckles spilled into the air as she shook her head.

She sunk her envious gaze into Izuku.

“Once again, you somehow lucked out, Izuku,” Himiko jeered. Her humorless laughter died, and her eyes sank deeper into hatred. “Tomura is such a damn persuasive person, isn’t he? It took him nothing but two weeks to convince Chisaki to change his mind.”

“Yup,” Jin sourly agreed. “You did have a helping hand though. That bastard basically got a hard-on right there after hearing that you killed over twenty of your own and two of the Viper Seven. You gave him exactly what he wanted: a family member for a family member—and more.”

“The sick fuck was delighted,” Himiko said bitterly. “But I suppose that’s what’ll make you two a good match, huh?”

The mere thought of giving Chisaki joy nearly made Izuku vomit.

He had hoped his actions that night had sown discord between the Vipers and Yakuza. All he wanted was to effectively prevent Tomura’s rise to total power. But if what Jin and Himiko were saying was true, it had the opposite effect. He could see Chisaki’s sick smile and hear his eerie laugh.

Katsuki cocked his gun and his frown deepened. “You two are doing a lot of goddamn talking.”

“Yeah, I suppose we are.” Jin sighed and tilted his head. “So. Which way are we doing this, Izuku? The easy way or are we going to have to drag you by that pretty hair of yours all the way back to Tokyo?”

“There’s not a damn chance I’m coming with you,” Izuku spat.

“Ouch! Mr. Viper Killer has got bite now,” Jin laughed. His unnerving smile widened and his one good eye steeped in blood lust. “Good. I was hoping we would do this the hard way.”

Instantly, both Izuku and Katsuki moved into action. Katsuki rushed towards Jin and Izuku sprinted towards Himiko.

Himiko spun backwards on her feet, and her chain moved like a deathly ribbon with her flow. She gained unnerving momentum and slung the long weapon at Izuku’s legs.

Izuku moved slightly quicker. He tilted his body out of harm's way by mere inches and didn't stop his run forward. Izuku's body pumped more adrenaline into his blood when Himiko rapidly pulled the chain back to her to fling another blow—but Izuku dodged it.

He worked quickly and grabbed on to the chain, gripping it tight around his arm. His feet slid against the ground, and he gritted his teeth. He violently pulled it towards him and Himiko staggered forward.

But his sister caught her weight.

Himiko's wild eyes filled with venom.

The chain strung taut, and they were caught in an equal test of strength. Izuku made a rapid size up: they were nearly the same in speed and strength, but Himiko possessed more accuracy in distance techniques while Izuku was better at closer combat.

Then the sudden sound of gunshots fired into the air. Izuku snapped his head to the side and his heart nearly stopped.

Katsuki was going on the offense. His husband was caught in the heat of battle, trying to land a hit on Jin as he dodged around Jin's sharp swings of the katana. Burning scarlet eyes were sharp and Katsuki's gun was firing off with frightening accuracy that would've instantly killed any man.

But Jin was not simply any man.

The Double Headed Viper had elusive skills for evasive techniques. Jin dodged every lethal bullet as if it phased through his body. The two men moved around each other like two tornadoes at close distance, clashing at high speeds.

For every bullet Katsuki tried to land, Jin used his katana to deflect. He even sliced several in two.

Then Jin landed a blow and carved shallowly through Katsuki's upper arm.

The howl of pain that bounced off the walls made Izuku freeze.

Suddenly, Izuku was harshly jerked. He stumbled forward, accidentally letting himself be distracted.

Himiko didn't waste time. She briskly twirled, wrapping her chain around her body and yanked Izuku close to her.

The other end of the chain slung around.

Izuku barely had time to dodge. It came straight for his head. Izuku ducked, and a lock of his hair was cut off. He let go of the chain and quickly fell backwards on the defensive.

That was all she needed.

Himiko began her lethal routine. She spun like a king cobra and the chain worked as an extension of her will. She whirled her body to make the heavy chain rain down thud after thud in rapid succession. The sharp blades on the end flung towards Izuku like metal fangs, and each time they bit him.

He tried to outmaneuver her the best he could. But he couldn't dodge every attack. Many shallow cuts landed on his skin like a thousand paper cuts. He hissed as his body began to feel like it was on fire. He tried harder to dodge, but the distance between them was growing too wide.

She didn't let up. Himiko gained speed. Her dance was a spiteful ballet that didn't allow Izuku to breathe. Her hateful leer grew deeper and deeper with every blood droplet of Izuku's that hit the floor.

Izuku focused all his efforts and drowned out the sound of bullets whizzing in the background to bum rush Himiko. He ducked, sidestepped, and rolled until he got close to her again. The fury in his eyes tripled as he closed the distance. He pushed through all the stinging pain across his body to finally gain the advantage.

Himiko quickly tried to back up, but Izuku didn't allow her.

He drew his blades from his sash at the highest speed and cut upwards.

Himiko yelped in pain as he sliced her arm. She stepped back. Quickly, Himiko switched gears. She went on the defensive as Izuku went on offense.

Izuku poured down strike after strike.

He only went for the kill. The jugular. The head. The neck. The heart.

But Himiko used her chain like a shield. She protected herself from his wrath and matched his expert footing. She backed up and gained an advantage briefly, and then Izuku drew close and took it back. They did this again. Then again. And again.

Soon they found themselves caught in a twin serpent dance.

They began to snake around each other at an impossible speed. They fought toe to toe, fully rivaled in their skills. They knew each other's every move. Every attempt to kill. When Himiko went high, Izuku knew to go low. When Izuku faked left, Himiko knew to dodge right.

All the years of distrust proved to deadlock them. They had been watching the other too closely, memorizing the other's moves. All the years of disdain was coming to a peak in a flurry of blades, kicks, and punches.

Izuku attempted one more blow to the head and Himiko's breath caught.

She wrapped her chain around both of his blades and strung it tight. She locked him there and Izuku's nose flared. He pushed forward with all his strength. The force he used made them go toppling downwards to the ground. Himiko cursed but held her gridlock around his blades. Izuku pinned her down to the ground with his legs as he used all his body weight to lean in.

They were caught there and their eyes locked.

Izuku's blade was aligned perfectly with her skull.

If Himiko slipped for a moment, the points would go crashing through her forehead.

He pushed down harder but Himiko's strength held his weapons suspended in the air.

Progressively, Izuku's eyes became filled with untamable fire. He wanted to break the chain. Snap it in two and sink his obsidian blades right through his sister's skull. But he was unable to do that. As of now, Himiko's wrath was mightier than usual, and she matched his fire with her need for retribution.

The poison between them surged.

Then the sound of Jin falling to the ground snapped both of their heads to the side.

Katsuki was at an advantage now. He had disarmed Jin of his katana and knocked it to the ground. Katsuki clicked the trigger of his gun. But it came out empty—he was officially out of bullets. Quickly, he pistol-whipped Jin directly in his injured skull to keep him down.

However, Jin devoured the pain like it was nothing. In a flurry, Jin disarmed Katsuki of the gun.

Soon, the two of them began to fight. Like giant titans quaking the ground, the two men began a toe-to-toe match of their own. Jin utilized a flurry of martial arts and Katsuki held his ground by pure strength alone.

But it was clear they too were caught in a deadlock as well. Katsuki was strong. However, Jin was equally as strong. Even with fractured arms, Jin's Viper made him push through it as if he had no broken bones at all. Pain was merely fuel for them, and the more agony Jin was in, the harder he fought.

But in the same vein, the killer inside of Katsuki was forged of protective rage. And all it took was a single glance back at Izuku for Katsuki to begin fighting harsher.

Himiko's eyes snaked towards Katsuki. Then they slithered back to Izuku.

She picked up on Izuku's fear like a shark smelling iron in the water.

Desperation took a hold of Izuku. He screamed out a yell of effort. He used all his strength to push down on the chain. The metal strung tighter and Himiko's arms began to shake as she gave into his power. Izuku's eyes turned wild as a surge of fierceness quaked through his body.

The point of his blade was a mere inch away from Himiko's face now.

It took half a second for the most sickening smirk to spread across her red lips.

She stopped resisting. The chain gave, and Izuku fell forward. He stabbed to where her skull was, but she moved faster. Himiko snapped her head to the side, and the blades sank a millimeter away from her ear. She swung her chain around his neck and pulled.

Blistering pain shot all over as their heads collided.

Izuku became disoriented. And in the blur, she kicked him off. Now, she was barreling full speed towards Katsuki.

“Kacchan!” Izuku screamed as he took off full speed behind her.

It was almost too late.

Katsuki turned his head at the sound of his name. Straightaway Jin took the opening. He landed a sickening kick in Katsuki’s jaw. Katsuki hissed and ate the hit and he steeled himself.

Himiko speared her chain directly at his heart.

Katsuki rapidly moved out of the way as the blade sliced straight through the fabric of his uniform. Without hesitation, he quickly grabbed the chain with both hands. Using his whole weight, Katsuki heaved.

Himiko flew forward.

Katsuki dug his feet into the ground and flung her straight into Jin like a ball and chain. Their bodies crashed into each other unexpectedly, taking them off guard.

Himiko rapidly recovered, but Jin took two seconds longer. And that small opening was all Izuku needed. She tried again to attack Katsuki, but Izuku stopped her. He dipped low, and with the edge of his blade he cut it through her side. She screamed out. He spun on his heels to immediately send a ferocious dropkick directly to her head.

The sound of cracking bone echoed into the room. She was sent skidding straight down into the ground.

Jin readied himself to land an unexpected punch to the back of Izuku’s head. But he was stopped. Katsuki shot a handout and caught Jin’s fist in the air. He gripped it so tight he nearly broke Jin’s knuckles. Izuku rounded quickly. He ducked underneath Katsuki’s arm and landed a devastating blow with his blades.

He cut straight through the skin and muscles of one of Jin’s arms.

Jin screamed and jerked backwards. He freed himself of Izuku’s blades as they hit down to the bone.

The blood from the injury sprayed directly across Izuku and Katsuki. Jin slapped a hand over his wound and Himiko quickly recovered back on her feet. All four of them took defensive stances.

Heavy panting filled the air as they sized each other up.

Without taking his eyes off his bloodthirsty family, Izuku handed Katsuki one of his blades. Katsuki viciously gripped the hilt. He adjusted it, slicing through the air with a twirl of his wrist. The obsidian weapon melted into an extension of his limb.

They took a step closer to each other.

Jin's teeth were clenched and Himiko worked her nearly broken jaw. The fury in her eyes escalated as she looked down to her side wound. As the blood seeped out, Izuku could feel her anger kick up another notch. She wiped her bloody nose, smearing the red liquid.

An eerie smirk spread across her lips.

"Focus your efforts to kill the brute," Himiko growled. "Izuku deserves to watch him die."

Everyone moved at the same time.

In a silent understanding, Izuku kept his eye on Jin while Katsuki kept his eye on Himiko. They found themselves in a wordless sync as they combined their strength and speed.

Whenever Himiko tried to lock her chain around Izuku's neck, Katsuki would quickly catch it and overpower her. When Jin tried to stab Katsuki in the side, Izuku quickly out moved him and disarmed him with speed Jin didn't possess.

They kept on the defensive and found themselves using the other for leverage. Jin swung a punch in Katsuki's direction. Katsuki ducked low to dodge. In the same moment Izuku kicked high above Katsuki and landed a successful swift combo to Jin's face. Katsuki spun low and then slung his blade into Himiko with his whole-body weight.

It didn't take long before they were fighting back-to-back, covering the other.

It went on like this until Izuku felt fire ignite in his lungs. The fury of kicks, punches and blades was proving to make both Jin and Himiko frustrated. Izuku could feel the despondency spill into the air. Together, he and Katsuki were impenetrable. And it seemed like both his siblings were picking up on that fact.

Then Izuku caught the split-second look exchanged between Jin and Himiko. They nodded and began to switch up their attacks.

Jin suddenly turned and ran away from the heat of battle. He headed straight towards his katana.

Without hesitation, Izuku took off after him. He knew he could outrun him. But in the next second, Himiko wrapped her chain around Katsuki like a snake.

She tangled him up in her metal web and yanked him across the other side of the room.

Through his shaky vision, Izuku could see a blur of blond.

Himiko and Katsuki immediately began combat and it was incredibly fast paced. Himiko successfully cut Katsuki's calf. Katsuki then sliced her shoulder. They both fought through the pain inflicted, but it was clear Katsuki couldn't predict Himiko like Izuku could.

Himiko's mixed aerobatic techniques were something Katsuki had never faced.

Izuku hesitated for a split second. He wanted to help—but then pushed forward.

He kicked his feet higher in gear to pass Jin. The two brothers caught gazes. They both looked at the katana. It all suddenly felt slow. Jin dived for the blade, and Izuku slid on the ground.

Within the blink of an eye, Izuku's hand reached the hilt first.

He grabbed the katana the second before Jin could. Jin tried to drop backwards, but Izuku whipped the sword wide.

The sharp blade cut straight through Jin's stomach.

Blood sprayed across Izuku and the floor. Jin choked. He stumbled on his feet and Izuku lunged for the kill. His nostrils flared as oxygen rolled through his body. Pure, unfiltered adrenaline drove him as he plunged forward. He sank the katana straight through Jin's center.

Both of their eyes went wide.

Jin grabbed the blade out of shock and stared into Izuku's eyes.

Izuku's heart skipped a beat.

"Damn." Jin gave an impressed, bloodied smile. A trail of red spilled from both sides of his lips as he tried to laugh. He tilted his head. "You came a long way from being the runt, huh? And here I thought we were starting to feel like whatever a 'family' is."

Guilt pulsed through Izuku. He blinked back conflicting tears.

He pushed the blade in deeper until it pierced through the other side. Jin gasped as he tried to scramble for something in his pocket. It was a syringe filled with paralyzer. Jin weakly attempted to stab it at Izuku's neck, but Izuku caught his wrist without much effort.

He gazed up at his elder brother who was now coughing up blood.

Izuku twisted the blade until he knew it hurt.

"We were nothing like a family," Izuku said wretchedly.

Jin laughed. He shook his head and whispered, "To me, we were."

Izuku cut up, severing the organs inside of his brother. Blood pooled at their feet as Jin dropped to his knees. Izuku kneeled with him, keeping his hand on the hilt of the blade. He watched as Jin fought against death. His brother strained to keep his eyes open and he weakly hold up the syringe. Once more, he tried to stab at Izuku's neck, but darkness pulled him under this time.

Jin blinked once. Then twice. Then he closed his eyes and slumped over on the ground.

The syringe full of blue liquid rolled across the wooden floor.

A shrill scream cut through the air.

"No!" Himiko shrieked.

Izuku whirled his head towards the other side of the room.

Himiko's face was distorted in horror. Tears collected at the rims of her eyes as she watched Jin's body twitch. Her gaze filled with terrifying spite as she dodged another one of Katsuki's blows.

The murder brimming inside of her became a terrifying aura. Waves of red pulsed from her frame. She gritted her teeth and Izuku could see her relive Sen's death. She whirled on Katsuki at the same time Izuku dropped the hilt of the katana.

Izuku sprinted to the other side of the room. Himiko's speed kicked up a gear.

She moved like vengeful lightning.

There was no time to move out of the way. Katsuki was instantly tangled tightly in her chain. It wrapped around him like a deadly python and his arms became painfully restricted at his sides. Katsuki tried to struggle out. But before he could, Himiko delivered several hate-filled punches to his jaw.

A sickening crack of broken bone echoed out.

Right as Izuku was about to reach them, suddenly a body collided with him.

His whole world view toppled upside down as he was tackled to the ground. Izuku yelled when he was rolled over and violently stabbed in the neck with the point of a needle. He howled in pain.

When he finally got a clear view, Jin was above him on his last breath. Through a sickening smile, blood poured out of his mouth and onto Izuku.

"Sorry," Jin wheezed. He heaved, ready to pass out at any given moment. "Even if it's the last thing I do, you're going to go back home one way or another, baby brother."

The paralyzer was fast working. He could feel his body fight against it. But his immunity was not at the peak of its abilities after two weeks of missing micro-dosing himself. In a haze, all Izuku's senses decelerated. His limbs became shaky, and he was unable to push Jin off.

Jin gave one last uncanny grin before his eyes rolled back. He fell on to Izuku face forward with a heavy thud. The dead weight made Izuku nearly scream out as all his wounds were pressed on to. But he pushed through his weakened state the best he could. However, it was difficult. He was slowly falling more and more into a stupor.

Black began to swim at the edges of his vision. A small whimper escaped his lips.

The sound of Izuku's weakened gasp made Katsuki whip his head.

And in that split second where his eyes were not on Himiko, he made a tragic mistake. A flying kick connected with his chest. He was knocked straight over—and right into the Amethyst Room. His back cracked as he slammed into the hard wall inside.

The bone breaking sound made Izuku crane his neck.

Through his dimmed vision, Izuku saw Katsuki inside of the broken sauna. His husband freed himself from the chain—but Himiko reeled it back like a whip. She struck him across the face with it without mercy. Katsuki's blood splattered across the inside of the room as he fell to the side.

In the blink of an eye, Himiko slammed the glass doors shut.

She quickly tied the handles together with her chain, locking the doors together.

Himiko wasted no time turning the sauna up to a lethal boil. She broke the gauge with her elbow for good measure and the glass scattered across the ground.

Katsuki worked himself up right again. He exhaled heavily as he held his face and violently shoved on the doors to get out. However, all he got in return was a horrific rattle. He shoved again and again, and the chain sang its metallic tune. It wasn't budging.

Izuku's heart stopped. Himiko trapped Katsuki inside.

The red lights inside the sauna snapped on and the buzzing of heat sizzled into the air.

Katsuki began punching the glass with his inhuman strength, but it didn't break. Izuku made the quick conclusion that it was plexiglass. And unless Katsuki suddenly had the strength of 10,000 pounds in a single punch, he wasn't going to make it out on his own.

The red lights inside the sauna turned a deeper shade.

Katsuki looked up, horrified. He began punching harder until his knuckles bled.

Izuku screamed out for him. The urgency of Katsuki in danger made everything speed up. He overpowered his shaking limbs to push Jin's limp body off him. He whipped up on his feet and took off with energy he didn't have.

Expectedly, he was stopped by a swift kick from Himiko. Izuku blocked with his arms and whirled on his feet. He countered with an equally lethal kick to the back of her head. But of course, she blocked exactly like him with a low duck.

With half dim vision, Izuku began to fight Himiko with everything he had. Every second he could feel against his skin. The pounding of Katsuki trying to break the glass kept on in the background. It was a horrible percussion keeping tempo to the rhythm of their fight.

Himiko hit him in the jaw. Izuku stabbed her in the leg. She clawed her nails down his face, and he dropped the point of his elbow into her mouth. She lost a tooth and spit it in his face. He lost his composure and tried to wrap his hands around her throat. They fell to the ground in a furious squabble.

Desperation took a hold of them both. Within mere seconds, their movements became more and more unraveled. Izuku and Himiko twisted up together like vipers in a final showdown. It was now evident that this was the moment.

All the years of hatred between them was coming to a boiling point.

Izuku gritted his teeth as he was slammed onto his back. Himiko lunged for him with a knife, and Izuku caught her wrists.

The tip of her blade was an inch away from his eye.

Izuku's arms began to shake as she pushed down, determined to drive it through his skull. Their gazes locked and fearsome electricity surged through the air. Izuku's heart was beating erratically as he heard Katsuki in the background beginning to scream from the heat that was ticking up and up.

Himiko pushed down harder, nearly overpowering him.

The point of the knife got a half an inch away from his eye.

"I'm going to rejoice when I finally kill you," Himiko proclaimed venomously. "I never had any goddamn plans of bringing you back to Tomura alive. You don't deserve a happy ending."

Those last two words made Izuku envision the happy ending he wanted.

He saw Katsuki, their future house, and all the love they had promised each other. Something unlocked inside of him more powerful than his instinct to survive. It was warm, and it was fearsome. It combined with all his violent tendencies and gifted him a second surge of strength. He felt his veins pulse under his skin.

The paralyzer in his body suddenly felt as thin as water. His vision slowly came back, and he could see crystal clear all the things in life he wanted—and it was Katsuki.

Izuku decided she was wrong. He deserved his happy ending.

With a fearsome yell, Izuku twisted Himiko's wrist around. She balked at his sudden wave of power and before she could act, the point of her blade faced her.

Izuku thrusted it directly into her eye.

An ear shattering scream overshadowed the squelch. Izuku's face twisted in sheer malice as he pushed the blade deeper and then cut wide.

He sprung up to his feet as his sister screamed on the ground.

Himiko grappled at her face, blood seeping between her fingertips. She cursed his name and tried to dive at him but missed. Izuku side stepped and immediately stabbed right into the other eye, blinding her fully. She fell to her knees, screeching his name like a curse to the sky.

Izuku promptly set off towards the sauna.

Inside was Katsuki, sweating profusely and hissing as he no longer could touch the door. Blisters were swelling on his legs as he nearly cooked alive.

Izuku whipped off the chains from the door and flung them open.

Katsuki rolled out of the cooker immediately. He flung himself to the cold ground and sucked in a breath between his teeth. Izuku squatted down to catch him and held him in his arms. Katsuki gripped back, gasping for sweet, cold air as his body shook. Both of their eyes were wide with horror at what nearly was too late.

A sudden faithful cry ripped beside them.

Both Izuku and Katsuki snapped their heads to see Himiko charging for them. Blood cascaded down her cheeks from her butchered eyes as she lunged. But Izuku rushed her right back. They collided, and this time, he was able to finally have the upper hand.

She blindly flung a knife and Izuku grabbed her arm. He tossed her around, and with all his strength threw her into the sauna. He picked up the chain before she could get up again and wrapped it tightly around the door handles. Exactly like she had done.

Himiko flew forward.

She screamed and banged on the glass. It rattled underneath her tremendous rage. She yelled loudly as the temperature inside began to boil. Her fists pounded harder and harder. She did what Katsuki couldn't, and the glass mildly cracked under her fist.

But it gave no more. It kept her trapped inside as she yelled Izuku's name.

"You fucking runt!" Himiko screamed. She progressively became more and more undone, blinded by her rage and now by Izuku's brutality. "Let me out of here! This is not fair! It's not fair, it's not fair!"

Izuku took a large step back and his hands began to shake. He stared into her face, and it was like looking into a twisted mirror. Countless lines of blood streamed down her face, and her hair was tousled in every direction. Her lipstick had smeared across her skin and countless cuts and bruises were all along her jaw.

She looked like The Blood Viper, doused in its own undoing.

“Why…Why do you get to be happy?!” Himiko demanded fiercely. She scraped her nails along the glass, and both Izuku and Katsuki recoiled at the high-pitched sound. Then slowly, her screams devolved into sobs. Helpful, terrified sobs. “Why did you get to be special, Izuku? Why?! Why did I get the shittest life?!”

He wished he had the answers. But he didn’t.

Because he wasn’t special. And he didn’t always get happiness. Their hell was crafted from the same pain, but she always assumed the knife was duller on his side. But Izuku knew the truth, the knife that cut them was always the same type of sharp. It simply cut them in different ways.

Slowly, Izuku walked up to the glass.

He studied her mangled face. The cuts, the bruises. The blood red hue that was splattered all over her. Without flinching, he took one last good look at his sister—his rival. He saw his reflection in the glass stack on top of her.

Izuku leaned in as Himiko began to cry blood.

“At least you will know the last thing you and Sen both saw before you died was my face,” Izuku venomously whispered. “You can talk about how you both hated me in hell.”

A scream as vicious as a storm erupted.

Himiko drove deeper into her hatred. She yelled his name. She cursed his future. She cracked the glass some more, and for a moment, Izuku wondered if it would give in to her unbridled strength. But it didn’t. It kept her solidly confined, just like all the envy she harbored for Izuku.

She could do nothing but helplessly scream as her skin began to boil.

Blisters the size of coins began to rise on her flesh. She fought against it, scraping them off like pimples. Blood spilled and more blisters appeared. She frantically rattled the doors as the lights inside turned the deepest shade of blood red. Then the lights flickered. The sound of the heat buzzing was at its highest octave, and it mimicked a swarm of wasps.

And then Himiko stopped.

Her blind gaze looked forward as if seeing him. With finality, she accepted her last moments.

Izuku froze. He watched with a conflicting heavy heart.

Katsuki limped towards him. He stopped beside Izuku and watched with a horrified expression as she cooked alive. Swiftly, Katsuki turned his gaze away. He shook his head and put a hand on Izuku’s shoulder.

“You don’t have to watch this,” Katsuki murmured.

But Izuku didn't budge. He kept his eyes tethered to Himiko. Because even though they hated each other, she deserved to have a witness to her undoing.

"Yes, I do," Izuku whispered.

She smiled at him, for the first time. She laughed and then finally she slumped down.

Then she whispered her last words: "I hope you never find happiness, Izuku."

It felt like her final strike. And this promise cut into him more than any of the blows she had landed before. Himiko faded and her body went deathly still on the ground. However, behind she left her rage. Her words rang as if there was truth inside of them.

And exactly like she wanted, Izuku wondered if she was right.

Weary green eyes looked around.

Surrounding them was a sea of blood.

It was everywhere. On the walls, on the ceiling, the floors. It was on the doors and in cracks. He gazed at the two mutilated bodies of his siblings and soon their ghosts were added to his endless catalog. He could feel their eternal eyes stare up at him and their spiteful simpers were stapled to the inside of his thoughts.

Izuku wondered if she was right.

Was this forever going to be his life? Would he ever really find happiness? Even if they escaped now, how long would it be before Tomura sent another viper after them? And then another and another? Not to mention the Yakuza. Was he forever doomed to a life of endless death?

As if Katsuki could see him drowning in his mind, he shook Izuku out of it. He grabbed Izuku by his shoulders and lightly jolted him.

The sudden movement jerked Izuku back into the present. He focused his gaze and stared up at the love of his life.

"Hey, breathe," Katsuki desperately urged. "We need to go."

Izuku swallowed dryly and took a deep inhale. He hadn't even registered that he had stopped breathing. He shakily exhaled and nodded. Pushing back the haunting thoughts, he glanced around. His eyes cut towards Himiko and Jin's unnervingly still bodies.

They could no longer afford sloppiness.

"We need to cut their jugulars," Izuku instructed seriously. "We have to make sure they're dead and bleed them out."

"Good idea," Katsuki agreed.

Together they walked over to Jin's body first. Katsuki kicked him over and Izuku took the katana out of Jin's abdomen. Without flinching, Katsuki bent down and craned Jin's neck for Izuku. He angled it well, showing the slight raise of the vein under the skin.

They looked at each other once as Izuku steadied his shaking hands.

He put the edge of the blade to the crook and slit Jin's neck open.

They both quickly ran into the hallway.

Izuku was gripping his twin blades. Katsuki was wielding Jin's gun. He was carefully counting the rounds left and he held up three fingers to indicate the number of bullets inside. They needed to make sure to use them wisely until they got to their bags upstairs.

Right as they were about to run straight for their room, a string of loud bangs trembled from inside the building. Both froze on the spot because it sounded like a struggle. They cut their eyes at each other. They homed in their sharp hearing to focus in on where the sounds were coming from.

The source was around the corner. They slyly moved towards the source of the ruckus down a long, dark hall.

As they crouched, they noticed there were traces of blood caked in the floorboards. It was evidence of a brawl and Izuku felt a huge weight of guilt come down on him. He hoped with everything he had that no one was harmed. He didn't know if he could live with more added guilt that someone else died at the hands of his family while in pursuit of them.

When they came to the epicenter of the voices, it was directly behind the doors of the cafeteria. Soft sobs could be heard on the other side. Izuku peered around carefully, keeping himself masked in the shadows. He was able to peer through the sliver of a crack between the doors. He clenched his jaw.

He saw five lower ranked vipers standing there.

Their faces were vaguely familiar. He recognized some of them as siblings who always admired the Viper Seven. They were poised with their guns directly at all the bathhouse employees. Each person was on their knees with their hands up while fear rolled off their bodies.

Everyone seemed terrified except Nemuri. She was wearing a hardened, war-stricken expression. Murder was dancing in her eyes and there were bruises all along her face. She was fairly beaten up from what seemed like a three on one battle.

"Someone should go check in on Blood Viper and Double Headed Viper," one of the viper spoke. "I haven't heard any screaming in a while. They might've completed the assignment."

“I’ll go,” another viper replied. “Hey, maybe after we bring back Viridian’s spoiled ass, we can leverage it into Tomura giving us a promotion. He’s been in the worst goddamn mood without him. He’ll probably agree to whatever once he gets his Little back.”

Sick, humor filled laughs echoed out.

Izuku leaned back quickly when one of his siblings began to walk towards the door.

He signaled with his hand for Katsuki to get ready.

His husband stationed himself strategically next to the door.

When the lower ranked viper came out, Katsuki immediately snatched them. He muffled the man’s yell with his large hand and snapped his neck in a sharp, quick movement. The sound of the vertebrae breaking was barely audible as the body went entirely limp in his arms. Quietly, Katsuki lowered the dead man down on the ground.

He held up his gun and strategically pointed the barrel through the crack in the door.

He put his finger on the trigger.

Three concise shots were fired.

Three heavy thuds were heard from the inside.

A sudden yell of confusion from the last Viper standing cued them to move quickly. They rushed inside of the cafeteria, ready with their weapons raised.

The last Viper immediately pointed his gun at them. But before the Viper could pull the trigger, Nemuri jumped to her feet. She moved into action, and revealed a hidden knife that was tucked underneath her dress. She slit the viper’s throat without hesitation the moment he took eyes off her. The Viper’s eyes bulged. He grappled at his throat that was now raining crimson as he dropped to his knees.

He choked and gasped until he finally keeled over.

With pure satisfaction, Nemuri’s cold eyes watched the body tumble down to the ground, dead.

A sigh of relief rang out. Takeyama held her hand over her heart and Ryoku shakily scrubbed her hands down her face. Sekijiro was clutching his arm that was bleeding.

Nemuri quickly jogged towards the window and peered out of it and then shut the blinds. She repeated this action several times over until all the curtains were drawn. Nemuri turned her hardened gaze on both Izuku and Katsuki.

“Are you two alright?” Nemuri asked sternly.

“Okay as we can be,” Katsuki replied.

Nemuri kicked the dead body on the ground. She watched the Viper on the ground twitch until they no longer did, and their eyes rolled back. She scoffed and scowled.

“Who was that?” Nemuri questioned.

“It was the Vipers,” Izuku answered quietly. A shadow stretched across his face. “I’m so sorry. They came here for us.”

“Unfortunately,” Katsuki whispered. “We might need to get a move on before more assassins come. But did you want us to stay behind for added protection? We could help.”

“No need,” Nemuri muttered, fully on high alert. “They caught us off guard because of the fireworks, but that won’t happen again. If those really are the Vipers, you two need to get a move on like you said. I think I saw a couple of untagged cars in town as well. They were driving slowly, and that’s when I decided to turn around and make sure you both were alright.”

“Yeah, and then we were ambushed,” Ryoku added. “But next time there won’t be an easy ensnarement.”

“I’m so sorry for bringing this here,” Izuku said with his head down. “I didn’t think they would find us so quickly.”

“You have nothing to be sorry for,” Nemuri quickly corrected. She walked up to him and put a kind hand on his shoulder. She smiled the best she could and shook her head. “But you should never underestimate the resources the Yakuza has. Nor should you doubt the number of eyes they have crawling all over the damn place.”

Katsuki wearily glanced off to the side. He then said, “We should really get going before more come.”

“I agree,” Izuku whispered. “Thank you all for your hospitality. I’m r-really sorry for the mess we’ve left behind.”

“We’ll be able to handle ourselves, don’t worry at all,” Takeyama reassured.

Next, Sekijiro walked up to them hastily. He carefully peered at the endless cuts, scrapes, and wounds on their bodies. At this point, both of their purple uniforms were polka dotted with blood. The fabric had been cut up to the point the thin cloth was nearly shredded off their bodies.

“Let me patch you both up before you go,” Sekijiro suggested urgently. “Some of these look really nasty. Especially that shoulder wound on you, Izuku. You won’t be able to function properly once the adrenaline wears off.”

Izuku peered down and he was greeted with overwhelming blood sliding down his arm. Katsuki was wearily looking at that wound as well as Nemuri. Izuku winced. Himiko had done a damn good job at injuring him where it counted.

“Yeah, You’re right. Bandages would be good,” Izuku agreed shakily. “Th-Thank you.”

“And a fuck ton of pain killers too,” Katsuki added in.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Cleanup was more efficient than Izuku thought it was going to be.

There had been a secret room neither Izuku nor Katsuki knew about that was in a clandestine back room. It was full of cleaning supplies, and more surprisingly, large baths for acid. As all the employees took a post, it didn’t seem like the first time this group had disposed of bodies —and it certainly didn’t feel like it would be the last either.

Izuku and Katsuki sat in chairs as Sekijiro tended to them in the secret room. As his wounds were stitched up, Izuku watched as Ryoku lowered all the Vipers into an acid bath she prepared.

When their flesh hit the liquid, it hissed like a snake.

Izuku stared on without blinking.

“We need to make a plan to keep out of their reach until we can make it to Nana,” Katsuki whispered beside him as Sekijiro cleaned his cut with an alcohol swab. “We’re not going to be able to slow down now.”

“Is there any place you can think of for us to hide?” Izuku asked wearily.

“No,” Katsuki said gravely. “Nemuri? Is there any place you know we could go?”

“I’m sorry, there’s not,” Nemuri reluctantly replied.

Katsuki exhale roughly. He said, “I guess we’re going to have to keep cutting these bastards down in the meantime until I get a call back from my ex-supervisor. We’re officially on the run.”

A moment of silence stretched between everyone as the acid bath sizzled.

Izuku focused in on Jin and Himiko’s bodies. They sank down deeper and deeper into the dark liquid like they were being consumed in quicksand. When the last strand of blond hair disappeared beneath the surface, all that was staring back at them were the ripples in the acid.

In that small riptide, Izuku saw a lifetime of memories involving Himiko and Jin. None of them were particularly pleasant, but that didn’t stop Izuku from feeling a bit of solemness.

This officially only left him and Tomura as the lone survivors of the Viper Seven.

“What are you thinking about?” Katsuki asked.

“Nothing important,” Izuku replied quietly without taking his eyes off the bath.

Katsuki held his hand lightly. “You can tell me, no judgment.”

Izuku turned hesitantly to his husband. They leveled gazes and the words stumbled off his tongue.

“I’ve killed everyone from my unit except Tomura,” Izuku confessed. He blinked rapidly, and he sucked in a deep breath. “And we all were raised together. Is it bad that I don’t feel guilty for any of their deaths except for Hiryu’s?”

“No.” Katsuki clenched his jaw. “Fuck them.”

“I think the worst part is, I never wanted to see any of them die, despite knowing they wouldn’t have cared if I did,” Izuku murmured. “I thought maybe there was a chance Himiko wouldn’t care about me leaving because she hated me so much. But I was fooling myself. Everyone I grew up with were always real vipers.”

“You only did what you had to do in order to survive,” Katsuki tried to reassure him. He squeezed his hand. “If it’s between you or those fuckers, you should always choose yourself.”

Izuku squeezed his hand back.

He sucked in his lips and his eyes skirted back to the acid bath. In his ear the fizzling sounds multiplied louder and louder until he swore, he heard Jin and Himiko’s haunting laughs mix together.

ɯɯɯ

Once they were all patched up, all the employees in the bathhouse armed themselves.

Each took a weapon from Nemuri’s collection while Izuku and Katsuki changed out of their uniforms. There was no time to wipe away the blood. They jumped into their winter clothes and pulled on their jackets. Nemuri slung two bullet proof vests towards them, and Katsuki locked and loaded several of his guns into his holster.

When it was the dead of night, it was officially time for them to embark.

Both stood in the doorway, and the brisk winter winds blew through their skin.

How fast the night had changed. And this was likely only the beginning of their troubles now that they had been discovered. The faint smell of iron chipped into the air and Izuku felt uncertainty stare back at him from the other side of the night.

He turned to Nemuri. She was already looking at him, with tears in her eyes.

Izuku smiled weakly. He approached her and gave her a tight, warm hug. She returned it back to him tenfold, and the affection between them compressed. He felt a sting in his heart and knew he would miss her. Even though he had only known her a short time, he finally felt like he understood kindness a bit more because of her. Izuku nearly didn’t want to let go.

He squeezed his eyes shut tightly as she cradled his head.

“Thank you so much for everything,” Izuku whispered gently.

“I would do it again in a heartbeat,” Nemuri whispered back. She away from the embrace and nodded to him and Katsuki. “Make sure you both live a full life.”

“We’ll try our best,” Katsuki said. “Thank you for everything you’ve done for us. Please stay safe the best you can.”

All the employees said their goodbyes and after that it was time to go.

They both hurried towards Katsuki’s motorcycle and packed up. Izuku and Katsuki put on the bullet proof vests under their jackets. It was heavy but Izuku was more than thankful for it right now. Who knew who was waiting on the inside of the night for them. Katsuki climbed on his motorcycle, and Izuku followed suit with his pulse pounding in his ear.

When he was fully seated, Izuku positioned the bulletproof duffle bag Nana had given him so that it covered his back. They put on their helmets and Katsuki revved the engine. They peered around and found no one else lurking in the shadows.

When Izuku locked his arms around Katsuki’s waist, he couldn’t help but look back. He felt compelled as if there was a string attached to his head that pulled him.

He saw Nemuri standing there with a heavy heart and fear loudly screaming in her eyes.

Katsuki didn’t look back as he took off into the foggy night.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They were unsure where they were heading.

All they knew is that they needed to get far away and fast. Izuku kept a look out for any suspicious movements as Katsuki sped off down the empty highways. The streetlights felt like fleeting stars passing them at light speed. The only things Izuku could see was the road, those passing lights, and the blank sky above.

After about two hours of straight driving, the bone chilling winter was beginning to sting. He tucked his hands underneath Katsuki’s jacket and huddled in closer. He rested his pounding head against Katsuki’s back as they slowly came to halt at a red light.

Izuku glanced around, and the dark silence prickled his skin. They were the only vehicle around.

Katsuki turned his head slightly and audibly sighed.

“I’m low on gas,” Katsuki announced begrudgingly. “We have to stop at a station soon.”

“Here I was, hoping we had unlimited fuel,” Izuku replied tiredly. He hugged Katsuki closer. “Let’s try our best to make it quick.”

They found a gas station on the edge of the next city in their path.

It stood out like an oasis of light in the vast darkness. The neon blue and red lights offered no real comfort. But what did was the small storefront that was attached. There was yellow warmth radiating from the inside and Izuku could see the shining bald head of a man as they drew closer.

Katsuki parked the motorcycle at the nearest pump and kicked up the stand.

Izuku hopped off first and began stretching his arms. Katsuki fluidly swung his legs around and cracked his back. Neither of them made a move to take their helmets off. It was a silent understanding that they were being careful to avoid being identified.

As Katsuki pumped gas, Izuku kept a sharp lookout.

He was keen on any sounds or movements. But no matter how hard he searched, all he found was emptiness. It was engulfing them like they were on a tiny island, stranded in the middle of a sea of shadows. Truthfully, he didn't know whether to be worried or thankful that there wasn't anyone nearby.

When the click of the pump signaled their tank was full, Katsuki took out the nozzle and hung it up on the station. He turned to Izuku and jutted his head towards the store.

"Let's go inside and pay in cash," Katsuki said.

Izuku nodded, and they began to walk into the store together.

A melodic bell echoed when they entered through the door. The clerk that was inside perked up. He was an elderly man with a full face and a slightly red nose. He was huddled over the counter and offered a warm smile that translated through his honey brown eyes.

"Welcome, welcome!" The elderly man greeted cheerfully. "I hope you two are having a great night!"

Izuku and Katsuki made disgruntled, but agreeable sounds.

As Katsuki began paying for gas, Izuku's eyes wandered the small shop. He counted the colorful candy bars and pondered how many visitors this man received through the night.

When the register chimed, signaling their transaction was complete, Izuku's eyes wandered up towards the foggy mirror above him. Then he halted entirely. In the fisheye he saw the distorted image of headlights approaching in the distance. Suddenly the sound of multiple car engines revved through the walls.

All three men sharply turned towards the glass door.

Driving up were four cars.

All the hairs on Izuku's arm stood up. With a bated breath, he waited for them to pass. Katsuki clenched his jaw when they came closer, and he cursed out loud when they began to slow down.

They all pulled up, surrounding Katsuki's motorcycle.

Both Izuku and Katsuki immediately went on high alert.

Underneath the iridescent lights of the gas station, the details of the cars were revealed. They were sleek, deep black and all perfectly shined. The windows on all the vehicles were tinted, the rims were gold and there was not a license plate in sight.

Izuku immediately recognized the odd uniformity of the cars. But worse, he saw the flower-like symbol of the Shie Hassasikai that was embedded in gold on one of the cars.

"Oh my, what a busy night I'm having today," the clerk said curiously. He took his glasses out of his shirt pocket and put them on his face. "How peculiar. I don't usually have this many customers this time of night."

He limped around the counter and tried to get a better look. But quickly Izuku shot a hand out and stopped him.

The clerk looked over his shoulder and asked innocently, "What's the matter, young man?"

"Don't," Izuku whispered harshly. He shook his head as his eyes darted between the clerk and the four cars outside. "Don't let them in."

At that, the clerk's posture straightened out. The little bit of color that was in his cheeks vanished and he turned his eyes to the posse of cars parked outside. He squinted and swiftly a ghostly expression washed across his face.

He saw the Yakuza symbol crystal clear.

Katsuki began reaching for his gun. "Lock the front door."

The clerk did precisely that with extra haste.

"Do you have a back door we could exit out of?" Izuku asked quickly as he began scoping out the small store. He pulled down the blinds and pulled out his gun too.

"Ye-Yes, towards the back," the clerk replied. He dryly swallowed when suddenly Katsuki cocked his weapon. "Wh-What's going on? Why do you all have guns?!"

"Go hide in the back closet, and don't come out for anything," Katsuki answered selectively. He pointed to the utility room and the old man flinched unwillingly. "Be as quiet as you can be if you want to keep your life."

The doors on the cars opened and out poured men in all black.

"Shit," Izuku hissed.

The clerk quickly ran towards the closet door and locked himself in. He didn't spare a single look back while Izuku and Katsuki ran towards the back door. They immediately flung it open, and quietly pressed themselves against the back side of the building.

Loud banging pounded on the door.

“Open up!” A gruff voice of a man yelled. “You have until the count of three! Or we will not spare you!”

Izuku and Katsuki exchanged a single glance. They began carefully tiptoeing towards the corner of the store.

“One!”

They reached the corner, and Izuku peered around.

“Two!”

He saw the motorcycle awaiting them on the other side.

“Three!”

The sound of glass shattering to the ground nearly made Izuku flinch.

His senses reactivated to their highest level once more. Everything began to move in slow motion. He could hear the footsteps of the yakuza rush into the store. Their boots crunched the glass under their feet as they cocked their weapons. Violent clamoring became the ticking countdown to get the hell out of here.

They made a run for it.

They sprinted straight across the gas station, going full speed.

Someone shouted, exposing them. “They’re outside! Stop them before they get away!”

A parade of bodies chasing after them ensued. Izuku and Katsuki jumped the cars blocking the bike, sliding across the hoods. Bullets whizzed right past Izuku to try to kill Katsuki. When one bounced off Katsuki’s helmet, Izuku’s heart stopped. Then fury burned through his veins.

As Katsuki turned on the motorcycle, Izuku’s killer instinct activated fully. His pupils narrowed down as he locked on to the Yakuza men flooding out of the store.

He shot two down right through the heart where they stood.

“C’mon!” Katsuki shouted.

Izuku quickly spun on his feet. He barely made it on the back of the motorcycle before Katsuki sped off. They skirted forward, narrowly maneuvering between the cars blocking their way.

Deadly bullets whizzed past Izuku’s head, aiming for Katsuki—and Katsuki only.

Their whole world jerked forward at high speed. They took off into the night at the fastest velocity Izuku had ever seen Katsuki drive. He clung on tightly, and the winds began to cut straight through them. It didn't take long for the smell of burning rubber to fill the air. Several sets of blinding headlights began to chase right behind them. The lights grew larger and larger, and Izuku felt like prey.

Katsuki cursed out loud when a bullet nearly nicked him. He kicked up the speed and began to zig zag.

More bullets tried to hit Katsuki and Izuku looked behind them. The blinding headlights mixed in with their unsteady motions made it extremely difficult to focus. But Izuku homed in. He was able to decipher that all four cars were coming right after them at full speed. Each vehicle had a person with a rifle standing up through the sunroof trying to shoot them down.

Izuku adjusted himself. He held on securely to Katsuki's middle with one arm. He twisted his body and took aim with his gun. He tried to take down the men in the sunroofs—but missed when the cars jerked out of the way.

He took several more fruitless shots. He clenched his teeth as sweat began to profusely pour down his forehead. This was going to be too difficult like this. His aim was too rocky between Katsuki's maneuvering and the yakuza's dodging.

But Izuku knew that unless they killed these henchmen, they were not going to make it out of here alive.

"Do you think you can take them out?!" Katsuki yelled as he shifted them out of the way of another bullet.

"I can do it, but I need you to get me closer!" Izuku shouted back. "Or put me on an angle!"

Katsuki nodded and leaned forward.

They hit a curve in the road, and it twisted them around. For a split second, it gave Izuku the right point of view and he did not waste it. He fired off three bullets into the closest car: one shattered the window, one hit the driver, and the last one hit the man hanging out the sunroof.

The car began to spin out.

Loud, abrupt skidding alarmed everyone as the car tumbled at high-speed. It hit a bump in the road and flipped on its head. Glass sprayed everywhere like rain. Izuku shielded his face, and Katsuki didn't take his foot off the gas. When Izuku looked again, he saw flames arising from the belly-up car. The other three cars jerked around the mayhem and continued to chase them in hot pursuit.

The road straightened out again, and Izuku's head rattled around. He held his grip on Katsuki firmly as he aimed with the other hand. He tried his best to take out the other three cars but was faced with the same problem. Right when Izuku wished he could get closer, their pursuers began to kick it up a notch.

The sound of shifting gears clanked. Rubber burned hotter against the pavement and the cars began to gain on them at an unnerving speed. Izuku's eyes widened when suddenly they were beginning to become boxed in. Two cars pulled up on the side, and another pressed right on their bumper.

"I should have fucking set that goddamn opera house on fire and killed all these bastards," Katsuki hissed.

The two cars next to them began to close in.

They crept uncomfortably close until the smell of exhaust choked Izuku. Hands began grappling at him, trying to take hold of his arm. Izuku quickly jerked out of the way. Instead of grabbing him, the men ate the barrel of his gun. He shot two men at point blank range in the arm and then again in the head. He pulled the trigger again to kill the driver—but the gun clicked empty.

Izuku reloaded quickly, using only one hand. He put the barrel of the gun in his mouth and snatched the extra rounds out of his jacket pocket. He reloaded the gun rapidly. He whipped his pistol back in his hand and aimed straight for the driver.

Then suddenly a hand grappled him from the opposite side. Izuku yelped as he was violently pulled towards the other car.

Everything began to tip sideways as Katsuki's balance was knocked off. The motorcycle became uneasily wobbly, and both of their hearts began pounding. Hands began trying to pull Izuku through the car window and Izuku struggled against them.

Katsuki quickly recovered and Izuku snatched his limb back. The man tried to grab him again, but Katsuki moved sharply. He kept one hand on the bike's handle and pulled out his gun. Within the blink of an eye, Katsuki shot the man in the head at point blank range.

Izuku twisted and aimed his gun to the driver's head. He successfully landed a shot. Katsuki switched hands and did the same thing for the other car. Both vehicles on either side of them came to devastating, hard stops. Each car twirled out of control and rolled off the road. They crashed off into the grass and left chaos in their wake.

There was only one car left now.

The car that was tailing their bumper tried to rear end them off the road. The hit was hard enough to jerk the bike out of control. Izuku held on for dear life as he was rocked forward. Katsuki cursed and tried to jerk to the side, but the car did the same thing as him.

It kept on their tail like glue and began to ram them over and over.

Izuku tried again to shoot from an awkward angle with one hand. But right as he was about to pull the trigger, the car rammed them again—but this time harder than before. Izuku yelled as the grip he had on Katsuki was lost.

He toppled backwards unexpectedly, but Katsuki's hand shot out behind him in the nick of time. His husband grabbed him by his jacket and held him with pure might. Katsuki pulled Izuku forward and Izuku clung to him right away again using both arms.

"Hold on tight," Katsuki warned.

That was all Izuku got before Katsuki chaotically steered the motorcycle. He spun the bike around so fast that Izuku had to close his eyes. His head twisted like he was on an extreme rollercoaster. He hugged Katsuki's midsection with all he had as they spun around and around.

When the wind was cutting into him in the opposite direction, Izuku finally opened his eyes. They were racing back in the direction they came. The car behind them was making a frenzied U-Turn, trying to keep close.

"I'm going to turn around again," Katsuki yelled over the roaring winds. "Take them out through the window when we cut past them."

"Got it," Izuku responded.

He held on tight as Katsuki jerked the bike around. They only gained speed as Katsuki began barreling towards the car. They were heading towards a collision. It was nearly a game of chicken, and the car was not moving out of the way.

Izuku readied himself and held up his gun. He closed one eye to tighten his aim.

When they closed the distance, Katsuki skirted slightly to the right by an inch. They passed each other and both Izuku and the passenger in the car held up their guns. The adrenaline in his blood made everything slow down.

He saw the two people in the car. He saw the viciousness in their eyes. He saw the passenger take aim with a tranquilizer bullet. For anyone else, this would be the end—but Izuku's killer instinct was sharpened by Tomura himself.

Izuku's quick trigger finger worked its deathly magic.

His bullet sliced through the air at precisely the right time. It cut through the head of the passenger clean, and then barreled into the driver's temple. Both men fell forward, dead instantly. Two for the price of one. The car spun out just like the others did.

It came to a dramatic halt, leaving behind road marks that had steam rising to the sky.

Katsuki came to a steady, but fast stop.

He turned the motorcycle to the side, and both looked at the car. They waited for any signs of life. But none came. They glanced behind them, awaiting more potential enemies, but no one was in sight. The night echoed only their heavy breathing.

They were officially alone again—barely escaping the narrow grasp of death once more.

Izuku lowered his gun.

He scanned his eyes across the scene. They were close to where the other two cars had crashed off the road. Small fires had caught under the hoods of those vehicles. Scattered like confetti, debris was everywhere. Car parts, stray bullets, and blood were stacked up and down the vacant road.

Without dropping their guard, Izuku and Katsuki climbed off the bike.

Izuku kept his hand on his gun and so did Katsuki. They quietly surveyed the madness together. Katsuki slowly took off his helmet and his face was drenched in sweat. His bangs were plastered to his forehead and the weariest expression Izuku had ever seen him with was taped across his face.

“What the absolute fuck,” Katsuki harshly whispered.

Izuku took off his helmet as well. Cold, fresh air filled his lungs, and he pushed back his damp hair out of his face. His eyes stretched wide as he stared at the tiny fires up and down the road.

“How could they find us?” Izuku asked, utterly baffled. “This doesn’t make sense—we’re in the middle of nowhere. There was no one tailing us from when we left the bathhouse. I’m sure of it.”

There was no answer from his husband.

Katsuki seemed equally as puzzled. His gaze frantically darted all over as he investigated the chaotic scene. He stalked up to one of the flipped cars and then stood over a lukewarm body that had been launched from the window.

Then suddenly, Katsuki’s posture snapped upright like a light bulb went off.

He whipped his head around so fast Izuku worried if he hurt himself.

Katsuki stared directly at his bright, red motorcycle.

“It’s my bike,” he hissed bitterly.

In a whirl of frustration, Katsuki flung his head back and gestured to the vehicle in disbelief. Izuku’s eyes widened, and it clicked in place. Izuku stared wide eyed in horror at what had possibly given them away.

“Fuck!” Katsuki let out a loud, disgruntled groan and gripped his hair. “Fuck. Fuck. Fuck. And they could be tracking my phone if they have as many resources as you say they do. I have anti-tracking software on all my devices, but maybe someone got past my firewall.”

Izuku rubbed his forehead to ease the growing headache.

But quickly, the answer felt so painfully obvious. Of course.

The Vipers probably had been tracing them through CCTV footage this whole time. Izuku ignorantly assumed that without Aoyama, that their technological reach would be hindered. But of course, even though Aoyama was the best, it doesn't mean he was the only one who could excel. Especially when the right pressure was applied.

Izuku wondered if Tomura knew where he was this whole time. What if his Big Brother was simply waiting until ready to come collect him?

A chill ran down his bones at that thought.

“Damn it all,” Katsuki cursed angrily. He slammed the bike helmet on to the ground in pure anger and groaned. “We’re going to have to go dark completely with these fucking blood hounds. No bike. No phone. No contact with anyone. We can’t even so much as breathe in the wrong city otherwise they’ll send another goddamn squad.”

Izuku closed his eyes and tried to breathe. He couldn’t help but blurt out the obvious question that their whole survival hinged on.

“What about the call from your supervisor?” Izuku asked. “We can’t get rid of your phone just yet.”

Katsuki dropped his head slightly and the hope in his eyes was fading.

“We’ll have to play it risky until it gets too hazardous,” Katsuki muttered reluctantly. He fixed his gaze on Izuku very seriously. “How are you on ammo?”

“I have a fair number of rounds left,” Izuku muttered. He inhaled deeply and let out a rickety breath. “But not enough for an entire month and a half worth of shoot outs like this. I could only probably last another five ambushes before I’m forced to only use a blade.”

“Same.”

Katsuki crossed his arms and grew silent. He delved into deep thought as he stared down at the corpse laying at his feet. He kicked the body over, studying the man’s bloodied, road burned face.

“Once we ditch the motorcycle, we’ll be able to buy some time—but not a lot,” Katsuki muttered unhappily. “In the meantime, we’ll keep the phone—but only until my shitty ass supervisor calls me back. After that, we’ll destroy it immediately. So, let’s hope he calls before someone tries to take my head off again.”

With bitterness, the two of them left their helmets on the side of the road.

They didn’t look back as they walked up to the one car that was still in decent condition.

They both began to search everywhere in the vehicle for any cell phones, trackers, or laptops. They scanned thoroughly, patting their hands everywhere. Sweat beaded on Izuku’s forehead as they did this because he knew they couldn’t screw this up.

Every single device they found they smashed it to bits.

Upon completing that task, the two of them wordlessly transferred all their bags into the car.

“We should drive to the next city over and steal another vehicle,” Katsuki said. “We’ll be okay in this, but only for a few hours. But it’ll be good enough to confuse them.”

They opened the doors to drag the dead bodies out. Katsuki unceremoniously tossed the dead Yakuza man on the pavement. Izuku reached for the second body inside, but paused momentarily when he recognized who it was.

He leaned in. Gradually, the familiar face began to fill him with dread.

“What’s wrong?” Katsuki asked when he saw his sudden hesitance.

“This person is a Viper,” Izuku said. His heart dropped and Katsuki locked his eyes on the dead corpse in the driver’s seat. “If this Viper is with a Yakuza, then…then that means they’ve teamed up.”

“Oh, perfect,” Katsuki grumbled sarcastically. “Those bastards are officially working together to bring us in.”

Izuku didn’t respond because working together could mean a lot of things. It could mean Chisaki hired the leftover Vipers to come and find them. It could mean maybe there was a momentary collaboration to get things done quicker.

Or meant one other thing—the thing that Izuku feared the most.

Izuku laid the vaguely familiar Viper down on the ground. He looked at his fallen sibling and then his eyes trailed down to his pockets. He patted the corpse down and found the silver cellular device all Viper’s carried.

Izuku entered their universal pin code and searched through the emails.

He scrolled back by date, scanning all the subject lines. Many of them were labeled urgent and sent by either Tomura, One, Ms. Nagant or Mr. Compress. Every single email was about a shortage of Vipers and the state of assignments. Until he found an email from three days ago.

> From: Mamushi Tomura
>
> To: Tokyo Vipers
>
> CC: One
>
> Subject line: URGENT: Shie Hassaikai Merger under way and Viridian Viper Situation
>
> All,
>
> Thank you for your cooperation over the last two weeks. I know it has been a trying time given the circumstances. The number of Vipers lost to Viridian Viper’s defective actions has undoubtedly affected us all. Many missions have been canceled and as a result, some of our clients have pulled their support to seek business elsewhere until we get everything under control.

Because of this, we are down in fiscal numbers. However, after discussing the situation with One, together we have arrived at a solution that would be able to mend this fiasco.

As of now, it is in our best interest to begin pursuing a merger with our biggest clientele, the Shie Hassaikai.

I know this comes as a surprise for many of you. But after much discussion with One, we feel as if it is the best course of action. Once the merger is complete, this will mean our family will function as a faction of the Yakuza rather than assassins for hire. This union will allow us to recover the number of forces we have lost from the fire and the murders. Additionally, we will be able to recover financially from having clients pull away. We will also be able to gain access to unlimited Yakuza resources that would help us begin preparing a new cohort.

Mr. Chisaki, One, and I met and hashed out a proper business deal. We wanted to make sure this moves forward with all parties' best interest in mind. There have been many conditions set on both sides. However, two large conditions were set by Mr. Chisaki, and they are non-negotiable:

1. The Viridian Viper must be delivered to him.
2. Bakugou Katsuki must be killed for murdering his family members.

As of now, both are a priority. The merger cannot move forward until these tasks are completed. Going onward I will be selectively dispatching you all to complete these checklist items.

I will be answering all suitable questions at the next all hands meeting, which will be scheduled for tomorrow at 18:00 in the Grand Hall.

Signed,

Mamushi Tomura, The Horned Viper.

Izuku's world warped as he stared at the e-mail. He breathed out unevenly and glanced at Katsuki, who was reading along with him over his shoulder. The tension in the air became palatable with disdain. Katsuki's anger was simmering on low heat, ready to explode.

"C'mon." Katsuki's nostrils flared and he looked Izuku dead in his eye. "Let's get the fuck out of here."

ᔓᔓᔓ

The entire drive, Katsuki held his hand.

There was a wordless connection between the two of them as they began to melt into their new reality. Izuku tried his best not to spiral. But it was difficult. He found himself thinking about that email detailing the merger, especially the part about Katsuki.

When they finally made it to the next town over, immediately Katsuki began scouting for a discreet car to hijack.

“Let’s try to make sure we don’t take some family’s minivan or something,” Katsuki mumbled as he drove through the city slowly. “I’d feel sort of bad if we took something like that.”

The comment made Izuku give a short, humorless laugh.

“Wow,” he said in a slightly amused tone. He turned to his husband and cocked his head. “Never thought you would be so thoughtful while trying to steal a car. You really are the nicer one between the two of us, I think.”

Katsuki scoffed. “I’m not that damn nice.”

Izuku held back a small laugh. Katsuki then pulled into a residential area where rows and rows of cars were parked on the street. He drove by slowly and then finally stopped when they came upon what they were looking for.

“Ah, fuck yeah. That’s the one,” Katsuki whispered. He pointed with his finger. “That’ll be a perfect damn cover.”

The car Katsuki was pointing at was probably the most unremarkable vehicle Izuku had ever seen. It was slightly worn with a dent in the side and there was a layer of unwashed grime on it. A little yellow air freshener dangled from the rearview mirror. And it was a dark beige color, like it was trying not to stand out.

In short, it was exactly what they needed.

They pulled up beside the car and glanced around carefully. A single hand motion from Katsuki was all it took for them to jump out and immediately step into gear. Izuku kept checking over his shoulder, rightfully paranoid. And beside him Katsuki sat his back bag on the ground and opened it up.

To Izuku’s full surprise, Katsuki pulled out two fake license plates. Izuku blinked, taken back by the sheer level of preparation.

Katsuki caught his shocked face and smirked over his shoulder.

“What? Don’t seem so surprised,” Katsuki said a bit cockily. “I’ve learned a lot of tricks of the trade over the years. Stealing cars is only good if you can make them undetectable.”

Izuku let out a shy, nervous chuckle. “You are good. I feel stupid for ever doubting your abilities.”

His husband winked at him playfully then went back to being serious. Carefully, Katsuki undid the license plate from the car with a screwdriver. He focused on laser sharp and Izuku peered over his shoulder again.

With mindful precision, Katsuki replaced the real license plate with the one of his own.

He grunted as he finished and proceeded to do the same for the backside of the car. Quickly, Katsuki traced his hand on the under belly, making sure no trackers were attached. He nodded to Izuku then stood up. Using a tiny device he pulled from out of his pocket, he placed it methodically on the door handle. It blinked blue and suddenly the alarm on the car was disabled.

Katsuki began picking the lock.

Watching his lethal lover like this made the back of Izuku's head tingle. It could've been fatigue finally catching up with him, or maybe he was officially losing it. But it was oddly enticing to observe the range of Katsuki's impressive skills.

When the door sprung open, Izuku was deeply impressed.

His husband proceeded to get to work hot-wiring the vehicle. In the meantime, Izuku threw all their belongings in the backseat. There were some signs of life in the car like old receipts from Seven-Eleven and empty plastic cups of coffee.

The engine began revving loudly. Katsuki smirked at him from the driver's seat.

"Let's get going."

ᔓᔓᔓ

They drove further south with no stops. When they passed a sign that said, 'Welcome to Kitakyushu', it signaled to them that they were nearly all the way at the southernmost end of the country.

The radio played a song Izuku had never heard of as they reached the peak of night. Katsuki's eyes were beginning to droop, and it was obvious when they both felt the adrenaline come down. Izuku's shoulder was hurting, and Katsuki was stiffly moving his arms. When the ache in their backs became too much, they knew they needed to stop and rest.

Katsuki drove up to a secluded cliff top and parked the car off in the grass.

They were hidden slightly by the barren trees, and there wasn't much traffic coming in and out of the mountain road. They climbed into the backseat and used Katsuki's sleeping bag as a blanket to warm them up.

Katsuki sighed and his frosty breath spilled into the air. He pulled out his phone once more, leaned further into the makeshift blanket, and he began dialing the same contact once more.

This time, there was significant urgency in the air. Katsuki's usually steady hand was beginning to shake. The phone continued to ring and ring. The rhythm of the drawn-out tone was starting to sound like their funeral hymn.

When Izuku heard that dreaded flat beep his heart sank.

Katsuki couldn't even leave a voice mail because the inbox was officially full.

Katsuki pulled the phone away from his ear reluctantly.

"No dice," he said, sadly. "Yet again."

Izuku's bottom lip began to quiver. He tried to stop it because he didn't want to be weak—but it kept on.

He clenched his teeth and squeezed his eyes shut in frustration. All the day's events crammed into the forefront of his memory. He saw Jin and Himiko dissolving in acid. He saw Himiko's bloodied eye sockets staring back at him. He re-lived her vengeful words and felt the curse carry through the air.

Suddenly, a weight like granite appeared in his chest. It weighed him down until he let out a loud, saddened sob.

Katsuki sat up immediately, eyes wide. Izuku covered his mouth and lowered his head. He turned away as the cries spilled out and he didn't know what else to do.

"Hey, don't cry," Katsuki comforted right away. He reached over and pulled Izuku close to him. "Shit. Izuku, please don't cry."

"I'm sorry," Izuku said desolately. He turned his head into the crook of Katsuki's neck and hugged him. Katsuki hugged him back, threading his hands through his hair and shushing him. "I'm so sorry. I can't help it. I-I'm worried now. What if he doesn't call us back? What should we do? Do we find somewhere else to go? Nemuri was all Nana could give us. I-I feel so guilty dragging you into all of this. You were so happy at the estate and now you're back in this because of my mess."

"We'll get that call back, don't worry," Katsuki whispered. But even he didn't sound like he believed his words all the way. He held Izuku closer. "I promise you, we will."

"But it's been nearly two weeks," Izuku countered. "There's no way we can keep this up for six more weeks, Katsuki. We don't have the resources. And if the Vipers and Yakuza are working together that means there's more places we can't go and more eyes on us. A-And if they catch us, you'll—you'll—"

Another sob hit his lips.

Izuku dug his fingers into his husband as if he was already buried in his grave.

"I don't want you to die, Katsuki," Izuku wept. His voice cracked on the last syllable. "I don't think I-I could go on if you—"

"—Stop that," Katsuki snapped.

Izuku glanced up at his husband. Fierce, fire-like eyes were burning into him. Katsuki's face was distorted in anger, but not for him. He took Izuku's face in his hands and cradled his cheeks. Calloused thumbs wiped away the tears rolling down Izuku's cheeks.

“I’m not going to die,” Katsuki said firmly. “Especially not by the hands of some scummy ass yakuza. And I’m not going to let you come within a fucking inch of that bastard. I meant what I said in those shitty ass vows when I said I will kill anyone who gets between us. That includes yakuza, vipers and it especially includes your fucking brother.”

“You remember what you said during your drunk vows?” Izuku asked quietly.

Katsuki continued to wipe away his tears and nodded.

“Of course, the embarrassment that tape left me with is hard to forget,” Katsuki replied with half a laugh. “Sure, I was plastered, but those words were from the damn heart. And I don’t go back on promises very easily. Now, c’mon. Give me a smile. We did really fuckin’ great today—and we’ll keep doing great until we get to Nana.”

Izuku wanted to smile. He did. But it was impossible given the weight of what was resting on his shoulders.

“Y’know, I…have something that might really make you smile,” Katsuki said quietly.

“I don’t think anything could make me smile right now,” Izuku muttered.

Katsuki’s lips twitched into a smirk as if he knew a secret.

He grabbed for his backpack in the passenger seat and unzipped the small pocket on the front. Izuku could barely see what he was shifting for in this type of dark. But the tiniest bit of moonlight caught the glimmer of a green gem.

Katsuki held up his faux wedding ring from Okinawa.

Izuku’s heart thumped loudly, and his mouth went dry.

“Y-You kept it?” Izuku asked in disbelief. “After everything?”

“Mhm, I did,” Katsuki replied. He twirled it around, admiring it as if the rust from wear and tear wasn’t there. “I couldn’t find it in myself to toss it, even when I was blinded by anger. All I saw was you when I looked at this stupid little gem.”

Izuku smiled weakly.

“See, I told you it would make you smile,” Katsuki teased impudently.

He pinched Izuku’s cheek playfully and a bubble of laughter fell from Izuku’s lip. Izuku blushed, shyly smiled, and allowed Katsuki to plant a tiny kiss on his forehead. When Katsuki reeled back, Izuku’s eyes were slightly brighter.

“I actually still have mine as well, Kacchan,” Izuku confessed.

This time, it was Katsuki’s turn to be shocked. “You do?”

“Of course.”

Izuku reached forward and dipped his hand into his duffle bag. He pulled out the ruby ring.

Katsuki's face sparked to life. A short, hopeful laugh escaped past his lips as Izuku showed it to him.

Izuku was beaming through his tears now. They smiled radiantly at one another.

He had tucked away the small ring right before the masquerade. He'd been careful to hide it amongst his toiletries, thinking he would need it to get through the gut-wrenching task of entertaining Chisaki. Up until now, he had forgotten it. Or more so, he figured it was a lost cause given Katsuki's anger. He thought Katsuki likely had thrown his ring into the abyss and cursed his name.

But he was wrong—and he was so happy that he was.

Katsuki took the ruby ring from Izuku and slid it on his finger. Izuku did the same with the emerald ring for Katsuki and underneath the moonlight, the fake gems shined like they were worth millions of dollars. Izuku gazed into Katsuki's eyes and that magnetic pull that was between them deepened.

Their hands laced together in harmony and Katsuki leaned in to capture his lips.

Heat spilled down his body and Izuku melted underneath his husband's touch. He scooted in closer as Katsuki deepened the kiss. It felt beautiful. The way their bodies pressed flush together in the brittle cold was all the warmth Izuku thought he could ever need.

When they pulled back, Katsuki's eyes were set at half mast.

"We'll be okay," Katsuki murmured against his skin. They rested their foreheads together and cuddled further under the blanket. "When this is all over, we'll be living in our house in the countryside. And all this bullshit will be nothing but a bad memory."

They intertwined their hands, and the green and red gems gleamed as brightly as their love.

ɯɯɯ

A melodic ringtone mixed in with the singing of birds. Izuku's ears were graced with this appeasing harmony, and it softly roused him from his sleep. He gently yawned and Katsuki's body shifted as well. They both blinked their eyes open at the sound of the ringtone.

When the second loop of the song occurred, it instantaneously shot Katsuki out of his drowsiness. He sprang up and hastily grappled for his black phone. He flipped it open, and the loudest, longest exhale of relief expelled from him.

"You bastard," Katsuki said. "It's about time you called me back, old man."

Izuku heard the agitated voice of a man on the other end of the line say, "What the hell have you gotten yourself into, Bakugou?"

Chapter End Notes

Please let me know what you think below!! Thanks so much for sticking with this journey <3 I appreciate each and everyone one of you ^^

Chapter 34: Unison

Chapter Summary

> Unison: (Instrumentation Instructions) Players strike a chord together at the same time.

Chapter Notes

> Helloooo! So sorry about the disappearance :) I was in Asia traveling and then had some life events happen directly after. All good things so no worries but I'm back and able to sit down and finally wrap up the last leg of this story!! I'm so excited for it and I hope you are too!!!
>
> Beta'd by the LOML, Luna ❤️
>
> Warnings: Cheesiness and Violence

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 34 — Unison

.

.

.

Izuku's eyes widened. This was Katsuki's supervisor, wasn't it?

"Did you get my voicemails?" Katsuki asked quickly.

Within a split second a maelstrom of words were thrown his way.

"Get them?" The man snapped. The octave raised so sharply that Katsuki flinched. "Did I get them?" Katsuki pulled the phone away from his ear and groaned. "Bakugou, I was bombarded with them—while I was on vacation! I just finished listening to every single one. What the fuck is wrong with you?! Do you have a death wish—"

The rampage went on until Katsuki scrambled to throw on his shoes. The car rocked with the hurried motions as the speaker blurted out a string of colorful insults that Izuku would never have thought to put together.

Katsuki huffed before throwing open the car door. The cold wind rolled in as Katsuki stepped outside.

“Sorry, give me one second to calm him down,” Katsuki grumbled and closed the door.

Izuku blinked once. Then twice.

He rubbed his half awake eyes, leaned in towards the door, and tried his best to listen intently. However, he was only able to grab bits and pieces of the conversation. If he could even call what he was hearing a conversation. A curse here. A groan there. It was mostly the man yelling and Katsuki reluctantly apologizing.

Soon the conversation evened out. Katsuki began speaking in a low whisper and the man calmed down enough to the point Izuku could no longer hear what was being said.

Through the fogged up window, Izuku observed his husband. Katsuki stationed one hand on his hip and dropped his head down between his shoulders. He was beginning to pace around, getting further and further away from the car until he was entirely out of ear shot.

Izuku twisted his cold hands to try to calm his erratic heart. But it didn’t help. His anxiety fought its way up his chest causing him to gnaw on his bottom lip until it bled.

When Katsuki finally turned around, the conversation had clearly ended.

His husband raced against the gusting winds to get in the car and slammed the door shut while shivering. Izuku shivered as well, sniffling as he rubbed his frost kissed nose to warm it.

“Well. I have good news and bad news,” Katsuki mumbled as he stroked his chin. He turned to Izuku with a concerned but hopeful expression. “Which one do you want first?”

“Er, what’s the good news?” Izuku replied anxiously.

“The good news is, he said he can take us in. He’s willing to help us stay low and give protection with a professional team. And he gave me the location of an extremely secluded safe house.”

Izuku’s eyes lit up and a blanket of relief fell over him as he smiled.

However, his happiness wasn’t mirrored. Sitting across from him, Katsuki was stuck in a pensive state. His eyes were quietly studying the small amount of blood smeared across Izuku’s bottom lip.

Izuku’s smile receded.

“What is the bad news?” Izuku asked seriously.

“The bad news is…he can’t help us get there,” Katsuki carefully explained. “Since we need to keep moving in order to not be sitting ducks, it gets complicated. If we weren’t being hunted, it would be easy. But we need to get rid of my phone to avoid being tracked. Our only option is to go completely dark like we said. Which means I can't contact him anymore. He gave me the location—we have to make it there and once we do we're golden."

"…And where do we need to go exactly?"

This is where Katsuki tensed up.

"It's Mount Rausu."

Izuku balked. "Huh?"

"I know—"

"—That's entirely the opposite direction of where we are. What—" Izuku leaned back, eyes stretched wide. "Why so far?"

Katsuki didn't reply back right away. There was a small, tense moment as Katsuki broke eye contact.

"Things…changed," is all Katsuki gave.

"R-Right." Izuku glanced off to the side, cursing internally. "Of course."

Silence took a seat between them as they absorbed the reality of the long road ahead. Izuku tried his hardest to focus on the good news mostly.

Was it far? Sure. But this was a clear path to safety and getting to Nana within the next six weeks—exactly what they so desperately need. Izuku mentally attempted to hash out the quickest route possible. But even with a car and nonstop driving, that left them with at least a thirty three hour drive. And that wasn't even accounting for other variables that could cause trouble along the way.

A sudden chill raked down his spine.

A threatening vision of Tomura ghosted across Izuku's vision. Even now he could feel his Big brother's sub zero gaze scanning the entire country to entrap him.

Just when Izuku felt his thoughts begin to spiral, Katsuki acted as if he could feel them too. He reached out and touched Izuku's hand and grounded him in the present.

"We can do this," Katsuki said firmly. "All we have to do is push forward for the next three—four days tops. Then it'll be alright."

A gentle sensation grazed across Izuku's forearms. It encased him like a warm, cozy blanket in the cold car. He pinned down the sensation as hope. It was fuzzy, scary, but it called to him that they had come this far and they could do this. When Katsuki cracked his signature crooked smile, Izuku felt his fear momentarily chased away.

"Ye-Yeah. You're right," Izuku agreed. He slowly nodded his head and Katsuki's smile grew larger and wider. "We can do this—together. We're always better together."

“Damn right we are.”

Now, they both were smiling.

Katsuki turned and reached for the map in the front seat. He shuffled around his backpack for a marker and circled exactly where they needed to go.

It was far. But it was doable.

Together, with the red marker, they mapped out the quickest route possible. They minimized stops and planned for rotating who was driving. When they finished their plan, the sun was fully seated up in the sky. It shone down on them brightly, signaling that it was time to get moving.

Katsuki took a deep breath and grabbed his phone with both of his hands.

He gritted his teeth and snapped it in two.

Izuku stared at the lopsided red circle on the map. He looked at it and tried his best to imagine what the safe house would be like.

Maybe it was a simple metal box. Faintly cold with stainless steel amenities and no entertainment. Or maybe it was an underground bunker of sorts—potentially constructed purely of concrete with various bits of furniture scattered around in a futile attempt to make it feel warm.

As Izuku ruminated, he tuned into the subtle tapping he was hearing next to him.

Katsuki was humming along to the radio while driving. His thumb was keeping beat to the bass as he pressed his foot on the gas. His husband’s intense eyes were focused on the long stretch of road. There weren’t many cars. They were passing through the southern countryside and all there was to see were rolling hills, dead grass and mountains.

Izuku gazed out of his window to take it all in. As he leaned against the headrest, he noted all the various patches of beige and the bright white snow that was sitting on the very top of the hills in the foreground.

As they drove by one particularly breathtaking mountain, an uncomfortable thought pushed itself forward.

This could truly be the very last time he was ever in Japan.

He had thought about it before at the water tower while gazing out at the sea. He had taken in the sights then, trying his best to savor them like a cold glass of water spilling down his throat. He wanted to appreciate every last drop, because if they were going to be free from the Vipers and Yakuza—leaving Japan was likely the one option they had.

“Enjoying the sights?” Katsuki asked in a light, playful tone.

Izuku turned to him and offered a smile. “I am. The mountain we just passed really caught my eye.”

“Yeah that thing was really something. Gotta love all the nature this far out.”

“It’s lovely…” Izuku’s voice trailed off as he stared at the passing mountain in the distance. It grew further and further away from them. “Y’know, I never really…appreciated all this before. But the landscape of Japan is really beautiful. I guess I took it for granted.”

“It’s easy to do that when you’ve grown up here,” Katsuki excused him. He gave a small shrug and took one hand off the wheel to pat Izuku’s leg. “Don’t feel too bad.”

Izuku didn’t respond back verbally. He simply glanced at the fading mountain, knowing there was a bittersweetness to the fact he never was going to see it again in his lifetime. The warm hand on his thigh didn’t leave and soon he felt Katsuki begin to trace tiny hearts into his pants.

“What are you thinking of?” Katsuki probed when silence rinsed over them.

Izuku shook his head. He straightened out his back in an attempt to hide his pensive state of mind.

“Nothing important,” he answered. “You know me. My brain is always on.”

But Katsuki saw right through him—like always. Izuku’s body might as well have been made of glass when it came to those scarlet eyes.

“C’mon, none of that,” Katsuki murmured. He ‘tsk’d under his breath and gave a playful, light pinch to Izuku’s thigh. “Cough it up.”

“Okay, Okay,” Izuku chuckled. He scratched behind his head and shrugged his shoulders tensely. “I guess I am…sad? I mean, I’m obviously sad about a lot of things. These last handful of weeks have been…insane. But it’s really hitting me that we’re going to be leaving Japan. It wasn’t until we were at the water tower that I realized I never got a genuine moment to appreciate what was around me. I’ve always been so…”

Izuku sucked at his teeth, trying to search for a word.

Sheltered? Isolated? Deprived?

“…Insulated,” he settled for.

Izuku waited for Katsuki’s response. He felt bad for constantly bringing up negative things like that, but he couldn’t help it. The lid was finally snapped off his mind and he could easily discuss his upbringing without feeling like his throat was going to clamp shut.

“I actually feel the same,” Katsuki replied.

Izuku softened at the kinship. “Really?”

“Yeah.” Katsuki shrugged. “Obviously your case is far more fucking extreme—but I never took a break to connect with nature and all that hippy dippy shit. There was never any time.” Katsuki frowned ever so slightly. “Too many bills to pay.”

Izuku pursed his lips to the side. He placed a gloved hand over Katsuki’s that was resting on his leg.

“Maybe in our next life we can have the time to really soak it all in,” Izuku reassured.

He imagined it: in the next cycle of their fates maybe they could slow down. They could have the opportunity to truly appreciate all that surrounds them and—

Suddenly, Katsuki sharply turned the car.

Izuku’s poetic thoughts were rattled about by quickened velocity. He yelped as his body ungracefully collided with the passenger seat door.

When the sound of tires burning on the concrete breached his ear, Izuku whirled his sights on his husband. He stared at him like he had gone crazy and judging by the mischievous grin plastered to Katsuki’s face, he just might’ve.

“Wh-What are you doing?!” Izuku yelled as he gripped the dashboard for dear life. Katsuki continued to turn the wheel sharply as if he was in some video game. He looked to Izuku, winked, and took the next exit.

“I refuse to leave shit up to reincarnation,” Katsuki blurted out. “We get one life.”

Before Izuku knew it, they were barreling towards a small pitstop that was tucked away off the side of the road. It consisted of a single gas station that had a handful of pumps and a FamilyMart. They came to a quick halt. They both jerked forward, saved by their seatbelt.

Izuku groaned and kept his head down. He rubbed his temples to restore some patience when he had the sudden urge to kick Katsuki’s ass.

“Sorry—I’ll be quick, I promise,” Katsuki said. He sprung out of the car in a blur.

Izuku didn’t have a chance to respond. He watched as Katsuki walked briskly through the automated glass doors.

A small, amused laugh slipped through Izuku’s lips. He tried to stifle it but the warmth of humor worked its way through his chest like tiny, lovely butterflies. He chuckled louder and louder until he was smiling so hard his cheeks hurt.

A day with Katsuki will never be dull, will it?

He found comfort in that. What a beautiful future they had together.

When Katsuki came back out, he had a small object tucked away in his hand. Izuku couldn't make out what it was. As Katsuki got back in the car, Izuku was about to ask him what was so important that caused him to drive like a bat out of hell but Katsuki beat him to it.

"Say cheese, nerd."

A giant flash went off quicker than Izuku could process. The blinding white light evoked a disgruntled groan from Izuku as tiny spots danced across his vision. He blinked rapidly and when his sight cleared up, he deeply frowned.

"A disposable camera?" Izuku questioned.

"Fuck yeah," his husband replied, a little too cheery. His toothy grin stretched wide with extreme pride. "Now we can have some pictures of all the different places of home. No matter what country we end up in."

"Okay…but when exactly are we going to take these pictures?"

"On our way to the safe house, duh," Katsuki explained like it was simple. "We're driving all the way across the country, might as well make the most of it."

Izuku was hesitant.

He liked the idea. But—

"—C'mon, darling," Katsuki pushed with a sweetness laced into his words. "Let's try to make some memories while we still can."

Katsuki tethered gazes with Izuku.

Like clockwork, Izuku was tempted by those dangerous scarlet eyes, yet again.

"Okay," Izuku agreed shyly. He smiled and melted into the fluttering sensation in his heart. "Let's do it."

ɯɯɯ

When they arrived at their first stop, Izuku was a bundle of nerves. He was holding on to Katsuki's arm and pulling their bodies close as they walked through the park. He was nervous they were veering off schedule, but Katsuki didn't seem the slightest bit worried.

With every step they took together Katsuki was reassuring him with a slight squeeze of his hand. As they pushed into the belly of the crowd they were surrounded by tourists far and wide but also one of the most tranquil parks Izuku had ever seen.

In the middle was a large, frozen lake and evergreen trees were littered all around them. Bunches of flowerless rose bushes were aligned along the corners with dead, yet beautiful, petals on top of the snow on the ground. Off to the side was the old traditional Japanese architecture that Izuku always loved. In the center was a bright red bridge over the frozen lake. It was wide enough for two way foot traffic and gathered around were bunches of people, huddled like busy birds flying in and out.

Once they got close, Izuku saw that many of the people who were gathered were foreigners. They were blissfully happy on vacation, fluttering about and around snapping photos.

“That’ll be us soon,” Katsuki said to Izuku.

“On vacation?” Izuku laughed.

“Hell yeah.” Katsuki chuckled. “After all this we’re taking one really long fucking break. Now, let’s get in line to take one of those cheesy photos.”

They fell in line with the rest of the people, blending in well. Izuku watched curiously as the normal people took photos on the bridge, politely asking the previous person in line to take a photo of them with their loved one.

It was in this moment he observed different types of love all neatly lined up in such a simple way. He saw romantic love as a couple held each other and kissed for the camera. He saw parental love as a mother and daughter stood next to each other, hugging for the photo. Then finally he saw friendship—a group of college students all giggling as they posed with silly grins.

It was such a small thing: to take a picture with a loved one.

But it was something Izuku never had gotten to do before Katsuki.

At this thought, Izuku looked up at his husband fondly. Katsuki looked back down at him, flexing his eyebrows.

As Izuku studied his husband’s face, his eyes naturally wandered over Katsuki’s shoulder. He scanned the faces in the crowd apprehensively, but froze when he saw long, silver hair. Suddenly, a spike of adrenaline as painful as needles stabbed through him at the glimpse of the person.

The tall man was facing away from them, with menacing broad shoulders and his hair was pulled back into a sleek, all too familiar bun.

Izuku jolted and every nerve on his body was set aflame. His breath caught and he didn’t let it go. A hand tugged on Izuku’s arm, but he stayed frozen in place, eyes growing wide as the man began to turn.

“Izuku?” Katsuki called him.

Words could barely reach his ears as the man turned around to face them.

—but it was an unfamiliar face. Plain and unscarred.

“What’s wrong?” Katsuki’s voice turned deadly serious.

"…Nothing," Izuku whispered. He blinked rapidly several times to pull himself out of it. He sucked in several deep breaths and shook his head. "Sorry, I thought—I thought I saw someone but I was mistaken," Izuku whispered. "Sorry. False alarm."

Katsuki's eyes turned murderously sharp.

He gazed in the same direction as Izuku's on full alert. He scanned the area as if to be sure himself. When no one tripped Katsuki's deadly senses, Katsuki visibly relaxed. He then threw his arm around Izuku's shoulders and pulled him in close. His lips dipped to touch the shell of Izuku's ear.

"If you see anyone you even think is half suspicious, run," Katsuki whispered. "I meant it when I said I am your bodyguard. I'll make sure it's okay."

Izuku nodded quietly and Katsuki gave him another reassuring hug that melted away all the nerves he had gathered.

Katsuki asked the woman in front of them to take their photo and she agreed with a bright smile.

She took the disposable camera and it was then he and Katsuki posed. Izuku didn't know quite what to do, but Katsuki leaned into it so naturally. His husband tossed an arm around his shoulders and hugged him tightly. Izuku wrapped his arms around Katsuki's middle and leaned in. Right when they both said "cheese", Katsuki planted a chaste kiss right on Izuku's blushing cheek a second before the flash went off.

Izuku turned, surprised and Katsuki pinched his nose playfully.

"I like catching you off guard," Katsuki cheekily replied. "It's fun messing with you."

"You're more silly than I thought you were," Izuku laughed.

"You have a lot to still discover about me I guess," Katsuki replied. He laughed heartily and Izuku joined in the harmony.

When the next set of people asked them to take their photo, Katsuki happily agreed. He took the camera phone from an older man. Izuku stepped back politely and watched, and it was here Izuku noticed how much the two men looked alike. One was older, but not old enough to be the other's father. But when the two strangers joked warmly between each other, it struck Izuku what they were: brothers.

Izuku's face fell.

The two brothers playfully engaged in banter before posing and smiling together like they loved each other. Izuku was then reminded of a memory that was long buried in the back of his mind. It was shortly after Tomura began implementing their family dinners and long before his rise to total power.

The distant smell of sea salt reached Izuku's nose.

It had been such a small, simple day. There had been no mission. No blood. Tomura was bored and asked if Izuku wanted to come with him to a new tattoo parlor. Izuku had agreed because during this time, he didn't mind spending his days off with Tomura. They had taken a short day trip to the coast——and had taken a singular photo together on the beach.

Izuku realized he had stood corrected.

He had taken a photo with someone he loved before Katsuki.

But he was sure that version of Tomura no longer existed.

As they traveled, Izuku saw all the different versions of Tomura along the way.

He always questioned if Tomura truly loved him, or even cared about him as a person. But as he and Katsuki went place to place taking photos together, Izuku felt like he was finally able to see all the small moments he and Tomura shared together that were similar to this.

Ice cream shop trips. Dinners. Days Tomura let Izuku pick out his next snake tattoo.

