Deathly Beautiful

by KyuukaKoinu

Summary

Katsuki always believed the first emotion he felt about the mysterious man was anger. Unchecked, pure fucking resentment. He thought the bitter emotion coursed through him like a raging river and struck lightning on every nerve he had.

But when he truly thought back on it—the first emotion he felt wasn’t anger. It wasn't even hate or mild dislike.

It was morbid curiosity.

Chapter 1: Da Capo

Chapter Notes

Hello! :D I come barring a fic that's been sitting in my WIP for a couple months as an outline. I'm really excited to write this one. ^^

This fic is Beta'd by the moon of my life, LunaToons on AO3 :) Enjoy!

I do not allow reposts or translations on Wattpad. If you're going to do a translation, please do so on AO3. Thank you.

Update note:

This turned out to be a monster ever bigger than I would have imagined. But I had a TON of fun doing it and I loved every second. If you want to start this fic but are intimated by the word count, that's totally understandable!

Something that helped me push through writing was breaking this down in chunks. This fic is essentially four "books" in one. If you want to pace yourself that way you can!

Part I: The Scarlet Eyed Killer (270k words) Chapters 1 - 16.
Part II: The Viridian Viper (190k words) Chapters 17 - 26.
Part III: The Dance (178k words) Chapters 27 - 37.
Part IV: The Lovebirds (246k) Chapters 38 - 53.

<3 I hope you enjoy the journey!

Chapter one — Da Capo

Katsuki knew it was going to be a shit assignment when Denki spilled coffee on his dress shirt right after he got the folder. He should've fucking guessed something was wrong the moment all the stars began misaligning for him.

First off, the mission itself was absolutely trash. He knew it the second he was handed that godforsaken dark green folder. The red wax emblem sealing it was practically taunting him. When he tore it open, just as he suspected, it was vanilla as fuck. He skimmed for the yellow highlighted details and he snorted out loud.

He had to be a bodyguard.

Katsuki was more than well equipped to be something other than a goddamn bodyguard. His track record and portfolio included a lot more high profile type of jobs but at this point in his career, he'd take what he could get.

His last green folder assignment was mildly compromised because he let his temper flare out of control and mouthed off to the wrong people. Now this was his punishment—working this shit green folder jobs until he could prove that he was able to keep his temper under control.

The Company dispatched him that same night with his equipment on a private jet. His leather suitcase was filled with several guns, tasers, and knives—the usual go to things. He kept in an annoyed grunt when his boss, Aizawa Shouta, gave him that look™ before he was sent off.

"Don't mess this up, Bakugou," his supervisor's voice dragged out. His eyebrow twitched several times while staring at him. "We really need to make sure this client is happy if we want to ensure future relationships with his connections."

"Yeah yeah, I got it old man," Katsuki grumbled underneath his breath while he casually spun his favorite stainless blade in his fingers. "You know damn well I'll make sure whatever crooked bastard is safe."

"I don't think we're in the right business to be calling anyone crooked, but that's the right mindset. Don't fuck this up for us. I mean it—keep that hot headed temper of yours under control this time."

Katsuki nodded reluctantly while maintaining eye contact with Aizawa's bloodshot eyes. He put his blade away while he resisted the deeply strong urge to roll his eyes. His boss was so clearly sleep deprived—yet again. It made Katsuki wonder if there was ever a day where the damn man wasn't tired?

He was handed a small list of people's names he needed to memorize on the sixteen hour flight to Madrid along with all their pictures. Everyone on the list he was meant to protect was extremely serious looking with sharp eyes and frowns. The head boss who he was assigned to watch over was the most serious looking of them all.

Mr. Aguado.

He had dark honey brown eyes and exactly three forehead creases across his fair skin. His midnight black hair was streaked with dark grey hairs that congregated in the front and the deep, grotesque scar gashed above his left eye hinted at an unknown story. Katsuki filled in a blank in his mind: whoever gave him that nasty mark, Katsuki was sure wasn't alive.

The details of the mission were simple and straightforward: he had to be Mr. Aguado's bodyguard for a single night. His job was to keep everything peaceful as the 'business' leader negotiated over underground poker games in Madrid at one of his sketchy private clubs.

There were no other details and truthfully, Katsuki didn't want or need them. Whatever this man did was his business and at the end of the day Katsuki only wanted to get paid so he could hit his contract's quota and possibly get the hell out of this lifestyle.