There were so many tiny moments of affection that were hidden in Tomura's icy front. They showed like cracks that were too small to see with the naked eye, but as Izuku homed in on them he realized something largely important: Tomura could have easily been labeled as 'defective' as he was.

The singular difference was how his brother hid it. Tomura covered up his affections with cruelty. Every time he did something nice for Izuku, he doubled the amount of pain he inflicted.

This new realization was freeing like a weight had been cut from Izuku's ankles. Him and Tomura were alike, in the worst of ways. The montage of watching his brother grow up flashed in front of him, but this time without all the horror and blood. He saw the half smiles. The favoritism. The way his brother would quietly fuss over fixing his frizzy hair. He saw the intense looks of familial protectiveness.

It was all there, hidden in plain sight—and quite possibly the same, twisted reason Tomura had spent so much energy to set him up with Chisaki.

Then suddenly a soft hum from Katsuki lulled Izuku out of his thoughts.

He turned, and saw the angelic vision of Katsuki contrasted against the setting sun. Golden hair cradled the orange glow like a halo. Katsuki was zoned out driving, and was gently humming to the song on the radio.

His raspy voice was an octave off from the actual pitch, but he sounded so serene.

As he listened to Katsuki sing to the song, he felt Katsuki's love so clearly.

It wasn't hidden in cracks, and it was not overshadowed by any darkness that was inside of him. It was bright, warm and brought out the best version of Izuku.

Tomura's love never did that.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the day felt like it was at its end, they found a secluded spot off the road. It was perfectly placed under the stars with the sound of the wind to keep them company.

They both huddled in the back seat, and cuddled for warmth. Izuku laid comfortably on top of Katsuki as he pulled the sleeping bag over them. Katsuki stroked his hair and then lightly kissed his forehead. When he tilted his head back, he sighed.

"Day one down," Katsuki grumbled as he closed his eyes. He wrapped his arms around Izuku's middle to keep him secure. "Two more to go until we're in the clear. It feels weird."

"Freedom is an elusive feeling—isn't it?" Izuku whispered.

"It is."

Izuku looked up at the stars that night and thought about love. Was it love that caused fate or was it fate that caused love? Because Tomura's version of love was control and Katsuki's version of love was freedom.

And Izuku's—

He was still learning what it was.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they woke up the next day, it was Izuku's day to drive. They circled new pit stops on their map and a giddy feeling bubbled in Izuku's chest. They had taken so many pictures the day before they had to stop and get a new disposable camera. This time, Izuku was the one to happily buy it.

Their first pit stop this morning was a mountain. It stood tall like the embodiment of pride as it looked over the vast countryside. Izuku smiled as he hurried out the car and waved Katsuki along who was smiling as well. Izuku decided then and there to treat their new pit stops exactly like the foreigners from the bridge: a vacation.

He relaxed for the first time since the masquerade and let himself be lost in spending time with Katsuki. He learned a lot about His husband this way.

He learned when relaxed, his husband had a silly streak. He was playful like when they were kids and grumpy ever so slightly when things didn't go his way. He liked taking photos. Enjoyed the rain. Hated the snow. Secretly loved humming softly to himself.

Katsuki was an ever-unfolding mystery and Izuku was enjoying getting to know what Katsuki was like when he wasn't in high stress environments.

After several more pitstops, Izuku couldn't help but feel excited for the future.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The morning passed by without incident.

There were no threats lurking in the shadows as they made their way up to the central part of the country. They stopped off at a wine vineyard and took a picture together there. Then again in a large meadow. And again at a unique restaurant that sold different flavored almonds from Korea.

They were still on track for getting to the safe house in the time they had set out.

The long road they were on suddenly began filling up with larger villages, then small towns. The lonesome road transformed into winding bike trails, railroads and two way traffic much closer together.

Izuku eyed the bright white sign he drove past that read, "Welcome to Numata!"

They were close to passing Tokyo now, approaching the drop dead center of the country. It could have been paranoia, but Izuku swore he could feel Tomura's gaze coming from the east, searching for him.

Katsuki studied the welcome sign as well. He pulled out the map they had and uncapped their red sharpie with his mouth. He leaned back in his seat and spread the map wide in his hands.

"Halfway there. Thank fuck," Katsuki grumbled under his breath. "My back is starting to get a crick in it from sleeping in this cheap ass car. I'm too old for all of this."

Izuku stifled a laugh when Katsuki poorly attempted to crack his back. "You're not that old."

"Yeah yeah, I know. But my spirit is sixty," Katsuki jested. "All I know is there better be a warm bath waiting for us at this safe house—and a full plate of food or I'm going to lose my mind."

"Have you ever been where we're going?" Izuku asked curiously.

"No," Katsuki replied casually as he looked at something on the map. He took a sharpie and circled another tourist attraction. "The old man would never let me crash at one of his private properties. He's way too cagey."

"What about the other safe house?"

"What other safe house?" Katsuki answered, entirely distracted as he studied the map.

Izuku made a confused face. "The one that was on Oshima Island? That we had missed the ferry for?"

Katsuki paused. His eyes slowly rose from the map, as if he had forgotten all about that. Izuku was confused by the sudden onset of silence when Katsuki paused a beat too long to be written off.

“Right.” Katsuki’s voice was stiff—angry almost. “I’ve never been to that one either.”

Izuku’s brows knitted together. What was that?

Right when he was about to ask, Katsuki continued to speak.

“Um, Izuku,” Katsuki’s voice dropped below a whisper. “There’s something about that I’ve been…meaning to tell you.”

Izuku turned his gaze subtly to Katsuki, eyes off the road. He was stunned by the amount of sadness that was now in Katsuki’s face. Empathy was sitting in the front row, but above all—guilt was highlighted in his features. Katsuki hesitantly opened his mouth—but nothing came out. His eyes were scanning Izuku’s face as if trying to find the right words written in his freckles.

Izuku wasn’t looking at the road anymore. He felt oddly held in place.

Then for a second, Katsuki glanced in front of them. His eyes widened.

“Shit—Izuku!”

Izuku’s head turned fast enough to give himself whiplash. He exclaimed when he found them speeding towards a stopped car on the road. Izuku hit the brakes hard. Dramatically, they both toppled forward and the coffee that was in the cup holder spilled over. Katsuki cursed as he grabbed the dashboard and Izuku’s head snapped down at the sheer force.

They both sat in silence at the close call. Izuku perked his head up, glanced at Katsuki who was also relieved.

“Shit,” Izuku harshly whispered. “Sorry—I’m so sorry—”

“—Don’t worry about it,” Katsuki rapidly shook his head. “That was my fault.”

In front of them was an extremely long line of cars. Both husbands frowned deeply and straightened their backs on alert. It could simply be traffic, Izuku tried to reason. Or a tree that fell in the road like last time they got stuck like this. Izuku rolled down the window and peered his head into the winter winds to get a glimpse of what was going on.

It was a checkpoint.

Officers in blue were tediously checking driver’s licenses and cars on both sides of traffic. They flashed lights to the backseat and were instructing people to get out of their cars. Everyone who complied was let through very slowly.

Izuku felt the phantom sensation of Tomura’s hands gripping down on his shoulders. Whatever Katsuki had to say was brushed under the rug.

Izuku put on a serious face and hit the blinker. He made a sharp u-turn the way they came without a second thought. They turned off a side street and were able to shuffle back towards the way they came.

“The highway we need to get to the far north is on the other side of the checkpoint,” Izuku pointed out quietly. “Is there another way around?”

“Possibly,” Katsuki said. He frowned deeply when he saw one officer check the trunk of a car. He pulled out the map and looked closer at the tiny, twisting lines that were converging on the map. “Let’s keep driving west and see what we can find.”

Izuku glimpsed in the rearview mirror and saw one of the officers pat someone down far too thoroughly.

They were certainly searching for something—or someone.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They ended up finding themselves driving directly west—in the opposite direction of Tokyo.

They were getting off track now, and needed desperately to find a way through the middle of the country. However, every time they tried to even get past the threshold, they found themselves caught in another checkpoint that was conveniently blocking the access to the highways into any northern cities.

After the third checkpoint, Izuku no longer felt this was a coincidence.

“We’re going to have to ditch the car,” Katsuki said seriously. His eyes were sharply looking forward at the suspicious officers that were scanning IDs. “We’re not going to make it past like this.”

“I agree,” Izuku murmured quietly. “We need to find a town further south and take the train past Tokyo and as far north as possible.”

Katsuki nodded in agreement and immediately got to work. He looked at the map yet again and realized their route was officially null. He flipped the map over to reveal the train system guide and began to create a route through there. As he did this, Izuku narrowly u-turned back the way they came.

He peeked in his rear view again. However, this time instead of the police officers all not noticing, there was one who was looking straight at them.

A chill raked down Izuku’s spine.

The officer stood there like a statue, watching them drive away.

When the checkpoint was out of sight, the fear that had been pushed down inside of Izuku awoke. It stretched its limbs to take up room in his body and all he could feel was an ice cold terror. There was only one person on this planet that could make Izuku feel this way.

“Do you think your brother would put out checkpoints across the country to find you?” Katsuki asked uneasily.

Izuku didn’t reply back right away.

He could feel the glacial gaze of Tomura on his nape; it mimicked frost bite as it sunk into his flesh. The sensation overpowered him in a way that was saved for his Big Brother. The feeling was so prominent that Izuku could have sworn Tomura was in the car with them.

An imagined projection of Tomura appeared in the rear view mirror, like a ghost. His brother sat there with his legs crossed and hands in his pockets. His glare was soaked with venomous possessiveness. On either side of his phantom were the freshly slain Himiko and Jin, leering at him.

“He would do anything to find me,” Izuku whispered, all too sure.

ɯɯɯ

When they made it to a city away from the checkpoints, the couple considered their afternoon a wash. They were officially behind schedule. Getting to the safe house in two more days was slipping further and further away like grains of sand in an hourglass.

Currently, they were standing in some deserted parking lot in Toyama, Japan. They were parked right outside of the massive train station in the central part of the city.

The buildings in this city were tall, but not dense enough for Izuku to feel covered and safe. The vast open sky above them made him feel vulnerable. Almost as if Tomura’s watchful eye had more space to peer down and spot them.

Right now, Katsuki was leaning over the side of the car with the map. He had a green sharpie in one hand while staring hard enough at the map that he could burn holes in it. He was trying to figure out what trains they needed to take to make it to Mount Rausu. It was proving to be a complicated task because most trains in this part of the country filtered into Tokyo—and that was an absolute no-go for them.

“Alright—we can make it up to the old man in three days...four days tops,” Katsuki grumbled.

Well. That wasn’t what Izuku wanted to hear.

Katsuki gestured him over to take a look at the route he had crafted. Izuku gazed over the marked map and all the crossing lines nearly made him dizzy. Katsuki ran his gloved point finger from green dot to green dot explaining the transfers.

“First train we’re going to take is going to be four hours,” Katsuki said evenly. “It’ll drop us off in Niigata. Then after that, the next two trains are both eight hours. We’ll go from Niigata to Akita station, and from Akita station to Aomori. Then the final train we need to get on will be eleven hours. We’ll be dropped off at Shari.”

Izuku eyed the small distance between the last train stop and the mountain.

“And then we take a bus?” Izuku asked, pointing to the empty space.

“Unfortunately, no,” Katsuki huffed. “There’s no trains or buses in that part of the country based on this map. I think from the looks of it, we have to walk it. It’ll be exactly an eighteen hour walk on foot if we keep a good pace. But the trek up the mountain is going to be two hours at least.”

Izuku rubbed his forehead, the calculations were beginning to give him a migraine.

“But Niigata might be dangerous to pass through,” Izuku said seriously as he looked at their route. “That’s the Chisaki family’s original home city before they took over Tokyo.”

“Yeah. I remember you telling me. But there’s no other route that’s not through Tokyo, I’ve been trying to Tetris this shit together and there’s no other way.”

Izuku’s migraine pulsed. It was Tokyo or Niigata. They had to weigh it out—and truthfully Niigata was their best option.

When Izuku’s frown was too deep, Katsuki leaned in and planted a chaste kiss on his lips. Izuku felt himself flush and his frown was washed away despite his worries at that moment.

“Remember: we got this,” Katsuki reassured. He cradled Izuku’s face in his hands and chased his gaze down until they were locking eyes.

Izuku nodded.

They then began to get to work.

They grabbed their backpacks, securing the straps to their bodies tightly. Izuku pulled his black beanie over his hair and Katsuki placed sunglasses over his eyes. They both put on thin, black surgical masks and Izuku wrapped himself tightly in his red scarf. He sighed as he tried his best to tuck his unruly curls under the beanie but it was hard after two days without a comb and his siblings’ blood still mildly caked in his hair.

Katsuki gently tucked a lock under the beanie, helping him.

His husband then put his own baseball cap on and checked himself in the side mirror of the soon to be abandoned car. Katsuki pulled out the disposable camera and clicked his tongue to catch Izuku’s attention.

“Look this way, darling.”

Izuku didn’t have time to pose before the flash went off. He laughed while shaking his head, blushing slightly.

“I don’t think we get to play tourist anymore, Kacchan…”

“Definitely not, but that doesn’t mean I still can’t take photos,” Katsuki teased. “One day we’ll look back on these photos fondly.”

“Yeah,” Izuku whispered distantly as he looked at the train station. “One day.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

The first train was quaint and quiet, like most commutes. People had their heads down on their phones, or playing games on a handheld console. The seats on this train were a lime green color that felt like it glowed brighter with the early evening light.

Izuku and Katsuki found a pair of seats in the far back of the train. Izuku took the window seat while Katsuki was in the aisle. They chatted lightly and ate the snacks in their backpack along the way. Through this train they were able to see the ocean clear as day. The sunspots sparkled a bright white that reflected off the water, like a sea of tiny suns waving to them as they passed by.

Izuku leaned back on the window, enjoying the sun on his neck.

He pulled out the disposable camera and decided then to snap a quick photo of Katsuki in the seat next to him looking at the map. His husband looked extra concentrated. Eyes focused. Tongue sticking out. Izuku smiled lightly when Katsuki didn’t even register that he had his photo taken.

“What’s your supervisor like?” Izuku asked as his mind wandered.

“The bastard is grumpy as hell,” Katsuki quipped.

“So…like you?” Izuku compared cheekily.

Katsuki paused. He looked up from the map and cocked his head at Izuku. “Well. Yeah. I suppose that’s true.” Katsuki’s smirk twitched into a smile as he distantly lost himself to a memory. “I always thought I got my attitude from my mother, but I’m sure it was a combination of spending half my time with him too.”

“Makes sense, he was a big influence on you,” Izuku said.

“Y’know…one time, someone mistook us for father and son,” Katsuki offered up without being prompted.

“Really?”

“Mhm.” Katsuki snorted. “The person who thought that was a client. It was because the fucker had said some bullshit, and we both detected it at the same time. It was almost comical how we crossed our arms in sync.”

It was easy to picture: identical frowns that pulled on the sides of their mouths at the same time and then the duo folding arms. They probably both seemed so entirely unimpressed at the same time that DNA must’ve been the one explanation for the synchronization. Maybe they even had the same forehead wrinkles from young Katsuki mirroring this guy's actions so much.

Izuku idly wondered if he and Tomura shared any of those similarities.

"Ah—Izuku," Katsuki chimed. He suddenly was sporting an extremely guilty expression. "Er. A couple of important things about my supervisor."

"What?"

"Well, first thing is his name is Aizawa, if you remember." Katsuki paused as if he was carefully sorting his next sentence. "The second thing is…he doesn't know exactly…how… bad the situation is. I told him about needing safety and all of that because I pissed off the Yakuza. But he doesn't know about us." Katsuki discreetly gestured between them with his finger. "Like—at all."

Izuku blinked.

He looked at the slightly rusted rings on their fingers.

"Nothing at all?" Izuku clarified.

"Nothing."

Izuku's chest twisted in a brief stir.

Katsuki was obviously ashamed as he explained, "I—I omitted you from my report about Okinawa. And I didn't mention you being at the estate with me. And…I didn't mention you in any of the voicemails."

Something about it stung. It was as if he was being pinched by the hands of inadequacy itself, but he should have known better. Aizawa had placed a kill order on his head this year—and Izuku didn't blame him.

"Sorry," Katsuki promptly amended. He reached his hand out, and laced their fingers together.

Izuku squeezed his hand back and tried his best to pin a smile to his lips. But it was half formed and clearly forced.

"No need to be sorry," Izuku finally spoke. His voice was rusty as he pushed the words out of his mouth. "I, uh, would do the same if I was in your shoes."

"But I really am sorry how I've handled all of this shit," Katsuki pushed, deeply sincere. "What I'm trying to say is, let me talk to him first, okay? If he sees you, he might flip out and get the wrong assessment of the situation. When we get to the mountain I'll take the lead and talk with the old man before he goes off the rails."

Izuku nodded and forced a smile. "Okay."

Katsuki pulled his mask down, kissed his forehead, and went back to gazing at the map.

Izuku found himself daydreaming about meeting Aizawa. He wondered what the man was like. Did he laugh similar to Katsuki? How many qualities did they share, and exactly how important was his opinion to his husband? Izuku chewed on his bottom lip apprehensively.

He couldn't help but want to make a good impression, but that ship might've sailed. Tiredly, Izuku leaned his head against Katsuki's shoulder. His skull became bogged down by all the buzzing thoughts filling it up.

Izuku's gaze stayed glued on their rings.

The first train ride went by with a bat of an eye. He and Katsuki were in and out of sleep the whole time. Every time Izuku awoke, he found more snow outside their train window as they ventured further and further north.

The second train ride dragged much slower.

They were boxed in a red cart that stunk mildly of cigarettes. It made his nose itch and then about half way through, a man next to them began eating a bag of potato chips obnoxiously loud. Izuku could've wrangled the man for the impolite chewing but they both had to endure it. He and Katsuki were trying their best to sleep as much as they could and retain any energy they needed in case something occurred.

However, there was a finite amount of quality sleep they could get in the old leather seats.

At some point during the eight hour ride, the two husbands played tic-tac-toe what felt like a thousand times over. Izuku learned Katsuki was oddly good at the game, and he was also good at rock paper scissors, which made Izuku flustered to lose several rounds in a row.

By the end of the second train, Izuku gained a crick in his back that was the same as his husband.

Now, they were running to make their third train.

It was somehow already the day's end and the last train leaving out of the station took off as soon as they ran down onto the platform.

"Hurry!" Katsuki shouted as he instantly broke into a sprint.

Izuku caught up to him and passed him as they both ran for the train. They could see the doors begin to shut and for a split second, Izuku thought they could make it. They got inches away—and then the metallic doors slammed shut directly in his face.

"Damnit!" Izuku yelled as he collided with the closed doors.

His hands touched the cold surface and slowly, the steel beast began to pull off. Katsuki groaned and threw his head back as he slowed his running.

Izuku pursed his lips as he watched their train leave them behind.

“Well…that’s the last train until 6:00 am,” Katsuki grumbled. “We’re stuck for the night.”

Izuku’s eyes looked up above at the giant golden clock. It was exactly 00:00am. They had six hours.

Katsuki’s loud sigh bounced off the concrete walls of the underground platform. He took off his backpack and placed it down on the cold ground next to the tracks. He sat down like he was weighed down by rocks in his pockets with a loud thump. Tiredly, the young blond leaned his body against one of the pillars.

Izuku followed suit and stretched out his legs across the cold ground. He pulled his face mask down for fresh air when he noticed they were completely alone.

Izuku took a moment of silence to look around. He gazed up at the low ceiling that held the beautiful old golden clock. Its hands were an intricate type of black metal and the numbers were roman numerals. The platform was decorated sort of the same, something of a relic from the industrial times with stark white tiles, gold lining and old chipped paint.

The air inside of the platform was cool, and the station was eerily quiet. The sole sounds were the occasional creak of old wooden benches and the soft whistle of the wind through the cracked windows. The empty platform stretched ahead, dimly lit by the glow of a single flickering light.

“How is your back doing? Should we try to find a hotel?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki shook his head and said, “No hotels. My back is just going to have to suffer.”

“Well...guess it’s only us and the night, huh?” Izuku mused. He decided to try to find the silver lining. He smiled at Katsuki who softly gazed at him. “Y’know, this isn’t so bad. It’s kinda romantic in a weird, deserted way.”

Katsuki scoffed. “Of course you would find this place to be romantic.”

“What? It is!” Izuku defended with a smile. His dimples showed as he sat up right more. “I mean look around. The pillars are numbered with fancy old steel that was likely hand carved by someone. It must’ve taken a lot of passion to do something like that.”

Katsuki raised an eyebrow. He assessed the number 4 on the pillar across from them and admired the small flower symbol that was hidden in the design.

“Huh. I guess you’re right,” Katsuki agreed. “Well. With that attitude I guess this is an adventure then, isn’t it? We could do whatever we want.”

Izuku shook his head when Katsuki smirked mischievously. “I didn’t say all of that.”

“Yeah, but you implied it,” Katsuki teased. He winked as he leaned in closer to his husband. Heat rolled off Katsuki’s skin and Izuku blushed automatically from the proximity. “The station’s ours for the night. No one else to disturb us. And look at that sky—” Katsuki paused to gesture to the window where the moon was barely visible above the horizon. “We’ve got a front-row seat to the stars, darling. We could have some real fun.”

Izuku glanced up at the sky for a moment, and the corners of his mouth turned further up.

“Okay, I’ll give you that,” Izuku said. “What adventure do you want to have for six hours?”

“Your Captain Romance,” Katsuki shot back. “This should be a perfect opportunity for one of your ‘lessons in love’. What do you think we should do?”

Izuku glanced around the station with a thoughtful expression. The wind made a howling sound, rattling the old building and the benches creaked in tandem with the shift.

Izuku pursed his lips and muttered, “I don’t know.”

“Really? You don’t know?”

“No, I’m sorry, Kacchan. I’m all out of romantic ideas, I guess.”

“Well, I thought the answer would be obvious, dork.” Katsuki stood up and took off his baseball cap. He shook out his messy hair and stood in front of Izuku with his hands on his hips. A charming smirk caught his lips. “I think we have no choice but to dance.”

Izuku blanched.

He laughed awkwardly at first, short and not serious. But when Katsuki didn’t budge Izuku laughed nervously even more. He looked around the ghost station with a confused face.

“Dance?” Izuku reaffirmed. “Here? Me and you?”

“Duh,” Katsuki said, not budging an inch. “Come on, one little dance, I promise I won’t make you look stupid.”

Izuku was still unsure.

“I owe you one,” Katsuki added, much more serious. “Last time wasn’t correct.”

Izuku thought back to the last time they danced—it was the masquerade.

He quietly realized why Katsuki wanted to do this.

Izuku nodded gingerly. “Okay. Let’s dance.”

He rose to his feet and lightly brushed off the back of his pants. He slowly removed his beanie, loving the feeling of the air on his scalp after nearly twelve hours. Izuku let Katsuki gently guide them into the middle of the empty platform.

The cool air swirled around them, letting them know they were alone. A full contrast to last time with all the prying eyes of the Yakuza watching their every move. Now, it was nothing but the two of them and the warmth between them that made the night feel cozy, like it belonged to them.

Katsuki started the sway and Izuku's imagination transformed the room.

The old pillars were now made of expensive white granite, and decorated like they were in a fancy ballroom. A lavish, chestnut floor was beneath their feet and they weren't wearing dingy jackets but rather clean, crisp suits with delicate blouses underneath.

Katsuki then hummed a quiet, off-beat tune. But then slowly the melody shifted until it took form. The soft, ethereal hum drifted into the air and the first few notes were instantly recognizable. Izuku's eyes widened, and he couldn't help but giggle, shaking his head at the sheer irony.

"Really, Kacchan? My Heart Will Go On?"

Katsuki replied with a shrug as he continued to hum. "You're the one who is such a nerd about it. I thought you might like it."

Izuku laughed deeply, directly from his belly. He pictured them together back in Love's Paradise on the boat awkwardly swaying to the song. It seemed like a lifetime ago now, and here Katsuki was—willingly—humming it.

Katsuki continued to hum the song before singing it. He wrapped his arms around Izuku and continued to dance them around. Izuku laughed, breaking the beat, but then he joined in.

Katsuki sweetly sang, "Love can touch us one time—"

"—And last for a lifetime," Izuku sang back, smiling brightly. "And never let go 'til we're gone…"

They continue to sing the song together, the lyrics filling the space around them.

Izuku soaked in this moment, appreciating their blending in such a gentle harmony. It was a little off-key, but it didn't matter. In this carefree moment, the music was theirs, floating through the quiet station, wrapping around them like a familiar embrace.

As the iconic refrain raised, so did their voices.

They jointly sang—"Near…far…wherever you are,"—they held each other a little tighter, letting the lyrics remind them of everything they meant to each other. They continued to let their voices rise, and got louder as they danced together, lost in the night. Their steps on the platform felt like the tempo they always were searching for.

Then in perfect unison, they both belted out, "You're here, and there's nothing I fear—" Their singing was cut up with laughter as they continued, unabashed, "And I know that my heart will go on! We'll stay forever this way!"

Izuku's voice trailed off but Katsuki's continued as he whispered the lyrics, "You are safe in my heart and my heart will go on and on…"

Then, the two of them stop their singing. It came to a gentle halt and the lyrics were replaced by Katsuki's gentle hum of the rift.

The world around them was now a quiet, private sanctuary for the two of them. Their steps became more fluid, more natural. The night continued to stretch on, but it felt like time had slowed down for them. There was something deeply intimate in the way they shared this moment—two people, moving in sync, creating their own rhythm in an otherwise deserted place.

"This is kind of amazing," Katsuki whispered. He tilted his head, impressed with the two of them like they deserved a prize. "Who else gets to slow dance to the Titanic theme song at midnight in a train station?"

"Only us," Izuku replied with a chuckle. His eyes set at half mast as he gazed at his husband. "Despite everything, Kacchan…I-I wouldn't want to be anywhere else right now."

At this proximity, Izuku could feel Katsuki's heart speed up.

Then Katsuki's eyes softened and he pulled Izuku impossibly closer. He placed their foreheads together as he whispered delicately.

"Near, far…wherever you are," Katsuki muttered, as if the Céline Dion lyrics were truly a match for his feelings. "I'll always be here…Izuku. Wherever you go, I will go. I will always make my way back to you. Over and over and over. I mean it."

Izuku's heart softened hearing their vows again. He leaned back as they shared a leveled look, deeply staring into the other's gaze. Izuku's heart fluttered. He leaned in slowly and so did Katsuki. They both closed their eyes to share a kiss. It was full of love so pure Izuku was sure he almost felt cleansed of his past.

They stopped swaying, and time stood still for them for a generous moment.

When they broke apart, their eyes were inseparable. Deeper and deeper into their passionate love they fell. One right after the other—head first both tumbling down and down.

"Always, huh?" Izuku whispered, heart racing at a high. "Even when we're stuck in random train stations in the middle of nowhere?"

"Especially then." Katsuki laughed. "I'll dance with you anywhere, any time, darling. As long as we're together."

"You've got a deal. But it seems like we've always been together," Izuku said thoughtfully. "Even when we didn't know it."

Katsuki smiled at that. "Yeah, it does, doesn't it? It almost kind of feels like…"

Fate.

Izuku waited for Katsuki to say that word once more.

But it didn't come and Izuku didn't finish the sentence. Izuku knew Katsuki didn't believe in fate, and lately Izuku wondered if he did anymore. However, what he did believe in was Katsuki. He believed in this moment, and he believed in them making it to safety together.

They continue swaying, and they resume their humming.

The song wrapped around them like a soft, familiar blanket. There was no rush. At this rate, Izuku feared the world could pass them by and they wouldn't even notice. This moment was all that mattered. The slow, steady rhythm of their hearts. The hum of a love song, and the warmth of each other's presence.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When morning came, she came bearing bright rays of light that stirred Izuku and Katsuki awake from sleeping on the platform floor. The echo of footsteps on the stairs woke them up as the busy people of Akita Station filled the platform to begin their days.

Izuku could feel the tax of day three on the run in his muscles and in the pits of his stomach.

They both put back on their hats and surgical masks and zoned in.

"Alright, last two trains and then we hike—after that, we're in the clear," Katsuki said, fully hopeful.

They boarded the six a.m. train and on the way in, Izuku naturally scanned all the people piling in with them. Many were adults and middle aged men and women in suits. Some others were families looking as if they were heading to a wintry vacation. Others looked like they were getting in from a late night and merely wanted to go home.

As Izuku and Katsuki made their way to the back of the train, Izuku spotted an elderly man with a large hunchback who caught his eye.

The man had wrinkles that stretched across his face and a handful of moles that were interestingly arranged. The tiny black dots created a loose shape of a heart on his left cheek. His eyes were a warm, mahogany brown that was very inviting—and they were locked right on Izuku.

Izuku didn't smile at first. But when the elder man gave him a sweet wave with his cane, Izuku felt himself give in. He hesitantly, but shyly waved back as he passed by. Heat gathered in his chest at the simple action, he felt like such a normal civilian for the first time.

They entered the next cart and found two perfect seats waiting for them.

They plopped down and sighed at the feeling of old leather.

"Much better than the ground," Katsuki laughed. He shifted until he was comfortable and then pulled out a tiny sheet of paper. He took out his black pen and smirked at Izuku. "Ready to lose in tic-tac-toe again, nerd?"

Izuku shook his head and put his hands up. "I'll play if we make it best out of one hundred. At least I'll have a shot at winning."

"Sure, but that's still not going to stop you from losing."

ᔓᔓᔓ

It didn't.

By the end of the eight hour train ride, Izuku had somehow lost 15 to 85 games of tic-tac-toe.

"How do you keep doing that?" Izuku groaned, flabbergasted. He stared at the tiny Xs and Os like there must've been a secret formula.

Katsuki gave no answer to his witchcraft besides a sharp, sarcastic chuckle.

They gathered their bags when the train came to a full halt. When they stood up, they wordlessly held hands. Together the two husbands helped maneuver through the dense crowd at Aomori station. As the train emptied out on the platform, over hundreds of bodies shuffled with them. People zig zagged like tiny ants in overlapping lines trying to get where they were going.

When they found their last train—hope dared to bubble in Izuku's stomach.

The train was larger than the others they had been on, and was much newer. It had a sleek silver look to it with two black parallel lines that cut across the middle. It was one of the fancier trains that was better built for extreme distances.

Right before they boarded, Izuku caught sight of the large giant four faced clock overhead.

It was nearly 14:00, which meant they would get to Shari, Japan at exactly 01:00.

When they boarded, they did their usual routine and headed for the back of the train. However, when they arrived they found it was packed to the brim with people. Izuku frowned, but he supposed that it was normal for this time of the day. Katsuki jutted his head back towards the front of the train and they wandered by to the middle section.

They were lucky enough to find two empty seats and staked their claim.

Right as Izuku shuffled into the window, he casually scanned the crowd in the cart. He saw a couple of similar faces, many of which were on the last train with them. Izuku noticed a mom who had been behind them in line at the last stop and the elderly man with the heart shaped moles who had waved at him.

"Eleven more hours to go," Katsuki said sardonically. "Do you feel like getting whooped in tic-tac-toe again?"

“No, I do not,” Izuku chuckled and shook his head. “You can play by yourself, I’m sure that would be far more entertaining to you.”

“Ouch. Someone’s a sore loser. Didn’t think you would be that type, darling.”

Izuku sheepishly smiled and confessed, “I’m actually tired.”

At that Katsuki shifted down in the cushiony seat further. He smiled at Izuku from underneath his surgical mask and quietly wrapped an arm around him. Izuku naturally nuzzled in, leaning into his husband’s body heat.

“Go ahead and sleep then,” Katsuki said sweetly. “We both honestly should try to. We’re going to need our strength for the day hike we have to do after this.”

Izuku nodded and closed his eyes. It was here the train began to take off, and the roaring sound of wheels against the rails filled the air.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Izuku roused awake, the attrition of being on the run was weighing him down.

All of his adrenaline must’ve seeped through his skin during his deep sleep, because now he could feel pure physical exhaustion from the last two weeks. Every overwhelming encounter piled on top of the next, making all the damage he’s sustained amplified. Izuku rolled his neck when he could feel his arms pulse around the still healing bullet wounds, nicks, and deep cuts. The ones that stung the most he knew were fresh from Himiko and Jin.

Izuku’s eyes blinked open slowly and all his senses came in.

The first sound that breached his ears was Katsuki’s snoring. His husband was out like a light, huddled up to him with his head dropped back against the seat. His arms were locked around Izuku’s midsection and his legs were stretched out wide.

Izuku sat up straight and noted it was dark outside. The sun had returned to her cozy home beneath the horizon, leaving behind the stars in her trail. His eyes slid over to the electric clock at the front of the cart and he could see it was now officially 23:07.

Wow. He had slept eight straight hours.

Izuku looked around and noticed barely anyone was in the cart. In fact, it seemed like it was only them and the old man with the heart shaped mole pattern. The elderly man was snoring loudly with his head lulled between his shoulders as he clutched on to his cane for support.

Izuku shifted and the action immediately roused Katsuki.

A long, deep groan spilled from his husband.

“Damn,” Katsuki grumbled, voice full of gravel. “What time is it?”

“It’s 23:07,” Izuku answered. “We have two hours left.”

Katsuki yawned and worked out his neck. He nodded tiredly and slowly sat up straight. He craned his head to take a look around at the empty cart.

“Interesting.” Katsuki rubbed his eyes. “No one is traveling this far north?”

Izuku shrugged. He was about to give his own opinion, but it was cut short by the sudden gentle push on his bladder.

“Ah. I have to pee,” Izuku announced quietly.

Katsuki nodded and stood up to let him out. As Izuku squeezed his way into the aisle, he walked towards the tiny bathroom nook. It was a few seats ahead of them. He looked behind him to see Katsuki had his eyes open, paying him very close attention.

Izuku passed by the sleeping elderly man.

Then out of nowhere, a scalding jolt of pain hit him as a needle punctured the back of his leg.

Time slowed as heat radiated from where he was hit, and the sting raced down his leg. Immediately, his limb nearly went numb and Izuku toppled forward before he could comprehend what happened. He loudly hit the ground with a yelp and whirled around to look at his assailant. There, he found the once warm eyes of the elderly man to be cold and deadly.

It was only from this angle did Izuku see the faded Shie Hassaikai tattoo that was hidden on the man’s rubbery neck.

In the blink of an eye, everything sped back up.

Katsuki screamed his name and made a run for him. Izuku tried to scramble upright, and as soon as he did, both doors on either side of the cart snapped open. Like a tsunami, eight men dressed in all black came pouring in, four from each end.

“Katsuki, watch out!” Izuku screamed as the four men began to draw their weapons.

Katsuki instantly drew his knife from his holster and began fighting on the defensive. The men tried to punch, kick, and hold him down. But Katsuki’s strength thwarted them in a flurry.

Hands grappled at him from all over as Katsuki did his best to hold his own. In a fury of unrelenting paced moves, Katsuki blocked, dodged, and landed several painful punches directly in their faces. With an air slicing movement, he successfully landed his blade into the side of one man. The guttural scream the man let out bounced off the walls as Katsuki lanced his blade in the side of another man’s neck.

It all swirled together.

Izuku was trying to fight off the ambush despite the paralyzer pumping in his veins. He landed a handful of successful pressure point punches aimed precisely at their cores. The bodies fell. But then they got back up—like they were being puppeteered by forces unseen.

Izuku's killer instinct sharpened as he landed one sickening kick to the jaw of one of the men. The man toppled straight down on the flat on his back and blood sprayed across the windows.

Then a loud, metal slam echoed through the cart. Izuku glanced back for a split second.

There he found Katsuki, back against the wall, fighting off the two remaining men on him.

Katsuki was holding the barrel of one of his enemy's guns, using all his strength to keep it pointed away from him. He kept it aimed in the air all while trying to avoid being slashed by the other man. The three men were caught in an intense three way dance of ducking, dodging, and trying to land a deadly blow.

Izuku's heart began to race higher. His adrenaline pushed against the exhaustion and tranquilizer that was coursing through his blood. Izuku's nostrils flared as he forced himself into overdrive. He picked up his speed. He worked like liquid lightning as he began his best to maneuver being captured by the men. He grabbed for his blade that was tucked into his waistband. Then he spun wide, slicing two of the men.

One man held his neck as his artery was cut. The other dodged and left with a shallow wound. Izuku pushed forward on the three men with a vicious barrage of knife attacks, backing them into the corner. He was gaining speed—until he wasn't.

Sharp, sudden pain shot through Izuku from his puncture wound.

He stumbled. His capturers saw the opening like sharks. They pushed in and took the advantage. Izuku tried to go on the defensive—but another blinding shot of pain hammered into his leg.

Izuku yelled as his muscles cramped on themselves. The tranquilizer in his leg was working its way through his body swiftly now—his resistance to the substance had been slowing it down. However, it wasn't slowing it down enough any more.

He tried to run. He turned, and headed straight for his husband for help.

But he cursed loudly when he reached Katsuki and found himself eating the carpeted floor of the train. His leg now felt like cement. Unmoving. Then came another sharp, unkind jab that pierced his other leg. The liquid burned so intensely that it ripped a scream from his lips that caused the whole cart to reverberate.

Katsuki snapped his head towards him and it was a mistake.

The small opening was enough for one burly man to put Katsuki in a drop dead headlock. Katsuki choked. He sunk his nails into the man's arm—piercing the skin until it drew blood. He tried to throw the man off of him. But every time he attempted the man leaned back, restraining Katsuki in a bind.

Izuku used all his strength to try to stand up, but failed when two men grabbed him by both of his arms. They twisted his appendages unnaturally and forced Izuku to drop his weapon.

They had him locked in a bruising hold, restraining him fully with all their body weight. They hoisted him roughly off the ground and held him up in the air.

Izuku struggled against them. He tried to get to Katsuki. But as the paralyzer took root in his body, both of his legs stopped responding to him.

They were as good as dead weight.

Izuku continued to fight against the men, eyes wide with fear as he looked at Katsuki in front of him.

Katsuki's eyes were wild like a feral beast. His nose was flared and his teeth were barred. He tried to shake the man off of him with several punches but when another man walked up and landed a catastrophic gut punch to Katsuki's center, it cut him down.

Blood spilled from Katsuki's lips and he began to violently cough.

Slowly, in the midst of the chaos, the elderly man stood up. The hunch in his back completely disappeared, and he unsheathed his cane to reveal a thin, golden sword that was inside. He straightened out his shirt and his once harmless aura evaporated into the air.

He glared at Katsuki like he was an insect.

"Chisaki sends his regards," the elderly man said. "Enjoy your last night on this earth, Bakugou Katsuki. In the next lifetime, know it's impossible to ever get the upper hand on the Yakuza Heir."

He snapped his fingers and the two lovers were dragged in opposite directions.

Izuku began to kick. Scream. Scratch and bite the best he could as his whole lower half betrayed him. Tears blurred his vision as he watched Katsuki struggle with all his might against the men who piled on him like flies. They forcefully took him and Izuku's heart began to break. It broke down and down until it was in a thousand shards shredding him apart from the inside.

"Kacchan!" Izuku screamed.

In a violent twist, Izuku tore one of his arms free. He reached out for Katsuki.

Katsuki's eyes widened, and his pupils constricted.

Izuku screamed as his arm was lurched backwards into a binding hold. The two men dragged him away towards the back of the train. The automatic door opened and they hauled Izuku out of the cart. As the doors slid shut, Izuku could see Katsuki be lugged away into the opposite cart.

Izuku floundered more, and his heart pumped adrenaline through him. He could feel his body reach down into the pits of his stomach and unlock his overdrive—but in an instant he was hit again with another syringe. This time, it was in the neck.

Izuku's body seized up as his world began to fade to black.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku went in and out.

He was here. Then he wasn't.

The toxin in his body was fighting his immune system. He had been overloaded past what a normal dosage would be and it left him feeling queasy. His memory began to form in patches that rotated between understanding what was happening and blank spaces.

He registered when he was dragged through the train. There was no one else on the carts. Then he went into blackness again.

He registered being unceremoniously tossed on the ground in the baggage cart. Then more blackness. Then he registered the two large men above him, leering. They pulled out their phones and began to make calls.

Then once more, Izuku fell to the shadows for an extended period.

When Izuku came to again, his body was on fire and he was severely disoriented. The world faded in from black and dizziness hit the pits of his stomach. Nausea rocked its way up through his stomach to his nose as his head pulsated a deadly tempo.

Izuku tried to scream but his mouth was sloppily duct taped.

Next, Izuku tried to move but was restricted.

He frantically began squirming and found painful zip ties cutting into his wrists. He hissed as he tried to move his arms but it was fruitless. He was bound by rope that was securely laced around his chest, arms, thighs, legs, and ankles.

His shaky vision scanned everywhere in the room. The baggage cart was small, red, and it wasn't meant for sitting. The door on this cart was a large metal door that was clearly designed to keep people out—or in this case, keep someone in.

Izuku continued to scan the room until he found two goons standing above him. They were ruffled up, nursing broken noses and deep cuts on their arms. One guy was tall with crimson hair and the other had eyes as striking as the sea.

Both of them homed their lethal gazes on Izuku.

"Ah. The prize is awake," the redhead goon spoke.

The other with ice blue eyes scoffed. With a confused stare he asked, "How is that possible? It hasn't even been thirty minutes and we gave him triple the dosage of that shit. He should be out for the next several days."

“It’s because he’s a viper. You know those fuckers eat poison for breakfast. His body probably metabolizes toxins quicker than a goddamn machine.” The man then leaned down into Izuku’s face and sneered. In a frustrated voice he asked, “You’ve caused a lot of trouble. Do you know that, sweetheart?”

Izuku didn’t respond. He viciously glared at his kidnapper, holding back tears as his mind couldn’t stop worrying about Katsuki. Where was Katsuki—

“Honestly, after looking at him up close—I get it,” the blue eyed man said. He leaned back against the wall and let his eyes roam over Izuku. “If I was Chisaki, I would launch one thousand ships for that face too.”

“Yeah, he’s a looker. But it’s unfortunate he stirred up this much chaos. Everyone’s damn vacation time got canceled.”

“It’s whatever now. After we dispose of that blond, all of this will be over.”

Izuku froze.

The blue eyed man sinisterly smirked and chuckled, “Ah, that seemed to get a reaction out of him.”

“Yeah, sorry about that, sweetheart. Your little runaway lover is being cut up in tiny pieces as we speak.”

The two men laughed and Izuku’s heart plummeted through the center of the earth.

No.

No. No. No.

He shook his head to try to jostle himself out of this nightmare. But it wasn’t working. He stayed tied up, forced to listen to the maniacal laughter of the two thugs in front of him.

The heavy metal door slid open slowly.

The sound of hefty machinery scraped the sound waves in the room as the elderly man from earlier walked in. He no longer had his cane and Izuku felt fury stir within him. The two goons straightened out, making it clear of the hierarchy that was between this unit of killers.

“They’re finishing the job,” the elderly man spoke. His voice was deep and leveled. “After they come back, we should be good to go. One of you, inform The Horned Viper and let him know we caught his brother. We’ll meet him at the next train stop in Bihoro.”

One of the men began to dial someone on a flip phone. The other leaned against the wall. Then finally the elderly man pressed close on the sliding door.

Izuku screwed his eyes shut.

This can’t—this can’t happen. Katsuki can’t be—

But before the door could shut, a veiny hand covered in blood shot out and caught it.

The red stained fingers dug into the steel and forced the sliding door back the way it came. The mechanics snapped from the sheer strength of the hand as it was forced against its mechanism. In the dark room, Izuku could see the glint of the green gem on the ring finger.

“Wh-What the hell?!” One of the men yelled and reached for his gun.

The door snapped open violently, breaking in the process.

It happened quicker than anyone could see. A blur of black and blond hair rushed into the room.

Katsuki slammed his body into the biggest goon and immediately disarmed him of his gun. The two other thugs in the room tried to shoot him. They fired off several bullets—and failed when Katsuki twisted the larger body in front of him as a shield. The man was pumped with lead and his eyes rolled back. Katsuki held the body up as he used it to cover himself.

A savage snarl took over his face as his scarlet red eyes glowed in the moonlight.

He took the gun and shot the second goon square in the forehead.

The body dropped and the elderly Yakuza man tried to run. But Katsuki grabbed him ferociously. With all his strength, Katsuki tossed the man hard into the wall, shaking the cart. Katsuki then threw a staggering punch directly to the man’s face. His knuckles cut across the man’s teeth and blood sprayed onto the walls.

The older gangster tried to pull out his gun but Katsuki broke his wrist. He snapped it back unnaturally in the blink of an eye. The weapon dropped to the ground with a heavy thud and Katsuki pinned the man to the wall.

Katsuki brandished his blade.

“N-No,” the man whispered and began struggling more. “Get your filthy hands off of me! I’m a high ranking Yakuza! You’ll regret this! Chisaki will make sure you die a slow and painful death for this—”

Katsuki leaned in cruelly and his eyes swarmed with shadows. He placed his blade on the man’s bobbing throat and pushed.

“Chisaki will never get the upper hand on me because I have the one thing he doesn’t,” Katsuki hissed. His voice dragged in the same way his knife did across the man’s throat. “I have killer instincts.”

Blood poured down the man’s neck and he began gasping for life. The body floundered before it dropped. Katsuki stepped back and allowed it to hit the ground with the other two bodies in the enclosed space.

Silence enveloped the cart.

The aura spilling off Katsuki chilled Izuku down to the bones.

His head was dropped down, and blood was caked into his blond hair. The red liquid dripped like rain from his head and down his coat to his leather boots. It was everywhere. When he lifted his gaze, the shadow over his face darkened his features to be as terrifying as the beast inside of him.

Scarlet eyes cut over to Izuku.

Izuku's heart skipped a terrible beat.

Wordlessly, Katsuki urgently bent down. He reached for the duck tape and gently peeled it off. He chucked it to the side and began to work quickly. He turned Izuku on his belly and began to cut him free from the rope with his bloody blade.

Izuku exhaled a long, shaky breath as he felt himself set free.

"Are you okay?" Katsuki asked as his eyes darted all over Izuku's body. "Did they hurt you?"

"No, I'm okay," Izuku replied.

Katsuki gave one short, curt nod back before he helped Izuku to his feet. Izuku wobbled, and his legs protested against him as he rose. He groaned when he could feel the burning numbness in his legs. The toxin wasn't dispelling as quickly as it used to.

Katsuki immediately picked up on this and hoisted Izuku up. He slung Izuku's arm over his shoulders and gripped him by the waist for support. He helped Izuku to the door and the two of them limped out of the baggage cart with haste.

When they came into the light of the passenger carts, the two husbands felt the pressure of time against their necks. Urgency to get the hell off this train had officially been applied. They first went for their backpacks—and along the way a trail of dead bodies were splayed across the floor. There was blood staining the carpet, and Izuku tried his best not to trip as he stepped over every cold corpse. One. Two. Four. Seven.

Katsuki had cut down every single person who stood in his way.

They grabbed their backpacks hastily and secured them to their bodies. Not bothering with their masks or hats, they made a run for it back to the end of the train.

When they made it back to the baggage cart, Katsuki flung open the emergency door and a harsh gust of wind tore into them. Izuku used his arm to shield his eyes and Katsuki grabbed him by the waist to steady their balance. Both husbands gripped the lips of the exit as they wearily looked out the train. The wind picked up as if it was screaming for them to run.

The train was moving at full speed. It rounded the corner of a small mountain, dipping low as it hugged the side. There was a breadth of room between the train and the sharp, hard rock of the mountain as the steel beast went down the decline. All Izuku could see zooming by them at high speeds were snow and pine trees.

They both looked at each other and the winds picked up.

“It’ll be like jumping into a soft cloud,” Katsuki tried to reassure. “The snow will break our fall.”

Izuku wearily replied back, “That’s a myth. It’s going to burn.”

The rhythmic clatter of the train’s wheels against the tracks was suddenly drowned by the deafening sound of heavy boots on steel. The baggage car door flew open with a violent crash, revealing the hulking figures of several more Yakuza. Izuku’s adrenaline spiked when he got a glimpse of their guns.

The Yakuza shouted and pointed towards them on the opposite end of the cart and began running towards them at full speed.

“Let’s go—” Katsuki hissed.

Izuku’s heart pounded in his ears.

The sound of Yakuza men shouting at them grew louder, closer. Katsuki squeezed Izuku’s hand one last time, and he tied their gazes together. At that moment, it was just them. The two of them against the world.

They jumped.

The cold air hit like a wall, biting into their skin as they fell, the world a blur of steel and snow, a violent whirlwind. For a heartbeat, time seemed to slow. Izuku’s stomach lurched as the ground rushed up to meet them, and then—

Snow.

At this speed, it seared into their skin and the feeling of ice against his cheek burned. They rolled chaotically and Izuku’s vision became a rotation of black sky and white snow. He went down the hill, gaining speed. He gritted his teeth as he continued to roll, mentally noting that Katsuki was partially correct. It was like landing in a half-soft cloud—the other half was like tiny blades of ice.

They tumbled down the incline. Then slowly, they rolled until they came to a soft stop. Izuku grunted when Katsuki’s body collided with his and his husband’s arms found their way around him protectively. Together, they skidded in the pile of soft powder.

They both looked up, breathless but alive.

Izuku laid there for a moment. Blistering pain was sounding alarm bells through his legs. The thick air mixed with the sound of Katsuki’s ragged breaths. Izuku closed his eyes when the world kept spinning.

Katsuki leaned up and hovered over him.

Soft, scarlet eyes studied him while snow decorated his husband’s blond hair.

“Are you okay?” Katsuki asked, his voice hoarse.

Izuku groaned but managed a small, exhausted nod. “Never better.”

They both stumbled to their feet and Katsuki pulled Izuku upright with ease. Izuku wobbled and leaned in fully to Katsuki when his legs began to shake. His husband caught his weight and the two of them looked up to the train.

It was barreling away from them at high speeds into the night. The rickety sound of the track cranked on and the steel beast left a thick cloud of smog in its wake.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Wherever they were, it was on top of a mountain that was laced with thick pine trees. Izuku could smell the light scent tickle his nose. The winds up here were sharper, cutting through the poor excuse of a winter coat he had on. Katsuki was now visibly shivering in his leather motorcycle jacket as they trekked on. But his husband didn’t make any mention of the pain he was in as he gritted his teeth and pushed forward.

They kept moving, not bothering to stop and clean any blood off of them. They needed to be gone before Chisaki’s goons circled back.

“How many more people do you think they’ll send to try to find us?” Katsuki whispered.

“As many as they have to expend.”

Quietness sliced through them.

Katsuki readjusted his grip on Izuku’s middle section as another loud, angry blast of air hit them.

This far north, the temperature was much colder. It was no longer a light winter but a deep plunge into what felt like the arctic. The forest they were currently weaving through was eerily quiet. As they trudged through the thick snow, their boots crunched against the frozen earth. All the tall pines towered above them, and Izuku noted how their branches sagged, heavy with snow. The trees here casted long shadows under the pale light of the moon, making the canopy they were under seem like a dizzying maze.

Katsuki spoke again, but this time much quieter, “Your tolerance to poison is dropping.”

“Yeah,” Izuku agreed, feeling ashamed. “I haven’t been keeping up the dosing regime since the masquerade. My body is…slowing its metabolism of toxins.”

The ache in his legs felt like a forewarning.

This was now the longest he’s ever had taken to recover from a paralyzer since he was eleven. While it was far above the average for any other regular person, it concerned him. When Jin had sunk the paralyzer into his neck during their final fight, it had taken ten minutes to feel the effects go away. It was slower than his usual three minutes. But if what the Yakuza men on the train said was true, he was only now starting to feel better after an entire thirty minutes.

Izuku sucked in a breath.

Quietness fell on them again when the howling wind picked up. The chill in the air had settled deep into their bones, but neither of them slowed, and they kept their pace steady despite the exhaustion weighing them down.

Katsuki continued to lead the way, his strong silhouette moved with purpose as he held Izuku up. Soon, Izuku felt his legs return to some semblance of normal and he began to walk on his own. They still stayed huddled close together, bodies trying to fight against the cold.

Then they passed an overlook that was free of trees. There, in the distance was a tiny glimpse of their destination.

Katsuki pointed and sighed out heavily. “That’s it. There’s stupid fucking Mount Rausu.”

Izuku wanted to smile, but his face was hurting from the cold.

They began their hike down, holding hands. Katsuki led the way confidently, and Izuku followed closely behind. His husband’s larger frame shielded him from the cutting winds and Izuku tried to keep their joint hands heated. He breathed on their gloves, puffing in small clouds.

When they reached the bottom, the landscape stretched out before them. It was silent, vast, and untouched. It almost felt like a dream, a world far removed from the chaos they had narrowly escaped. The snow-covered ground gave way to a slight clearing.

As they got closer, their eyes caught a glint of something ahead—a familiar sight. Train tracks.

A crossroad symbol was on a rusted sign beside the tracks. The white paint faded down from the wear of time, making it barely visible against the snow.

In the distance, a cargo freight train rumbled by, its metal wheels screeched against the rails. The train was long and its silhouette cut through the dark, powerful and unyielding. The rhythmic clank of the train grew louder with every passing second. It was here Izuku quickly saw the train was on the tracks that were heading straight for Mount Rausu.

Izuku’s eyes flickered to Katsuki.

Katsuki flickered his eyes to Izuku right back.

They both looked as if they had the same idea.

In tandem, they both took off in a sprint.

This time, for the first time, Katsuki was ahead of him. Izuku pushed his body to keep up as he felt the last bit of paralyzer slip its way out of his legs. He leaned forward into every powerful step he took and defied the wind that tried to blind him.

“I think we can catch it!” Katsuki shouted over his shoulder, his voice full of determination.

Without a second thought, Izuku pushed forward, his legs burning with each step as he followed Katsuki. The train was moving at a swift rate, but Katsuki was already gaining ground. Izuku’s breath came in quick bursts, his body protesting the speed as they closed in on the cargo train.

Ahead of him, Katsuki reached the tracks first. He didn’t hesitate. With a powerful leap, he grabbed the metal ladder attached to the side of one of the freight cars. His arms flexed, muscles rippling under his motorcycle jacket as he hauled himself up with the ease of someone who had done this a hundred times before.

Izuku’s heart raced high—not solely from the exertion of the run, but from the sight of Katsuki effortlessly pulling himself onto the train, his body strong, sure, and confident.

“Come on!” Katsuki yelled down, his voice full of encouragement, but Izuku felt his chest tighten.

He was still too far away.

Izuku pushed. His legs pumped as hard as they could, but the snow was thick and the ground was uneven. He jumped over several old, rusted metal tracks that nearly tripped him as the sting of the toxin weighed him down. His body ached, his muscles protested, but there was no time to think of that. Not with Katsuki above him, waiting.

The train was moving faster now, but the distance between them was shrinking with every second. However, it was still a leap too far. Izuku’s heart raced with the thought of losing Katsuki, of being left behind, of not being able to keep up.

Right when doubt began to creep into his thoughts, he saw Katsuki’s outstretched hand.

“Izuku!” Katsuki shouted, his voice desperate.

And then he did it.

With a burst of energy, Izuku closed the distance. He launched himself toward the train with everything he had. The cold wind sliced against his skin. The gap between them felt impossible, but in the moment before the world blended around him, he felt Katsuki’s grip on his arm.

Katsuki hoisted him up with a loud guttural yell using all his strength. For a moment, Izuku was weightless, his feet dangled below him. Then Katsuki’s arms were around him, pulling him the rest of the way up onto the train’s metal platform.

They both collapsed onto the cold steel, breathing heavily, their chests rising and falling in unison. Katsuki’s fingers clutched at Izuku’s jacket, as if afraid he might slip away.

“Don’t scare me like that again,” Katsuki chastised.

His hand cupped Izuku's cheek, brushing the cold from his skin with a gentleness that made Izuku's heart flutter.

Izuku nodded, his breath still shaky as he gazed into Katsuki's eyes. "Sorry."

Katsuki smiled then, his eyes softening all the way. The gentle look contrasted the blood of others that was stuck to his skin. He leaned in, brushing his lips lightly against Izuku's forehead.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The train's wheels screeched to a halt, and the sound sliced through the fog of sleep that clung to their bodies. Izuku blinked into the darkness, disoriented for a moment before he realized where they were. The steady rumble of the train had come to an abrupt end, and the quiet that followed was thick with the kind of stillness that only the dead of night could bring.

Izuku sat up, rubbing his eyes as he took in their surroundings. The cold was sharper now and the night air bit into his skin like it had teeth. He could see nothing but the faint outline of trees against the star-streaked sky.

Katsuki then woke up. The bags under his eyes were darker now and the pain from the recent assault was apparent in the way he winced when he moved. He sat up with a loud groan and nursed his stomach that was likely bruised from the gut punch he received.

"I say this in the most un-ironic way, but I feel like I got run over by a fucking freight train," Katsuki grumbled as he rubbed the back of his neck.

Izuku sheepishly smiled at him, appreciating the touch of humor.

Without another word, they hopped down from the freight car, their boots landing softly in the snow that covered the ground. The night was eerily quiet. No sounds of pursuit. No vehicles rumbling in the distance. They were alone in some train track cross roads with only the moon above to witness them.

The Yakuza should've been far gone now. But that only made Izuku want to put more distance between them.

"Let me get some of this blood off me before we go," Katsuki announced.

He reached down and grabbed a lump of snow and slowly threaded it through his hair. He shivered as he did this. The tremor passed from his shoulders to his ankles as he rinsed his hair of the dried blood. The snow fell to the ground, absorbing the old liquid and transforming into a dark red shade. Izuku followed suit, trying his best to wipe off any blood that may bring alarm or attention to them.

They cleaned off the best they could before they decided it was time to get a move on.

Izuku's arms were screaming at him to take a longer breather. But there was no time to linger. They had a long voyage ahead of them, and they were now officially so close. He could see strong, silent Mount Rausu in the distance. It stood much closer now as a beacon of hope in the dark winter.

They began their long journey into the night.

Katsuki pulled the collar of his leather jacket tight around his neck. The cold was clearly gnawing at him, but it was nothing compared to what they had already been through. Nothing stacked up to the fear of being caught by Tomura and Chisaki.

For the first few hours, they didn't speak much.

Their breaths came in puffs of white mist as they focused on each step. Izuku's legs burned with the effort, but he stayed fueled by the fire in his chest to get to freedom. The thought of making it to Nana with Katsuki was like coal for his own engine that kept him moving along steadily.

They passed through towering pines, the trees looked like silent guardians in the night. The singular sounds were the crunch of their feet in the snow and the occasional rustling of branches above as a cold wind swept through the forest-like area. Izuku tried to focus on the rhythm of his breathing, blocking out the nagging ache in his muscles, the exhaustion threatening to overtake him.

Hours passed in the dead of night.

The stars above flickered coldly, a backdrop to their slow and steady progress.

As the first hints of dawn began to bleed across the horizon, they reached what looked to be a small town. Tiny buildings were haloed against the backdrop of the painted sky with streaks of pale pink and lavender.

Katsuki exhaled loudly at the sight of the sign that read 'Welcome to Shari, Japan!'

Hope swelled inside of him. He grasped Katsuki's hand out of pure joy. Katsuki grasped it right back.

They kept moving, heading straight for the direction that pointed them towards Mount Rausu. With every step Katsuki took there beside him, it felt like they were moving toward something bigger than simply survival.

When they reached the base of the mountain, what felt like eighteen hours had passed. It was night again, and Izuku's internal clock was starting to get turned around. He was mildly lightheaded. They had kept walking without stopping out of sheer fear that the Yakuza were roaming every city in the vicinity to try and trap them.

They came to the opening of the hiking trail and paused.

This was the final ascent. Izuku's heart pounded as he glanced up at the towering peak before them. The summit was still far away, and the climb would undoubtedly get more treacherous from here.

"Did he tell you where to meet on the mountain?" Izuku asked, voice a touch weak.

"No," Katsuki said. He sighed and shook his head. "He said that if I climb, he would be able to see me coming. So we just need to try to get to the top and I'm sure he'll come and find us. He's on the lookout."

Hope dared to spark in Izuku's chest.

They started walking, their boots crunching through the fresh snow. The trail was faint, marked only by the occasional sign of wildlife—prints in the snow or a snapped branch. The mountain air grew thinner the higher they went, but they pressed on, side by side. The climb was steady but unforgiving, the cold ate at them as they wound their way through another dense forest.

Izuku looked up at the mountain, and his breath caught in his throat. The peak loomed ahead, jagged and imposing. But there was something else too. The promise of safety, the knowledge that they were so close to freedom, fueled his every step to the point he caught a second wind. Or was it a third wind? He wasn't sure. But he could feel that Katsuki felt it too.

They pulled down deep inside of them as they began the final leg of the journey, climbing the mountain in silence.

The further up they went, the steeper the path grew. The snow began to deepen, making every step harder to take. But still, they didn't stop. It was hard. It was exhausting. And when they reached the halfway point, the wind howled like a wolf in their faces.

Izuku dared to look over behind him and he saw the most beautiful sight of the ocean. It was shimmering under the pale moonlight and the crescent moon above stood in the sky shyly behind several clouds. With the mountain beneath their feet and the stars decorating the sky above them, Izuku and Katsuki finally allowed themselves a moment to pause.

They looked at each other with the same, silent understanding.

"I never told you where we had to meet Nana," Izuku said.

"Huh. You're right," Katsuki replied. "Where do we have to meet her?"

"The sunny place," Izuku said simply.

Katsuki's eyebrows knitted together in confusion. Then like a bolt of electricity, realization struck across his face and his eyes widened in disbelief. The reference to their failed childhood getaway worked like an arrow piercing through both of their hearts.

"You're joking," Katsuki said.

Izuku grinned until his cheeks hurt. “I’m not. It’s…It’s fitting isn’t it?”

Katsuki stayed suspended in silence. He blinked rapidly, drinking in the sight of Izuku as if he was too good to be true.

“It is,” Katsuki whispered.

They continued on, hand in hand this time. It was here that the final stretch of their hike felt like a dream. The cold air, thin and biting, was nothing compared to the exhilaration of knowing where they were heading. Together.

Maybe it was truly their fate to always end up running away to Okinawa together.

The moon now had fully risen, casting long shadows on the snow-covered ground as they crested the last hill that led to the safe house. The mountain landscape around them stretched wide and serene. The vast silence was intermittently broken by the occasional crunch of snow underfoot.

Suddenly, Izuku felt a laugh bubble up in his chest. It was a laugh as light as air, one that he hadn’t allowed himself to release for what felt like forever.

The tension, the fear, the days of running—it was all nearly behind them now. The thought of the safe house was enough to make everything feel gentler. Izuku turned to Katsuki and felt himself overcome with a new air of joy.

“What are you smiling at, nerd?”

Izuku stopped in his tracks and looked around at the beautiful scenery. He then looked down at the snow and curiously tilted his head when a crazy idea pulled to him. He turned his mischievous eyes on to Katsuki and tilted his head.

“You know, I’ve never had a snowball fight before,” Izuku said slowly.

He bent down and began to gather some snow in his hands. Katsuki frowned at the action and shook his head. He took several steps back and put his hand up.

“Absolutely fucking not—”

Before he could finish those words Izuku launched a snowball directly in his face. It collided with the grumpy expression and slid down, leaving behind a wet trail in its wake.

Katsuki slowly lifted up his hands to wipe his face clean in dead silence.

At the fear that he had made a mistake, Izuku nervously awaited his husband’s reaction. And to his delight, when Katsuki pulled his hands back, a wickedly mischievous smirk was spread across his lips.

“Oh, it’s on,” Katsuki said, kicking right into his highly competitive side.

Izuku laughed and began making another snow ball. Katsuki scooped up his own handful of snow and flung it toward Izuku. It hit his shoulder with a satisfying squelch, and Izuku immediately retaliated, launching another snowball that exploded against the side of Katsuki's head.

Katsuki blinked in surprise and a flash of a smile tugged at his lips. He tried to launch another attack, but before he could react, Izuku tossed another snowball at him, hitting him squarely in the chest with a soft, powdery splat. Katsuki yelled out a loud exclamation, the cold shocking him for a moment. Then he laughed. Laughed like he hadn't in so long.

Izuku's heart sung hearing the melodic sound of happiness.

The two of them were both laughing now. Snow flew through the air in a flurry of white as they darted around behind trees on the trail. It felt similar to the past when they would have shoot outs, but now with much, much lower stakes.

They found themselves back in their usual pattern with Izuku running and Katsuki chasing.

Katsuki dodged another snowball and skidded across the ground to gather more snow. His arms flung up to launch a perfect shot at Izuku. It hit him directly in the chest, and Izuku stumbled back, pretending to be knocked off balance.

"Is that all you've got, Deku?" Katsuki taunted. A wicked sparkle danced in his eyes as he scooped up a handful of snow.

"It definitely isn't, slow poke!"

Before Katsuki could respond, Izuku had aimed and thrown it at him with a speed that took him by surprise. It hit him square in the face. Katsuki froze for a moment, blinking as snow trickled down his cheeks. He wiped his eyes with the back of his hand and grinned at Izuku.

"That's it!" Katsuki yelled. He charged forward with renewed energy.

Izuku squealed and ducked out of the way just in time. But Katsuki had already grabbed another handful of snow and had begun to chase after him. Izuku laughed loudly as he sprinted down the hiking trail.

When the path narrowed, Izuku took the lead.

He ran, dodging snowballs right and left. He looked back, stuck his tongue out and teased his husband. He rounded the corner of the mountain trail quickly and prepared to throw his snowball when Katsuki came around the edge. Izuku laughed loudly, cheeks hurting from giggling in the bitter cold—

—Then the sound of a shotgun cocking stopped him cold in his tracks.

Izuku's head snapped forward and the long barrel of a shotgun was placed directly at the center of his chest.

His heart skipped a beat and his laughter died.

The man pointing the gun had one of the meanest glares Izuku had ever seen. His hair and eyes were as black as ink and he was wearing all black winter gear. He was snarling at Izuku with a loose cigarette hanging out his mouth.

Carefully, Izuku put his hands up to surrender.

The man took one step forward and Izuku took one step backwards. They did this three more times until Izuku came right back from where he came.

Katsuki jogged up, oblivious. He was still laughing with a snowball in his hand.

“C’mon, you know running from me never ends well—”

Katsuki choked on his words and dropped his snowball. The dark haired man’s razor sharp gaze skinned him alive.

“Bakugou. Why the hell did you bring a snake on my property?”

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below! I know it's been a minute :) I had needed a small break here this last leg because its going to be /a lot/ and I wanted to make sure I didn't accidentally rush the ending. But!! We're almost there at the end!! It's so bittersweet but the light at the end of the tunnel is thereeeee!!! I have the next chapter already written and the one after that is half way done :) so I'm going back to my every other week update schedule :))

Thank you so so much for reading and sticking around this long <3

Chapter 35: Tutti

Chapter Summary

Tutti — (Instrumentation Instructions) Everyone plays together.

Chapter Notes

Hello everyone!! Welcome back :)) thank you so much all the love and warm welcome backs on the last chapter!! Seriously, every one of you made me smile and I'm so happy there's still so many of you here reading after so long with this beast of a fic. LMAO. I hope you enjoy this one!!

Thank you to the LOML Luna for betaing :)

Warnings: Adult Scenes and Themes

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 35 — Tutti

.

.

.

It was rare that Izuku was ever caught off guard.

He could count on one hand the times he's had to surrender at point-blank range to a shotgun —and this was exactly the first.

Katsuki immediately ran forward. His eyes were panicked, and he tried to put himself between Izuku and the gun—but failed. The tall, unmoving man shoved Katsuki back with one arm like a protective father and kept the barrel directly aimed for Izuku's heart.

Katsuki cursed and frantically shook his head.

"Aizawa, hold on a moment. Put the gun down—"

The man did not. He snapped the shotgun upwards to catch under Izuku's chin and pushed up. Both Izuku and Katsuki's breaths hitched high. Izuku held his position, locked in a stare down with Aizawa's cold, hate-filled eyes.

"Bakugou, you better explain what the hell is going on right now or I'm putting a hole through this serpent's throat."

Katsuki grabbed the barrel. "Put the gun down first—"

"—No."

Izuku choked as the end of the barrel jabbed into his Adam's apple.

"He's running from the Yakuza too!" Katsuki blurted out in one breath. Clouds of white from his mouth spilled into the air as he continued to quickly say his explanation. "Chisaki is trying to get his hands on him because we fucked up—we both severely fucked up. And he needs protection as much as I do. If they get to him, he's as good as fucking dead."

Aizawa's glare only intensified. "And why should I give a damn?"

"Because he…" Katsuki trailed off. He looked between Izuku and Aizawa, struggling with his words.

Izuku knew to keep his mouth shut, but god he wished his husband was more articulate.

"He didn't choose to be a killer—he was trafficked," Katsuki finally settled on.

Silence fell over them just as the snow began to fall. It fell softly in the air, landing gently in all of their hair.

Aizawa cut his eyes to Katsuki.

He was shifting through the words like they were knives, weighing each one, turning them over in his mind. Izuku's pulse hammered in his throat. Then, Aizawa's resolve waivered. Izuku felt it. For a split second, the barrel eased up by a hair.

"You believe that?" Aizawa asked cynically.

"Yes," Katsuki exasperated with all his chest. "It's true. But it's a really long goddamn story. We can all talk about this calmly but I'm telling you he's not going to hurt anyone. I promise."

Aizawa scoffed.

"Are you really that stupid, Bakugou? He's playing on your heart strings. Snakes like him lie to gain the advantage. They have no goddamn honor."

"No, it's true!" Katsuki nearly shouted. "I know it for a fact—"

“—And I know for a fact he works for some elusive, lethal underground company where their agents are called Vipers. It’s the same company that killed my best friend over thirty years ago and this particular Viper killed Rin Hiryu.” Aizawa sliced his eyes back to Izuku. “If you think I’d forgive either of those transgressions, you don’t know me at all, Bakugou.”

Izuku could feel beads of sweat form on his forehead despite the cold.

Aizawa knew what Izuku was. He didn’t give a damn about how Izuku was crafted. And given how tightly the information about the Viper Academy was under lock and key, it didn’t surprise him that he only had half of the story.

“But he’s trying to leave!” Katsuki shouted. When Aizawa still didn’t budge, Katsuki began to grow desperate. He groaned, curses spilling into the air as he got closer to the older man. His eyes were wild as he pleaded. “Aizawa, please. He needs our help. He’s who I was talking about at my retirement party when I asked you about Nana and the black folder shit.”

Izuku had never seen Katsuki this way. His husband’s face was contorted with distress and very quickly, Katsuki began to spiral. He begged. He bargained. He looked a split second away from getting on his knees.

But Aizawa remained as unmoving as the mountain they were on.

“Even if all that were true, Bakugou, why are you extending your neck for him? Let him clean up his own goddamn mess.”

“…Because I love him.”

Aizawa whipped his head towards Katsuki.

His eyes widened in shock and the cigarette in his mouth dropped to the ground.

“And I’m also responsible for his mess.” Katsuki shakily exhaled and clasped his hands together like he was praying. “I haven’t been truthful about what’s been going on since Okinawa, Aizawa. There was a lot more to that assignment and I omitted more than half of it from my report. And he…was also with me while I was at the estate for those four months after. Then after that, I put us in a tight bind because I exploded—exactly like you said I would.”

At that, Aizawa stiffened.

His jaw tightened as he asked, “Exactly in what way did you explode?”

“Well. That massacre that was on the news in Tokyo.” Katsuki winced. “The one that was given the name ‘Scarlet Masquerade’…”

“That was you?” Aizawa growled angrily.

“Uh, yeah...” Katsuki scratched behind his head.

“Goddamnit, Bakugou—”

Aizawa cursed under his breath and instantly snatched the shotgun off Izuku.

He whirled around like he couldn't believe what he was hearing and pinched the bridge of his nose. Izuku watched as he closed his eyes and took in a deep inhale. Then Aizawa muttered under his breath a few times, too low for Izuku to really catch what he said. All he could hear was 'children' and 'the death of me'.

When Aizawa turned back around, he was red in the face like Katsuki worked his very last nerve.

"You're going to explain everything—in vivid goddamn detail—when we get inside," Aizawa lectured sternly. He pointed to Izuku with the gun again. "Tie him up. I'll decide after I hear whatever story you have if he's going to be executed here and now or not."

Katsuki was ready to protest.

However, Izuku turned around and obediently placed his hands behind his back.

He waited for Katsuki to do what he was told. His husband roughly exhaled and then shuffled through his bag. He took out red rope that was buried at the bottom and uncoiled it. Izuku didn't say a word as his husband tied his arms and wrists, double knotting, until Aizawa seemed to be satisfied.

"Sorry," Katsuki murmured in his ear as he tightened the last knot. "It'll be okay. He'll understand once we explain everything to him."

Izuku nodded, wordlessly. He tried to think of something to keep him calm, but he came up short. This whole situation was like walking across a bridge that had dynamite taped underneath, unknowing if it could explode at any moment.

Aizawa turned on his feet.

"Follow me," he grumbled.

Katsuki gently grabbed Izuku by his elbow and led him along. The wind pushed against their backs as they quietly followed Aizawa further up the mountain. As they traveled deeper into the jagged trail, it ended not too far off from where they had their standoff.

They were now trudging through nearly knee deep snow, until they came to a wall of tall, intimidating trees. The thick bases stood there like guardians, keeping dutifully strong and watching over the mountain. Their trunks were pushed together with no sliver of room to get by and their evergreen branches stretched towards the night sky.

One particular tree in the center was full of evergreen vines. Its bark was barely noticeable underneath all the tiny leaves that wrapped around it, dangling down.

To a passer by, it probably seemed like nothing. But to Izuku, it stood out a touch from the rest.

His gut instinct was confirmed when Aizawa stepped forward and pushed aside the vines. Underneath, a small wooden door was exposed. Aizawa opened it easily to reveal a tunnel through the mountain. They walked in, ducking underneath the vines as they entered the pitch black passageway. The cave here was narrow, and the winds blasted through at higher speeds. Izuku squinted as they headed straight for the light on the other side.

When they finally breached the exit, Izuku had to stop himself from gaping.

Nestled into the side of the mountain was a large fortress of a cabin. It was completely isolated, occupying the entire ledge that jutted from the rock.

Its timbers were dark with age and weathered by the breath of countless winters. Moss clung to the stone foundation like an old memory, and the roof was thick with a quilt of snow that glowed under the silver gaze of the night sky. In contrast, a soft golden light spilled from the windows. It flickered like candle light through frosted glass, making it appear as if the cabin itself had a heartbeat.

All around the cabin, the forest stood tall.

Birch trees, long and pale, were gathered like silent sentinels with their branches etched with ice and starlight. Izuku noted the wind moved gentler here, like a lullaby threading through their ears. He inhaled and the scent of cedar and firewood filled his lungs.

But the background was the most beautiful, breathtaking view Izuku had ever seen.

It was a perfect look across the country at such heights. He could see all the hills, the towns, and the ocean off to the side. The moon above shone down on the snow and the clouds hovered above, watching.

Aizawa turned to them.

“Welcome to winter paradise.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

The warmth of the cabin felt like a long awaited hug. Both him and Katsuki melted into it when the radiance of the fireplace filled their senses and graced their chilled bodies.

Aizawa led them out the doorway, and they entered into a large, spacious living room.

The first thing that caught Izuku’s eyes was the interior. The cabin had a high ceiling, and one entire side of the living room wall was a large window. It gave a perfect look out to the view across the country and on the other side was a balcony. The wooden walls were full of old photographs that had seen years, but held no dust. And all around were shelves carved from driftwood, gently curved into the walls. They were lined with leather-bound books and curious trinkets.

And in the middle of the living room sat a heavy wooden table. The surface was scarred and etched with wear from the years. It sat across from the roaring fireplace on top of a large fur rug.

But sitting around on the long couches in front of that table were five strangers.

Like clockwork, all eyes turned towards them.

There was a woman with pretty brown skin and platinum blonde hair. She was the first to react. She made a bewildered face and stared at him like some mythical creature that had sprouted wings and jumped off the page of a story book.

The next was a short blond that had a stripe of black in his hair shaped like an electric bolt. He spluttered a loud, “huh?!” when Izuku came into the light. After him, a guy with the same black hair and eyes as Aizawa tilted his head. His mouth dropped and he blinked like he was unsure if he was hallucinating.

Then finally, the last two strangers in the room cursed under their breaths.

Izuku instantly recognized those two. They were Katsuki’s blond and purple haired coworkers that he had the displeasure of meeting in Biei. The men exchanged knowing glances and the blond one in particular dropped his head. He exhaustedly muttered ‘I fucking knew it’ quietly.

“Um. What is this?” The woman with blonde hair asked slowly. She sat up right, frowned, and eyed Izuku. “I thought this was a fix-Katsuki’s-fuck-up-assignment? Isn’t this the guy who you issued a search and kill for? The one who killed Hiryu?”

“It is,” Aizawa grumbled. “I caught these two outside—having a snowball fight.”

Izuku and Katsuki grimaced when perplexed glares were tossed their way.

“Sero, get me a glass of whiskey,” Aizawa ordered.

The young man who shared his features jumped at the command. He looked at Izuku once, entirely taken back, and rushed into the kitchen. When he came back he handed Aizawa a glass cup that was filled to the brim.

Aizawa gulped it all down at once.

“You two, sit right there.” Aizawa pointed to the spot in front of the fireplace. “And don’t move a single inch.”

Izuku and Katsuki jumped to follow orders. They sat down on the plush, fur rug with their back to the fireplace. Izuku sat on his hunches while Katsuki went criss-cross.

Katsuki still hadn’t let go of his elbow, and his grip switched to protective. All the prying eyes were cautiously studying them. They scanned their bruises, cuts, and the flakes of dried blood that clung to them both. Given how everyone was gawking, they must’ve looked as if they traveled through hell and back.

Aizawa sat down in the middle of the couch between everyone. He raised an eyebrow when he could see Izuku cautiously eye all the people, a bit like a scared puppy.

“This is Miruko,” he pointed to the blonde woman on his left. “And this is Denki, my nephew Sero, and Shinsou.” His hand loosely gestured to the canary blond, the young man who shared his traits, and the stoic purple hair guy in the corner. “And finally, this is Monoma.” He flicked his wrist to the blond with blue eyes.

Then without a moment’s hesitation, he leveled his shotgun at Izuku. He locked eyes with Katsuki, glare burning.

“Start talking.”

Well.

This wasn’t quite the welcome Izuku anticipated, but truthfully, what was he expecting? A cup of hot cocoa awaiting him with a blanket? He should have known better that going to a rival company for help would be dicey.

Izuku let Katsuki take the reins after they exchanged a glance steeped in hesitation. Neither of them knew quite how to begin, but Katsuki cleared his throat and started from the origin of it all—Okinawa.

He spoke with a careful cadence, unraveling the story thread by thread. He described their initial meeting, the tense flicker of recognition that almost detonated the mission before it even started. Next, he spoke of their charade of a marriage, hastily fabricated and surprisingly convincing. Katsuki walked everyone through each day like he was navigating a minefield.

But Izuku noticed a subtle omission.

Katsuki completely skipped over the night they got obliterated on cheap alcohol and woke up accidentally married.

He glanced at his husband with subtle confusion, but said nothing.

Katsuki had his reasons, Izuku was sure.

Then the tale shifted, the stage changed—it was now Tokyo. Katsuki painted his year there in hues of grit and quiet devastation. He revealed how that one solemn year tangled their lives together, and stuck with him in dreams until this day.

“He took care of me every day for a year when my mother left me alone,” Katsuki confessed quietly. His head was down and his grip on Izuku’s arm tightened. “When we figured out that we were each other’s lost best friend…a change happened.”

It was then Izuku noticed it—the imperceptible thaw in Aizawa’s stern demeanor.

His scowl faltered. Dark eyes now assessed Izuku not with judgment, but with curiosity.

Katsuki continued on and gave a full, honest report on how they killed Peter Moore. At all the new details, Aizawa dropped his head and shook it.

Katsuki ignored this and pushed on, continuing to paint the picture of the bloodshed he and Izuku spilled that night. He easily segued into Izuku hurting his ankle in the woods, and needing to be taken care of. He fondly recalled how that led them to spending their time in Biei together for four months. He set the scene of those intimate days they shared—how they reconnected through small moments and laughter that felt genuine, almost sacred.

He confessed they were the best months of his life.

Then came the descent: Izuku needing to return to The Viper Academy, the red folder, and how it was revealed that Izuku was the assassin hired to kill his mother.

The mood in the room snapped taut. All gazes sharpened into spears aimed at Izuku.

With silent understanding, Izuku took over.

He tried to start at the beginning—his beginning. He spoke of his upbringing in Tokyo's shadows, where empathy was not taught but extracted. Under the cold weight of so many suspicious eyes, his instincts begged him to shut down, to slip into silence. But then Katsuki's hand came to rest on his shoulder. It was a grounding warmth that steadied his trembling breath.

Through all his tremors, he spoke of it. The training. The poisoning. How they were groomed to kill and feel nothing. When he detailed the basement and The Cull, he could see several of the strangers in front of him churn with sickness. A few in the room turned pale, nausea rising at the monstrous truth.

But worst of all, when Izuku described what happened with Hiryu, he could see pity spill into the air.

Then Izuku got to what he always knew to be the night of 'The Incident'.

It was painful, retelling it again.

His throat caught around the words like they were barbed wire. Guilt slithered through him, quiet and suffocating. His shame was a dusk-fallen shadow that grew longer and longer as he continued. It clung to him, whispering cruel reminders of everything he could never undo. Izuku couldn't stop the way he cried through it. He horribly remembered the way Mitsuki's body fell to the ground.

"That night is my biggest regret," Izuku rasped, tears clinging to his lashes. "I wish I never took the shot."

A long pause was taken here.

Izuku held his head down and let shame gnaw at him.

Katsuki was stiff and quiet.

No one spoke, as if they all took a moment of silence for the tragedy of it all.

Eventually, Izuku inhaled his grief and pushed forward. He brought up Tomura here, and truly went into detail about how terrifying he was. He painted the vision that Tomura is what a perfect Viper would be considered. He was cold, brilliant, and void of all emotions but bloodlust. His Big Brother was a true apex predator draped in the skin of a man.

When he told the room how Tomura beheaded their previous handler and rose to power, he saw fear dance across a couple faces.

Then came Chisaki.

Izuku talked about the man's growing obsession with him. Bile tickled the back of his throat as he spoke of the unsettling way his virginity had been bought like it was a rare emerald for Chisaki's collection. After that, the air shifted. Disgust, horror, and rage all coalesced in the eyes trained on him. He talked about how Tomura was desperately trying to melt the Vipers into the Yakuza in order to gain power—and Izuku was the bridge all his plans hinged on.

There was a pause before Izuku got to Okinawa.

Izuku hesitated, knowing Katsuki had left a major truth unsaid. So he too chose silence on the matter of their drunken marriage.

He gave his side of things for Okinawa and Biei, which pretty much mirrored Katsuki's. Then he explained how he found out he was Mitsuki's killer the night of Katsuki's retirement party. He could still feel Tomura's fury from that night, it wound around him like a noose and choked him.

Then Izuku explained how he had left a letter—not a red folder.

It was painful, how he had to recall the complicated relationship between him and his deceased sister, Himiko. Her motive for switching the two items was clear: she wanted Izuku dead, and she wanted Katsuki to do it. She wanted to make him hurt in the same way he had hurt her all those years ago.

Then he got to the night of the Masquerade.

Izuku glanced at Katsuki, and together they unraveled the chaos.

Their narratives clashed and danced, each from a different vantage. And in that dissonance, Himiko's genius became clear. She always had a way of being simple, wicked and utterly devastating.

It didn't go unnoticed to Izuku how Aizawa's temper rose again. But this time, it wasn't directed at him. He was glaring into Katsuki deeper and deeper with every new soul that Katsuki recounted collecting.

Then Izuku awkwardly put in the detail that five of those people were directly related to Chisaki Kai.

The reaction was immediate. Excruciating groans filled the room.

“Bakugou, you absolute dumbass,” Monoma hissed through clenched teeth.

Izuku didn’t argue. He then detailed exactly how incensed Chisaki had become.

He described the fury that rivaled a thousand wars and how the man was fit to slaughter everyone he saw. Hesitantly, Izuku vaguely recalled that Chisaki figured out Katsuki was the killer at the Masquerade. Then he fully demanded a life for a life from the Vipers to settle the blood score and threw Izuku into a cell until further notice.

Izuku had carefully skipped over the marriage certificate reveal to follow suit with Katsuki’s omission.

But he saw it. Some eyes in the room squinted, like they could feel a piece of the puzzle was missing.

Before questions could be fired, Izuku barreled ahead to talk about his own massacre that occurred that same night. He told everyone how his brother Tomura brutally chose the five children in their care to be executed.

Everyone was taken aback, but Izuku continued his story. He detailed his escape, cutting down as many Vipers as possible and taking the children and fleeing to Nana for safety.

Izuku then caught their story up with Katsuki tracking him down.

It was here that his husband stepped in again, a touch nervous.

He picked up the thread, telling everyone how they worked it out and eventually got on the same page. They were beginning to resolve the gaping, Mitsuki shaped hole between them but they really only had so much time. In their chaotic tale, dark shadows still churned behind them. The Vipers and Yakuza were now united, hunting them like wolves.

And now, here they were: on the run.

“Nana said she could help us disappear to a place that they can’t reach us,” Izuku explained with finality, his voice shaky. “If we could make it to her in Okinawa in five and a half weeks’ time, we’ll be safe.”

Everyone was staring at them with different expressions.

Aizawa was working his jaw in frustration, but sympathy was apparent in his eyes. Miruko was similar, but slightly more trusting. Sero gave a low, impressed whistle at all of the mess and Monoma’s lips were pressed into a thin line. He thoughtfully strummed his fingers on his thighs. Shinsou was still fully guarded. His eyes were like icicles, sharp and distrusting as he regarded Izuku.

Out of everyone, Izuku noted that Shinsou was the one of the group that was not moved at all by his story.

Everyone else had given slightly at something. Whether it was the trafficking, The Cull, Tomura, or even the arrangement with Chisaki. Everyone in front of him buckled slightly under the weight of the ugliness he had endured—except Shinsou.

Aizawa shifted tiredly and said, “This has got to be the second biggest mess I’ve ever heard in all my years.” He shook his head and his sunken eyes studied Izuku. “If what you’re saying is true, then you really were trafficked at a young age…weren’t you?”

Izuku nodded, feeling ashamed for some reason. “I was.”

“I see.” Aizawa rubbed his chin as he mulled over a thought.

“I have one question,” Denki suddenly interjected with his finger up. All eyes turned to him and he made a pained, conflicted face. “No offense but there’s a part that kind of doesn’t—make sense to me? Why would Chisaki demand blood from the Vipers for Katsuki’s massacre? And why would they throw you in a cage because of it?”

And there was the million dollar question.

Izuku could feel the moment approaching. It hung in the air like the scent of lightning before a storm. And when Katsuki exhaled like a man about to walk into a firing squad, Izuku knew.

He was going to say it.

“There’s actually, uh, one more, rather large, detail.” Katsuki turned his gaze slowly back to everyone. “I left it out because I didn’t want to distract from the more pressing parts, but… the reason Izuku got punished is because Chisaki found a very damning public record that ties us together.”

Katsuki cleared his throat.

“In Okinawa, we got married.”

His voice didn’t crack. Didn’t stutter. It was said as bluntly as if he’d just announced the weather. But it might as well have been like dropping a bomb.

“Married?!” Denki’s voice splintered like a guitar string breaking. “Like—legally?”

“No,” Katsuki snapped sarcastically, “Spiritually. Yes, idiot. Legally.”

The room broke out into chaos. A cacophony of exclamations, shouts and questions clashed together like an out of tune band trying to all play their own song.

Sero blinked rapidly. “Holy shit—”

“—I told you to kill him not fucking marry him, Bakugou,” Aizawa hissed, ready to shove his foot down Katsuki’s throat.

Miruko gasped a loud ‘oh my god’ and plopped backwards on the couch. Shinsou threw his hand over his face while Monoma turned away. It was obvious those two could no longer witness this train wreck. Aizawa then threw his head back as if this revelation added ten years to his life expectancy—in reverse.

“You married him?” Shinsou jeered, jabbing a finger in Izuku’s direction like he was a stain. “The guy you’ve been trying to kill for years? Why the hell would you do that?”

“Technically, it was accidental,” Izuku offered, sheepishly. “We were black out drunk.”

That didn’t help. In fact, it made it worse.

“So you’re telling me,” Miruko stammered slowly, “That two very well trained killers for hire, got wasted at some cheesy, gimmicky vacation spot and accidentally tied the knot? And you didn’t immediately find a way to get it nullified in the whole four months you spent together afterwards?”

“I never said we were perfect,” Katsuki muttered begrudgingly.

“So why not get divorced?” Miruko questioned.

“Isn’t it obvious?” Aizawa interjected. He pulled his head to the side and stared at the two husbands. “They don’t want to. It’s written across their faces—these two are lovesick.”

Everyone else grew quiet like that was impossible.

Now they were all surveying Izuku and Katsuki closely, like they were two books on a shelf with wide open pages for the world to see. Izuku could feel each and every gaze pluck him apart. They were searching his body language, trying to find out if this was some dubious trap to bring Katsuki down into the grave—but it wasn’t.

All there was to be found was the infinite love in Izuku’s heart for Katsuki.

“Holy shit,” Sero repeated again, much more taken aback. “Bakugou, you’re in love? How is that even possible?!”

Denki was equally perplexed. “You quite literally have shouted ‘fuck romance’ in public several times?”

“Not to mention berated couples who did PDA in front of him,” Monoma muttered.

Katsuki shrugged half heartedly. “Feelings change.”

“But he killed your mom, Bakugou,” Shinsou emphasized with disgust. “Surely you’re not going to simply glide over that.”

“We didn’t glide over it,” Katsuki bit back. He scowled defensively and bore his threatening glare into Shinsou. “Shit is more complicated than that and I’m not defending my goddamn life choices about him to you two again.”

Aizawa paused.

“Again?” He questioned. He turned to Monoma and Shinsou carefully. “What does he mean by again?”

Both Monoma and Shinsou grew quiet. They awkwardly shifted like kids being caught somewhere they weren’t supposed to be.

Aizawa’s eyes narrowed.

“Wait. You two knew,” he seethed and Miruko’s mouth dropped further in shock. “When I sent you up to Biei to drag this knuckle head back, you saw them there together, didn’t you? And you didn’t think to say a word about it?”

“Bakugou asked us not to,” Monoma defended. He threw his hands up and shook his head. “Like you said, they seem hopelessly in love or whatever. I felt bad and he practically groveled on the ground for us not to say a word.”

“More like he threatened us with a gun,” Shinsou muttered.

That wasn’t at all how Izuku remembered it, but sure.

Aizawa lifted up his finger, ready to give a scathing lecture. But then he caught himself mid-breath. He shook his head and gestured ‘absolutely not’ with his hands before turning his attention to the matter at hand.

He worked his jaw, clearly wavering between two thoughts as he glanced between the young lovers in front of him. Like a pendulum, his eyes swung back and forth between red and green.

He was still deciding what to do.

Desperation crawled its way out of Izuku’s throat when his grasp on hope began to slip.

“Please,” Izuku begged. He screwed his eyes shut and dropped his head low. “I know it’s wrong to ask for your help. It goes against everything in my being to do this, b-but I need your help—we need your help. Katsuki is the one they want dead and I don’t want him to be hurt. I couldn’t live with myself knowing that he’s in harm’s way because he got involved in my life. If you want something for your time, I can give you all the money I have on my person. I don’t have much, but I can give you everything I have if it means he’ll be safe.”

Izuku bowed low to the ground. He touched his forehead to the rug and pleaded with all he had.

“I know what type of life I’ve lived,” Izuku uttered mournfully. “I’ll never fully outrun it. Forced or not, I still killed hundreds, if not thousands. But if I have any chance to do something right—anything at all—I want it to be making it up to Katsuki. I want to keep Katsuki safe and watch out for him for as long as I live. I-I want to earn my life.”

Everyone grew quiet.

Silence swallowed them, and Izuku heard one person stand up from the couch.

He dared to look up. It was Miruko.

She was gazing down at him with mixed emotions. “For someone who killed their husband’s mother, you sure make it sound so poetic.”

“I only want to make sure Katsuki is taken care of,” Izuku confessed, voice breaking a little on the words. “That’s all I’ve ever wanted.”

The room was quiet again. But now it wasn’t sharp—it was thoughtful.

Miruko dusted her white pants slightly and he could see a conclusion settle on her face. She was the first of the group to break from formation and walked around the table. She crouched in front of Izuku, studying him like a soldier assessing a battlefield.

She looked into his eyes, and Izuku couldn’t help but notice they were kind.

“You’re scared, aren’t you?” She asked sadly.

“I’m always scared,” Izuku whispered. “But I’ve learned to push through it.”

That got her.

She stood, turning to Aizawa. “Well?”

Aizawa had watched the entire exchange in silence, jaw set. Finally, he stood up. He didn’t say a word, simply gave a single, stern glance towards Katsuki. He placed the gun down on the table with a loud clunk and walked behind Izuku. He pulled out a knife and squatted down. With jagged motions from his blade, he began to cut Izuku free from his restraints.

The ropes fell away, and both Izuku and Katsuki let out twin breaths in total relief. It took all Izuku had to not embrace Katsuki then and there. He was beyond relieved to have survived such an intense interrogation.

Aizawa walked in front of him and tilted his head. “So what’s your name?”

“My name is Izuku,” he whispered.

Aizawa sighed from the depths of his spirits.

ɯɯɯ

Aizawa dismissed them all with the laziest flick of his wrist, like even lifting his hand was a burden too heavy to bear.

But, without missing a beat, the colorful group followed his command. Their exit wasn’t dramatic. There were no complaints, no shouting or objecting. It was a quiet unraveling that communicated that everyone was still digesting what they heard.

On the way out, Miruko and Denki spared Izuku kind, pity filled smiles that held some semblance of understanding.

On the other hand, Monoma and Sero didn't look at him directly. They made eye contact with Katsuki, and shared intense looks of apprehension. Only Monoma tossed one, unsure backwards glance Izuku's way before leaving.

Then finally, the last person to leave was Shinsou.

There was something different about the way he viewed Izuku. The disgust was palpable. It dripped off him like rolling beads of rain from a window, each gathering into a large puddle of visible distrust. When Shinsou rolled his eyes, Izuku knew then there would likely be no changing this guy's mind about him. He viewed Izuku as the snake he was meant to be, and nothing more.

Everyone was swallowed up by the dimly lit halls one by one. When no one's footsteps could be heard, that left him, Katsuki and Aizawa.

Izuku couldn't tell what the older man was thinking. His dark gaze was picking them both apart as he mulled over some unknown thought. As he did this, the bags under his eyes could've been mistaken for actually carrying rocks with how large, and heavy they were.

"Follow me," Aizawa commanded. "I guess it's time to give you a tour around where you'll be staying—and neither of you touch shit in my house before you shower. You both stink."

Izuku and Katsuki exchanged soft, gentle smiles. Warmth spread from limb to limb as excitement took the wheel.

They did it. They finally made it to safety in one piece. It took everything Izuku had to contain his relief. They both stood up and took their backpacks in tow as the wind rattled the old cabin.

Quietly, the pair of husbands allowed Aizawa to take them up and down the house.

He showed them every room and Izuku was surprised at how alive it felt.

Door by door, the house unfolded like pages of a well loved storybook. Each chapter was a room that was steeped in its own hues and memories. The reading room welcomed them first. It was anchored by a vintage blue couch whose fabric had softened from the years of companionship. It slouched slightly in the middle, as though cradling the ghosts of the past who were still curled up with their books.

Then came the drawing room. It was robed in velvety purples that hugged the walls like dusk does before nightfall. The large armchairs were arranged in a circle, close enough to trade secrets or laughter over steaming mugs. To Izuku, it felt like a room made for confessions, where conversations could float easily in the space between flickering candlelight and the clink of ceramic.

Next came the sunroom and the balcony—each a love letter to time. Small nicks were in the wood, faded spots in the curtains, and the windowsill was etched with the quiet chaos of years lived fully. These weren't blemishes, but rather the fingerprints of life—proof that joy, mess, and memory had danced freely through these halls.

As Aizawa guided them back toward the living quarters, he paused at a modest door tucked into the back. Beyond it was another porch much like the front. However, this porch was more intimate. It slung to the side of the mountain like a secret.

On this side of the cabin, the air was crisper and it made Izuku curiously lean into the frosted window. Below, he saw a faint trail that dipped its way into the wilderness. It was covered in snow, but still showed signs of recent use.

Aizawa lightly tapped the glass and pointed.

"Do you see that line in the back?" He asked. "It's faint right now because it's dark, but squint the best you can."

Izuku got closer to the cold glass and did what Aizawa said. He was rewarded with the very subtle visual of a grey line cutting across the horizon. It sloped downwards, and was barely visible to the eye from this distance.

Katsuki tilted his head. "What is that?"

"That's an emergency path down the mountain," Aizawa informed them. "It's an abandoned ski lift and it'll drop you off at the outskirts of the town below. I repurposed it once I bought this land up here, and now it's basically my own personal fire escape."

Izuku nodded, approving of the smart getaway system.

"If anything happens…" Aizawa warned, slightly on edge. He turned and looked each of them carefully in the eye. "Make sure to take this and get out immediately. Don't be sitting ducks stuck up here."

Katsuki's expression hardened into a seriousness and so did Izuku's. They both took one more good look at the ski lift before following Aizawa back into the living quarters section. As they strolled down the hall, Izuku noted all the different bedrooms. Soft, yellow light spilled out from underneath some of the doors like little sun rays while others were fully dark.

Katsuki gave a low whistle, half in awe.

"Is this like, all yours?" he asked. He twirled a lazy finger in the air, as if gesturing to the entire mountain itself.

"Yes, Bakugou. It is all mine," Aizawa tiredly replied. He looked over his shoulder with an expression as dry as dust. "I use it when I want to be migraine free for a while. But as you can see…" He gestured vaguely toward the two of them. "It doesn't always work."

Katsuki clicked his tongue and rolled his eyes. “But what made you buy it all the way up here?”

“Simple. I hate people.”

Short and to the point. Izuku could respect it.

“You’re so damn dramatic, old man.”

They stopped at a door nestled snugly between the others, as if it had quietly claimed its place in the heart of the hallway.

Aizawa pushed it open with a gentle creak and revealed a room that felt like a quiet retreat.

A single queen-sized bed rested against the far wall, cradled in a warm wooden frame that looked like it had been carved from the trees in the forest. The blue comforter on top was slightly rumpled and at the center of the room there was a large, charming rug. It had threads woven together to make an artistic image of a small deer standing peacefully among a ring of wildflowers. It was such an unexpectedly tender touch that made the space feel alive, like a hidden glade in barren woods.

To add to it, next to the bed, two modest windows let in soft moon light while a sturdy desk sat under one of them. Then off in the corner, a washroom was tucked away so neatly it almost disappeared into the walls.

But what caught Izuku’s eye the most were the several piles of clothes, towels, and toiletries awaiting on top of the comforter.

“I admittedly only picked up a few clothes that were in Katsuki’s size,” Aizawa explained apologetically. “I wasn’t aware he was going to be bringing company. I’ll make sure to head down into town tomorrow and pick you up some fresh clothes that are your size, Izuku.”

Izuku bowed politely. “Thank you.”

“Don’t mention it.”

It was here that Izuku saw what he always heard in Katsuki’s stories. Aizawa’s nonchalant attitude was thick, but lying underneath was his sincere, genuine care for people. It was soft like delicate flowers and made Izuku feel protected.

“Now, go ahead and get a good night’s rest you two,” Aizawa murmured. “We’ll talk more in depth in the morning.”

ɯɯɯ

Showering felt like heaven poured straight from the pipes.

Izuku let out a low groan as his muscles finally began to unwind under the sweltering heat. He turned the pressure as high as the rickety shower would allow. The steaming water pounded against his sore limbs, scrubbing away days of sweat, dirt, and dried blood of the various Yakuza and Vipers. He dropped his head against the tile wall, letting the water run in rivulets down his back.

When he finally stepped out, the washroom billowed with a thick cloud of steam that followed him like a fog. He padded into the room slowly, toweling off, skin still flushed and pink from the heat.

Waiting for him, already tucked into bed, was Katsuki.

His husband was leaning against the wooden headboard, lids heavy and lashes low. But his mouth curled into that quiet, private smile he reserved for Izuku and Izuku alone.

Izuku smiled back, heart warm.

He threw on the oversized clothes Aizawa had left folded at the foot of the bed. The black shirt swallowed him whole, slipping right off one shoulder. Katsuki let out a low laugh. It was soft and unguarded. Izuku hadn't heard that particular laughter from Katsuki since Biei.

"You look like a damn ghost in that thing," Katsuki snickered.

Izuku huffed, trying to glare but failed miserably. "C'mon. It's not that big."

"It's swallowing you whole," Katsuki deadpanned. "If you vanish in the middle of the night, I'm checking the laundry pile first."

"Shut up," Izuku said half-heartedly, still laughing.

While still chuckling, he dove into bed beside his husband. The moment his body hit the mattress, it was like every vertebra in his spine finally gave up the fight. He sank deeper, bone by bone, exhaling a sigh that deflated his entire soul.

He rolled into Katsuki's warmth, wrapping himself in strong arms that pulled him in without hesitation. Their limbs tangled until they fit together like two halves of the same soul.

Izuku glanced at the wooden Grandfather clock in the corner. It was an impressive 03:02 a.m.

Katsuki lovingly rested his head on Izuku's. His lips caressed the damp curls at Izuku's temple. And then his thumb lazily stroked at Izuku's waist beneath the borrowed shirt.

"We're almost there," Katsuki whispered.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku could barely pry his eyes open.

His body felt like it had been filled with lead. Every limb was either heavy, aching, or worn down to the bone. His brain protested movement, as if even thinking about shifting was too much. A low groan rumbled from his throat as he rolled onto his side, muscles tensing automatically when a sharp throb pulsed from his still-healing stab, cut, and gunshot wounds.

Even with a half awake mind, Izuku could process the adrenaline that had carried him through the last stretch was long gone.

He weakly blinked his eyes open when he saw a bundle of blond hair.

His husband stood beside the bed, quiet and still. His back was illuminated in the soft light that was filtering through the curtained windows. He was dressed in a cozy black sweater and matching sweatpants.

Overall, Katsuki looked like he had been up for a while. His sharp eyes were watchful even in the quiet. A mug of coffee steamed in his hand, the scent grounding and rich in the air.

“Kacchan?” Izuku’s voice was scratchy, still wrapped in sleep. He tried to push himself up, but his body protested. Fresh pain shot through his side and down to his ankles. He winced. “Is it time to get up?”

Soft lips kissed his forehead.

“Don’t worry. Keep resting, Izuku.”

The words wrapped around him with the same care as Katsuki’s arms, even if he wasn’t being held yet. Izuku gave up the fight without another thought. He let his head drop back onto the pillow and a long breath spilled from his lungs.

“M’kay,” Izuku whispered quietly, eyes fluttering shut once more.

Katsuki crouched beside the bed. Calloused fingers threaded through Izuku’s curls, slow and gentle. Izuku leaned into the touch, breathing deep, letting himself be taken care of in the quiet peace.

ɯɯɯ

When Izuku woke up fully, it was somehow pitch black outside. At first, he assumed that he only slept a couple hours. But when he checked the GrandFather clock in the room, he was surprised to see it was 02:21 a.m—which meant an entire day had gone by.

He lurched forward in shock.

“Well. Good morning sleeping beauty,” Katsuki’s voice chimed in beside him, fully awake. “Or should I say good night? Not quite sure how that would work.”

Izuku whipped around to look at his husband, completely startled. Katsuki was shirtless, perched lazily upright against the headboard with a random book open in his hands. He gave Izuku a completely serene smile.

“W-Was I really out the whole day?” Izuku asked.

“Yeah, I had no clue you could knock out like that,” Katsuki replied. He closed the book he was reading and turned to Izuku. “I think you unlocked a whole new volume in your snoring —the whole damn cabin heard.”

Izuku groaned. He pushed the heels of his palms into his eyes and shook his head.

“This is so embarrassing. I-I’ve never slept that long before—everyone was probably waiting on me to wake up.”

“Hey. Don’t sweat it,” Katsuki comforted. He reached out a hand to caressed Izuku’s shoulder. “There’s a first time for everything and this is understandable. No one cared that you slept in.”

Izuku did his best to shove down his shame. “How long have you been awake, Kacchan?”

“I slept pretty long as well,” Katsuki confessed. “I got up sometime around the afternoon and then got back into bed later and slept my ass off too. But now I can’t get back to sleep. I decided to rummage through some of the old man’s books hoping they were boring enough to put me back to sleep, but surprisingly everything has been pretty intriguing. He’s got weirdly good taste.”

Izuku chuckled and looked down at the book in Katsuki’s hand.

It was titled, ‘Inferno’ and the author was Dan Brown. Izuku held back a small snicker. He never would have thought his husband would take a liking to Dan Brown.

“Are you going to go back to sleep?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki shook his head. “I don’t think so—or at least not for a while. I’m wide awake. I kind of want to keep reading this book.” He held it up and smiled innocently. “This shit is pretty good.”

“Ha, okay,” Izuku mused. He scooted against the headboard and allowed his body to relax. “You can keep reading. I won’t bother you.”

At that, Katsuki gave him a tender glance. Then he turned his attention back to the book.

A familiar silence fell upon them. It fell like the gentle snow outside, trickling in entirely unhurried. Izuku hugged his legs to his chest as he continued to look at the night sky.

The moon was shining brightly, offering pale light so beautiful it felt like it was made of silver. Izuku stared at the elegant creature in the sky. It felt closer up here at this altitude. Big, bright, and lovely.

Izuku turned. He looked at Katsuki and found himself doing what he loved best: admiring him.

He appreciated everything he could drink in. The soft way Katsuki’s hair fell against his angular face. The sharp edge of his eyes that was only rivaled by his blade. The shade of his skin that felt more ethereal under the moonlight.

Katsuki truly was beautiful—and it frightened Izuku how much he loved him.

“You need to stop staring at me like that,” Katsuki chastised without looking up from the book.

Izuku tilted his head. “Like what?”

“As if I’m going to disappear.”

“Sorry,” he whispered. “I’m still grasping that this is all real. I can’t help but feel like you might slip away.”

“Izuku. I’m not going anywhere, you got that?”

“I got it,” Izuku replied, just below a murmur.

But there wasn’t enough resolve in his words for Katsuki, he supposed. Because within the next second, his husband closed his book and turned towards him.

He inched close, and Izuku held his breath.

He searched Katsuki’s eyes, lost in the blaze of hypnotizing red that sucked him in.

They shared a quiet, private look. It was so intimate that Izuku felt as if Katsuki had slipped directly into his thoughts. Their breaths synced, quickening together. Then, slowly, their eyes dilated in unison as they leaned toward each other, drawn like magnets.

“I’ll only leave your side in death,” Katsuki whispered, voice like velvet and steel. “And even then, I’ll claw my way back to you.”

They closed the distance, instantly.

Heat soaked into Izuku’s body like earth drinking sunlight. His heart fluttered and his head was as light as a cloud. Soft tongues touched. Shy bites sunk into his lips. Then finally sharp teeth pulled at his bottom lip right before Katsuki slid inside with his tongue.

At first, the kiss had started off gentle. Soft and reassuring.

But when a chill raked down his arms, Izuku knew this was different—he could taste it. It was the silent communication of them nearing the finish line. Within their push and pull were a litany of promises for the future.

Like a spark catching fire, the kiss turned more passionate.

Not soft. Not hesitant. But as if it meant everything. Their bodies began to melt together and Katsuki stole all the air from Izuku’s lungs.

Izuku began to lose himself to everything he was feeling: the pressure of Katsuki’s mouth on his, the way his hands tilted his head just right, how his body pressed in, confident and steadfast. It was all stacking up to be something more than a kiss: it was a claim.

Katsuki leaned in, deepening the kiss with a firm push that sent Izuku gently tipping back. He didn't resist. Instead, he let himself sink into the soft pillow beneath him, arms winding around his husband to pull him closer, guiding Katsuki down on top of him.

When they slotted together, Katsuki groaned quietly in the back of his throat.

He pulled himself away from Izuku. In the dark, they both laid there, breathing heavy. Their eyes half lidded, and their lips glistening from the soft coating of saliva. Katsuki took a second to soak in the sight of him, and bit his lip.

"Do you want to?" Katsuki asked, voice so low it scraped the bottom of Izuku's core.

Izuku's toes curled at the thought.

"I do, but—" he cautiously looked at the closed door. "What if we accidentally wake someone up? I don't think I could handle the embarrassment if someone heard us."

"Don't worry," Katsuki reassured. He gently stroked Izuku's head, coaxing him into a blanket of security. "You just have to be real quiet. Can you do that for me?"

His tempting voice beckoned Izuku's arousal forward. They locked eyes, and Izuku knew he was damned then and there.

"I can do it for you, Kacchan."

"That's my darling," Katsuki grinned.

Katsuki got up from the bed and walked over to his backpack that was tucked away on the other side of the room. He dipped his hand in one pocket, and pulled out a small tube. The shape of it was very recognizable to Izuku at this point.

"When did you get lube?" Izuku questioned, slightly surprised.

"I picked it up at Midnight Sento," Katsuki replied smugly. "It's not the only thing I got in that sex shop in the basement either."

Izuku pressed his legs together, intrigued. "Wh-What else did you get?"

"I got you some more pretty panties," Katsuki teased with a mischievous undertone. He now dug in his bag and pulled out soft baby blue, delicate lace underwear. Heat burned at Izuku's cheeks at the garments, taken aback. "I had a feeling you were probably missing feeling pretty, weren't you? I know you hate wearing boxers."

Izuku blushed, but laughed. He should have known.

"Yeah, I haven't enjoyed it. But given the situation, I've adjusted."

"Well. No more adjusting to shit you don't like. I got you a couple pairs."

Katsuki kneeled on the bed, lace underwear in tow. He pushed the covers aside to reveal Izuku lying there. The oversized black shirt and boxers were loosely hanging from his frame. Under his husband's intense gaze, Izuku felt himself grow timid. The heat between them simmered as Katsuki took his time sliding off Izuku's boxers.

Izuku's half-erection twitched and the cold air tickled his skin.

Katsuki bit his lip as he began to slide on the baby blue garments. With tremendous care, he returned the decorative lace to Izuku's hips like it was always supposed to be there. Izuku drank in the softness of Katsuki's touch and the gentle feeling of normalcy the underwear provided him.

Once they were fully seated on his body, Katsuki kissed his hip bone.

"There we go." Katsuki smiled. "Absolutely goddamn perfect."

Without a moment's hesitation his husband reclaimed his spot between his legs. Warm, calloused hands massaged into his thighs and Izuku happily opened himself wider.

Their pelvises pressed together as Katsuki resumed kissing him deeply. They rocked softly, making sure not to make too much noise. It was a gentle rhythm that contrasted the last time they collided, full of brutal passion.

Izuku's stomach tightened when Katsuki's lips began to travel down. Kisses peppered along his jaw, his neck and then his sensitive collar bone. Sweetness and heat caramelized together, like every touch created a path of electricity on his skin the further and further Katsuki went.

Large, rough hands gripped his sides as Katsuki's head dipped low. Izuku watched, trying his best to keep his uneven breathing under control. Katsuki's mouth caught the hem of his shirt and peeled it up, revealing Izuku's stomach.

They made eye contact only once before Katsuki leaned down.

He placed the first kiss right above Izuku's navel. It was soft and deliberate. The touch ignited the molten feeling deep in Izuku's core. It spread, running down his legs and made his breath catch.

"I think I'd slit a thousand throats for you," Katsuki whispered against his skin, voice husky at the edges.

He planted another kiss next to his navel, this time sucking at the supple skin softly. He nipped and licked, tasting Izuku in a way that aligned with a form of worship. Tiny sparks raced down Izuku's spine. His husband's hands gripped his hips as he continued his motions. When Katsuki delicately swirled his tongue on the edges of Izuku's navel, a quiet, bashful whine spilled into the air.

He squirmed when his cock officially became fully hard. Another kiss followed, then another. Each open mouth kiss traveled across his torso in an agonizingly slow path.

Then finally Katsuki's mouth ghosted above the lace. Katsuki kissed his way down, dragging his teeth across the lace like it owed him something. Like he'd earned it. As if every inch of Izuku was meant for him.

Izuku's fists clenched the sheets.

"Katsuki…" he whispered huskily.

"I got you," Katsuki murmured, voice low and rough. His hands smoothed along the insides of Izuku's thighs, thumbs tracing lazy circles as he settled between them. "You just breathe."

Wet, slow kisses touched the tip of Izuku's cock through the lace. Izuku whined, trying to hold back. He wasn't used to not letting out his moans and the idea of them getting caught ignited something in his core. It filled him up as Katsuki pulled aside the underwear gently.

Within moments, Izuku gasped as his husband took him in his warm, awaiting mouth. His hips shuddered, and his hand instinctively threaded into blond hair.

Pleasure spilled into his core, soft and erotic as Katsuki sucked him gently. There was no rush as he bobbed his head, pulling out needy keens from Izuku's lush lips. He nuzzled in further, making Izuku curl his toes in ecstasy.

His hips jerked from intense sensitivity. Katsuki ramped up, sucking harder and breathing heavily through his nose. He reached a hand down to massage Izuku's sensitive sack. Izuku arched and his fingers tugged at delicate blond locks.

Katsuki suddenly began to devour him down like he was starving—like Izuku was decadent and not to be wasted.

His mouth was hot and unrelenting, tongue swirling with messy precision as he sucked him hard and full of fervor. Every movement dripped with hunger. He didn't slow up. He zeroed in on the tip with brutal focus, giving it a rough flick before dragging his tongue across the slit, tasting the slick proof of Izuku's need.

A guttural groan tore out of him as he took all of Izuku's cock in again, deeper this time, his throat flexing, his tongue lashing a firm, filthy lick that made Izuku's hips jerk.

"Fuck—Kacchan—" Izuku gasped. His eyes fluttered shut and his head tipped back against the pillow.

Katsuki hummed, sending vibrations like coals to rake across Izuku's nerves. The weight of Izuku's reactions fed him, and he began to move more fervidly. Izuku bucked. He gasped out as his husband poured pleasure into him. His heels dug into the mattress helplessly as Katsuki's hands began to hold him down. Izuku whined, trying to move and fuck up against the tension as his orgasm rose.

Katsuki's grasp on his hips tightened, sure to leave bruises in an effort to keep him grounded while he unraveled.

More suffocated moans caught in Izuku's throat.

He fisted blond hair tighter and tighter while his other hand scrabbled for purchase against the mattress. Desire, heat, and rapture multiplied tenfold as Katsuki began to suck on him rougher than before. Izuku bit his lip in a crazed attempt to keep from crying out and iron spilled into his mouth.

The cord snapped.

His orgasm hit like a wave breaking against his body—hot, fast, and all-consuming. He slapped a hand over his mouth as he cried out, breath ragged. He came hard, fully intense directly into Katsuki's warm mouth. The liquid spilled and he whined into his fingers as Katsuki drew back with a long powerful suck, milking him dry.

Izuku's hand trembled against his mouth as Katsuki swallowed all of his essence, eagerly. His husband looked devilish as he rose from between his legs and wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.

"You know," Katsuki quietly murmured, brushing damp curls from Izuku's forehead. "I've always loved how much you can cum in one night. It feels like I can fuckin' wring you dry and that's rare for a man. Did you know that?"

Izuku reached for him blindly, breathless. His hand found Katsuki's chest, fingers curling weakly in the heat of the skin.

"N-No," he whispered, lashes fluttering. "I thought that was normal."

"Not at all." Katsuki's laugh came low and deliberate, the kind that caressed skin without touching it. "You really don't know how much of a rare gem you are."

He leaned away briefly, grabbing the fresh bottle of lube from beside him. The cap clicked open with a soft pop, and Katsuki poured a generous amount into his palm. The room filled with the slick sound of his fingers working the lube.

He didn't look away as he moved to Izuku. Their gazes tethered and the tension in the room strung taut.

When Katsuki hooked a finger into the backside of the lace and peeled it aside, he let out a soft curse. Izuku's most sensitive place lay exposed beneath him, flushed and sitting alluringly between rosy cheeks. He paused for a second, to take in the sight. Then he settled between Izuku's trembling thighs, adoring and patient, like he had all the time in the world.

With aching tenderness, Katsuki carefully massaged Izuku's delicate entrance. He coaxed Izuku open like he was precious. The lube spread warm, gliding across sensitive skin. He pampered his husband slowly, taking his time to appreciate Izuku's willingness to always be with him.

Izuku's legs twitched at the contact. His thighs flexed and he raised his hips to give little needy rolls.

“There’s no rush,” Katsuki murmured, voice like honey as he leaned forward. He pressed a kiss to Izuku’s inner thigh. “We have a lifetime of this ahead of us.”

Then, he pressed in.

Both of them quietly hissed as the tip of his finger breached. Katsuki pushed in further, easing past the tight resistance with intensive care.

“Damn,” Katsuki groaned. He bit his lip as he sunk himself in at an excruciatingly slow pace. “You’re as tight as the first time all over again.”

He reeled his finger back and then slowly pushed it back in.

Ravenous need washed over Izuku. It caused him to tilt his head back with a quiet groan. The burn was faint but in a familiar way that always drove him crazy. Another finger slid in fully, and Katsuki paused, letting Izuku adjust. Katsuki watched his face, deeply in tune with the twitch of his brow and the part of his lips.

When Izuku relaxed around him, he moved again—stroking deep, slow, and steady. His two fingers curved upward with practiced ease, brushing against the soft, sensitive spot inside that made Izuku’s toes curl.

A loud whimper escaped Izuku’s throat. “Katsuki—”

“Shh, darling,” Katsuki whispered against his thigh. “Not too loud.”

He added a third finger, gentler this time. Izuku tensed, then melted as Katsuki massaged him open. A caring thumb swept soothing circles on his inner thigh. The stretch stung, but beneath the sting was intoxicating heat. It caused Izuku to claw at his belly, like he could tear it open and alleviate himself of the burning.

Katsuki continued to move with hypnotic rhythm. Expertly, his fingers scissored, stroked, and filled Izuku up. His lips brushed against Izuku’s knee, then lower to his thigh. His breath skated over the sensitive, freckled skin. He laid down a trail of kisses as his pace became quicker, fucking in and out with the squelch of the lube.

Izuku’s hips lifted, instinctive, desperate for more.

He pushed his hand into his core when he felt the heat inside of him stir high for a second time.

Katsuki smirked against his thigh. He mercilessly pressed down on that singular spot.

Izuku gasped, hands flying to fist the sheets. Katsuki sped up his movements, pressing deep, curling up until Izuku’s back arched from the bed in pure, wordless pleasure. He struck again and again and again until Izuku felt his sanity begin to drown underneath the ripples of pleasure. His legs began to quake and the smirk on his husband’s face spread wider.

“Does right here feel good?” Katsuki teased, knowing damn well it did.

“Don’t toy with me,” Izuku hissed, voice brimming with warning. “I’m already struggling to k-keep my voice down.”

He choked on his next words as several more desperate whines were pushed out of him.

“Sorry,” Katsuki whispered, voice dipping low and hungry. “You’re perfect like this. How could not play with you just a little bit?”

He leaned in and pressed soft, open-mouthed kisses to Izuku’s stomach, never breaking rhythm with his hand. The lube made every motion slick and precise. Katsuki knew exactly how to touch him, how to make him come undone with nothing but his fingers and the rough love in his voice.

Without breaking his movements, Katsuki removed his own boxers. He began to slick himself up, stroking himself as he listened to Izuku come undone. He quietly groaned into Izuku’s soft stomach as he doused his erection in a generous amount of lube, squeezing the tip.

Izuku felt himself unraveling. His thighs trembled and he bit into his knuckles when he felt a moan pushed out from another intoxicating massage of his sweet spot. His eyes screwed shut and his back arched off the bed. The pressure built fast and hot, the edge pulling him forward until—

Katsuki ripped his fingers out.

Izuku choked, breath catching in surprise. He was given no room to think before Katsuki drowned him with an overwhelming kiss.

His husband pressed his body firmly on top. And he didn’t let up—he acted as if he couldn’t control the need to be physically connected. Katsuki kissed him deeply, tongue sliding directly into his mouth sensually. It was rough, desperate, and dominating—like he needed Izuku to feel him all the way down to the bone.

His hand slid into Izuku’s curls, tugging just enough to make him shiver.

Izuku’s fingers dug into Katsuki’s shoulders, clinging like he’d fall apart otherwise.

The soft nudge of Katsuki’s thick tip caught at Izuku’s entrance. They broke the kiss, gasping softly as the pressure increased. Izuku whimpered, already biting his lip.

“I told you to keep it down, darling,” Katsuki whispered, low and firm, his voice heavy with possession. “You’ll wake the whole damn cabin.”

He nudged in the tip and Izuku roughly exhaled through his nose. When Izuku thought his mind couldn’t become more crazed, Katsuki began to push in—slow and steady. He felt every inch of Katsuki’s girth. It grew as he pushed in, spreading him open in a way that could only be described as home. The beautiful sting made Izuku wince, shuddering as his husband dove into him. Izuku’s nails bit into Katsuki’s skin and his legs wrapped around his waist.

When Katsuki bottomed out, both of them shakily moaned. Katsuki stilled for a moment, tasting the way he was hugged so deliciously. He then pulled back and eased forward again—slow, deliberate, deep.

Izuku's eyes fluttered shut, hands moving to clutch Katsuki's arms for support.

Every thrust was smooth and patient, paced to keep the bed from creaking. Every roll of his hips sent waves down Izuku's body from head to toe. They tried to keep their sounds from escaping past the room as they became lost in each other. Katsuki leaned down and sprayed soft kisses across Izuku's cheek, his temple, his parted lips—anywhere he could reach.

Izuku was trembling, doing his best to stay quiet, but a soft, broken noise slipped from his throat when Katsuki hit that perfect spot. He barely got it out before Katsuki was kissing him again, swallowing the sound whole.

"God, you're so fuckin' tight," Katsuki groaned softly against his lips. "You're killing me."

Katsuki moved with more urgency now. He thrusted in harder and dragged soft gasps and quakes from Izuku with every snap of his hips. His hands began to shake as he felt their bodies wrap into one.

Katsuki leaned back, his hips rolling faster with each thrust now. He set a relentless rhythm that sent sparks licking across Izuku's skin. Every movement pushed him closer to the edge, until it felt like he was unraveling beneath the weight of Katsuki. Of his love, of his touch, of his beautiful scarlet stare.

Izuku was full in every way now: body, heart, soul.

Katsuki was everywhere. On his skin. In his lungs. He was even gripping his hair with a steady hand that possessively tugged, letting Izuku know exactly who he was married to.

It was overwhelming.

Then suddenly, a flood of emotion crashed through him all at once. Izuku clung to Katsuki's gaze, those searing eyes locked on his like a lifeline, and it made the pleasure burn deeper into his core.

Then Katsuki thrust harder, perfectly angled and sharp with purpose. Izuku gasped. The soft cry was barely bitten down with his teeth.

Tears welled at the corners of Izuku's eyes from the intensity of it all.

"Are you okay?" Katsuki whispered quietly.

Izuku nodded, still gasping. "I—I just love you so much. I don't know what to do with it."

Katsuki's breath stuttered, catching sharp in his chest like the words physically struck him. His hips snapped forward with one deliberate thrust. He sank into Izuku until there was nothing left between them.

They both groaned in a low, raw octave.

“Shit,” Katsuki whispered. For a second, his grip loosened on Izuku’s hair. Then he leaned down until their mouths were a mere inch apart. “You don’t have to do anything with it. Give it to me—I’ll take it.”

Katsuki snapped his hips again and punched out a pretty keen from Izuku. It spilled right into Katsuki’s open mouth. He did it again, and again, and again until he found a luscious rhythm. Their rugged breaths mingled, interwinding like vines back and forth as pleasure rocked through their bodies.

Katsuki moved like he was guiding a storm and taming it all at once. Each punch of his hips was measured but heavy with intent, raw and passionate, like he wanted Izuku to feel him—not only physically, but spiritually. He wanted to seer himself into Izuku’s every aching, sensitive nerve.

Izuku clung to him as if gravity had turned sideways. His hands slipped along the solid curve of Katsuki’s back, nails scratching down as he tried to anchor himself through the storm of rapture Katsuki pushed him into. Every slide, every grind of pressure sent shivers tearing through him, breath catching in soft, desperate sounds that Izuku muffled with the grit of his teeth.

Then with one, powerful thrust, Izuku was utterly blindsided by pleasure. His head tilted against the pillow, and his body arched off the bed.

And he moaned—loudly.

The erotic sound reverberated through the room as absolute rapture electrocuted his mind.

Quickly, Katsuki slapped a hand over his mouth, but didn’t stop. They locked eyes, intense and heady as Katsuki continued to drive in and out at a brutal pace. The lewd, muffled moans vibrated against Katsuki’s palm, and Izuku uncontrollably twitched beneath the waves crashing down through him.

“Fu-fuck,” Katsuki hissed, hips stuttering.

He clasped his hand tighter around Izuku’s mouth as his pace picked up. Izuku screwed his eyes shut as he held on tightly to his husband and moaned helplessly into his hand.

Pure, carnal hunger devoured them whole as Katsuki began to fuck him like their lives depended on it. Izuku felt every slam against his sweet spot down to his core and the heat piled high. The bed creaked, rocked, and it hit the wall in tandem with their rhythm.

Katsuki muffled his own groans by burying himself in the crook of Izuku’s neck. Sweat beads gathered at their brows as both of their arms and legs began to shake.

Izuku felt himself climb high, he gasped into his husband’s hand as Katsuki somehow found a way to drive into him with more fervor.

Then the second wave came. He felt it stack tall, swelling in pressure and intensity under his skin like a gathering inferno until it exploded.

Izuku's mind went blank.

He whined lewdly into Katsuki's hand and his nails drew blood as they raked down his husband's back. His whole body seized up beautifully as euphoria danced along his skin. He clamped down on his husband's pulsing cock and Katsuki followed closely behind.

A needy groan was muffled into Izuku's neck and the hand on his mouth tightened. Izuku's legs quaked as he came. His essence spilled between their bodies, soaking the lace and shortly after, Katsuki filled him up. His husband gave one, two, three hard thrusts before his hips stuttered. Then he sank in for a final, powerful drive.

Warm seed spread all over Izuku's insides, making him groan as he felt Katsuki's cock twitch, giving him every last drop.

For a long moment, neither of them moved. Katsuki didn't pull out right away, and Izuku didn't want him to.

The room was heavy with the scent of sweat and sex. The quiet rush of blood in their ears pulsed against the dead of night. Izuku was completely pliant, like putty. Together, their chests were rising and falling in uneven waves.

Slowly, Katsuki's hand moved away from his mouth and found its way around Izuku's throat. Firm. Not choking, but just there. A reminder to Izuku of who exactly Katsuki was.

Gradually, the haze of pleasure bled out into tenderness.

With delicate care, Katsuki pulled out. He watched Izuku's face closely for any sign of pain.

Izuku winced, but barely. The look in his eyes was soft, glowing in the pale moonlight. Katsuki reached for a nearby towel and cleaned them both with slow, gentle movements.

Then he laid down beside him, tugging Izuku into his arms. He held Izuku tightly, like he couldn't bear to ever let go. Without a word, their legs tangled as they came down from the moment. They encased each other, and their bodies became their own private shelter for the night.

Quietly, Katsuki pressed his lips to Izuku's damp forehead. He murmured something too quiet for Izuku to catch. Izuku then turned in, and buried his face in Katsuki's warm chest. He hummed low at the erratic beating of his husband's heart. He quietly listened to it slow down, and carefully he wrapped his arms around Katsuki's waist.

He clung tight like the world might shift beneath them if he let go.

They stayed this way for a while. Breathing together. Heartbeats syncing.

Katsuki's fingers threaded through Izuku's curls.

“Are you okay?” he asked softly. “That was really intense.”

Izuku nodded. He pressed a kiss to Katsuki’s sternum. “Yeah. I feel really…full. Not just from, uh, you know. But from everything. I just really love you so much.”

Katsuki’s throat bobbed.

“Yeah,” he whispered. “I know what you mean. I love you too.”

Silence fell over them again like an extra blanket. It was heavy and warm. Exactly what they needed for the dead of night. Katsuki’s arms flexed tighter around Izuku as he exhaled through his nose. Gradually, he let his eyes slip shut.

“You scare the shit out of me sometimes,” Katsuki whispered after a beat. “You make me feel too much.”

“Same.” Izuku looked up, eyes glassy but warm.

Katsuki gave a soft hum. It was pulled from somewhere deep in his chest and full of never ending love. He kissed the corner of Izuku’s mouth, then again, slower, on his temple.

“To reiterate: I’m not going anywhere, ever, Izuku,” Katsuki whispered. “You don’t have to carry anything alone anymore. I’ll take all of it—your love, your fear, even your bad dreams. Everything.”

Izuku’s arms wound even tighter around him. “Promise?”

Katsuki didn’t hesitate. “Yeah. I promise.”

And they stayed curled like that for the rest of the night. The world outside their little cocoon remained quiet and still for this fleeting moment. Izuku finally relaxed, bones undoing for the first time in a long time.

As snow continued to gently fall outside their window, they closed their eyes. Skin to skin, breath to breath—two hearts finally at rest.

When morning rolled around, Izuku felt like a brand-new man. He had been revitalized, and practically exfoliated by the bliss of sleeping without fear clinging to his spine.

This felt different than the night after the masquerade. Then, he was dripped in such an ugly darkness that forced him to shed his old skin and accept that he wasn’t a viper—and never had been. But this breath of fresh air was lighter. He felt like he had finally found the path to light with the help of Katsuki guiding him like some guardian angel.

Izuku got dressed in the clothes that were laid out for him from Aizawa. It was a simple, beige sweater and sweatpants. Katsuki had on his own black sweats.

Shy smiles were exchanged between them as they headed out of the room.

They followed the lovely scent of breakfast into the kitchen. Awaiting him were all the faces he had come to know the previous day. And not one of their gazes had changed from the last time Izuku had seen them.

Miruko smiled. Denki offered a lazy wave. Monoma lifted two fingers in a half-hearted salute. Aizawa was reading something. Shinsou didn't even glance up from his plate.

Izuku suddenly felt inexplicably shy.

He lingered a step behind Katsuki, offering a small nod of greeting before they both took their seats at the long dining table. The spread before them was enough to make his mouth water on command: pancakes, fruit, grilled salmon, onigiri, and an array of fresh vegetables. The scent was rich and comforting.

And then, as if his body had been waiting for permission, Izuku's stomach let out a long, loud growl.

Izuku startled, surprised. He bashfully grabbed his abdomen.

"Sorry about that," he apologized. "I guess I didn't realize how hungry I am."

"Dig in until you feel satisfied," Miruko laughed. She smiled happily with a radiant expression. "We're all just getting started. Coffee is over there on the counter."

"I'm about to drink that entire pot," Katsuki grumbled as he reached for two plates. He placed one down in front of Izuku and began to fill his plate for him. He easily grabbed everything he knew Izuku liked: pancakes, eggs, and salmon. He even made sure to give him extra strawberries on the side.

"You got tea?" Katsuki asked Aizawa. "Izuku doesn't like coffee."

The comment earned a few subtle looks from around the table.

"There's some in the cabinet above the stove," Aizawa replied, pointing directly behind him.

While Katsuki went to retrieve it, Izuku reached for Katsuki's plate and filled it for him in the same manner. He made sure to pile on things he knew Katsuki loved: salmon, waffles, and anything that leaned into the spicier flavors he gravitated towards.

Across the table, Denki was stifling a laugh.

"Damn," he said, smirking. "You really know what he likes, huh?"

Izuku paused, unsure why that was funny. "Yes?"

"Mhm." Denki bit his lip and then a jester-like grin split across his face. "So. You were knocked out for the whole day yesterday. Did you have a nice pleasure-filled sleep?"

Izuku dropped the fork. He choked on his own saliva and Katsuki whirled around, mortified. All color drained from both of their faces and Izuku wished the ground would split open to swallow them whole.

Denki bursted into harmonious laughter with Sero.

Miruko tried to hide her own, small smile while Monoma elbowed Denki in the side. Shinsou sighed and continued to eat his bacon, biting aggressively into it. His face translated nothing but pure, absolute irritation.

“Don’t embarrass them,” Miruko lectured, though her own smirk betrayed her. “Slip ups happen, especially at 3:00 a.m. Everyone knows the two things open at that time of night are legs and liquor stores.”

“I-I’m so sorry!” Izuku blurted out. He frantically bowed his head as his cheeks burned with pure embarrassment. “Th-That was completely inappropriate of us to do with everyone in the house—”

“—Relax,” Miruko chuckled, placing a calming hand over his. “Not everyone heard. It was just me and Kaminari. And I didn’t hear the whole thing. Only one… very loud moan. Personally, I shot up because I was on edge. I thought the Yakuza had somehow gotten in and were murdering Bakugou—but. Turns out it was quite the opposite when I checked near your room.”

“Yeah, and I woke up when I heard your bed knocking,” Denki snickered. “You’re lucky it’s me you share a wall with and not prude number one and two over there.” He jabbed his thumb towards Monoma and Shinsou. “They probably would’ve interrupted you guys mid thrust. But luckily, I understand how the throws of passion can’t be tamed.”

Izuku made a noise somewhere between a dying kettle and a gasping goldfish.

Katsuki returned with his tea, face a deep red. They awkwardly shifted next to each other while Denki continued to howl like a hyena.

“New house rule,” Aizawa suddenly announced. He sat his cup of coffee down on the table sternly and shot Katsuki a chastising glare. “Please try not to fondle each other while we’re forced to all stay here. No more three a.m. moans and no hand jobs on the living room couch where people can walk in and see.”

Katsuki frowned. “Uh. We didn’t do that last one.”

“I know,” Aizawa deadpanned, turning his glare on Denki and Sero. “It was these two.”

In a second, the laughter in the room died down to only Miruko. Sero rubbed his neck and Denki sucked in his lips.

“All of you are bad for my blood pressure,” Aizawa curtly declared. He shook his head, clearly too old for all of this, as he turned his attention back on his paperwork. He picked up his pen and began aggressively writing. “Listen. I know you’re all young, energetic twenty-somethings but for the love of god—try to spare the rest of us.”

Izuku was mortified. “I’m so sorry—”

“—It’s fine,” Aizawa grumbled. He raised his hand to silence Izuku. “I blame Bakugou more than you. Let’s not discuss it. Ever.”

Izuku gave a slow nod.

The weight of ten thousand pounds worth of mortification pressed down on him. So much for making a good first impression.

He kept his gaze locked on his plate, cheeks burning, and did the one thing that made sense at that moment: he ate. If his mouth was full, he couldn’t accidentally make this situation worse, right? So he focused on chewing, fork moving on autopilot, piling bite after bite in like it was a shield against further humiliation.

As if what had happened was a normal occurrence, breakfast carried on. Everyone at the table blended into one with a kind of gentle laughter Izuku wasn’t accustomed to.

The table buzzed with easy banter, light as morning air, flowing between everyone like they’d done this a thousand times. It was effortless, familiar. His heart swelled at the sight of Katsuki slipping so naturally into it all. These were his husband’s longtime colleagues, but Izuku hadn’t fully grasped until now exactly how close they truly were.

Monoma and Katsuki traded barbs with the ease of old rivals, sharp in tone but soft in intent. Denki and Sero kept the energy high, tossing jokes back and forth while Miruko’s bright, melodic laughter filled the room. Shinsou chimed in with comments of wisdom, keeping everyone grounded.

At the head of the table, Aizawa remained mostly silent. He offered the occasional dry scoff or exasperated glance—but Izuku caught the serene, satisfied smile that tugged at his lips as he watched over the group. Especially when his eyes landed on Katsuki.

Aizawa flicked his wrist as he signed something on the papers in front of him.

Katsuki’s curiosity was tugged. He leaned over, trying to get a better look.

“What’s that?” He asked outright.

Aizawa gave another quick signature on the paper before double checking it. “I was finishing going over the final details of Izuku’s case.”

At that, Izuku paused his eating. He peered over to Aizawa as everyone looked at him.

“My case?” He clarified.

“Yup. You’re officially a client of ours.” Aizawa then reached down and pulled out a green folder from under his seat. He neatly tucked away the papers inside and held it up. “Congrats.”

Izuku stared at the folder, taken aback. He had never seen a green folder before. Did Aizawa color it this way because of his hair and eyes? Izuku curiously touched his curls at this moment, unsure of what green could mean.

“Thank you so much,” Izuku said, deeply sincere. “I’ll go get my money—”

“—No need. We’re doing this pro-bono,” Aizawa replied firmly.

Izuku paused. He was unsure if he liked that.

“A-Are you positive?” He questioned. “I don’t have much, but I can still give you some compensation for your time.”

“Don’t sweat it. Consider this a belated wedding gift.”

Aizawa pointedly looked at Katsuki who quietly mouthed ‘thank you’.

“But before we make it official, there are some things I want to hash out,” Aizawa remarked. “Yesterday, while you were sleeping, Katsuki filled us in on some of the details we were still missing—but it would be helpful if you could add more color to this.”

“Of course,” Izuku eagerly agreed. He sat up straight and politely folded his hands. “I’ll tell you anything you want to know.”

“You said that they issued an email blast that detailed a hunt for you,” Aizawa pondered. He then scratched his chin with his finger and pursed his lips. “But you also said Katsuki is the only one that they want dead and mentioned your brother’s plans hinge on you being present. Is it solely because he sold Chisaki your virginity? Because obviously—” he gestured at Katsuki. “—That is off the table. Is there more to it?”

Izuku nervously toyed with his hands. “There’s—There’s more.”

Unprompted, his throat became dry.

As he gazed at all the prying eyes, his nerves rattled like someone shook him. Opening up was something he was still practicing—but this was much different than talking with Katsuki. With his husband, it felt easy, like a flowing river. But with people he didn’t know—he wasn’t sure.

“It’s okay,” Katsuki suddenly said. “You can tell them.”

He put his hands over Izuku’s and encased them tenderly.

Green eyes met red and they held each other’s gaze for a comforting moment. There, Izuku felt like Katsuki leant him his strength simply by looking deep into his eyes. Izuku blinked a couple times. Katsuki smiled.

Izuku then looped his gaze back at Aizawa and never let go of Katsuki’s hands.

“My brother, Tomura, had plans to try to marry me off to Chisaki Kai.”

At this, silence rippled through the group. Spines straightened. Eyes narrowed and the laughter from moments before became distant.

“Marry?” Aizawa parroted like he heard wrong. “To the Yakuza Heir?”

“Ye-Yeah,” Izuku whispered. He swallowed thickly when the tension in the room became serious. “Right before I escaped, Tomura confessed he set up the virginity deal to bring me and Chisaki closer. He thought it would slowly devolve into dates and then eventually a marriage proposal. But—clearly that’s not how that night went.”

“But why would he make you marry Chisaki?” Miruko asked, horrified. “What sense does that make?”

“It would meld the Vipers to the Yakuza in a permanent, unprecedented way that shows loyalty,” Izuku explained. “If the Vipers merged with the Yakuza, we’ll be on somewhat equal footing as two crime families in the Tokyo Underground coming together. Tomura will be Chisaki’s brother-in-law and he’ll be able to gain more access to power. And that’s all he ever wanted—power. Power to run The Viper Academy. Power to sit at the Underground Council. And now, power through the Yakuza.”

“Why doesn’t he marry Chisaki his damn self then?” Monoma spat.

“Because Chisaki has a type.” Izuku grew quiet here. “My brother’s face is too marred to be attractive to Chisaki—and he exudes too much dominant energy. Chisaki is obsessed with purity. People who seem…innocent and submissive. But, it’s extremely rare for someone to catch Chisaki Kai’s eye. The last person who did was some civilian school teacher. Chisaki had the man kidnapped and delivered to his doorstep. He wasn’t seen again. I’m the second person he’s openly shown interest in and it seems like he’s trying to repeat history.”

It was here Izuku could see Shinsou carefully look at his features, picking them apart.

“What the Yakuza Heir wants, he gets,” Aizawa remarked, matter of fact. “No matter who pays the price. And I’m assuming your brother is the same way if they are friends.”

“He is. But for Tomura, if I marry Chisaki Kai, he’ll be able to take control of all the Tokyo Underground,” Izuku said. “He’ll overrun Chisaki in record timing, I’m sure. Exactly like he did with our previous handler, Nine. Tomura is good at gaining peoples’ favor to stab them in the back later.”

“But I don’t see what Chisaki would get out of this,” Denki said. “Besides arm candy, he has to see he’s being used, right? Why would he ever agree to marry you, you two barely know each other.”

“Chisaki doesn’t care about getting to know me,” Izuku replied, a tinge sour. “I’m an object to him. That man wants to possess me. Not all marriages are about companionship. Many are business deals and that’s exactly how Tomura will pitch me to him: a business deal that likely could benefit him.”

“—And the Yakuza have very rarely done love marriages,” Aizawa tacked on, deep in thought. “The closest I can think of a love match in the Yakuza is when the Heir gets obsessed with someone and they force them. If they don’t go that route, they strictly get married to someone that gives them some sort of political or economic gain.”

“So you would be both,” Monoma said slowly, as if it all clicked together. “Damn. You really struck out.”

Izuku furrowed his brow.

The more he sat on it, the more terrible sense it made.

He had to give it to his brother. Tomura wielded his ruthless intelligence like a scalpel—precise, surgical, and devoid of anything resembling mercy.

“Chisaki’s whole empire was built on merges, that’s why he’s so powerful,” Izuku reasoned out loud. “He’s successfully merged all the other Yakuza syndicates into his. And honestly, the more I consider it, it wouldn’t be far fetched for him to want to absorb the Vipers. He works so closely with us it actually seems natural. I know he’s always been put off about how much he has to pay for Viper assassins. If he absorbed us, he wouldn’t have to pay for our services anymore I’m assuming.”

“And there’s the fact Chisaki is spoiled rotten to the core,” Miruko spat, disgusted. “I met the guy once, when he came to check out our own services—and man. He’s apathetic about everything. The few times he showed real emotion was when he got to play with people like toys. Or when he was angry about being disrespected. He fully believes he’s entitled to full access to the very best things, at all moments.”

“And because of your looks…” Sero whispered, eyes finally seeing the full picture. “…He probably believes he’s entitled to you.”

“Yeah,” Izuku replied. “I don’t know what I would do if I somehow ended up being forced to marry Chisaki,” Izuku lamented. He hung his head away. “I would feel like I died inside. I-I want to survive, but if that happened, that’s not a life I could go on living.”

Izuku noticed how Katsuki was quiet during this whole exchange. With every further and further mention of Chisaki, anger swam around in his eyes, searching for a way out.

“Alright, well thank you Izuku for giving us the full gravity of this situation,” Aizawa said.

Aizawa rose from his chair with the green folder tucked under one arm, his expression sharpened into steel. His gaze swept across the table, pausing on each face—taking inventory. When it landed on Izuku, a flicker of determination locked into place.

“This is a level ten protection case,” Aizawa declared. His voice was low but weighty, the kind of tone that silenced the entire room. “Given that this is the Yakuza we’re dealing with, I have brought Miruko on board to help out. The objective of this mission: under absolutely no circumstances does Izuku get taken by the Vipers or Yakuza. And if he does—we’re extracting him. As a unit, we’re going to make sure these two make it to the escape point in Okinawa.”

He crossed the short distance to Katsuki and handed him the folder. Katsuki took it without hesitation, fingers closing around it like it was something holy.

“This is officially your last green folder assignment, kid,” Aizawa warned. “Make it count.”

Katsuki gave a single nod, stiff with purpose.

Izuku swallowed. Before he could stop himself he asked, “What does green mean?”

Silence folded over the room. Everyone turned towards him.

Katsuki didn’t let go of his hand. Instead, he gripped it tighter until Izuku could feel the pulse in his husband’s fingertips against his skin. When Katsuki’s voice came, it was rough and certain.

“Green means to protect.”

The weight of the words landed like a gun being cocked. Final. Fatal, if they had to be.

Now, their intertwined hands were clasped tight enough for Izuku to feel all of Katsuki’s burning hatred for Chisaki. Katsuki was looking at him, eyes full of fire. The muscle in his jaw flexed with barely restrained fury. He didn’t say anything further—and he didn’t need to.

The expression on his face alone said enough: Over my dead body.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much for reading!!! I hope you enjoyed. The next chapter is pretty silly stuff because writing more silly M-Unit stuff feels like it was needed before I push you all over the final ledge. :')

Have a great rest of your day!

Chapter 36: Tacet

Chapter Summary

Tacet (Instrumentation Instructions) Indicates a musical instrument to rest.

Chapter Notes

Hello! Welcome back to this lovely story :') Early update because sitting on this is making me too excited in anticipation lol here's a fun chapter for you! I hope you enjoy it!! Thank you like always to the LOML, Luna, for being a beta beast!! ❤️❤️❤️

Warnings: Adult Scenes and Themes

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 36 — Tacet

.

.

.

Aizawa's decree echoed in Izuku's ears. It felt like a war cry, in a way. Izuku could only hope Tomura didn't hear it wherever he was.

He made sure to express his gratitude. He bowed low, and muttered "thank you" as many times as Aizawa would let him. It was only after the tenth time did Aizawa tell him to ease up and go back to eating.

He tried to do exactly that, but underneath all the eyes, he was awkwardly hyper-aware of his body. He credited the discomfort to being so close to freedom. It was surreal that soon his body would be that—his. He was overly thankful that Aizawa had taken him in. If he didn't —Izuku wouldn't know what to do. He didn't have anyone else now to depend upon.

Before they could wrap up breakfast, Aizawa tapped him on the shoulder.

"Izuku," he spoke. "I wanted to talk to you in private after you finish with your food."

Izuku straightened out his back and nodded eagerly. "Of course, sir."

“Please, don’t call me sir.” Aizawa frowned. “I’m not that old despite what your smart aleck husband tells you.”

A couple of chuckles rolled through the group along with a quip from Katsuki.

After Izuku finished with his meal, Aizawa gently gestured for him to get up. Without haste, both Izuku and Aizawa arose from the kitchen table. Aizawa led the way while Izuku followed. Nervously, Izuku swallowed and clasped his hands behind his back. This must be the final interrogation.

They reached the drawing room and it welcomed them with its velvety purples.

Aizawa took a seat first, then motioned for Izuku to do the same with a calm, unreadable expression.

Izuku obeyed, hesitantly sitting down in the armchair directly across from him.

The silence between them stretched, heavy and uncomfortable. Aizawa studied him with a gaze crafted by years of instinct and mistrust, and Izuku felt every second of it. His thoughts spiraled under that quiet stare—was Aizawa seeing a monster? A threat? A boy who had dragged Katsuki into something far darker than he ever deserved?

Maybe he saw all of it—because Izuku certainly did.

Aizawa exhaled. “I wanted to ask you about someone your agency—” he paused, eyes flickering as he corrected himself. “I mean, I wanted to ask you about someone your family murdered.”

“Yes,” Izuku stammered. He nodded, biting the inside of his cheek. “And ‘agency’ is fine. I’ll give you any information you may want.”

“Do you happen to know of a case pertaining to an agent by the name of Loud Cloud?”

It rang a bell. Izuku’s eyes sparked with a flicker of recognition. Aizawa caught it.

“So. You do know,” Aizawa muttered, his jaw tightening. He leaned back slowly. “Tell me.”

“I’ve only heard that name once,” Izuku answered carefully. “I heard of him this year when I was in Okinawa with Katsuki. My brother, Tomura, mentioned that name after going on a trip to Czechia.”

Aizawa huffed a humorless laugh. A faint smirk curled his lips as if he’d found a missing puzzle piece.

“I think I’ve met your brother then.”

“White hair with endless viper tattoos?” Izuku questioned.

“Yup.” Aizawa confirmed and scoffed. “That’s the guy. If that’s who your brother is, then your story makes a lot more sense.”

Izuku was curious now. Tomura had mentioned Czechia was a mess for him and One, all because of someone with a thirty year long grudge. But Izuku was more impressed with how Aizawa managed to even get close to One and Tomura and still live to tell the tale.

This guy must've been a force to be reckoned with.

"How did you find them?" Izuku asked, unable to contain the wonder in his voice.

Aizawa shrugged, entirely nonchalant. "I remember my friend mentioning something about working with a 'Viper' right before he went missing. And with a stroke of luck, I had a new client this year. He mentioned that we were 'sloppy' in comparison to 'Vipers'. So I decided to waterboard him to get a lead. He gave me your picture, along with a couple of others, plus the location of where your founder, One, would be heading next for a meeting—which was Czechia."

Izuku nearly whistled. Impressive was an understatement.

"I'm sorry," Izuku muttered. "I'm truly sorry for what they did to him."

Now, Aizawa leaned forward. A menacing scowl eclipsed his face. "I want to know why."

Izuku's throat went dry. He swallowed, and did his best to push past the lock on his throat.

"Our Grand Father…" He paused. He closed his eyes and sighed. "I mean, our founder, One. He was trying to snuff out competition. He didn't want to straight out slaughter people, because it would come off as too aggressive. So he began setting up competitors on lethal assignments to get killed. It would make the competition look incompetent while also diminishing any other agents on the field."

Aizawa's brows pulled together.

He leaned backwards and his expression hardened. "It wasn't…personal?"

Izuku shook his head mournfully. "It wasn't. I'm sorry."

"Damn," Aizawa scoffed. Then slowly, he laughed. He laughed like he had been told some cruel, unfortunate joke at his own expense. He ran a shaky hand through his hair. "This whole time I thought it was some sort of grand, crazy reason. But it was just snakes being snakes."

Izuku lowered his eyes, feeling guilty by association. "You'd been searching for a long time, haven't you?"

"I have," Aizawa affirmed heavily. He then looked Izuku in his eye and there was a new level of trust there. "Thank you."

"Of course," Izuku replied. He waited for a second, and tried to think of all the ways he could probably repay Aizawa. He could only offer one, taboo thing. "Are you going to try to seek revenge? I can try to give you any information you may need. Or even sketch out floor plans of The Academy—"

“—No.” Aizawa’s voice cut through the air like a blade.

He frowned like what Izuku suggested was equivalent to eating rotten fruit.

“I only want to know so I could tell his family,” Aizawa explained. “They’ve been waiting for years to find out what happened to him, and I wanted to give them peace. His mother made me promise when I was much younger to find out what occurred—and now I have.”

Izuku was taken back, surprised that an offer to get even was passed upon.

“Revenge isn’t the best path in life,” Aizawa lectured. He leveled Izuku with a stern scowl and shook his head. “I’ve been trying to teach Katsuki that, even though I’m not sure how well that teaching has stuck with him. Those goddamn Bakugous, Mitsuki and Katsuki alike, were always such a spiteful pair.”

Izuku pursed his lips.

Aizawa was right. Katsuki was spiteful. Hell, he was certain that spite is what drove Katsuki the last five years. However, when he thought back to Midnight Sento, Katsuki made it clear he was giving up his mission to kill Chisaki in favor of getting them to safety.

That night, his husband had traded vengeance for love.

“Katsuki seems to have let go of his need for revenge, for now at least,” Izuku murmured.

“Surprisingly, yes,” Aizawa replied. He leaned back and examined Izuku carefully. “But only because of you.”

“I didn’t really do anything. Honestly, I encouraged it.”

“You’re a Bakugou now, so it’s not surprising that you have a spiteful streak too,” Aizawa hummed. “But I think your presence in Katsuki’s life has made a good impact. Seems like being around you makes Katsuki slow down, for once in his damn life.”

Izuku didn’t know what to say. He wasn’t used to such compliments.

“Thank you,” he settled for and smiled politely.

“I mean it,” Aizawa replied. “You’re a good influence on him and he’s good for you too. You balance each other out, in a roundabout way. But you need to keep true to your word and keep that hothead safe, alright? If you don’t—”

His eyes narrowed, sharp and threatening.

“—I’ll track you down. No matter where Nana hides you.”

Izuku cracked a small, nervous smile. “Duly noted.”

“Alright then,” Aizawa muttered, rising with a grunt. “Let’s get you back downstairs before that husband of yours comes storming up here.”

Izuku smiled, picturing that perfectly in his head.

They stood together and a hush of unspoken trust settled between them. They made their way downstairs, back into the warmth and noise of the living room where the rest of their crew was awaiting them.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The moment Izuku returned to the kitchen, Katsuki instantly perked up. It made Izuku's heart flutter, and he sat back down next to his husband happily. Without waiting a second, Katsuki's hand naturally fell on top of his, and their fingers entangled the same as their lives.

Everyone watched, still eating, but assessing.

When Aizawa sat back down, he nodded once at Miruko. She returned the same gesture. Her eyes flickered to Izuku, and inside of them he could see thankfulness.

The morning concluded without note, and everyone went on about their days.

Izuku kept tightly glued to Katsuki, while outside Monoma and Shinsou disappeared into the forest in search of firewood. Inside, Denki and Sero were hunched over the kitchen counter, scribbling out a long grocery list peppered with debates over snacks and survival essentials.

Meanwhile, Aizawa and Miruko settled on opposite ends of the kitchen table, laptops perched on the wooden surface. "Admin stuff," was all they muttered when asked. From the quick taps of keys and clipped answers, it was clear they were closing out assignments before the cabin swallowed them whole for the next five and a half weeks.

Katsuki eventually settled in on the couch, and Izuku joined him. They clicked on the TV and found the closest soap opera that was entertaining. But after a couple of drama-filled episodes, Izuku admittedly became antsy.

"What are we supposed to do for the rest of our time here?" Izuku asked quietly.

"We rest," Katsuki replied simply.

He threw a lazy arm around Izuku's shoulders and hugged him tight.

Rest, huh?

Izuku hadn't considered that.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The afternoon went by and it turned out his body wasn't finished sleeping.

After sitting still a bit longer, Izuku knocked out on the couch beside Katsuki. They were only woken up for dinner, and immediately after they ate, drowsiness kicked in again. Izuku felt lethargic, but was glad he had the space to feel such a thing. Him and his husband retired to their bedroom earlier than anticipated.

Izuku found himself in a deep, lovely uninterrupted sleep.

When he roused again, he rubbed his eyes and yawned.

He glanced at the clock and noticed it was late at night. Suddenly, his stomach rumbled loudly. He sighed as he clutched at it, and the first thing his brain supplied him was a vision of the extra strawberries in the fridge. Izuku decided a quick, midnight snack couldn't hurt.

Quietly, he crawled out of bed, careful not to wake Katsuki. His husband was still sound asleep, blond hair spread beautifully across the pillow case. Izuku smiled and tucked him in further, happy when his love shifted in the bed and snuggled further in.

Izuku crept towards the kitchen. He pictured the strawberries and found himself humming in delight. He strolled down the dark hallway past several of the other's doors.

On his way, he couldn't help but notice the picture frames on the walls. Many were of a woman with bright brown eyes and dark hair. She was smiling in most of them, standing with a boy who looked to be in his early twenties. Izuku tilted his head at one of the photos he passed by. In this one in particular he could see the boy resembled Aizawa, far more than Sero did.

"—But he's dangerous, Aizawa."

Izuku stopped.

He turned to the door next to him where the whispers echoed from. Beneath the wooden frame, a faint, yellow glow spilled out onto the floor.

"I know. But from the looks of it, I don't think he would hurt Katsuki."

"He's already killed Mitsuki, who's to say he's not trying to finish off the blood line?"

"Shinsou, that's a bit far-fetched."

Izuku's heart squeezed. He tried to move his feet, but he was glued in place.

Shinsou groaned, frustrated.

"I know—But I don't like this, Aizawa. Maybe if he was a kid or someone who hasn't already killed hundreds of people, he would be worth saving because there would be something left to save. But he's a grown man. His view of the world is warped, there's not a chance he can learn to be a part of society. He's brainwashed all the way through for all we know."

Izuku's heart kicked up, fast and uneven.

Suddenly Denki's voice cut in. "Do you think he has some sort of killer sleeper mode that's activated when a code word is said?" he asked in a failed whisper. "Kind of like Winter Soldier? What if it's some sort of snake name that makes him go batshit."

"Probably," Shinsou grumbled. "He's a weapon. Not a person. He even has his serial number on his damn collar bone."

Izuku raised a hand to touch his tattoo.

His callouses traced the raised skin, outlining the '217' that would be forever etched on him. He realized he hadn't thought about his number in weeks. That was the longest he had ever forgotten about it.

"He is a person, Shinsou." Now, it was Monoma's voice, defending him. "That's very unfair to say. And that sleeper agent shit is a myth—there's no science behind it."

Denki started arguing Monoma down, convinced that there were hundreds of sleeper agents walking among civilians. Izuku knew this was false, and he was not some sort of machine that had no control of his actions.

However, Shinsou interrupted all the hypotheticals with one more jab to Izuku.

"Look, sleeper agent or not," Shinsou uttered. "All I am saying is that we are trying to help a guy who grew up in a killer cult acclimate into the world. What happens if he doesn't know how? Who knows what he'll do to Katsuki later down the line. He might be the death of him. Izuku is not normal."

"But he's trying to be," Monoma murmured. "That has to count for something."

"He can try all he wants," Shinsou replied. "Snakes might shed their skin but they don't change their patterns."

Izuku took a step back.

He slipped into the shadows, letting the darkness swallow his figure. Inexplicable pain shot through him from all over as his heart squeezed.

He turned quickly on his heels, unable to listen to another word and went right back from where he came. With shaky hands he opened the bedroom door and closed it quietly behind him. His hunger was now gone, swept away underneath the wave of shame that spread across his limbs.

He stood there, back against the door staring at the room.

Shinsou's criticisms echoed through his skull.

Then quickly, Tomura's.

While he was learning there was a lot wrong with the Viper teachings, some truth still rang true. And now, the biggest teaching was ringing louder and louder: outsiders would regard them as monsters.

Katsuki stirred and reached for the space where he should be. His husband groaned and sat up, confused. Sleep heavy eyes searched around the room, and when they found him, Katsuki smiled.

“Come back to bed, nerd,” his groggy voice drawled. It pulled Izuku in and calmed his erratic heart.

Izuku climbed under the covers, feeling safe again. He curled into Katsuki and Katsuki snuggled back. Three soft kisses were planted on his nose, cheek and mouth before his husband laid his head back down.

Izuku held on tighter.

He knew he would never hurt Katsuki—but the idea that others couldn’t see that, pained him. He wished he could unzip his skin and crawl out of everything he used to be, leaving that ugly 217 behind. But he knew he couldn’t do such a thing.

The words began to repeat.

He was not normal.

He was dangerous.

He might be the death of Katsuki.

Izuku blinked up at the ceiling. His eyes stung from holding back tears. He wanted so badly to be normal. Not only for Katsuki—but really, for himself.

His husband shifted slightly in his sleep and tucked his arm tighter around Izuku’s waist. He mumbled something unintelligible into the curve of Izuku’s neck. With that simple gesture, Katsuki’s warmth cut through Izuku’s dull ache like sun through fog.

Maybe Monoma was right. Maybe trying had to count for something. Maybe it didn’t matter how the odds were stacked or if Shinsou never changed his mind. Maybe he didn’t need the whole world to believe he could be human. Maybe he only needed to become someone who believed it himself.

Izuku closed his eyes.

“I’ll try,” he whispered, barely audible. “I’ll try my best to be normal.”

Katsuki’s hand flexed gently against his back like he’d heard it in a dream. After that, Izuku didn’t move again.

He laid there, curled into the safety of Katsuki’s arms, and let the pain ebb into quiet determination.

Week One in Winter Paradise

The first few days of getting to know Katsuki's friends were awkward. Izuku could see every glance they tossed his way held a question. They were analyzing his every move. He didn't blame them, and frankly, he understood the distrust. He just wished there was a way to win them over.

Over these first days, he learned that this particular group minus Miruko were called 'M-Unit'.

They were Aizawa's specially handpicked agents, and Izuku realized they mirrored the Viper Seven in a way. He could practically feel the favoritism. He learned that each person was responsible for a different aspect on the team.

Denki was in charge of electronics. He had a freakish depth of knowledge for anything relating to tech. The way he chatted about these things made Izuku see Aoyama in him, slightly. But only if Aoyama was a more outgoing, loud, perverted personality.

Next he learned Sero was specialized in staging and body clean up. Aizawa's nephew had apparently taken a liking to true crime podcasts when he was younger. He would ramble about them to his classmates in depth, but it caused him to become a bit of a social outcast. Eventually, the obsession devolved into gaining morbid interests regarding how killers disposed of bodies. After a while, and with the help of a lot of blackmail, Aizawa took him on.

Next were Monoma and Shinsou, which Izuku learned he had heard of before. He had seen their aliases in the news a couple of times: The Phantom Killer and The Puppet Master. He learned here that they used to work for another Hit-for-hire agency, but murdered their supervisor in cold blood once they discovered he had a thing for hurting kids.

Izuku wordlessly nodded in approval at that.

He hated kids being hurt too. If Shinsou wasn't giving him the cold shoulder so bluntly, he would sit down and try to bond with him because of it.

Then lastly: Katsuki. He already knew Katsuki's story, but now it made sense why he was added to the team. Whether he knew it or not, Aizawa's heart was plainly on his sleeve. He had a soft spot for people who desperately needed a place in the world. Izuku wondered if that's why he ultimately took him in.

They were all sitting around eating lunch. It was a simple meal, sandwiches and soups to combat the cold weather. Conversation buzzed low, until Izuku turned to Katsuki.

"Kacchan, do you want the rest of my soup?" he asked, nudging the half-full bowl toward him.

Katsuki lifted his head. "Sure, but take my bread."

There was a pause. Then, from down the table, Sero frowned and leaned in like he hadn't heard correctly.

"Wait," Sero questioned slowly. He pointed at Izuku. "What did you call him?"

Izuku blinked, confused. "I called him Kacchan?"

The reaction was instant. Aizawa coughed on his drink, barely saving his dignity. Denki's fork clattered to his plate as he doubled over laughing. Sero and Miruko let out a bark of disbelief that trailed into giggles. Monoma smirked like he'd been handed a gift. Even Shinsou perked up, blinking like he had been told something outlandish.

Katsuki scowled at them all, yanking the bowl of soup toward him with more force than necessary.

"Oh, this just keeps getting better and better," Monoma snickered. He lounged back in his chair, full of satisfaction.

"No way," Denki wheezed between laughs. "You actually let him call you that?"

Katsuki shot him a glare sharp enough to draw blood. "Fuck off."

Denki only laughed harder, slapping Sero on the shoulder. "Holy shit! This is like when you meet a vicious, terrifying dog and it's named something like Muffins."

"It's nothing like that," Katsuki gritted out, face progressively turning a dangerous shade of red. "Kacchan is perfectly damn normal."

Izuku shrank a little in his seat, cheeks flushing. He hadn't realized the nickname would cause this much chaos.

"Oh my god," Monoma murmured, lips twitching. "Wait. You like it."

Katsuki opened his mouth to argue but closed it just as fast.

Denki leaned in, eyes gleaming with wicked amusement. "Do you make him call you that during—"

Katsuki didn't even let him finish. He brandished his spoon like a weapon, voice low and deadly. "One more word and you're eating this, Pikachu."

Denki only threw his head back and howled with laughter.

Miruko grinned, propping her chin on her hand. "I think it's cute! Do you have a pet name for him?"

Silence.

Izuku went pink to the roots of his hair. Katsuki looked like he wanted to dig a hole and bury himself alive.

“It’s Deku, right?” Monoma raised a brow. “Shame. Kacchan is so nice and you’re over here calling him Deku like the ass you are.”

Katsuki didn’t answer. He hunched over his bowl and shoved another spoonful into his mouth.

Aizawa, who had been quietly observing the entire exchange with the amusement of someone witnessing a slow-moving train wreck, narrowed his eyes. He glanced between Izuku and Katsuki closely and noticed the difference in their body language.

“It’s not Deku,” Aizawa said. “Is it?”

Katsuki growled low under his breath. “What I call him is nobody’s fucking business.”

The table cracked open with another wave of laughter. The sound spilled into every corner of the room. Denki was red in the face, clutching his ribs. Sero wiped tears from the corners of his eyes. Even Miruko had to set her drink down, laughing too hard to hold onto it.

Katsuki sat there, pink-cheeked and glowering into his soup like it had personally betrayed him. Beside him, Izuku fidgeted, his own face flushed the same rosy shade.

He hadn’t considered giving Katsuki a nickname would cause such a spectacle. But here they were.

Gradually, everyone eased back into their meals, the laughter softened into little chuckles and quiet teasing under their breath. Izuku tried to bury his face in his sandwich, but the fluttering warmth in his chest betrayed him. Despite the embarrassment, he couldn’t help but smile.

It was different here.

The teasing was light, affectionate, without any of the sharp edges he was used to. This was nothing like Tomura’s family dinners, where the air had always been tense and the conversations careful. Back then, he’d thought those stiff interactions were the best life had to offer because they were better than nothing.

But sitting here, at a table loud with harmony, bumping elbows, and casual chaos, it felt like a real family.

He supposed this is what it was meant to feel like when everyone equally cared for each other.

As they ate, Denki curiously eyed around the cabin.

“So what are we going to do while we’re here?” Denki piped up. “Are we going to sit around for five and a half weeks and do nothing? You didn’t tell us this assignment was going to mean we’re stuck here, Aizawa.”

“I told you to pack for two months,” Aizawa lectured.

Denki groaned and threw his head back. “I thought you were just saying that because Bakugou is unpredictable.”

Miruko huffed. “If you call this situation predictable, I want to know what you consider not.”

“Well, I brought some video games,” Sero offered sheepishly. “I also packed some board games to keep us all occupied.”

“There’s no way in hell I’m playing anything again with firecracker here,” Monoma joked, jutting his chin towards Katsuki. “He’s too weirdly good at games.”

At that, Izuku’s eyes sparked with agreement. He turned to Monoma and nodded quickly. “He is, isn’t he? It’s so strange.”

“Don’t hate the player, hate the game,” Katsuki retorted smugly. He bit into his messy sandwich and smiled fiendishly, earning a couple of disgusted leers at the lack of decorum.

“I actually already planned an itinerary for all of you,” Aizawa interjected. This caused the conversation to halt and all eyes turned towards him. “Well, everyone except Miruko. She’s here because we need extra hands and I need someone sane to talk to.”

“Oh! Exciting!” Denki exclaimed with a wide grin. “What will we be doing? An M-Unit special?”

“Well. After I finish all this paperwork, we’re going to begin to rotate chores, keep your fighting skills sharp, and make sure to go over inventory of guns, bullets, and blades.” Aizawa paused, then smiled slyly. “Oh. And you all will be fixing up my cabin.”

Groans spilled into the air.

Katsuki made a disgusted face. “You’re shitting me.”

“That is child labor,” Sero deadpanned.

“You’re all in your mid twenties,” Aizawa shot back. “And you’re staying here free on my dime. There’s a couple of loose floorboards and someone has to go chop firewood to keep the chimney going. Not to mention there’s a couple of leaky faucets and roof tiles that need re-gluing.”

“Make Bakugou do all of that,” Monoma drawled grumpily. “This is all his fault.”

“Of course your lazy ass would make me do the heavy lifting.” Katsuki shot Monoma a cold glare.

“I can get started on whatever you would like,” Izuku chimed in quietly.

All eyes turned to him.

Everyone, but Katsuki, seemed surprised. Silence weaved through the air. Izuku nervously glanced around, unsure why what he said caused such a stunned reaction. Miruko and Aizawa exchanged secret glances. Aizawa half way smiled.

“You all should be more like Izuku,” Aizawa said with a hint of humor. “Finally, someone with some manners.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Over the rest of the week, they all threw themselves into the long, groaning list of chores needed to fix up the cabins.

All except Miruko, who Izuku learned was Aizawa’s equal. She ran a different sector of The Company and was solely here because Katsuki’s voicemails raise so much alarm they thought it might be an all hands on deck assignment. She kicked her feet up and enjoyed soap operas in front of the fireplace while the rest of them got to work.

Izuku, ever polite, was starting to regret his eagerness to help out. Especially when he found himself prying up a full row of stubborn, splintering floorboards. It took hours. Turns out, he had zero carpentry skills, but he made up for it with sheer stubborn effort.

He managed to finish the floors and even cleaned out the chimney to the best of his ability, soot streaked across his face like war paint. Aizawa gave him a long look afterward, humming thoughtfully before offering a rare, almost-surprised nod.

When Izuku patched the roof solo a day later, Aizawa actually tossed him a validating, “Not bad.”

That said, the others weren’t so lucky.

Aizawa was far less impressed with the rest of the agents—most of whom he had repeatedly caught slacking, hiding, or trying to sneak away with the grace of a raccoon into the kitchen. Eventually, he resigned himself to supervising full-time. He hovered like a hawk with a blanket wrapped around his shoulders and a steaming cup of hot coco in his hands.

“Put your back into it, Sero,” he muttered one morning, passing the kitchen where his nephew was locked in a life-or-death struggle with the leaky sink. Water sprayed everywhere, making Sero flail like a man drowning.

“You could at least help me!” Sero protested, shielding his face from the squirting.

Aizawa took a slow, satisfied sip of his drink. “No,” he said flatly. “I don’t think I will.”

It went on like this, until one day they ran out of wood for the fireplace.

“Bakugou,” Aizawa barked. “Go outside and chop the firewood we’ll need for the upcoming week. There’s a long blizzard coming and we’re not going to have a chance to do it tomorrow.”

“Why do I have to do it?” Katsuki grumbled, heavily annoyed. “Shinsou is just as strong.”

“Shinsou didn’t murder five members of Chisaki Kai’s family,” Aizawa replied bluntly.

Begrudgingly, Katsuki got up.

Izuku gave Aizawa a soft smile, which was returned in Aizawa’s very own way.

He and Katsuki threw on their winter jackets, readying themselves. Izuku still wore the plush, olive green coat Nana had gifted him. Katsuki’s coat was newer, a sleek black goose-down lined with faux grey fur around the hood. Aizawa had bought him the coat when he saw the leather jacket was all Katsuki had on him. Aizawa was also kind enough to buy them both new, winter boots. They were matching, darkly colored and completely waterproof to help shield them from the steep snow on the mountain.

As they exited to the back porch, the cold welcomed them by nipping at their noses.

Katsuki strolled over to the pile of wood sitting on the side of the cabin. He adjusted his gloves before picking up the sharp axe and slugging it over his shoulder. He lugged it along as he grabbed for one chunky piece of wood grumpily.

Izuku took a moment to stare. Katsuki with an axe reeked of an intoxicating type of danger.

His husband caught him and smirked. “You really like checking me out while I’m holding a weapon, huh?”

“A little,” Izuku replied with a blush and a grin. “Sorry. Bad habit at this point.”

Katsuki smiled and leaned in. “Nothin’ bad about it.”

He placed a kiss on the corner of Izuku’s mouth. Quick and soft enough to make Izuku’s stomach flip. With that, they stepped out to the chopping block. Katsuki began to set up and immediately got to work. His shoulders flexed, axe swinging down with clean, practiced force. Each log split with a satisfying crack, the rhythm steady and grounding.

Izuku stood nearby, stacking the chopped firewood in neat, uneven piles. They didn’t talk much. They carried on this rhythm of Katsuki chopping and Izuku stacking, without missing a beat. Katsuki glanced at him every so often with a half smirk.

“You know,” Katsuki muttered after the tenth log split clean in half, “You didn’t have to follow me out here. Aizawa made it clear he’s punishing me for being bullheaded.”

Izuku chuckled, brushing a bit of sawdust off his gloves. “I’m always happy to help you out, Kacchan.”

Katsuki huffed. “You’re too nice sometimes.”

“I can’t help it,” Izuku proclaimed, completely unashamed. “Especially when it comes to you.”

That earned him a sharp look. But Katsuki didn’t argue—simply raised the axe again with a smirk tugging at his lips. Izuku gawked a little longer than necessary, warmth pooling behind his ribs.

After about an hour, the firewood was now piled high. Katsuki chopped more than enough to last the week and then some. He gave a couple more swings for good measure before he stopped completely. With a huff, he wiped his brow with the back of his hand and turned to Izuku, who was placing the last piece of wood on the pile. He rested the axe over his shoulder and leaned all his weight into one hip.

“Y’know. I think you impressed Aizawa this week,” Katsuki praised with a grin.

Izuku paused his stacking. “Really?”

“Yeah.” Katsuki shrugged like it was no big deal, but Izuku saw a tiny glint in his eye. “He gave you a nod and even told you ‘not bad’. It took me years to get that and you got it in less than a month.”

Izuku burst out laughing. “I didn’t realize that was a big deal.”

“Hey,” Katsuki warned, “From the old man? That’s practically a standing ovation.”