His 26th birthday was nearing and Katsuki was admittedly damn tired.

He had signed up for this career when he was a poor, homeless teenager knowing that it would trap him for a total of ten years. Originally, all he cared about was the lucrative income because he thought this was something that he wanted. The excitement that came with danger and crime was addictive and he was no stranger to the burden of murder at a young age.

He had a lot to give to The Company because he never once batted an eye at the under the table commands that were coupled with a loaded sniper gun and black ski mask. He did what he was told and he did it efficiently so that he could go home later that night with a large amount of yen transferred into his bank account.

But in the past five years, a lot changed.

The more blood that was spilled by his hands, it stayed washed over him like an invisible layer that never truly vanished. Especially with what had happened when he was twenty. His whole universe warped, shifting to a dull black and white view of the world and all the color in it was stolen away from him.

After that, every work day felt like a chore. Living was significantly harder for him. Killing became less of a passion and more of a reluctant pass time that kept his pockets padded. It was as if the blood he spilled on himself was permanently stained against his skin whether he liked it or not and he found himself numbing his emotions whenever he was given a new red folder.

Red always meant the job ended in lethality. Green meant protecting a mark with minimal casualties. Yellow was a mix of both and a wild card.

But with his skill set, he was almost always exclusively given red folders that matched the same color of his eyes. Many of his fellow colleagues gave him the nickname 'The Scarlet Eyed Killer' because of how many bodies were under his belt by the time he was twenty years old.

At that time, the body count was exactly four times his age but now, five years later, it had exponentially increased—along with his kill shot accuracy. He was rivaled by no one in The Company and now his reputation far past preceded him in their internal affairs. He had only ever met one other person who came close to the same amount of skills as him——but he wasn't about to think about that goddamn nuisance.

A flash of bright green eyes and a taunting smile on pink lips appeared in his mind.

Katsuki felt his jaw automatically clench painfully at the thought of that strangely strong short bastard who had been a certified thorn in his ass for nearly a decade. He heavily huffed when he realized just thinking about that personification of an inconvenience made his fucking body tense.

But he concluded he was on his way to Madrid, Spain and his muscles relaxed slowly.

There was no fucking way he would have another run in with him there—the chance were slim. Ultra slim. From what he gathered, whoever the damn guy was, he operated mainly in Japan and he's only ever run into him out of the country three times within the last eight years that they knew each other—or—er, knew of each other.

Katsuki ground his teeth together and tried to wash away the feeling of freckles trickling into his thoughts.

By the time nightfall came, Katsuki laid in the small bed silently staring up at the plain cream colored roof of the jet. He pulled out his stainless blade that he's had with him ever since he started this career and stared at it emptily.

The handle fit perfectly in his large, calloused hand and the blade was short enough to deliver swift, lethal blows without being too noticeable by whoever he was up against. The ends of the handle were carefully trimmed in gold and on one side of black handle his name was choppily engraved on it and the other side, his mother's.

His dark red eyes studied the reflection of himself through the metal of his blade pensively.

He noted the dark bags under his eyes, the semi-permanent frown on his lips and how his light blond hair was tousled slightly against the plain colored pillow underneath his head. He turned his head slightly to get a better look at his strong jawline and his brows pinched together.

He looked just like her now—undeniably so. If someone was to stop him on the streets in Tokyo and ask if he was 'Mitsuki's boy' he wouldn't even deny it because it'd be so stupid to even try deflecting. His mind briefly wondered if his own reflection is what really kept him going these last five years or if it was the reason why he was feeling burnt out now.

A weight inside of Katsuki's chest suddenly appeared at the thought of his mother and instantly tripled when the sour memory of her bloodied body pushed forward to the front of his mind. The young adult shook his head softly and re-sleeved his blade before turning over and closing his eyes.

He had to focus on his assignment.

When his jet landed at the private air station in Spain he was greeted by Mr. Aguado's pointed smile.

The corners of the man's lips stretched from ear to ear and a deep, delighted chuckle bubbled up from his chest. The man was larger than he expected and came up to nearly meet Katsuki's 6'3" height. Mr. Aguado's greedy smile looked beyond grateful that he was here and he gripped Katsuki's shoulders simultaneously securely and threateningly with excitement.

"I'm thrilled that I can have you join us tonight, Mr. Bakugou!" Mr. Aguado greeted as he proudly clasped Katsuki's right hand in between his two. Sharp red eyes darted down to see all the different expensive gold and silver rings decorating the elder man's hands.