Izuku’s chest swelled, breath visible in the cold air. He smiled happily, keening at the validation. He really wanted Aizawa to like him, and he supposed if that meant digging up more floorboards than he would do it for the next month if he had to.

“I’ve been trying to make sure I earn my keep,” Izuku admitted. “Their opinions are important to you, so it’s kind of important to me too. Is that weird? I want them to see that I can be…well adjusted.”

Katsuki didn’t say anything for a moment.

“I think they’re starting to see it,” he reasoned. “Just give it some time, it won’t be fast.”

“Okay,” Izuku replied. He smiled, feeling slightly better.

He barely had time to enjoy the smug smirk spreading across Katsuki’s face when the cabin door creaked open behind them.

“Hope you two are actually chopping wood and not making out,” Monoma called, stepping out and squinting against the sunlight bouncing off the snow. He had a blue scarf looped around his neck and a paper bag under one arm. “It would be a shame if we all froze to death because you two couldn’t pause your lethal domestic bliss for an hour.”

Shinsou followed him, hands stuffed deep in his coat pockets. A neutral scowl was on his lips as his eyes cut to Izuku.

Izuku straightened instinctively.

Katsuki didn’t miss a beat. “You two creeps come out here to supervise?”

Monoma smirked. “Should we?” His eyes flicked between them, and Izuku was suddenly very aware of how close he and Katsuki were standing. “Sounds like you have a guilty conscience.”

“We’re actually heading into town,” Shinsou added, tone clipped. “Blizzard’s coming in hard tomorrow. Gonna stock up on food and other supplies while we can.”

Izuku nodded, and tried to think of a way to be helpful. “Want us to write down anything you might need to get?”

“No,” Shinsou replied without looking at him.

Monoma gave him an unhappy glance. “Ignore his charming personality. We’ve got a list. Just make sure this firewood actually gets inside.”

“Yeah yeah, we got it,” Katsuki huffed, casually readjusting the axe on his shoulder. “You two hurry before the storm blows in.”

“We’ll do our best,” Monoma drawled, beginning to walk away towards the mountain exit. “Go easy on the poor guy, Bakugou.”

Shinsou didn’t bother saying goodbye. However, Izuku caught the brief, mistrustful glance he shot back over his shoulder. Once the two vanished into the trees, Katsuki let out a low snort.

“I give it twenty minutes before they’re arguing about which brand of hot sauce to buy,” he grumbled.

Izuku stifled a laugh, appreciating the joke. But he couldn’t get past the cold look Shinsou gave him before departing. As if Katsuki could practically see his hang up, his husband stepped in front of him and leaned down. He smiled gently in a reassuring way.

“Hey. Ignore Shinsou,” Katsuki advised firmly. “He’s very unwelcoming to newcomers. Hell, he didn’t really warm up to me until the second year we worked together.”

Izuku nodded along. “Do you think it’s because of my background? That I’m too… unpredictable to him?”

“Maybe,” Katsuki sighed. He leaned back up to his full height and paused thoughtfully. “It's probably just him though. His upbringing, wasn’t the best, y’know? It’s hard for him to trust others.”

“What was his upbringing?”

“Him and Monoma grew up in an orphanage together. But out of the two of them, Shinsou was the only one who was there since birth. He bounced around a lot and many of the homes were filled with the worst kind of people. It made him very untrusting because he only saw the ugly side of human nature.”

“But not Monoma?” Izuku questioned.

“Monoma got put in the orphanage older,” Katsuki explained. “Around seven or nine. I can’t remember which. He remembers having parents who loved him before they died in a car crash. And that kind of love sticks with you, even if it’s short-lived. Gives you a little more faith in people, I guess. But don’t let that fool you, Monoma’s not exactly a picnic. That asshole gives me a hard time—he treats me like some sort of barbarian.”

Izuku nodded, appreciating the bit of color that has been added to Shinsou and Monoma.

When the clouds above them blocked out the sun, they both looked up in the sky. There was a thick, dark blanket of grey above them now, spreading out to every inch that the eye could see.

Katsuki sucked at his teeth and motioned with his head back to the door.

“C’mon, let’s hurry and get all the wood inside before it starts coming down.”

ɯɯɯ

Week Two in Winter Paradise

The blizzard came raging, exactly like Aizawa said. It hit the same day their second week in the cabin started.

The windows had vanished beneath a thick veil of white, the overcast was so dense it felt as though the world had been erased beyond the glass.

Outside, the wind howled like restless phantoms. Its voice twisted through the air in long, mournful wails. Each breath the storm took seemed deliberate—an inhale that swelled with quiet menace, followed by an exhale that shuddered through the cabin walls, making the furniture creak and shift. It never jolted hard enough to stir fear, but just enough to remind them it was not safe to step outside.

Izuku tossed another log into the fireplace, nudging it in with the iron poker. Sparks jumped as the flames caught hold, crackling with approval. The fire welcomed the fuel, stretching higher and rewarding the room with warmth.

They were all sitting around the living room watching an old Romeo and Juliet movie. They had gotten to the part where the story culminates tragically with Romeo finding Juliet’s still body. He was grieving over her, holding her in his arms.

As the actors weeped on screen, a couple of sniffles were audible. Everyone’s eyes were glued to the tragedy with a blanket tossed over their bodies. Overall, the cabin ended up being exactly one blanket short, which caused Izuku and Katsuki to share one. Izuku didn’t mind though, and neither did Katsuki.

Izuku wandered back to his place on the couch and Katsuki opened the fuzzy blanket for him.

Instinctively, he curled into Katsuki’s side, letting their legs tangled beneath the thick blanket. Katsuki tugged the edge up over Izuku’s shoulders, then pressed a kiss to his temple without saying a word.

Izuku smiled and slipped his cold fingers beneath Katsuki's hoodie, earning a soft grunt.

"Your fingers are freezing, nerd," Katsuki hissed.

"Sorry," Izuku whispered back, not really sorry at all.

Katsuki rolled his eyes but pulled him closer. He rested his cheek on Izuku's curls, and happily encased his warm palms over Izuku's appendages.

"My god," Monoma uttered, completely astonished. "It's like watching a dog walk on its hind legs."

Izuku and Katsuki both turned to find every single set of eyes glued to them, not the TV. Aizawa had his eyebrow raised, piqued in interest. Miruko was grinning from under her blanket. Monoma, Sero, and Shinsou were all wearing various expressions that ranged from gaping in disbelief and utter disgust.

Heat crept up Izuku's face as he shrank slightly.

"Keep your eyes on the stupid movie," Katsuki barked.

A ripple of snickers passed through the room, but they obeyed. Everyone turned back to the screen with extremely smug expressions. Still red-faced, Katsuki scowled at no one in particular and yanked Izuku even closer.

This was becoming a frequent occurrence.

Over the last week, Izuku learned Katsuki's coworkers were really not used to seeing him act so softly. They practically balked when they had caught them kissing in the kitchen a couple of days ago.

Which to Izuku, was odd. All he had ever known was soft Katsuki. Gruff? Yes. Blunt? Always. Rude? Without ever missing a day. But Katsuki had always been overwhelmingly kind, deep down. No matter how much he tried to hide it, his gentle side seeped out like a light peeking through a dark cloud.

From the other couch, Sero leaned back with a sly grin. "Does he bark for you too, Izuku?"

Izuku's cheeks went deep pink.

Katsuki didn't even blink. "Only when he asks nicely."

Denki choked on his popcorn.

"If you all can't concentrate on the movie, I can give you more chores to do," Aizawa grumbled.

Everyone immediately protested, Izuku included.

They continued to watch the movie, this time in silence.

As the story began to climb to its climax, Izuku's heart clenched like it always did at this part. It was such a shame to him how easily they could have avoided their doomed fate. If only there had been a little more time for Romeo realize Juliet was still alive.

He watched sadly as Romeo pulled the poison vile from his pocket and pressed it to his lips.

ɯɯɯ

For the later half of the week, Aizawa wanted everyone to go through what to do in the worst case scenario.

"We're going to make our exit strategy now," Aizawa forewarned.

It was said with enough foreboding that a chill climbed down Izuku's spine. He wanted to believe they were safe, tucked away in this mountain, but given how far the influence of the Yakuza stretched—they couldn't be too sure.

Aizawa pulled out a map of the northernmost tip of the country. He sprawled it across the table in the reading room and they all gathered around.

Katsuki's frown was sternly deep. Miruko's eyes were laser sharp. And everyone else was sharing glances, as if they were accepting what was to come.

With careful diligence, Aizawa began to pen several asterisks across the map. Each point was hugging the coastline near where Mount Rausu was.

"I have stationed exactly ten speed boats at various docks nearby," Aizawa explained. "If it comes to the point where we need to get the hell out of here, everyone gets to one of these. No matter what. We will rendezvous in Nemuro." He circled the tiny town that was across the bay. "There's a Company headquarters here where we can recuperate."

Everyone nodded, memorizing the tiny address Aizawa wrote down on the paper.

Aizawa then led them to the backside of the cabin, where the living residences were.

Then he opened the room that he placed Katsuki and Izuku in.

He swiftly lifted his leg, dug his foot in the rug, and kicked it backward. The rug folded on itself, revealing a square hatch embedded in the floor. Its metal handle was rusted, old with age and years.

Aizawa crouched down, gripped it, and hauled the latch open with a grunt.

Beneath it was a concrete staircase. It was steep, narrow, and descended into pitch-black stillness.

"This is a secret safe room," Aizawa said, tone tight. "Inside of it is a secret door to a passageway that'll spit you out in the direction of the ski lift. It's an easy out that could potentially buy time to flee to safety."

Everyone nodded, but Izuku wasn't sure he liked the way that was phrased.

Why did Aizawa make it sound like the plan was to leave people behind?

They filed down into the hidden room, feet echoing against the stone steps. The air turned colder the farther they went, and the walls closed in like the ribs of a great, sleeping beast.

When Aizawa flicked the lights on, harsh fluorescent beams sputtered to life. The light revealed a stark, windowless bunker. The grey walls were lined with shelves cluttered in dust-coated rifles, pistols, boxes of ammunition, and blades dulled from time. Behind several crates was the steel door to the outside, and a cold draft wandered in from its direction.

"A lot of these guns are old, and haven't been used in years," Aizawa explained as Denki wiped the grime from the barrel of an old shotgun. "We're going to have to go through each one and make sure they work."

Miruko picked up one of the larger blades. Its edge was jagged, dulled by rust and overuse.

"We'll need to sharpen these too," she said, testing the weight in her hand like she already knew what it was capable of.

Aizawa nodded, his expression unreadable. Then he looked at all of them.

"Grab what you can. Blades. Guns. Whatever still works," He instructed firmly. "We're taking full inventory. No room for half-measures anymore."

The room filled with movement, but the silence under them pulsed. A quiet understanding slipped across everyone as they filled their hands with as much as they could. Izuku watched as Katsuki easily picked up a crate or two and saw Denki carefully try to handle several knives.

Guilt ate at him as he saw them all prepare for the battle that was surely inevitable.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They settled in around the living room and kitchen. Various stations were set up to inspect the guns and count the ammo.

Miruko and Katsuki had found sharpening stones for the blades and Aizawa was carefully inspecting the bullets with the help of Shinsou. Izuku, Denki, and Monoma were gathered around on the couch. They had an assembly line of sorting the guns in piles of 'usable' and 'not'.

Sero was at the end, close to Katsuki, double checking if the guns were actually usable.

Izuku thumbed the chamber of the revolver, letting the last shell tumble into the bowl with a metallic clink. He glanced up, and his eyes caught on his husband.

Across the room, Katsuki was hunched over the table. His sleeves were shoved up, showing how his forearms flexed with every slow, deliberate pull of the blade across the whetstone. The scrape of metal echoed, low and rhythmic, like a threat on loop. His jaw was tight and his lips were pressed together in deep concentration. And his eyes were sharp and predatory, never once lifting from the edge he was crafting.

Izuku bit the inside of his cheek when heat crawled up his neck.

“Sooo…is the sex like…crazy?” Denki whispered, mouthing the last word like it was classified.

Izuku nearly dropped the revolver. He whirled to Denki who was giving him a knowing smirk.

“E-Excuse me?” Izuku squeaked, his voice going up an octave.

“You can be honest with me,” Denki said. He wiggled his eyebrows while sliding in closer to Izuku. “I’m not like the others, I’m super chill. I mean, all that years-long enemies-to-lovers tension? That’s gotta lead to some explosive results. High risk, high reward type of stuff, yeah?”

Izuku’s mouth hung open as blush raced across his nape.

“You scoot any closer to him and I’m coming over there,” Katsuki said from across the room, not even glancing up. The blade in his hand screeched against the stone like a warning.

Denki laughed nervously. “Oof, I forgot Bakugou is the jealous type.”

He put his hands up, hiding with humor how he did fear for his life. He put a healthy distance between him and Izuku and politely went back to doing inventory.

“Question,” Sero piped up casually, clearly enjoying the chaos, “What are your last names? Did you guys choose one of the other’s surnames or did you hyphenate?”

“I bet they hyphenated,” Monoma interjected. He reloaded a gun with a swift gesture and raised a brow at Izuku. “Katsuki seems like the type to insist on equal billing.”

“Our last name is Bakugou,” Katsuki replied, shooting Monoma a glare.

“Did he agree to that?” Sero pointed out while checking the trigger of one gun. “You guys did get married drunk, and I can totally imagine you completely went cave man and claimed him as your bride or something.”

“I, uh, actually really like Bakugou as my surname,” Izuku interjected, a touch shy. “It has a nice ring to it.”

Monoma seemed surprised. “You’re okay with it?”

“Yeah,” Izuku then smiled at Katsuki and the gesture was returned tenfold. “I’m happy to carry it.”

There was a beat of silence, as if Izuku's answer was news.

"Speaking of the big M," Miruko interjected suddenly. She pointed directly at the shabby rings on both of their fingers. "Please don't tell me those are what I think they are."

That got Aizawa's attention.

Up until now, he'd been doing his best to ignore the nonsense unfolding around him. But at the mention of rings, his interest piqued. He leaned over to glance at Katsuki's hand, eyes narrowing. Then, without a word, he stood, crossed the room, and gently took Izuku's left hand in his own.

Everyone watched, perplexed, as Aizawa pulled out a pair of reading glasses from his pocket like this was a scheduled appraisal. Izuku froze under the older man's touch, posture straightening as Aizawa peered in with the scrutiny of a jeweler. The lines on his face deepened with disappointment as he studied the battered ring.

Then his gaze shifted to Katsuki, flat and unimpressed.

"Bakugou, I didn't peg you as cheap," he said, voice low and judgmental. "You proposed to this poor boy with a fake ruby? Even with how much I pay you?"

Katsuki spluttered and his cheeks colored red.

"N-No! I'm not fucking cheap, you know that!" Katsuki hissed.

He stood up, and marched over. Defensively, he snatched Izuku's hand away from Aizawa and clasped it tightly, shielding the tiny ring from more scrutiny.

"And there was no proposal," he snipped. "We got these rings quickly at a street vender in Okinawa to keep up the ruse. We didn't exactly have time to take a stroll through Tiffany & Co."

Shinsou raised an eyebrow. "Not even while you were practically on a honeymoon in Biei?"

"I—" Katsuki started. His embarrassment died down when he looked at Izuku. His eyes saddened slightly, as if his thoughts snagged on a particularly uncomfortable realization. He glanced down at Izuku's rusted ring. "No. We didn't…have time."

Izuku fell quiet too.

It always felt like they were trying to out wit Father Time.

Every step of their journey so far was them desperately trying to carve out space for the two of them. But even with their combined strength, they couldn't stop the hands of time from ticking forward.

Katsuki pursed his lips and grumbled something under his breath. He walked back over to the knife sharpening station and sat down. He began grinding his blade with much more vigor, frustrated.

Sero smiled at him apologetically as he tested the trigger of another gun.

Monoma then leaned into Izuku. He whispered, “When you two get settled in your new identities, make sure he buys you a real ring. Don’t let that bastard off so easily. I know for a fact he has several offshore accounts stacked with money because he’s stingy.”

Just as Izuku was about to ask how Monoma knew that—the deafening sound of a gun shot struck.

Everyone in the room jolted, caught off guard. They all whirled around at the sound of Katsuki’s raw, ear piercing scream.

Izuku’s heart stopped.

Blood was pouring out of Katsuki’s thigh steadily. He howled in pain as he flopped back, grabbed his thigh, and curled on the ground.

“What the fuck, Sero?!” Katsuki roared, voice breaking around the pain. His glare was wild, teeth bared. “You shot me!”

“Oh my god!” Sero yelled, mortified. He dropped the smoking gun in his hands like it was made of coals. “I-I’m so sorry I thought the safety was on—”

“—I just fucking healed up!” Katsuki screamed loudly. He hissed in agonizing pain as he applied pressure to the wound. “Oh you sonofabitch—I’m going to kill you—”

Izuku practically sprinted across the room.

He dropped on his knees to where his husband was. And instantly, he began to apply pressure and cradle him. His hands were shaking as he checked for a shattered bone, praying the bullet hadn’t hit an artery. Izuku’s voice came out with hurried questions, quick and clinical.

“Did it hit the femoral?” Izuku asked hastily. “A-Any numbness?”

“No and no,” Katsuki ground out, each word a growl. His hand began gripping Izuku’s like a vice.

Izuku gripped back as he inspected the wound. “Shit. It’s deep. Did it hit where you were shot before?”

“No.”

Izuku exhaled hard. He didn’t even notice he was holding his breath until it came out shaky.

Then he looked up.

The room had gone silent. Everyone was staring, stunned. Shinsou in particular was gaping hard. It was obvious he was taken back, but he wasn’t the only one. However, the gawking only agitated Izuku this time. This wasn’t the moment for everyone to look at them crazy—Katsuki was hurt.

“Is there a first aid kit here?” Izuku asked Aizawa, ignoring everyone.

“Yeah…” Aizawa replied slowly. “I’ll go get it.”

He turned around and left for the kit. Izuku returned his gaze to his husband and stroked his forehead.

“Are you sure you’re okay?” Izuku asked tenderly.

“I’m fine,” Katsuki grumbled, leaning into the touch. “It’s not the first time one of these imbeciles have shot me.” Katsuki craned his neck to glare at Denki, fierce gaze terrifying down to the bone. “Last time Pikachu shot me in the ass.”

“On accident!” Denki defended quickly. “I was on the field for the first time and got spooked. Bakugou came around the corner looking all grizzly and I thought he was someone from the other side, so I shot.”

Katsuki grumbled at him.

Izuku quietly waited for Aizawa to return. In the meantime, Sero, Katsuki and Denki got into a three way yelling debate that consisted of blaming and deflecting. In the fuss, Izuku stayed focused on making sure the bleeding didn’t get out of control. He patiently kept his hand on the wound, applying pressure until his arm shook while gently brushing Katsuki’s bangs.

As he did this, he missed some of the other looks in the room.

Monoma grew quiet, gazing between the two of them like he had seen a whole new side of Katsuki. Miruko’s lips were pursed to the side and her arms were crossed. She tilted her head in quiet approval while beside her, Shinsou hadn’t moved.

This whole time, Shinsou remained silent.

His eyes were boring into Izuku, like he was a walking contradiction.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They got back to doing inventory once Aizawa returned with the first aid kit. He placed it beside Izuku without a word.

The room was quieter now, heavy with the scent of antiseptic and the distant sound of the wind rumbling. Izuku had laid several towels across the couch, a makeshift barrier to keep blood off the cushions, and Katsuki was stretched out over them. He was tense, pants discarded leaving him only in his boxers and the muscles in his thigh twitched beneath Izuku’s careful hands.

“Ouch,” Katsuki hissed. He jerked back, wincing.

“Sorry, Kacchan,” Izuku muttered. He caressed Katsuki’s thigh lovingly. “I’m trying to be as gentle as possible.”

“It’s okay,” Katsuki grumbled. “Not exactly your fault.”

Katsuki loudly hissed through his teeth as Izuku took the tweezers and carefully worked at the embedded bullet. Every tiny motion was deliberate and measured. Izuku’s hands stayed steady despite the way his throat tightened every time Katsuki winced.

There was a quiet moment where Izuku finally pulled the bullet free, dropping it into a metal bowl with a soft clink. He let out a slow breath, and so did Katsuki. The worst part was over.

He began to suture Katsuki up with delicate care.

“So, is Kacchan strictly between the two of you?” Denki teased. “I would love to call you Kacchan, Bakugou!”

Immediately, Katsuki glowered. He lowered his chin and the shadow from his bangs darkened his eyes.

“Try it and see how fast you lose teeth,” Katsuki hissed.

Denki held his hands up, laughing quietly. “Hey, just asking.”

Izuku shook his head, trying to focus. Gingerly, he threaded the needle through Katsuki’s skin, but he paused once more when his husband jerked in pain.

He took a moment to take the tiny towel by his feet and pat Katsuki’s forehead dry from sweat. His husband’s eyes fluttered shut under the touch, face softening noticeably. Izuku smiled, then handed him the cup of coco he had made for him.

“Is that better?” Izuku asked sweetly.

Katsuki sighed into the mug. “It is.”

“He’s milking it,” Monoma butted in. “He’s only acting like a damn baby to get you to dote on him. On an assignment, I’ve seen him give himself twenty stitches before. Without any numbing, behind a dirty warehouse—and he did it with a fishing line.”

“Shut up,” Katsuki snapped.

He glared across the room at the other blond who shot back an unimpressed look.

“Wait,” Izuku said. He halted and looked at Katsuki sideways. “Is that true?”

Katsuki’s mouth opened. Closed. Then he rolled his eyes and muttered something under his breath.

“Maybe,” he grumbled.

Izuku gaped. “Kacchan, if that’s true then why are you wincing so much? This is barely three stitches.”

Katsuki sighed, lowered the mug, and slowly propped himself up on his elbows. There was a flush to his cheeks, more embarrassed than in pain. And when he finally looked up at Izuku, he fixed him with the most guilty smirk imaginable.

“You’re just so sweet,” Katsuki confessed. “It’s hard to not wanna get an extra taste of it every chance I get.”

Izuku huffed. He playfully punched Katsuki’s shoulder.

“Why do you always have to be such a pain in the ass?” Izuku chuckled.

Katsuki grinned flirtatiously. “But I’m your pain in the ass.”

Izuku blushed, and giddiness bubbled up inside of him. As much as he wanted to be mad, he couldn’t. He leaned in naturally and so did Katsuki. They grew close enough to have their noses brush.

“Hey!” Sero shouted. He placed the gun down on the counter and pointed his finger. “Please, no kissing in front of us again! You guys get way too into it. I still haven’t recovered from walking in on you two macking down in the kitchen. Bakugou sucks face like a goddamn animal.”

“S-Sorry!” Izuku stammered, blushing.

He lurched back and quickly returned to work on the sutures. Katsuki groaned and flopped back on the couch. He put his hands behind his head and his flinching stopped all together when Izuku threaded the needle through this time.

Miruko snorted. “Well at least we haven’t had anymore three a.m. incidences,” she said, stretching her arms out. “Only kissing, thank goodness. I was worried that loud moaning was going to be a daily occurrence with the way Bakugou is all over the sweet little green bean.”

Izuku and Katsuki laughed quietly.

“Yeah,” Katsuki muttered with a cocksure smirk. “I’m keeping myself under control. No worries.”

ɯɯɯ

The truth was, Katsuki wasn’t under control—and neither was Izuku.

Every night as soon as the lights went off, their passion bloomed to life. They had simply found a better, more sound proof way of doing it now. And it involved a hand tightly cupped over Izuku’s mouth and the loud, roaring shower.

Izuku moaned as Katsuki hit his prostate with another thrust from the back.

Water had soaked his hair all the way through as he whimpered underneath his husband’s palm. His limbs were shaky, barely holding him up as they kneeled together on the shower floor. He pushed back as the pace they set picked up and the water from the shower head came pouring down.

Katsuki was grunting in his ear. One hand over his mouth, and the other was possessively wrapped around his waist, holding him still as he fucked him with all his might. Their twin moans were muffled by the sound of the rolling water—and Izuku wondered if everyone thought one of them enjoyed really, really long showers.

Steam clung thick to the walls, and the water pounded steadily. It drowned out everything but the sound of their breathing and the slick rhythm of their bodies colliding. Izuku's cheek pressed to the cool tile, his breath fogging the surface, trembling under the steady weight of Katsuki's body behind him.

He cried out quietly as he arched back, urging his husband on.

"You're so fucking gorgeous," Katsuki groaned into the shell of Izuku's ear, his breath hot and ragged.

He punctuated each word with a deep thrust, and Izuku's arms nearly gave out. Katsuki held him steady with a bruising grip around his waist, dragging him back onto each roll of his hips with expert force.

Izuku's lashes fluttered when warm, ecstasy rolled across his limbs. His mouth opened against the press of Katsuki's hand. He moaned into his palm—desperate and overwhelmed. His back arched, caught in the firestorm of pleasure Katsuki was drawing from him without mercy.

"You like this, huh?" Katsuki rasped. "You like when I shut you up and fuck you?"

Izuku nodded, eyes dazed and half-lidded.

Searing heat swelled in his core as his cock bobbed between his legs. The possessiveness in Katsuki's voice was like a drug. The way his husband spoke through clenched teeth, it was like he was barely holding back. It made the erotic sensation tighter, sharper, and more electric.

Katsuki's rhythm picked up.

His hips snapped forward, relentless now. He pushed deeper, harder, and groaned when Izuku clenched around him. His grip moved to Izuku's jaw, tilting his face back enough so he could see him. He cursed when he caught sight of how blissfully wrecked Izuku was.

"They're all stupid if they thought I could keep my hands off you," Katsuki whispered, breathing hot against Izuku's damp cheek. "I'm always going to make sure my sweet husband is full of cum by the end of the day."

Izuku trembled at the thought. His eyes rolled back and he bit his lip. His whole body trembled under Katsuki's aura, and his fingers slipped down against the tile.

Everything about their love making now was messy and tantalizingly intimate. Katsuki reached around then, fingers wrapping firmly around Izuku's aching length and began stroking in time with his thrusts. He began driving him straight to the edge with no breaks.

Izuku sobbed and three fingers were ungracefully thrusted into his mouth. His soft moan was gagged and saliva coated Katsuki's fingers. His body began to seize up with pleasure as he clamped down even more.

Then with one, two, three direct hits against his sweet spot—Izuku's mind was cut with white noise.

His eyes screwed shut as he came undone. His release painted the tile in front of him. His body went tight, shaking, barely able to stay upright—but Katsuki didn't stop.

His husband grunted low, voice cracking as his rhythm faltered and finally shattered. With a final thrust, Katsuki spilled into him. He brutally buried himself deep and held Izuku close. His lips brushed Izuku's temple as he groaned through his own release. They both panted loudly, and it took a second for Katsuki to remove his fingers.

The only sounds left were the loud shower, their panting, and the soft, wet kiss Katsuki pressed to the back of Izuku's neck.

The water had gone lukewarm and the mist was thinning in the air. Izuku sagged against the cool tile, boneless and trembling, while Katsuki held him up with one arm around his middle. His other hand gently carded through damp curls, slower now, affectionate in a way that was almost jarring after how primal they'd been.

Izuku's lips were swollen and his cheek flushed red where Katsuki's palm had been. His lashes were wet, heavy over his cheeks as he struggled to catch his breath. But he didn't pull away. He never could anyways. He leaned into Katsuki like he always did.

Katsuki kissed the top of his shoulder, grinning against his damp skin.

"You're shaking," he murmured smugly. "Didn't know you were still such a lightweight."

Izuku let out a laugh, still dazed.

"You're such an ass," he breathed, barely able to keep himself upright on his knees.

"Yeah," Katsuki agreed. "But you like it."

Katsuki leaned back, not pulling out, but just enough to look down at Izuku. He stared, letting his gaze roam, taking in every mark he'd left. From this angle, he could see where he and Izuku were still connected and a hungry gleam flickered in his eyes.

Izuku's breath caught high, feeling the cock inside of him swell back to life.

"Kacchan?" He asked quietly. He looked back, eyes half lidded and panting. "Do you want to go another round?"

A wicked grin was tossed his way as his husband pressed forward.

His chest was like a furnace against Izuku's back as he slotted them together, leaving no distance. He ground his hips into Izuku, earning a low, sensitive moan from the both of them.

"Of course I do," Katsuki replied back, tilting Izuku's chin up with two fingers. "Darling, I can go for hours for you."

Izuku's pupils blew wide.

Week Three of Winter Paradise

It was now the third week of their time in the cabin, and Izuku was daring to think they could make it to Nana without a blip. Maybe being this high up in the mountains was so far off the Yakuza's radar that they didn't have a thing to worry about from way up here.

It was nice to think so, honestly.

Izuku was getting used to everyone, and was starting to think he could adjust to a life in this way. Every morning they made breakfast together, and every evening they watched movies or played games.

At some point they all went outside and made snowmen.

Katsuki, of course, had jokes. He made his snowman extra plump in the rear with two round globes on the backside and called it Izuku. Izuku angrily tossed a snowball his way, missed, and then that set off a whole chain of events of them participating in another snow ball fight.

This time, everyone joined in—aiming for Katsuki.

His husband was incensed. He yelled and went on the defensive as he was hunted through the snow restlessly. Loud laughs, sarcastic remarks and joy echoed in the air. Izuku giggled every step of the way, enjoying the chaos that made him feel absolutely normal. He couldn't remember the last time he had this much fun.

They chased Katsuki around the mountain until sunset and then all made snow angels. Even Shinsou had joined in, warming up to Izuku ever so slightly.

Later in the week, Aizawa urged them all to do strength and flexibility training when Sero revealed he pulled a muscle during the snowball fight.

Agility training was light work for Izuku. But it was here everyone could see Sero and Denki were not the best physically out of the group. This revelation made Aizawa suggest sparring matches where they all traded techniques.

They went in twos, mixing, matching and pairing up with each other. However, when it got to him and Katsuki going head to head—it ended up being painfully clear that when put against each other they gridlocked. But not because of skill, but because it was obvious they were each other's weak points. Izuku pulled his kicks, and Katsuki's punches didn't land as accurately.

It made Aizawa drop his head at a point and mutter, "No wonder you never caught him."

They both blushed when everyone laughed at them.

One evening, after dinner and a few lazy rounds of cards by the fire, the cabin gradually quieted.

Laughter faded into yawns, and one by one, the others peeled off to their rooms. Denki was the last to leave, muttering something about Aizawa's training being harder than prison time before disappearing down the hall.

Izuku lingered in the living room, curling his hands around a still-steaming mug of cocoa Katsuki had made for him. Across the room, his husband was silently gathering the mugs and plates from the evening—still full of that twitchy, restless energy even in the calm.

Izuku watched him for a moment, soaking in the domestic bliss they had been afforded.

The quiet clink of ceramic. The way the firelight played along his jaw. The subtle way Katsuki's shoulders finally began to drop.

Without thinking too hard, Izuku got up and wandered over to the window. The frost had crept up the edges of the glass, curling in delicate fractals.

Katsuki came up beside him a few moments later. He hugged Izuku from behind, kissing the top of his head quietly.

Izuku looked out of the frosted window. It was snowing now, as gentle and steady as stardust.

He leaned against the windowpane, pressing close enough for his breath to bloom in soft clouds across the glass. Below, the world lay drowned in white. An endless, unbroken expanse stretched toward the horizon like the hush after a lullaby. Fresh snow had fallen in thick, velvety sheets, blanketing the mountaintop and smoothing out the jagged edges of the town far beneath them.

From this height, the small town looked like nearly nothing. Tiny rooftops blurred into one another, soft and indistinct. Like little whispers of civilization barely peeking through the snowdrift's embrace.

Izuku took a sip of his cocoa. The heat slid down his throat, rich and sweet, radiating in his chest.

The soft padding of slippers on wood announced Aizawa's approach. He didn't say anything at first either, simply joined them there at the glass. The three of them quietly watched the snow build up on the balcony rail, the eaves, and the crooked trees in the distance.

“The real reason I bought this place wasn’t because it was so isolated,” Aizawa suddenly said.

Both Izuku and Katsuki turned, surprised at the sudden admission. From what Izuku could gather within the last three weeks, this was rare. Aizawa didn’t open up and he didn’t really talk about his past.

“Then what for?” Katsuki asked.

“I bought it because my wife liked it here,” Aizawa whispered.

A solemn expression clouded Katsuki’s eyes.

Aizawa shrugged, not taking his gaze off the tiny houses below. “This place used to be a seasonal rental spot. We would come up here all the time during the winter and…relax. I bought the property because I like being reminded of those times.”

“You’re more sentimental than you lead on,” Katsuki replied quietly. “Sounds like it was a nice time.”

“It was.” Aizawa smiled at Katsuki like he was seeing someone else. “The reason she loved it so much was because you could hear the orchestra down in town from on the balcony. Me, her and our son would go outside and listen to the orchestra play for hours.”

“Really?” Izuku asked. “You can hear it from all the way up here?”

“Mhm,” Aizawa hummed. He leaned against the window. “The orchestra here plays their concerts on speakers for the town. The sound waves echo off the mountain side and it carries. It’s a weird miracle of physics.”

They both studied Aizawa who was still looking at the town. He then exhaled deeply, like he was pulling himself out of a distant memory. He tilted his head to the balcony.

“Go on,” Aizawa urged. “Enjoy the view.”

He turned then, leaving them alone.

Izuku’s gaze tethered to Aizawa’s back, watching him walk away around the corner. There was a visible sadness in every step he took. Like his feet were shackled by invisible weights. Izuku frowned apprehensively. He knew that kind of walk. It was the kind of gait one did when there were ghosts heavily sitting on one’s shoulders.

“He’s married?” Izuku whispered.

“Widowed,” Katsuki corrected quietly. “His wife and son were murdered some time ago. He doesn’t talk about it, but that is whose photographs are on the walls around here. It’s a topic none of us ever discuss—and it’s off the table to bring up.”

Hundreds of burning questions came tumbling forward.

Izuku wanted to blurt out each one, but he kept his lips shut out of respect. He didn't want to accidentally pry for more information and cross the line into gossipy territory.

With a tender smile Katsuki began to slide open the balcony door.

He stepped out into the cold, and Izuku followed. It was slightly warmer today, and their sweaters were able to shield against the biting winds well enough. Izuku hugged his mug with both of his hands as they walked all the way out on the balcony. The floorboards creaked with each step as they settled in, leaning over the rail.

Then came the music. It was soft, almost imperceptible at first.

Izuku's lips curved into a smile as the gentle strains of classical music floated through the crisp air. The cello murmured in low, mournful tones. Violins lifted above it, delicate and soaring, like the wind skimming over treetops. And then the flute: a flicker of silver, playful and fleeting. It wove in and out of the harmony, dancing along the edges of the melody with effortless grace.

"Wow," Katsuki exclaimed, scoffing in disbelief. "I can't believe it. You really can hear it."

"It's beautiful."

Izuku hummed, low and content, as the tune continued. Their shoulders pressed together gently, and warmth was politely exchanged. They stayed there, together, listening to the gentle rise and fall of the faint music. Izuku closed his eyes as the wind swept through his hair. He pictured this is how Aizawa must've felt, all those years ago. What lovely moments he and his wife must have shared.

He opened his eyes to find his husband contemplatively gazing down at the ring on his finger. Katsuki pursed his lips as he reached over to trace the small, faux ruby on Izuku's hand.

"They are looking a little rough, aren't they?" Katsuki muttered.

"Trekking through the snow probably didn't help," Izuku added.

"Yeah," Katsuki chuckled. "They look like shit now."

"Well. They weren't meant to last forever. They were only decoy rings for the assignment."

Izuku held his ring up to the light. It caught nicely against the sun and contrasted the snow like a lovely pop of red. He smiled at it, thinking about all the rings had endured.

"I didn't expect for them to gain so much sentimental value," Izuku mused.

Katsuki didn't respond right away. He let silence trickle in as he shifted his gaze up to meet Izuku's.

"Do you have a dream wedding ring?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku was taken aback. He blinked hard in surprise, not expecting such a question.

Blush began to rise from his neck and colored his cheeks a pretty pink. He laughed as he thought back on all the hopeless romantic day dreams he used to have. It all seemed so silly now. Especially given how his only wish was for them to get to safety.

“Ha, I do,” Izuku replied. He scratched his blushing cheek timidly. “Or I did. You know me, hopeless romantic. B-But what my ring looks like and all that doesn’t matter to me anymore. I’m okay with anything as long as you’re my person at the end of the day.”

Katsuki huffed and shook his head. “But if you could have your dream ring what would it be?”

Izuku pressed his lips in a thin, thoughtful line. It didn’t take much for his romantic tendencies to come rushing forward.

Well. Old habits die hard, he supposed.

“I’ve always adored ‘eternity’ wedding bands,” Izuku answered truthfully. “The concept and look of them is very romantic to me. The way they loop endlessly with diamonds, or whichever gemstone, all the way around. It feels like they truly represent love instead of one, big giant rock. Eternity like infinity. The love just…keeps going around and around. Never ending.”

He smiled at his husband, who smiled back at him.

“I would love an eternity wedding band made of rubies,” Izuku whispered.

He paused for a moment, and gazed deep into Katsuki’s eyes. Up close, Izuku could see the different hues that were scattered around. He tilted his head when he gazed at the lovely bit of orange hugging Katsuki’s pupils.

“…And your dream wedding?” Katsuki questioned.

Izuku shrugged.

“Small. Very personal with a few people and the person I love.” He grinned thinking about it. “I’ve always loved the idea of a wedding on the roof of the tallest skyscraper at night. The city and ocean in the background stretching on and on like the eternity bands…Maybe we’re both dressed in tuxedos with hand made flower crowns.”

He could picture it. A perfect sunset wedding on top of the tallest building where the oranges and purples on the sky bled on the glass and reflected all over.

“How about you, Kacchan? Any romantic ideas floating around up in there?”

“I never gave it thought,” Katsuki confessed. “But I think I would like an eternity band too. One made of emeralds preferably.”

Izuku smiled as their hands intertwined. They stared at each other for a gentle, prolonged moment. When there was only silence, the orchestra could be faintly heard in the background.

A new melody began to play.

Then he heard it. Three specific notes from a violin that made his heart stop on the spot.

Izuku paused. So did Katsuki.

In unison, their heads turned to stare over the horizon down at the tiny town below. Izuku strained his hearing when he knew exactly what the song was. But surely, he was mistaken. However when the next few notes came, they chimed together in an unmistakable manner.

The violins mixed with the viola and the tempo winded around like golden thread into the air. It dazzled and shone, captivating both of their attention like it always did.

Immediately, Izuku thought he must've been hallucinating. He thought this as his eyes grew wider and wider. But when Katsuki's eyes stretched in the same manner he knew that the impossible was happening.

His heartbeat sped up at the same time the viola did.

"Is…" Katsuki whispered, barely breathing, "Is that—"

Izuku finished for him, in utter disbelief.

"The Dance Of The Love Birds?"

Chapter End Notes

I hope you guys liked the chapter! :^) Next chapter is a /very/ special chapter and the last Izuku POV chapter for a couple chapters. After that, we'll be flipping back to Katsuki after so long. It made me a bit emotional bc it has been such a ride :')

Thank you so much for reading!! <3 Please let me know what you think below ❤️

Chapter 37: Staccato

Chapter Summary

Staccato (Stylistic Indication) — Separated

Chapter Notes

Helloooo! Ultra early update because I'm in a silly goofy mood and Luna also is. :') Big thank you to her, the LOML, for betaing like always! Without any further delay, please enjoy this very special chapter!

Warnings: Angst and Violence

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 37 — Staccato

.

.

.

It couldn’t be.

But it was.

As clear as the sky above, they were listening to the melody of their childhood.

Note for note it was the same. But now, instead of only the violin, a new instrument was woven in and out to elevate it: the viola. The two strings twirled around each other like lovers.

The violin leapt, tender and yearning. Then the viola grounded it, rich and solemn. Their dialogue was an enchanting yet precarious conversation without words. Much like a dance performed at the edge of a cliff where each step could mean the fall off the deep end further into the abyss of their devotion.

As the melody spun, the world around them faded.

They found themselves transported back to that winter in Tokyo. Together they were once again in front of the statue of the broken angel, smiling. Every low note reminded them how back then, it was both simpler and so much more fragile. And each high note felt like it was drawn directly into their skin.

And then, the song began its slow, inevitable descent. The pitch floated gently to the ground like a feather. And when it landed, so did the final note. The rift faded into silence and neither of them moved, both too stunned even to breathe.

Izuku's eyes stung from how long he had forgotten to blink.

"…Did I hallucinate that?" Katsuki asked, voice hoarse and dry.

"No," Izuku replied, breathless. He blinked rapidly, shook his head and rubbed his eyes.

"Did we fucking hallucinate that?" Katsuki then quickly examined Izuku's mug of cocoa. "Were we slipped shrooms by that damn Denki—"

"—Kacchan, that was real."

Izuku tore his eyes away from the town below to his husband. They stared at each other, completely perplexed.

"How is that possible?" Katsuki whispered.

"Maybe someone else heard the song?" Izuku replied, trying his best to come up with an answer.

"Yeah," Katsuki replied. He nodded slowly. "He could've played it for other people."

Izuku thought maybe that answer was the best. But realistically, it wasn't.

They were with the violinist from start to finish when he was composing that song. Sure, the version the looney man had before their input was similar—but that year they all spent together shaped the song in such a unique way. What they started with was nowhere near what they ended with.

And what they just heard was the exact, final product.

"But you have his violin," Katsuki suddenly said. He glanced wearily at the town below. "You said he gave it to you, right? How could he play this version for other people without his violin?"

Izuku's brows pulled together. "Maybe he bought another?"

"With what money?" Katsuki countered. "He was homeless like I was."

"After you left, I had given him all the money I saved up for us to go to Okinawa."

Katsuki paused, but then so did Izuku.

“But it wasn’t enough to buy another violin,” Izuku whispered, disproving himself.

He whirled around, and tried to think as hard as he could. They both stole one more glance at the town and waited. They waited and waited but no more music came.

When the wind blew a little too hard, Katsuki was the first to move. He pushed away from the railing and walked back inside. Izuku followed him closely and they both wordlessly closed the balcony door and sat on the couch. They didn’t exchange any words, simply stared at the fireplace in total silence.

There was one more, far fetched explanation, which neither of them dared to say out loud.

“How’d you like it?” Aizawa suddenly asked.

They both turned their heads to see Aizawa on the other side of the living room. He was sitting in the large brown reading chair, holding a book. He was smiling at them, oblivious to their confusion.

Izuku blinked while Katsuki cleared his throat and straightened out his back.

“We…” Katsuki started and trailed off. “…We really liked it.”

Aizawa frowned. “Are you sure? You look like you’ve seen a ghost.”

Izuku forced a smile. “We did like it,” he reassured. “It was magical. Thank you for telling us about it.”

At this, Aizawa relaxed and gave a lopsided grin. “I had a feeling you two would enjoy it. It’s a very romantic time. Makes the impossible seem possible.”

“Is there a website or something for the orchestra?” Katsuki quickly asked. “Like can we check out who is scheduled to play or the name of the songs?”

Aizawa shook his head.

“Unfortunately, they’re old school,” he explained. “The town below is pretty rural given its mountain location. You have to go to Will Call to look at the set list and purchase tickets.”

Katsuki frowned. “You mean we would have to go in person?”

“Yes,” Aizawa replied slowly. He squinted at them suspiciously. “Is something the matter?”

“We heard a song we recognized from a long time ago,” Izuku explained. “It’s silly but we knew the homeless street performer who created it. So it’s bizarre to hear it played by a real orchestra.”

At that, Aizawa grew intrigued. “What’s the song?”

They awkwardly shifted on the couch and glimpsed at each other. Izuku started humming first, and then Katsuki followed. Together, off pitch, they tried to mimic the melody to the best of their abilities. They shaped around each other like they were the violin and viola.

“Ah.” Aizawa raised his brows and nodded. “Yeah. I’ve heard that play from the town a couple times the last two years.”

Both Izuku and Katsuki sat up right.

“Really?” Izuku asked, full of wonder.

“Did you ever go see it in person?” Katsuki also asked at the same time.

“No,” Aizawa replied. “It’s a beautiful melody though. The venue down there has a lot of concerts from new Neo-Classical hits. I think they do tours from select composers.”

Izuku and Katsuki shared a look.

“Crazy coincidence though,” Aizawa mused. “That’s very neat that you knew who made the song. Do you know their name?”

“No,” Katsuki answered, slightly in a grumble. “We, uh, never asked.”

Aizawa shook his head. “Rude. Even as a child,” he sighed heavily. “Well. Maybe you’ll get to hear it again before it’s time to go.”

Izuku offered a faint smile, but his mind was already drifting.

Aizawa began lecturing Katsuki on the importance of always asking people’s names. After that, the conversation settled into a quiet lull. They all lingered there a moment longer, listening to the faint hum of the wind outside.

Eventually, Aizawa stood. He stretched with a soft grunt, and muttered something about going to find the other ‘headaches’ wandering around his property to make sure no one died.

After that, they continued about their day. But Izuku’s mind was stuck. It was as if he was caught on a branch of his memory. No matter how much he tugged and pulled, he stayed entangled in the eeriness that occurred.

“Wow,” Katsuki muttered, still astonished after dinner. Then he smiled at Izuku and took his hand. “What a fuckin’ coincidence, right?”

“Yeah,” Izuku agreed with a light laugh. “How crazy.”

They went to bed that night, chalking up the incident as an insane fluke. Katsuki closed his eyes and reeled him in tight. But Izuku stayed awake in his arms. He intently listened for any semblance of a violin again but found nothing.

That night, Izuku stayed awake for hours looking at the frosted window in their room.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The next day slipped by in a quiet shuffle.

Denki and Sero remained their usual bright, chaotic selves. They were constant sparks of humor that helped mask the undercurrent of tension that lingered beneath the surface. Miruko and Aizawa kept things running smoothly, balancing their distinct brands of discipline and force, while Shinsou and Monoma mostly kept to themselves.

Katsuki, meanwhile, rarely left Izuku's side. Neither of them mentioned the melody again, and The Dance of the Love Birds did not return to haunt their ears.

By the second day, Katsuki had managed to push the entire thing aside. He dismissed it as some bizarre blip. One of those strange, meaningless intersections of memory and chance that occasionally stumbled into their lives.

But Izuku couldn't.

The tune looped in his head like a thread he couldn't stop tugging on. His curiosity gnawed at him in a way that made it hard to focus on anything else. It was a familiar kind of obsession. The kind that had followed him his entire life, and no matter how much he tried to ignore it, he simply couldn't let it go.

It was on the third night, as the two of them lay curled in bed beneath the thick comforter, that he finally spoke the thought aloud.

"I think we should go to the orchestra," Izuku whispered, keeping his voice cautious. "Only for a little bit, if only to see who was playing the song."

Katsuki shifted beside him, the mattress dipping slightly as he propped himself up on one elbow. His brows furrowed with concern. Izuku rolled over to face him, meeting his gaze head-on.

"Is it really that important?" Katsuki asked after a moment, voice low. "I get it. I do, but…" He exhaled slowly, eyes heavy with thought. "I don't want to risk setting anything off. We've managed to stay off the radar this long. I'd rather not give the Yakuza another opening."

Izuku's fingers moved absentmindedly against Katsuki's arm, tracing invisible hearts while his thoughts tumbled about.

"I guess it's not that important," Izuku mumbled. "It's just…I don't know why, but I feel like we have to close the loop. Especially if we're not coming back to Japan." He hesitated. Then added, almost to himself, "What if it's the violinist?"

Katsuki grew sad. "I think he might be dead by now, Izuku. He was pretty damn old and frail."

"I know," Izuku replied quietly, his fingers still moving. "But…I guess I want to see who else knows our song."

Katsuki let out a reluctant huff of laughter, shaking his head.

“Our song, huh?” Katsuki parroted lightly.

“Yeah, it’s our song,” Izuku smiled lovingly at his husband who returned the gesture equally. “Is that weird to say? I’ve always thought of that melody as our melody. It feels weird to have it out there and not know who else is playing it.”

Katsuki stared at him for a long moment. Then exhaled a deep, steady breath and laid back down beside him. One hand reached out to brush gently through Izuku’s hair, then traced down along his cheek and neck in one long, thoughtful sweep.

Izuku’s eyes fluttered closed at the touch, and when they reopened, Katsuki was gazing at him like he was a million stars. The fond curve of his lips pushed warmth into Izuku’s heart.

“Okay. You have a point,” Katsuki said. “In the morning, I’ll talk with Aizawa and see if there’s any leeway. If he says it’s safe to go, then we’ll go check it out.”

Izuku’s face lit up with gratitude, and he leaned in without hesitation, beaming.

“Thank you, Kacchan.”

“Anything for you, darling,” Katsuki whispered, soft and sure.

He kissed Izuku’s forehead, and together they sank into the quiet comfort of sleep.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Surprisingly, the next morning over breakfast Aizawa seemed pretty open to their plans about the orchestra.

“We’ve already been down to town a couple of times for supplies,” Aizawa explained, gesturing to Monoma, Shinsou and Miruko. Each one of them shrugged and nodded their heads. “It’s a pretty secluded town. If the Yakuza were searching there, they would have searched up here too by now.”

“I agree,” Shinsou added, much to Izuku’s surprise. “Doesn’t seem to be much down there besides elderly people. It’s pretty closed off.”

Katsuki and Izuku both perked up, sparks of hope igniting in their expressions. Katsuki graced everyone with a rare, softened smile while Izuku grinned like sunlight across his face.

A quiet thrill coiled in Izuku’s stomach, tightening into knots of anticipation. He pictured the violin and viola once more, their voices twinning in that bittersweet harmony, playing their song. He was excited to figure out what was going on down there and if maybe them hearing that song really was a fluke.

“How about we go at the end of the week then?” Katsuki proposed. He now nervously fiddled with his fingers and bit his lip. “I think that would be a perfect time to go.”

Suddenly, Katsuki’s leg began to bounce beneath the table.

It was a restless motion that immediately caught Izuku's attention. It was startlingly rare for Katsuki to show any outward signs of anxiety, and the unprompted fidgeting set off quiet alarms in Izuku's head.

"Why the end of the week?" Aizawa asked, one brow arching as his eyes flicked toward Katsuki's hands. Aizawa, much like Izuku, didn't miss the subtle tension. "It's not like we've got much going on here besides slowly driving each other insane."

Katsuki stiffened. "I, uh, wanted to ask you a favor," he muttered. His gaze shuffled over the others at the table. Color slowly crept across his cheeks as he cleared his throat. He looked distinctly uncomfortable. "Privately. After breakfast."

Denki groaned, dragging out the sound with exaggerated offense.

"Aww, come on, Bakugou," he whined, flashing a toothy grin that bordered on mischievous. "We're all basically family at this point. Whatever it is, spit it out!"

"I said privately, dipshit," Katsuki snapped, voice sharp with embarrassment.

A collective sigh circled the table. Miruko shook her head into her coffee and Monoma rolled his eyes.

Aizawa exhaled and nodded. "Alright. We'll talk after everyone's eaten. Try not to explode in the meantime, Bakugou."

The conversation shifted after that as breakfast carried on. Denki cracked jokes and Miruko poked fun at Monoma's fastidious table manners. But despite the easy atmosphere, Izuku couldn't shake the way Katsuki's thumb kept rubbing slow, anxious circles against his coffee mug. Nor the subtle flicks of his eyes toward him whenever the conversation lulled.

Izuku considered pressing him under the table, maybe nudging his foot as a silent prod, but decided against it. He knew that look on Katsuki's face: it was the one he wore when he had already made up his mind.

So, instead, Izuku sat quietly beside him, finishing the last of his toast.

Everyone eventually trickled out of the kitchen. Their chairs scraped backwards and their footsteps echoed down the hall. Izuku lingered, uncertain whether 'privately' included him or not. Katsuki caught his hesitation and gave him a soft, almost sheepish smile. Then he tipped his chin slightly toward the door in a silent cue.

"That means you too, nerd."

There was his answer.

Izuku sighed through his nose and rose from his seat, casting one last curious glance at his husband.

He didn't like being left out of things, especially when Katsuki was involved. But he didn't push. With a small pout tugging at his lips, he turned on his heel and went to find Denki.

Who, if history was any indication, was probably already neck-deep in some harmless chaos.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later that night, Izuku decided to follow up.

They were alone in their room, and the quietness of the cabin breathed with the wind. Their room was dim, lit only by the soft glow of a bedside lamp. Izuku nestled into Katsuki's side, their legs tangled beneath the blankets.

"What was that all about at breakfast?" Izuku asked, his voice soft and teasing.

Katsuki smirked, that little flicker of teasing lighting up his eyes.

"Nothing you need to worry your darling head about," Katsuki laughed.

Izuku pouted, pulling back enough to meet his gaze. "You're keeping a secret from me?"

For a heartbeat, Katsuki didn't answer. His expression softened and the corners of his mouth twitched.

"Just trust me," Katsuki murmured, voice lower now. "You'll find out soon enough."

"Okay, fine," Izuku huffed. He decided to let it go. "I trust you."

Katsuki's hand found his cheek. The rough palm cradled him with the kindness his husband reserved only for them. Katsuki then leaned in and kissed him slowly. Izuku closed his eyes and melted into his husband.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Third Week in Winter Paradise

By the end of the week, a fresh wave of jitters settled in Izuku's chest.

Katsuki had been acting strange all week. Almost, nervous? Which was very peculiar for his husband.

However, it wasn't only him.

Aizawa and Miruko were also acting odd. The two older agents smiled at him and Miruko frequently ruffled his hair in a more affectionate way. Not only that, Izuku had even caught Monoma weirdly sneaking around. The sarcastic blond was usually not the secretive type. But he made sure to always steer Izuku away from the reading room whenever he wandered up to the second floor.

It was all stacking up to be strange.

He fidgeted while they dressed for the orchestra. Their clothes were simple and warm. Nothing elegant, but Aizawa had assured them no one at the venue would care.

Izuku pulled on a pale-blue sweater, soft against his skin, and some worn jeans. Katsuki chose a deep crimson turtle neck and paired it with black pants. They wrapped scarves around each other's necks in quiet coordination that held playful chuckles. Katsuki lingered as he adjusted Izuku's scarf, making sure to tuck him in tight.

"Don't want you getting sick," Katsuki teased with a small smirk. "Not that I exactly mind taking care of you now, but just in case. Let's keep you safe."

There was a hint of humor in his voice, but Izuku sensed apprehension as well. Maybe it was tension about leaving the cabin. Or maybe it had to do with whatever he'd discussed with Aizawa earlier in the week.

As they headed out, Shinsou, Denki and Sero hung back.

Aizawa instructed them to, just in case someone came knocking in the worst possible way. As a precaution, Aizawa also gave everyone encrypted closed network cellphones that worked within close range. A fancier term for walkie talkie Izuku learned.

They made their journey down the mountain trail, snow crunching under all their feet. Izuku's nerves prickled the whole way. It was a longer journey than he thought. But at the base of the long slope, nestled quietly into the trees, sat the ski lift. It wasn't the chairlift he'd imagined, but a cable car—large, rounded, and painted a muted blue that almost vanished into the winter sky.

Next to it stood the control station. It was a small shack with a lever and a few simple buttons. Aizawa stepped up and flipped the main switch. The lift groaned to life, metal cables creaking. The control station then hummed like it had just woken from a long sleep.

The doors of the cable car yawned open with a hydraulic sigh. Izuku stepped in first, boots clinking softly against the metal floor. Katsuki followed, brushing his hand against Izuku's lower back in a subtle, protective gesture before settling beside him on the bench. Aizawa, Miruko, and Monoma filed in after them, settling across the car.

Miruko whistled low as she looked out through the curved glass. "Damn. This view will never get old."

Aizawa stood near the back, arms folded.

The doors slid shut behind them. And with a low mechanical grunt, the cable car lifted off the platform and drifted into the air. The world was now beneath their feet. Snow-draped trees, narrow winding paths, and the faint silhouette of the cabin above, all grew steadily smaller and smaller as they drifted off.

Izuku pressed a hand to the window, eyes wide with wonder.

The forest stretched endlessly below, an expanse of white pines and leafless branches. The snow was a mix of silver and gold, painted from the soft afternoon light. Beams of sun peeked through the clouds, casting long streaks of light all over the mountainside. And even from up here, Izuku could see a small river. It curled through the valley like a frozen ribbon, glinting in the distance.

“It’s beautiful,” Izuku murmured in utter awe.

A beat of silence passed behind him before Katsuki answered.

“You’re beautiful,” his husband whispered gently and very close.

Izuku turned his head, cheeks dusting with blush. He caught Katsuki watching him instead of looking out of the window like everyone else. Shyness crept in and Izuku awkwardly laughed, rubbing his neck. He glanced at all the other people and saw Miruko smile and avert her gaze while Monoma stifled a laugh and turned his attention to the window.

“You’re being weird, Kacchan,” Izuku replied with a tiny smile.

“Tch.” Katsuki affectionately rolled his eyes. “Can’t I say something nice to my husband without getting accused of being weird?”

“Not when you’ve been acting all mysterious,” Izuku laughed, nudging Katsuki’s knee with his own. “You’ve been quiet since we left the cabin. Not to mention super secretive the last few days.”

Katsuki shrugged. “I think you like when I am all mysterious. I can see you blush.”

“God,” Monoma muttered from his corner, “Do you two have an off switch, or are you in an endless honeymoon stage?”

Miruko grinned and elbowed Monoma. “Hey. Let them have their moment—”

Suddenly, the cable car jolted without warning.

A giant shudder rattled through the floor, followed by a sharp, metallic clank that echoed through the chamber like a warning bell as if something caught. The air snapped taut with gasps and muttered curses. Everyone’s shoulders stiffened, eyes going wide as the whole cart rocked like a deadly pendulum.

Izuku’s breath caught as the car nearly flew sideways, throwing everyone’s weight off balance. His shoulder slammed into Katsuki’s chest as his whole body slid across the seat. He tried to scramble for purchase and quickly Katsuki’s arms wrapped around him as their bodies slid.

“Shit,” Monoma hissed, half-rising from his seat, one hand gripping the railing.

Aizawa didn’t move from where he stood. He swayed expertly with the sudden tilt and his sharp eyes were already sweeping across the windows. Miruko planted a hand against the wall, feet spread, and clenched her jaw tight.

Slowly, the rocking subsided and a loud, metal groan spilled into the air.

Izuku pulled in a breath and straightened, pulse racing in his throat. His eyes flicked to the others, then to the door, then finally up—searching for any sign of failure.

The cable car groaned once more. Then, gradually, it lurched back into motion. It eased on, smooth and unbothered like nothing had happened.

The silence that followed was thick with unease.

Everyone turned to Aizawa, who was the only one who didn't seem alarmed.

"Small snag," Aizawa explained evenly. "Sometimes it catches, but only rarely. The line's old, but still solid."

"And you didn't think to warn any of us?!" Miruko hissed, shaking her head. "You need to get that fixed before it breaks one day!"

Izuku let out a long, shaky breath. He turned his head toward Katsuki who had him tightly in a vice grip. His husband groaned with a long exhale as well and leaned back against the seat. His arms pooled around Izuku's waist as he shook his head.

"What the hell, old man?" Katsuki questioned unhappily. He frowned hard. "That's going to get someone killed."

"You all will be fine," Aizawa curtly grumbled.

Izuku huffed a quiet, nervous laugh, more out of exhaustion than amusement. The cold air that crept in through the cracks of the windows felt sharper now, like the mountain was reminding them exactly how high up they were.

The car continued its descent with a low, mechanical whirl, swaying gently on the line.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they finally arrived at the orchestra, Izuku was captivated by the architecture.

The building rose out of the snow like a glowing ember in the frostbitten landscape. Its wide arched windows shimmered with condensation. A golden light spilled out into the icy afternoon sky like music given form.

Even from the outside, the soft strains of string instruments swirled into the air. Every note was like a gentle hum that wrapped around Izuku's bones and warmed him from the inside out.

Izuku's eyes scanned the crowd. It was small. Mostly made of elderly folks who were all bundled in thick coats and scarves. Their conversations were gentle and curious, like people who were waiting for a joyous ritual to begin.

Izuku tucked closer to Katsuki, whose hand was warm against the small of his back. Their little group of five stood out in the quiet shuffle of anticipation.

As they stepped through the grand double doors, Izuku felt as though they were being swallowed whole into the belly of a beast.

The lobby stretched wide with polished marble floors, a plush red carpet unraveling like a ribbon beckoning them forward. In the center stood a statue of a golden angel.

When they walked close to her, Izuku took a moment to gaze up. Her wings were spread wide in a silent cry of triumph and in her hands was a harp. At her feet were rows of white roses laid out like a halo.

“It’s gorgeous here,” Miruko said, awe-struck.

“They do a good job at up-keep,” Aizawa agreed.

Izuku kept staring at the angel. He studied how her face was serene and blissful.

They each bought their tickets at the old-fashioned booth that was lined in brass. The ticket itself was a simple white with black ink, but Izuku couldn’t help but study it. In particular, he couldn’t help but memorize the name on the ticket.

“Fated Strings: The Twin Stars Concert Series”

Composer: Souta, Amane

Izuku’s inner child hoped this was who he thought it was.

They all filed into the auditorium for the show.

The room was breathtaking. Rows upon rows of red velvet seats stretched out in perfect symmetry in front of them. Every seat was trimmed with gold that shimmered under the delicate overhead lights. The stage was small, intimate. It was wooden and bare except for two simple chairs placed at its center, angled toward one another like old friends preparing to talk.

Izuku and Katsuki took their seats in the front row alongside Aizawa, Miruko, and Monoma. Everyone around them hummed with gentle excitement.

“They say the composer rose to fame only recently,” Izuku overheard an older woman whisper behind them. “Unusual for someone our age to break through now.”

“Definitely,” another replied. “But his music—it speaks like it’s been waiting to be heard all his life.”

Izuku glanced at Katsuki, who looked equally intrigued. Without a word, Katsuki reached out and laced their fingers together.

Then the lights began to dim.

The hum of voices faded into silence. The air thickened, charged with quiet anticipation. And in that final moment before the performance began, Katsuki looked at him like he was the only thing that mattered in the world.

Izuku smiled. He squeezed Katsuki's hand, heart full.

Then, the audience clapped loudly when a small woman walked out on stage. She had skin similar to Miruko's and big, brown eyes. Her hair was neatly pulled back into a bun with thick black glasses perched on her nose. She straightened out her blazer as she gestured warmly out to the crowd in front of her.

"Hello everyone!" She announced. Her voice boomed off every corner of the room. "I welcome you to the final act! Thank you all so much for sticking around. We have saved the very best performance for you. He is a new composer on the scene and his masterpiece has been sweeping the country. You all know him, Souta Amane."

She took a step back and bowed low. "Please, give him a warm welcome!"

She walked off and two new women walked on. Both were stoic, and a regal air radiated off of them. They were dressed in classic all black ballroom gowns, and were holding the violin and viola respectively. They each took a seat and faced each other, painted in nothing but professionalism. A small smile slipped on their lips.

Then, out walked the one person Izuku never thought he'd see again.

Both Izuku and Katsuki stopped breathing. Their hands tightened.

"Hello music lovers," Souta greeted.

Everyone roared, clapping and cheering.

Izuku couldn't believe it.

His face was the same. His pose was too. Even his voice was laced with that comforting, mischief and magic. However, his body was visibly thinner. He was now older, walking with a limp, but donned in fresh, clean clothes. The hunch in his back was steeper and his wild white hair was neatly combed into a bun for the first time.

He smiled delicately at everyone with stars dancing across his eyes.

"I want to personally thank you all for coming out tonight," Souta spoke. He grinned gratefully at everyone, his eyes never lingering too long in one place. "I know many of you have traveled far to come hear my humble concert pieces. And for that I am more than thankful. I have composed a lovely hour-long session for you, about two twin stars falling from the sky in tandem. It's a love story, at its core. But it is also my vehicle to express my calling. And all I have ever wanted was to share my calling with the world."

He took a large gulp of breath and straightened his back the best he could.

“My calling is that I want to create something beautiful,” Souta repeated those same words he uttered to them years ago. “Something that would never leave someone. I want it to imprint on their hearts and in their minds so whenever they hear this melody, they will remember where they were when they first heard it. They will smile, look towards the one they love and be reminded of all the gorgeous reasons to live.”

Izuku shakily exhaled, feeling like he was in a dream.

“Without further delay,” Souta mused with his charming smile. “Let us get started with the opening number.”

He turned with quiet authority, spine straight as a taut bow. With a measured breath, he lifted his baton. The violinist and violist raised their instruments in tandem.

Then the song began.

The Dance of The Love Birds wove in and out of Izuku’s ears, humming and leaving goosebumps along his skin. The music elegantly flowed, like a gentle river of memory. Without warning, Izuku was suddenly carried through his life by the song.

He saw the beginning, tragic and grey. Sterile halls with no warmth surrounded him as he struggled to survive. It continued like this, fully black and white with no color as the tempo picked up. The viola danced low to the ground while the violin flew above as all of Izuku’s childhood fell before his eyes.

Then—a pop of color.

Blond. Red.

He saw Katsuki, small and scowling. He was standing across the street from him, both of them drawn like moths to the same street violinist’s melody—this melody. It played in the distance of that memory like fate itself humming beneath the snow. Izuku watched as the color bled into the greyscale world. It was slow at first. Then it came crashing in all at once, until Katsuki shone like fire in the night.

The music surged upward with the violin’s rise, light and bright. Izuku saw them again beneath the shattered wings of the stone angel. He saw the two of them dancing in the beams of stained glass that poured through broken cathedral windows.

Then soon the tempo slowed and he was flung forward. He was older now, alone but searching. Grey was all around him again. The little color he did see was only a figment of his imagination. He was wandering through life lined with ghosts, clinging to flickers of red and blond that passed by.

Then the music popped, loudly. The violin and viola joined together in a way that caused Izuku’s memories to flood with hues—it filled with Katsuki.

Katsuki was older now, stubborn and golden. He stepped back into his life like he’d never left. He saw their years together unfold—two people orbiting each other like twin melodies, always on the verge of melting together. Their bodies moved as one like staves on a page, looping in harmony.

Fighting. Finding. Forgiving.

Then more saturation spilled into his heart as he saw them kiss. He saw them finally collide and suddenly the whole world was painted in large, vivid strokes of chroma that Izuku never thought was possible.

That's when it clicked: all the color in his life was Katsuki.

He turned to the man beside him at that moment.

His husband was in a trance. His hand covered his mouth as he watched the performance on stage with glassy eyes. When a tear fell from Katsuki, Izuku saw it plainly. All the gorgeous reasons to live—not simply survive.

Katsuki had given him purpose to push on—to feel something so utterly soul consuming that he had no choice but to be reminded he was human. He had no choice but to be reminded that he wasn't solely an empty husk.

But rather, he was a person who deserved to experience life so beautiful it would make him cry. It would make him smile. It would make him angry, sad, happy and a mix of all the emotions he was always told to beat down in his body.

Katsuki truly had reminded him to live.

Izuku lost himself to the rest of the concert, drowned underneath the sound of the strings.

ᔓᔓᔓ

By the end of the hour concert, Izuku and Katsuki were moved to silence. There were no words that could describe the pure feeling that danced along their skin.

The melodies of the songs they heard, beginning with the one that started it all, made them feel like they were born again. Cleansed in the magic of the music along with everyone else in the audience.

It wasn't until the thunderous applause swelled around them that they were pulled out of their spell. They rose with the rest of the crowd, clapping in unison. Their movements were slow, weighed down by sheer astonishment.

Izuku cried softly, smiling the whole time.

The man who had once been a rambling violinist of their past had fully transformed into a master of emotion. Izuku's chest ached with pride and the bittersweet taste of a long lost childhood pushed to the edge of his tongue.

In the past, he had found the violinist to cross his mind. A lot. The man was the first person Izuku had made contact with on the outside. He showed Izuku that his hands were capable of doing something other than killing when he was eight, and he was the first person besides Katsuki to teach him about the concept of kindness.

So to see him now, fully back on his feet, felt like a long lost wish come true.

Souta smiled wide beneath the lights as roses rained down from the balconies. Izuku wished he'd thought to bring some. In their place, he cheered until his throat hurt and clapped until his palms stung. Together, the violinist, the violist and Souta all bowed. They waved and smiled until the crimson curtains dropped.

When Izuku turned, he found his husband's eyes were rimmed red. A single trail of tears poured freely down his cheek in a delicate, shimmering line. Katsuki let out a shaky laugh as he wiped his tears away with the heel of his hand.

He glanced at Izuku and smiled, full and unguarded.

"That was the best thing I've ever fucking seen," Katsuki said through a cracked voice, half-laughing, half-crying.

Izuku let out a choked laugh of his own. "Yeah," he breathed, wiping at his cheeks uselessly.

Katsuki reached out and brushed the lingering wetness away with a trembling thumb. They stood there for a moment, grinning like fools, bathed in the golden light of the theater.

Then Katsuki's brows pulled together, eyes flicking toward the curtain.

"We have to go find him," he said urgently.

Izuku agreed and they clasped hands.

Quickly, they turned and began to explain everything to the rest of the group. They urged how important it was they found the composer, lightly mentioning how it was related to their year in Tokyo. Aizawa, Miruko and Monoma seemingly agreed.

The five of them quickly walked out into the crowd. Izuku led them along, pushing through the crowd as gently as possible.

When they breached the lobby, the old violinist was easy to spot.

He stood in front of the statue of the golden angel, surrounded by a small group of elderly women. All of them were laughing and fawning over him with bundles of roses as he bashfully swayed on his heels.

Izuku and Katsuki exchanged wide-eyed glances, their grips tightened. They waited, patient and quiet, until the group began to peel away.

Finally, Souta turned to them with the same warm eyes that had followed them all their lives.

“Hello there!” Souta said brightly. “Did you enjoy the show?”

“We did,” Katsuki replied, his voice a little too stiff at first. He nodded, almost conservatively. Very unlike the man he usually was, and so much like the boy he used to be. “We more than enjoyed it, actually.”

“We—” Izuku began, then faltered. He cleared his throat and tried again. “We wanted to ask you something. If that’s alright.”

“Of course,” Souta replied warmly. “Ask me anything.”

They both shifted awkwardly.

Their silence stretched just a little too long, the nerves tripping them up in tandem.

Somewhere behind them, Aizawa let out a barely audible sigh, and Izuku winced inwardly. He hadn’t felt like a kid in a long time. And right now, he felt like they were both those vulnerable, innocent boys that found each other at the edge of the world.

“I’m Katsuki,” his husband said finally, his voice steadier now. “And this is Izuku. We used to hang around you a lot. In San’ya, Tokyo. About eighteen years ago?”

Souta’s smile faltered. His brows drew together slowly. Izuku held his breath as he watched realization unfurl across the man’s face. His eyes darted all over. To their hair, eyes, then finally their intertwined hands.

“We were there,” Katsuki added quietly, “When you first started refining your opening song.”

Souta gasped. His hands lifted instinctively, hovering in the air like they weren’t sure what to do. Then his whole face lit up with wonder—bright and full of memory.

“Oh my goodness,” he whispered. “It’s you! My little ones!”

His eyes danced between them, widening even further. Then he blinked, took in their adult frames, and laughed softly.

“Or—well, not so little anymore. Either of you,” Souta laughed with a delicate grin.

Izuku chuckled through the knot in his throat, even as tears pushed forward in his eyes again.

“This is incredible,” Souta breathed, clasping his hands together. He stepped closer to them and joy, appreciation and admiration all sewed together at once. He opened his arms then, without hesitation, beckoning. “Well? What are you standing there for? Come give me a hug!”

Izuku and Katsuki stepped forward at the same time, unable to stop the wide, tearful smiles on their faces.

Souta pulled them both into his bony arms with surprising strength. Izuku sank into the embrace, arms wrapping tightly around the man who had unknowingly stitched both music and Katsuki into the seams of his life.

Izuku choked back a happy sob as he held on tighter.

Souta then pulled back and took a good look at them both. He nodded in approval, grinning with his crooked teeth this time. He was still missing a few, but now they seemed well taken care of.

“I can’t believe this,” he whispered. His eyes dropped to their intertwined hands once more and a proud smile graced his lips. “You’ve been reunited. All my life I thought you two were separated for good after you left. But you’re here. Together!”

Katsuki wiped his tears off his face. He shook his head and dryly laughed, “What are the chances, huh?”

Souta tutted his finger. “There’s no such thing as chances, little one. It’s always fate.”

Fate.

Izuku frailly smiled at that.

“I’m so happy to see you’re doing well,” Izuku said softly, stepping back as their embrace loosened. “I thought about you a lot, after everything. I was worried something bad happened to you.”

Souta’s face warmed with affection. “I was able to get my life together again because of you both,” he said. “When you stopped coming around, it was hard. I didn’t realize how much I relied on the two of you. Your presence, your ears, and your belief in me was like medicine. You two helped me process the grief of my wife’s passing.” He exhaled shakily. “You were the best audience I have ever—no. You are the best audience I will ever have.”

He looked at Izuku then. A deeply grateful expression shined through his brown eyes.

“And that money you gave me?” He said. “I used it to get a tiny hotel to live in, something stable. That gave me time to breathe, and get on my feet again.”

“I’m glad it helped,” Izuku said gracefully.

“There aren’t enough ‘thank yous’ in the world for it,” Souta replied, shaking his head. “I decided then to get myself cleaned up. I wanted to try my hardest to play my music for a crowd again since the song was now perfect. I also secretly hoped if I played my song, you two would be reunited by it again one day. Exactly like you were the first time.”

“You were right,” Katsuki chuckled. “We were, in a roundabout way.”

Izuku smiled. “Adding in the viola was a perfect touch. I always assumed that song was a solo.”

Souta’s eyes twinkled with playfulness. “It was always a duet,” he said, winking between them. “It was never meant to be played alone.”

Izuku and Katsuki exchanged smiles.

“Enough about me!” Souta sparked with life. He clapped his hands together and tugged them to his chest. “Tell me, how have the two of you been?”

Katsuki shrugged. “We’ve—We’ve been great.”

“Yeah,” Izuku agreed. He laughed, because clearly that was not the truth with their situation. But right here and now, in the moment, they were.

Souta beamed. He turned eagerly to Katsuki, eyes gleaming. “Please tell me you grew up to be a composer!” he exclaimed. “Your ear for harmony and timing—it’s like listening to a clockmaker fine-tuning the gears of a symphony. I couldn’t have pulled off that piece without you.”

Then he turned to Izuku, warmth deepening in his voice. “And you! I’ve never seen anyone take to the violin the way you did that year. You played like someone who’d stumbled upon a buried part of his soul and was aching to let it sing! Surely, you both stayed in music?”

Izuku grew sad for a second.

But then Katsuki wrapped an arm around him and lovingly squeezed his shoulder.

“We’re working on it,” Katsuki replied. “We’re actually leaving Japan soon for a, uh, fresh start. You could say. But we’re both really damn happy we got the chance to see you again before we headed out.”

Souta perked up. “You’re leaving together?” He glanced between them. “Like you meant to before?”

“Yeah,” Katsuki replied. He looked at Izuku like he was the answer to all his worries. “We are.”

Katsuki’s smile then faded. It bled into that soft apprehension Izuku had been noticing all week. The longer his husband’s eyes stayed fixed on him, the more the nervous bundles inside of him grew.

“Actually,” Katsuki said softly. He shifted his stance, squaring his body towards Izuku fully, like he was bracing for impact. “There was something I wanted to do tonight. I was going to wait until later but—I can’t think of a better time than to do it now.”

His arm slowly slipped from Izuku, breaking their hold with deliberate care. He cleared his throat.

Izuku’s brow pinched, unease churned in his stomach. “Kacchan?”

Katsuki took a step back. His movements were taut with purpose and his jaw was clenched. There was a look in his eyes that Izuku identified as Katsuki’s bullish resolve. Then, Katsuki’s hand went to his coat pocket. The crowd behind them blurred into silence, their motion slowing like a dream as Katsuki willfully dropped to one knee.

Izuku froze. His lungs locked.

The moment unfolded in total clarity. The soft scuff of Katsuki's knee meeting the marble tile. The flick of the velvet box opening in his hand. The warm glow of the chandelier catching on the eternity wedding band that was studded with rubies all the way around.

"Bakugou Izuku," Katsuki said, his voice cracked around the edges but was steady at its core. He pushed the ring up and fastened Izuku's gaze. "Will you marry me?"

For a moment, Izuku could only blink. His mouth parted in disbelief. His vision swam, and his heart swelled with a chaotic rush of affection, terror, joy, and surprise.

"Wh-What—" Izuku stammered, heart careening wildly in his chest. "We're already married —"

"—Marry me again," Katsuki insisted. His grip on the ring box tightened, his voice went hoarse. "Sober this time."

His eyes were intense, set on getting an answer. They were burning bright with that unique, Katsuki intensity. And behind all that fire, there was an ache. It was a gash on Katsuki's heart, laid bare and wide open for everyone around them to see. Ruthless, guarded Katsuki had torn himself open just to make space for this moment.

Izuku's chest broke wide.

He sank to his knees without realizing it, overcome by a force too large to be described with words. A sob caught in his throat as he nodded with frantic urgency.

"Yes," he choked out. "Yes, of course, I'll marry you again."

Izuku couldn't stop laughing through his tears. Katsuki joined him, both grinning like damned, lovesick fools. Katsuki took Izuku's hand. He carefully removed the rusted, fake ring and tucked it away in Izuku's pocket.

Then, with teeth bared in triumph and love, he slipped on the new wedding band.

It fit perfectly.

Suddenly, applause erupted around them, breaking the bubble they were in. The blurry background came back into focus and Izuku frantically looked up to see Miruko whistling and clapping like a madwoman, Aizawa was folding his arms with a satisfied nod, and Monoma rolled his eyes but was smiling despite himself.

Other guests joined in, voices lifting like the rise of a tide. Everyone's cheers echoed through the small lobby.

Souta was now also in tears, clapping his frail hands. He grinned with all his crooked teeth, laughing exactly the way he used to.

"My little ones," Souta whispered. "My fated little ones."

Then Souta bent down for the violin case that was at his feet. He opened the case with a swift click, and reached for his brand new, bright white violin. He elegantly held it up, poised and ready with the bow.

The three of them all exchanged looks, and Izuku truly felt like he was in a fairytale at that moment.

“Let me offer you a dance,” Souta volunteered. “To celebrate your real marriage.”

Without a word, he began to play. It was their song again, The Dance of The Love Birds, spinning around with the magic Souta used to play eighteen years ago.

Katsuki pulled Izuku gently to his feet.

Izuku followed, dazed, and they moved together. Laughter spilled into the air as they bumped together awkwardly at first. Then slowly, like always, they found their rhythm. Their push and pull. Their chase and follow. They stepped and twirled.

They swayed as the song wrapped around them with gentle nostalgia this time, binding them together under the golden angel. They held eye contact the whole time, the world allowing them to spin.

And when the music ended, the applause quieted into a hush of soft murmur of stifled sniffles and congratulatory whistles. Izuku gazed at his husband, and for once, the stars felt aligned in all the right places.

Katsuki pulled him in for a fierce embrace.

Izuku buried his face against Katsuki’s shoulder and held on with every ounce of strength he had. His chest trembled with the weight of love too big to speak aloud.

His husband’s breath tickled his ear.

“Sorry for the ambush,” he said. “I wanted it to be a surprise. Y’know, romantic and all.”

Izuku smiled against Katsuki’s beating heart. “It was. Well done.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they arrived back at the cabin, Izuku was greeted with a surprise ‘Engagement’ party. Turns out, all the sneaking around and secrecy was all done to keep Katsuki’s efforts hidden.

Confetti rained down from a crude paper banner that read “Engaygement!” in bold, hand drawn rainbow bubble letters. Shinsou stood just behind the couch, holding the end of a party popper, stoic but clearly present. Denki was waving a self-made pride flag and jumping in place like a kid on a sugar high. All while Sero was already pouring champagne into mismatched glasses from the kitchen island.

Izuku couldn't stop himself from grinning from ear to ear. Everyone in the cabin gave them a pat on the shoulder and some embraced Izuku for a hug. Shinsou kept his distance but still offered a half hearted smile when he saw how happy the two of them were.

Awaiting them in the party was a secondary velvet box. Izuku opened it and inside was a matching eternity wedding band—full of emeralds.

Katsuki humbly pulled off his old, fake ring and held up his left hand.

"Well," he said with a smirk. "What are you waiting for, darling?"

Izuku grinned and slid the ring onto his husband's finger. His heart skipped a beat as their matching bands glimmered together underneath the cozy light of the cabin.

Miruko then cleared her voice and tapped a fork against her glass of champagne.

"A toast!" Miruko yelled. "To Katsuki and his darling," she teased. Everyone grinned, amused and both Izuku and Katsuki blushed deep red. "But more importantly, to their future new life!"

Everyone gathered around the kitchen table and raised their glasses. Each one of them caught gazes, warm and content.

"To round two, but make it consensual!" Monoma added, smug and loud.

"To love!" Denki said with a mock-sappy expression.

"To a real ring," Sero deadpanned, earning a laugh from the group.

Izuku raised his glass, hand trembling slightly, and grinned so wide it made his cheeks ache.

"To all of you. I don't…I don't have any words," Izuku whispered. His throat tightened again and his heart began beating erratically. "Thank you all. For being so kind. I didn't know it was possible to feel happy like this and I'm just thankful you're all are, er, tolerating me being here and willing to take me on as a client."

The looks from the other agents grew empathetic.

"We're not simply tolerating you, Izuku," Aizawa retorted. He patted his shoulder and Izuku felt tears of warmth well up in his eyes again for the hundredth time today. "We're happy you're here. And we're happy we can do something to help you and this hot-head get a second shot."

Everyone hummed in agreement and Shinsou even seemed to sway.

"C'mon!" Denki laughed cheerily. "Let's get this party started. I want this to be a night none of us will forget! That way when you guys go off grid, you'll miss us."

Denki pouted playfully and Katsuki scoffed, but smiled regardless.

The night continued on with a kind of joy Izuku had never known. It was a deep, rich elation that soaked through to the bone. It was the kind of bliss that made him feel almost winded, like laughter had replaced his need for oxygen.

Every time he thought the celebration might slow, someone would shout out a new toast, or a new song would blast from the old radio, or another bottle of champagne would snap open with a triumphant pop.

Izuku laughed so hard his ribs started to ache.

His face flushed candy pink from the drinks. He tried to decline a couple, but Monoma handed them to him with no room for argument. Sero, Denki, and Miruko began dancing. The trio shouted and hugged Izuku too tightly. Izuku nearly squealed when one particular hug from Miruko lifted him clean off the ground.

Then half way through, Aizawa brought out a cake. It was a simple, vanilla flavor with pink frosting. The only decoration on the top were two poorly drawn rings in gold.

Half way through the night, Katsuki went and grabbed the disposable camera they had picked up on their road trip.

“Take a picture of us,” he asked Sero with his face flushed from alcohol. “Don’t make it look bad either!”

Sero laughed and captured a couple photos the best he could.

In each photo, Katsuki and Izuku were tightly hugging each other. They proudly held up their new, matching wedding bands. There was soft laughter in the background when Katsuki grinned and swayed. The shimmering look of bliss on his face was so strong that it made everyone in the room emotional.

Through his drunken haze, Izuku could have sworn he saw Aizawa quickly wipe a tear away from his eye.

When they finished taking pictures, Katsuki turned to him with half lidded eyes.

“You’re all mine now, darling,” his husband said with a lopsided grin.

Izuku giggled back. “I’m going to do my best to make you happy, Kacchan.”

“You already do.”

They smiled and rested their foreheads together.

Denki and Sero clapped then forced them to toast again to their sweet moment.

Eventually, Izuku was beginning to sweat through his sweater. But truthfully, he didn’t care. The air was thick with the smell of cake, pine logs, and the scent of whatever body spray Denki had practically bathed in. Someone had opened the balcony doors at one point to let in the cold air, and it barely made a dent in the growing heat.

The warmth in the room wasn't strictly from the fireplace though. It came from the small group of people packed inside. It was the collection of friendship and found family. Everyone was celebrating the bonds built over late nights, bruised knuckles, and silent trust that ran far deeper than words.

At some point in the night, Sero challenged Monoma to a drinking contest and lost—then challenged him again out of pride and lost again.

Everyone was howling with laughter as Shinsou rolled his eyes and refilled their glasses anyway. Denki tried to freestyle rap to a slow piano ballad and got booed good-naturedly by everyone except Sero, who beatboxed with a wine bottle against his leg in undying support.

Shinsou refused to participate in any dancing until Miruko yanked him into a group number with the rest of them. And even then, his grumpy two-step was enough to get a full standing ovation.

Izuku found himself spun around the rug in dizzying circles when Sero grabbed his hand and dragged him into the middle of the room. They moved like idiots to a cheesy pop remix Aizawa had thrown on. He tried to keep up, but was too fast and off-beat. The both of them tripped over their own feet, but really none of it mattered.

Izuku's chest ached from smiling.

His breath came out in gasps between bouts of laughter.

Katsuki joined in only once, grumbling that he hated dancing in front of people—which Izuku called out as a flat out lie. He grabbed his husband's wrist and yanked him towards the bustling living room. They stomped together through the mess of it until they were both breathless. Katsuki's hands found a home on his waist to steady them as they laughed like kids, drunk on the sheer ridiculousness of their love.

After several more hours of drinks, board games that Katsuki dominated for some reason, and blissful company, the party began to ebb. The energy mellowed out and people began settling into the couches, chairs, and even the floor. In everyone's hands were plates of cake or half-filled drinks. The music softened into background melodies.

Izuku found himself curled beside Katsuki on one of the large couches.

His husband's hand was idly tracing the bones of his knuckles. Every now and then he'd glance down at their new rings and grin hazily.

"I like these much better," Katsuki said with a slight slur.

"Me too," Izuku chuckled back. "How did you get them so fast? It hasn't even been a week since you asked."

"I badgered Aizawa," Katsuki admitted. "He told me there was a jeweler down in town that could push out a quick, custom order. After that, I wire transferred him the cash safely from one of my offshore accounts."

“I’ll have to thank him later.” Izuku’s cheeks were hurting from smiling. “He saved us from having to scrub green off our skin every night.”

Katsuki laughed and leaned his head back. He closed his eyes, and began to softly listen to the calm sound of the comforting silence around them.

Izuku took a look around. It was surreal, how everything felt both loud and peaceful.

The others still chatted around them, voices rising and falling. Sero was snoring somewhere on the carpet with his arm thrown over Denki’s stomach. Miruko had her feet propped on the coffee table, poking Shinsou in the ribs every time he looked like he might fall asleep sitting up. Monoma had kicked off his shoes and was reading the back of a champagne bottle aloud like it was Shakespeare.

Izuku leaned his head on Katsuki’s shoulder and let out a long, slow breath.

“Your friends are so nice,” he murmured. “I don’t want this to end.”

“It doesn’t have to,” Katsuki replied. “We can invite these idiots to our wedding once we get settled in. The second we’re in the clear we’re going to have a nice, quiet ceremony exactly like you wanted.” He paused then scoffed with a smirk. “Well. Maybe, not so damn quiet with this lot. But it’s hard to get rid of migraines. They’ll be around.”

Izuku shut his eyes and nodded, swallowing past the lump in his throat.

It was here he realized this party wasn’t only about them or the proposal.

This was a send off, in the best of ways.

He looked around the room once more, eyes misting as he soaked in the sleepy mess of his new acquaintances.

Aizawa was beginning to pour out half drank glasses and rinse some of the dishes off. Their gazes met for a moment and he nodded with a gentle smile at Izuku. Izuku smiled back, and he leaned in further to his husband. He decided he really liked this group. This loud, ridiculous, painfully loyal crowd who had all somehow conspired with Katsuki to make this night unforgettable.

Izuku took another look at his new wedding band.

When he held it up, his breath caught somewhere between his lungs and his throat. It was like his body couldn’t quite keep up with the awe sprouting inside him. He turned his hand slightly, watching how the light caught the rubies.

He couldn’t believe it—yet there it was. For the first time, it all actually felt real.

A life with Katsuki, his Kacchan, was no longer a fleeting dream he clung to in the quiet hours.

All his life, a future with Katsuki had felt like smoke, impossible to grasp. A fleeting concept that he had indulged in every stage in his wretched life—but it was never real.

As children, playing husbands in that crumbling church, it was only pretend. When they dreamed of running away, the promise slipped by. Even in the years Katsuki served as a bodyguard in the periphery of his chaos—the crush Izuku nursed was a private indulgence, never something he believed he could have.

Then in Okinawa, their fake marriage was just that: a performance. No matter how desperately he wished otherwise. And later, in Biei, their time together felt like a honeymoon carved from stolen time.

But now—there were these rings.

They were undeniable proof that he and Katsuki were real. As real as the sun and moon, forever drawn into each other's orbit.

After all the years of almosts and not-quites, their happy ending had finally arrived.

Izuku's faith in fate returned a bit that night.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Fourth Week in Winter Paradise

The next week passed with a new form of kinship in the cabin.

Conversations came easier. Laughter lingered longer. Even Shinsou, who had clung to his wariness like armor, seemed to soften around the edges. There was no dramatic shift to it. No vocal change of heart but the tension in his shoulders eased up. His replies grew less sharp and he no longer looked at Izuku like an active threat.

They crossed paths alone one morning, right outside the kitchen.

Miruko had finished making a fresh pot of coffee and the smell clung to the air. Izuku had been on his way to the reading room, where Katsuki was, with his hands wrapped around a warm mug for his husband.

Then when he turned the corner, he nearly collided with Shinsou. They both cursed in the narrow hallway when Izuku almost poured the hot liquid over both of them.

They made eye contact, and for a moment, neither of them moved.

Shinsou's face flickered with trepidation. But this time, it didn't reach his eyes all the way. Stopping it from taking root was a kinder emotion. It filled his deep, violet gaze. He regarded Izuku like he was an entirely different person. One that he had spent days watching, listening, and trying to understand.

“You really care a lot about him,” Shinsou said. His eyes surveyed Izuku carefully. “Don’t you?”

Izuku’s fingers tightened around the mug. He nodded slowly, eyes dropping to the floor as if the admission might make the hallway shrink.

“I always have,” he replied in a disarming whisper. “And I always will.”

Shinsou didn’t say anything back right away. For a moment, there was only the creak of the wood beneath their feet.

Then, without a word, he stepped forward to walk past him. At first Izuku thought he was going to shoulder-check him. But instead, when Shinsou grew close he hesitantly reached out and grabbed Izuku’s shoulder—gently. His fingers dug slightly into the fabric of his sweater, with a tenderness that translated how much new trust Izuku had nurtured.

“Good,” Shinsou sighed. “I thought that idiot might die alone.”

He then disappeared around the corner elsewhere in the cabin.

Izuku stood there for a moment, stunned. The mug in his hands trembled a bit with him.

But he smiled.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The night before their fifth week in the cabin, Izuku was daring to imagine their escape with Nana.

They were so close to her now. He could practically taste the freedom on the back of his tongue.

It was officially less than a few days away.

Earlier, Aizawa mentioned that within the next couple of days they were going to begin their migration down south.

With the help of his private boat, their road to the other end of the country was going to be smooth sailing. Aizawa had plans to smuggle them through the docks at night in Okinawa. It was sleuth enough that Izuku knew they could easily slip past Yakuza traps.

According to the older agent, it would take about three days to get to Okinawa by boat. So in short, it would be like enjoying a nice, weekend cruise with everyone. Which meant, in two days, they were going to begin the end of their journey.

Izuku fell asleep that night dreaming of it.

His mind was a blurry haze as he drifted into sleep. He fell into his mind gently, picturing him and Katsuki on a boat. The smell of sea salt tickled at his nose, and the winter breeze brushed across his cheek. He could feel the air progressively get warmer as they moved south.

The dream sequence made him feel like he was floating. Then suddenly, in a strange mirage, a small flower popped up in the middle of the boat.

It was a white thorn apple, perfectly waiting for him.

Izuku curiously examined it, recognizing the flower as poisonous.

He walked towards it, and with every step he took the floorboards of the boat transformed into dirt.

The ground beneath his feet was no longer the boat, but rather it was his old courtyard. His old backyard all the way back in Tokyo boxed him in and made him freeze up. Izuku glanced up and saw the cluster of skyscrapers he grew up in.

They leaned over, eerily watching his every move. All around him was the tall, thick barbed wire fence that was tasked with keeping them trapped.

Izuku's heart raced as he looked around.

Many of his siblings were playing across the field. They were fighting, chasing each other with loud laughter and giggles ringing through the air.

Sen and Himiko darted past him, rough housing in pure bliss. He turned his head as they disappeared into the darkness together. Jin came next, gracefully sparring with Hiryu as Aoyama and Ibara played chess off to the side.

An ominous chill raked across his skin. His throat bobbed, feeling like it was caught on a hook.

Izuku turned his eyes back to the flower in front of him. It was peeking from the ground, an anomaly.

Izuku reached down to grab it—and was forcefully stopped by a large hand clasping around his wrist.

He jerked his head to see Tomura. His brother's waxen face was chilling and his eyes were pools of nothing staring back at him.

Suddenly, the snakes tattooed on his neck and arms moved like they were alive.

The vipers, once inked in obsidian spirals across his pale throat and collarbones, began to pulse. Their scales caught the low light like wet stone. Their forked tongues flickered, tasting the air.

One by one they peeled from Tomura skin with obscene slowness, like wet bandages coming off a corpse, and they dropped to the ground with soft, sickening thuds before slithering forward with awful purpose.

Izuku screamed, but no sound came out. The vipers climbed up his legs, wrapped around his torso, and coiled around his arms. He tried to shake them off but there were too many. They wove around him, hissing and barring their fangs until they wrapped around his neck.

They encased him whole until he was covered entirely in horned vipers.

Izuku gasped awake in a cold sweat.

His heart pounded like it was trying to punch through his ribs. His eyes darted around and he felt out the bed to make sure it was real. He glanced to his side and saw Katsuki sleeping peacefully. His husband was out cold, arm tucked around him.

Relief settled in Izuku's chest as he breathed out.

He shook his head, trying to get the awful imagery out his mind.

He didn't get nightmares frequently, but he was surprised that such a pleasant dream transformed into something so ugly. He grabbed his head when he felt down right woozy from the whiplash of the two sequences.

He inhaled to calm himself. However, his head swam like the room tilted.

Izuku paused. He frowned.

He shook his head again and there was a rock of nausea to his gut that he didn't have an explanation for. He sat up further, confused when his drowsiness wasn't dissipating like it should have. Then when he sat up all the way, a faint scent wafted past Izuku's nose.

He froze.

Terror shot straight down his spine. He recognized that smell.

It was noxious gas.

His instincts kicked in like a switchblade snapping open. He clamped a hand over his nose and mouth, spun toward Katsuki, and shook him violently by the shoulder.

"Kacchan!" Izuku harshly whispered. "Kacchan, you need to wake up!"

When Katsuki heard the urgency in his voice, his eyes shot open. He sat up straight, and immediately swayed like he was sea sick. Katsuki coughed violently as he covered his nose with his arm and he quickly jumped to his feet.

They looked at each other, and dread calcified in their cores.

Izuku's heart began to race and he glanced towards the door. There, he saw the thick cloud of gas creep from the crack. It slowly rolled in like the grim reaper, taking its time to drag across the floor.

Within the next split second, the door to their bedroom slammed open. Both Izuku and Katsuki jerked back, getting ready to strike—but it was Aizawa, covering his mouth with a rag.

He stood in the doorway, hair damp with sweat, eyes red-rimmed and wild.

“Below ground,” he hissed. “Now.”

Behind him, the hallway was chaos. Denki was hunched over, coughing. Sero looked like he was going to vomit. Monoma had his shirt over his nose, eyes darting back and forth. Shinsou’s hand was clenched around a long blade. Miruko was trying not to inhale as she loaded her gun with a dead-silent click.

Aizawa ran forward. He kicked aside the rug in their room, gripped the hidden handle in the floor, and heaved.

The air was turning thick. Izuku could feel it in his throat, clinging to his lungs. The smell had teeth now—and it was coming for their throats.

“Everyone get in,” Aizawa ordered once he had the hatch open.

Then that’s when they heard the shrill sound of glass breaking from upstairs.

Miruko cursed under her breath and slammed the bedroom door shut. She locked it, bolted it. But it wouldn’t hold for long.

One by one, they dropped through the hatch.

Izuku was the first to go, pulling Katsuki after him. They climbed down the concrete ladder into the emergency bunker. Aizawa expertly maneuvered the rug back over the top of the hatch. That way when he closed it, it would be hidden once more.

And when the hatch shut above them, and Aizawa locked the final bolt, silence fell like a guillotine.

They gasped in the clean air, greedy and loud. Sero dropped to his knees, coughing uncontrollably. Denki was shaking, his fingers twitching like he couldn’t stop them. Monoma wiped his eyes furiously, blinking through the blur. Shinsou groaned, trying to spit out the taste of the poison that accumulated on his tongue

Izuku clutched Katsuki’s hand in a white-knuckled grip as they both hacked uncontrollably.

Right as Denki was about to say something, Aizawa slapped a hand over his mouth and put his finger up in a ‘quiet’ motion.

They all listened intensely.

The sound of more glass breaking was followed by footsteps. Multiple people flooded into the cabin up above them and they could hear them spread out corner to corner. The movements of the people were organized. Tactical in a way that Izuku knew. His stomach knotted when he heard countless footsteps get closer. He tried to number them and do the math of how many bodies they needed to cut through.

Ten. Twenty. Forty. Sixty.

He lost count as the sound of the people above them became close to a stampede.

Aizawa removed his hand from Denki's mouth and motioned to all of them.

"Everyone needs to make a run for the boats at the base of the mountain," Aizawa whispered low and serious. "There's no point in trying to go toe to toe, there's too many. If you get separated, rendezvous in Nemuro. Now, everyone—go. Put your gear on and grab what you can as quietly and quickly as possible."

They all began to scatter.

As the sound of more people flooded into the cabin, everyone suited up hastily. They had stored extra clothes and bags down in the bunker, in case they needed an emergency exit. Izuku grabbed the backpack pre-packed with guns, knives, and his burner phone. He took out his obsidian daggers and hooked them on his person and threw on his winter coat.

When he turned, Katsuki already had his combat boots on. The others dressed in silence, getting their weapons ready. All of their expressions dived into a lethal seriousness from them that Izuku had not yet seen.

They began to hastily make a move towards the emergency exit when the sound of the bedroom door shook the floor above. With a loud creak and a bang, the heavy object slammed to the floor. In came dozens of people, boots scattering. The footsteps were endless.

But among them, Izuku distinctly recognized one pair.

His blood ran cold.

Tomura's heavy, powerful steps vibrated across the floor.

The drag. The pause. The deliberate thud of heel to wood, like someone who walked not to move, but to announce their presence. Each step didn't just echo. It spread. It crawled down Izuku's spine like rot.

Everyone below the floorboards grew deathly still, afraid of making noise. They eyed the large, metal door to the outside in front of them with bated breaths, weary of getting caught.

Aizawa inched slowly, trying his best to not draw attention.

The people above shuffled loudly, searching every inch of the room. Izuku could hear them go into the bathroom, the closet, he could feel the thud of them turning over the bed.

"We can't find them," a voice of a man said above them. "They must've escaped somehow."

“They couldn’t have gotten too far after we sent that gas bomb down the chimney,” a woman explained.

All the people above them moved about. All but Tomura.

Izuku held his breath when he couldn’t hear his brother shift. He was standing still, cold eyes drinking in every inch of the room no doubt. Everyone tried to get closer to the escape door and beads of sweat began to accumulate on Izuku’s brow.

When they reached the door, Aizawa’s hand clutched the handle tightly, waiting.

Then, Tomura moved. He took a single pace forward and paused.

“The trick is listening closely,” Tomura said, voice smooth and patient.

His feet shifted. He took one, two, three steps and stopped.

“Because if you do,” Tomura drawled. “You can hear the scratching of vermin under the floorboards.”

Bullets rained down through the wooden floor.

“Go! Go!” Aizawa shouted loudly when the hatch began to be forcefully blown off.

He ripped open the steel metal door and its loud screech cut through all of their ears.

“Surround the parameter!” Izuku heard one of Tomura’s men scream from above. “Don’t let them escape!”

They all poured out the door. They were shot into a narrow, thin passageway that forced them all into a single file line. The cold cut into them as they all worked fast with Aizawa leading the way.

Izuku’s heart was hammering in his ears as they twisted and weaved through the maze in the mountain. The sound of footsteps from the cabin oscillated in and out above them as they ran as fast as they could.

When they breached the exit, they were spit out right on the edge of a cliff. The drop was steep enough to make Denki shriek. They all sharply turned, the snow under their feet crunching with the urgency they kept up.

Aizawa clutched his rifle when the sound of running footsteps from the trail above came into ear shot.

He raised one single arm and formed his hand into a fist.

Immediately all members of M-Unit fell into formation. Without warming, Katsuki grabbed Izuku and threw him in the middle. Suddenly everyone squeezed in tightly around him with their guns drawn. Aizawa took the front and never broke his pace.

When they rounded the corner where the paths collided, gunpowder filled the air. Bullets rained down as everyone began to dodge defensively, keeping Izuku and Katsuki protected. Izuku's instincts homed in as he ducked behind a large tree with Katsuki. Several of the others ducked and rolled, opening fire on their opponents.

Everyone kept close. They ducked, rolled, and fired off their bullets towards the men in black. One by one the Yakuza fell, covering the once fresh snow in bright crimson red.

Izuku's eyes were restricted as he landed several kill shots at Yakuza scum who came too close on their right. Katsuki began reloading, defending his blind spot on the left as more Yakuza spilled from the slope above.

"Move down!" Aizawa commanded and everyone fell in line. "Remember, get to the speedboats!"

They began to run rapidly, trying their best to get away while still defending themselves. They bobbed and weaved through the thick forest, using the trees as cover. Izuku's lungs ignited with fire as he ran from cover to cover progressively down the mountain.

Katsuki was right behind him, hot on his heels keeping his gun lifted and firing. His husband killed anyone that came too close.

Then suddenly, a second wave of bodies came.

They spilled down the mountain like ants, coming in nearly every direction from behind them.

Izuku's eyes widened in horror as they became outnumbered with what seemed like a small army.

They all kicked up the pace, running for their lives.

Denki began cursing repeatedly as he picked up his knees. Sero began reloading. Monoma and Shinsou shined, letting their killer instincts sharpen and slice through the open fire. Monoma's sniper eye took down several people in the distance and Shinsou blew the kneecaps off one man who got too close to their group.

Behind them, Aizawa and Miruko lingered.

Their bodies moved with lethal precision as they engaged the oncoming Yakuza forces. They held them off with their combined years of expertise.

Miruko's trigger finger was a blur. Each bullet landed with unnerving precision, shattering bones and sending the enemies sprawling. Heads snapped back. Chests exploded. Knees buckled mid-charge. And when her chamber clicked empty, she didn't flinch.

One man rushed her, screaming, thinking he could close the gap. She welcomed him. With a feral grin, she dropped low, swept his legs out, and vaulted upward to drive her elbow straight into his throat, crushing his windpipe before he even hit the ground.

All while next to her, Aizawa's heavy shotgun cut through several men at a time. His black coat flared as he reloaded the sawed-off shotgun with practiced ease. When he fired, it was brutal like a fist punching through their torsos.

Clusters of men dropped in heaps, their bodies torn open by buckshot. Aizawa didn't watch them fall. He was already pivoting, reloading, ready for the next wave.

But despite their formidable skills, the sheer number of adversaries was progressively becoming overwhelming.

Miruko, bloodied but unbowed, turned to the them, her voice cutting through the chaos.

"Go! We'll hold them back!" Miruko shouted as she ducked behind another tree. She shot from around the trunk. "We need to split up and shake them off!"

Izuku hesitated. A force unlike any other he ever felt during combat sank in. He inexplicably knew Miruko was right, but the urge to stay by her stopped him. Then Aizawa nodded towards him, his eyes meeting Izuku's with a silent command.

Suddenly, a voice rang out from the distance. A Yakuza commander barked the orders, "Focus your efforts towards the two targets!"

Katsuki's hand clasped around his wrist and they sprinted away.

He did his best to not look back. The sound of gunshots and screams filled the air as they retreated down the mountain path. Their breaths fully ragged as they navigated the treacherous terrain.

Down here, the forest grew thicker. They zig zagged between more trees. Behind them, the sounds of battle grew fainter, replaced by the ominous silence of the forest.

Izuku let out a shaky breath as his legs began to burn. He absorbed the pain and funneled it into fuel.

They quickened their pace, adrenaline fueling their flight. As they reached a new clearing, more Yakuza emerged, their weapons raised.

Immediately everyone began to duck behind the trees. Pieces of bark flew into the air as the bullets soared. Izuku shielded his head as he reloaded his gun. His piercing eyes homed in on three bodies and when he raised his pistol—he sank three precise shots in their temples.

They tried to move, but when they did the Yakuza advanced with them.

They tried to cut through, but as more bodies came into the clearing, they were facing difficulties.

Monoma cursed under his breath as he took down two more men.

He ducked behind a tree when a bullet nicked his cheek. He reloaded hastily. Then, he looked at his comrades. Denki and Sero met his eyes, and so did Shinsou.

A serious firmness settled at the bottom of his Monoma's eyes.

Shinsou nodded once before sprinting towards Izuku and Katsuki. He covered himself as best as he could. He hid behind a tree that was next to Izuku and Katsuki.

"We need to section off," Shinsou harshly yelled to them. "Us three need to go. Now."

Izuku's heart sank under the crackling of more gun fire. "But what about them?"

"They're not amateurs," Katsuki hissed, his voice low but confident. His hand clamped around Izuku's wrist again. "They'll hold them off then escape when it's clear."

Quickly, the decision was made for him when Katsuki and Shinsou began running, tugging him along. Izuku ran along with them, using all the spirit he could muster.

This time, Izuku did look back. There he saw the three fighting in a tight formation. Sero, Denki, and Monoma held the opening. They cut down anyone who tried to follow them.

Monoma was all smoke and thunder, his twin pistols spitting out death in rapid bursts, brass shells clinking to the ground as he carved a brutal rhythm through the crowd.

Sero met every oncoming fighter with brutal force, his brass knuckles shattering ribs and elbows, his kicks snapping spines, the sound of bones breaking like drum beats behind them.

And Denki was more lethal with a knife than he let on. He struck like electricity, powerful and fast, sliding through soft flesh with terrifying ease.

Together, they held the mouth of the opening like a dam against a rising flood, refusing to let a single enemy slip past.

The trio disappeared as Izuku skidded down a new hill.

He held his arms out for balance as they rounded, getting closer to their exit.

Shinsou was running ahead of them.

"We're going towards the ski lift!" Shinsou shouted over this shoulder. "At this rate we're not going to make it down by foot. The cable car will get us down quicker!"

Izuku and Katsuki nodded. They sped around a sharp cliff and barreled down with all their might. Cold air filled their lungs like needles, stabbing and jolting them with every hurried step they took. Behind them, Izuku heard the forest scream faintly. Gun fire. Groans. He could only hope it was their side winning out—and not the Yakuza's.

When they came to the second opening, their saving grace was sitting there, rocking in the wind.

And then from the trees, like a nightmare made flesh, a man stepped out. The large man Yakuza leered at them through his one good eye. He was dense with muscle and menace, his breath fogging as he advanced quickly.

Shinsou didn't hesitate. He rounded on his feet with the kind of speed Izuku hadn't seen from him before.

Shinsou struck, fast enough to be invisible until impact. The man staggered, and tried to grab him but Shinsou ducked the first swing. He planted a brutal elbow into the man's ribs, then pivoted and slammed his heel into the side of his knee. Bone cracked. The man howled.

But Shinsou didn't stop—he grabbed him by the collar, twisted, and slammed his skull into the steel girder of the station until the man went slack, leaving a red smear behind. And then there was silence.

They moved again. Faster this time.

Katsuki forcefully pushed Izuku to the front. Before Izuku could think, his husband hoisted him by the waist like deadweight and shoved him frantically into the cable car. The cold metal floor bit through Izuku's pants as he hit it hard, and before he could scramble up—

The sound of ten more footsteps came.

Izuku snapped up right, and from the window of the cable car, he could see more Yakuza. They came from the trees like insects. Some with guns, others with knives, a few with nothing at all.

They attacked Shinsou and Katsuki without any hesitation.

The blur of bodies began to brawl beneath Izuku. Katsuki had already closed the distance to the first, fists landing like gunshots, quick and savage. His entire body twisting with each blow—fully brutal. One man crumpled, but two more took his place. Katsuki lifted his gun and shot two more down.

Shinsou was holding his own, moving like a shadow. Every strike with his long blade was purposeful and every dodge he maneuvered calculated.

Together, Katsuki and Shinsou moved like they'd fought side-by-side their entire lives. Katsuki took high, Shinsou took low, switching seamlessly as they knocked one man back and cut another down.

But they weren't winning—they were surviving.

And then, another wave of attackers came.

Izuku moved to get off the cable car—but the second he emerged, Shinsou whirled his head towards him.

His eyes were wild and his voice boomed, "Stay there!"

Katsuki's eyes met Shinsou's. The space between them charged with an unspoken communication.

And then Shinsou turned, blood on his cheek and fury in his eyes, and shouted, “I’ll see you two at the rendezvous point!”

Before Izuku could process the words, Katsuki leapt for the cable car. Someone tried to grab his leg and Shinsou cut the man’s hand off with a sharp swing of his blade. Blood sprayed across his face as Katsuki hoisted himself up and in the car.

Then Shinsou made a beeline for the control panel at the base of the steel column. A blade slashed across his arm, but he didn’t flinch. Another attacker lunged, but Shinsou ducked, rolled, and came up swinging—his fist colliding with the attacker’s temple so hard that blood sprayed.

He reached the switch.

He punched it to full speed.

The cable car jolted.

It surged forward with a loud whir. Izuku jerked with the force and so did Katsuki. They both grabbed on to each other for balance as the car rocketed away from the station. Cold air hit Izuku like a slap. His heart leapt into his throat as the station shrank behind him.

He watched as Shinsou twisted another man’s arm until the joint gave with a wet pop. He pivoted, using the man’s limp body as a shield against the next attacker’s machete, then slammed his boot into the attacker’s sternum so hard the man flew backwards, landing in a heap on the snow-covered rocks.

The bodies blurred together, shrinking and shrinking, until the figures fighting were shadows.

Izuku’s hands trembled against the steel bars of the cable car. His throat ached from the scream he didn’t release. The car descended, propelling them down the mountain on that groaning wire, until the entire world below was obscured by fog and distance.

“They’ll be okay,” Katsuki said, voice taut. He spit out a glob of blood and wiped his mouth. “Don’t worry. We’ve been in tighter situations as a unit before.”

Izuku wearily looked at his husband, unsure. None of these people had ever faced Tomura.

Right as he was about to reply, the cable shrieked above them. Both of their heads whipped up at the sound of the high-pitched metal-on-metal wail of something snapping.

The line snagged—violently.

The car lurched forward with such velocity that Izuku’s skull slammed into the window behind him. A loud cry tore from his throat, and before Katsuki could even curse, the second snag came—louder and sharper.

The line gave.

And then, the world fell.

The entire car sheared free from the cable like a bullet from a chamber, gravity taking hold in one clean, merciless movement. The mountain opened its jaws as the cart tumbled into its throat with no warning.

His stomach dropped first. Sickness rocked all the way up his core as they lifted off the seats. Izuku barely had time to grab hold of Katsuki. His arms hooked around his husband's torso and his face buried in his shoulder.

Then, the impact came.

Katsuki wrapped his arms around Izuku's head, taking the brunt of the next blow with his back, teeth gritted so tight it sounded like they cracked. They were slammed down into the metal floor mercilessly.

Glass exploded off the windows outward like a shrapnel storm. Jagged fragments sliced through the air as the car bounced, skidded, twisted, slammed.

They were a hunk of metal ricocheting down the slope, pinwheeling end over end, every impact punching the breath from their lungs and every jolt a new source of pain. The wind was a scream in their ears.

Metal crumpled. Bones slammed into steel. The ceiling buckled. The floor split. Snow rushed in through the broken windows like smoke.

Suddenly, they collided with something hard, and large.

The force that the cart was stopped with rocked stomach acid into Izuku's mouth.

The cart groaned, lifting to tip over then paused. It fell backwards, and hit the ground with a loud, hard final thud.

Neither of them moved.

A silence so vast and absolute followed that for a moment, Izuku thought he had gone deaf. Then he heard the distant hiss of snow melting against hot metal. Pain bloomed in full color now. His ribs ached. Glass was lodged deep in his thigh. Blood trickled hot down his legs, soaking his pants.

Katsuki moved first.

He hissed in enormous pain as he tried to peel himself upright. Blood dripped from a gash under his eye. He nursed his temple and tried to stop the world from spinning.

Izuku did the same. Broken glass fragments cut into his gloves as he tried to find leverage to pull himself up. Katsuki shoved a jagged sheet of metal out of the way that had fallen from the ceiling. He staggered upright with a groan that sounded less like a man in pain and more like an animal trying to rise from a trap.

He stood to his full height, and tried to find an exit.

Izuku looked around and found total wreckage. If the cable car had been a piece of paper, it was now crumbled. The once smooth metal was bent and torn in several places. The windows were entirely gone, and in their place were sharp left over shards of glass like teeth.

Katsuki yelled out a loud grunt as he pushed against the jammed door on the side. His neck flexed with effort as he gave a full strength haul. The door shrieked and surrendered to Katsuki, popping open and falling to the ground.

Izuku coughed, once, then again. A wet rattle tossed around his chest. He felt something warm come up with it, tasting like blood. He tried to speak for help, but Katsuki was already reaching down and pulling him out from the twisted ruin.

“C’mon,” Katsuki rasped. He hastily bent down and gathered Izuku in his arms. He cradled him fiercely and exited the cable car. “We have to keep moving.”

Katsuki hastily began to run. Izuku hissed when his leg throbbed, glass shards jolting around, deep in his muscles.

“I got you,” Katsuki said shakily as he picked up his pace. “I got you, don’t worry, darling.”

His voice cracked on the last word.

Izuku breathed out, wrapping his arms around Katsuki’s neck. He tried to catch his breath as they kept going. He looked around and found they were at the base of the mountain, completely out of reach of the chaos.

He could hear no more gunshots. No groans or cries. He could barely hear anything besides the frantic panting of Katsuki running as fast as he could.

Izuku wearily looked up to the peak as his heart clutched for the others.

He could only hope they made it out safe.

ɯɯɯ

Katsuki ran the whole way to the coast line with no breaks.

Trees blurred in their periphery. The ugly slush of snow beneath Katsuki’s feet and his rugged panting were the only sounds in the dead of the night. Izuku was sure his husband’s lungs were on fire as they barreled straight into the darkness with no hesitation.

Along the way, Izuku had dug the glass out of his legs. The gashes were deep but he knew he could push past it.

They turned a corner, and in view came one of the marked docks. The boat was there, still hidden under a heavy tarp flapping in the ocean wind. They both looked around, heeding caution and found nothing.

“Do you think the others made it?” Izuku asked, worried.

“They’ll be fine,” Katsuki said, voice firm despite the strain in his breathing. “We’ve done this before. Whenever there’s too many people to take out, everyone is really good at getting to safety. We’ll see them soon, don’t worry.”

They walked out to the dock and with delicate care, Katsuki put Izuku down on his feet again. Izuku flexed out his thighs, working his adrenaline to push down the pain that was shooting up in his legs. He stretched out his limbs and nodded to Katsuki that he was good to go.

Katsuki then yanked the tarp away with one whip motion and the canvas went flying into the wind. Beneath it was a small, motorized white and blue skiff. It was very bare bones but functional.

“C’mon, darling,” Katsuki urged.

Izuku nodded and hastily allowed himself to be led into the boat. Katsuki’s hands helped steady him as he got into the swaying boat. Izuku held out his hands for his husband and Katsuki grasped them tightly as he began to get inside.

Then suddenly, as Katsuki was halfway in, a strange sound cut through the wind.

It was sharp, clean, and almost delicate.

Katsuki choked and stumbled.

Both of their eyes went wide. Like a cruel nightmare they both saw too late, a tiny dart sank its way into the side of Katsuki’s neck.

Izuku scrambled out of the boat when Katsuki staggered backwards.

Quickly, Katsuki ripped the dart free with a snarl of pain, but the paralyzer was already beginning to work its effects. His hands shook with tremors. His body began to lock up and finally, his knees gave out. His eyes rolled into his skull.

“Kacchan!” Izuku screamed.

He shot his arms out and they toppled together with Katsuki’s heavy body dragging them down.

Another dart cut through the dark air. But this time, Izuku was on high alert. He snatched it mid-flight without looking, with his eyes wide and wild. He flung it into the water while cradling Katsuki’s head with one arm. His eyes scanned over the endless trees in front of him for the perpetrator. But found nothing in the deep darkness.

His nostrils flared as he used all his strength to drag Katsuki towards the boat again.

“I got you, Kacchan,” Izuku hissed through a clenched jaw.

The sound came again. Izuku dodged the next dart by a hair. It whistled past his cheek and sank into the side of the boat.

But then another followed. And another.

Izuku deflected both, but a third following too closely slipped past his defense. It buried itself into the base of his neck. Izuku jerked and gritted his teeth. The chemical hit him like a hammer to the skull but he knew he had more time than Katsuki.

His adrenaline pulsed against the push of the sedative.

He began to crawl, dragging Katsuki's sluggish body by the arm toward the boat—inch by miserable inch. His hands were beginning to shake. His balance tilted, leaning like the world shifted ever so slightly. But he kept going. He had to.

"Please," Izuku hissed through gritted teeth to no one. Or, to fate, maybe. "Please—"

He made it back to the boat and with a loud groan, lifted Katsuki. He hoisted his husband into their getaway vehicle with all his strength and just when he stepped foot inside, more darts came.

He dodged two, but another, larger one, embedded itself in his leg. He ripped it free, hands trembling. But then another came, biting into his other leg.

Izuku growled low in his throat, ripping the dart out with his bloodied fingers. But another one hit. Then another.

Nausea dragged him down and his vision pulsed.

Izuku began to tremble.

"N-No," he gasped. "No, no—"

The high dose of paralyzer overtook his bloodstream like ice water. His vision tunneled out. A loud, angry defeated cry spilled from his lips. He tried to climb in the boat with Katsuki but his muscles felt like they had been replaced with stone.

His vision blurred.

Then the world stopped.

Izuku fell. His back hit the wooden dock as he collapsed straight down into gravity. He stared wide eyed toward the end of the dock, world spinning in a dizzying circle as he laid completely still against his will.

Something moved at the end of the dock.

A single footstep changed the whole mood.

Dread so visceral crawled up his legs that it felt like his own bones were trying to escape his skin.

The next step came, and Izuku felt fear scream in his skull.

Tomura emerged from the darkness like a phantom, fully sculpted in white.

His coat was the same color as the snow. Knee-length, regal and trimmed in thick white mink fur that shimmered in the ocean wind.

Every inch of him was pristine and polished like a man who truly did sit at the Tokyo Underground Council. White slacks. White gloves. White boots, un-scuffed and heavy against the old wood. He was a true, monochrome devil coming to drag Izuku back to the pits of hell.

The only color on him now was his eyes. Deep, blood red that was so thick Izuku could feel the void consuming Tomura's soul.

His brother's white hair blew softly in the wind and the tattooed vipers on his throat pulsed.

Izuku let out a strangled, involuntary cry. Weak, tiny tremors surged through his hands. He tried to grapple at the wooden dock beneath him. He begged his fingers to move. Just one inch. Just enough to drag himself back to Katsuki. Just enough to fight. But his body was locked beneath the weight of terror and toxin.

Tomura approached gradually, savoring each step.

Behind him, a row of Vipers stood tall. He stopped just in front of Izuku and looked down with that cold, clinical detachment that has haunted him since childhood.

"Playtime is over, little brother," is all Izuku heard before darkness consumed him whole.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku came to like a man drowning.

He surged up through the black, lungs heaving against pressure that had no shape. His eyes snapped open and the world tilted violently. The first name that broke through the sludge of his thoughts was Katsuki. Then came the pain. A crackling cough wrecked his chest, and blood coated his tongue with the sharp, metallic sting of iron.

Memory hit him next. It all came in fast, brutal, and incoherent. Gunfire. Snow. The paralyzer bullets soaring through the air. Then nothing.

Izuku groaned as his skull throbbed like it had been cleaved open and stitched back together all wrong. He winced and pressed his lids shut against the spinning.

He tried to catch his breath and get his bearings.

He looked down, vision pulsing in and out of clarity. In the haze, he saw the bindings wrapped around him like a vicious viper. Coarse rope twisted cruelly around his wrists and ankles, strung so tight they chafed his skin raw. Worse, he could feel paralytic humming throughout his muscles and making his limbs heavy like lead.

Quickly, the world sharpened in pieces.

Trees. Stones. Snow. Everything was white and grave level quiet. He frowned when he looked around longer. An eerie familiarity itched at him like a tick sucking blood.

No. This wasn't right. This couldn't be right.

The chill in his gut dropped further when he recognized the grove. Dead Higanbana flowers littered the snow-packed forest floor like red-brown ash. All the trees stood around barren and black against the night sky. Their branches were pointed at him, skeletal and accusing.

Ahead of Izuku lay a familiar slope of graves. They were aligned in neat, long, rows winding across the earth.

He was at the Bakugou Estate in Biei.

More specifically—he was at the family grave site.

Right as his confusion grew, his eyes finally focused in and snagged on what was happening in front of him.

His heart dropped and ice filled his veins.

No.

No. No. No.

Directly across from him, Katsuki knelt in the snow.

He was bound in plastic zip-ties thick enough to cut off his circulation. His head hung low and his jaw was clenched. Rigidness seized his shoulders with either defiance or terror. Or maybe it was both. Three Yakuza men with rifles circled him like vultures. And behind him was a pile of fresh dirt.

A fresh, shallow grave had been dug directly beside the resting place of Bakugou Mitsuki.

And in addition, a new headstone already stood tall. Etched into polished black granite read 'Bakugou Katsuki' in clear, crisp etching.

Izuku called out for Katsuki. But the sound was smothered into a muffled howl into the gag tied around his mouth. He thrashed, frantic and useless. His muscles barely twitched under the drug's chokehold. Panic so urgent surged through him until his vision pulsed white.

Katsuki's head snapped up, and their eyes met. His husband's expression collapsed into horror, but before he could say anything, the shadows moved.

Two massive Yakuza thugs seized Izuku by both arms, jerking him upright to his knees. Their grip was deliberately punishing as they manhandled him. Izuku gasped through his nose, the cloth in his mouth soaked through with saliva tasting like mildew and ash.

“Ah. Finally awake,” Tomura spoke.

His brother strolled into his view languidly. His coat flared with every step, bone-white against the bleak, wintry cemetery.

“I’m only half sorry for the headache you must have,” Tomura said coldly. “We had to hit you with extra dosages for obvious reasons.”

Izuku screamed again, hoarse and guttural.

He tried to plead. He tried to bargain past the cloth, but his brother wasn’t listening. Tomura turned his back on him, making it clear he had no more mercy left to give. He walked straight up to Katsuki and glared down at him like he was dirt beneath his shoe.

Izuku thrashed harder. He tried to say, “Get away from him!”

But the gag swallowed his voice.

“However,” Tomura continued. “I am fully sorry that it took me so long to come collect you. I admittedly have known where you were the last three weeks. But Chisaki had this headstone specially made and it was only delivered today.”

Tomura delicately ran a gloved finger down over the curve of the headstone.

“He has a twisted sense of humor,” Tomura said.

Izuku made an attempt to call out his brother’s name.

“At least now you’ll be next to your dearest mother, Katsuki,” Tomura taunted, with a hint of disgust. “Mother and son. Forever side by side, doomed by the weight of their mistakes.”

“Fuck you,” Katsuki sneered through gritted teeth. “I’m going to kill you with my bare hands after this.”

Their gazes collided. Searing heat met glacial indifference and the silence between them quivered like a taut wire on the brink of snapping.

Tomura’s upper lip curled, and his expression grew icier by the second.

He slowly walked back over to Izuku and crouched down to his level. He hooked his finger under the gag and with a sharp flick of his wrist, he slipped the gag down from Izuku’s mouth. It landed like a sodden rag on his chest.

“Tomura,” Izuku sobbed, fully unraveling. “I’m sorry—” another wrecked sob. “I’m sorry. Don’t hurt him. Please.”

Tomura’s eyes glared down at him unwavering. But Izuku had to try. He had to convince Tomura not to go through with this—so he continued. He groveled until he felt his lips chap under the weight of all his desperation. Katsuki was looking at him in the most heartbreaking way as every new word slipped past his lips.

But no pleas were able to penetrate Tomura's tundra.

"Don't hurt him," Izuku begged. "Tomura, I love him. Please."

Tomura didn't waiver. His eyes narrowed.

"You know he doesn't care about you, Izuku," Tomura berated, low and dispassionate. "Did he tell you about our deal?"

Izuku stilled.

Deal?

The word hung like an executioner's blade mid-fall.

His storm of frenzied thoughts slowed for a brief moment, caught on the word. He furrowed his brow trying to connect it somewhere. But he couldn't. Something was missing. Out of the corner of his eye, he could see Katsuki lock up. Soon, all the color from Katsuki's face drained and a new look of horror was spreading across his features.

Tomura lifted a brow.

"Ah." He patiently clasped his hands. "He didn't tell you."

Izuku's silence deepened. His eyes flitted between his husband and his brother. He steadily grew more and more confused.

Katsuki began shaking his head. It was a subtle, terrified gesture.

"Izuku," Katsuki rasped, voice serrated with panic.

He began to struggle against his zip ties. He tried to lurch forward but one of the men guarding him stepped in. He pointed his rifle directly between Katsuki's eyes as a warning. Katsuki choked back a sob as his scarlet eyes latched on to green.

"Izuku, I swear to god I was going to tell you—"

"—He was going to trade you in," Tomura cut in, his voice a venomous whip. "Hand-deliver you to me like an offering. Just for a shot at his pathetic revenge."

"I changed my mind!" Katsuki screamed the words, fully guttural and with monstrous pain. His expression crumbled down and he turned his furious gaze on to Tomura. "You know I changed my mind the second I realized who the fuck you were!"

Tomura didn't blink. "Still," he said. "The thought alone is proof enough you don't deserve Izuku."

Katsuki thrashed, rabid. Another guard had to restrain him, and Katsuki fought him every step of the way.

“No! No, Izuku, please—I had changed my fucking mind!” Katsuki’s voice cracked, splitting right down the dead center. “Izuku, I—”

But the rest didn’t come. It stuck in his throat like a shard of glass. He hesitated, chest rising and falling with heartbreak as tears streaked through the blood and dirt on his face. He was sobbing now, chest wracked, words failing as grief took over.

“I’m so fucking sorry,” Katsuki groveled, and Izuku’s eye’s grew wider. “I—I didn’t know everything back then. I didn’t have the whole picture or know anything. I was so fucking angry, Izuku. I was blinded by my rage—”

Tomura rolled his eyes and snapped his fingers. “Gag him.”

One of the guards stepped forward without hesitation and jammed a filthy rag deep into Katsuki’s mouth, cutting him off mid-apology. Katsuki convulsed against his restraints until his skin bled raw. He was still pleading with his life and trying to apologize through his eyes alone.

Izuku stared back, unblinking. His heart began pounding at the highest tempo it had ever reached.

He searched those scarlet eyes—weighing every tremor in Katsuki’s expression for some sign of manipulation. Some sort of twist that he could cling to. But there was none.

Tomura was telling the truth.

“I told you Izuku,” Tomura hissed. “I may be cruel, but I would never lie to you. Unlike me, this mutt jumped at the idea to trade you in to me, all for a shot to kill Chisaki. I told him if he brought me you, he could get his revenge—and he agreed. How else do you think he found you so quickly after the masquerade? I’m the one who told him what car you took after noticing which one was missing from the garage.”

Izuku shook his head in disbelief.

He reeled back, terrified and struggling to swallow the truth.

But the pieces fit. They clicked into place into the grand scheme of the puzzle. Now, Izuku felt sick for an entirely different reason. His head swam again and betrayal sank into his gut. It climbed into his throat and cut off the air from his lungs to his head. His world fell off its axis.

Katsuki was drenched in absolute shame. His tears free fell to the ground and he was hunched over trying to translate a thousand sorrys with his eyes.

Then Tomura sighed. He stood up and lightly brushed his white pants.

“We’re done here,” Tomura declared with finality, already turning away. “I’ve wasted enough time with this childish runaround. Bring in the coffin.”

The world stilled.

“Coffin?” Izuku whispered, the sound barely a breath.

He didn’t have time to process the shape of the word before four Vipers entered in formation. The thud of their boots marched in unison like the tolling of a funeral bell. They moved with the kind of brutal efficiency born of repetition. Their faces were hidden behind porcelain masks, not human, not even curious.

Between them they carried a box, long and narrow. It was hewn from coarse, black-stained wood.

The breath that left Izuku’s lungs was sharp, like a wounded animal. Horror detonated behind his eyes. He surged forward without thinking, and a scream shredded itself from the pit of his chest.

“No!” he shouted, voice fraying into hysteria. “Stop! Tomura, please! Don’t do this!”

Tomura didn’t flinch. He didn’t so much as even turn his head.

“You’re still bleeding through your heart for him?” Tomura asked. He spoke as if he was explaining a tired truth to a child too naive to understand. “Even after what I just told you? You really are foolish, Izuku. But I suppose that’s my fault for sheltering you so much.”

The coffin touched the ground with a heavy, inevitable thud.

“Tomura, please don’t—” Izuku begged. He looked up to Tomura with bleary eyes. “Big Brother, don’t do th-this. I’ll marry Chisaki—I’ll go back with you, I swear. I’ll do whatever you want, just—don’t kill him. Please. Please—”

Tomura stayed silent as he walked behind him.

He lifted the cloth to gag Izuku once more. He cinched the rag tight until Izuku’s jaw screamed in pain. Izuku struggled against the men holding him down, but the overwhelming dose of paralyzer in his vein was like heavy metal now. It made its way at home in his limbs as his immune system failed to rebound like it used to.

Katsuki’s chest surged with breath, like a furnace pulling its last draw of air.

Then, the two large Yakuza guards roughly hoisted Katsuki to his feet. He fought them every second in a violent, strong thrash. He kicked, slammed an elbow into someone’s ribs hard enough to crack, bucked and twisted like a beast that refused the slaughterhouse.

At one point, Izuku thought he might escape. Katsuki’s indomitable strength began to burn right through them. But then, the four Vipers cocked their rifles. Cold steel was pointed directly at Katsuki in all directions.

Katsuki froze.

With clenched teeth, Katsuki was roughly positioned in front of his coffin. He stood there on his feet like a man on death row with red rimmed eyes.

Tomura approached Katsuki. Their gazes clashed and the eerie silence broke through the air.

Tomura gestured for one of the Yakuza men to de-gag Katsuki. When the cloth fell, Tomura stared expectantly at him.

“Any more lies you want to confess?” Tomura mocked.

Katsuki snarled and spat directly in his face.

The spit hit like a slap. Tomura closed his eyes on reflex, but remained chillingly composed. He lifted his hand slowly, and wiped the disrespect off his face. His nostrils flared with sheer, controlled rage. When he opened his eyes again, his gaze was pure hatred, right down to the marrow.

He stepped back, glare sinking into Katsuki like one of his machetes.

“Actually,” Tomura muttered, as if suddenly remembering a misplaced trinket. He extended his hand with the same cold indifference one might offer to collect a knife. “I almost forgot __”

One of the Vipers stepped forward and pulled out a folder from underneath their arm. Tomura neatly plucked out a stapled sheaf of papers. He turned around to Izuku and held them up for him to see.

Dread began to sink like an anchor inside Izuku when familiarity came knocking.

Tomura threw the papers to the ground in front of Izuku.

“You haven’t been married for an entire goddamn month,” Tomura hissed.

Izuku’s eyes latched onto the page lying askew near his knees. His heart dropped, plummeting straight into hell when he recognized his own signature. It was still familiar in its rushed curvature, but now grotesque in its betrayal. But more horrifyingly, sitting right next to it was Katsuki’s signature—forged, in perfectly neat black ink. The decree of legal separation burned on the page:

The Official Divorce of Bakugou Katsuki and Mamushi Izuku.

Finalized.

The font was bold, bureaucratic, and merciless.

Bile surged up to scald his throat as a memory roared to the surface.

Tomura had briefly asked about the divorce papers the night of the masquerade—but Izuku had dismissed it. Foolishly. Stupidly. He should have known better because Tomura never asked questions without reason. Every inquiry was a chess move. Every word he spoke was a trap.

Izuku shook his head and cried through the gag. He screamed out ‘no’ as loud as he could as his heart broke further and further.

Katsuki was staring in horror at all the papers messily tossed on the ground. His gaze was fixed on his faked signature, shoulders trembling with the slow realization of what had been forcefully taken from them.

Their eyes met, and Izuku’s skin went cold.

Katsuki’s face was ashen in resignation, as if he accepted what was coming.

Tomura turned to Katsuki then, cocked his gun and his subzero aura descended further.

Izuku began struggling. He kicked, he screamed, he tried to get away from the two large men holding his arms. He thrash so hard past the paralyzer to the point the men restraining him needed to force him to the ground. Izuku screamed into the gag as his chin hit the dirt and his belly pressed into the cold snow.

He shook his head as Tomura lifted up his gun and pointed directly at Katsuki.

Katsuki’s throat bobbed. He glanced at Izuku and then to Tomura. He tried his best to not show fear. But it snuck out through a single tear and a trembling lip.

“Don’t cry,” Katsuki called to him. Izuku’s screams turned his throat raw as Katsuki nodded as if everything was going to be okay. His ex-husband’s nostrils flared as he took a deep breath, never letting go of his gaze. “I told you—even in death, Izuku. I’ll claw my way back to you again and ag—”

The shot cracked through the air and the world split in two.

Izuku’s scream broke his vocal cords at the same time the bullet tore through Katsuki’s abdomen. Blood sprayed from the wound in a cruel, vivid arc.

Blood, so much blood, rained across the snow as Katsuki choked. His eyes went wide and his body toppled backwards into the coffin behind him with a sickening thud. He hit the wood while his groans of agony gurgled in his throat, wet and raw and unfinished.

Before Izuku could process the sight, the Vipers picked up the lid of the coffin. They slammed it over Katsuki and sealed in his howls of pain.

“Nail him in tightly,” Tomura instructed, unfazed. “Chisaki has specific orders that he’s buried alive. The heir wants him to suffer in agony up until his last breath.”

Izuku sobbed helplessly into the cold dirt as they began.

Nail after nail, Katsuki was hammered into his final resting place. Izuku began shaking his head as he heard the wood splinter from the sheer force the pounding was done with. With every nail in the coffin, Izuku’s heart broke further and further.

Unkindly, the Vipers dragged the heavy coffin over to the grave. They tossed it in with a clumsy thud and Izuku broke down more. Wrecked cries ripped through his throat as he listened to the sound of dirt being piled on top of the coffin. With every layer, Katsuki's groans of pain grew more distant.

And when his siblings were done, they packed in the soil tightly, making it look like a perfectly well deserved grave. Izuku sobbed helplessly.

Tomura rolled his shoulders and put his gun away. He pulled out a needle of paralyzer that glinted against the snow. He grabbed Izuku roughly by the arm and sunk the needle in slowly.

Limply, Izuku hung there. His limbs were useless as he hung his head low. He choked on his own sadness as he was suffocated by the weight of what his brother had done. Tomura began to drag him over, directly on top of the grave. When he stopped, he reached down to grab Izuku by his chin and forced his head up.

Izuku's heart shattered into irreversible pieces when he came face to face with the headstone.

The name Bakugou Katsuki stood directly in front of him.

"Take a good look," Tomura demanded. "I want you to understand what your defiance has cost you."

Izuku's soul broke.

Tomura straightened, then threw Izuku over his shoulder like he weighed nothing. All the fight had been stripped away from Izuku's bones. He couldn't move. He couldn't struggle. He hung like a rag doll as he was carried away. His paralyzed body swayed with every step, but his eyes never blinked.

The Vipers and Yakuza fell into step behind Tomura, a silent procession of monsters. And together they began the slow march away from the grave.

As he watched the headstone grow further and further away, a light inside of him died. It was smothered, directly by the hands of his merciless brother. He knew it then. He knew this part of him could not be reignited. It could not be reclaimed.

Because all his life, he had denied it.

He knew this was a risky path.

He knew they had a slim chance.

But he just didn't know how much it truly would cost them.

Because Katsuki was always his tempting forbidden fruit. In Izuku's eyes, he was the ruinous apple that damned the entire human race, but he took that bite anyway. He indulged himself in the fantasy of what could've been in hopes of a better future. However, he should've known better than to give in to the illusion that a sinner like him could be worthy of love.

But still, he took that bite. And inside of that apple was a dose of venom strong enough to kill them both.

Chapter End Notes

Welp. :') Katsuki POV time!! Yay? 😃 I hope you enjoy and please let me know what you think below—locks my doors

Chapter 38: Confuoco

Chapter Summary

> Confuoco (Instrumental tone) — to play with fire

Chapter Notes

> Helloooo!!! First, omg the response to the last chapter was insane!! Thank you ALL so much for reading and leaving your reactions! I was giggling like a madman reading all the comments, theories and screams. I think that was the biggest reaction ever a chapter has gotten :') thank you! I had a busy last two weeks so I haven't gotten the chance to reply to everyone but I'll get around to responding like I usually do <3
>
> Now, without further delay, big thank you to Luna, the LOML, for betaing and proof reading like always!! She does such a good job with giving me feedback and always pushing me to be better :')
>
> Enjoy! <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 38 — Confuoco

.

.

.

Two And A Half Months Earlier

The dormant darkness inside of Katsuki viciously snarled and snapped its sharp teeth. The entity melted with the part of him that loved Izuku so deeply. Clashing emotions melded into one, truly testing the thin line between love and hate, until his darkness became a gigantic beast too overwhelming for him to contain.

Katsuki gripped the folder until his fingers tore through it and his nails pierced his skin.

His palms bled all over the photos, dark red pooled over Izuku's face. Drip by drip his thick blood soaked the photo and it gave him pause. He studied how Izuku's face was drowned in red. The same way his mother's had been.

All roads led to Izuku.

As Katsuki stared at the photograph, his darkness and the part of him that loved Izuku agreed on one thing: devour him.

Katsuki's two sides hummed in agreement as his eyes restricted.

While half his brain contemplated mariticide, the other was drowning in hurt so profound he didn't know how to process it. Because why? Why would Izuku, who loved him, do this? How dare he?

How fucking dare Izuku drop this bomb and think he could waltz on with his goddamn life?

Did Izuku think he was disposable? Some trivial chapter, now neatly closed? Or worse—had Katsuki never mattered to the man? Had all those affectionate glances and caring touches been a lie?

His gaze caught on the photograph of his mother. Her smile had been captured mid-laugh, radiant and blinding in the stillness of film. It hurt to look at her. But it hurt more to look away. Because beneath that smile was a graveyard of grief Katsuki buried but never properly mourned. And now Izuku unearthed it. Fucking ripped it out of the ground and left him holding the bones.

Katsuki shook where he stood, trembling so hard his teeth ground together. His heart caved in on itself, collapsing under the weight of the twisted, unspeakable truth in his hands.

The love of his life killed his mother.

An ugly, wretched sob slipped from his lips. Katsuki felt painfully alone.

He craved warmth, a hug specifically. But he was disgusted with himself when the one person who he wanted the hug from was also the person who had inflicted this irreversible pain.

It was here Katsuki felt it again: that horrible loneliness that followed him his whole life. It cut into him and took up room, pushing his cruel self deprecating thoughts that have haunted him since childhood to the surface.

“You’ll never be good enough to be loved,” his self hatred hissed. “Of course he left you here alone to deal with this. Your feelings don’t matter.”

“The last four months were nothing but a lie,” his self-doubt murmured. “There’s no one on this planet that could love a monster like you.”

“Even if he did love you, he left,” his anxiety muttered. “You were never that special to him.”

More tears poured down as he glared at the photograph of Izuku. He felt the distance between them stretch and it broke his heart. How the fuck was this happening? The one person he thought he had finally formed an intimate connection with was gone. And had killed his mother. And quite possibly, fucking knew this whole time.

His anger flared, fusing with his sadness.

Katsuki’s darkness snarled one more time and kicked him into gear.

His eyes snapped up and he violently slammed the folder on the table. He clenched his fists as he stormed back to the bedroom. He knew what he had to do. He deserved to know what happened to his mother straight from the mouth of the assassin. If he had to stalk Izuku to the ends of the goddamn earth, then so be it.

The paralyzer in his blood was lessening with every furious step he took. It vanished as he threw on his clothes, boots, and motorcycle jacket. His mind was like a giant buzzing hornet’s nest as he grabbed for the keys. He threw several clothes into a duffle bag, hastily packing and not paying attention to what he was grabbing.

Then his eyes cut down to his left hand.

The tiny green gem taunted him.

His rage immediately screamed ‘throw it away’. Just as he was about to snatch it off his finger—he stopped.

Without warning, the part of him that loved Izuku surged forward.

He clenched his teeth as he was torn in two. Deep down, he didn’t want to take the ring off. He was in denial, grieving the love he thought they had fostered.

He didn’t want to accept that Izuku would hurt him like this.

But moreover, a tiny voice in his head was worried about Izuku’s safety.

The ugly truth of Izuku being trafficked was like acid in his mouth. He couldn’t shake how Izuku reacted whenever it was mentioned: the smaller man would clam up, his eyes would skate to the side and he would curl into himself.

It all added up as signs of severe abuse.

That damn Izuku could barely utter a word about his upbringing. And because of that, Katsuki pictured it must be the worst living conditions imaginable. For all he knew, Izuku was trapped right now. Probably locked up in a cage like an animal.

Then Katsuki hesitated.

What if Izuku didn't choose to kill his mother? What if he was forced?

But just as quickly, the dark part of him—furious, betrayed—snarled back: don't make excuses and don't be fucking weak. It snapped its teeth at the side of him that loved Izuku.

Katsuki closed his eyes to gain composure when he felt himself slipping. The two halves of him began to detach from each other, and they became at odds. His darkness wanted retribution. But the side of him that loved Izuku wanted answers.

His heart began to split—and it was the worst heartbreak Katsuki ever experienced. But there was one thing that made sense to both sides: find Izuku.

He grabbed his bag and walked out the door towards the train.

In the end, the ring stayed. But so did his fury and so did his heartache.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki arrived at his apartment in Yokohama by sunrise.

His steps were like drums. Loud, furious, and daring to pulverize everything in his way. He didn't say a word to his doorman as he stalked up to his unit. Immediately, he knew where to go.

He ripped the hall closet open and dropped to a crouch. With a snarl, he shoved aside the heavy trunk full of firearms and its metal surface scraped the wood. His hands went straight for the floor. One by one, he tore up the loose boards, ignoring the splinters that bit into his fingers.

Patiently waiting for him underneath was his tracking gear.

The black briefcase radiated death. It was a collection of all the specialized electronics he only used if he was truly hunting a ghost. He picked it up, blew off the layer of dust, and clutched it tightly.

He walked up to his dining room, sat down, and snapped open the latches.

Each device sat in its cutout like an instrument on a surgeon's tray.

Hundreds of tiny, black trackers sat next to his portable hacking deck, signal interceptor, and GPS signal sniffer. He inspected his old signal blocker and customized tracking laptop.

Particularly his laptop he made sure was still good. Over the course of the last ten years, Katsuki took it upon himself to learn coding. He had made from scratch several programs that gave him the upper hand when hunting.

Luckily for him, everything was still in top notch shape.

It had been a couple years since he had to pull this stuff out. Last time, the bastard he was after fled two prefectures and burned every bridge. He nearly got away. But that was the keyword: nearly. Katsuki always was able to track a mark down. There wasn't a person on this planet who could get away from him.

Especially not his goddamn husband.

☽ ☽ ☽

Down in the garage, he stalked straight to slot four. The tarp covering his motorcycle hung heavy like a shroud. He tore it off in one, furious motion.

The scarlet chassis gleamed beneath the overhead lights, sleek and blood-bright. Twin black lines slashed down the frame like war paint. The matching helmet dangled from the handlebar like it had been waiting for him.

He put on his helmet and straddled his bike.

As he put it in gear, he already knew where to start.

The memory of the tall, silver skyscraper complex came to his mind. He could still perfectly picture Izuku walking inside, being swallowed by those large double doors. The sigil was seared in his memory: two snakes intertwining on a V.

Without a second thought, Katsuki sped off into the morning light towards Hadeus, Tokyo.

☽ ☽ ☽

It took a while to find it. The narrow, crooked path Izuku had led him towards all those months ago was not easy to locate.

It was like Hadeus only opened its jaws to a select few. Those it did not want, it chewed up and spit back out. But Katsuki eventually tracked it down, like he did with everything.

Hadeus was marked by the faint smear of blood on the sidewalk that stretched into a narrow alley. He drove carefully down the dark street. And the longer he did, the bumpier the path became—screaming how unwelcome he was.

Exactly like four months ago, it was like entering the Bermuda triangle.

Every trace of normalcy faded. Corner stores vanished, replaced by shuttered fronts and gang-owned stalls. The pedestrians changed too. No office workers or tourists. Only restless men and women with heavy jackets and heavier stares. A few leaned against cracked walls, counting yen or lighting cigarettes.

Their eyes were sharp and unblinking as Katsuki passed.

Neon signs flickered above them in colors too harsh to be warm. The colors bled blue and violet into the street, casting long eerie shadows. From somewhere close, laughter burst out loud and sharp. But it was the kind that didn't sound too friendly.

He kept riding, scanning for the cluster of skyscrapers burned into his memory.

But Hadeus was bigger than he recalled. It was a labyrinth of smoke, steel, and concrete. Hundreds of people milled about. Some hawked at sizzling, savory street food. Others tucked into corners under the bass thrum of music spilling from broken windows. Clubs with blacked-out glass pulsed with life like open wounds.

The road tightened, choked by bodies and sound.

As Katsuki went further in, a man with an eye patch watched him too long—much like a predator weighing the kill. Katsuki gripped his throttle tighter. Suddenly, he understood why Aizawa had warned them about this damn place.

Right as Katsuki was beginning to think he messed up the location, he saw it: the twin viper sigil.

Exactly like he remembered, it sat on top of gleaming glass double doors.

As he drew near, Katsuki slowed his bike. He parked it around the corner, hidden in the shadows. He took off his helmet, and the wind blew through his hair. He looked up, studying each floor of the silver building as it stretched into the dark fog above him.

Then, the doors opened.

His heart pulsed.

Out walked two people. One man, one woman. They were dressed all in black with dark colored hair. In their hands were briefcases but what caught Katsuki's attention were their eyes.

Sitting inside of their stares was a chilling, vacant hollowness.

It perfectly matched Izuku's photo tucked inside the red folder.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki found a tall, grimy hotel wedged beside the Viper Academy.

It was the kind of place that reeked of desperation and sketchy deals. Instead of regular people who needed a place to spend the night, shady business exchanges were clearly running.

He passed by one group of women smoking in the hallway. They leered at him, scrutinizing him in case he was trouble. Then another group of people looked over their shoulders, skittish. And another pair of men didn't even bother to glance at him, but there was blood caked on their faces and murder dancing in their eyes.

All of this made Katsuki feel right at home. No one would bat an eye at him coming and going for the next few days.

He paid cash and requested the room he scoped out. It had a clear view of The Viper Academy's front entrance. From there, he could watch every single bastard who came or went.

When he opened the door to his room, the smell of mildew greeted him. Next, the scent of stale cigarettes wafted all around. He noticed how the grey wallpaper peeled at the corners and how the overhead light flickered like a dying insect. The mattress sagged in the middle and there was a weird, questionable stain on the carpet.

But all Katsuki cared about was the single grimy window that overlooked the street below.

He pulled the rickety coffee table to the window and began to set up. He positioned his heavy duty laptop on the surface and neatly laid out all his guns, ammo, and high tech devices. With a soft grunt, Katsuki grabbed the wobbly wooden chair in the room and sat down.

He peaked out the curtains of the window and glanced down below.

☽ ☽ ☽

First Week of Separation

Katsuki barely slept. Not because he didn't want to, but because whenever he fell asleep he was greeted by the same, horrible lucid nightmare involving his mother.

It started like a true dream. He was back in his mother's apartment, smiling and laughing with her. He could feel the way her small hands cupped his face and how she would halfway hug him. He could smell the lingering perfume as she walked across the room to prepare dinner while making snide remarks.

Then when she turned around, she was smiling as blood trickled down her temple from a gunshot wound.

He would spring up and try to grab her, horrified as her eyes rolled back. But he was held in place by Yakuza goons stronger than him.

He whipped his head to the side and there, he could see Chisaki. The Yakuza Heir's cold, golden stare cut into Katsuki ruthlessly. While behind him, Izuku lurked in his shadows. His lover's green gaze was no longer sweet or docile. It was mercilessly sharp as he held up the smoking gun to his lips and gave it a venomous kiss.

Then like clockwork, Katsuki would wake up choking on his own breath, drenched in sweat.

After three dreams like that, Katsuki put all his efforts into hacking into The Viper Academy's system.

He wasn't as good as Denki. The annoying Pikachu probably could hijack the system in less than eight hours if given the right motivation. But what Katsuki lacked in knowledge, he made up for in sheer, blazing spite and black coffee.

While his fingers coded on auto pilot, his thoughts slowed up. The cloud of hurt and anger gave way to logic ever so slightly.

He couldn't help but wonder why Izuku left so abruptly. It didn't make any damn sense.

Red folder aside, Katsuki assumed Izuku would make one more attempt to sever their marriage before he departed. The nerd had made it abundantly clear that he wanted a divorce. But instead, Izuku just left. He didn't even leave behind so much as a cell phone number or divorce papers so they could get their accidental matrimony sorted out.

It was…odd. Concerning, really, if he was being truthful.

So Katsuki made the only conclusion he could: someone else interfered and dragged Izuku back before they could close out. Whoever it was must've then told Izuku that he was the true killer of Bakugou Mitsuki, and Izuku left abruptly right after finding out.

Because even though Katsuki was angry, he felt as if that would make sense for Izuku's character.

He could see the sensitive man's bleeding heart dosed in shame. And because of that, Izuku likely departed without a fight. It made sense that he would go back to a place that treated him so terribly if he was too ashamed to properly ask for help.

And because of that, Katsuki's concern for Izuku's safety was sitting at the front of his mind. He could imagine shadow hands dragging the smaller man into a cage. However, despite this imagery, the longer he staked out The Viper Academy, Katsuki noticed two strange things.

First, Izuku was nowhere in sight.

The second, the people coming and going came back every single time.

Over the course of several days, he watched people buzz about the building. Some of them he began to recognize. They would dress in different outfits such as casual jeans, or formal blazers, or even stealth suits meant for assignments. But a lot of them talked and got food like normal people. They wandered around Hadeus like it was a regular neighborhood and laughed with the other shady locals as if they were completely free.

It was really bizarre. Because if these people were like Izuku—sold into human trafficking—why the hell did they look so content? But more importantly, why did they go back every time?

He couldn't quite figure it out.

Suddenly, his laptop dinged.

His hands ceased typing as a pop up window appeared on his screen. Staring back at him was the disabled firewall for The Viper Academy's network.

He swallowed hard. Then his mind flooded with visions of Izuku.

He leaned in, and began to scroll through all the folders inside. Some things were still heavily encrypted. Like clientele info and agent records. He also curiously saw a heavily guarded folder entitled 'Mamushi Venom: Failed Mithridatism Experiments.'

But luckily for him the alarm for the back gate was accessible.

He set an automatic alarm and code on his laptop for 02:00am. When the clock struck at that exact time, his software would temporarily disarm the back gate for one hour. That was long enough for him to slip through, get inside, and find Izuku without needing to poke the hornets' nest.

As he tried his best to rest up, the two emotions inside of him were clashing. They were fighting over what to do when he actually found Izuku. His darkness wanted blood but his love wanted clarity.

The more the night bled away, his love won out.

It was tipped over by looking at his phone.

His lock screen was still Izuku. It was that stupid, cute photo of the man feeding a deer at the same time a small butterfly landed on his nose. His rage wanted him to change it to a blank, black screen. But his love was winning out the more and more he thought of Izuku being somewhere alone and frightened.

For the rest of the night, Katsuki idly scrolled through the four months worth of photos of Izuku smiling on his phone.

☽ ☽ ☽

Breaking in didn't go as planned.

Turns out, the Vipers have more than just a firewall, they had fucking armed guards waiting inside.

It took all but two steps into the courtyard for shit to hit the fan. Katsuki was spotted within seconds and shot at. Luckily for him, he was quick on his feet. He ducked out of the garage before it could slam shut again and sped off on his motorcycle.

He clenched his teeth as the guards kept on his tail in hot pursuit. They poured into large black SUVs, chasing him quickly. He bobbed and ducked as bullets whizzed past his helmet and skinned his jacket.

He twisted his throttle, weaving through Tokyo's backstreets at neck breaking speed.

☽ ☽ ☽

After he shook them, Katsuki decided to follow his better judgement and leave his motorcycle elsewhere. He found an isolated garage in the next district over. It was dressed in blackness and completely out of reach of CCTV.

From there, he trekked back to Hadeus on foot in different clothing he bought on the fly.

He kept his head down, jaw clenched so tight it ached. When gangsters passed too close or let their gaze linger a second too long, he pulled the brim of his baseball cap low, shrouding his face in shadows. As he walked, every bass drop from the blacked-out clubs made his blood throb in sync. It was like Hadeus itself was mocking him—pulsing with life while he felt like he was bleeding out inside.

By the time he reached his hotel room, his head felt like it was going to explode.

He shut the door behind him and collapsed into the chair by his workstation.

For a moment, he just sat there. His chest rose and fell like a storm, barely holding it together.

Then, he snapped.

“Fuck!” he roared, hurling his cap across the room. It hit the wall with a dull thud and slid down.

He clawed his hands through his hair and gripped the roots. He shakily breathed as he dropped his head forward. Then he bent low in the chair, elbows on his knees, fingers laced behind his neck as though trying to hold himself together with pressure alone.

His failure tasted like ash.

It choked him. The bitter reality of not knowing what was going on made him unwillingly imagine it. His mind toggled between sweet Izuku locked in some nightmarish chamber and then his mother. He felt her blood, her smile, and her deathly silence.

His breath came in shallow pulls.

Katsuki shook his head hard, like he could knock the pain loose from his skull. Then slowly, he straightened. He forced the tremor out of his hands, and stared at his laptop’s screen.

There had to be another way in. And he was going to tear that whole place apart until he fucking found it.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki pressed his laptop keys smoothly as he slipped past another firewall.

He took a slow, large gulp of his black coffee. His eyes were bloodshot from lack of sleep as he dived deeper and deeper into The Viper Academy’s system.

It was here he found that within The Viper Academy halls were hundreds of wire taps. They all funneled into the main system, likely feeding audio to whoever was in charge. Katsuki thought it was disgusting. But he supposed in a place like that, of course the walls had ears. No one sold there probably ever had a shred of damn privacy.

His anger bristled on Izuku's behalf.

He listened for a full day to various conversations. Most were casual. A lot were about assignments and killing. But many of the conversations confused Katsuki. Because how the fuck did these people seem so calm? Weren't they being held against their will?

Then finally Katsuki caught a conversation that was useful.

"Himiko!" A voice of a man said. The grainy vocals frayed through Katsuki's computer as he tried to stabilize the signal. "Hey! Do you happen to know where Izuku is? I wanted to ask him something about venom altercation. We're running more Mamushi Venom trials."

"Sorry," A sharp voice of a woman replied. She sounded like she couldn't give less of a damn. "You're shit out of luck. The runt isn't here."

"Really? I thought he was back from Bangkok by now."

"He is. But Tomura moved him out of the compound."

"Ah, that sucks. Do you know where Tomura moved him to?"

"I do, but I'm not supposed to tell."

The conversation then faded, buried underneath static.

Katsuki's heart skipped a beat and then his stomach knotted.

He recognized the name Tomura. Izuku had mentioned it during their time in Biei, specifically when he had the breakdown at the mere sight of a belt. In that small window, Katsuki learned the older brother who relentlessly abused Izuku was named Tomura—and now that bastard had taken him somewhere.

He wearily looked out the window again towards the building.

☽ ☽ ☽

Second Week of Separation

Izuku wasn't at The Viper Academy. That dead end slammed Katsuki right back to square fucking zero.

No leads, no trail. Just static in his ears and fury in his gut. He spent hours hunched over the wiretaps strung through the hallways, listening for anything—anything—that could point him in the right direction. But he got nothing. There was not a single goddamn hint about where Izuku had been moved to by Tomura.

Katsuki only had one, real choice left. He had to go on foot, wandering around Hadeus.

He felt like he was searching for a ghost. Around every corner he saw a memory of Izuku. Chuckling. Smiling. Clutching his book against his chest. Katsuki searched in every restaurant, alley and building that he came across. But each time he thought he saw Izuku—it turned out it wasn't.

He circled past one of those loud obnoxious clubs again, but this time he was cut off.

Suddenly, a wall of bodies formed in front of him. Katsuki looked up from underneath his baseball cap and narrowed his eyes. In front of him were three men and one lethal looking woman.

She stood at the center, posture relaxed but commanding. A cigarette was tucked behind her ear and brass knuckles gleamed on both of her well manicured hands.

The men flanked her like obedient hounds on a leash.

One was thin and jittery. He was flicking a switch knife open and close with trembling hands. Another was a hulking mass of muscle, his face marked by a crooked nose and an eyebrow piercing. Then the last man, silent and cunning, hovered behind her. He was watching Katsuki with deadly intent as he kept his hands behind his back—likely on a gun.

Katsuki didn't move. And neither did they.

Then finally, the woman broke the silence with a soft, dangerous smile.

"What's your name, blondie?" she asked, voice slow like molasses. "I've seen you creeping around my club the last couple of days."

Katsuki tore into her with a vicious glare. "Don't worry about it."

"I'm afraid I'm gonna have to," she replied. One look was all it took for her hounds of men to take a step forward and show their guns. They pointed them straight at Katsuki's heart, knees, and head. "Let's try this again, shall we? You've been extremely suspicious peaking into my VIP section. You don't even say a word before you turn and leave. Did someone send you as a spy from Dragon's side?"

"I have no idea who Dragon is," Katsuki replied calmly, not fazed by the weapons. "I'm only looking for someone. I don't want trouble."

The burly man spoke up. "Who are you looking for then if you're not a spy?"

Katsuki groaned. This is why he fucking hated gangsters. They were the most jumpy goddamn people on this planet.

With careful movements, Katsuki decided to take out his phone. He turned his device around for them to see his lock screen of Izuku.

"I'm looking for him," Katsuki explained. "Have you seen this guy? I really need to talk to him."

All four gangsters exchanged looks, then broke out into loud, crazy laughter.

Katsuki frowned. What the hell was so funny?

The jittery one doubled over like it was the best joke he'd heard all week. Even the silent one cracked a grin. The woman flicked her hand again, and the guns vanished as quickly as they'd come. Now they were looking at Katsuki like he was some poor sap who'd wandered into the wrong alley.

"You and half of Hadeus are looking for that pretty thing," the woman said with a shake of her head.

Katsuki's eyes narrowed. "What is that supposed to mean?"

"You heard me, lover boy," she teased pointedly. "You're not the only one running behind that Viper for a bite. You might as well get in line."

Suddenly, another gangster from the shadows arose. Katsuki didn't even notice him at first. He was shorter in stature and gripping a long knife. He must have been keeping watch in case Katsuki was trouble. But now he joined in like he wanted a slice of the gossip.

"Who's he lookin' for?" The short man asked curiously.

"You'll never guess," the jittery man snickered. "Viridian!"

The short guy covered his mouth in pure humor and shook his head at him.

"Another poor soul smitten by the green eyed gem of Hadeus," the woman chuckled. "I don't blame you. I'm also hoping for a shot one day. Maybe in our dreams we'll all get lucky."

"It's not like that," Katsuki hissed, suddenly feeling very possessive. "I actually know him."

"Sure you do," the big one said with patronizing sympathy. "Look, you might as well give it up. Izuku is polite, but he's not going to give you the time of day. He doesn't go out with anyone. Trust me, I've been trying to fuck him for the last five years. He's as prude as they come."

"Well, I heard he's shacked up with the Yakuza Heir," the short man said casually. "They're probably kissin' and grindin' as we speak."

White noise cut through Katsuki's ears.

"…What the hell did you just say?" He turned to the man, voice sharp like a blade.

"Chisaki Kai," the man clarified like it was obvious. "I heard from a friend of a friend that they're havin' some sort of courtship. A lot of people who work for Chisaki are vouching for it too. They're all sayin' Chisaki basically put the word out that no one is allowed to touch Izuku besides him—and he doesn't say things like that lightly. They might be half way into a honeymoon stage by now."

“Ugh, of course,” the woman sighed. “Makes sense someone like Izuku would wind up with a Yakuza. Power and beauty. Tale as old as time.”

Katsuki’s pulse roared in his ears.

“Bullshit,” he growled, immediately rejecting the concept. “There’s no way in hell that’s possible.”

“Oh, it’s possible,” the short man doubled down. “Look, maybe you can find Viridian down below. He tends to run errands for his brother in the circles pretty frequently.”

Katsuki hesitated. “What do you mean…down below?”

“In the real Hadeus,” the man replied, watching the growing confusion on Katsuki’s face. “Oh, you’re kidding me right? You’ve never been to the circles before?”

“No,” Katsuki replied, fully guarded.

The jittery one pointed across the street, toward a thumping blacked-out club.

“Go in there and go towards the back,” he instructed sinisterly. “There’ll be an entrance and the code word to get in is ‘Inferno’. Maybe you’ll find Izuku and he can tell you straight up he’s not interested.”

They all laughed again and began to walk away.

“Good luck, lover boy,” the woman called over her shoulder, waving as the group turned and walked off, grinning.

☽ ☽ ☽

Against his better judgement, he followed the instructions. Every nerve in his body was screaming for him to turn around because this was clearly a trap. But his mind was stuck on Izuku. Specifically what those extras said about Izuku and Chisaki.

It had to be bullshit. Pure, trashy gossip people tossed around for sport.

Still, the words bothered Katsuki.

When he got to the back of the humid club, he was met with four large body guards with mean sneers. He didn’t look them in the eye as he spoke the password. It was the key to a lock, and immediately one of the guards stepped aside. He pulled back the velvety curtain for Katsuki and it was as if Hadeus finally opened its jaws.

Katsuki walked past all its sharp teeth and found an elevator. A herd of people were busy coming and going on it and it took him a while to push inside. There was only one, black button. He pressed it and the elevator doors clanged and swallowed him whole.

Down, down, down the throat he went.

The air got colder, denser, and more sour with every moment of descent. As he stood in the packed elevator, Katsuki couldn't shake the sensation that this was bad news.

When the elevator reached the bottom, it was like he was spat into the underworld.

Enormous black pillars rose up around him, sleek as obsidian.

They vanished into the ceiling so high it didn't seem real. Bridges hung between the pillars like suspended veins, carrying foot traffic over balconies and into buildings that jutted from the concrete like tumors. Everything here was cast in shadows and neon lights. Crimson, plum and indigo illuminated from all over, making the three colors blend together like they would in a bruise.

People roughly shoved past him when he didn't move, but Katsuki couldn't if he tried. He was too shocked.

He'd heard the phrase 'Tokyo's underground scene' tossed around before, sure. That meant sleazy bars, clubs too exclusive for the public, and places people only found if they knew the right kind of scum.

But this—

This wasn't a metaphor.

Hadeus was a real city—no. It was a machine with a million moving parts.

The air down here reeked of liquor, sweat, and something metallic. Blood, most likely. People were shouting over thumping bass, and he could see men and women in stilettos with glassy eyes selling pleasure with a smile. Woven between them were gangsters in suits grinning too wide. And smoke curled from cigarettes like fingers wrapping around all of their throats.

Katsuki swallowed when all his alarms went off.

☽ ☽ ☽

As he descended, he learned that the first level he had been on was just the beginning.

There were nine levels total, each representing a different theme.

It was like Hadeus was Tokyo's wicked twin. It was a perfect reflection inverted and warped until all that was beautiful was tainted by malice. Hundreds of bodies moved around him, brushing past like insects, vibrating with noise, energy and hunger.

The First Circle was called Limbo.

It stretched wide and open, a network of half-formed buildings and alleyways. It hummed with low-grade desperation. Shady types crawled through the dim streets, looking lost or hunting for a gang to claim them. The buildings served as halfway sanctuaries. He learned these places were where people could crash for the night without too many questions. Or stash something quick and dirty before disappearing into the dark.

The Second Circle, Lust, hit Katsuki like a backhand to the face.

As he walked downward, the lights changed. Fuchsia and red bled across the walls like smears of neon blood. It was a red-light district, and it was thriving. The architecture mimicked the vastness of the circle above. But the energy was louder here. Shameless and truly damn hungry. Alluring men and women leaned out of doorways, beckoning with painted nails and sleepy eyes. Brothels, strip dens, and underground sex clubs tempted anyone who walked by.

The glow in the Third Circle, Gluttony, was sickly.

Green lights with yellow flickers that danced like chemical flames. This was the stomach of Hadeus, and it churned. The streets were lined with illegal restaurants that had black-market chefs selling dishes that were banned topside. The air reeked of grease, smoke, and something acrid and sweet. There were booths tucked into corners, peddling banned drugs without shame.

But even after searching in every crack there, Katsuki somehow thought the Fourth Circle, Greed, was worse.

It screamed a type of capitalism Katsuki always detested. Greed lived here in the open, unashamed and weaponized. Gambling dens stretched as far as the eye could see, and every corner had a loan shark smiling with too many teeth. People in sharp suits traded dirty money like playing cards. He learned every square foot belonged to someone who had bought it with blood or leverage.

He bitterly thought about how much his mother would love it in this circle, specifically.

The Fifth Circle, Anger, was smaller than the last four. It narrowed ever so slightly and his cell phone signal gave out.

Down here, Katsuki noticed the bustling noise faded.

Instead, the air simmered with rage. Underground fighting rings were everywhere, pitting people against each other in cages. Some bare-knuckled. Others held sharpened blades. It didn't take much for Katsuki to realize blood was currency here. Graffiti covered the walls, and every individual looked seconds away from swinging. Even the air tasted of violence as people placed bids on who they thought would be the winner.

The Sixth Circle, Hersey, made Katsuki's skin feel cold.

Not physically. But his bones recognized the shift. It was sterile, quiet, and more dangerous and narrower than Anger. This level was carved from doctrine and ideology. Radical groups holed up in glass-and-metal buildings. They preached dangerous truths or outright goddamn lies to anyone who lingered long enough to listen. There were cults, self-help movements twisted beyond recognition, and even sanctuaries of scientists so deep in their theories they abandoned humanity altogether.

The Seventh Circle, Violence, reeked of rot.

This was violence in its purest form. Not brawls or grudges—no. This was calculated cruelty. Human trafficking routes. Torture bunkers. Every room Katsuki passed in this level left screams unanswered. This was the worst of what humanity had to offer. As he searched for Izuku, he found many buildings down in this smaller circle were locked or blocked off.

Katsuki wandered here the most. He was worried sick that Izuku was trapped inside one of those locked rooms. But like the other six circles, he couldn't find him. So he continued his journey down.

The Eighth Circle, Fraud, sickened his stomach.

Everyone here was a damn liar, and that was the only honest thing about it. Counterfeiters, con artists, and blackmailers lined the streets. Paperwork traded hands faster than blades. Identities were for sale as people started over with entirely new names and lives.

Katsuki sighed as he finished searching every inch of the Eighth Circle.

His eyes looked up at the long row of swaying red lanterns above his head. They lined a narrow passageway of buildings that was packed with skittish people. Light chatter was all around him as flickering red, orange, and purple neon signs written in kanji flickered on and off.

Katsuki squatted down on the concrete doorstep of one building. Above him, a neon sign for a secret pub hummed softly.

He stared solemnly at his lock screen of Izuku. His heart twisted in a terrible way. In every single circle, Katsuki showed Izuku's picture around in hopes that someone knew where he was.

He felt really fucking pathetic, like a kid passing around a flyer of their beloved lost animal. It was demeaning. And it only added to his growing frustration because every time someone did recognize Izuku—they laughed him off. Or Shrugged. Or even tried to ask him where'd he gotten the picture and if he could fucking air drop it to them.

But worse, he just found more people emphasizing that rumor about Izuku and Chisaki.

"They're totally in love," one old gangster said with a shrug. "I heard from the Yakuza themselves that Chisaki is planning to sweep Viridian off his feet and keep him for himself."

A sex worker also confirmed the same thing. "I've heard that Chisaki is already planning to woo him with some grand gesture. You might as well cut your losses. Once Chisaki has his sights set on someone, they're as good as his."

"My friend swore she saw them kissing in one of the lounges in the third circle about five months ago," a drunk man had snickered. "They're probably together."

And those were just some of the confirmations that stood out amongst many.

Katsuki shook his head when his anger started to overpower his love for Izuku. He had not a clue what the fuck was going on. But he decided he didn't believe it. Not unless he saw it for his damn self he wasn't going to believe those disgusting rumors.

He picked himself up and began to work his way down to the very last circle, Treachery.

When he approached the last, concrete stairway, cold air spilled from down below. He shivered as the wintry breeze touched him and gritted his teeth when ominous eyes crawled on his skin.

As he walked down the dark staircase, he noticed the distinct lack of people. No drunken beggars. No sex workers. No music and no liveliness like up above.

But he did notice the few people here were sharper looking. Meaner and gruffer. They all donned katanas on their backs, tattoos and a symbol of a geometric flower somewhere on them. Katsuki narrowed his eyes at the sigil. He didn't recognize it, but it was pinned on every single person's black blazers.

As he approached the entrance for the Ninth Circle, a row of thick body guards stopped him.

"Sorry you can't go down there," a large, built woman barked at him. She leered down at him with the meanest snarl Katsuki ever seen.

Katsuki frowned and glared at her. "Why not?"

"Ninth circle is reserved for Shie Hassaikai personnel only," she stated. "Now, beat it."

Katsuki frowned deeper. Then goosebumps raced down his spine. His killer instincts heightened and he carefully glanced over his shoulder. There, he could see every eye on the staircase was on him. They were all suspiciously sizing him up with their hands on their guns and swords.

It was easy to conclude everyone surrounding him was a scummy Yakuza. Which meant that the geometric flower pin they were all wearing was the Shie Hassaikai symbol.

Katsuki backed up slowly, deciding poking this nest would be suicidal. When he was on top of the concrete stairs, he took one more glance down at the hidden level.

A pull in his gut told him that he would be back.

☽ ☽ ☽

When Katsuki made it back to his motel room, his eyes were bloodshot. The veins inside of them were spidering through the white like wildfire, inflamed and angry. He knew he looked wrecked but he honestly felt worse.

Sleep was clawing at him now, begging to drag him under after days of running on fumes. His skull throbbed with a migraine that felt like someone jammed a knife through the base of it and twisted. But none of that mattered. All he could think about was Izuku—and fucking Chisaki.

The image of them together sent a violent heat through his chest. His jealousy flared so fast and savage it made his teeth clench. But beneath the fury, his gut was twisting with doubt.

It didn't sit right.

Izuku was a romantic. Hell, he'd waited to have his first time with the right person. He was the kind of idiot who blushed at Hallmark movies and cried during the sappy wedding scenes. His Izuku wouldn't fall for men like Chisaki. He wouldn't touch filth like that, let alone smile at them.

And yet, everyone in Hadeus that knew Izuku seemed to think otherwise. It was like these people knew an entirely different version of Izuku—one that Katsuki had never seen.

He worried as he sat on the edge of the bed.

He went digging into his duffel, meaning to grab the red folder. But instead, his fingers caught on a thick red fabric. He frowned in confusion and held it up. Katsuki exhaled roughly, bitterly laughing almost.

In his furious packing haze, he had accidentally grabbed the bright, scarlet red suit he bought with Izuku. He remembered how Izuku told him he looked good in red, cheeks pink and eyes full of love. Resentfully, Katsuki shoved the suit aside and pushed the memory down where it couldn't hurt him.

He clutched the red folder with shaking hands.

The paper inside was wrinkled now, bent at the corners from being handled too many times. Still, he opened it again, forcing his tired eyes to read every damn word. He wanted to find some kind of inconsistency. Something that screamed forgery or a trick. But the deeper he read, the colder his blood ran.

There was nothing but the truth here.

With every new detail Katsuki forced himself to absorb, it was proven this is what actually happened to his mother. He saw the absurd dollar amount The Viper Academy had been paid —and the percentage that was Izuku's personal cut. Chisaki even listed things about her that only someone who stalked her would know. Much like the red folders Katsuki would be handed before his own assignments.

He even learned his mother had been with the Chisaki family during that winter she abandoned him. She sought refuge in a Yakuza safe house, took out a loan of about a million yen to get back on her feet, then fled without repaying her debts. She even stole some pearls from Chisaki's grandmother.

Katsuki's stomach twisted. That sounded very much like his mother.

Now it made sense what happened back then. He always wondered how they were able to afford a whole new apartment and car after she had disappeared for an entire year.

But worse, there was a small, italicized sentence at the bottom of one paragraph: Overhaul formally agrees to have Stain take the credit for the murder for optics purposes.

That sentence alone felt like it confirmed all his nightmares. He discerned that Overhaul must've been Chisaki's code name. Same for Stain for Chizome for whatever reason.

His eyes caught the glint of the small green gem on his finger. He began to toy with the ring, spinning it back and forth on his finger, trying not to crumble.

"Why did you leave me like this, Izuku?" Katsuki muttered sadly.

And in the silence that followed, not even the walls had an answer.

☽ ☽ ☽

Over the course of the week, Katsuki prowled the underground circles of Hadeus like a ghost chasing an echo.

He slipped through the alleys, clubs, and bars again and again and again. Somehow, word got around fast amongst some of the low-level gangsters. The cruel minded people started calling him Lover Boy in a half-mocking, half-pitying way. They were beyond amused, enjoying watching a man unravel in real time.

Katsuki had now spent two weeks in Tokyo—and he had jack shit to show for it.

No matter how many networks he hacked or hushed conversations he leaned into, nothing pointed to Izuku. It was like chasing smoke with his bare hands.

Izuku's legal names only came up twice: once on his death certificate as Midoriya Izuku at the age of two. Then another time, Mamushi Izuku came up with their marriage certificate. The proof of their union was floating in the public Nago, Okinawa wedding registry. But that was all any digital database gave about Izuku.

There was no phone number. No email. There weren't even medical records. Not even a whisper of the Mamushi surname was in government databases or public files.

It was like Izuku never existed.

Currently, he was lying in bed. His head was pounding as he poorly attempted to rest his eyes. To his side on the coffee table was his laptop. He decided to keep an open line on The Viper Academy's wiretaps in case something of interest popped up.

"Damn, you look beat," the deep voice of a man chuckled.

"I am," a woman groaned. She sighed loudly and her voice picked up static through the receiver. "My back is killing me from the assignment I just finished. Do you think you can buy the grocery for Izuku and Katsuma tomorrow morning before we go see them so I can sleep in?"

Katsuki sprung upright and looked at his laptop with wide eyes.

"Yeah, no problem. What time did you want to head out tomorrow to drop off the food?"

"Probably around eight a.m. so we can be there by nine. Oh. By the way, are you going to the masquerade ball Chisaki is throwing for him and Izuku's coming out? It's Saturday."

"Mhm, Tomura is making me," the man grumbled, seemingly unhappy. "He wants extra muscle there in case something goes wrong. I told him I think he's being paranoid but he seems worried."

"That's just Tomura. You know how he gets about Izuku. He asked me to come too and make sure everything goes smoothly."

"Damn, this Izuku and Chisaki getting together is a real big deal, huh?"

"It is!" The woman said cheerily. "Ah. I'm so excited. I still can't believe Izuku caught the Yakuza Heir's eye. That's such a big accomplishment!"

The conversation fizzled out with static, moving elsewhere.

Katsuki scrambled over to his laptop, and immediately tried to fine tune his software to continue listening. But found nothing but static cutting into him. The two agents must have moved behind closed doors where there were no wiretaps.

He stared with confused, hurt eyes at his screen.

Katsuki's breath came out in short, jagged huffs. His pain and anger began to swell as he processed what he just heard.

He glanced at the dark, scarlet tux carelessly tossed on the back of a chair in a new light.

☽ ☽ ☽

Third Week of Separation

When the morning came, Katsuki checked out of his motel room.

He went and got his bike before sunrise, and stationed himself a good healthy distance from The Viper Academy. He clutched his binoculars as he kept an eye out for a man bringing in groceries.

Then he saw him. The tall man walked like he constantly had some smooth jazz music looped in his head. He was dark blond and in the middle of his forehead was a strange, perfectly vertical scar. And in his arms, he hauled along a healthy heap of groceries.

The guy didn't see Katsuki as he walked in The Viper Academy. Then he didn't see Katsuki again when he exited with a green haired woman through the back.

The two rode off in a bright, electric blue sports' car towards the highway.

Katsuki's resolve to get to Izuku deepened. With bloodshot eyes, Katsuki pulled his helmet down over his head. The visor clicked into place with a hiss, muffling his uneven breathing. Then the engine roared back to life beneath him.

He kicked off the curb and tore into the street like a bullet chasing its mark.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki eased back on the throttle as the car far ahead of him veered off the main road. It disappeared into a winding, tree choked path that cut into a private area. He spun around on his bike and began to discreetly circle the perimeter to look for another way in.

He drove around until he found a proper vantage point. It was far enough to not be spotted through the thick layer of trees, but close enough where he could still see.

From here, he spotted a giant ocean side mansion. It was embedded into the side of a cliff and appeared more marvelous than anything Katsuki had ever seen. These were the types of houses he would drive by and wonder how in the hell did someone ever afford such property.

With a grunt, he sat down behind a row of bushes and pulled out his binoculars.

He scoped out the scene, and found several armed guards with rifles circling like hawks. But when he lifted up and looked to the rooftop—his heart stopped.

Through the lens he recognized the shape of Izuku.

He was getting out of a pool that was stationed on the rooftop.

Izuku rose from the water like the enchanting creature he was, hair flipping back as droplets sprayed all over. Ribbons of water rolled down his defined back muscles and v-cut abdomen as he hoisted himself up with a brilliantly bright smile. His hands pushed back his bouncy, wet curls as he began to dry off with a towel.

Katsuki slowly peeled the binoculars away from his face. He blinked.

This wasn't at all what he thought he would find when he finally located Izuku.

He imagined Izuku in the basement of some shady warehouse, being forced against his will to do unspeakable things. But instead, he found this.

For the rest of that day, Katsuki observed.

He was originally doing this to get a feel on the guards' patrol patterns so he could sneak inside. But instead he found himself gawking at what he was witnessing through the windows.

Katsuki was baffled.

The whole day Izuku was happily smiling, playing with a small child. The boy had light brown eyes and hair with a smile that resembled Izuku's. Katsuki assumed this must have been the child, Katsuma, that Izuku mentioned that he needed to get out.

But neither of them looked scared. They looked peaceful as they ran around the mansion playing tag.

Izuku and the small child played hide and seek outside, ate healthy, and watched TV on the biggest screen Katsuki had ever seen. Even more so, the clothes they were dressed in were expensive. He recognized the name brand logo that was stitched into the black sweater above Izuku's heart. That shirt alone cost roughly 140,000 yen.

He even saw Izuku quietly hand wash a dark green Rolls-Royce Phantom Oribe in the driveway. The way he was attentive to the rims made Katsuki guess the car was Izuku's. This was confirmed when he saw the license plate said 'Viridian'.

Something unpleasant tugged at Katsuki.

It was rooted in shame for how impoverished he grew up.

When they were kids, he always considered there was a possibility that Izuku was extremely well off. The fact Izuku was able to steal money without being noticed alluded that whoever was raising him was rich enough to not miss a few dollars.

This was completely opposite of how Katsuki grew up. Katsuki was raised dirt poor, struggling from the bottom to keep his head above water.

But here Izuku was with no chains, no gun to his head, and wealthy beyond comprehension. It looked like he was here, willingly. Happily far away from Katsuki and all his brokenness.

"He knows you're from the gutter," his self hatred hissed. "Why would anyone that wealthy want to lower themselves to your level? Of course he doesn't love trash like you."

"The problem is you," his self-doubt murmured. "You were not a good enough person for him to stay."

"Even if he does love you, he left," his anxiety muttered. "He chose to be far away from you."

With a heavy heart, Katsuki continued to observe Izuku.

☽ ☽ ☽

The next two days, Katsuki camped out at his vantage point in the cold.

He shivered in his sleeping-bag as he waited for an opening to get inside of Izuku's home.

But it was hard. The armed guards that circled the mansion barely took a break. It was like they were wind up robots. They were more efficient than anything Katsuki had ever seen. They didn't slack off for a single second and that made it almost impossible to get close to the mansion without tripping alarms.

While he waited for an opening, Katsuki watched Izuku through the large glass windows.

During these two days, Izuku frequently checked his phone. Katsuki grew sadder. He wondered why Izuku hadn't even bothered to leave him his phone number. Did he really never plan to talk to Katsuki again? It seemed like it. Izuku lazed around the mansion watching TV and reading books out loud to Katsuma.

It was as if the four months they spent together didn't happen.

From the looks of it, Izuku had really moved on with his life. He didn't seem to give a single damn about the wreckage he left Katsuki in.

Seeing Izuku so relaxed and well taken care of fed into the hurt inside of Katsuki's chest. And when his hurt grew—so did his anger. The two were so attached for him, and the passage between them was the same tunnel inside of Katsuki's heart.

Then on the third night, Katsuki saw something he didn't think was possible: one of the guards slipped up.

Someone showed up late for their shift, leaving the back window and patio entirely unguarded.

Immediately, he sprung up from his sleeping bag and dusted the dead leaves off his body. It was late at night, and he could see Izuku in his usual spot on the couch watching something on TV.

Masking himself in the dark of the night, Katsuki bled into the shadows. He crept up quietly, jumping over the fence in the back and landing expertly on his feet. His sharp eyes homed in on Izuku who hadn't seen anything, too distracted by something in his hands.

Using the tree line, Katsuki crept closer to the house. He carefully scanned for cameras, and was happy there were none in the backyard. Then when Katsuki crouched low in a bush by the window, he froze. At this angle, he finally got a view of the TV—and it was playing their wedding video.

"I promise to always come back to you, darling," the Katsuki on the screen said drunkenly.

Katsuki's heart skipped a beat.

Izuku was playing their wedding video? The tiny fragments of his love for Izuku pieced together then. His heart fluttered in a dangerous way, going against all the hurt that was stacking up inside of him.

Katsuki crept closer. He got near enough to gaze from behind Izuku.

And in Izuku's hands was a photograph.

It was of them, wearing flower crowns and laying on the grass. They had cheesy grins on their face and the look in both of their eyes seemed so hopeful. Izuku lightly traced Katsuki's smile with his fingers.

So much affection was pouring out from those lovely, green eyes.

His love for Izuku pushed his anger out of the way and gripped the wheel. It held on tightly as he walked up to the window without thinking. He looked closer now, and that's when he noticed what he couldn't see from so far away: Izuku was sad.

Depression was pouring off of Izuku in waves as he comforted himself with the memories of Katsuki.

Katsuki's heart pulled. His intuition began screaming: something was deeply wrong. Why did Izuku look like he was on the verge of crying?

Too deep in his thoughts, Katsuki didn't see Katsuma until it was too late.

He heard a tiny gasp close to the glass.

His eyes snapped down.

At his feet was Katsuma. The small boy's knees were on the floor in front of the window while he watched Katsuki like a damn horror movie. He gaped up at Katsuki like he was Godzilla incarnate with horrified eyes. A plastic toy car dropped from his little hand and clattered on the wooden floorboards with a clink.

Katsuki froze. Blinked. Then muttered, "Shit."

The kid didn't move. Neither did Katsuki. They stared at each other for a second, locked in a mutual what-the-hell moment. Thinking fast—or not thinking at all—Katsuki forced a smile. He lifted a hand and gave the world's most awkward wave.

The kid screamed.

"Oh, what the fuck—" Katsuki hissed under his breath, nearly tripping over his own feet as he staggered backwards.

He ungracefully ducked into the bushes and shrouded himself in the shadows. Leaves whipped at his face and a large branch smacked him square in the forehead. He hastily scrambled away because he was sure that shrill yell would alert the guards from the front.

And he was right. Quickly, two of the guards with rifles came around the corner like hounds, sniffing around for the source of the sound.

Katsuki hid as best he could in the darkness, and sweat began to profusely gather on his brow. Through the branches of the thick bushes, he could see Izuku in the window cradling and comforting the small child.

Izuku was armed now, gun in his hand as he tightly held the boy up with his other arm.

The guards scanned for a moment, eyes glowing with deadly intent. Then when they didn't find anything, they went back to their stations.

Izuku, however, didn't move.

He stayed by the window, squinting into the darkness.

Then, as Izuku glanced over the yard, his eyes landed on Katsuki's location. Unwillingly, Katsuki's heart kicked up. He wondered if Izuku could see him, but when Izuku turned around after a prolonged moment, he knew he couldn't.

The guards began their patrols on the back side of the mansion again, this time, doubled up.

Katsuki's frustration burned when he realized he couldn't get close again.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki didn't get another opening.

He had wanted to get in before Saturday, which was officially tomorrow. If what that man and woman said was true, then Izuku would be meeting up with Chisaki somewhere for some sort of masquerade event.

His palms were beginning to itch to get his grasps on Izuku because something was off with this whole damn thing. There was no way in hell Izuku was with Chisaki. Maybe Chisaki is the one who threatened Izuku to leave. He must've informed Izuku about the red folder as well.

That had to be the only explanation for it all.

But still—it bothered Katsuki how peaceful Izuku seemed in the house.

Izuku was on his phone so much that Katsuki couldn't help but wonder why the man didn't bother to leave his number. This is where while he loved Izuku, he knew his hurt was right. Something wasn't adding up, but Izuku still discarded him.

One of the small threads holding on to giving Izuku the benefit of the doubt broke at that moment.

It was clear, Izuku wasn't being held against his will. He just didn't want to see him. Now, two more threads hung in the balance. The first, Izuku was not with Chisaki. The second, Izuku couldn't have known at any point that he was the one who killed his mother.

He came to the conclusion he just needed to ask one question: how long did you know?

Because if what he thought was true, the answer would be, "I found out from Chisaki and left, because I was so ashamed."

And Katsuki truly believed that would be the answer.

☽ ☽ ☽

Night of the Scarlet Masquerade

When the next night fell, Katsuki changed into the red suit he'd stashed in his bag. He armed himself with his holster discreetly under the blazer with multiple guns. He wasn't taking any chances if he was going to be surrounded by Yakuza tonight.

He dusted off the dirt and leaves clinging to him from the last few days of camping out in a goddamn sleeping bag. His spine cracked as he stood. He stretched out the ache and a heavy sigh left his chest.

He was deep fucking in it for Izuku.

All his life, Katsuki never thought he would be in this position. But here he was, so in love with Izuku he was sure he'd walk through hell for him. He had fallen so hard in love he was sure he broke something in his brain when he landed. Had this been anybody else, he would've simply collected their goddamn life for what happened to his mother.

But for Izuku—Katsuki's love for the man rivaled his need for vengeance.

The two beasts were deadlocked in an ultimate tug of war of strength. Each grew stronger when fed in the slightest. And right now, his love was winning after seeing Izuku gazing so longingly at their wedding video.

His love was reaching out, telling Izuku to hold on and that he was coming.

Katsuki put on his motorcycle jacket and zipped it tight. He rolled his shoulders, pulled on his gloves, and wheeled his motorcycle around the front. With extreme sleuth, Katsuki hid well in the shadows of the trees. He watched as the gates opened, and pouring in came a long line of unmarked black cars.

At least ten vehicles drove up in front of the mansion in perfect unison. Each was freshly washed with shined golden rims. In the middle of the cluster of cars was a long, expensive limo. The side was embellished with a golden sigil of the Shie Hassaikai.

His anger simmered at the sight of that symbol.

From this distance, Katsuki couldn't see Izuku or the man he was standing with well. But he saw them climb in the limo and he saw the long string of cars drive back the way they came. The winds blew loudly as if they were pushing Katsuki to follow them.

His fingers curled around his helmet. He slid it on once more, clicked the visor down, and straddled his bike.

The engine growled to life beneath him.

☽ ☽ ☽

When he got to the venue, it was the most disgusting show of wealth Katsuki had seen in a while.

He'd always held contempt for the ultra wealthy. Especially those who wasted money.

This kind of decadence, where fortunes were pissed away on champagne fountains and designer silk worn for a single night, made his skin crawl. There were people starving in alleys while these bastards drowned themselves in caviar and top-shelf liquor just to feel something. He hated them. All of them.

And he was unhappily conflicted to learn Izuku was technically one of these people.

The ballroom venue had bright, green lights illuminating the whole structure. The marble architecture of the building had old renaissance angels engraved into it. And hundreds of people Katsuki recognized from the underground scene were walking about in masquerade attire.

He frowned deeply the longer he scanned some of the poorly hidden faces.

Most of these people were Yakuza, easy to spot under the fancy clothes with sleeves of ink creeping from under cuffs. The Shie Hassaikai insignia was either stamped like a brand on their flesh, stitched into their lapels, or sewn in gold thread across their tailored collars.

He slowed up amongst the thick crowd of cars. He eased into the line of black luxury vehicles, idling a few cars behind Izuku's limo.

When the sleek vehicle stopped, everyone by the entrance turned, awaiting.

Katsuki watched Yakuza bodyguards pour out the limo.

Then a man whose hair was as white as crushed bones got out. Katsuki frowned when he caught sight of the viper tattoos that filled his neck. The dark ink perfectly matched the frostbitten deadness in his eye. He seemed familiar but Katsuki couldn't place from where in his sleep deprived haze.

Following him, Chisaki got out of the limo. His golden eyes were sharp and apathetic, much like a king too comfortable in his power. He didn't even bother to hide the way he surveyed the crowd, like he could buy them all with a snap of his fingers.

Then slowly, Izuku emerged.

Katsuki's heart slammed once, hard, as if trying to break through his chest to reach Izuku.

Izuku shone like a true, precious gem. It was like he sparkled under all the lights.

His shirt was black, high collar, and made of lace that clung to his freckled skin. The material held an intricate pattern of vipers woven in and out of the design. At his collar was a dark green necktie that was a shade of viridian so deep it nearly blended in with the black color of the lace. To match it was a pair of sleek black slacks, a formal black blazer, and a viridian pocket square that matched the neck tie.

And on his delicate face sat a beautiful masquerade mask that enhanced his eyes.

Gorgeous emeralds shone under the light. They were embedded into the sides of the mask, lining the cut out for his eyes. Falling from the bottom of the mask were strings of emeralds beaded together into tassels.

His handsome appearance stunned several people around him. All eyes were on him, only for him.

From here, Katsuki could see Chisaki hold his arm out for Izuku.

The world stilled. The bright lights grew dim, the people in the crowd faded away. All of Katsuki's senses focused on what happened next.

Izuku fluidly slid his hand into the crook of Chisaki's arm and smiled sweetly up at him.

And in that moment, Katsuki's heart ripped straight down the middle in a clean, catastrophic break.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki parked his motorcycle in the shadows, tucked it, his jacket and his bags out of sight a couple buildings down and made his move.

With easy effort, he climbed the back wall that was facing away from the crowd. He pulled himself up hand over hand like he had done many times before on assignments. He skillfully shuffled across a small ledge as the early winter winds began to howl at him like a warning. His fingers burned against the cold stone but all he could see in his mind was Izuku smiling at Chisaki.

He reached the third floor and saw an open window.

Carefully, he inched over to it and hoisted himself inside. With heightened agility, Katsuki lowered himself into the room. His sharp eyes scanned the area and noticed it was entirely empty. Then he cursed under his breath when he heard movement coming towards him from the connecting room.

"Man, I'm so excited for vacation this year," a man chuckled. "I'm just happy we can catch a break this winter—"

Katsuki tried to hide, but there was nowhere to go. Three large Yakuza men dressed all in black with porcelain masquerade masks walked straight into the room. They spotted him immediately.

Shit.

"Hey—you!" One shouted. "No sneaking in!"

That was all they managed before chaos broke loose.

The three guards bum rushed him at the same time he dove forward. Katsuki let his fists fly. He ducked a wild swing and slammed his knuckles into the first man's gut. The second reached for a knife—too slow. Katsuki cracked him across the jaw and pivoted, breath ragged with fury.

He wasn't leaving without talking to Izuku. Especially not after what he'd seen outside.

The image of Izuku on Chisaki's arm burned behind his eyelids. It stroked his inner darkness and turned his movements sharp and savage.

Katsuki began to go toe to toe with the three guards, sucker punching them and side stepping quickly. He was quick on his feet, deciding he had enough of this bullshit. He was getting to Izuku tonight one way or another, goddamnit.

His rage boiled over in that moment, egged on by the hurt in his heart. He took his blade out of its holster and sunk it into the side of one man's neck. Then he gutted another man with the thought of his mother.

In a twisted dance, he whirled and quickly disarmed the last guard of his gun. The man grunted as he tried to punch Katsuki in the head—but Katsuki was stronger and quicker. He took the barrel of the gun, pointed it to the man's heart, and pulled the trigger.

The silencer on the pistol made the deadly bullet quiet.

The man choked out in shock and dropped to the ground.

Katsuki stared down with brazen hatred. He enjoyed the way the Shie Hassaikai symbols on their blazers were tainted in red.

As he took in the three dead bodies, Katsuki decided it was okay. If he needed a more direct approach to get to Izuku—then so be it. A few Yakuza scum dying in the grand scheme of things wasn't an issue to him.

He squatted down low and noticed one of the porcelain masks the guards was wearing was cracked, shattered on the ground. He picked it up slowly, noticing small droplets of blood splattered across. Katsuki glowered when he realized he did in fact need a mask in order to not stand out.

With an exhausted sigh, Katsuki hooked the broken mask to his face.

Next, Katsuki dragged the bodies to a closet off to the side. He hoisted them in, with blood dragging across the carpet. As he stacked the bodies, all he thought of was his mother, probably watching him.

He felt her grin, happy that Yakuza had lost their life just like she had lost hers.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki searched for Izuku. High and low. Far and wide. He pushed through countless people searching for that pop of dark green. He wandered down to the ballroom floor, weaving between all the people dancing around like they were in a fairytale.

Then when the dancing slowed, and the crowd began to look up, Katsuki did too.

Katsuki saw him the moment he stepped on to the top of the stairs.

He was dazzling, and his whole appearance commanded every lick of attention in the room. Katsuki's heart skipped a beat and it was like the floor dropped out from beneath his feet. His ribs caved in around his lungs, making time stutter and bleed out between heartbeats.

Through the haze of crystal chandelier light in the crowded room, stood Izuku.

And he was holding hands with Chisaki.

Suddenly, Katsuki didn't move. He couldn't.

For the first time since he saw his mother's dead body, he was really paralyzed. His body was ice wrapped in searing fire, every one of his nerves lit up and burned as he watched the scene unfold with the slow-motion cruelty of a dream gone wrong.

He observed from a distance as Izuku and Chisaki slowly descended the spiral stairs. They made their way to the center of the ballroom, their eyes never leaving the other's. They began to flow together with the rest of the lavish crowd, looking at each other like no one else existed.

The orchestra wailed its song like a beast in heat.

Strings thrashed against silence, percussion pounded out a rhythm that sounded more like a countdown than music. And across the polished marble, under velvet drapes and golden chandeliers, Izuku began dancing—with him.

Chisaki's gloved hand rested low on Izuku's back, the other wrapped tightly around his fingers, holding him how Katsuki used to. And Izuku—god, Izuku—didn't look scared. He didn't look alarmed. He looked calm. He looked like he'd chosen to be there.

Katsuki could feel heat swelling under his skin.

It boiled through his veins, curling his fingers into fists so tight his knuckles turned white.

Every part of him screamed to lunge forward.

He wanted to fucking tear Chisaki apart with his bare hands and drag Izuku away to Biei. He wanted to demand answers, demand the truth, demand fucking everything—but he stayed still. His soul was paralyzed by the brokenness that was riddled across his body.

His chest was collapsing with every step Izuku and Chisaki took in their dance, and it felt like they were stomping all over his wounded heart.

Their bodies moved as one, perfectly in sync with the music's violent rise and fall. They twirled through the golden room like they were truly betrothed. Chisaki caressed his skin.

Their eyes connected. Their breaths were in tandem in a way that Katsuki thought was only meant for him.

The longer he watched, the more his breath turned to smoke behind the mask. His inhales became progressively more jagged and his heart began pounding in his ears.

Chisaki's hand slid a little lower.

And then it happened.

Chisaki leaned in. His mask brushed Izuku's freckled cheek—and he kissed Izuku.

It was a kiss meant to be seen. And see—Katsuki fucking did. The kiss was a flat out show as if Chisaki was screaming from the rooftops to everyone: look what I got.

Katsuki waited for any hint of disgust on Izuku's face. A wrinkle—or even a curled fist.

But instead, he saw Izuku slowly kiss back. He saw the way Izuku's damn eyes fluttered closed and the way his hand pulled Chisaki closer. Katsuki saw the way the kiss lingered and deepened just long enough to be consensual.

The second thread holding on to giving Izuku the benefit of the doubt snapped.

The orchestra reached its crescendo at the same time jealousy so violent gripped Katsuki's core. Violins shrieked like sirens over blood-soaked streets, and Katsuki stood there in the middle of a masquerade that might as well have been his funeral, watching his world collapse.

No one around him seemed to notice the way his jaw was clenched so tight he could barely breathe. No one noticed the way his hands trembled at his sides, nails digging deep enough to break skin. No one noticed the fact that a man who had lost everything was now watching the person he had given his heart to be revealed to be someone else's.

"Ah, aren't they such a handsome couple?" Some man beside him said.

A woman hummed in agreement. "I think they're a perfect match. No one better for each other."

His darkness pushed aside his love for Izuku and gripped the wheel. It made itself back at home in his body, taking control with the power of jealousy so hot Katsuki thought he might melt through the earth's crust.

Two of Chisaki's henchmen walked up to them right as they were about to kiss again. The Yakuza Heir departed with his goons, leaving Izuku alone in the middle of the floor. The crowd went back to dancing, paying him no mind. They twirled around, creating a busy scene.

Katsuki stepped forward like he was beckoned. His eyes narrowed and all he could see and feel was green.

He roughly pushed through the dense dancing crowd to get to Izuku.

Then Izuku quickly turned on his feet. He walked off to the corner.

Katsuki's darkness rumbled in his chest as Izuku retreated from the crowd. He tipped his chin low as he approached. Izuku leaned his side against a large pillar in the back with his head down. He closed his eyes as Katsuki circled him like a shark.

His heart hammered loudly as he came up behind the smaller man.

Then when he got close enough to smell that sweet cologne, Katsuki's logic tipped right off the deep end.

He reached a hand out, and did what was within his right. He clasped his fingers around Izuku's throat and pulled his damn husband back to him—where he belonged.

When Izuku collided against his chest, Katsuki's lungs expanded with both satisfaction and rage.

"I found you, darling," he hissed into Izuku's ear.

His husband stiffened. Visible goosebumps raised along his skin as he craned his neck.

The moment those beautiful green eyes latched on to him, Katsuki felt his emotions grow stronger. His love for Izuku leapt, overjoyed to be reunited. But his anger was screaming bloody murder over what the fuck he just saw.

But between those two beasts was his logic. It was keeping a curbed leash on both, barely holding on.

"K-Katsuki?" Izuku whispered in disbelief. His eyes began to stretch wide. "You—You're here?"

"I am," Katsuki answered curtly with a tilted head.

Izuku didn't reply. He gawked at Katsuki like he was a ghost who shouldn't be here.

Something about Izuku's confusion was progressively pissing him off. He felt that fury in his chest screech once more. He tried to calm down but it was impossible. Katsuki seethed as he waited for Izuku to fucking say something.

Izuku glanced at the people on the dance floor.

When Katsuki followed his line of sight, he noticed Izuku was gazing after where Chisaki had left off. His nostrils flared. Izuku was thinking about Chisaki at a time like this?

Izuku turned around slowly and Katsuki loosened his grip. He dropped his hand to his side and Izuku cut his eyes down the vacant hallway around the corner. Suddenly, Izuku grabbed Katsuki's wrist.

“We can’t be seen together here,” Izuku whispered hastily. He jutted his head to the side where the hallway was. “Let’s go over here.”

Izuku tugged on Katsuki’s wrist and tried to lead them away.

But Katsuki stayed like a rock. He was offended that Izuku was trying to usher him into the shadows like some goddamn side piece. His insecurities raked their claws down his insides, and he suddenly felt deeply unlovable.

Izuku looked back towards him with a questionable glance. He pulled again, but was unfruitful. Izuku nervously gazed up at the stairs once more for Chisaki, and Katsuki felt that ugly jealousy pulse.

“K-Katsuki, seriously,” Izuku warned with heightened urgency. His eyes darted at all the people dancing about. “We—we can talk but not here. We can’t be seen together right now.”

“Since when was it a crime to be seen with your husband?” Katsuki asked carefully, with a slight bite.

Izuku halted.

“Husband?” Izuku parroted. He looked at Katsuki sideways. “We’re…We’re still married?”

Katsuki glowered. What the actual fuck?

“Of course we are,” Katsuki hissed.

Izuku looked visibly confused, and genuinely displeased about the fact they were still married. Suddenly, Katsuki’s anger rumbled again. This time, louder in his throat. The look Izuku was giving him was pretty much screaming: I don’t want to be married to you.

Izuku let go of his wrist and took a hurtful step back.

Both his anger and love told him to take a step forward.

“Why don’t we have a dance, darling?” Katsuki asked, trying to keep a lid on his barely contained emotions.

He gestured behind him to the open floor. He didn’t want to be tucked away. He wanted to be claimed, openly, and prove to himself once and for all he could be loved. Maybe Izuku could find him offering a dance to be romantic, and the love of his life will be reminded of their time together.

That sad part of him was still holding on to his love for Izuku, hoping Izuku was still holding on back.

“I’ve always wanted to dance with you properly,” Katsuki added honestly.

He held out a hand for Izuku to take.

But Izuku continued to stare at him sideways—and it felt like a stab to the heart. Izuku glanced up at the stairs once more, and Katsuki tried to push back the wrathful tears in his eyes. Izuku had checked not once, but thrice for his real lover because he was clearly hesitant to be seen with Katsuki.

Suddenly, now it made more sense why Izuku was so insistent upon the divorce. It wasn't because he thought it was for the best—it was because he had someone else waiting on him. Someone who had given Izuku the goddamn green light to kill his mother.

Izuku then reached for Katsuki's hand.

Immediately their fingers laced together, and Katsuki decided he was going to tear the answers out of him.

Izuku tripped a bit as Katsuki pulled him close. Slowly, Katsuki began to backtrack to the center of the floor. Out of spite, he stopped at the exact spot where Izuku was moments ago with Chisaki. He hoped it would make Izuku feel guilty for double timing him in a way. Sure, they never fucking said they were an item—but the love in his chest believed that Izuku was his and he was Izuku's.

In the dense dancing crowd, Katsuki began a fast paced tango, the only genre of dance he knew.

They kept their gazes tethered as they swayed, pulling close. The rush of body heat and intimacy blossomed between them as they locked stealthy, cat-like steps. They whirled, not breaking eye contact and then Katsuki dipped Izuku low, almost to the ground.

Katsuki's logic held the leashes tighter on his two beasts as he tried his best to keep a leveled head.

When his emotions stopped holding him hostage, he finally asked the one question that would decide everything, "Did you know all along you were the one who killed my mother, Izuku?"

Izuku stumbled in his dance steps.

At this proximity, Katsuki could feel how his husband's heart raced faster. Much like a liar's would.

"No," Izuku answered. "I didn't know the whole time—"

"—Then how long did you know?" Katsuki asked, cutting straight to the point.

As he thought more about his mother, Katsuki's anger began winning the battle against love. It made him pick up the pace in their dance. He was now making sharp movements hard enough to make them both dizzy. Everything immediately blurred in a blend of bland colors as they were whipped around and around.

"I found out the night you went to retire," Izuku whispered.

At this, Katsuki's fury paused.

The very last thread of an excuse he gave Izuku was gone, snapped in two.

"You knew for the entire last month we were living together?" Katsuki whispered in disbelief. "And you didn't think to tell me?"

He slowed their dance and all the blurred surroundings came back into focus. Izuku looked around, dazed and dizzy, eyes cutting once more to the stairs searching for Chisaki.

True hurt spread across Katsuki's heart. It stuck so deep that Katsuki was unsure it would ever leave.

"I…I was going to. B-But I was too afraid," Izuku confessed.

His beautiful eyes became glossy and true, remorse shone through. But Katsuki couldn't feel it. Everything from the last three weeks was stinging him like thorns. All this time he had given Izuku the benefit of the doubt. And he was wrong.

Izuku continued his speech, and Katsuki grew angrier.

"I wanted to," Izuku said. "I did—I couldn't find a way to come out and say it. I'm so sorry, Katsuki. I'm really really sorry for everything. If I could take back what I did, I would. I didn't know it was her. I-I swear. I know that doesn't excuse anything."

The wall of hurt around Katsuki transformed into steel as he relived the last month they lived together.

He saw them dancing, sweetly singing to each other. He saw Izuku cuddling by his side and kissing his sternum. But worse, he saw Izuku sit in front of his mother's goddamn grave and say he loved Katsuki.

Indignation struck like a hammer.

"You're right," Katsuki hissed, and his darkness begged to be let free as his hurt grew and grew. "You're pathetic sorrys don't excuse anything. Why didn't you just fucking tell me instead of letting me believe it was Chizome?"

"Because I was scared of hurting you," Izuku admitted in a small voice.

Katsuki's raw expression twisted with a snarl. His chin lowered menacingly and the mask on his face nearly slipped off.

"Bullshit," Katsuki snapped. "Bull fucking shit. If you cared about hurting me, you wouldn't have had that scum's tongue down your throat five seconds ago and who knows however many times now."

Izuku's eyes widened, but no denials came. This time, Katsuki wasn't waiting around for Izuku to give him more pathetic ass sorrys.

“Now. Let’s try that again. Why did you not tell me, Izuku?” Katsuki demanded.

“Because I was scared,” Izuku whispered, holding back tears. “That’s the truth.”

“But of what?” Katsuki demanded, raising his voice.

At the sharp volume, Izuku flinched. And immediately Katsuki stopped dancing all together.

With that single flinch, a revelation dawned on Katsuki.

His menacing scowl fell to the ground. In its place was only the look of a sad, misunderstood boy. Katsuki silently stared at Izuku in disbelief as it all clicked together. Their last month together flashed before his eyes and this time, it was tainted.

Suddenly the voices of his self hatred became crystal clear.

“You were scared…of me,” Katsuki whispered, voice low and full of pain. “Did you think I would hurt you if you told me? Even after everything?” he asked, softer now, the question hanging like a broken limb.

Silence followed.

Izuku opened his mouth, then closed it.

Katsuki slowly leaned away, shocked at the lack of denial.

His eyes darted all around Izuku’s beautiful face that he adored so much. He waited for a moment. Hoping that there would be some sort of hint that Izuku wasn’t scared of him. But there was none. Soon, Izuku’s prolonged silence was enough of an answer.

And that answer was, “Yes, Kacchan. I am terrified of you. I always have been.”

Katsuki’s features crumbled inward like a dying star the longer the silence stretched on. He saw the boy Izuku used to be, with the eye patch. He saw that small Izuku who he wanted to protect quivering away from him, crying and fearful to touch him. Katsuki’s eyes started to burn and his tears pushed forward.

This whole time, Izuku had lied.

He didn’t think Katsuki was soft at all. He didn’t think Katsuki could be kind, or gentle, or worthy of love. Izuku was just like everyone else, frightened of Katsuki’s hands and damaged mind. He was scared of the anger Katsuki wielded to shield himself from the jaws of a world that kept trying to eat him alive.

And here Katsuki was, stupid enough to believe he could be anything but the son of a fucking monster.

He had gotten his hopes up all because a boy with pretty green eyes told him he could be soft. All this time. All those nights. All those goddamn hours he spent trying to be better—it was for nothing. He thought Izuku saw him. Not a monster, but the person he was trying to become.

But the truth was out in the open now: Katsuki was a monster to everyone, even the man he loved.

And that is all he would ever be.

Katsuki's hurt morphed into something truly fearsome in that moment.

It grew winged armor, fangs, and shrouded itself in the anger Katsuki always used to protect himself. A single tear drop fell out of Katsuki's eye and took all his reasoning with it. In its wake, the tear left behind a dark leer crafted of violent jealousy and depravity.

"No," Izuku said suddenly. But it was too late. He began shaking his head furiously but Katsuki knew the truth now. Izuku was a damn liar. "No. No, Katsuki. I-I'm so sorry I didn't think that at all—"

"—You did," Katsuki said in a deep, steady voice. More tears fell. "You're scared of me. Because I'm a monster, right?"

Katsuki's eyes darkened and his wall of anger shot up to new heights.

His eyes narrowed as his pupils constricted down into tiny dots. All that was left in his eyes was an unnatural amount of scarlet.

"You were scared enough to poison me so I wouldn't be able to hurt you," Katsuki reasoned, finally seeing the truth plain as day. With every accusatory word he spoke, hate gathered in his tone like a tsunami. "And then you came running to Tokyo for protection from me in Yakuza scum's arms. But worse of all, you went and cuddled up with the man who requested my mother's murder without a goddamn shred of decency."

Katsuki's hold on Izuku grew more and more intense.

"No," Izuku exclaimed past his wincing. "N-No! That's not what this is at all. I told you in my—"

Izuku yelped out loud when Katsuki's fingernails tore through the material of his blazer. The sharp tips sunk into his skin, drawing blood. Izuku tried to move backwards away from Katsuki. But it was no use. Katsuki's grip was as strong as an iron fist.

He decided then and there, Izuku was going to pay for lying and killing his mother. And so was that fucking Chisaki.

Katsuki's jealousy roared to life and snapped the leash off his darkness.

"K-Katsuki. People are watching," Izuku begged. "This isn't the scene to do this. There's too many Yakuza members here. They will kill you."

“They can try,” Katsuki replied callously. His eyes glazed over with vengeance. “Because if everyone in the world thinks I’m a monster, then fine.” Katsuki’s mouth curled. “I’ll give them the bloodiest monster they’ve ever seen.”

The next breath he took tasted like gunpowder.

If he was going to burn, then so was this whole goddamn room.

“Hey, you!” One guard yelled out. He grabbed Katsuki by his shoulder and forcefully spun him around. “What do you think you’re doing—”

The guard didn’t have the chance to finish his sentence.

All of Katsuki’s killer reflexes snapped into place at that moment to show his true form. With unnerving speed, Katsuki reached into his blazer, pulled out a loaded gun, and aimed it directly between the guard’s eyes. He pulled the trigger before the next word could even be uttered.

Blood splattered across both Izuku’s and Katsuki’s faces.

Horrified, shrill shrieks erupted all around the room.

Katsuki’s bone chilling gaze sliced towards Izuku. In the reflection of Izuku’s glossy eyes, all Katsuki could see was his mother’s skull with a bullet torn through it. He imagined a burial plot for Izuku and Chisaki, side by side, paying with their lives like his mother paid with her’s.

Immediately, Izuku took the defensive.

He snatched his body backwards as Katsuki whirled his gun on him.

Bullets began to rain down like hail as the crowd began a stampede.

Izuku took off in a sprint, no doubt to go running to his scummy boyfriend. Katsuki was piled on by Yakuza men, but he was stronger. Better. More furious. No one could match his wrath in this moment and no one was going to stop him from exacting his revenge—even if it was the last thing he fucking did.

From there it was carnage—pure, efficient, and personal.

Screams erupted all around him as the only thing in his mind was to kill.

He killed because violence was the only language the world had ever taught him, and he would speak it now with perfect fluency. There was no hesitation in his fingers and no remorse in his heart as he cut down person after person, trying to clear a path through to his cowardly husband.

He could barely really recall what he was doing. His movements were being puppeteer by his hurt and his rage, fusing into a two headed beast.

All he knew was to follow the rush of green that was retreating from him and make him pay.

He drowned out that tiny voice of love that was screaming for him to stop.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki always heard the phrase ‘blacked out in rage’. Many people blacked out when they are utterly consumed by emotions so powerful it was like they turned into a different person.

But what descended on him wasn’t black—it was scarlet.

It poured into his vision like blood flooding beneath a door. Fast, scathing and unstoppable. It drowned out everything else until all he could see was red.

He wanted to drive his blade into Izuku’s throat the same way Izuku had stabbed his heart. Katsuki’s pain tasted like iron in his throat as his inner child cried out from the betrayal. All he wanted was love, but the world decided he wasn’t worthy. So what was the point in pretending like he was anything other than that bloody, scarlet soaked monster everyone saw?

That night, Katsuki gave the world what it wanted.

He painted the ballroom in blood. Body after body dropped as he gunned down every scummy Yakuza in sight. His senses sharpened to a way they had never before, fueled by betrayal and a broken heart.

As he hacked down person after person, he imagined that somewhere his mother was baring her teeth in a grin, happy to be given countless bodies as an offering to her honor. He knew she was a spiteful woman, and he was her son. He was the product of a monster and the most vengeful woman on this planet.

So he became what was in his blood—and showed everyone what he was really made of.

He cut his way through the ball room. The halls. The stairway and into a private room. He decided counting how many lives he claimed was pointless. Because there would never be enough to quell his anger until Izuku and Chisaki were one of those people.

He cut his way up to the roof, cornering Izuku who was running as fast as possible.

They engaged in a tight, close quarter fight that was as fast as the wind. Blow after blow and bullets rained down.

“Katsuki!” Izuku screamed out as he dodged more attempts to gash his neck. “Wait!”

Katsuki felt something inside of him slip here, upon hearing Izuku’s cries of pain. His love surged forward, beckoned by Izuku’s voice, trying to overpower his anger. Katsuki’s rage grabbed the very last handgun in his holster and cocked it.

“Katsuki! Please, wait a moment!” Izuku yelled more when Katsuki began to fire off the gun.

Izuku began to go on the defensive. He hid well behind Katsuki, keeping close to his back in order to not give a clear shot. Katsuki tried to whirl around, and failed. He whirled and whirled and the part of him that loved Izuku more than anything was beginning to grow stronger. It was being fed by the sound of Izuku's voice.

"Please, Katsuki! We-We can talk—"

"Shut up!" Katsuki viciously yelled. His love for Izuku was growing now, but he quickly capped it. He shoved it down so hard with the simple thought of Izuku kissing Chisaki. "I don't give a fuck what you have to say! After I kill you I'm going to gut your new boyfriend and make you both pay for what you did to my mother!"

Katsuki reached behind him and grabbed Izuku's arm. With all his strength, he flung Izuku in front of him and pulled the trigger.

Izuku shrieked as a hot bullet landed in his leg.

His love for Izuku freed itself after hearing that howl of pain. It began to slow him down, and every bullet he tried to land in those dark, gorgeous curls missed. It was as if there was a piece of him that refused to let him finish the job. Katsuki felt his accuracy loosen despite his anger.

He became frustrated with himself, and that slipped into his movements.

He messed up enough that Izuku was able to grab his wrist. Izuku wrangled his arm with both hands. Using both his speed and strength, his backstabbing husband pulled his arm backwards. Izuku did this until Katsuki's shoulder popped out of its socket.

Katsuki screamed, and Izuku screwed his eyes shut.

With blinding speed, Izuku disarmed the gun from Katsuki with the twist of his wrist. Then he hit Katsuki in the side of the head with the blunt end of the weapon twice.

The pain made his vision spot. Ripples of mixed memories flooded Katsuki's head. His mother's laughter melted with Izuku's. Katsuki stumbled. He gasped and grappled for his husband, unsure if he did this out of rage or love.

Then Izuku's beautiful face twisted in a snarl. Tears poured from his eyes as he hauled back.

The final blow landed with a hard crack and Katsuki's world went black.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki recognized the sensation immediately, he was falling yet again.

It was that same weightless, gut-twisting drop into the deepest recesses of himself. Conscious but not awake. He was trapped in that in-between space where time didn't move and his memories played on loop like film projected across the backs of his eyelids.

When he opened his eyes in the dream, the world was warm.

He was at the park in Yokohama. It was the one with the crooked fountain and that rusted jungle gym kids still climbed like it wasn't falling apart. It was summer, the air was thick with heat and the sky was a bleached blue. Cicadas hummed in the trees, a low, rattling chorus.

His mother stood beside him, squinting against the sun. She had one hand perched on her hip, the other shading her brow.

"Oi. Brat," she said, nudging his arm. "What flavor do you want?"

He blinked. "Mint."

She smirked like she always did, sharp and fond. He found himself grinning back before he could stop it. He paid for the ice cream and they sat down on their usual bench, the one near the dog run. A pair of retrievers barked and tumbled through the grass. It was so stupidly peaceful.

This day had been real. He remembered it clearly, it was the summer after he turned twenty. Just a few months before she was killed.

His mother licked her vanilla ice cream cone once, then turned toward him. Her eyes were softer than he was used to.

"Ah, Katsuki," she started, voice quieter now. "I don't want to be too mushy or anything, but…I really appreciate you—as a son."

He scoffed. "You don't have to go all soft on me."

"I know," she chuckled. "But still. I should say it more often. I know I wasn't the best mom for you, and I have my pitfalls. But I got lucky with you. You turned out...surprisingly okay."

"Oh, so now I'm okay? Not a brat anymore?"

"Don't push it. You're still the biggest knucklehead I've ever met."

He grinned, teeth bared wide and unapologetic. "Wonder where I got it from."

She laughed, elbowing him in the ribs. For a moment, the pain between them peeled away. He felt like a normal kid somehow. There was no blood on his hands. No ghosts in his chest. He was just a boy with his mother on a blistering summer day, and their ice cream was melting too fast to finish.

And then she hugged him.

The familiar scent of her faint perfume and sunscreen mixed. He shifted, too awkward, but then returned the hug slowly. Some of her ice cream smeared against his cheek, and they both burst out laughing.

She wiped it away with her thumb, eyes crinkling in the sunlight. She gazed at him proudly, happy to be his mother.

“Hey,” she said after a beat. “Let’s take a trip for New Year’s. Some mother and son time! We haven’t done a trip by ourselves and I have to admit I am jealous of how much you travel with Aizawa.”

Katsuki tilted his head. “Where should we go?”

She shrugged, took a bite of her ice cream, and leaned back like the weight of the world wasn’t hanging over either of them. “Anywhere. Wherever you want to go, brat.”

The answer came easy. “You always said you wanted to go to Paris.”

Her face lit up like he’d handed her the damn world—and that’s all he ever wanted, really.

“Oh my god, yes!” she gasped. “Let’s do that!”

He began to imagine their trip and his heart soared happily. His mother had been doing so much better these last two years. She was on medication. She didn’t gamble. And she kept a stable job now. She even made sure to eat healthily and their relationship had improved dramatically. They had finally arrived at a point where he officially got the mother he always hoped for.

Then the memory started to fade around the edges. The color bled out like ink in water, drifting away in swirls. Then the cicadas softened and the heat thinned.

Because while it was a nice memory, that’s all it was.

They never got to take that trip, because their future was robbed of them.

☽ ☽ ☽

Morning after the Scarlet Masquerade

Katsuki didn’t know how long he’d been unconscious. He only knew that the sky outside the narrow slats had shifted and woke him up. His head throbbed in slow, punishing waves. Each pulse was a brutal echo behind his eyes. It felt like something inside his skull had cracked—and maybe it had.

He groaned and dragged one hand across the cramped metal. His legs were twisted beneath him, nearly numb from the unnatural position. And his spine screamed when he shifted.

Early winter winds blew in and bit his skin.

When he finally forced his eyes open, squinting against the sickly light, he pulled his senses together. He was stuffed in a ventilation shaft. He nearly laughed at the irony. He was shoved in here like trash.

His chest was hurting, but he moved anyway. His arms shook as he braced against the sides. His knees collapsed under him. He bit back a curse and gritted his teeth.

Then he craned his neck, peering through the grate.

Across the roof, it was entirely empty. No Yakuza were around, which meant that the coast was clear for now. He knew he needed to hurry and take the opening. He shoved at the cover, and it gave with a hollow clatter.

He climbed out, and dropped down hard, fully landing on his side. Without warning, a lightning bolt of pain cut across his skull.

He grabbed the spot where Izuku had struck him hard. Pain spotted across his vision as he recalled the way those cutthroat green eyes tore into him moments before the final blow.

Then, his anger returned. All from the single thought about Izuku. The whole night's events flashed before his eyes. Izuku smiling at Chisaki. Holding his hand. Dancing with him. Kissing him.

But worst of all—Izuku knew for the entire last month that he killed his mother. Izuku had sat there, at her grave, and told Katsuki to his face that he loved him. All while knowing the reason she was dead was his fault. And then he had left to find comfort in the arms of the man who paid him to kill her.

The fire in Katsuki reignited as he thought about that one summer day with his mother.

His anger wasn't as uncontrollable this time. But it was sturdy, rooted well in vengeful resolve. He was going to make sure those who killed his mother paid the blood toll. His hurt sat on top of his love for Izuku, pushing the shards of his broken heart far beneath the surface.

Tears cut down his face in a combination of grief, sadness and betrayal. He clenched his jaw and wiped away the pitiful wetness along his cheek that mixed with the dried blood.

The pain inside of him was too much.

He needed to get it out before it tore him apart.

Aizawa had always said revenge wouldn't fix anything. The old man claimed vengeance was a poison people swallowed hoping someone else would die. That all that type of hatred left behind was scorched earth and hollow men.

But Katsuki didn't care. Because right now, with a broken heart eating him alive, he was certain of only one thing: the one way to heal the pain inside of him—the only way to kill the thing tearing him apart from within—was to get his hands on Chisaki and Izuku and bury them both for what they took from him.

Then maybe, after all these years, he could finally stop hurting.

☽ ☽ ☽

When he left, there were cops and Yakuza buzzing around. He had to use extra sleuth and be extremely mindful when scaling down the venue. It was a miracle no one had searched the vent he was shoved into, and he had to wonder who put him in there.

The side of him that loved Izuku told him the answer: Izuku himself.

But he was too hurt to dwell on it.

He got his bike and bags and made his way to a seedy motel. It was small and far away from the scene of the crime. He looked over his shoulder all the while, feeling as if a set of eyes were crawling on him.

When he made his way into his room, the first thing that greeted him was a long, full length mirror that was cracked directly above where Katsuki's heart was. The reflection showed a distorted version of himself he had never seen before. He walked up to it, dropping his bag and helmet on the floor.

He was covered in blood, head to toe.

It was smeared on his skin, caked in places that he didn't know were possible. He looked at his hands at that moment, and all he could see was red. He waited for the voices of self deprecation to come with their hurtful words—but they didn't.

For the first time in Katsuki's life, he wasn't even the slightest bit ashamed of what he was.

He was happy to be that monster everyone feared. He finally accepted his birth rite as the bastard son of Imasuji Goto. His biological father was a true horrible, vicious human being—and now, Katsuki was his successor.

He breathed out shakily, understanding himself fully for once for what he was. That darkness inside of him wasn't another entity. It was just him. He was the bloodthirsty one. He was the one who craved violence and justified it.

The new sense of self rotated in his chest like a blade and came out the other side sharp with rage.

He looked down at the ring on his finger and felt that anger boil again. Slowly, Katsuki removed it from his hand. It was painful to accept that a future with Izuku was no longer real but even more painful to accept he had been fooled for so long.

Bitterly, he threw the ring on top of his bag.

He turned then, ripping his eyes away from his cracked reflection. He began to strip down and head into the shower. He knew he needed to get a move on within the next hour, maximum. He had been sloppy at the masquerade. Had he'd plan to kill that many Yakuza, he would've been better prepared. But he didn't anticipate lighting up the whole room like that in a fit of heartbreak and jealousy.

But Katsuki knew what he had to do after this.

He was going to kill Bakugou Izuku and Chisaki Kai.

And he was starting with his deceitful husband.

☽ ☽ ☽

When he finished showering, Katsuki gave himself stitches. He mended the multiple cuts and gunshot wounds he sustained. He ate the pain like it was nothing as he dressed and cleaned all the gashes in his body using his first aid kit.

In the background, he played the small TV the motel had to offer. The news was running, and it was detailing the horrific night that had fallen upon Tokyo.

The Scarlet Masquerade is what they were calling it.

Over forty people were murdered, and quite possibly more. Many of the news channels suspected it to be gang activity, but never outright named the Yakuza. Likely because of the Chisaki family's death grip on politicians in Japan. And lucky for him, his name wasn't dropped. Which meant he was in the clear for the time being.

However, as he listened to the TV, another story caught his eye.

On the screen now were The Viper Academy skyscrapers. The once polished silver buildings were singed black at the bottom. Where the parking garage used to be was now absolutely nothing. It looked like true scorched earth, empty and burned down to the foundation.

Katsuki furrowed his brow as he knotted the last stitch in his arm.

"What the hell?" He whispered.

But before his thoughts could marinate, a loud sequence of knocks hit his door.

Katsuki turned his head and tightly clenched his jaw. His eyes were sharp, restricted down and ready to collect another soul.

When he didn't answer, the knock came again.

"I know you're in there, Bakugou Katsuki," a deep, smooth voice of a man announced. "I followed you here from the masquerade venue. You slipped past the cops well but I saw you leave through the alley."

Katsuki immediately stood up and got his handgun. He cocked it with a loud, threatening clank and turned the barrel towards the door.

"No need for that." The voice said. "I come in peace and I'm not law enforcement."

Katsuki scoffed. "You have until the count of ten to get the fuck out of here before I pump that door with lead."

"Like I said, that won't be necessary," the man repeated, a bit more testily. "I'm here to propose an idea that might be of interest to you. I don't mean any harm. I promise, I am unarmed."

Katsuki scowled. He walked up to the door on edge, gun still raised. He looked through the peephole. In the distorted fishbowl lens he saw a man with dark crimson eyes and stark white hair pulled back in a bun. Katsuki's frown deepened when he caught the viper tattoos on the man's neck and hands.

Slowly, he opened the door just enough to crack it open, making the chain lock stretch taut.

Two pairs of sharp red eyes met through the narrow gap.

Katsuki paused and assessed.

The man in front of him was covered neck down in viper tattoos. On either set of his knuckles were the words 'VIPER' and 'SNAKE' in bold ink and he was dressed in expensive looking all black garments. His face had a large, giant gash over one eye and there were cracks embedded in his skin.

Katsuki recognized this guy.

This was the same man that got out of the limo with Chisaki and Izuku at the masquerade. And now that he was closer, Katsuki knew why he seemed so familiar earlier. He had seen this man briefly, right before he and Izuku left for Biei. It was when he had been at the cafe waiting for Izuku to go grab his bag.

This was the guy who let his dogs mangle someone who simply bumped into him.

Katsuki heightened his guard.

"Hello. My name is Shigaraki," the man said smoothly. His void-like eyes bored into him and sent chills right down Katsuki's spine. He bowed, ever so slightly. "I'm Izuku's handler."

Katsuki frowned. He followed his gut and clutched his gun tighter.

"Handler?" He asked, entirely unfriendly. "So you're the leader of that Viper Academy?"

"Something like that," Shigaraki said. "I was raised there as an agent, and I am now second in command."

"And why are you here at my motel room?" Katsuki hissed.

Shigaraki didn't blink. His eyes gazed at Katsuki, giving nothing.

"I would like to hire you for an assignment," he said. "I think you're the only one who could do it and our interests align at the moment. It would be beneficial for us to work together."

Katsuki leered and reeled back. "You're kidding, right?"

"No. I'm not." Shigaraki put his hands in his pockets and tilted his head. "I have a…situation on my hands that I can't handle myself right now. Izuku has fled Tokyo and he left a lot of chaos behind him. And unfortunately, I can't go after him since I have to clean up the mess he left behind after upsetting the Shie Hassaikai."

The fire on the news burned to the front of Katsuki's mind.

"Why me?" Katsuki asked. "Just get some of your other agents to go get him."

"Not possible," Shigaraki replied. He tightened his jaw and exhaled exhaustively. "I can't exactly count on simply anyone to bring in Izuku with his level of lethality. He would easily cut down whoever I sent his way. You, however, would be able to bring him back with less resistance because of your…"

Shigaraki paused, looked Katsuki up and down, and frowned distastefully.

"…relationship," he finished.

Katsuki didn't like the way the last word was said. It was spat with so much resentment and disapproval it stung his skin. He decided then to show his gun, fully letting this Shigaraki know he wasn't fucking around with him.

"And how exactly do you know Izuku and I are involved?" Katsuki questioned defensively. He leaned against the doorway, gun in hand and finger on the trigger.

Shigaraki narrowed his eyes. "I make it my business to know everything, and everyone, Izuku does."

"Is that so?" Katsuki chuckled humorlessly, immediately thinking of Chisaki. "Sorry. I don't trust fucking snakes anymore. You'll have to hire someone else."

He made a move to close the door, but quickly, the man shot his arm out and held it open. Katsuki sneered threateningly but Shigaraki remained calm. He pushed the door back open, the latch chain rattling.

"I promise I can make it worth your while," Shigaraki said persuasively. "If you bring Izuku to me, I can give you something that you can't achieve on your own."

"There's not a damn thing you can give me—"

"—I can offer you Chisaki."

Katsuki halted.

He hesitantly looked at Shigaraki sideways.

"See? I told you I could make it worth your while," Shigaraki mused when he realized he caught Katsuki's attention. "I can give you the perfect opening to kill Chisaki with your bare hands. Even a cherry on top to torture him like I know the infamous Scarlet Eyed Killer likes to do."

At the mention of his alias, Katsuki understood this man knew more about him than he led on. Playing his cards carefully, he toned down his abrasiveness. But he couldn't help but grow curious at the thought of getting an opening at killing Chisaki.

"…How exactly would you make that possible?" Katsuki questioned.

"I work close enough with him to the point he foolishly trusts me. It would be easy for me to set him up."

"And why would you be okay with that if you work together?"

"Because I am going to kill Chisaki eventually," Shigaraki admitted. He shrugged like murdering the Yakuza Heir was a small task. "It doesn't matter to me if I kill him or not; I just need him gone and out of the way after some power transfer happens. However, it matters to you—correct? You want to be the one who makes him feel that pain. And I can make that happen."

Katsuki sucked at his teeth. He toyed with the idea as he thought about ways to murder Chisaki.

Getting an opening to kill Chisaki wasn't going to be an easy task. The Yakuza Heir had endless bodyguards, territories and politicians he could hide behind. It would be like going up against an army in order to even get a chance to slit that man's throat.

"All you have to do is bring me Izuku," Shigaraki emphasized smoothly.

Katsuki narrowed his eyes at the snake in front of him. "And what would you do with him?"

"I would simply bring him back to his comfortable life. Nothing more, nothing less."

Katsuki's mouth pulled down further in a frown. "You're going to have to give me more than that."

"Izuku is my most valuable asset," Shigaraki explained evenly. "Right now, the longer he is on the run, the more the Shie Hassaikai will hunt him. If I get to him first, I can make sure he is protected from their fury and bring him back under my wing. After all this blows over, he will continue to be treated well: clothed in the finest name brands and fed the highest quality food like he always has been. We don't treat our agents poorly, I'm sure you know this."

He did.

Izuku had a far more comfortable life than he ever would have guessed.

"Look at where he lives," Shigaraki pushed, leaning closer. His voice spun like a spell, hooking Katsuki in. "Look at the clothing he has. He's been living a life of luxury with a silver spoon since he can remember. I have no intention of harming him. My only honest goal in life is that I want what's best for Izuku. If you give him to me, he'll be safe and Chisaki will be yours."

Katsuki could imagine it.

Izuku would be back at home in that oceanside mansion of his. He would be reading his books, swimming in his pool and playing with Katsuma probably until the end of his days.

For some reason, from the outside looking in, Katsuki didn't think Izuku's life seemed so bad.

Maybe that's why Izuku didn't seem petrified to return—or maybe that's why he stayed all these years.

But still.

When Katsuki remembered the way Izuku had broken down at the sight of a belt—he wasn't sure what was the real mirage. He didn't doubt Izuku was abused. But really, none of that mattered anymore. What really mattered was getting his revenge on the two lovers who broke his world in two.

He pushed aside his feelings for Izuku and tightened his jaw.

"No deal," Katsuki sneered. "Sorry, but I want them both dead."

"Think of the bigger picture here," Shigaraki suggested. "Why blame Izuku more than the Yakuza Heir?"

"Why choose?" Katsuki flicked his wrist, dismissing the whole idea. "I'm passing up on your offer. You're going to lose your biggest asset unless you kill me right here and now."

A dark flicker swarmed around Shigaraki's eyes. An uncomfortable wave tore through Katsuki the longer the man looked at him. It wasn't murderous intent, but rather something darker and rooted in true loathing.

Tediously, Shigaraki removed his hand from the door. He took a relaxed posture and tilted his chin upwards.

"I'll give you time to think about it," Shigaraki said snidely.

He was calm, like he knew this was going to happen. From his deep pockets, he pulled out a little navy-blue flip phone and a small piece of paper with some writing on it.

He handed it to Katsuki through the door without any sort of hesitation.

"When you change your mind, my contact is on this phone," Shigaraki said. "Press the dial and I'll answer. Also, here is a lead on Izuku. He set fire to the garage at home and slowed us down. But after we got the flames under control, I noticed one car was unaccounted for."

Katsuki hesitantly took the phone and paper.

Something about this screamed trap. But when he glanced it all over, it was legit. He flipped open the phone and there was a single contact inside: '117'. And on the piece of paper written in red ink was the make, model, color and license plate of a car.

Katsuki's frown deepened. This felt a little too easy and didn't add up.

"Why are you giving me this if you need him alive?" Katsuki asked, on edge.

“Think of it as a thank you for putting the Yakuza in disarray for me,” Shigaraki answered without any bite. He took a step back and smiled at Katsuki in a knowing way. “You gave me just enough of an opening to get my foot solidly in the door.”

Shigaraki began to walk away, not even properly saying goodbye. He turned down the hallway and from here, Katsuki could see a number in ink on the nape of his neck. 117.

Shigaraki lifted up his hand to wave back to him as he walked away.

“Enjoy your road to revenge, Bakugou Katsuki.”

☽ ☽ ☽

The first thing Katsuki did was hook the phone Shigaraki gifted him up to his laptop. He used his advanced tech application he designed when he was eighteen. He scanned the tiny device for tracking software or anything that could be used against him.

Unsurprisingly, he found the phone was tapped.

A dry, bitter laugh cracked from his throat. Katsuki leaned back in the chair, lips twitching at the pathetic attempt. This guy thought he was stupid.

With a few keystrokes, he traced the malware, dismantled the transmitter, and wiped the trace logs. The phone’s insides were totally clean now, leaving no issue of him being traced. But he was still offended that Shigaraki underestimated him that much.

Goddamn snakes.

Katsuki’s hand hovered over the trash bin with the phone. He was about to throw the whole thing away—

—but stopped.

His rage echoed in his belly and prevented him from tossing the phone in the trash.

He sucked at his teeth. Without thinking too hard, Katsuki decided to keep it. He placed it in his cargo pants right next to his own, black colored smartphone.

Next, Katsuki moved to searching CCTV footage on his laptop.

He pulled up his custom application, the one he’d built at twenty. It was an automated crawler that combed surveillance networks by radius. Plug in coordinates, enter a license plate or description, and the thing scrapes everything within that custom set radius. His laptop hummed loudly as it ran the code and spat back out the results.

Lucky for him, a candy pink Ferrari Purosangue wasn’t exactly subtle.

The hits came in under ten minutes, popping up as little green dots showing Izuku’s trail.

It looked like Izuku was heading south—and rather fast. All the snapshots showed him running various stop lights or speeding fast enough to be given a ticket.

Katsuki's eyes scanned all the photos until he landed on the final one, showing where Izuku was last spotted. It was grainy, low-res, but clear enough. A still frame locked on the driver's side. It was Izuku behind the wheel, caught in the middle of an illegal left turn in Osaka.

He zoomed in on his husband's lethal green eyes.

Katsuki leaned back, lips parting in a gesture that wasn't quite a smile. He twirled the flimsy scrap of paper Shigaraki had given him between two fingers, like a match he was about to strike.

"Gotcha, darling," he sneered.

Chapter End Notes

Thanks so much for reading and coming along with the journey!! I appreciate you all so much. Let me know what you think below <3 I love everyone's theories and comments! I hope you have a great day!

Chapter 39: Morendo

Chapter Summary

> Morendo (Stylistic indication) To play in a way that gradually grow softer and then dies away.

Chapter Notes

> Hello everyone!!! :)) The power of angst is really motivating me to write (plus all the good weather since it's summer where I live now. I had a really good hiking session and took up bouldering this week so my endorphins are kinda high)
>
> We're barreling right down this story!! I hope you enjoy <3 Big thank you like always to the LOML Luna for betaing <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 39 — Morendo

.

.

.

Katsuki could admit he liked a good chase.

There was a rhythm to it that he thrived on. The pressure building under his skin. The slim chances of his prey escaping. The look of terror when his victim realized there was no way out.

It was a perfect hit of exhilarating thrill right before he killed someone.

And he couldn’t deny Izuku running from him always did ignite heat in his veins.

His husband was the only one who’d ever escaped him and lived to tell the tale—an anomaly of green in a world Katsuki painted red. But he knew that this hunt would be the sweetest yet. Because after all this time, he was going to track Izuku down and kill him exactly like he should’ve done years ago.

He harnessed his hatred and drove furiously all the way down to Osaka.

When he arrived, he checked his black smartphone for any more hits on the pink Ferrari. He found none. Either Izuku ditched the car or, more realistically, he was resting up somewhere.

Katsuki knew Izuku well enough to know he was definitely resting—but not for long.

It only took thirty minutes to find where Izuku stashed the car.

He scoped out the radius of the last hit and decided to think like a damn nerd. And that brought him to a small, parking garage in the heart of Osaka, Minami district. He was sure that pint sized Deku thought the flashy car would blend in like camouflage into the neon cladded area.

Izuku hid the vehicle on the third floor in a corner.

As he approached, Katsuki thought it might've been abandoned. But when he looked inside, he saw a sleek, beautiful katana sitting in the passenger seat.

A sadistic grin stretched across Katsuki's face, like a cat who caught a little mouse.

He knew damn well Izuku would come back for that thing. The other assassin wouldn't dream of leaving such a perfectly good weapon behind. He was far too thorough.

Katsuki then fished out a small black tracking device from his pocket. It was no bigger than his pinky nail and entirely undetectable to any sniffers. He bent down low and placed it under the belly of the car. He shifted a bit, trying to find the right curve to shove it into.

Then boom, it clicked into place. A smirk bloomed across his face.

Then suddenly, he heard the smallest shuffle—and it sounded exactly like goddamn Deku.

He'd come to know the way Izuku moved over the years. There'd been many, irritating moments when the other assassin tried to sneak past him, attempting to kill a mark Katsuki was protecting. Several times he'd succeeded. But after so many endless run ins, Katsuki perfectly honed his ears for those quiet, little footsteps so that Izuku could never catch him off guard.

He straightened his spine and sharply scanned the garage.

His eyes landed on a pillar not too far from the car. It looked about Deku sized.

Katsuki tilted his chin down and snapped in place all his stealthiness.

He moved, entirely soundless.

He remained light on his feet in a way Aizawa drilled into him. His ex-supervisor always reprimanded Katsuki for his heavy footsteps. The old man said he held too much presence when entering a room. He said that Katsuki needed to learn how to turn it off if he ever was going to be a proper hitman.

So, Katsuki spent years practicing sneaking up on people. He did this until he was totally undetectable to a mark. He now could sink his knife in someone's throat without them ever hearing him coming.

His hunter side kicked in as he moved away from the car.

He kept his eye on the pillar and carefully peered around it. He saw Izuku doing the same on the opposite side, trying to see if he was still near the car.

Katsuki snuck up on him. He drew close then squatted down slowly directly beside Izuku, a mere three inches away.

His oblivious husband peered around the pillar more, clearly confused as to where he'd gone. Then he stiffened his body to stay as quiet as possible. Katsuki had to hold back a laugh.

It was cute how Izuku thought he could hide from him.

Katsuki tilted his head and waited for him to notice.

Izuku seemed to become more confused. Katsuki watched, fully amused as the beautiful man shifted to look the other direction around the pillar.

And when he turned his head, their eyes locked.

They were close enough to kiss, Katsuki thought distantly. But he was also close enough to kill, he thought more ferociously.

"This is the part where you run from me," Katsuki whispered, breath gliding across Izuku's lips.

Izuku took off and instantly Katsuki shot his hands out to seize both his wrists. Izuku tried to snatch himself out of the hold with all his might. But Katsuki's grasp was painfully firm. Katsuki leered as Izuku began to struggle fiercely—he wasn't going to let Izuku out of his sights again.

This would be the final goddamn chase they ever had.

And chase they did.

Izuku annoyingly, but not unexpectedly, tore himself out of Katsuki's grip. Katsuki rebounded easily as Izuku bolted through the parking garage.

His husband zoomed through the concrete structure in a desperate, almost beautiful way trying to escape. But it was foolish. Much like when a bird slammed itself against glass, desperate for the sky and freedom on the other side.

Because like always, Katsuki was right on his heels.

Katsuki's footsteps thundered behind Izuku's lightning speed. The crackle and boom of their electricity surged through the air. It filled the atmosphere with clean, terrifying energy as Katsuki dug right into his newfound killer instincts.

Katsuki's anger was thicker. His eyes were sharper. His agony homed in all his senses.

But most of all, Katsuki embraced his monstrous identity. His new sense of self gave him a savage brutality he never knew he possessed. Maybe it was genetic, gifted by Imasuji Goto.

In a sharp flash, he wondered if this was why Aizawa always discouraged him from enjoying killing. Aizawa probably knew that if Katsuki got the chance to embrace his bloodlust, he would be transformed into a real, wicked monster.

He remained hot on Izuku's tail. Matched every pivot. Every sprint. Every reckless dodge Izuku took—Katsuki kept up.

But he also recognized their strengths.

Izuku was faster—always had been. Izuku could find a way to break free and fly away from him with speed Katsuki didn't possess. But Katsuki was stronger. The second the distance closed, he could overpower Izuku and drag him right back into his arms. So they continued like this. With Katsuki gaining the advantage. Then Izuku. Then Katsuki again and Izuku once more.

Their endless dance landed them in the Osaka night market, tearing through the mass of people like a tornado.

Screams wrapped around them as they engaged in a close, tight chase. The crowd split open like flesh under pressure. Mothers scooped up their children. Merchants grabbed their wares. Paper lanterns strung above rattled in the sudden, unnatural gust of wind stirred up by their clashing storm.

Izuku ducked through the dense crowd, nimble and fast. He extended his arm in a hurry and grabbed a parasol from a merchant in passing. Then he turned around and swung.

They engaged blow for blow with Katsuki's knife and Izuku's newly found parasol.

For every jab Izuku was able to land, Katsuki blocked two more. He was quicker than he was at the masquerade because the determination in his heart was stronger. Katsuki started matching Izuku's skilled footing.

Izuku began to stagger as Katsuki started to gain on him. With every attack, he slashed away at the flimsy parasol, wearing it down. Right as the parasol seemed like it was about to break, Izuku cursed under his breath.

He tried to turn and run.

But Katsuki grabbed his duffle bag in an unforgiving hold.

Izuku yelped as he was brutally yanked backwards. He nearly fell, but balanced on his heels. He tried to grab his bag back, but Katsuki was always stronger. Izuku used all his agility to whirl and strike. Katsuki gritted his teeth as Izuku began to beat him with the parasol like he was some goddamn piñata.

While Izuku did this, Katsuki reached into his cargo pants' pocket. He pulled out a tracker.

He had a feeling that Izuku might get away. Because somehow, Izuku always did.

So he placed a safety measurement right on the back of Deku's duffle bag. It snapped into place with its tiny teeth right in time. Izuku broke away from him and in movements too fast to recall, trapped his arm in the parasol, closed it, and with a giant yell of effort and impressive strength, whirled him into one of the merchant stands.

It was a wash after that. He tried to keep up with Izuku, but the man retreated faster than the wind. Izuku sprinted for the docks, barreling towards a departing boat.

Katsuki was right behind him, gun drawn—and he was aiming to kill.

His sights lined up with Izuku's skull. His finger curled tight against the trigger. One pull. That was all it would take. One bullet to cauterize the wound inside of him that never stopped bleeding.

Right when he had a clear shot—his hand shook. The bullet veered.

He tried again, but the same thing happened. He clenched his teeth and attempted to tighten his aim.

But his hands began to tremble out of control.

Izuku leapt for the departing boat, grabbing onto one of the ropes. He dangled there, completely vulnerable.

Katsuki took aim for Izuku's head again—

—and right as he pulled the trigger, his heart intensely spasmed.

He flinched, in shock and in pain, and the bullet landed in Izuku's arm instead of his skull.

Katsuki skidded to a halt at the end of the pier. He clutched at his heart, stunned.

He had the shot. What happened? Why the hell did that happen?

His eyes were wild as he assessed what was going on—and what he found was infuriating. Standing directly in front of his new found killer instincts was his love for Izuku. He thought he left it at the masquerade ball, but it followed him, festering inside.

Katsuki looked up. He watched, seething, as the boat took off.

After a moment, Katsuki could see Izuku peak from over the ledge of the boat. Those stunning green eyes landed on him, cutting through the dark night. Katsuki calmly stared back, heart fluttering despite himself. Even in the dead of night, Izuku's eyes were radiant. They pulled him in and slowly, all his anger melted away under that beautiful gaze.

Loud police sirens began to make their way to the night market.

Katsuki pulled his hood over his head. He didn't break eye contact with Izuku, spun under the spell of those alluring eyes. It wasn't until he turned away did he finally pull himself back.

He walked away quickly from the scene, and disappeared into the mayhem of the night.

Hundreds of people were tightly packed together, gasping and pointing in all different directions. As the blue and red lights approached, Katsuki pushed himself deep into an alley. The police ran right past the crooked passageway he was tucked into. They endlessly searched in the thick crowd of people who were all giving conflicting, confusing recollections.

As he walked back to his motorcycle, Katsuki pulled out his phone. He clicked open his tracker app and saw the tiny, blinking green dot on the map.

It was slowly moving across the Osaka Bay.

"See you soon, Deku," Katsuki hissed.

☽ ☽ ☽

The green dot on his phone crept across the water and stalled on Awaji Island. It blinked steadily on the island's edge like a heartbeat waiting to stop.

Katsuki followed it closely, driving past the speed limit along the edge of Osaka Bay.

Along the way, Katsuki's thoughts snagged on what occured at the docks. He couldn't move past the fact his hand shook like that. What bad fucking timing.

Katsuki mulled over this, unhappily. He reviewed the last eight years in his head—and something he didn't notice before stood out: every time he aimed his gun at Izuku, his hands were shaky. Anyone else, his hands were still and precise.

He thought this was because of his pure, unchecked rage for the man. It made sense that he trembled when holding the gun whenever it came to that goddamn Deku because of how much he hated him. But now, he wasn't sure hatred was the cause.

A tiny, quiet whisper in the back of his head told him the answer.

But he didn't want to listen to it.

By the time he arrived on Awaji Island, the wind turned cold and sharp. It sliced through his jacket like it possessed teeth. The chill heightened his excitement, because while the wind howled, so did Katsuki's inner beast. The adrenaline in his veins was pulsating being so close to his prey.

He followed Izuku's tracker all the way to a forgotten stretch of cracked road. There, a shitty roadside motel sat against the night sky. The blue neon sign sputtered on and off, barely clinging on. There were no cars in the lot and no signs of life.

Katsuki parked his bike right out front, boots hitting the pavement with finality. As he kicked down the stand, satisfaction began to coil tight in his gut like a loaded gun.

On his phone screen, the distance between the green dot and his own glowing orange one was closing.

Katsuki walked into the motel with his jaw set. The bell chimed above him like a warning siren announcing his entrance. The first thing that greeted him was the smell of old dust and residual nicotine. The faded floral wallpaper stood out a bit in contrast with the bleakness of the motel.

Which Katsuki all thought was fine for the crime scene it was about to become.

He walked straight up to the man sitting at the check-in. He noted the employee had an oily comb over and large, round glasses.

Of course, the clerk didn't see him at first. His eyes were plastered to his laptop, clearly watching porn.

Katsuki tried his best to not focus on the lewd image that was reflected through the crooked glasses of the man. But when the employee didn't even notice he was standing there, Katsuki unhappily slammed his hand on the bell.

The man jumped and yelped. Immediately, his eyes went wide. He snatched his headphones from his ears and slammed his laptop shut. He gawked at Katsuki, entirely surprised to see someone actually wanting service at this shit hole.

"Watching porn on the job?" Katsuki sneered, unfriendly. "I should call management and report you."

"No! Please don't!" The man instantly begged. He straightened out and clasped his hands together. "We don't get customers this time of night, I swear! Please, this is my fifth strike, I'll lose the job if you report it."

"Oh, really?" Katsuki grinned fiendishly as he leaned across the counter. "I'll tell you what, I won't report this on two conditions."

The man nodded frantically. "Ye-Yes of course, anything!"

"First, you tell me which room he went to," Katsuki said as he lifted up his phone screen, showing Izuku's picture. "And the second, you take this 60,000 yen right here and not report anything you see or hear for the next twenty four hours."

He pulled a wad of crisp bills from his coat and dropped it on the counter.

The man froze, taken back. He assessed Katsuki cautiously. His eyes flickered between the phone and then the cash.

Katsuki raised a perfectly plucked brow and waited. He knew this man would cave. Men like him always did.

And just like he predicted, the man took the money.

“He’s in room 201,” the clerk whispered.

Katsuki grinned with all his teeth. He leaned back and turned toward the hallway.

“Enjoy the rest of your video,” he called, voice dry and humorless.

☽ ☽ ☽

Killer red eyes tightened as he watched the distance between the two dots on the map grow smaller and smaller.

He walked along the ledge of the outdoor hallway, looking closely at the green dot on his phone. He passed by dark window after dark window of the hotel rooms. Then when he rounded the corner, he saw a single, golden light spilling out from one room.

Katsuki looked down at his phone. The distance in kilometers was nearly zero. His heart began to race again. His stomach tightened at the thought of getting close to his prey.

As he walked forward, suddenly the blinking green light disappeared—a sign that Izuku must’ve discovered the tracker and destroyed it. Then the light in front of him was killed in an instant.

Katsuki scoffed, unable to stop the mean sneer that spread across his lips.

“A little too late for that,” he muttered, voice low and cruel.

He slipped the phone into his pocket and pulled out his lock pick without breaking stride. Passing the dark window, he paused at the door. His heart thumped loudly as he began to easily unlock it.

The lock popped and he stepped inside with the gentleness of a demon.

His restricted eyes scanned the dark space.

The motel room was exactly what he expected. A single bed with a TV, dresser, closet and bathroom tucked away in the corner. But none of that mattered. What mattered was that Katsuki could feel the fear in the air.

It was tangible, like static electricity silently humming beneath the silence.

He breathed it in slowly. His eyes adjusted to the dark as his hands clenched in excitement.

He closed the door behind him and locked it tight.

He moved like a shadow, shifting his weight to soundless. He searched carefully for that beautiful man he's been chasing all his life.

He passed the bed and checked the closet first. When that was empty he looked behind the dresser and under the desk. He pivoted carefully on his heels towards the bathroom, wondering if there was a window Izuku crawled out of—but there was none. And Izuku wasn't there.

Which left one more option.

He walked back to the bedroom and cut his eyes down to the ground.

He slowly crouched and there he was. His small Izuku, trying to crawl away.

Katsuki grinned cruelly with all his teeth.

Clever, darling. But not clever enough.

Katsuki's hands shot out, grasping Izuku's ankles. His hands wrapped all the way around and he pulled. He drank in the sound of Izuku's terrified, surprised yelp as he tugged him backwards with all his might.

Izuku tried to struggle against him, but it was useless. He was always stronger.

But that damn Izuku was always quicker. He twisted immediately when he was pulled from underneath the bed. Then he aimed his gun directly at Katsuki's arm. Katsuki tried to dodge, but Izuku's trigger finger was lethal as lightning.

Katsuki yelled as he was shot point blank range. Pain seared across his whole arm. He went flying back into the wall with the force as the bullet ripped clean through his bicep.

He drowned down the pain with all his vengeful thoughts. Make Izuku pay for killing his mother. That's all that mattered. Not the agony. Not the burning voice in his head that was screaming at him to stop—but simply his mother.

Him and Izuku fought again. But this time it was different.

There was a surge of finality in the air.

Izuku came at him fast, swinging the butt of his gun toward Katsuki's temple. But Katsuki saw it coming. He caught Izuku's wrist mid-swing and twisted it until Izuku screamed. The gun clattered to the floor.

Izuku moved quickly, launching his legs up around Katsuki's neck and choking him with brutal precision. Katsuki pried at Izuku's thighs, fingers digging in. But Izuku held tight and began to suffocate him. Katsuki stood, lifting him like dead weight. He began blindly slamming them against anything he could find. The walls. The dresser. The bed frame.

The room trembled under their vicious collision, breaking and bending to their will.

Izuku tightened his hold, grabbed Katsuki's hair, and drove his elbow down again and again. Katsuki's vision blinked white. He hissed, realizing Izuku was attempting to knock him out again.

He then blindly hurled them both into the mirror.

Glass exploded around them. Shards sharply flung in the air and cut them both.

Izuku faltered. That was all Katsuki needed.

He ripped Izuku off and slammed him down. They grappled, hands slipping on blood and sweat. Izuku struck first with a wild kick—catching Katsuki in the jaw. The impact knocked him sideways. But he caught Izuku again before he could run and tackled him into the nightstand.

An elbow hit his throat. A lamp broke over his back. Katsuki staggered. Izuku ran. Katsuki dragged him down by the leg, pinned him.

They fought like animals. Grappling. Scratching. Punching and kicking.

Memories of his mother rushed forward, driving him on.

With every hit he saw her stiff body. With every punch he heard himself crying there in her living room for hours. His eyes began to burn as he thought about Izuku poisoning him. Leaving him alone to find that red folder. All while Izuku went back to his real lover, Chisaki. Not giving a single damn about him.

Izuku grabbed the sheets, wrapped them around Katsuki's head, and wrenched free. But Katsuki's blade hissed through the linen, cutting through.

Izuku sprinted for the door. Katsuki pinned him down by stabbing through his pant leg. The thud of Izuku's skull against the floor was deafening. Izuku clawed for the doorknob. Katsuki dragged him back in one fell swoop.

Katsuki pinned Izuku down. He forced himself between Izuku's legs, pressing every ounce of his weight down. Then his hands found Izuku's delicate throat—and squeezed.

Izuku thrashed. He scratched at Katsuki's hands and kicked but it was useless. Katsuki was always stronger. He pushed his weight down and overpowered Izuku fully.

Katsuki held on as Izuku gasped. There was no love in the hold this time. Only muscle, memory, and the inevitability of the tragedy they'd become.

Izuku looked up at him. He was terrified.

Katsuki stared. And for a moment, time fractured.

Suddenly, beneath him wasn't the Izuku he'd been hunting but rather the Izuku he'd only wanted to protect. He saw that version of Izuku, in Biei, basked in warm, honey light that spilled in from the window. He was at the kitchen table, stirring sugar in his tea with a spoon. That saccharine version of Izuku smiled and gestured for him to come closer.

Katsuki blinked, hard.

He willed away the memory and continued his stead-fast resolve.

But then, he saw Izuku give up the fight. Izuku's hands went slack at his sides, but his eyes stayed gazing up at Katsuki. In those beautiful viridian irises was nothing but love and resignation. The two mixed together in the most sorrowful way.

Katsuki tried to push forward—but then a small, single tear drop fell from Izuku's eye.

Time split again. Then he froze.

Because he realized, the face beneath him was the same one that once laughed on a boat with him in Okinawa. The same one that peeked up over a book in the hotel bed. The same one that leaned close over steaming cups in Biei, whispering something dumb and gentle just to make him smile.

Those versions of Izuku bled into each other, like light refracted through stained glass.

And then finally, he saw the Izuku with the eyepatch.

He felt those caring, tiny hands on his shoulder again, washing away all the neglect he'd collected.

Katsuki's hands began to shake.

His grip loosened.

Air slammed into Izuku's lungs like concrete bricks hitting his chest. He began violently coughing. His hands instinctively flew to his throat as wind filled him up again. His trembling fingers landed on top of Katsuki's.

Katsuki gritted his teeth—angry with himself.

He thought of his mother's corpse and reached for his blade—he swung it towards Izuku's neck for the kill.

In a split second, Izuku caught sight of it. He closed his eyes and craned his neck, giving Katsuki the perfect opening.

Katsuki froze. The tip of his blade stopped at Izuku's Adam's apple.

Shock rippled across his body like hands splitting his spine. He watched with earth shattering realization, as yet again, Izuku remained giving—even now.

When he didn't make a move, Izuku hesitantly opened his eyes.

Katsuki's hands began shaking more—and soon the trembling became uncontrollable. His tears betrayed him as they poured from his eyes faster now. He tried to rid the roaring memories of Izuku out of his head, but he was unable to.

All the versions of Izuku's smile bombarded him like vicious lashes to the face. Over and over and over. His memory reminded him just how much he loved the man he had at knife point.

Katsuki's nose flared and he pushed his mother's corpse to the front of his mind. He could do it. He could fucking do it—but he stayed rooted like time stilled.

His eyes darted all around Izuku's face, cataloging every freckle he kissed in the past.

Suddenly, Izuku held Katsuki's shaking hand. He steadied the blade.

"It's yours to take, Kacchan," Izuku whispered through his quivering lips. "It's always been yours anyways."

Izuku didn't flinch. He didn't fight. He closed his eyes, tilted his head more, and offered his neck to Katsuki.

Katsuki's eyes widened as Izuku tried to help. But his hand couldn't move. He shook more violently and clenched his jaw. And it was at this moment Katsuki realized something horrifying: even after everything, Izuku still loved him enough to die by his hand.

He exploded.

Every blistering emotion erupted at once. Katsuki screamed out a loud, frustrated curse. He snatched the knife away from Izuku's throat and his body rocked forward.

Katsuki clenched his teeth as he lodged the knife into the floor next to Izuku's ear.

Izuku stared wide eyed in shock at Katsuki. He stared right back with the same emotion.

Katsuki watched, entirely helpless, as his tears steadily fell down onto Izuku. Soon, Izuku began to cry as well, and their sorrow mixed together on freckled skin.

"I—I can't." Katsuki's voice broke straight down the middle. "I c-can't do it."

Katsuki's face twisted in disbelief.

He gripped the blade's handle like it was the only thing anchoring him to the world. His fingers curled around the carved letters of his mother's name, as if the feel of it could give him strength—but it didn't. It only deepened the divide.

He was torn between love and hate. Guilt and rage. Duty and desire. He struggled back and forth, held prisoner by the two loud wolves inside of him.

In that moment, the beasts finally tore into each other. The warring halves that'd fought for dominance since he saw that red folder collided in one final clash. And the one who came out on top wasn't who he expected.

It was grief.

It had been sitting there, puppeteering everything from the shadows. It was draped in years of sadness and strife that Katsuki never got the time to process. Katsuki's face crumpled when it rose to its full height, showing itself.

He took one, good look into those eyes he loved so much. Suddenly all his rage was gone.

He screwed his eyes shut and turned his head away. He choked out several, muffled cries as he bit his lip.

Then Katsuki hunched over Izuku, weeping. He rested their foreheads together.

All the anger inside of him evaporated into the air. In its wake was only grief and mourning. The two sat heavy at the bottom of his body. They were dragging him down and he couldn't lift his limbs. Katsuki lowered his head into the crook of Izuku's neck and his free hand threaded through Izuku's hair tenderly.

"Wh-Why can't I d-do it?" Katsuki cried as he clutched the handle of his blade tighter.

As he held Izuku, the answer came to him. That tiny voice he'd been ignoring finally spoke up. It was no longer small but rather a loud, thunderous bellow that shook him to his core.

"Because you love him," it said. "Because you've always loved him."

The voice showed him all the different versions of Izuku. And he didn't know which versions of Izuku he loved more: the ones who fought him tooth and nail, or the ones who trusted him enough to fall asleep at his side.

"You love all of him," the voice said. "You won't be able to choose."

And the voice was right. All those different Izukus he loved.

Even the one who killed his mother.

All the years of denial caught up in one, swift moment. The tidal wave inside of him slammed down, hard and cruel and drowned him in the truth: it'd been love at first sight in Vienna and it stuck with him this whole time.

Suddenly, warm loving arms encased him.

Izuku, even after being hunted, was sweet to him again.

Katsuki broke down.

Izuku hugged him, giving him the embrace he so desperately wanted since finding that red folder.

Katsuki leaned into his husband and for this single moment, he felt small again. He missed his mother, and he missed his husband in the same, terrible breath. He cradled Izuku's head tenderly like he used to, not so long ago.

Suddenly, all he wanted was to go back to those few months in Biei. Just them. Happy. Nothing but pure, amazing happiness. Why couldn't he ever be happy like that? All he ever wanted was that type of steady peace in his life.

Katsuki held on tighter.

Izuku didn't say a word. The other man let him cry and some part of Katsuki despised it.

Of course the one person to witness his breakdown would be the same man who ruined him.

The tears came hard and fast. Then slower. Then finally, not at all.

Katsuki hated every second of it. Hated the way he shook. Hated the rawness clawing at his throat. Hated that he was sobbing into the neck of the man who'd destroyed his life. But more than anything, he hated the truth that wormed its way to the surface.

He didn't want to kill Izuku.

That fury he'd been feeding on lied to him. It dressed itself up as justice and closure. It told him that Izuku's blood would settle the score. A simple bullet through the skull or a knife between the ribs could set him free.

But now, with his face buried in the shoulder of the man who shattered him, he felt nothing but the weight of his own confusion. And the slow, sick realization that he still wanted Izuku.

Katsuki raised his head. Their noses brushed. His breath caught. Their eyes met and their extremely vulnerable gazes held.

A split second of silence.

This near, Katsuki couldn't deny Izuku's power over him. Izuku was close to being his everything. His husband. His prey. The man he always chased until he was fucking losing it in the head.

Because while Katsuki was always stronger, and Izuku was always faster, they were undeniably weak for each other—in every way.

His stomach tightened with the need to be closer to his other half and there was a pure, carnal pulse in his veins. It stirred awake from the visceral stare Izuku was giving him, and his mind began to crave being close.

Katsuki watched as Izuku let out a beautiful, unsteady breath.

Viridian eyes dilated, pulling Katsuki in like a siren song.

Katsuki tightened his grip on Izuku's hair. Izuku's fingers dug into his shoulders. Their breaths quickened together at a gradually increasing rate.

Then they both closed their eyes right as Katsuki lowered his head and Izuku tilted his head up.

They locked into a vicious kiss and all sanity walked out the door.

The kiss tasted like blood, sweat and tears. The three melted in a way that was only saved for them. Purely Izuku and Katsuki, colliding yet again in a taboo moment. Dark desire flooded through Katsuki as he began to take Izuku apart, pouring out all his frustrations.

What happened next, Katsuki couldn't have predicted in a thousand years.

It was provoked by Izuku's damning green eyes. The way Izuku watched him was as if Katsuki was danger personified, and Izuku wanted to get hurt. The stare was maddening, pulling Katsuki further and further away from all his senses.

Their hands scratched into each other until there was no distance left between them.

Katsuki's heart skipped a beat when Izuku called his name, soaked in sultry want. Right then and there, the ground felt like it would give way underneath him if he didn't take Izuku. Katsuki worked his knife in a way that called to all sides of him.

Izuku's eyes followed the blade as if in a trance.

He cut away all of Izuku's clothes, egged on by his husband's hungry stare. When Izuku was helplessly naked beneath him, Katsuki admired the blood spots across Izuku's skin. All the new cuts and bruises were like a painting, and they smeared across his freckles beautifully.

Izuku's gaze was equal parts worship and self-destruction. It beckoned to him: wreck me, take me, unload it all on me.

So Katsuki did.

He sat up and snapped his shirt off in one fluid motion. Then he surrendered to all his feelings.

He fluidly bound his husband with the zip ties he meant to use to trap him—and Izuku willingly gave his wrists without a struggle. He was staring at Katsuki like he was ready to be burned, and willingly ready to receive every inch of Katsuki's cock and fury.

When Katsuki pushed inside his husband, he knew that they would be forever bound in a way that no one could name.

He desecrated Izuku with all the powerful emotions strung between them.

Hate. Love. Rapture. Envy. Jealousy. Pain.

He weaponized each one into powerful thrusts. He wanted Izuku to feel every ounce of his exasperation—and he felt Izuku's right back. Even in zip ties, his husband's nails dug into him. Every ounce of themselves was given in that moment and swelled together into a ruthless fucking.

Underneath every moan was a bloody vow. Every squeeze of the neck was a promise. Katsuki kept his mouth busy until Izuku forgot how to tremble. It was mind numbing. Katsuki could feel Izuku melt around him like he was wax over Katsuki's flame.

Then Izuku gasped. Katsuki felt it, a spasm that told him that Izuku was his and only his.

Not Chisaki's. Not death's. But his.

That split-second moment when his cock hit Izuku's sweet spot, Katsuki decided it was only for him to touch. He angled and pounded relentlessly until Izuku shattered. Pleasure tore through them like a scream beneath skin.

Katsuki pressed bites to Izuku's spine that matched the way he started to move. Fully rough, hard, and relentless. He sped up, grinding into Izuku until he tore moans of electric heat from his husband.

He fucked Izuku like this was his vengeance—and maybe it was.

He devoured Izuku whole, nipping and sucking until he felt Izuku struggle against the zip ties, curls bouncing too lovely for a vulgar moment like this. Every thrust Katsuki gave was a promise made with teeth. And Izuku took it, willingly. He took all of Katsuki, moaning like it hurt to feel this good.

Their rhythm turned punishing. Katsuki drove into him like he was trying to leave pieces of himself behind. Izuku fucked back like he was starving, like the only way he could feel whole again was to have Katsuki demolish him.

When Izuku came the first time, Katsuki didn't stop.

Not even when he came again, screaming his name, Katsuki still didn't stop.

It was the third that broke him.

Izuku's whole body convulsed, raw and sobbing. They came together and Katsuki emptied everything he was into his husband. That final thrust cracked both of their hearts wide open. Emotions bled out of Izuku like floodwater breaching a dam. Izuku cried like it wasn't sex but rather like it was a resurrection.

Katsuki wrapped his arms around him, held him through the powerful orgasm. And when Izuku shook in his arms—completely blind, breathless, and ruined—Katsuki finally understood what it meant to be needed like this. To be worshipped. To be wholly loved so much that he felt the power surge down to his core.

And he couldn't get enough.

Without pulling out, Katsuki rolled their bodies to the middle of the bed and pressed Izuku belly down. Izuku's head hit the soft pillow as he breathed steadily in and out, sweat rolling down all parts of his body.

"We're very far from done, Deku," Katsuki roughly hissed against the shell of Izuku's ear. He rolled his hips in a slow, greedy grind that made Izuku's eyes fall shut with pleasure. "Bite a pillow if you need to."

They kept going. One round. Two rounds.

They even tore through to a sixth, impossible one when Izuku rolled their bodies and he wound up on top, straddling Katsuki.

Izuku trembled like he was caught somewhere between need and delirium. Sweat slicked his skin, and his thighs shook as he rode Katsuki like he couldn't get enough of the cock stuffing him full.

Katsuki's back was flush against the mattress, feet planted for leverage. He fucked up into Izuku with powerful force. He was trying to demolish him from the inside out and fill the man with all his pent up emotions.

He dragged Izuku down into a kiss that was all teeth, tongue and insatiable hunger.

Izuku whimpered into it, helpless. His bound hands clawed at Katsuki's chest, leaving scratches that burned deliciously. Katsuki groaned as Izuku's mouth found his neck, sucking hard enough to bruise. Then he started out right crying, lost in too much pleasure.

He pressed his lips directly against Katsuki's, trembling.

"Ka-Kacchan," Izuku sobbed, sounding like he was gone from all his sanity. He began to struggle against his zip ties, and made a frustrated sound. "Kacchan, Please. I need—"

"—Then take," Katsuki growled furiously.

He bit down on Izuku's lip unkindly, drawing blood.

Izuku gasped, cried out, but didn't pull away. He only ground harder against him, shivering as Katsuki's grip bruised into his hips and his cock slammed deeper with every thrust.

Izuku's body bucked and shook, biceps flexing as he fought against the plastic ties. And then, with a fierce, guttural groan, he tore them apart at the same time Katsuki slammed against his prostate. Izuku threw his arms around Katsuki's neck as if he'd been craving holding him all along.

Katsuki's hands dropped low, spreading Izuku's cheeks open with no shame. He drove up into him until the bed groaned beneath them.

Izuku was panting like an animal in heat. He sat up, back arched and cock leaking against Katsuki's stomach. His trembling hands gripped the headboard as he rode Katsuki with a fire that bordered on madness.

His hair was clinging to his forehead, soaked with sweat. Blood was smeared across his lips, his chest, his fingertips. And his eyes—fuck, those sweet doe eyes—were pitch-black with lust, pupils blown so wide they swallowed the green whole.

He looked like pure sin, like some forbidden god that came down to ruin Katsuki.

And Katsuki fucking loved it.

“That’s it,” he growled loudly, voice breaking as Izuku bounced on him relentlessly. “Take it. Fucking take it all you want.”

Izuku rode him with force that knocked the air straight from Katsuki’s lungs. The slap of skin filled the room, lewd and thunderous, punctuated only by Izuku’s strangled moans every time Katsuki’s cock hit that spot inside him.

Katsuki matched him, thrust for thrust. His hands left bruises on Izuku’s cheeks and his nostrils flared with how deep his need was. His logic was gone—burned to white-hot noise that sang one command: fill Izuku up with everything he could.

Izuku beautifully moaned his name when Katsuki fingered at his already stuffed hole without warning.

The bed creaked loudly.

With help from the slick lube and cum, Katsuki sunk the finger inside. He stretched Izuku’s hole wider, and felt himself deliciously sucked in. Izuku’s movements became more desperate as he pushed another finger in. Then Izuku outright began sobbing from overstimulation when he did a third. But still, Izuku didn’t stop.

He kept riding Katsuki as he pushed in a fourth finger, making Izuku take a new limit of being filled up.

Katsuki grinned, feral, as he watched Izuku fuck himself on his cock and fingers.

Then, the bed cracked.

The whole frame flipped, breaking underneath their debauchery. Both their eyes widened, and their breaths caught as they were tossed ungracefully to the floor. The sheets went with them, and Katsuki quickly wrapped his arms around Izuku, keeping himself buried to the hilt.

They hit the ground with Izuku’s back on the floor, Katsuki between his legs and the covers over their heads.

There was barely time to register the new position because immediately Izuku grabbed his face and began to kiss him deeply. The metallic taste of iron exchanged between them. Katsuki couldn’t help but lick the blood from off Izuku’s bottom lip.

His husband gasped at the sensation and excitedly clenched around Katsuki’s throbbing length.

“Don’t stop,” Izuku commanded breathlessly.

He wrapped his muscular legs around Katsuki’s waist, locking him in.

They fixed gazes and Katsuki was gone.

Katsuki fisted Izuku’s cock and started to fuck him with all the wrath he never got to scream.

Every thrust was brutal and honest. He wanted to ruin him. Make his husband feel him tomorrow, the next week and forever. And Izuku met his thrusts like he craved the savageness of it. Slick, wet sounds of lube and cum filled their ears as he railed Izuku into the ground.

Katsuki watched Izuku come undone, blissfully crying out with wrecked sounds that made his cock throb harder. He sucked at Izuku’s neck and nails raked down his back.

When pain bloomed across his skin, Katsuki accepted the truth in all its heaviness. No matter how much blood soaked the floor between them, he would always choose to crawl through it —just to be with his husband.

Because even though he was a monster, he was a monster that loved Izuku.

☽ ☽ ☽

By the time they were tired, the sky was beginning to brighten.

They were pushed past their limits and both of their voices were hoarse. Every ounce of adrenaline in their bodies had been spent. And it resulted in hours of sex that Katsuki couldn’t get enough of. He could kiss Izuku forever, he dangerously realized.

When they finally stopped, it was abrupt.

Izuku moaned loudly after dry orgasming for the nth time. His voice cracked exquisitely and his back arched off the floor. His legs quaked as Katsuki emptied deep inside of him.

Izuku gasped sharply, then his whole body collapsed with Katsuki’s.

His hands were still clutching at Katsuki’s shoulders with what little strength he had. Then they fell away. His eyes fluttered, and for a second he seemed like he might try to fight the weight pulling him under. But it won. Izuku gave in completely to sleep right then and there.

A faint snore slipped past Izuku’s lips.

Katsuki stared in shock.

“Izuku?” He questioned.

But no answer came.

He lifted his fingers to check for a pulse, and found it was steady and fine. He couldn't stop the sense of bewilderment. Had they really fucked until Izuku passed out?

He blinked slowly, staggered by the sudden come down. Then, with a low grunt, he pulled out. He tried his best to be slow and careful, wincing at the wet pop that followed. He rolled to his feet, ignoring the pain in his arm from where Izuku shot him. It throbbed sharply, but he pushed it aside to tend to Izuku first.

He walked to the bathroom and returned a moment later with a warm, damp towel.

Wordlessly, Katsuki knelt beside Izuku.

He began to clean him. He carefully dragged the rag across Izuku's forehead, ridding him of the salty sweat gluing his hair to his face. Then he moved lower, trailing the cloth down over Izuku's chest, his thighs, his calves, and eventually the mess between his legs.

Izuku softly whined in his sleep as Katsuki cleaned his entrance, jerking slightly.

The helplessness of the sound made his heart tug.

He looked down, and saw the absurd amount of cum spilling from Izuku.

He probed his tongue at his cheek. It would be unpleasant if Izuku woke up with that much fluid dried inside of him. And it would take forever to get out if left overnight.

Katsuki rolled Izuku over, belly down.

Then he put his head between Izuku's legs. He spread Izuku's backside, getting a good look at the overused entrance. It was pink, swollen and the rim was twitching. He thought about using his fingers to scoop out the cum, but knew his softest appendage would avoid more irritation.

He hesitated for only a second before leaning in.

The first press of his tongue was measured and gentle.

Izuku quietly groaned in his sleep, hips twitching faintly. Katsuki pushed his tongue in further, moving it gingerly and drew out all of the cum. He swallowed it down and spread Izuku's legs further. Izuku whined again when Katsuki softly swirled his tongue. He ate it all until there was nothing left.

He pulled back and spread Izuku's backside so he could see the little hole again. He ran the rag over it a final time, cleaning all the remains.

He walked over to his bag and unzipped the side pocket. His fingers brushed past gauze and tape until they closed around the small bottle of emergency ointment tucked inside his travel first aid kit. When he returned to Izuku, he smeared it across any scrapes, cuts, and bruises he could find along the other man. Then mindfully he put a generous amount on Izuku's entrance.

After he was done, Katsuki leaned in and planted a kiss against the small of Izuku's back.

He continued on cleaning Izuku's arms, his hands, his legs—until there was nothing left but a man who'd been thoroughly, intimately cared for.

When he was done, Katsuki tossed the rag into the corner of the room and sank down beside him. He pulled the covers over them and used the last of his strength to turn his head.

Izuku looked peaceful.

And that was the last thing he remembered before sleep finally took him.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki was falling again. He didn't want to be. But he was dragged through his mind like a body being pulled over a barbed wire. Blackness swept over his thoughts and brought him back to another distant memory.

This time, he was nineteen. One year earlier than the dream he had of her before.

It was early spring, everyone was coming off the coattails of winter. Hope was in the air as people were excited to get outside and stretch their limbs after such a long hibernation.

But more importantly, it was his birthday.

They were at his mother's apartment. The windows were open and the air that drifted in was warm and damp with rain. The scent of pavement and wet cherry blossoms cut through the scorched mess wafting out of the kitchen.

Katsuki woke up from a nap to the smell of food burning. For a second, he thought the house was on fire—again.

He stormed into the kitchen, ready to yell, but froze when he saw her.

His mother was sweating over a cake pan like it was a live grenade. The kitchen looked like a bomb went off in it. Flour was on the floor. A scorch mark was on the side of the toaster. One of her sleeves was singed at the edge.

She didn't even look at him when she pointed at the cake on the counter with her spatula.

"Happy birthday, brat."

It was the most hideous cake Katsuki had ever seen. It was pink, lopsided and sagged like it was barely holding on. Red frosting pooled like blood on one side. And more so, strawberries were squashed flat into the surface into a sloppy letter K.

Katsuki blinked.

"Since when did you cook?" He asked, scrunching his nose. "This looks a mess."

“Yeah? So does your face,” she snapped. Her hair was tied back with a rubber band, and there was a streak of frosting down her jaw. “I wanted to try to do something nice for you. I realized I never properly said sorry for how your sixteenth birthday went, so here—happy birthday, Katsuki.”

Like the good son he was, Katsuki sat down.

His mother stuck a single pink candle into the top with unnecessary force and lit it with her cigarette lighter. He stared at the crooked flame. She crossed her arms like she was daring him not to eat it.

“You’re not getting another one. I don’t care if it tastes like shit.”

Katsuki scoffed a bit, then smiled.

He blew out his candle, happy to make a wish.

This was the first time she’d gone out of her way to bake a cake. He wondered if she did this out of guilt since she mentioned his badly bungled sixteenth birthday.

But, to him, this was great.

He faked liking the cake even though the bottom was burned. The middle was also half raw and the frosting was too sweet. But he didn’t say a word. He ate it like it was the best thing he’d ever tasted. Because her knuckles were scraped, her voice was tired, and her smile flickered when she thought he wasn’t looking.

“Thanks, this is awesome,” Katsuki said.

“You’re welcome,” his mom replied with a grin. “Happy birthday, you brat.”

She ruffled his hair without saying another word. Her palm was warm and dusted with sugar. Outside, a breeze moved through the open window and stirred the curtains. It carried the smell of earth and rain and the distant sound of someone cutting grass.

“What did you wish for?” His mom asked.

He shrugged. “Nothing serious.”

But that was a lie. He wished for more moments like these. He could finally see his mother coming around the corner, and he was so happy about it. He could see her attempting to be there for him in ways she wasn’t when he was younger.

He wished for her to continue being better.

☽ ☽ ☽

Day After Reuniting

When Katsuki woke up, he was no longer in his mother's apartment. Instead, he was thrusted back into the reality where his mother didn't get to live to her full potential. And one of the men responsible was next to him, naked in the covers.

Katsuki groaned from the jarring whiplash.

They were laying on the ground, tangled in a heap of bedding. His muscles were screaming from the insane marathon of sex they endured.

He looked around the motel and was impressed with the wreckage. Glass shards glittered across the carpet like a field of broken stars, remnants of the mirror Katsuki shattered. All the pictures were knocked off the walls and fractured on the ground. The bed had been rocked halfway across the room and it was tilting downwards from when they broke it.

Pretty much, the room was obliterated.

Shamefully, Katsuki got up.

He walked over to his bag, and sifted inside for the first aid kit. He found it and returned to sit on the floor beside Izuku. He began to dress his new gun shot wound that was pulsating.

As he did this, he studied Izuku.

His anger was gone, replaced by its true face: hurt. His sadness was more powerful now, and the undeniable love he held for Izuku was plain as day. He couldn't hold back the pathetic sigh that fell from his lips.

How stupid he was for thinking he fell in love with Izuku during Biei.

He's probably been in love from the moment he laid eyes on him in Vienna.

The irony. The guy who hated romance fell victim to love at first sight at the age of seventeen and never recovered.

Katsuki finished cleaning his wound and sat upright against the wall.

All the screws in his head that had come undone last night retightened. He began thinking straight again, focusing on what the hell was he going to do now to get his revenge. He chewed on his bottom lip as he swallowed down the new epiphany: he couldn't kill Izuku—and he didn't want to. But that contradicted everything he'd been living for these last five years.

Slowly, Izuku stirred.

His hair was disheveled and a small grunt left him as he rose. Izuku glanced around with those doe eyes of his, looking far too innocent for the killing machine he was. He sleepily rubbed his face and tried to sit upright. He immediately winced. Izuku gasped, groaned, then rolled himself up with one arm on his side.

He looked at Katsuki wearily.

Katsuki hung his head away.

Another memory of his mother came then—her in her casket. Her pale lifeless face an ashen grey. He could still remember how the mortician tried to cover up the gunshot holes in her temples with her hair. But it only half worked. He could see the wounds as they lowered her to the ground.

Katsuki raked a hand through his hair and gripped the roots hard enough to sting.

He was truly fucking weak.

He glanced at Izuku once, then slowly stood up from the covers. He shifted tiredly and kicked the sheets off to the side. He began putting on his clothes in humiliation. He kept his back turned towards Izuku as he halfway dressed in his shirt and boxers.

Then he leaned against the wall across the way from where Izuku was. Katsuki put distance between them. If he didn't, he knew he would embrace Izuku again.

Izuku was studying him carefully with some distrust in his eyes.

The sound of a rustling tree reached both of their ears.

Quickly, Izuku—who was visibly on edge—hastily looked out the window. Then when he noticed it was only trees, the paranoia washed away, but Izuku's jumpy demeanor didn't leave. He stiffened as if he was afraid of someone else.

If what Shigaraki said was true, then Katsuki knew who Izuku was afraid of. But Katsuki wanted Izuku to confirm it in case Shigaraki was lying.

"So," Katsuki said. He cleared his throat, put his head down, and nervously toyed with his hands. "Who else are you running from besides me that has you this jumpy?"

"I-I'm likely being hunted by both the Shie Hassaikai and my family now," Izuku confessed, but then cringed. He tilted his head and made a small correction, "Rather, the people who used to be my family, I suppose. The Viper Academy. Both are possibly coming for me."

"What did you do for that to happen?"

Izuku paused.

Then he said, "I stopped an order of the Shie Hassaikai. And in the process, I slaughtered a large chunk of other assassins from my academy. I haven't run into either the Yakuza or Vipers yet but…it's only a matter of time."

Much to Katsuki's surprise, Izuku confirmed Shigaraki was telling the truth. However, Shigaraki didn't mention Izuku murdering some of his own at all. He found the omission odd, but figured maybe Shigaraki was giving him the footnotes version.

"What constitutes a large chunk?" Katsuki asked distantly.

“Over twenty of my siblings.”

At that, Katsuki balked. He whipped his head up, entirely surprised by the number he heard.

“Twenty?” Katsuki parroted.

Izuku nodded slowly.

Katsuki added those bodies to his own kill count that same night. He raised his brows. Between the two of them, they’d slain over sixty people in under a day. He couldn’t help but feel morbidly impressed with their handiwork.

“I-I didn’t know many of them,” Izuku amended, distressed. “My unit was always sectioned off from everyone. But I had to kill three from my unit who I was close with the same night of the masquerade. My older brother, older sister, and my favorite brother, who I thought might be capable of saving. But he wasn’t.”

Katsuki’s eyes stretched wide.

Older brother? Izuku finally killed his abusive brother?

All the years passed in front of Katsuki.

He recalled the ugly bruises Izuku would come with. Then sourly, Katsuki recalled the eight years they were at odds. He still remembered when Izuku arrived to kill the Midnight Butcher. His face was pulverized, lip split down the middle.

Katsuki tightened his grip on his hands to keep from hugging Izuku.

He was overjoyed that Izuku killed his abuser. Good fucking riddance.

“What made you snap like that?” Katsuki whispered.

Izuku looked Katsuki seriously in the eye now. Katsuki felt his heart tug, and all those strong emotions for Izuku amplified.

“At the masquerade, five of the people you killed were members of the Chisaki family,” Izuku informed him, and Katsuki’s only thought was ‘good’. “That set off a chain reaction and I had no choice but to intervene.”

“What kind of chain reaction?”

“A deadly one. Chisaki Kai is furious about his family members being killed, Katsuki. He figured out you did the massacre and wanted to even the score with the traditional Yakuza punishment: a life for a life. A family member for a family member. But you don’t have any family. Except—”

Izuku paused, sucked in a breath and reluctantly pointed to himself.

“—Me. Legally.”

At this Katsuki grew confused. “We’re not related.”

“Our, ah, marriage,” Izuku muttered with a light blush. “It makes us legally family.”

“Oh.” Katsuki sparked with realization. He nodded slowly. “Right. We’re family. Legally.”

“The marriage certificate was on the public records, and he found it,” Izuku continued to explain. “Because of that, he jumped to the conclusion I had a helping hand in plotting to kill his family and maybe other Vipers. He decided five Vipers had to be killed to balance the scales. A-And then my brother offered to kill the five kids we have.”

Katsuki’s stomach turned. “Who thinks of something like that?”

“Tomura.”

Izuku spat his brother’s name with so much resentment that Katsuki was taken back.

But he was damn glad to hear it.

“My big brother Tomura thinks of something like that,” Izuku hissed, fiercely. “And I-I couldn’t let that happen. I couldn’t. I would burn down the whole city of Tokyo before I ever let that happen. So, I killed them. I killed every single snake that stood in my way, got the kids and ran.”

“And where are the kids now?”

“They’re all safe with Nana,” Izuku explained sadly. “She’s taking them home to their families. I-I had luckily found her rather quickly thanks to your help. You, uh, figured out the bulk of the work and I just put in the last piece. Her alias was One For All. I tracked her down and we talked. Then she agreed to help reunite them with their families that they were stolen from. So, even if the Yakuza or Vipers find me, the kids will be safe no matter what.”

Katsuki’s eyes softened.

Izuku did it. He stopped his cycle.

Affection poured out of him like a steady river. He couldn’t stop it, even if he tried.

All he wanted to do was jump forward and kiss Izuku once more. This time kinder and deeper. He wanted to tell Izuku to be glad he stood up for himself, and not to feel any remorse for killing that bastard brother of his.

But the hurt from being betrayed kept him rooted in place.

“You did good,” Katsuki whispered slowly. He squeezed his hands together and gave a pained, short nod. “I’m…I’m really proud of you.”

“Thank you,” Izuku replied quietly.

They held gazes for a long moment.

Love pulled fiercely inside of him, begging him to run across the room.

Forcefully, Katsuki blinked back oncoming tears. He pushed the heel of his hand into his watery eye and then hung his head down. His hair shadowed his face as he went back to fidgeting. The broken heart inside of him weighed too much.

“But—Katsuki. That’s not all,” Izuku suddenly said. “You’re in danger too.”

Katsuki scoffed and shook his head tiredly. “I’ll be fine.”

“No, Katsuki,” Izuku warned. “You won’t be. Chisaki very explicitly demanded he wants you killed for what you did at the Masquerade. Chisaki kills people who harm his family in creative ways. He’s the head of the Shie Hassaikai for a reason. He overhauled seven other Yakuza families and absorbed them into his own in a very violent, sadistic fashion. You need to be extremely careful. You’re in just as much danger as I am.”

Katsuki was offended.

Izuku really thought his latest, scummy lover was more skilled than him? As if.

He’d done away with gang leaders before without an issue. He could easily do it again, but he knew it was going to take time this turn. Chisaki being the Yakuza Heir put a large, solid barrier around him—but Katsuki was confident he could get past it. He could break it down with his bare fists because he had to.

If he didn’t, his pain would corrode him from the inside.

“Chisaki is the one that needs to be careful,” Katsuki grumbled under his breath. “I’m more capable than you think.” He sighed. Then shifted again. “Well. What is your next move, Izuku?”

“I guess I’m going to keep it moving,” Izuku confessed in a small voice. “Um, Nana offered me a spot to go with her. She said she could help me get out permanently, like you wanted me to do originally. B-But that won’t be for another two months.”

There was a long pause.

“Are you going to take it?” Katsuki asked.

“I-I’m halfway considering it,” Izuku whispered honestly. “That’s my only option if I want to live an okay life, right? I can’t go back to Tokyo, and I have nowhere else to go. Especially after all the killings I’ve done, I likely need protecting to cover up my past. Th-There’s no place for me anymore.”

At that, Katsuki soured once more.

After all the ‘killings’ he’s done?

Izuku said it so simply, like the damage he caused Katsuki was a drop in the ocean. It was almost like Izuku didn’t give a fuck about killing his mother. Katsuki’s mixed emotions stirred again, twisting his insides like putty.

He kept his face as stale as possible as he said his next words.

“Are you sure?” Katsuki asked. His voice was low and quiet. “That’s what you want to do?”

Izuku took a long pause. “I think it is.”

Katsuki waited.

And waited.

And then he waited some more.

He waited for fucking something. Any sort of mention about his mother’s death, or a sorry about how much hurt Izuku caused. He waited for Izuku to say something about deceiving him for a full month. Or poisoning him and leaving him alone. He even waited for an explanation about Izuku being with Chisaki directly after being with him.

But Izuku uttered not a single word.

And it broke his goddamn heart.

He got it now, Izuku loved him. But he didn’t care as much as he thought. So why should Katsuki? He was proud of Izuku for killing his abuser—but Izuku still killed his mother. And Katsuki made a promise at her funeral to get justice. No matter what.

He had one more option left that didn’t involve killing Izuku—and it was the burner phone in his backpack.

Katsuki tightened the grip on his hands as guilt began to chew away at him.

“Okay,” Katsuki whispered. “Let me help you then.”

Katsuki kept his head down as he deceived Izuku.

He did this because he knew now, Izuku was his ultimate weakness. If he continued to gaze into those beautiful eyes, for even a second, he would be done for. His resolve would crumble—and he didn’t want that.

“R-Really?” Izuku whispered, perking up. “You want to help me?”

“Yeah,” Katsuki lied. He wrung his hands tighter. “Just lay low for two months, right? We can figure out a way to stay out of sight together. I can withdraw some cash to help us go dark and I have my motorcycle we can get around on easily. It’ll be safer with the two of us rather than you trying to do this alone.”

More tears pushed at his eyes when ugliness twisted around him.

The side of him that loved Izuku was weeping.

He didn't like lying to Izuku, and this pained him so much to do—but he needed to do it if he wanted to finally move on from his mother's death.

"Thank you, Katsuki," Izuku said gratefully. "Nana gave me the address for a place I could stay at in the meantime. It's called Midnight Sento, it's in a small town not too terribly far from here. It's a bathhouse run by someone she knows who can house us."

"This is nice of her," Katsuki muttered.

He pursed his lips and tilted his head as he thought of a believable lie.

The one he came up with was simple. Once upon a time Aizawa mentioned a 'safe house' that The Company kept for people in witness protection programs. It was super discreet and used to house their more endangered clientele.

He decided to take that and run with it.

"But realistically," he continued. "You're going to need better security than laying low at a bathhouse. If you're going to stay out of their hands for two whole months, you need protection. Likely from trained, lethal bodyguards. I know my ex-supervisor has a safe harbor not too far from here. You'll be better protected in a place with other hitmen who are trained similarly to me."

Izuku didn't respond back right away. Katsuki could tell he was taking a beat to think about things, weighing his options.

"Would your ex-supervisor be okay with me using his safe house?" Izuku asked nervously. "Last I checked your old company also had a kill order on me."

"I'm sure that's settled by now. But if it's not, I'll just beg him," Katsuki grumbled, lying flawlessly. "The old man has a soft spot for me."

"Thank you so much, Katsuki. But what are you going to do? I know you think you can take on Chisaki head on, but he has a lot of connections all over Japan. Getting close to him isn't going to be a simple thing—and neither is getting away. Y-You might need Nana's help disappearing too now," Izuku suggested meekly. "It's something you should consider."

At another mention of that bastard, Katsuki bristled immediately.

"The only thing I am considering is killing Chisaki," Katsuki snapped back harshly. "You don't need to worry about me, Izuku. I can handle myself just fine. I've taken care of myself my whole life. The only thing you need to worry about is laying low. So. Let's get a move on to that safe house."

"Okay," Izuku replied quietly. "Thank you again for being willing to help."

"Don't mention it."

Katsuki reached over into his backpack and pulled out the navy-blue burner Shigaraki gave him.

“I’ll be right back. I’m going to go make the call to get us set up,” Katsuki muttered distantly. “Start getting ready to head out.”

“O-Okay.”

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki walked around the corner, far away from the room.

He stared at the phone like it was a real Mamushi snake. He was waiting for it to come alive and bite him in the neck—but that was a chance he was willing to take. He reflected on how much lack of remorse Izuku showed about his mother. It was fucking repulsive.

But at least now, Katsuki knew if he did give Izuku back, his abusive brother wouldn’t be there because he was dead.

In a way, that made Katsuki feel more content.

He flipped open the phone and pressed dial. It only took one, single ring for Shigaraki to answer.

“Bakugou,” Shigaraki greeted, sounding only a touch surprised. “I thought for a second there you had thrown away the phone after dismantling the wire tap.”

“Is the deal still on the table?” Katsuki asked, cutting right to the point.

“Yes it is.” There was a smug level of amusement in his voice. “Changed your mind?”

“Nearly,” Katsuki replied tightly. “Give me details on how you plan to give me a shot at Chisaki.”

“I’ll schedule a false deal in a remote location,” Shigaraki explained, the ease in his tone grating. “After the power transfer is done, I’ll have full control over his security detail. That means I choose who’s on-site. I’ll choose only Viper agents—no Yakuza.”

Katsuki said nothing, letting the silence push Shigaraki to keep talking.

“Vipers don’t ask questions. They’re loyal to me,” he went on. “So when I give the signal, you come in and do what you’ve been dying to do. We’ll turn our backs. No interference. No cameras. Just you and him. You carve him up, bury what’s left, and we walk away like it never happened.”

Katsuki sucked at his teeth.

That would be a perfect opportunity. An opening like this didn’t come around very often.

“Okay,” Katsuki grumbled after a long moment. “Now when and where would this be?”

“Potentially within the next year.”

Katsuki groaned loudly. “Are you fucking serious right now?”

“I know, it’s not ideal,” Shigaraki quickly explained. He softened his tone and tried to calm Katsuki down. “But killing the leader of the entire underground Yakuza syndicate takes time. You can’t simply rush into it without coming out with a bounty on your head—much like yours is right now.”

Katsuki felt like throwing this damn phone.

A year? Did this guy really think he was stupid?

“Bakugou,” Shigaraki said slowly, bringing down his anger. “If you give it at least six months, I can promise the hunt for you within the Yakuza will die down with my help from the inside. I’ll make sure Chisaki will be occupied with other things. And when he least expects it, we’ll strike. I want to make sure no harm comes to you.”

“As nice as that sounds, I know there has to be more,” Katsuki jeered. “You don’t seem like the altruistic type. So cough it up. What’s the real reason you want to wait a year?”

There was a long pause, as if Shigaraki wasn’t expecting Katsuki to guess his angle.

“Fine.” Shigaraki sighed, clearly aggravated. “Coupled with what I just said, I do need Chisaki alive to grant me power for a merger I am working on. I can only take over after he is dead and Vipers are melted deep into the Yakuza. But it would look suspicious to the Chisaki family if their Heir died directly after the merger. Ultimately, it would be a win-win for both of us to wait this out.”

Katsuki worked his jaw back and forth.

He’d waited for years to kill Chizome when he thought it was him. And truthfully, Shigaraki made logistical and logical points. It would be damn near impossible to get his hands around that crow like motherfucker’s neck given what he did at the masquerade.

Everyone was on high alert and if what Izuku said was true, then they knew he was the culprit.

It took a while, but ultimately, Katsuki decided he could wait a measly year. He could lay low. He could do that in the name of his mother.

“…And what would happen to Izuku during this time?” Katsuki asked softly, one more time.

“I told you, he would remain untouched,” Shigaraki explained. “I am planning to take him off all assignments after this.”

“How come?”

“You sure like to ask questions.”

“I like to know exactly what I am signing up for,” Katsuki quipped. “So tell me. How come? If Izuku is your most valuable asset as you say, then why would you be taking him off assignments?"

"I'm taking him off because I don't think he's well suited for assignments any longer," Shigaraki admitted. The tone of his voice was heavy with what seemed like regret. "His outburst proves it. I've been pushing him too hard. When you bring him back, I will retire him. We have enough money that he wouldn't need to go find a job, so he would live out the rest of his days in comfort and luxury. Exactly as he always has been."

Katsuki's eyes dropped to the floor. That didn't sound so bad.

"That's it?" He whispered.

"That's it," Shigaraki confirmed.

He sat on it.

He imagined Izuku's life back home would be different now. Izuku wouldn't be forced to kill. He would be in that mansion pampered with endless books to read. He would cry over Katsuki's betrayal but he would cry in his Rolls-Royce.

And he'd never have to flinch from the sound of his older brother's footsteps again—because at least now, the bastard was dead.

Izuku's life would be okay. And after Katsuki killed Chisaki, so would his.

"Alright," Katsuki murmured, feeling inexplicably filthy. "I'll agree to bring Izuku back to you, but only if you make it six months instead of one year. Then you have a deal."

"Fine. We can make it six months."

And just like that, his deal with the devil was struck.

He felt the invisible handshake come and take a piece of his soul with it. The side of him that loved Izuku was lashing out, recklessly thrashing trying to get a grip on him. But the memory of cradling his mother's cold, dead body for hours prevented it from doing so.

"Where should I meet you to drop off?" Katsuki asked solemnly. "I'm with him now in Osaka."

"The Viper Academy has a secondary location on Oshima Island," Shigaraki explained. "It's a couple hours south of you, but I will meet you there. There's a ferry that departs at the end of the day you can make if you're quick. I'll make sure the Yakuza and Vipers hold off on their search for you both."

"Got it. Once I get to the island, I demand we have this in writing of some sort."

"Of course," Shigaraki promised. "I'll make sure to draw up a proper contract before you and Izuku arrive."

"Good. We'll see you soon."

He closed the flip phone without saying goodbye.

He put it in his pocket the same time a single, cold tear rolled out of his eye. Quickly, he dragged the heel of his palm across his cheek and wiped away that sign of weakness before it could make him stray any further.

But with that tear, came a voice.

“Don’t do this!” It screamed. “Please! Don’t do this. You love him!”

It was the same voice from last night. However, he decided then to bury it deep. He dug a grave for it, right next to the grief he carried for his mother. Packed it in tight with dirt made of betrayal and silence. He suffocated that voice beneath all the hurt Izuku inflicted.

And he wanted that hurt gone. But the only way he could vanquish it was to get his revenge.

He repeated this to himself. Over and over until he believed it.

By the time he made his way back to the room, he convinced himself vengeance was the only way he could be truly happy.

☽ ☽ ☽

He told Izuku about the so-called ‘safe house’ on Oshima Island.

It was ironic how easily the lie fell into place. It sounded right. Like something that he would actually do if the deal with Shigaraki wasn’t on the table. And of course, Izuku didn’t question him. The other man simply nodded, fully trusting. It was damn near harrowing how trusting Izuku was.

And because of that, Katsuki couldn’t meet his eyes. Not because he was sad, but rather he wasn’t sure he could look into the eyes of the man he adored so much and still go through with betraying him.

How the hell had Izuku done it?

How the fuck did Izuku looked him in his face for thirty days and never say a single word?

It made him sick. Izuku managed to smile, laugh, and kiss him without flinching. And it was more than heart breaking. Because if Izuku could do all that while knowing what he’d done —then maybe he didn’t care at all.

Maybe knowing he’d killed Bakugou Mitsuki didn’t cost Izuku a single night of sleep.

As the motorcycle tore down the road, that last month in Biei replayed on a loop.

Each time he thought of a past memory, his ache deepened. He re-lived all the soft, stupid moments they’d shared like it was real—only to have it all poisoned under the new light.

☽ ☽ ☽

About an hour from the ferry, the road threw another goddamn obstacle in their path.

Because of course it did. Nothing in Katsuki's life ever comes easy, and today wasn't about to be the exception.

A tree collapsed across the highway. It dragged power lines down and crushed several cars beneath its weight like they were nothing but toys. Police were scattered across the scene, taping off the wreckage and waving cars back with stiff arms and hardened faces.

Katsuki tried his best to convince them to let them through. But not a single officer gave a shit. The cops stood their ground, unmoved by his words.

In the end, all he got was a redirection and a ticking clock.

And unfortunately, luck was not on his side. They ended up missing the ferry.

The moment they arrived, the boat took off. He groaned one loud curse into the wind. Angrily, he slammed the bike's kickstand down with the heel of his boot, jumped off and was ready to tear into anything just to feel like he had control again.

In contrast, Izuku said nothing. Simply pulled off his helmet and shook out his hair, slow and unbothered. He swung his legs off the bike and leaned back against it. He kept his gaze fixed on the fading outline of the ferry as it sailed away into the dark.

Katsuki snatched his own helmet off, and pulled out the burner phone.

His fingers flew over the buttons, unhappy that he was once again hitting a speed bump.

[You]: We missed the ferry because there was an accident on the freeway. We'll get there right in the morning.

[117]: Okay.

Just okay.

Katsuki decided he didn't like the Vipers very much.

He exhaled hard as the weight of this whole screwed-up plan pressed down on him. The cracks in his resolve were spreading fast, and he didn't know how much longer he could keep up the charade. His strength had limits, and he was reaching them. He was hoping to get the exchange over with today—before he imploded.

Out of the corner of his eye, he looked at the man responsible for his turmoil—and regretted it instantly.

Izuku's hair moved with the breeze, soft and wild. It caught the faint glow of the moon, showing like a halo around his head. His face was lit just enough to remind Katsuki of every night he'd spent memorizing it in the dark. And for a breath, Izuku seemed so gentle it hurt.

He didn't look like someone who killed the last of Katsuki's family.

But he did.

And Katsuki was here, stuck with him.

He turned away, hands clenched as he shoved the burner back in his pocket.

☽ ☽ ☽

They ended up deciding on spending the night in a water tower.

Izuku was skittish of the Yakuza or Vipers catching up to them, but Katsuki knew this wouldn't be an issue. If Shigaraki was holding up to his half of the deal then neither of those groups were looking for them. But to give Izuku a sense of security, he followed along.

Once they got inside, the tower wasn't what Katsuki expected.

The air was cool, carrying the smell of old water and rust. But it was the color that caught him off guard.

Blue light shimmered all around like it was made of magic.

A high level of water filled the base of the tower. Its surface was glowing faintly from the dull underwater lights embedded along the bottom. The glow made the whole place glitter with a quiet, artificial whimsicalness.

Suspended above it all was a grated metal floor, wide and solid beneath their feet. Off to the side there was a narrow control station. The door they walked through led directly onto the platform, and above them, a spiral staircase wound up to a second level.

Katsuki almost dryly laughed. The color matched exactly how he was feeling on the inside.

Tiredly, he bent to his knees without a word. His body was heavy with exhaustion from carrying his broken heart for too long. In one smooth motion, he shrugged off his pack and jacket, the fabric slapped against the metal floor with a thud that echoed.

He pulled out his sleeping bag and shook off the twigs and dirt that clung to it from the overlook near Izuku's mansion.

Beside him, Izuku kneeled too. He wasn't quite close enough for them to touch, but near enough that Katsuki could hear the quiet movements of him rifling through his duffle bag.

Izuku began to organize the contents. He stacked clothes on top of the hard items, rearranging the bag into something that resembled a makeshift pillow.

With a slight huff, Katsuki laid out the sleeping bag all the way.

He looked once at Izuku and regretted it immediately. His heart skipped a beat. Nope. Too dangerous. He sure as hell wasn't sleeping next to that man. After last night, he couldn't predict what would happen.

He stood up, turned his back, and walked away.

“I’m going to go sit outside,” Katsuki muttered. “Don’t wait up.”

He left out before Izuku could respond.

☽ ☽ ☽

He found himself circling the outer ledge of the water tower.

His boots scraped the metal as he wandered without aim. Once, twice, and then a third time.

The irony didn’t miss him. He’d always been stuck in some kind of loop, hadn’t he? Always spinning in place, chasing warmth that never stayed in his life too long.

He’d been stuck in the same cycle ever since his mother abandoned him in the cold, back turned and no hint of when she would return. Ever since then, he’d been clawing towards what he thought was love, or family, or even a home.

But every time he got close—it vanished because he wasn’t good enough.

Eighteen years of chasing warmth, and all he had to show for it was heartbreak.

The early winter wind picked up, sharp and sudden. It bit through his hoodie and shirt with ease, reminding him too late that he’d left his coat in the tower. He sighed, irritated but not surprised. He thought about going back in to grab it—but stopped himself.

The image of Izuku waiting there, watching him with those stupidly big, concerned puppy eyes, made him feel nauseous. So instead, he stayed out in the cold.

He sat down on the ledge, letting his legs swing over the edge. The town spread out below, small and quiet, glowing dim under the clouded night sky. It didn’t look real—more like a model town under glass.

Then his black smart phone buzzed.

He fished it out of his pocket, thumb already prepared to ignore whatever it was. Denki sent their group chat another meme—some stupid gif with sparkles and an exploding kitten or something equally pointless.

But Katsuki barely registered it. His eyes caught something else.

His lock screen was still Izuku.

He folded his lips into a thin, flat line. He studied Izuku’s smiling face again, and the small butterfly on his nose. On cue, his chest tightened and his eyes started to prickle. He didn’t unlock the phone. He just stared.

And for one long, aching minute, he let himself mourn what they never really had.

Katsuki blinked back the burn in his eyes and shoved his phone deep into his pocket where it couldn't hurt him. The cold railing pressed against his forearms, sinking to his skin through the fabric. He leaned his chin against the metal and stared blankly into the night across the water.

He could see the island from here.

His thoughts wandered—but they always circled back to that last month in Biei. The same month he said "I love you" out loud for the first time in his miserable life. And the month someone said it back.

Suddenly, the sound of a throat clearing caught his attention.

Katsuki's shoulders stiffened.

He turned his head enough to cut his eye at the source—and the second he caught that familiar green in his periphery, his heart skipped and plummeted at the same time.

He huffed and pulled his gaze away, planting it firmly on the dark island across the water.

"Kacc—" Izuku stopped himself. Katsuki heard the way Izuku swallowed the nickname down like it was dangerous to say. "Katsuki. You, uh, forgot your jacket. I-It's cold out here. You might get sick."

And there it was. That infuriating level of care.

Izuku was a walking contradiction, and that was the real problem.

One moment he was all soft glances and careful words, gentle in a way that made Katsuki feel seen. Then the next, he was killer cold. He could be whispering 'I love you' against Katsuki's throat like it was gospel. Then somehow those same lips were capable of hiding the most devastating secret pertaining to Katsuki's life.

It was too much whiplash and Katsuki was ready to have that shit out of his life.

He grunted, not saying a word and held his hand out stiffly for the jacket. Izuku passed it over, clumsy, like he didn't know if he had permission to touch him anymore.

Katsuki took the item without looking. He shoved his arms through the sleeves, yanked the zipper all the way up, and buried his hands deep in the pockets like he could trap the storm inside his chest before it came pouring out.

Because it would. If he let himself speak—or look at Izuku too long—it fucking would.

"Are you going to stay out here all night?" Izuku asked, voice small and almost childlike.

"I'm watching the door," Katsuki snapped. It was a lie, but he wanted to be left alone. "You can go back to sleep."

Izuku shifted on his feet awkwardly. "I-I can't sleep."

Katsuki clenched his teeth and tightened his fist.

“Izuku,” he hissed, worried that being around Izuku too long would crack his resolve. “Go back inside.”

He didn’t want to see Izuku. He couldn’t. Right now, his chest was a minefield. One wrong word, one too-soft look, and everything would blow up.

He gazed across the water to the dark island. He was too close now to get caught up in his emotions. His revenge was right there and his happiness was there waiting for him.

But for some reason, Izuku didn’t leave.

Instead, he came closer. His footsteps rattled the metal beneath them and Katsuki clenched his fists in his pockets. Then he heard Izuku kneel. He dropped softly to his knees against the surface—and the warmth of Izuku’s body at his side, barely brushing his, sparked across his body.

And then—a hand reached out and gripped his shoulder.

Katsuki flinched. It was so soft—and it made his heart twist. He tried to jerk away, and keep his eyes on that island to remind himself how damn close he was. He couldn’t blow this. He had waited five goddamn years.

But Izuku’s grip didn’t give up. He gripped him tighter, refusing to let Katsuki go.

“Please talk to me,” Izuku begged. “Please. Or look at me.”

Katsuki shook his head. He shifted away from Izuku’s warmth.

“I can’t look at you,” Katsuki hissed, but not angrily. His voice was hoarse with so much torment he couldn’t take it anymore. “The reason why I can’t should be very fucking clear.”

Izuku shuffled closer again. “I-I know, b-but please. Look at me.”

He grabbed Katsuki’s jacket and tugged.

Suddenly, Izuku began begging.

He pleaded with soft words and touches that were exactly a day too late.

“No. I can’t do it,” Katsuki hissed. Izuku pulled again, and slowly, Katsuki began losing his composure. Exactly like he knew he would if he got too close to this damning man. “No.” A pull. “I said no—” a tug. “Stop—”

“Please,” Izuku’s voice cracked.

“No. I can’t do it.”

Katsuki shook his head again, more violently this time. He felt that very small thread holding back all his turmoil began to draw taut, threatening to break. Instantly, all the words he wanted to scream came roaring to the surface. He tried to shove them down, but they were barreling forward, pulled out by Izuku's touch.

"I can't," Katsuki whispered. Izuku pulled more, and more words were forced out. "If I do it, then—"

"—Then what?"

"Then it'll all come out!" Katsuki yelled.

The sound echoed over the edge of the tower, vanishing into the dark sky. He hunched over, elbows on his thighs and head hanging between his shoulders like the weight of his thoughts finally collapsed him. His hands began to shake and he began to slip again.

"I won't be able to stop it," he hissed, truthfully. "Everything sitting inside of me will come out and I don't want that to happen."

"Let it out," Izuku whispered.

Katsuki shook his head as he thought about how he was so close to his vengeance.

"I don't want it to—"

"—You have to let it out," Izuku pushed. He shuffled impossibly closer, bringing with him his warmth. "Please. Just look at me. Let it out and look at me. I don't care what happens or what you say. I'll listen and I'll take it all because I deserve it. Scream. Yell. Tell me to go to hell—b-but please. Take it out on me."

Katsuki's vision became blurry.

He shook his head, resistant to what Izuku suggested.

But then gently, Izuku began to caress his shoulders.

The touch was so loving and comforting—exactly like the hug last night.

And exactly like last night, all of Katsuki's anger vanished underneath that touch.

His wall of armor began to crack. His tears were pulled forward from a simple touch of those small, loving hands. He didn't even realize how much he began to cry until the teardrops fell and rapidly fell on the back of his hands.

His face crumbled as he began to gradually turn towards Izuku.

When he finally lifted his head and gazed Izuku in the eye, Katsuki broke.

The love in Izuku's eyes was devastating. It was pure, vulnerable and blinding in its depth. His long lashes were wet with unshed tears, and his nose tinged pink from the cold. His cheeks were flushed with a soft, raw red. And the wind tugged at his curls, carrying strands across his freckled skin.

He looked so beautiful—exactly like he had in Vienna.

And it hurt so much.

The lid came off. All his grief, rage, and unbearable misery poured out of him at once.

"How could you, Izuku?" Katsuki's voice cracked on the last syllable. "H-How could you look me in my eyes for that long knowing the truth and not say anything? H-How could you find it in yourself to lie after everything we shared together? I-I've been trying to wrap my mind around that specific fact—but I can't."

Katsuki tried to stop his tears. He clenched his jaw and everything inside of him came apart.

"I keep replaying that last month over and over," Katsuki wept. He shook his head and Izuku stayed quiet. "Then I keep trying to imagine if there was information that was that important to you, could I be able to keep it from you for that damn long? How could you fucking kiss me, have sex with me, and say I love you while knowing you were the one who killed her? How c-could you do all that? W-We talked about our deepest fucking insecurities and everything—"

He kept going. And as he did, it all compiled.

All his heartbreak, agony, and grief ripped out of him like they were blades trying to escape his chest. They cut through him, excruciatingly. Each ripped open a different part of him and with every new opening came words that he'd been holding in for weeks.

"I-I'm sorry," Izuku whispered past his own tears. "I'm so so sorry. I know that was wrong of me, I-I shouldn't have deceived you like that."

"A sorry isn't going to make it right, Izuku," Katsuki sobbed.

Because he made his choice, and it was the island lying right ahead of them.

More words were pulled from him, and it was like a gathering storm the more and more he recounted. He became progressively pissed off as he thought about the red folder, the money, and how he wandered Hadeus worried sick only to find out Izuku had another boyfriend all along. And that same motherfucker was the man who raised a single finger and shattered his world.

The more he thought about it, the deeper the hurt dug in. It was like a storm of knives now, all aimed at Izuku and the sheer fuckery of this ordeal.

Because really—Chisaki?

That was the man Izuku chose in the end?

Even if the bastard hadn't been the one to order his mother's death, Katsuki would still slit his throat on general principle alone. He was never good at containing his jealousy. If he found out there were more men Izuku kissed, he was sure he'd kill them too.

"A-And then I woke up alone and paralyzed for hours!" Katsuki yelled loudly, somewhere in the middle of his rant. "I was trapped in my fucking head for ages, crying out for you! B-But worst of all, you just nonchalantly left that fucking folder there for me to see! Wh-Why would you do that? Why would you think that was the way to tell me the truth, hah?! Why was I not good enough for a decent fucking conversation after I gave my heart to you?!"

"Folder?" Izuku questioned.

Katsuki glared at him through his tears.

"Yes," Katsuki hissed. He leaned into Izuku's face, snarling. "The fucking folder you left on the kitchen table where you let me see how much you were paid to kill her."

Izuku blinked rapidly and leaned back. "What? I didn't leave a folder—"

"—Yes, you did," Katsuki yelled back angrily. "The red folder that was signed and approved by your fucking boyfriend. Which is the cherry on top of all of this shit, by the way," Katsuki hissed rapidly as his eyes went wild with hurt.

He kept going, gaining speed on releasing all his repressed emotions.

"Because even after you abandoned me and left that folder I still tried to come and find you to talk to! I-I spent a week nonstop searching around Tokyo! I even went down in that dangerous ass underground because I was worried sick about you! I had no clue if you were safe because you didn't even bother to leave any contact information!"

Izuku's expression became bewildered, and it irritated Katsuki.

"But imagine my surprise when people knew exactly who you were and told me you were likely with Chisaki," Katsuki spat viciously. "The beautiful Viridian Viper and the goddamn Yakuza Heir: a perfect match made in Hadeus. And all these people were gushing about your budding romance and—"

"—Wa-Wait," Izuku said loudly over Katsuki.

Katsuki glared but stopped speaking. He waited to hear whatever useless excuse Izuku was going to say.

"Katsuki—I explained the situation about Chisaki in my letter," Izuku whispered, clearly hurt. "There is no budding romance, wh-why would you ever believe that? I told you Chisaki bought my virginity against my will and my brother was forcing me to sleep with him."

Katsuki's raging train of thought came to a screeching halt.

…What?

He stopped.

Word by word, Katsuki picked apart what Izuku just said. Then once more. Letter. Virginity. Bought? He tried to fit those words in the mess they'd created but they belonged nowhere.

An eerie, unsure sensation began to tap at the back of his neck.

"What letter?" Katsuki asked uneasily.

Izuku blinked.

"The letter I put in your hands after I left," Izuku explained like it was obvious. "It was in a white envelope. I signed it with your name on it and everything."

There was a long stretch of silence as the wind cut through them.

Katsuki's anger slowly but surely was replaced with confusion. He leaned back and stared at Izuku with increasing perplexity as the ominous sensation tapped him harder.

"What are you talking about?" Katsuki questioned. "There was no letter. You left the red folder. Not a letter. And it wasn't in my hands, it was in the kitchen."

"No. I didn't," Izuku shot back, eyes flashing. He looked at Katsuki sideways. "I left a ten page letter, explaining everything including the truth about your mother. I put it right between your fingers so when you woke up you would have it. I-I even put my cell phone number inside so you could call me if you wanted to."

Katsuki's mouth fell open, but nothing came out.

His eyes slid to the side, scanning his memory but it was a mess like rubble after an explosion. Still, he searched every nook and cranny but found no semblance of a letter.

"…Izuku," he said, voice barely above a whisper. "I didn't get a letter. There was nothing in my hands when I woke up."

"But I put it in your fingers right before I left," Izuku said, voice cracking. Desperation flooded his face as his eyes went wide. "A-And I never had access to archived folders. I had only seen your mother's folder once. It was never in my possession. I couldn't have left it."

"Then who did?"

They froze.

Simultaneously, they searched the other for the slightest flicker of a lie.

But there was none.

That ominous feeling completely grabbed him now. No where in Izuku's face was an ounce of deception, which meant Izuku in fact left his number, an explanation and more.

Suddenly, a spotlight cut through the dark and illuminated the vast rift between them. It was a chasm as wide as the sea, filled with missed connections and broken threads. If they were both telling the truth, then something happened in the space between them.

“I think…I think I know who did it,” Izuku whispered angrily. His eyes flickered around, looking as if all the missing pieces floating between were actually there. “My sister, Himiko. She must’ve switched them.”

Katsuki frowned deeply.

Who the fuck was that?

“Hold on.” Katsuki’s eyes narrowed. The newfound confusion entirely overshadowed every other emotion. “How many siblings do you have exactly? And why would she do something like that?”

“I technically have about two hundred other siblings,” Izuku whispered.

Katsuki’s eyes startled wide and he blinked rapidly. Two hundred?

“And she did it because she hates me,” Izuku explained in an angry but understanding way. “She wants to see me suffer for killing someone she cared about in our cohort. Our upbringing…it punishes compassion and empathy. The only thing she’s ever known is pain and negative emotions. As a result, she’s been holding on to resentment against me all her life to keep her going. So, this swap…it makes sense why she did it. She wanted to hurt me—hurt us.”

It took a while for Katsuki to process what Izuku said. He stared, dumbstruck and in shock.

Izuku had left a letter, and someone who he didn’t even know switched it with the red folder to hurt them. Which meant, all this time…this whole time Izuku he—

Katsuki’s throat tightened as the pieces rearranged themselves in a horrifying new order.

“You…You really left me a letter?” Katsuki asked, voice strangled. “A ten paged one?”

“Ye-Yeah,” Izuku whispered.

Izuku met Katsuki’s eyes again, and the unfiltered anguish in both of their hearts amplified.

Katsuki’s breath began coming out in sharp, unsteady pulls.

“Wh-What was in the letter?” Katsuki asked.

“Everything,” Izuku sobbed, and his face crumbled. His tears came down and he looked absolutely devastated. “I-I explained everything regarding your mother’s death. I detailed the whole incident. I explained why I needed to go back to Tokyo for the kids. I even wrote about how Chisaki bought my virginity, and I was planning on killing him for you.”

Katsuki’s eyes stretched wider and wider with every piece of the puzzle.

“You’re right about how I couldn’t find a way to tell you,” Izuku confessed. “My brother Tomura had come to the estate when you were away at your retirement party. He revealed the truth to me, and I broke down in a way I hadn’t before. I-I hadn’t known she was your mother, and when I did, I couldn’t believe I played a part in hurting you that much. Then Tomura warned me not to tell you. He told me you would kill me if I did.”

Izuku’s expression twisted with shame. Woe rippled across his face like a fresh wound reopening as he stared down at his scarred, trembling hands.

“A-And Tomura has always had this frightening hold over me—” Izuku’s breath caught. “And because of that, there’s a piece of me that will probably always believe he has my best interest in mind since he’s saved my life so much. S-So when he told me not to say anything…”

Izuku trailed off, sobs swallowing up his words.

“…You didn’t,” Katsuki finished. “You listened to him.”

Izuku nodded, blatantly terrified.

For a moment, Katsuki’s heart didn’t beat at all. Because reality hit him like a freight train—Izuku hadn’t stayed silent because he was cruel or selfish or careless. He hadn’t lied or run out of cowardice. He’d been threatened by the person who severely abused him all his life.

As Izuku wept, Katsuki’s heart ached for him.

He saw how the years of abuse carved terror so deeply into Izuku’s bones that even now, he was still bleeding from wounds no one else could see.

“Th-That’s why I wrote the letter,” Izuku whispered. “I-I figured if I couldn’t say it out loud, I could try to in words. I-I read in a lot of books how characters gave each other these long romantic letters when words were too hard to say. And I thought it would be the next best option since I didn’t know what to do. I knew you deserved closure, but a large part of me was still underneath Tomura’s thumb. So, I mimicked what I saw in my favorite book to h-help me. L-Like I always do.”

Izuku lifted his gaze.

“B-But I know now, I should have spoken up and told you,” he said sincerely. “I shouldn’t have pretended because if I had just—If I just gave you the same honesty back, none of this would have happened. Himiko wouldn’t have been able to swap the letter out and you wouldn’t have been hurt the way you are now.”

He could picture it perfectly.

Izuku in the dead of night, hunched over the kitchen table. His fingers trembled as he struggled to find the right words. Not because he didn’t care—but because he cared too damn much. He could see the painstaking way Izuku took his time. How he was too scared to say the truth aloud but brave enough to write it in ink. He likely crossed out sentences and re-wrote them, muttering obsessively. He probably cried so much but finished it anyway.

And then—Katsuki saw himself.

He could imagine a parallel universe where he woke up with the letter between his fingers.

He probably would sit on the side of the bed, clutching it in his hands. His chest would be heaving and his heart would be clawing its way up his throat. He would hunch forward with wide eyes and tears would slip down his cheeks as he read every word. He would have cursed and cried. Maybe even punched a hole in the wall.

But in the end he would've called. He would've called so fast.

And then he would've gone and found his dumbass husband and embraced him.

Tears clouded his vision. Katsuki's eyes danced across Izuku's face, drinking him in. This beautiful, broken man never meant to hurt him. His heart began to ache, but it wasn't for himself anymore. It ached for Izuku.

Izuku hunched into himself, and Katsuki could see little Izuku, doing the same gesture. Small Izuku with the little yellow watch, hunching into himself scared of going home—

—Shit.

Home.

Katsuki's stomach dropped violently as he cut his eyes to the island.

He looked back to Izuku and the wind sharpened.

Panic pressed hard against his spine, snapping him straight. He moved without thinking, closing the distance between them until their bodies touched, until he could feel Izuku's breath trembling against his chin.

Katsuki swung his feet up and turned towards Izuku, fully facing him on his hunches.

Then Katsuki reached his hands out to cup Izuku's darling face.

The way Izuku responded to the touch was like he'd finally come home. His husband dropped his head without sound and curled into him. Izuku's trembling fingers wrapped around Katsuki's wrists as he leaned into the touch.

Izuku looked exhausted. Like he'd been running his whole life and solemnly realized he didn't have the strength to keep going.

As Izuku cried silently, Katsuki felt his broken heart throb.

There was so much he didn't know about Izuku. He didn't know how many siblings he had. Or even how he was raised. He only knew what he could see on the outside, and that was million dollar luxury cars and expensive name brands. But he had a feeling there was more.

He never pushed while they were in Biei out of fear of scaring Izuku away.

But maybe he should've.

Katsuki forced their gazes to meet and slowly Izuku's sobbing eased up.

"Izuku," Katsuki said firmly. "I need you to tell me everything you've gone through from start to finish."

He felt Izuku's grip on his wrists tighten. Then he saw hesitation bloom inside of Izuku entirely out of reflex.

Katsuki's heart dropped.

How much violence did Izuku endure for a reaction to be so automatic?

"Izuku, please," Katsuki begged. He drew in closer until he could count every eyelash on Izuku's face. "I need to know everything, leave out no details. I-I need to hear the whole story so I can grasp the full picture of what's going on with you. C-Can you do that for me?"

"O-Okay," Izuku rasped, voice splintering. "I-I can try, for you."

Katsuki nodded frantically. In one motion he quickly stood up and pulled Izuku with him. Immense urgency flooded his bloodstream as he felt eyes crawl across the water—coming from the island.

Katsuki clutched his husband's hand tightly as he led them back inside of the tower.

He took one more glance at the island and shut the door tight.

☽ ☽ ☽

It took hours. Long, excruciating hours where time felt like it moved sideways.

The whole time, Katsuki held Izuku's hands. He was afraid that if he let go for even a second, Izuku might shatter into a thousand fragments and vanish into the wind. And maybe he would have.

Because what Izuku told him wasn't a story. It was a goddamn nightmare.

Every time Izuku faltered, Katsuki didn't speak. He squeezed Izuku's hands and stayed there, anchoring him with the only thing he knew how to offer: unwavering presence. He didn't rush Izuku. Didn't force him.

He only listened.

And Izuku was brave enough to spill it all. From his lips, every last disgusting detail about his life fell. He spoke of his childhood like it was some far-off memory. He was so dissociated that Katsuki could see the bleakness sweep across his eyes. It was like Izuku wasn't describing himself, but someone else entirely.

With every new event, Katsuki became more infuriated and sickened.

The fucking belts. The Cull. All the deliberate, escalating sadism.

But what hit Katsuki the hardest was when Izuku described the glass box.

"After Tomura decapitated Nine, he left me there," Izuku whispered. "Everyone did. He turned off the lights and left me there by myself for four days without food or water or a way out."

Something horrific dawned on him.

That afternoon when Katsuki found his mother's body, Izuku had been locked in a cage. When he made her funeral plans the next day, Izuku had still been locked in a cage. And when her funeral happened the morning of the fourth day after her death—Izuku still had been there.

Izuku was trapped in that box, alone, in the dark crying out for Kacchan.

Katsuki was mortified.

When they came to the end of Izuku's life story, Katsuki couldn't speak.

His heart was roaring in his ears, and his hands—still wrapped around Izuku's—were trembling out of control. His fingers were shaking and he was about to snap. Because somewhere along the way, while listening to the man he loved recount his life like a goddamn eulogy, the anger in Katsuki transformed.

He'd always known hardship. Always known violence.

But what Izuku endured was uglier than he could ever imagine.

"Izuku. Has anything in your life ever been your choice?" Katsuki asked, entirely pained.

Izuku smiled sadly. He looked at Katsuki like he should've known the answer.

"Choosing to love you was," Izuku whispered.

Katsuki's eyes softened.

Without notice, his heart grew lighter.

The hurt in his chest slowly died a little bit. Even if ever so slightly, for the first time in his life, he felt an inch of healing and closure. It stunned him. Because all this time, he thought he needed revenge to lighten the load he was carrying.

But instead, it was love.

Pure, unconditional love relieved him of his sorrow in a way he never imagined. Because all this time he thought he was unlovable. He thought not a single person could ever love him for him. But really, Izuku loved him. Izuku loved him all their lives and through all his different stages.

Tears glossed over Katsuki's eyes.

He was loved so damn fiercely all this time and he didn't even know it.

"What would happen if they caught you now?" Katsuki asked.

"I'm sure my Big Brother Tomura would force me to marry Chisaki somehow," Izuku answered. "He's probably with Chisaki now, convincing him I'm still worth owning."

Katsuki paused and frowned.

He tilted his head slowly. He opened his mouth, closed it, and wearily slid his eyes to the side.

"What do you mean he's with Chisaki?" Katsuki asked carefully. "I thought you said you killed him."

"Huh?" Izuku tilted his head. "When did I say that?"

"Back at the motel, you said you killed your older brother."

"Oh, no. Sorry," Izuku quickly apologized. "The nomenclature is all a bit confusing. Jin is who I killed. He was the agent named The Double Headed Viper. Jin is my older brother because he was a cohort above me. But my Big Brother, the person who oversaw raising me, is Tomura. He's the one who beheaded our original handler, Nine, and took his position."

Sick realization spread across Katsuki's skin. His eyes stretched wide.

"So, your current handler is…your Big Brother?" Katsuki clarified. "The one who has been hurting you your whole life is also your handler?"

His heart kicked up so high he could feel the pulse thudding in his throat.

"Yes." Izuku hunched a bit. "I, uh, never realized that could be mixed up. The relationships inside of the Vipers are a little muddled I guess from the outside perspective. Bigs are in charge of a kid from the cohort below them, and they're called Littles. So, Tomura was my Big and I was his Little. He raised me since I was two and he was seven."

Katsuki forgot how to breathe.

"That's…so young," is all he managed to say between sharp breaths.

"It was," Izuku agreed. "B-But, yeah. Tomura has always controlled everything in my life—and I'm pretty sure the second he gets his hands on me he's going to punish me. And then he's going to send me off with Chisaki in order to appease him so he can get his merge. He needs me to complete his plans."

Everything snapped into place.

He heard Shigaraki's statement from earlier say, "I do need Chisaki alive to grant me power for a merger I am working on."

The merger was a fucking forced marriage between Izuku and Chisaki.

He took a sharp, horrified inhale when it all came crashing down. The new information perfectly aligned with what Shigaraki—or Tomura, whatever the fuck his name was—said. But this time it painted a much more sordid picture of what his plans really were.

Izuku was Tomura's 'most valuable asset' because he was going to give Izuku to Chisaki. Without Izuku, there could be no merger. Of course Izuku wouldn't work assignments if he was married into the Chisaki family. He would become Chisaki Kai's fucking spouse.

Tomura so expertly manipulated the truth, carefully cherry picking information so Katsuki wouldn't be able to detect his real intentions.

Dread washed over Katsuki as he felt the weight of the burner phone in his pocket.

"I-Izuku," Katsuki gasped out, terrified by what he'd almost done. "I'm so fucking sorry."

"I'm sorry too," Izuku whispered, ignorant to what Katsuki was actually apologizing for.

They studied the other.

All the strenuous, unfiltered emotions they were feeling poured out.

"I-I'm so sorry for everything, Kacchan," Izuku wept. "I-I'm sorry I didn't say anything about your mom. I should have. She was so important to you, and I knew that. All this mess is my fault because I couldn't see past how Tomura doesn't always actually know what's best for me—or even want what's best for me."

Izuku cried and Katsuki cried too. Izuku gripped tightly onto Katsuki and hung his head.

"I-It took losing you for me to really understand that a-and I'm so sorry about your mom," Izuku apologized from the bottom of his being. "I-I wish I hadn't taken the shot—I-I wish I didn't do it, but I did. I did and now I hurt you. A-And I take full responsibility for my part in it. I understand if you could never see me the same—and I don't blame you if y-you don't want to speak again after th-this."

Katsuki screwed his eyes shut and turned his head away.

Grief for his mother tangled with grief for Izuku, knotting inside him until it dragged him under a new, crushing sadness. Neither of them spoke; they just let the tears fall. One after another, splashing into the water below and rippling together like shared scars.

When the silence stretched long enough to steady his breath, Katsuki raised his head.

The only thing he felt—the only thing that mattered—was the pull toward Izuku.

He leaned in and caught him in a desperate embrace, arms locking around Izuku's trembling frame. Izuku clung back as fiercely, as though the world might vanish if he let go. They melted together. Grief folded into grief. Love into love. And Katsuki knew in that instant he would never let him go again.

Not now. Not tomorrow. Not in a million years.

"I'm so sorry, Kacchan," Izuku apologized again, much more unraveled. "I wish I could take it back. I-I want to take it back. I should have let Tomura cut my neck that day. If I'd known she was your mom—"

"—It's okay," Katsuki hushed him. He tenderly stroked Izuku's head and rocked him. "I-It's okay, Izuku. You didn't know."

"B-But I think I might've," Izuku replied, voice cracking. "I thought I saw a resemblance between you and her back then. I told myself I was seeing things, a-and—" Izuku cried harder, clinging to him more desperately. "—I'm just so sorry I hurt you so much. I never wanted to hurt you, I only want you to be happy, Kacchan."

Katsuki was too shocked by everything to speak.

Instead, he hugged Izuku tighter. Izuku buried his face in his neck.

They wept softly in the pale blue light, and they didn't let each other go. Katsuki's arms locked around Izuku more and his hand threaded through thick curly hair. Katsuki felt their hearts press together as they both silently cried in the pale blue light.

Izuku kept going, offering up more and more apologies.

He apologized for everything. For things he didn't know. For things he couldn't change. For everything that was out of his control. All the love and regret fell from Izuku's lips directly into Katsuki's hands.

At some point, Izuku wrapped his arms around his neck. He clung to Katsuki like a lifeline, as if he was the only thing keeping him from sinking completely. Izuku trembled with every breath, fully swept away by the storm of emotions he'd locked away for years.

Carefully, Katsuki guided them down to rest.

Izuku struggled to let go, so Katsuki didn't make him. He took off Izuku's shoes for him. Then his own. One arm never left Izuku's back. He kept it wrapped there, protective.

He shifted them over, gliding them delicately. They joined together in the small sleeping bag, fitting together like two perfectly broken glass shards. They laid their heads down together on the duffle bag, facing each other.

Izuku didn't stop apologizing.

He said sorry over and over again like if he said it enough, he could take back all the damage done.

Katsuki stayed silent. He softly stroked Izuku's hair with his shaking hand.

As he cradled Izuku, dozens, if not hundreds, of facts were being processed in his head. They darted around, connecting and drawing the bigger picture. He aligned his and Izuku's life next to each other like two pages of different story books. He read line for line how their interconnected lives fell apart in tandem like two twin stars destined to cross paths in the dark sky.

Eventually, Izuku's apologies trailed off into shallow sobs.

When they quieted, Katsuki shifted again. He guided Izuku onto his back and leaned over him.

Izuku had cried himself to sleep. His cheeks were wet. His eyes were swollen. Redness swept across his ears, cheeks and nose.

The sight tugged at Katsuki. Then one of his own tears fell down onto Izuku's freckled cheek at that moment. It slid away, escaping through one of the holes in the grated floor. It fell into the body of water below them and ripples drifted out.

Katsuki lifted a hand to tenderly dry Izuku's face. His expression crumbled, then it hardened. His chest burned with anger, born anew like a phoenix reignited.

He thought back on his vows and realized how true they were. Katsuki meant them, even more now. Every single damn word.

He would kill for Izuku. He would die for him.

But most of all—he would never let anyone hurt Izuku again.

☽ ☽ ☽

It took a long time for sleep to come and get him.

Katsuki laid awake for what felt like hours, staring up at the curved metal ceiling of the water tower.

His eyes remained wide and unfocused. His mind reeled, turning over every grotesque detail Izuku spilled in that shaking voice. Nothing—absolutely nothing—could've prepared him for the horrors he'd heard. The truth of the Viper Academy was worse than anything he'd imagined.

But now that he knew, it clung to him like poison in his lungs.

And when sleep finally crept in, slow and reluctant, it found him still awake—wrapped around Izuku in a fierce, protective hold. He held him close, as if shielding him from memories Katsuki couldn't fight.

He began falling into a dream memory again. But this time, it was short.

He landed softly in a thin blanket of snow outside of his old school during winter. He was thirteen, waiting to be picked up. His mother said she would come, and she'd been doing so for a while. So he gave her grace.

He waited. Then waited some more.

Eventually, there was no one left but him. Only Katsuki and the hollow sound of the wind threading through the chain-link fence behind the school.

He glanced down at his shoes and grew unhappy. There were holes in the bottom of the soles. He poorly tried to cover them with duct tape. But the adhesive didn't last the full day, and some wetness soaked through to his sock.

He didn't want to walk home in the snow like this, but it seemed like he was going to have to. Still, stubborn hope clung to his ribs. He gave her more time. More room to prove she hadn't forgotten him.

He waited until the sky shifted from bruised pink to empty black.

And in the silence, his thoughts drifted far away to that boy from Tokyo. The one with the soft green eyes and gentle hands.

Katsuki hoped he was warm and safe.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki was woken up abruptly by the sound of a ringtone.

He jolted awake, and so did Izuku. They shifted in the sleeping bag with tiredness heavy on their puffy eyes. As they roused, Katsuki's arms were still wrapped around Izuku. He grumbled unhappily as he fished out the ringing phone from his pockets.

Then he stiffened when he realized it was the burner phone ringing.

Katsuki pulled out the phone and frowned. There he could see the flashing number 117.

He sat upright and clutched the phone before Izuku could see.

"Sorry," he quickly muttered as he eased out the sleeping bag. Izuku looked up at him confused. It made Katsuki's heart tug at how red Izuku's nose still was. "I'll…I'll be right back, okay?"

Izuku nodded sleepily and rubbed his eye. "Okay."

Katsuki grabbed his coat and walked out of the tower. The cold winter wind greeted him like an old friend and Katsuki noticed the stark drop in temperature from last night.

His hand shook as he glared down at the phone.

The number 117 continued to blink on the small screen.

Katsuki could've slapped himself right then and there. He almost handed Izuku back over to his brother—his fucking abuser. He became truly, deeply nauseous. He realized where he was led astray. It was his damn need for vengeance. His clouded thirst for revenge led him right into being fooled.

Aizawa was right all along.

It was here that Katsuki began to really comprehend why Izuku believed in fate so much.

He always assumed fate was a weak person's philosophy to help them cope with the ugliness of the world. It was an easy way out and a simple excuse for lack of proactiveness.

But now he knew he was wrong.

Fate was real because fate was cruel. It was a vice grip around his throat, sinking claws into his jugular. The more he ignored his destiny, the more pressure fate applied.

Now, after walking down this path for so long, Katsuki was pushed into making the ultimate decision.

He had to choose: Izuku or his revenge. Protect the love of his life or kill Chisaki. Fate forced his hand to finally face the ultimate decision. Because there was no world in which he could have both. But Fate knew what choice he was going to make. It was so acutely clear.

He chose Izuku.

Katsuki flipped open the phone and answered with one swift, concise sentence.

"Deal's off," Katsuki hissed, voice low and deadly. "You're not getting him back, Tomura."

He spat the name like it curdled in his mouth.

Silence answered him. A thick, dangerous quiet stretched on like the breath being held before a guillotine dropped.

"…Are you sure this is the path you want to go?" Tomura's voice came through the receiver, smooth and sinister. "You won't get another easy chance to kill Chisaki. Not like this."

Katsuki's fingers clenched around the phone until the plastic groaned beneath his grip.

"You listen to me, and you listen goddamn close," he said, each word ground out like teeth snapping through glass. "I've been fantasizing about killing you since I was seven."

His voice dropped to a vicious octave.

“You will never—I mean never—get within breathing distance of him again. As long as I’m still walking this earth, I will make it my sole purpose to keep you so far from him you’ll forget what his voice sounds like. You’ll be a footnote in a history that I’m going to help him burn. Nothing but a goddamn extra in the background of his life.”

The silence on the other end stretched intensely. He could feel Tomura’s anger rising but Katsuki didn’t wait for the comeback.

“Rot in hell,” he hissed, and tore the phone from his ear.

He snapped the flip phone in half with a satisfying crack. He tossed the broken pieces over the railing and watched them scatter like bones across the dead grass below.

Katsuki’s chest was heaving now, struggling to breathe. His nostrils were flared and tears were pushing at his eyes.

Aizawa was really right.

Revenge wasn’t the path he should have ever been on.

But letting go of his need for revenge was like sawing off a limb. However, Katsuki did it because it was decaying flesh that was spreading its disease through his body. It was turning him into someone he never wanted to be: someone who would hurt Izuku—exactly like Tomura.

He finally admitted to himself that he wanted to protect Izuku more than anything. Even more than revenge. He couldn’t ignore it anymore.

Every time he looked at Izuku, he saw the small boy with the eyepatch. He saw the bloodied wounds and bruises Izuku would always arrive with. He still could feel the broken bones.

It was painstakingly obvious Izuku was still that little boy. And Katsuki still sometimes felt like that same kid stuck in the cold waiting for his mother. But this time, he decided they would break their cycle.

Katsuki needed to learn to let go of his mother in order to save him and Izuku once and for all.

He could no longer be that boy waiting in the cold.

Chapter End Notes

Something I love about this particular story is finally toppling all the long string of metaphors and scenes that have been set up. I think this chapter for me hits well because Katsuki admits it was love at first sight. I've been waiting to say that for 600k+ words lol.

The full Vienna encounter is at the end of Chapter 19 if anyone wants to re-read that interaction with the new information of Katsuki fell in love there :') it hits differently IMO. I've been waiting for that info because I think it'll make re-reading Part I of this story more sweet when you realize how much Katsuki has been denying being in love with Izuku despite always have been this whole time.

I also think re-reading the scene with Izuku and Katsuki's first truce in the middle of Chapter 20 hits different too with the knowledge :') poor Katsuki has been hopelessly in love just as much as Izuku.

Let me know what you think below!! <3 The next chapter is the very last catch up of Katsuki's POV then chapter 41 we're lapping back into the present ❤️

Chapter 40: Appassionato

Chapter Summary

> Appassionato — (Instrumental indication) to play with a passionate or emotionally intense quality

Chapter Notes

> Helloooo!! :') Another Katsuki POV chapter!! This one is really sweet to me because its such a pivotal moment for his resolve and emotions that have been building up. I love romance ❤️💕
>
> Big thank you to the LOML Luna for Betaing like always! 💜💜💜
>
> :)) Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chapter 40 — Appassionato

.

.

.

Katsuki never felt panic like this before.

He was usually calm on the inside despite his explosive, abrasive personality.

He was loud, but it was in a way that wasn't out of heightened emotions. He just liked getting on people's nerves and never once had to learn to control his tone. But right now, all he could feel was the dull claws of panic burrowing through his chest.

He didn't know what to do—and it made him want to yell into the abyss. Loudly.

He'd really screwed up more than he ever fucking had. But worse, he didn't know how exactly to tell Izuku.

Because how did he start that off? He couldn't exactly come out and say 'hey, so while in a fit of hurt, anger and betrayal, I made a temporary deal with your satan spawn of a brother.

The one who beat you non-stop for hours? Yeah that one. I was going to return you to him.'

He was never good with words, that was Izuku's strength. Katsuki was all brute force and action.

Which is why he did the only thing he could think of when his back was against the wall.

He called Aizawa.

Katsuki paced back and forth as the dial tone rang.

Once. Twice. Thrice.

The phone kept ringing, each chime gnawing deeper into his nerves.

Then came the monotone click. A cold, familiar sound that meant no one was going to answer.

Why the hell did this man never answer his phone?!

"You've reached Aizawa," the recorded voice memo said flatly. "I've been forcibly exiled to the Bahamas by The Company due to high blood pressure and an apparent inability to 'decompress.' Their words, not mine. I'm not taking jobs, intel, updates, or emotional crises right now. My phone is off except for this message. If you're bleeding out—try not to."

In the background, Katsuki could hear a distant shout, "Shouta, get in the water!"

"…Alright that's my cue. Leave a message. I won't hear it."

Beep.

Katsuki made a sound that was somewhere between a sigh and a groan.

"I know you're too much of a workaholic to not check your phone," Katsuki said angrily. He paced faster back and forth. "When you do, call me back immediately. It's an emergency. Like a really really really big emergency involving the Yakuza."

Katsuki wearily glanced at the island across the water.

"….Please," he desperately added.

It was now staggeringly clear why Izuku struggled to come clean about killing his mother.

Hurting someone he loved—further than he already had—felt impossible. It was like twisting a knife into the wound he was trying to tend to. Practically ripping it open right after watching the one he loved finish stitching it closed.

And after everything Izuku had told him, Katsuki didn't want to cause any more pain.

Which is why when he got back into the water tower, he panicked.

“There’s been a change of plans,” Katsuki blurted out. “Something happened on the island with the safe house, it’s been compromised.”

Izuku sat upright, clearly confused and dazed.

“Compromised?” Izuku question. “As in, something bad happened?”

“Yup,” Katsuki emphasized. “We need to get out of here as soon as possible. I tried calling my ex-supervisor directly to see if there was somewhere else we could go—” Katsuki winced and shook his head, angry with himself. “—But that bastard is not answering his phone right now. Like always.”

A half lie.

But they needed to get the fuck out of here quickly before that bastard Tomura crossed the water. There really was no time to explain. Katsuki hastily figured he could come clean later, when they had more space to discuss it.

They quickly packed their bags and made a list of all the cities they should avoid. Then they decided where they could go in the meantime until Aizawa returned his call.

“We should go back north,” Izuku quickly suggested in the middle of zipping his duffle. “We can head to that Midnight Sento location that Nana gave me. It’s the bathhouse I was telling you about.”

And that was it.

Katsuki didn’t waste any more time. Izuku told him Midnight Sento was located in Shinonsen and he set his GPS for it right away. They hurried out of the tower and onto his motorcycle. Its engine screamed loudly beneath them as he sped down the road.

Not once did he dare to look back at that island.

Because all that mattered now was getting Izuku as far from danger as possible.

☽ ☽ ☽

They made it to the next town quicker than expected. But in Katsuki’s opinion, it wasn’t fast enough. He wanted to keep going, but unfortunately gas wasn’t infinite and neither was their hunger.

They ended up refueling and stopping at a small diner off the road.

Automatically, Katsuki scoped the place out the second they walked in.

He clocked all six exits and memorized any faces that eyed them too long. Overall, nothing raised a flag, but he still didn’t relax all the way. He stayed closely behind Izuku, keeping a hand hovering slightly over the small of his back out of instinct.

He led the smaller man towards a blue booth tucked into the far corner, close to the back door.

Izuku slid in the booth, looking a little more tired than he had that morning. Katsuki didn't say anything as he slid in right next to him, keeping his sharp eyes on the door. When he didn't see anything suspicious, he relaxed only slightly.

He just sat back, crossed his legs, and slung one arm across the top of the booth behind Izuku. He let his eyes scan the windows with mechanical precision.

He only stopped when he felt Izuku's eyes on him.

He turned, expecting a question about the 'safe house' shit. Instead, he found Izuku gawking, perplexed.

Katsuki raised a brow.

"Why are you looking at me like that?" he asked, deadpan.

Izuku shifted in place, suddenly shy. A faint blush swept across his cheeks.

"Uh, you're sitting on the same side of the booth," he said. "Usually, you sit across the table."

"Ah."

Katsuki tilted his head, gaze locking onto Izuku's. He leaned in just slightly enough to make Izuku blush deeper.

"It's safer this way," Katsuki explained seriously. "If someone tries to come at you, I can protect you easier. I usually use this kind of positioning when I'm doing a bodyguard job."

Izuku blinked. His puzzled expression turned affectionate and the tension fell from his shoulders. Then came that smile. It was gentle, bashful and just a little teasing. It was the same one that always riled Katsuki up.

"Does this mean I'm officially your client?" Izuku asked cheekily.

Katsuki's mouth curled into a crooked grin.

"I guess so, huh?" Katsuki replied. Suddenly, he was very appreciative that Aizawa forced him to work green folder jobs all his life. "Who would have thought? After years of being pissy about being put on bodyguard assignments, it came in handy in the end."

Izuku beamed at him, beautifully.

The brightness caught Katsuki off guard. His heart skipped several beats, pulled in by how handsome Izuku was when he smiled. He stared, captivated by the two cute dimples on either side of Izuku's face. He hadn't seen them since Biei—and it made his heart flutter.

He was unaware how his eyes softened.

Suddenly, that damning gravity he always felt around Izuku sucked him in. They sat in silence, eyes locked, each searching the other without a single word.

Katsuki's gaze slowly dropped. It lingered first to Izuku's lips then to the pretty bruises along his jaw. The hickies were lingering proof of their marathon of intimacy from two nights ago. Katsuki really liked the way Izuku wore his mark.

At the same time, Izuku's eyes roamed his face too. The fondness in their eyes tangled together until it became impossible to tell where one ended and the other began.

Then suddenly Katsuki heard a phone ring.

It was faint beneath the low diner murmur and the clatter of plates. Izuku probably didn't hear it. Any other time, Katsuki would have missed it as well. However, it jerked him back to reality because it was the same default ringtone the burner phone had.

And holy hell. It was like a bucket of ice water was poured over his head.

Katsuki's smile was wiped clean off his face.

He awkwardly cleaned his throat. Regret wrapped its skinny fingers around his throat, strangling him. His eyes skirted down to the table and he scratched behind his head as he tried to think.

Maybe this was a good time to tell Izuku? When their waiter came he could order extra strawberries to smooth it over. The damn nerd loved strawberries.

But when the shame became too much, Katsuki quietly pulled his arm back from behind Izuku's seat and folded his hands on the table.

He chewed on the inside of his cheek as the guilt doubled.

Guilt for what he'd almost done.

And guilt for loving his mother's murderer, in a way.

Because while he adored Izuku, an undeniable fact hung in the air: Izuku did kill his mom.

Above it all, Katsuki prided himself in being a good son. He always respected his mother. He never turned his back on her. Not even when things got ugly between them. He'd been loyal to her in the way only Katsuki knew how to express himself: fiercely, unapologetically, and with a kind of stubborn devotion that bordered on blind.

But now—

…Now he didn't know where the line was anymore.

Izuku shifted beside him, also clearly unsure.

The quiet weight of disgrace settled over the table like soot in the aftermath of a fire that burned down everything they built together. Izuku turned away, slumping against the booth's edge. His bangs fell forward and obscured his eyes, as if even looking Katsuki's way might make it all worse.

Katsuki looked away too, eyes wandering anywhere else besides their broken relationship.

There were too many things fighting for space inside his head and heart.

His mother. The stupid goddamn deal. And finally, the image of Izuku falling apart in front of him as he told his life story.

Katsuki never knew how to process shit. He wasn't built for nuanced emotions. He was made to protect, to save, and to destroy what hurt the people he cared about. This was all new territory for him and he had not a damn clue how to proceed.

"Are we…okay?" Izuku whispered quietly.

Katsuki didn't reply right away. He steadied himself, preparing to come clean about the deal right then and there. He opened his mouth to confess, but stopped when he glanced at Izuku.

Fuck.

Izuku was trembling, ever so slightly.

Katsuki's heart wrung tightly. The damn man probably didn't even realize it.

The assassin he'd been at odds with for eight years was always strong, fast, and able to stand his ground with minimal effort. But this was clearly not that same person. And how could it be? Izuku was clearly struggling to hold it together after his life had blown up—less than three days ago.

No matter how damn demented Izuku's family was—he was obviously affected from having such an abrupt, bloody exit. And after everything, the last thing Katsuki wanted was to be the reason Izuku finally broke.

He decided to wait to come clean. He would do it on a day when Izuku didn't look so close to falling apart.

"I'm…processing things. That's all," Katsuki whispered, backtracking. "But yeah. We will be okay."

And that wasn't a lie.

It was one of the few honest things he'd managed to say to Izuku in the last twenty-four hours. They would be okay because Katsuki made himself a promise to start working through his shit instead of letting it decay inside him.

Still, the memories of his mother kept washing up on the shore of his mind.

They came no matter what, fully uninvited but also fully unavoidable.

They arrived in fragments. Some jagged and others soft, like pieces of a wreckage finally drifting up from deep water. Each memory shimmered with some old version of her: the warm one, the furious one, or the one who had left him alone. Each one carried the weight of who he was. They showed him how she shaped him into someone who loved too hard and protected too violently.

Now, Katsuki stood in the middle of it all.

He was ankle-deep in the tide of memory, trying to assemble the pieces into a shape he could hold. A lesson, maybe. A map for how to move forward—not away from her, but through her. A tool that could guide him through all the complicated love and pain she left behind.

He would try his best to get there. But it was going to take a while.

☽ ☽ ☽

They made it to the small city of Shinonsen smoothly.

The second they entered, Katsuki noticed an odd eeriness.

A cloud of fog was at their feet. It barely moved, like a breath that'd never been exhaled. Jagged mountains rose up around them with peaks sharp enough to pierce the sky. There were also ominous trees lining the road. Some were stripped bare, branches crooked like broken fingers. Others still clung to their fading fall color, leaves halfway between life and death.

Katsuki could feel Izuku stiffen behind him. His arms became tense around his middle. He didn't need to look to know the other man noticed it too—the atmosphere was dense and dead. Like they'd driven straight into a graveyard.

Katsuki slowed down instinctively, engine dropping into a low purr. They rolled through town, quiet as they could be. Around them, people moved with the speed of ghosts. Their bodies were hunched and everyone was dragging their feet wearing hollow expressions. There was no color in the way they dressed. No rhythm in the way they walked.

The silence here wasn't peaceful. It was uncomfortable, like everyone was waiting for the sky to fall and missed the memo that it already did.

At a red light, Katsuki came to a full stop.

He let one foot touch the asphalt, then glanced to the side.

"Who fucking died?" Katsuki muttered. "Everyone looks like their dogs got run over by a car."

"Yeah, it's…odd," Izuku replied, wearily. "Every single person looks depressed."

Katsuki didn't respond.

He was already cataloging escape routes, suspicious looking people, and anything that looked Yakuza or Viper like. But he stopped when he felt the tension rolling off Izuku's body. It was subtle, but Katsuki noticed the way Izuku's arms trembled.

Katsuki's hand dropped to rest on Izuku's knee. It was a small gesture of reassurance.

He could feel Izuku relax under his fingers.

The light turned green.

☽ ☽ ☽

When they found the building for Midnight Sento, it was about everything Katsuki suspected it would be. It was big, roomy, and the roof was pointed with the traditional Japanese architecture. The outside was painted black with highlights of violet all around.

What Katsuki didn't suspect was for the bathhouse to be run by a dominatrix.

It was so obvious in the way she strolled in. Her aura was overpowering and in the back Katsuki could see poorly hidden floggers perched on the walls. She smirked at them, put one of her hands on her hips, and spread out the red fan in her other hand with a sharp whip.

Izuku jumped and Katsuki stared, unfazed, as she coyly hid half of her face and winked.

"Ah! New faces. Welcome to Midnight Sento! My name is Kayama Nemuri," she greeted. "What kind of session may I offer you? We're having a special today in the sauna to accommodate for the terrible news. If you're here for my other services, all my slots are booked until next month."

Katsuki raised an eyebrow. Her services were pretty damn popular, he mused.

After an awkward set of introductions, they were able to get settled in. He learned Nemuri was honestly rather cool.

She didn't ask too many questions once they dropped the code phrase 'One For All'. She hopped straight into giving them a tour of the bathroom. She showed them all the different saunas, lounges, and then finally their living quarters.

Which—only ended up being one single bed. But Katsuki didn't care or mind.

However, what he did mind was finding out he was suddenly employed.

Nemuri smiled at them and said, "Now, you can get settled in and tomorrow you'll get to work," like it was no big deal.

"Wait, what—work?" Izuku blurted out, beating Katsuki to the punch.

"Oh yes! I forgot to mention: you're both now employed, congrats!" Nemuri belted out. She laughed with her whole chest and lightly poked Izuku's nose with the end of her fan. "This helps me pay for housing, food, and anything else you may need. You start your shifts in the morning with cleaning the baths, floors, and servicing guests. I'll get you both your uniforms after dinner."

Katsuki resisted groaning out loud.

If they weren't on the run from the goddamn Yakuza, he would've defaulted to shouting. But he kept his displeasure to himself and acted grateful.

So much for retirement.

They continued to get settled in, and soon found themselves at dinner amongst others. Accompanying Nemuri were two blonde women who were cousins, Ryuko and Takeyama. And then one rather large gruff man named Sekijiro.

All of them were wearing depressed expressions. Perfectly matching the other residents in this weird town. But despite that, Katsuki could decipher this bathhouse set up was a don't-ask-don't-tell type of arrangement for people in tough positions.

Then during dinner they learned why everyone was acting so depressed.

"Our mayor's daughter passed away," Nemuri explained sadly.

"Did you all know her well?" Katsuki followed up.

"Yes," Sekijiro answered. "She was like the sun around here because she was this huge socialite. Everyone knew her and she would throw these grand fabulous parties for free and let people come and mingle."

"She was also preparing to be the next mayor," Ryuko added with taut lips. "Everyone was really looking forward to it because she basically knew everyone by name individually. It made sense for her to be the next in line. She finally made this foggy city feel like a community."

Damn, Katsuki thought. No wonder everyone looked like they were in a graveyard. The whole town was collectively grieving.

"That's so sad," Izuku whispered. "I'm sorry for all of your losses."

"Thank you, Izuku," Nemuri replied. She tried her best to smile. But Katsuki could see it wasn't sticking. "I guess everyone is just finding it tough to adjust without her because it happened so suddenly."

"If you don't mind me asking, how did she pass?" Izuku probed carefully.

"It was a car accident," Nemuri answered. "Car crash. The fog here gets so thick sometimes that it is hard to see. It was so heavy the day she was coming back from work, and it caused someone to veer into the opposite lane. They had a head on collision at high-speed leaving three injured, one dead."

Katsuki's eyebrows knitted together.

“That’s horrible,” he muttered. “I’m really sorry you all are experiencing that.”

“At the end of the week her father is hosting an impromptu lantern festival to honor her,” Nemuri said. “It’s something she would’ve liked, to bring everyone in the city together one more time. But she wouldn’t want it to be all about her since her parties never were. Her gatherings were always honoring other people. So, this festival will be in her ways. Everyone attending is allowed to remember the memory of their own loved ones who have passed.”

Izuku stiffened.

So did Katsuki.

Immediately, he thought about his mother. Then sadly, he thought about his father. He could see them both standing there in front of him. Two of the most important people in his life, gone too soon.

Then a memory surfaced. It was one he hadn’t thought of in years.

He’d been six, clutching his mother’s hand as they stood at the edge of a riverbank. There was a lantern flickering in his small palm. It’d been for his father and held the name ‘Masaru’ on it in neat handwriting. It was a ritual his mother insisted on because she was slightly superstitious.

She cried the whole way through. But in the end, she still let the lantern go.

At the time, Katsuki was too young to fully understand the weight of the ritual. But now, standing amid the fragments of his memory, he realized he’d never done the same for her.

Never made a lantern. Never said goodbye. Never even lit a candle.

He wondered if that’s why she constantly haunted his dreams.

Maybe she was begging to be let go.

☽ ☽ ☽

Later that night after they went to bed, as if on cue, Katsuki fell into another dream about his mother.

This time, he was fifteen going on sixteen.

He noticed these dreams were progressively moving backwards, showing him his life in reverse. He searched the memory this time closely, wondering if an answer about how to process his grief was hidden inside.

The edges of the dream were tinged grey, like he was viewing it through fog. This was the year everything hovered in limbo. He’d been working for Aizawa for about a year now. But it was also two years before he was put on M-Unit, making it a rather lonely time.

He’d almost forgotten how cold that kind of loneliness could feel.

In the dream, it was the week before his sixteenth birthday. He hadn't planned anything. Birthdays never meant much after his dad died. Besides, no other birthday would ever come close to that one summer in Tokyo—the one time a green-eyed boy made him feel like he mattered just for existing.

But his mother had other plans this time.

"Let's throw you a huge party!" she declared happily. Her eyes were gleaming and her hands clapped together excitedly. "It's your sixteenth! That's a big fucking deal, brat."

He scoffed quietly. "Who would even come?"

"Invite your classmates and maybe some coworkers," she suggested casually.

He didn't know how to tell her he didn't have any friends at school.

Even though the kids at his new school in Yokohama didn't know him when they were poor, they still didn't like him. It was like they could see the grime Katsuki used to be covered in. Even after the new clothes, the fixed shoes, and the thick silver chain around his neck—he still felt like he didn't fit in.

It was as if he was masquerading as a normal teenager.

And the people at work kept their distance from him. Most of his coworkers didn't like the way he spoke. Something about his personality being too loud and obnoxious. But frankly, Katsuki didn't give a fuck. He was good at being a loner.

But right now, as he looked at his mom, he suddenly minded the fact he didn't have friends.

He distantly thought back to the boy from Tokyo who never celebrated birthdays.

"Clean up and decorate!" she exclaimed, beaming. "I'll handle the cake. This is gonna be awesome!"

And for once, Katsuki believed her. He let himself get swept into it.

He went and splurged on some All-Might style decorations for his birthday. He bought posters, banners, confetti and more. He even bought himself a new outfit, a special deeper shade of black that he thought accentuated his paler features.

When the day finally came, no one showed up.

He invited his whole class, awkwardly. He even tried to invite anyone who seemed about his age at The Company. Which was exactly two people. But not a single person came. And now he was in their apartment surrounded by stupid decorations and party blowers.

He waited. He waited and waited and waited for any goddamn extra to show up.

But no one came.

Not even his own mother.

He'd been sitting waiting for her. The sun went down and now he was in the dark. He didn't have it in him to get up and go flip on the light switch. He stared at the two crooked wax candles on the dirty counter. One candle was a 1 and the other was a 6.

When she finally came home, she was drunk and high. She stumbled through the door with no cake in hand, just an empty bottle swinging from her fingers. She was slurring apologies and crying but Katsuki didn't really care to hear it. He didn't bother getting angry.

This is what he should have expected from her.

He was more angry with himself for being dumb and getting his hopes up. So he didn't yell or slam the door like he might've years before. Instead, he helped her to bed. He ignored the way she stumbled over her words and his heart clutched when he heard the faint whisper of 'Masaru' escape from her lips.

He tucked her in, went back to the kitchen, and tore down every shred of the party he'd tried to create.

He ignored the way his eyes stung as he ripped down the streamers, the banners, and cleaned up the stupid confetti. He stuffed all of it into a trash bag along with his hopes of ever feeling special. He tied it up tight like it'd never happened.

Katsuki set his alarm for 05:00 a.m. He had an assignment in the morning.

Before he left for work the next day, he laid out the usual: water, painkillers and a slice of toast.

Everything she'd need for the hangover.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki woke up in the middle of the night feeling hollow.

He saw what the dreams were trying to show him plainly now, as if the curtain were pulled back.

So much of his entire life revolved around his mother. Every ounce of joy, sorrow, and every decision he made hinged on her. All the good memories and the sad ones were orbiting around her moods. It was always all about her validation and her pain.

Even now, long after she was gone, he couldn't seem to figure out how to feel joy unless he imagined she'd be proud of him for it. And what kind of life was that? What kind of goddamn existence was it if he couldn't even breathe happiness without her ghost's permission?

He turned his head slightly, eyes adjusting to the low light. He found Izuku asleep peacefully beside him. A calm breath escaped him at the sight.

Izuku was probably the only person who could ever understand his pain. They were the same, really. Two people who spent their entire lives putting others' happiness before their own.

Sadly, his heart pulled towards his mother's murderer.

Izuku's eyes were shut and his face was relaxed in deep sleep. He had the faintest parting of his lips giving way to soft, even breaths. His eyelashes were impossibly thick, especially the bottom ones. They were long and curled like they'd been painted there with care.

Suddenly, all Katsuki wanted was to be closer to the one person who understood him.

He hesitantly lifted his hand and touched Izuku's shoulder.

And like a magnet being drawn home, Izuku stirred. He sighed softly as he leaned into the touch. Katsuki felt his chest tighten when Izuku turned inward, curling closer without hesitation. He sought Katsuki out like it was a reflex born of all the nights they'd held each other in the dark in Biei.

Katsuki never got these dreams then, he realized.

His eyes traced every curve of Izuku's gentle face. And then, Izuku's lashes fluttered open.

Beautiful green eyes stared at Katsuki.

Neither of them spoke.

Katsuki wistfully stared into a sea of deep green. All he wanted was to submerge himself in it.

He moved in closely towards the other man. His arms slipped around Izuku's waist, wrapping him tightly. He held on like Izuku was a lifeline and tangled their limbs. Izuku stared quietly. No words were exchanged as they defaulted back to the way they used to be all those endless nights together.

Katsuki hugged Izuku close, afraid to let go. The ache in his heart slowly dissipated under the act of affection. Following that feeling, Katsuki rested their foreheads together and he closed his eyes. His heart hurt less and less the longer Izuku was safely in his arms.

He let himself take this inch of selfish comfort without guilt.

And when he finally fell asleep again, with the man he loved curled into him, the dreams didn't return.

☽ ☽ ☽

At the end of the week, the lantern festival occurred.

Between failed calls to reach Aizawa, Katsuki contemplated what to do. Should he even participate? They were just passing through.

But as he stared at the crowd of people gathered, he saw how much this meant to the town. In everyone's hands was the name of someone they loved, honoring their memory.

All around them, hundreds of people were gathered holding up lanterns. Every lantern in their hand was cradled delicately, showing how cared for each of the departed was. The surrounding buildings were dimmed. No lights were on, giving space and respect for the fallen souls. Even the fog thickened up a touch, reducing the visibility.

Nemuri led their small group to the front of the festival. There was a large crowd of people gathered, being handed lanterns and matches. Everyone was lighting a flame, and then heading towards the town square.

Katsuki observed as all the employees of the bathhouse grabbed a lantern.

Everyone but Izuku, that is. He noted Izuku stared at the lanterns solemnly but didn't dare move to grab one. Instead he clasped his hands behind his back and put his head down. His expression was tight and it translated one thing: a killer like him shouldn't be amongst mourners.

Katsuki felt the same.

He'd killed mothers. Fathers. He'd even killed politicians and priests. Katsuki had been collecting souls since he was thirteen with little regret up until it affected him.

What a damn hypocrite he was—a killer sad because his mother was killed.

The irony was palatable. But his pain was undeniable.

Katsuki watched as everyone around him wrote their loved one's name on the paper material. He stayed in place, unsure of what to do. Grief pushed its roots in deep, and for a moment, Katsuki hated how familiar this paralysis felt. It was like he was twenty again, clutching the corner of an apartment wall while they zipped her body bag shut.

All the members from the bathhouse were finished and began to move forward without him.

Izuku stepped forward too, but stopped when he felt Katsuki's hesitation. He turned and glanced over his shoulder, and instantly they caught gazes.

"Should I get one?" Katsuki asked, unsure.

He trusted Izuku's opinion; Izuku was always good with shit like this.

"I think you should," Izuku replied gently.

And for some reason, that made it easier. Katsuki drew in a breath and stepped forward. He borrowed from Izuku's mountain of emotional strength as he approached the table. He reached for a lantern and the paper felt delicate for what it was meant to carry.

With an unsteady hand, Katsuki wrote his mother's name.

Bakugou Mitsuki.

Fog pressed in around his ankles, curling at his calves like hands made of smoke.

Katsuki grabbed a match and together they walked into the crowd. They met up with the rest of the group from the bathhouse and all of them marched towards the town square.

When they arrived, there was an older guy with sleek silver hair mounted on a stage. He was in front of a wooden podium. He scanned the hundreds of citizens with a gaze Katsuki recognized. He'd seen that same look in his eye reflected in the mirror often when he was twenty. It was the type of grief that etched its way into someone's heart only when the core of it was wrongfully shot out.

"That's the mayor," Sekijiro whispered to Izuku.

Katsuki heard him too and nodded.

When the tribute started, Katsuki's heart clenched as he gazed around at all the people holding lanterns. He sourly wondered if any of these people were the hundreds of victims he pumped lead into within the last decade.

The mayor gave a heartwarming speech. It was a solid tribute to his daughter who, from the sound of it, was a beacon of light. All the citizens were brought to tears, and it made both Katsuki and Izuku nearly cry as well.

Then the mayor reached for his lantern.

He lit it with steady hands.

And then one by one, the crowd followed.

A thousand flickers bloomed across the square like fireflies shaking off sleep.

Light spread in waves, golden and slow, until the entire space glowed. The fog still hung heavy, but now it filled with warmth like the dead were all here, watching and extending their love. Katsuki looked out over the rows of people, a sea of yellow light breaking through the gray. Each lantern shimmered like a steady heartbeat.

He exhaled, shaky and unsure.

Scarlet eyes dropped to the unlit lantern in his hands. The match felt too small to represent the force his mother always was. Yet, he still struck it. The flame bloomed against the night, and he moved it carefully to the wick. But the winter wind blew in with a whistle and swiftly snuffed it out before the fire could take.

Katsuki stared, caught off guard.

He tried again, flicking his wrist and striking a new flame. But once more, the winter wind that he was all too familiar with came back. It snuffed out the light almost in a mocking way.

He tried a third time, and he couldn't stop his frustration from showing. His fingers trembled as he tried to light the lantern.

But yet again, it was blown out.

That was like the final, tiny tipping point. The tight coil in his throat clenched, and behind his eyes the pressure built. Quickly, this wasn't about the lantern anymore. It was everything. Every single goddamn thing. Why did he always have to fight for scraps of warmth the world handed so freely to everyone else?

Everyone else had their lanterns lit. Everyone else was moving forward.

Why was he always the one left behind?

Suddenly, Izuku stepped forward. Without asking, he held his hands out as a shield against the vicious winter winds.

Katsuki's head snapped up, surprised.

A soft, amber glow from the nearby lanterns bathed Izuku's face in warm light. It framed his cheeks and kissed the lashes of his downturned eyes. The glow outlined him like a beautiful painting that possessed exactly the right touch. Izuku smiled at him with a tenderness laced in sorrow, as if he understood without needing to ask.

Of course. It was always Izuku who shielded him from the cold.

All of the love inside of Katsuki burned brighter and his eyes softened.

He lit the lantern this time without issue, with the help of Izuku.

He held his hand out to protect the small wick. Together, they safe guarded the flame for Mitsuki.

It hit Katsuki then he didn't have to carry his grief alone. All his life, he'd been doing it alone. Struggling to manage his emotions without ever speaking about how they torn him apart. But here Izuku was, helping without being asked.

The mayor then stepped down from the podium and held up his lantern.

He walked off stage and led the way with his head held high. He strolled through the thick fog and led all his citizens towards the river. All the various people began following, and soon they stopped where a river passed by the base of a tall mountain. The wide stream spilled right into the dark, vast ocean.

The crowd of people began to split. Groups shuffled along on either side of the long river.

The mayor stepped forward first.

From his spot at the front of the river, he released the lantern holding his daughter's memory. The flow of the water carried her away from him. He watched her leave, and there was wisdom in the action. He observed with eyes full of love, not mourning, as she was able to continue on without him.

Next, everyone else released their lanterns. Each one joined in the water behind hers.

By the time her lantern made it to where Izuku and Katsuki were, the river was a glowing golden constellation of loved ones. Hundreds of names passed by, and distantly Katsuki could hear gentle laughter, quiet talks, and feel all the hugs and heartfelt confessions. The bright lights shone across his face, mimicking the fondness that was shared between everyone here.

One by one, all the employees from the bathhouse began to let their lanterns go.

Soon everyone around them did the same.

Katsuki watched as person after person placed their lantern down. Everyone released them into the narrow stream. Beautiful yellow lights wove together like a glowing procession of memory that flowed like a living ribbon of warmth through the dark.

It was Katsuki's turn to let go now.

But when he tried, his fingers trembled. His grip tightened instinctively around his mother's lantern.

He looked around at the crowd, and in an instant, he wasn't twenty-five anymore. He was twenty-four. Then twenty-three. Then twenty. Eighteen. Each year peeled away like layers of dead skin, leaving him raw beneath the weight. He was all the versions of himself at once, tangled in the same old ache. Grief was the glue that held them together, every year of his life stitched into the next by the pain that centered around her.

Suddenly, he was seven again, still searching for her face in the crowd.

His fingers couldn't move.

Nemuri then turned to Katsuki quietly when she noticed his hesitation. She placed a kind hand on his shoulder.

"Take your time," she said gently. "We're all going to go back to the bathhouse now. When you're ready, head home. No curfew tonight."

Katsuki nodded stiffly, beyond grateful. Nemuri gave Izuku a knowing glance and Izuku mouthed 'thank you' to her. The bathhouse employees left them there, and soon the crowd began to thin out.

Katsuki held the lantern close to his chest and he was so goddamn thankful Izuku didn't push him.

Katsuki moved first. He took a hesitant step forward along the shore of the river. He began to walk down the edge and Izuku followed him quietly. They walked together in the night air side by side, watching all the lanterns float by at their feet.

When they came down to the end of the river where it spilled into the ocean, they finally stopped.

Katsuki stared out at the endless, dark horizon that was coated in fog. He tightened his fingers around his mother's lantern and looked sadly at the dark horizon in front of him. It was nearly pitch black, and all the lanterns were floating out into it. One by one they were swallowed up by the darkness on the other side of the threshold.

Katsuki's heart hummed low.

"Why did it have to be you?" He whispered. "Out of all people, why you?"

The wind blew, and Izuku hung his head. His eyes skirted off to the side, counting the lanterns that passed them by.

"I don't know," Izuku eventually said. His voice was so low Katsuki could barely hear it. "I wish it wasn't."

"Me too," Katsuki replied quietly.

Katsuki tried to find logic behind their situation.

But there was none, and this all felt too connected to chalk up to some horrible coincidence.

What if it really was fate?

Izuku believed in fate. Maybe Katsuki should stop questioning it so much because right now, it seemed like the only answer to this demented dance they were stuck in. So he began reasoning out loud, because really, what else could he do?

He lowered his head as he squatted down on the patch of grass next to the river. Izuku joined him wordlessly, leaving space between them that no doubt was room for all their hurt.

Katsuki painfully looked at the lantern in his hands. The yellow light illuminated his crestfallen face, making him appear younger than he was. A line of countless lanterns passed them by on the river. One by one they watched them go while the one in Katsuki's hand stayed rooted in place.

Katsuki turned to Izuku.

"But even if it wasn't you, another Viper eventually would've killed her, right?" He whispered.

Izuku's eyes softened under the yellowish light. His eyes darted around, studying Katsuki's face as if he was unsure he should speak. But he did, and what he said gave an inch of closure.

"…Yes." Izuku admitted.

“And if I didn’t kill that guy when I was thirteen, he would’ve killed her. And if I didn’t stop Aizawa, he would’ve killed her—and who knows who else.”

He saw all the connections. Every gun raised against his mother, he stopped. She always danced along the line of death, never properly taking care of herself. From here, he aligned his and Izuku’s lives side by side yet again—and what he found was that their situations were inevitable.

No matter what, his mother was destined to die young.

Or rather, maybe she was fated.

She was fated to die.

“Y’know,” Katsuki said bitterly. “I asked her once who would want her killed for owing a debt and she couldn’t even come up with a list. She said it could be anyone. Somehow, someone always would have likely killed her because she always had her past chasing her.”

Izuku’s brow pulled together. “What type of past did she have?”

“That’s the thing, I don’t know.” Katsuki’s voice cracked. His eyes blurred with tears. “I will never know. That will always be an open ending for me because I realize I-I didn’t know my mom very well. But all I did know was that her gambling addiction put her in so much shit.”

Katsuki clenched his jaw thinking of all the time he came home to people in the house.

“I still blame Chisaki for taking advantage of someone with an addiction,” he hissed. “But I have to blame her a bit too, don’t I? All this time I thought she died because of a mistake I made—” Katsuki choked as he sucked in his lips. “When really, she died because it was a mistake she made. All this time, it had nothing to do with me.”

And that was really it, wasn’t it?

It had never been about him. It was always about her.

He should have known that even her death had nothing to do with him. He was always sidelined in their lives.

“She could never stay away from the things that put her in trouble,” Katsuki mournfully admitted. “No matter how much I wanted her to, she was always doomed from the start. And I think even my father knew that. It’s why his dying wish to a five year old was to take care of his mother. He knew she wouldn’t have been able to survive on her own—because her worst enemy was herself. B-But I couldn’t save her in the end…no matter how much we both loved each other.”

Katsuki looked down at the lantern in front of him.

The more he gazed at the flickering light, the more he felt the fog around his memories fade. Everything became painfully, crystal clear. He suddenly understood now why he held so many visceral insecurities. So many violate emotions that he suffocated over and over in hopes they died.

But emotions like that didn't die, they grew stronger until they were given the right fix.

"My love for her was never enough and that always made me feel like I was never enough," Katsuki whispered. "I cried, yelled and I screamed at her to be better. But she wasn't capable. All I wanted was for her to live and see how much potential she had. She was the center of my world for so long and when she passed, I had no clue what to do with myself. I had never —"

Katsuki stopped.

Izuku's eyes grew full of pity, and for once, Katsuki didn't feel disgusted.

He felt seen.

"I had never thought of putting myself first," Katsuki admitted. "I sacrificed my grades in school for her. I took that job for her. I didn't even have time to go out and make friends outside of work. I did all I could to take care of us—because that was all I ever knew. Just… take care of mom and be a good, grateful son."

Katsuki's face dropped as a revelation dawned on him.

"…And that always kept me away from happiness because I was so preoccupied with centering her. Didn't it?" Katsuki whispered.

The other man didn't answer. Instead, he let his actions talk.

Izuku shifted closer and hugged his arms around Katsuki's shoulders. Warmth shielded him from the cold, and Katsuki leaned his head against Izuku's.

He tried to stop the words, but they kept coming. Izuku's small hands soothed him, rubbing softly at the space between his shoulder blades as gently as possible.

"Y'know, I never had hobbies because I was too worried over her," Katsuki whispered, feeling utterly raw. "I worked too much to enjoy life because I needed to pay for two of everything. Part of the reason I gave up on ever finding a relationship was because I felt like I wouldn't find the time. My whole life was about her—and even now, it somehow still is."

Izuku hugged Katsuki tighter as his own tears began to spill down.

"I know she loved me to the full capacity she was able to, and I loved her too. I always will—but even now in a twisted way, she's still blocking me from happiness. My grief over her is keeping me away from you. I think…I think if I ever want real happiness, I need to stop centering her. Don't I?"

"I can't tell you how to live your life, Katsuki," Izuku mournfully murmured. "You have to do what you think is right."

“I know. But the happiest I ever was in my life was with you at the estate,” Katsuki confessed. “It was the first time I wasn’t focusing on her in my whole life. I thought it was retirement making me happy, but it was you.”

Katsuki lifted his head and drew back from the embrace. His eyes locked onto Izuku like he was the last anchor tying him to the world.

“I want to be happy, Izuku,” Katsuki confessed. A tear rolled down his cheek as he looked at all the freckles he wanted to kiss. “Do you think I’m capable of it?”

“I do.” Izuku wiped away the tears delicately. “I know you’re capable of it.”

Izuku looked down at Katsuki’s trembling hands.

Without a word, Izuku moved closer.

Gently, he laid his hands over Katsuki’s. The warmth of his palms spread like balm, steadying Katsuki. Katsuki’s calloused fingers, marred from a lifetime of violence, twitched beneath the soft touch. But slowly, his shaking began to still. Their hands fit over the lantern like they were made to meet here, at this exact moment, in this exact way.

Katsuki lifted his gaze to look across the lantern.

And when he caught sight of Izuku, it hit him like an arrow through the center of his chest.

The lantern’s light spilled upward between them, catching the slope of Izuku’s face, illuminating him from beneath. The rich light painted every curve in warm honeyed tones. His lashes cast shadows on his cheeks. The faintest freckle on his jaw caught the glow. He looked celestial. Somehow fragile and infinite all at once.

And in that instant, Katsuki saw the truth with bone deep clarity:

Izuku had been his light this entire time.

Through all the years. Through every bloody sunrise and sleepless night. Through the guilt, the pain, the aching silence of losing everything. Izuku somehow was always there. Constantly steady when Katsuki fell apart. And once more, he stood here with him, shielding his hands from the cold.

Katsuki’s breath hitched.

His chest burned.

He could feel the love inside him rising, unable to be contained.

Izuku looked at him, viridian eyes glowing like twin embers in the dark. His gaze was full to the brim with understanding, translating that he saw Katsuki for all he was and wasn’t afraid.

Their eyes dropped to the lantern. His mother’s name shimmered.

And with fingers still intertwined, they bowed.

Together, they released it.

The lantern slipped from their hands and floated downstream. It remained gentle and glowing like Mitsuki's soul was finally at peace. They stayed kneeling beside one another, watching in silence as it drifted toward the ocean through the fog, joining the rest of the souls on the other side.

☽ ☽ ☽

Later that night when they went to sleep, like expected, Katsuki fell into another dream of her.

But this time instead of sliding backwards, the dream pushed him forwards.

He was nineteen again, cast in the light of a long-forgotten winter.

The apartment was warm, muted, and familiar. He sat on her living room couch with one leg slung over the other, phone in hand, idly scrolling through Tinder profiles. One forgettable face after another until he paused on someone. The guy had dark hair, sharp eyes, and a smirk that sort of mirrored his own.

Just as his thumb hovered over the screen, his mother leaned over and swiped left with a sharp scoff.

"Hey! What the hell?" Katsuki snapped, jerking his head toward her. "I was gonna swipe on him!"

Mitsuki rolled her eyes. "He looked mean."

"So? I'm mean. Maybe it would've worked out."

"You're not mean," she muttered, rolling her eyes. "You're passionate—it's different. You're loud and stubborn and reckless—but mean isn't one of your traits, no matter what you think."

Katsuki was about to rebuttal, but was shut up by the look she gave him.

"You're a lot like me, Katsuki," his mother suddenly lectured. Her tone slipped to the softest he ever heard it as she gazed down sadly at his calloused hands. "People like us—we don't need matches, we need counterweights. Somebody who'll keep us from spinning out. Someone who's water to our fire."

She glanced away for a second. Her voice cracked just slightly.

"Masaru was that for me," she confessed in a whisper. "And even though we only had five years…they were the happiest of my life. I want that for you too, Katsuki. I want someone who'll soften you. Hold you. Love you like you deserve."

Then, without asking, she reached for his phone again and swiped to the next profile.

And there he was.

Izuku.

Freckles, deep green eyes, and dimples.

Katsuki blinked. Something shifted in the dream. The couch was the wrong color. The coffee table had swapped sides. And yet, there he was—his Izuku—smiling back at him through the screen.

“Oh, now this one’s cute,” Mitsuki cooed, practically beaming. She leaned in, reading aloud with interest. “Same age as you. He likes books, romantic movies, classical music, walks in the park…” She gasped. “And he volunteers at an animal shelter! Look at that. He’s a goddamn saint.”

Katsuki froze, totally confused as the memory twisted wrong.

“I always wanted you with someone like this,” Mitsuki whispered. “Someone who’d love you for every part of you—especially the parts you don’t like. I think he’d be very good for you.”

She swiped right.

The world tilted with the motion.

Suddenly Katsuki was no longer simply nineteen on her couch—he was in another world entirely. It was a parallel universe where Izuku wasn’t a Viper but rather he was a normal guy in college. Izuku was studying toxicology, volunteering with kittens and had straight A’s. This Izuku wore thin, hexagonal glasses perched on his cute nose while rehearsing violin at the Yokohama Orchestra.

And Katsuki was in love with him.

The dream showed him slices of a life he never had.

It showed him their first date in the park where laughter spilled between them like sunlight. It showed him them cooking dinner side by side in Izuku’s cramped kitchen, stealing kisses between the sizzling of the pan and the boiling of pasta.

Then finally it showed him in his mother’s apartment. Izuku was curled up on the couch while she talked his ear off. He’d gotten her pink carnations, and she was so happy. Katsuki was across the room making dinner, sneaking glances like a love-struck idiot. Izuku chuckled lightly while his mother went on about some work drama.

They caught glances across the room and Katsuki smiled gently at him. Izuku smiled back, eyes soft and full of adoration.

Later, as Izuku prepared to leave, Mitsuki pulled him into a warm hug.

“Come back any time, okay, Izuku?” she said, swaying a little. “I’m so happy you two found each other. You have no idea.”

“Of course, Mrs. Bakugou!” Izuku flushed pink and nodded quickly. He hugged her back. “I’ll bring that apple pie recipe when I see you again.”

Next, Izuku hugged Katsuki tight. They said their goodbyes and Katsuki kissed the top of his head. And just like that—Izuku was gone but his warmth lingered.

Katsuki stood there in the dream, stunned. His heart ached because why did this feel so real? The way Izuku’s hand fit in his. The way his mother looked at Izuku. He could see how easily they would’ve loved each other.

Mitsuki’s voice broke the stillness.

“He’s way out of your league, y’know,” she teased, nudging him. “But you two fit. I like him.” She gave him a long, knowing look. “What’s that thing you call him again?”

“…Darling?”

She grinned.

“Yeah. That. Never thought I’d hear something so sappy out of your damn mouth.” She stepped closer and smoothed his hair down like she used to when he was little. Her voice turned wistful. “Now stop being a brat and go be with your darling, Katsuki. I always hoped you’d find someone like that. And it’s a damn miracle someone that sweet can put up with you.”

She laughed and her voice cracked, just slightly.

Then her tone softened. “It’s time to wake up now.”

Katsuki frowned. “Can’t you stay a little longer?”

“No…I can’t stay anymore. My time is up.”

His mom then backed away. Step by step she got closer to the door. Then she turned away, back towards him. She put her hand on the door handle. Instantly, Katsuki saw the memory of her walking away when he was seven. It overlapped with her figure at that moment.

Immediately, he jerked forward, and tried to grab her out of reflex.

“Mom—wait. Don’t leave me again—”

He tried to grab for her, but his fingers fazed right through her.

He frozen when he tried again and found he could grab nothing. She paused with her hand on the handle.

She glanced back over her shoulder with that same sad, stubborn smile.

“I’ll never leave you, Katsuki,” she whispered. “I’ll always be with you.”

She opened the door and a bright light poured out.

Katsuki shielded his eyes and held back tears. When the blinding, overwhelming light softened, Katsuki’s heart stopped. Beyond the threshold, he could see his dad, smiling. Masaru stood there like he’d been waiting for her all these long years.

“Mitsuki,” he called, voice like warm tea. His eyes brightened with love. “What took you so long?”

“Sorry,” she laughed, her voice trembling. “Me and Katsuki had some healing to do first. But we got there. He finally lit a lantern for me.”

Katsuki watched, tears slipping down his face, as his parents reached for each other. Their fingers laced like they’d never let go. And in that final moment, bathed in light, they turned back toward him.

Their faces were radiant with peace for finally being reunited.

“Go be happy, Katsuki,” his mother called to him.

And with one last smile, they faded into the warmth together.

☽ ☽ ☽

When Katsuki woke up, his face was already wet.

Tears slid silently down his cheeks, warm against the cool air of the room as he stared up at the plain ceiling. His breath caught in his throat. He covered his mouth with one trembling hand and screwed his eyes shut as the weight of the dream hit him all at once.

But this time, there was no pain in the feeling.

A soft, steady warmth bloomed in his chest and wrapped around his ribs like a second skin.

Because of course his mother would’ve loved Izuku. There was never a version of the world where she wouldn’t. Similar to that sappy shit Izuku always said, in another lifetime or whatever, those two would have laughed together. They would have shared stories. Bickered in a friendly way and found common ground.

And just like that, the broken heart inside Katsuki began to mend a little.

Exactly like at the water tower, a single thread of closure stitched into the torn seam of his chest. Then another. Not enough to erase the break entirely, but enough to heal him ever so slightly.

He understood now, full on that it was love that could heal broken pieces.

Not rage, not violence, not revenge. But rather, love was remedying him.

And fuck, he never would've guessed it.

He lifted up from the futon and felt the gentle weight of Izuku's arm around him. The smaller man groaned softly from the sudden shift, but didn't wake up. Katsuki glanced down at him and felt all the pain weighing him down suddenly lift.

He rose to his feet, glancing down at Izuku sleeping soundly. Wordlessly, Katsuki wiped his tears and tucked the covers around Izuku. He smiled at the way the other snuggled in automatically, snoring lightly like always.

Eventually, Katsuki settled into the chair by the window. He gazed out, and noticed all the fog was gone. Sun as bright as the love he felt at this moment was pouring out. And for once, Katsuki let himself be basked in it.

He looked around the room and his gaze fixed on the small vase on the window sill. It held a tiny bouquet of bright, yellow daffodils. The flower reminded him of Izuku. He plucked one from the vase as he pondered on his dream.

He re-lived it like it was a real memory, over and over.

And when Izuku awoke, he told him what his mother said.

Katsuki leaned in, brushing soft hair away from Izuku's temple. With deliberate gentleness, he tucked the daffodil behind Izuku's ear. Izuku blinked up at him in confusion. But then he smiled, still sleepy.

"She would have loved you, darling," Katsuki whispered.

For the first time, he could clearly see what his mother would have wanted. But more importantly, he realized he didn't need her approval to live. He didn't need her presence to move forward. What he needed—what he'd always needed—was already lying in that bed beside him.

Acceptance and love. In their most terrifying, beautiful forms.

☽ ☽ ☽

He kept trying to contact Aizawa after that. He desperately needed to hear that old man's voice if Izuku was ever going to live a normal life. But of course—Aizawa didn't answer. Katsuki groaned as he got the same voicemail.

But between his frustration, Katsuki felt the ache in his chest lessen as the day went on.

The bit of healing he gained the last few days demonstrated to him that he could cure himself of pain through the raw, terrifying act of love. The healing was slow and uneven—but it was progress. He realized that he didn't have to carry grief in silence. And that maybe, if he let himself lean into love with everything he had, it would be enough to keep him from drowning.

After that, he made a quiet vow: he would hold onto Izuku.

Because in every scenario where he thought of departing ways with him, it felt wrong.

No matter what version played in his head, the threads binding him to that short stack of a man screamed out when he thought of severing them. Especially the thought of dropping Izuku off with Nana, never to be seen again, tasted like acid. He really didn't want to fucking do that.

But he also didn't want Izuku anywhere near the Vipers or Yakuza.

Which only left one, real option.

While his heart bloomed at the idea, his mind tugged him back to the looming guilt still hanging overhead.

It reminded him of what transpired a week ago: the deal he'd nearly committed to with Tomura.

And the fact Izuku didn't know it had occurred.

They were now polishing the floors in one of the sauna rooms, side by side. Steam rose faintly around them in soft spirals and Izuku hadn't taken the daffodil out of his hair. It was still neatly tucked behind his ear, absurdly bright in the haze of the bathhouse. The sight of it made Katsuki's heart twist up with an unbearable pressure to come clean about the deal.

However, he kept wondering when would be the right time to confess.

But the longer he waited, the harder it became.

Because the more Katsuki came to terms with how much he loved Izuku, the more impossible the truth felt. And while Izuku had always been the emotionally resilient one between them, Katsuki wasn't blind.

During the past week here at Midnight Sento, Izuku's demeanor shifted.

He'd grown quieter. More withdrawn. He shrunk into himself like a paper figure caught in a steady, all consuming burn. Izuku even began to nervously pick at his thumbs, entirely subconscious and unaware. It was a compulsive act of self-soothing Katsuki was starting to recognize all too easily.

But more so, Katsuki noticed never once did Izuku mention the siblings that he was forced to kill.

And worse, he never mentioned the sibling he gave to Nana.

Learning about the way Katsuma and Izuku parted made him really fucking sad. He recalled how happy Izuku seemed in that mansion, which he now knew was a dressed-up jail. Izuku hadn't been happy because of the riches surrounding him—he was happy because of Katsuma.

Stubbornly, Katsuki wished there was some damn way to reunite those two.

As they polished the tiles, Katsuki stole several glances at Izuku. He watched Izuku's face from the corner of his eye, studying the weight pulling on his features.

Then he looked down at Izuku's thumbs.

A fresh layer of skin had been peeled off. Raw.

Katsuki pressed his lips in a thin line.

Izuku was holding himself together with a very, very thin rope.

Hesitantly, Katsuki decided to table his confession for later. Maybe he'd find a better time when Izuku wasn't unconsciously self soothing. Instead, he decided to ask the most important question pertaining to their very dire situation.

"Have you made up your mind about going with Nana or not?" Katsuki questioned quietly. "I know you said you were contemplating it. But I think you really need to take it."

Izuku paused and hesitated. He stumbled visibly on his words and looked down to the murky water in the bucket.

Izuku's brows furrowed together. "I'm still not sure."

Katsuki immediately frowned.

"What do you mean you're not sure?" Katsuki bit back. He put down his scrubber and leaned into Izuku's line of vision with a stern glare. He took Izuku's chin with his fingers and lifted his head. "Izuku. You have gotta take it. There's no way you will be safe from that evil ass brother of yours otherwise."

"I know but something is keeping me here," Izuku shamefully whispered.

"What? What could be so important that you don't want to get to safety?"

Izuku chewed on his bottom lip. His eyes skirted to the side before locking on Katsuki's. A moment passed between them and Katsuki's eyes widened at how much sadness was written across Izuku's face.

"...I don't want to leave you, Kacchan," Izuku whispered.

Katsuki's eyes widened and his heart skipped a beat.

He blinked rapidly at the admission, then his whole face softened.

This sappy idiot.

"You've been unsure about going because of me?" Katsuki asked gently.

"Is that bad?" Izuku replied. He leaned in and all Katsuki wanted to do was hug him. "I don't want to leave you, Kacchan. I can't. I feel as if I physically can't. Every time I even think about it, my heart hurts in this awful way. How can I go on to a new, happy life knowing you could still be in danger? Or worse, killed?"

Katsuki's eyes grew sad, and he dropped his hand. "Izuku…"

Izuku whipped his head away.

"I know, it's stupid," Izuku blurted out. He shook his head and screwed his eyes shut. "I know it's such a stupid damn decision. But I can't leave you like this, Katsuki. I care about you too much. I'm staying and you can't make me change my mind."

A dry laugh almost escaped him.

Of course Izuku was thinking the same thing. This stupid nerd even put his foot down as if Katsuki would ever disagree with them staying together. He couldn't stop the tender, lopsided grin that bloomed on his face.

That was his Izuku, he supposed. Stubborn as always, like a damn ram.

"I was actually going to agree with you," Katsuki replied. "I don't want to part ways again either."

Izuku perked up, surprised. He turned back to Katsuki with a bewildered stare.

"Really?" Izuku questioned.

"Of course."

Katsuki smiled and leaned back. He tilted his head as he looked Izuku up and down.

As he did this, he couldn't help but feel another stitch of healing across his heart. They were incapable of leaving the other alone, weren't they? Even in the worst of times, they circled back, ready to have it out one way or another.

"I've had some time to process everything, sort of," he said. "Not fully, but enough. I've gone over a shit ton of scenarios and analyzed all the probable outcomes. And in every one where we're parting ways, I fuckin' hate it. It feels wrong, y'know? Like something really nasty is in my mouth and I get this lump in my throat. So, yeah. We should stay together."

His smirk widened as he watched Izuku absorb the information.

His damn dork's eyes widened and then the tension fell from his shoulders as absolute relief overtook him. Izuku's eyes watered and he became so overwhelmed with happiness. He looked at Katsuki like the stars finally aligned, shifting in place just for them.

Izuku asked, "Does this mean we should start looking for places to go since Nana is off the table?"

Katsuki scoffed. "Oh, no. You're definitely going with Nana. There's no chance in hell I'm letting that not happen."

Izuku frowned. “But you just said—”

“—I’ve decided I’m coming with you.”

Izuku’s eyes widened.

The silence that followed was vulnerable and painful in its stillness. It stripped everything between them bare, forcing the truth to the surface. Because change always came with pain, didn’t it? Real change tore through the body like a blade, carving out the pieces that no longer served. It dared the body to become something better.

This moment was one of those.

A pivot. A shift in their very souls.

And in that silence, Katsuki made his choice. He would go with Nana. He would follow this path alongside Izuku because he couldn’t imagine his life without him. His mother was always a sound believer in second chances. She started over more times than he ever knew, and at the core, he would always be her son.

And now he was following her footsteps and starting anew with the man he loved.

He pictured their hands clasped across unfamiliar cities and he could hear the laughter they were going to share in the mornings. But more than anything, he could see Izuku’s smile. That bright, stubborn light that always kept Katsuki fixated.

Izuku deserved to smile like that for the rest of his life.

So Katsuki decided he was going to fight like hell to give him that.

“You were right about the situation with me and the Yakuza,” Katsuki continued. “I’m in as much danger as you are. Now that my head is clearer and shit, I can think more logistically. I need to disappear as well if I ever want a chance to be happy and normal.”

“But what about Chisaki?” Izuku asked, unsure. “You said you had a plan to kill him, you can’t abandon that.”

“Forget I ever mentioned that,” Katsuki replied. He viscerally bristled thinking about that stupid fucking deal. “There is no plan. Your safety is far more important.”

“But you’ve been craving revenge for your mother for years,” Izuku emphasized. “If you want, we can go try and kill Chisaki ourselves then try to get back to Nana in time.”

Katsuki didn’t say anything right away.

He took a long, thoughtful pause as he realized Izuku was similar to him in more than one way. Izuku believed in justice, even if it had to be paid in blood. He was probably more thirsty for Chisaki’s undoing than Katsuki was. But Katsuki didn’t want to think about even getting close to the Shie Hassaikai after what he heard.

His fists tightened as he remembered the disgusting kiss between the Yakuza Heir and Izuku.

“Going anywhere near Chisaki is too dangerous, Izuku,” Katsuki whispered, feeling very sure. “You shouldn’t be anywhere near him—especially after everything you told me. It’s too dangerous for you.”

“But…your mom,” Izuku whispered.

“I know,” Katsuki agreed, gritting his teeth when his heart clenched. “As much as it pains me to let that scum keep living, I have to. The thought of never seeing you again is more painful than letting him live.”

He lifted his gaze and grasped one of Izuku’s hands.

He said solidly, “if I have to choose between a lifetime of happiness with you or a brief moment of revenge, I choose you. It’s what my mom would have wanted for me, I’m sure. But more importantly, it’s what I want for myself.”

“Are you positive?” Izuku whispered. “I don’t want you to regret this down the line.”

“I could never regret you, Izuku.”

It was the truth.

Never in his life could he ever imagine regretting the one person who changed him for the better.

Katsuki watched as tears gathered in Izuku’s eyes. He looked like his heart was dancing, mending, and flying all at the same time. They gazed at each other full of promises, and Katsuki felt the change fill the air.

“Let’s promise to never let go again, okay?” Katsuki proposed. “Even if we decide things don’t work out between us down the line, I want us to always be in each other’s lives. No matter what.”

He smiled as his own eyes grew full of tears.

“Okay,” Izuku agreed. He smiled back at Katsuki and two tears of happiness slid down his cheek. “I promise to never let you go, Kacchan.”

“Always?” Katsuki asked.

“Always.” Izuku promised.

The longer Katsuki gazed at Izuku, he saw all the heart wrenching versions of him appear before his eyes. They moved through his mind like a sorrowful ballet, one after the other, each cloaked in blood and heartbreak.

Each Izuku carried the unspeakable weight of what he’d endured. They presented themselves in order and then at the end, came a new Izuku. Future Izuku. The Izuku who successfully came out on the other side of his torment. He was older, wore glasses and was cleansed of all the grime he had to crawl through just to survive.

And Katsuki wanted so damn badly to make sure Izuku got to live in that version of himself.

“We’re finally going to get a shot of that new life together,” Katsuki whispered. “I guess it’s time to really start thinking about that flower shop of dead roses we said we were going to open, huh?”

They both laughed, full of joy.

Katsuki wiped Izuku’s tears away, deciding they didn’t suit him. Izuku nervously chuckled with him as he held on tightly.

“Yeah, I guess we do, don’t we?” Izuku chuckled. “Maybe we should start thinking about a name for it.”

They were finally aligned and all they had to do was make it to Nana. Together.

Izuku began shaking. He tried to calm down, but it was impossible. However, Katsuki could see he was shaking out of happiness. He was trembling because they were finally getting their second shot at running away together.

Katsuki couldn’t help but feel like it was more than a coincidence.

Another stitch knotted along his broken heart and he found himself circling back to the concept of fate. It seemed like no matter how far they veered off from their original promise, they always found a way back together.

What if it wasn’t simply chance that they kept falling into each other’s path? What if it was some sort of sign? What if Izuku was right about fate being real?

Before he could ponder any longer, Katsuki gathered the man he loved for an embrace.

Warm.

That was his first thought. Izuku’s whole body was always so warm, shielding him from the cold. Katsuki pressed in closer and let himself memorize the feel of Izuku in his arms. He reassured himself that this was where he belonged.

Izuku laughed through his tears and held him tighter, pulling him in with everything he had. Katsuki leaned away just enough to gaze into beautiful viridian eyes. He touched the daffodil in Izuku’s hair lovingly.

“Can I kiss you?” Katsuki asked, feeling compelled.

Izuku nodded, hand rising to cradle his cheek. “Please do.”

They leaned in.

Their lips met, and it felt like finally—finally—they were home.

☽ ☽ ☽

Katsuki was floating on cloud fucking nine.

Was this what sheer bliss felt like? If so, he never wanted to come down—ever.

When he wasn't leaving a voicemail in Aizawa's mailbox, the rest of the day passed by in a haze.

He and Izuku held hands the entire time, probably radiating a disgustingly sweet aura wherever they went. But Katsuki didn't give a shit. He didn't want to let go, so he didn't. He held Izuku's hand in the hallway. Then again on their way to lunch. And again throughout the meal.

He kept sneaking glances like a lovesick fool. And every time Izuku caught him, he blushed the prettiest goddamn pink Katsuki had ever seen.

Fuck. He was done for. Absolutely, stupidly gone.

Everyone else at the table faded into background noise as he started free-falling into daydreams about the future. He fed Izuku his strawberries and began picturing them berry picking together. Izuku lit up every time the sweet fruit hit his tongue. Katsuki made a mental note to keep Izuku fed strawberries all his life.

But then their little honeymoon daze shattered when someone mentioned a bet.

Apparently, the bathhouse employees had been trying to guess what they were to each other?

He bit back a snarl when he realized how nosy they all were.

"I guessed best friends," Takeyama admitted with a smile, her chin propped in her hand as she leaned forward. "But now I'm unsure. I don't think best friends feed each other like that."

Sekijiro, massive and red-faced with amusement, barked a laugh. "I guessed boyfriends of the sorts with a complicated past. I see the way you two are with each other. It's very soft."

"I think you two are exes," Ryoku added bluntly, arms crossed. "Not to be rude but the tension was thick enough to cut with a knife. It was choking us all for the last week on top of everything."

"So—which is it?" Takeyama pressed, her voice light, but her curiosity sharp.

Katsuki and Izuku sat frozen in place, mid-bite.

They both blinked as if they'd been caught in some kind of weird domestic sting operation. They glanced at each other helplessly. Izuku gave a tiny shrug, surrendering without a word. Katsuki exhaled through his nose, rubbed at his cheek, and muttered under his breath like it pained him.

“Well,” Katsuki mumbled. “None of those, technically. We’re legally married so we would be classified as husbands, I suppose.”

The table erupted.

“Oh my god! What!” Nemuri nearly shouted.

Her voice bounced off the walls and earned glances from nearby tables.

Takeyama’s eyes bulged. Her mouth parted in silent shock. Sekijiro looked seconds away from climbing over the table. Ryoku just hummed as though it all made sense now. Then, with the smugness of a man about to win a long-standing bet, Sekijiro turned to Ryoku and held out his hand.

“Pay up,” he commanded, grinning ear to ear. “Guessing that they were boyfriends was close enough.”

Ryoku shoved his hand away with a snort. “Absolutely not. Married is not the same as dating.”

“Wait, you’re really married?” Nemuri asked, eyes scanning them. “For how long?”

“I—I guess about five months now,” Izuku answered, cheeks red as he turned toward Katsuki.

Katsuki glanced down at him, eyes sweeping lazily over his legal spouse like he was the luckiest bastard alive. His lips curled into a little smile as he soaked Izuku in.

“But we’ve known each other a long time,” Izuku added, voice gentler now.

“Ah, so you’re still newlyweds,” Takeyama cooed, her hands clasped under her chin like she was watching the build up of a romantic drama. “This is so cute. You must tell me about your first date. I always love hearing about them when people are married.”

Izuku froze. Katsuki stiffened.

They hadn’t had a first date—not in the traditional sense. Their love story was a chaotic tangle of shared trauma. But, for some reason, the concept of never having a first date bothered Katsuki. Especially given how much of a romantic Izuku was.

“Our timeline has been complicated given, y’know, life circumstances,” Katsuki bit out.

His voice snapped sharp with a sudden defensiveness that screamed ‘back off’. Thankfully, the message landed. The room shifted. Takeyama and Sekijiro quickly redirected the conversation, gushing over what a cute couple they made, their words light but sincere. Ryoku simply smiled quietly, watching them with a calm acceptance.

As everyone talked, Katsuki let his mind wander.

He quietly questioned, did any of what they'd been through count as dates? That entire week in Okinawa felt like one endless pink-hued date. The estate was practically a four-month-long, non-stop courtship with sex scattered like punctuation marks between the days.

He deviously smiled a bit at those memories. He and Izuku had really great sexual chemistry.

Honestly, Katsuki felt like they'd been in a relationship for much longer than five months. Even during all the bullshit with the masquerade and after. And deep down, Katsuki didn't need some stiff formal 'proposal' or ceremony to make it real to him.

But he knew Izuku would want that.

He stole a glance at his legal spouse out his peripheral.

There was a small hint of longing inside of Izuku's eyes.

☽ ☽ ☽

After lunch, they split off to start the second half of their day.

Izuku was dragged into the back rooms with Nemuri for organization duty. She insisted she needed the nerd's precision for reorganizing the supply shelves. His meticulous notes from their first shift hadn't gone unnoticed. And Nemuri, ever the opportunist, put his talents to work.

Meanwhile, Katsuki got saddled with Sekijiro for inventory duty. Mostly because the two of them were built like battering rams and could haul the heavier crates without breaking a sweat.

Katsuki didn't mind. Manual labor was mindless and grounding for him. Which was exactly what he needed with the warm buzz of his decision to leave with Izuku and Nana still swimming in his head.

He tossed boxes of tiles and back-stocked equipment into place without much thought. He worked through the motions with clean efficiency. But every few minutes, he caught Sekijiro sneaking glances at him out of the corner of his eye.

The first time, Katsuki ignored it. The second and third, he clenched his jaw. By the sixth, his patience, already thin on a good day, finally snapped.

He dropped the next heavy box with a resounding thud that rattled the floor.

He straightened and turned with a sharp, unimpressed glare.

"If you got something to say, then say it," Katsuki snapped, tone flat and unfriendly.

"Oh! Sorry," Sekijiro laughed, scratching the back of his neck. He smiled with a guilty charm. "Didn't mean to stare. Got caught being nosy, huh?"

Katsuki narrowed his eyes. "Nosy's a generous word."

“I’ll own that,” Sekijiro chuckled, raising both palms like a man caught red-handed. “But if I ask something, you gonna deck me or answer?”

Katsuki rolled his eyes and huffed. “Depends on the question.”

Sekijiro grinned. “Fair enough.”

Katsuki waved a hand, already regretting this. “Fine. Ask.”

“You said earlier that your timeline with Izuku was complicated.” Sekijiro’s smile faded. His voice dropped and he spoke slower, treading carefully. “What did you mean by that?”

Katsuki froze. His arms slowly dropped to his sides, and he glanced around the room at the towers of boxes.

“Oh, erm.” He scratched behind his head, unsure. “It’s been a lot of…”

Violent miscommunication? Endless, passionate, hot sex?

“…back and forth,” he settled on with a grunt. “To say the least.”

“That boy loves you a lot, I can see it in his eyes,” Sekijiro pointed out. “But I can also see he’s longing for something more. That usually means something unpleasant has likely happened, yeah? Have you gotten the chance to make sure he knows how much you love him?”

The question hit Katsuki faster than he could brace for. Instantly, he flashed back to tracking Izuku down and slamming him into the motel room mirror.

Katsuki winced.

“There’s room for improvement,” he mumbled.

“How so?”

Katsuki shifted his stance, already regretting opening up. But whenever it came to Izuku, his heart felt like it was on a stage for the world to see.

“I’m not exactly the lovey-dovey type,” he said, giving an inch of vulnerability. “I suck with words. So all that romantic crap doesn’t come easy.”

“But you’re trying?” Sekijiro asked.

Katsuki scratched the back of his neck. “Yeah. Izuku likes that stuff, so I’m trying to get better. I dunno, maybe I’ll learn how to write poetry or some shit for him.”

Sekijiro beamed. “You don’t need poetry. If you’re not good with words, use action.”

Katsuki paused. “Huh?”

“Romance isn’t about saying the right thing,” he lectured, voice warm with conviction. “It’s about doing the right thing. Expressing yourself with gestures.”

“What do you mean by gestures?”

“Big romantic ones,” Sekijiro exclaimed proudly. “My husband’s a hopeless romantic too! So I cook for him. He loves it when I cook for him. I make massive meals with hours of prep. To him, it’s not about the food, but it’s about the effort. That’s what people fall in love with—the intention.”

Katsuki blinked. “I guess that makes sense. I just...wouldn’t know where to start with being mushy.”

“Then don’t think of it as mushy. Think of it as honoring him. Romance is an act of respect. A good marriage is built on that. Day by day.”

Damn. It seemed like this guy knew what he was talking about.

Nervously, Katsuki’s brow furrowed and he looked Sekijiro up and down. He never would have guessed such an intimidating man like him would be into lovey-dovey stuff. But in the back of Katsuki’s head, he really wanted to know how to keep Izuku happy.

He licked his lips and curiously asked, “You and your husband have been together long?”

“Over twenty years,” Sekijiro answered proudly.

Katsuki nodded. He wanted a marriage like that.

“Impressive.” Katsuki paused, quieter now. “I...I like the idea of honoring Izuku. I think I could be good at that.”

“You already are,” Sekijiro reassured. “I can tell. But the best way to do it is go on dates. That’s the glue. Don’t ever stop dating him.”

Katsuki scrunched his nose. “Dates?”

Sekijiro laughed, loud and boisterous. “Don’t tell me you two haven’t done a proper date night?”

Katsuki cringed. “Not exactly.”

“Ah, young stupid love,” Sekijiro teased. “You should never stop dating your spouse. That’s how you fall in love with every version of them as they change. They’ll evolve over the years, and if you don’t keep showing up for each other, you’ll miss those changes. You’ll also miss the chance to change as well.”

“Hah? What do you mean?” Katsuki tilted his head. “Dates can change me?”

“They can.” Sekijiro's expression softened. “There’s a quote by Dostoevsky: ‘I fell in love because I needed it to destroy who I used to be’.”

Katsuki went still. The words hung in the air.

Destroy who I used to be.

He looked down at his hands. He saw the calluses, scars, and the invisible blood that stained his hands scarlet.

“That’s...kinda beautiful,” Katsuki admitted reluctantly.

Sekijiro nodded. “Let love be the thing that transforms you. If you want to change—if you want to become someone better—then love. Love’s powerful like that. It’ll shape you. It’s just a matter of which way you let it.”

Katsuki huffed a short laugh. “Damn. That was poetic as hell. I wish I was half as good with words as you are.”

“Hah! You’ll get there,” Sekijiro chuckled. “My husband’s like you. Grumpy as hell, but a total softie under it all.”

Katsuki hesitated. “Uh…hope it’s not rude to ask, but…where is your husband? I figured you were with Ryouko or Takeyama. You all seem tight.”

Sekijiro chuckled, bittersweet. “They’re his cousins. We’re all staying here with Nemuri while we lay low.”

“Hate to pry again, but, what do you mean lay low?”

Sekijiro sighed deeply and set down the box he’d been holding. His gaze drifted to the far wall, distant.

“My husband’s in the Philippines, waiting on us. His family owed an old, large debt to the Sumiyoshi-kai. Before the Chisakis brutally absorbed them.”

Katsuki's stomach turned. He had a feeling he knew where this was going.

Sekijiro continued, quieter now. “His father had a deal worked out with the old leader. But when the Chisaki heir took over, he wiped the books. He cleared all the old debts to start his kingdom fresh. Unfortunately, that meant killing everyone who couldn’t pay up then and there. The Chisakis decided to murder his whole family.”

Katsuki clenched his fists, feeling that dark part of him stir yet again.

“The Chisakis are fucking disgusting,” he spat.

“They are,” Sekijiro agreed darkly. “They don’t forget anything. No matter how big or small the grievance. Ryouko and Takeyama were the only of my husband’s cousins who made it out. We ran with help, and Nemuri hid us here. We’re trying to get to the Philippines, but… the Yakuza have long memories and wide reaches. It’s impossible for us to get out of the country without triggering something.”

Katsuki's voice dropped. He fixed Sekijiro a very serious stare.

"There's a woman who helps people leave when it gets too dangerous," he whispered. "That's who me and Izuku are going to for help as well because we have a similar issue."

"Nana?" Sekijiro smiled faintly. "Yeah. We've heard of her."

Katsuki's eyes widened. "You know her?"

"Not yet. But we'll be leaving with her once the last of my husband's family makes it to Midnight Sento. You see, we are waiting on his mother. She's a retired eradicator, tough as nails. Her body wasn't found that night, and Nemuri swears she's alive. She's the one who tipped us off before the bloodbath."

Katsuki was silent. The story settled like a ton of bricks over his chest. Suddenly, his own problems didn't feel quite so unsolvable anymore—and he realized how many lives the Yakuza fucked up.

His mother was just a drop in the ocean of blood the Yakuza had spilled.

Sekijiro then shook his head, sighed, and smoothed out his shirt.

"But back to what I was saying," he said, pushing himself forward. "Run into love and go on dates. I think it'll help a lot."

Katsuki hesitantly smiled. "Alright. I'll try."

They continued on their shift, and the small lecture stuck deep in his thoughts.

When they finished, Sekijiro left him, but his advice did not.

Katsuki strolled around the area as he wondered how to begin asking Izuku on a date. He tried to think what type of date a cute nerd like Izuku would enjoy. He immediately got a few ideas, but groaned when he realized they were stuck in this damn bathhouse until further notice.

Right as he was brainstorming, he stumbled in the back of a storage closet. He stopped when he found flowers that were meant for one of the sauna rooms. They were bright, yellow flowers all organized by type. Daffodils, marigolds and yellow roses.

Katsuki nervously stepped forward.

I ran into love because I needed it to destroy who I used to be.

Quietly, Katsuki began to assemble a bouquet.

☽ ☽ ☽

Asking Izuku on a date was the most natural thing Katsuki had ever done.

The words slipped out like they'd been waiting on his tongue since Vienna.

Izuku lit up at the offer. He clutched the little bouquet of yellow flowers Katsuki handed over like it was made of gold. When Izuku blushed and smiled, the tension deep inside Katsuki finally exhaled.

The storm cloud hovering over Izuku seemed to part for a moment. It gave way to a bright smile as pure as sunlight. And just like that, the ache inside Katsuki's chest lifted a bit more. It elevated with another stitch sewn across his heart from acts of love.

He went all out for the date. He booked one of the more intimate sauna rooms at Midnight Sento, the galaxy room that reflected stars that were similar to Izuku's freckles.

He'd even asked Sekijiro for help at dinner. He specifically requested one of those "meals made with love" the older man bragged about cooking for his husband. Sekijiro practically screamed with joy at the request, beaming with pride as he prepared every dish like it was a royal banquet.

When Izuku walked in and saw the setup, he gasped.

The whole room was dark enough that it allowed the projected constellations to shine. In the middle of the room on top of a plush black comforter was a kotatsu bearing a purple blanket. Three candles sat in the center and already on the tabletop a delicious meal of various fish, vegetables, and steak was laid out.

"This is amazing," Izuku whispered.

He then smiled like he'd been handed the world. And Katsuki realized, that was all he wanted.

Later, they slipped into one of the bathhouse's tubs Katsuki had reserved.

He transformed it into a bubble bath and sprinkled it with herbal oils. He put candles around it, and gave it that super mushy atmosphere. Once they got in, the water instantly soothed every knot of tension from their muscles.

Katsuki grinned at the sound Izuku made as he sank into the heat. He then reached beneath the surface and took Izuku's leg into his lap. His fingers pressed gently into the tired, freckled skin. He kneaded with care, putting enough pressure to coax soft moans from Izuku's lips. He watched as Izuku's eyes fluttered shut and his lashes kissed his cheeks.

Izuku's head tilted back with a sigh of utter peace.

Then he leaned fully into Katsuki, back pressing into his chest, arms resting on Katsuki's thighs. And in that quiet moment, with skin against skin, Katsuki could have thought of no better time than to ask.

"Well, I guess that leaves one more question for the night," Katsuki whispered in a low voice. "Will you officially be mine, Izuku? If you say no, I get it. I won't be mad."

Izuku smirked up at Katsuki and poked his cheek.

“Ah, I don’t know. It is only the first date,” Izuku teased, lightening the mood. “You already have me naked in a bubble bath massaging my legs. Don’t you think we’re moving a bit too fast?”

Katsuki shrugged. “We’ll move at whatever pace you like.”

“Then of course, I would love to be yours,” Izuku replied joyfully. “Will you be mine as well?”

What a dumb question, Katsuki thought.

“I’ve always been yours.”

Izuku’s eyes filled with an endless amount of love. Katsuki returned it back tenfold. Slowly, Izuku sat up from his position and turned around to face Katsuki. Protective arms wrapped around his body and held him closely. Tangible amount of adoration filled the room as Izuku leaned his weight lightly on top of Katsuki with a soft grin.

“So should I call you my husband or my boyfriend now?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki scoffed. “Husband for sure. There’s no way in hell I’m getting downgraded to boyfriend.”

“Okay, good. I’m happy to hear that because I think husband suits you.”

“Damn right it does,” Katsuki replied happily. “It suits you too, Bakugou Izuku.”

☽ ☽ ☽

The next week bled by quicker than Katsuki thought it would. It started with a kiss on the cheek that lingered just a second longer than expected. And after that, the days seemed to slip into each other like pieces of a puzzle finally falling into place.

Katsuki hadn’t meant to fill an entire week with dates, it just happened.

It was like the floodgates were open and he couldn’t stop proposing more dates to the nerd. Or should he say his husband? Heh. His nerdy husband. That had a ring to it.

He asked his nerdy husband on more dates and it flowed like water. It was like one moment they were sitting beside each other under the stars in the galaxy room and the next they were walking through the backyard of the bathhouse hand in hand to enjoy some fresh air.

One morning, he dragged Izuku out of bed before the sun could rise.

He wanted to see it paint the sky from the top of the bathhouse roof. Izuku came with him, half asleep and yawning. He was wrapped in one of Katsuki’s hoodies that swallowed his hands. He looked like a sleepy little puppy and Katsuki could barely breathe because of how badly he wanted to kiss him.

“You’re insane for this, Kacchan,” Izuku mumbled, shivering as he pulled the hood tighter.

Katsuki shrugged, coffee in one hand, the other already reaching to warm Izuku’s fingers.

“Yeah,” he replied. “But you’re just as insane.”

Izuku huffed. He didn’t disagree and he didn’t let go of Katsuki’s hand for the rest of the morning.

After that, it became the pattern.

They went on walks around the building in the late afternoon when the world was sleepy and orange around the edges. Izuku told him things he hadn’t heard before. Like how between assignments he used to feed stray cats with his sister Ibara. Or how he always wanted to learn Arabic just to read one of his favorite love poems in its native tongue.

Katsuki listened. He hung intently on every word like they mattered more than anything else he could’ve done that day.

“You know,” Izuku chuckled one afternoon, pushing a piece of takoyaki toward him, “I think I forgot what it feels like to laugh like this.”

Katsuki watched him smile. “Then I’ll remind you every day.”

He meant it—and he proved it.

One date bled into the next. A movie night with snacks as they holed up in the living room area. A lazy morning where they made pancakes too thick and burned half of them because Izuku kept laughing when Katsuki swore at the batter.

Then they had an evening where they didn’t talk at all, just laid side by side and let the silence say everything.

All the while, Izuku was changing. Light returned to his eyes and the stiffness in his shoulders eased. Katsuki noted his laughter was coming easier, like he was letting the pain ebb out slowly.

Katsuki felt it too. The broken heart inside him, once controlled by violence and grief, began to pulse again. The stitched seams of his heart weren’t just healing—they were reforming. He was changing a bit, exactly like Sekijiro said.

“Do you ever think we’ve…always been this?” Izuku asked him late one night as they lay under a shared blanket in the lounge room, the one with the big window that looked out at the sky.

Katsuki looked over. Izuku’s freckles were dusted with starlight. His green eyes shone like glass. He was curled into Katsuki’s side like he’d belonged there forever.

“Yeah,” he whispered. “I think we’ve always been each other’s person. Just didn’t see it till now.”

Izuku smiled against his shoulder. “I see it now.”

So did he.

He saw it in the way Izuku reached for his hand across the dinner table.

He saw it in the way he leaned in for kisses without asking.

He saw it in the way Katsuki found himself looking at Izuku and immediately thought ‘there you are’, like he’d been searching for him his whole damn life.

And every date, every shared meal, every soft word between them carved a path forward through his grief. He worked himself through it rather than around it.

Together, on the nights that felt too heavy, Izuku helped him lift his pain.

One night, Izuku took him to the roof to count stars to take his mind off of it. He really liked that night, and he learned Izuku did that on days he missed Hiryu.

Then another night, when Katsuki found himself sad about his mom and unable to sleep, Izuku noticed and stayed up with him. Izuku listened to him pour his heart out and talk about another memory that greeted him. One that was when he was a kid and he had to spend so much time alone, walking door to door begging for a job.

After he got that off his chest, Izuku took his hand and lifted him up.

They snuck into one of the unused sauna rooms that night. Everyone was asleep, and no one was a witness to their quiet mischief. Izuku took extra blankets from storage and made a fort. He filled it with childhood like snacks from the staff pantry. Choco pies, shrimp chips, and strawberry milk.

Katsuki stared in wonder as Izuku gestured to him inside the blanket fort.

“C’mon, Kacchan,” Izuku whispered like they would get in trouble if they got caught. “I think this will make you feel better.”

And it did. They spent hours there, lying side by side. Their feet tangled as they played card games and made up new rules every five minutes just to win against each other.

“You’re such a sore loser,” Katsuki teased, flicking a Pocky stick at Izuku’s forehead.

Izuku grinned and blushed. “You’re lucky I like you.”

Katsuki smiled, absolutely feeling lucky. He leaned in with half lidded eyes and Izuku leaned in too. They shared a soft kiss that tasted like sugary treats. Katsuki pushed in, deepening the connection. When they pulled back, they both were wearing twin blushes that matched.

“Did this make you feel better?” Izuku whispered.

“It did. Thank you.”

That night, Katsuki went to sleep happily in the fort with Izuku. They got yelled at later by Nemuri, but they both took the lecture in stride. The very next day they did it again but made sure to clean up before anyone found them.

By the end of the week, Katsuki loved the concept of dates.

He always believed he was too rough to deserve things like this.

But with Izuku, he wasn't just worthy—he felt like he was meant to be this soft.

That annoying concept of fate trickled in again during this week. It shone in front of him every time Izuku's dimples poked through. Katsuki didn't feel comfortable saying that word out loud yet. But Katsuki was already sure of one thing:

He was falling.

But really, he always had been.

☽ ☽ ☽

By the end of the second week, the two husbands were happily in bliss.

Katsuki noticed that Izuku stopped picking at his thumbs. It made him glad to see Izuku was rebalancing. But even better, he was also opening up more easily about his life at The Viper Academy.

Sometimes they talked about it, and he eagerly listened to all the different stories Izuku had of his siblings. It seemed like Izuku was particularly close with the two he had to kill the night of the Scarlet Masquerade, Ibara and Aoyama. Which made it all the more damn depressing.

But Izuku was able to talk about it, which is what was really important to Katsuki.

They were now in the bathhouse all by themselves. Everyone else went down to the port to watch some fireworks. They were invited but declined. They both still felt too uneasy to leave the safety of the bathhouse.

They sat down on the ledge of the window that jutted out in one of the Sauna Rooms.

The two of them faced each other, knees lightly touching. The window they were looking out of was big enough to nearly cover the whole wall. Nemuri had suggested they go here to view the fireworks, and she was right. It gave a perfect view of the sky near the sea.

Izuku leaned against the window, soaking in the cool surface that contrasted the humidity in the room.

Katsuki studied him pensively.

He looked down at Izuku's thumbs and saw they were no longer red. As a couple, they were more steady this week. He guessed this was a better time than any to come clean about the deal. Katsuki nervously toyed with his hands. He was beyond terrified.

He didn't want to hurt Izuku, but he didn't want to keep this secret hidden.

Izuku turned to him then, sensing the shift of mood.

"Is something the matter, Kacchan?" Izuku asked.

Katsuki opened his mouth and then closed it. His brows furrowed together, and pain struck across his face.

"I'm…I'm really fucking sorry, Izuku," Katsuki whispered.

"Sorry for what?" Izuku asked for clarification.

"I'm sorry for blaming you, for hunting you, and for trying to hurt you," Katsuki confessed. "I'm so goddamn sorry."

He shuffled in closer, and prepared for the blow he was about to land to their newly mended relationship. He searched Izuku's eyes and his heart rate increased. Izuku looked so lost and confused. Fuck. This was going to hurt him so much.

Swallowing his shame, Katsuki held Izuku's hand.

"My stupid ass anger blinded me," Katsuki continued. His eyes teared up as he searched Izuku's beautiful freckles. "I lost control and I wound up becoming something I never wanted to be—I kept…I kept forcing myself to hunt you despite this voice screaming in my head not to the whole time."

"It's okay, Kacchan. I forgive you," Izuku replied, a little too easily for Katsuki's liking. "Between Tomura and Himiko, the situation was manipulated beyond our control. If I hadn't listened to Tomura, Himiko wouldn't have been able to steal my letter. I don't blame you at all for the way you snapped."

"But you should blame me," Katsuki insisted. His eyes pleaded for a lick of hate from this all too forgiving man. "My temper is so fucking bad sometimes, especially when it comes to my mother. She's always been the biggest trigger for my rage, and I exploded exactly like my old supervisor thought I would. And he was fucking right—I did take it out on someone I didn't want to."

Suddenly, a wave of tears glossed Izuku's eyes.

Fuck. Katsuki's heart began to twist when Izuku's face crumbled a little—and he hadn't even gotten to the part about his deal with the damn devil.

But still, he pushed forward.

"And Izuku—I-I almost—fuck." A small tear rolled out of Katsuki's eye. "I almost killed you. And then I nearly made a really bad fucking mistake—"

“—but you didn't kill me,” Izuku interrupted stubbornly.

Katsuki shook his head. “No, that’s not what I’m saying. I’m saying that I nearly—”

“—Kacchan, please. Listen to me,” Izuku cut him off again. He took a deep breath and Katsuki’s heart churned when he felt the trembles come through their intertwined fingers. “Do you still want to hurt me?”

“Of course not,” Katsuki replied.

“Do you think you’re still capable of hurting me?”

“No. I could never.”

“Then we’re okay,” Izuku whispered.

He lifted a hand to wipe the lone tear from Katsuki’s cheek. Katsuki screwed his eyes shut in pain because why. Why was Izuku always so damn sweet?

Coming clean felt impossible when the person he loved so much didn’t deserve any of the shit he went through. He took another sharp breath in and opened his eyes. He tried one more time.

But Izuku spoke first. And it came across as if he was desperate.

“What’s in the past, let’s leave it in the past,” Izuku pushed, his eyes pleading for them to go back to their happy state. “The fact that you couldn’t go through with it despite having a perfectly good reason too, shows what’s inside of your heart. I mean, Katsuki. I killed your mother.”

Izuku began to cry again, and Katsuki’s heart sank when he felt Izuku attempt to self-soothe.

“That’s not a small thing,” Izuku whispered, full of shame. “But even without hearing about my life, you still couldn’t kill me. T-That speaks volumes in my opinion. You didn’t even need to know about the letter or how I was brought up to not kill me.”

Katsuki wearily looked down to their hands.

He saw his husband subconsciously pick at one of his thumbs.

“Izuku…” Katsuki mournfully murmured. “I think you’re brushing this off too quickly.”

“Maybe I am,” Izuku whispered. “But we could both be caught in an endless spiral of sorrys if we’re not careful. At the end of the day, all that matters to me is that you couldn’t do it.” He smiled sadly. “I tried very, very hard to kill you in Taiwan. B-But I couldn’t. I wanted to kill you; hell I wished you died in Vienna right after I left you there to bleed out.”

Katsuki shook his head. “But that’s not the same—”

"—It is. And if we keep punishing ourselves, we're never going to be happy. Don't you want to be happy together?"

"Yes…I want to be happy with you so badly."

"Then let's."

It struck Katsuki then that Izuku was sidestepping the harder conversations. They'd finally gotten to a better spot, but Izuku didn't want to leave it.

He could see the despair in his husband. The way he clung to their newly found happiness with the same desperation of someone who had just stumbled into a sun-drenched clearing after days lost in the woods. Izuku had found his sunspot—and he wasn't ready to leave it.

But to reach the other side, where endless sun awaited, Izuku would have to venture back into that dark forest of thought. However, right now, Izuku wanted to stand still.

Katsuki wondered what would be more selfish: pushing Izuku back into that forest by coming clean or allowing him to be ignorant to his mistake a little longer?

He honestly didn't know.

"The truth is we both hurt each other, in so many ways," Izuku said sadly. They met unwavering gazes and both of them were saturated with guilt. "We betrayed each other, we broke each other's hearts. And on several occasions have shot, stabbed and, in my case, poisoned each other. But all I want now is to start over because we're at such a good spot. We love each other so much, don't we?"

"We do," Katsuki agreed quietly. "I love you more than I ever thought was possible."

"And I feel the same." Izuku's eyes watered. "And I know our lives are all tangled up, but we can keep apologizing forever if we keep on like this. We're not too far from Nana now, and all I want is a clean slate. I know it's selfish because there's so many crimes I've committed, and I'm very much probably not worthy of a normal life. B-But I want it. I want to be normal, and I want to bury the past."

"You deserve all that, Izuku," Katsuki whispered.

"And you deserve it too, Kacchan. We can be sorry the rest of our lives or we can be happy together and try our best to leave the past in the past."

It was a silent plea.

Katsuki really wanted to talk more about what had happened between Biei and now. But the look in Izuku's eye was as if he was about to dive off the deep end. His husband was making it very damn clear that he didn't want to talk about how his life had blown up. And frankly, who was Katsuki to force him?

He knew he had full intentions of coming clean.

But maybe right now wasn't the time to do it.

He assessed Izuku one more time. Then, reluctantly, he resigned. He could do it once they were safely with Nana. At least then, Izuku would be less on edge.

He smiled the best he could and nodded.

"Okay," Katsuki whispered, voice laced with pain. "Past is in the past from here on out. I forgot you can be so damn wise."

"Only sometimes." Izuku smiled.

"More than sometimes."

He shifted their hands and completely covered the thumb that Izuku was picking at. He blocked the self destructive habit gently, stopping the tick without interrupting the moment.

Izuku smiled at him, glad that Katsuki wasn't pushing him.

Right on cue, the fireworks went off.

A crackle tore through the air like thunder. It was followed by bursts of blue, red, and violet that splashed across the sky. The colors rained down across the misted windows of the bathhouse, reflecting across the courtyard tiles like falling stars. Katsuki felt the echo of the sound rumble through his ribs.

They both tilted their heads up toward it, breath fogging faintly on the glass in front of them.

Their eyes fixed on the way the light split the sky open. The crackling filled every inch of silence, even inside their little world. The bathhouse trembled faintly with the noise, and yet it didn't feel intrusive. It felt like the world was making space for them.

Katsuki didn't say anything for a while. He simply watched. And he wondered, not for the first time, how this small town managed its grief. It was impressive the people here still found something to celebrate after everything they lost.

He wanted that strength. He wanted to take it and inject it into his bloodstream and never lose it again.

He squeezed Izuku's hand.

They turned to look at each other in the middle of it all. The soft shimmer of fireworks painted Izuku's face in fleeting streaks of crimson and gold. His freckles lit up like stardust.

"I love you, Izuku," Katsuki confessed, from the bottom of his heart.

"I love you too, Kacchan," Izuku replied, smiling.

Katsuki toyed with the idea of fate again, as he continued to stare at his husband.

If it was real, then his fate had something to do with Izuku. They've always been sewn together—every thread made sure to pull them back into each other's orbit, no matter how far they ran.

Maybe it was fate that Izuku pulled the trigger that night. Maybe it had to be him.