Yup. There it fucking was.

That was the distinctive hint that Mr. Aquado was a crime lord of sorts.

Katsuki held back a scowl as he gripped the handshake tighter. He felt himself grow downright exhausted when he realized that he might end up killing someone within the next couple hours whether he wanted to or not. Shit with crime lords was always sloppy. He preferred the politicians or world leaders who requested his services much more.

"I'm glad to be of service," Katsuki replied in a curt tone as he eyed the other two large bodyguards. "I'll make sure nothing happens to you while you're doing your negotiations."

"I have no doubts you'll be fucking amazing," the elder man laughed heartily. "I took a close look at your portfolio before we came and I must say, the job you did in Vienna several years ago had me sold on you. You're definitely the right person for this job."

Katsuki resisted rolling his eyes and kept his plastic smile plastered across his face to the point he nearly gagged. Vienna was a nightmare in reality but on paper it was fine—no one knew what had actually occurred.

It unfortunately was where he met that broccoli looking motherfucker.

Whenever he thought of his old Vienna assignment he got so immensely pissed off. And he thought about it every damn day thanks to the bullet three scars in his left bicep he had to look at every time he showered. The son of a bitch had near perfect aim with a gun.

The conversation transitioned easily as Aguado's men took his things and Katsuki was briefed on what would be happening. Aguado had several intensely important deals to make starting at 23:00 sharp with rather high profile people in a sketchy underground that was controlled by his partner. Katsuki's job was to make sure no one who might think Mr. Aguado would look better with a bullet in his chest actually succeeded in doing so.

From the gist of what Katsuki was getting—it seemed like there were a lot of people who wanted to see Aguado pumped full of lead. But he didn't think too hard about it. When he was given that green folder in the Japan headquarters, he knew what it meant: as little casualties as possible to make sure no attention was brought to them.

His shift started immediately and soon he found himself walking towards a crowded club called 'The Sapphire' and it was overflowing with expensive looking people. Blue, purple and pink neon colors lined the night club and there was a strict dress code everyone had to adhere to that seemed to be cool colors only.

When they walked in all the way, effectively cutting the line wrapping around the building, Katsuki's eyebrows raised up in surprise. Well goddamn he thought to himself as his hand adjusted his blade into the secret pocket inside his blazer.

Overall the place was higher class than Katsuki anticipated and he was happy he'd packed his better-looking clothes for this assignment. He had changed into an all neatly tailored black suit with a jet-black silk dress shirt to go underneath his blazer and his golden stud earring to match his watch.

The ceiling of the club was black, blue with decorative gold etchings of various patterns. Waiters and waitresses were bustling around with blue bowties, white dress shirts and black vests, the club's uniform Katsuki put together. The music inside was medium noise where he could still hear the two other guards next to him chatter but the deep vibrations emitting from the speakers rumbled through him.

The smell of gin and whiskey assaulted his senses and he scrunched his nose up when they entered into the V.I.P section of the club. It was sectioned off by red rope and attractive men and women were casually seated all around fawning over the several powerful looking people gathered around the poker table.

Red eyes glanced over the dense crowd as he stood behind Aguado like a dutiful soldier with his hands neatly placed in front of him. The two other bodyguards stood next to him on either side as the next seated at the table began their coded conversation and Katsuki tuned out completely and just focused on the music.

Time melted away to be nearly 02:00 and at this point Katsuki was bored out of his fucking mind. Not a single sign of something suspicious happened besides some questionable ass comments from Mr. Aquado about paying the female waitress to come by his place later for some after dark 'fun.'

Katsuki scoffed out loud at that one, unable to hide his attitude.

He kept his eyes focused the entire time on the crowd and dipping in and out of the conversation the other two men in all black were having. His annoyance began to flare when he realized this was just another dead job. These were just a bunch of extras. Extras all around him talking about useless shit, doing useless shit and he was in the middle of it, guarding a useless piece of shit when he could be out trying to find the person who killed—

“Wow, Bakugou, take a look,” the man next to him whispered as he elbowed him in the side. “That waiter has a perfect ass on him, goddamn. You don’t see that type of perky backside often.”

The other bodyguard quickly followed the line of vision and gave a low whistle in agreeance.

Katsuki groaned internally in frustration because nothing had happened so far and now he was making goddamn small talk with some extra about another extra’s ass.

...However...

Katsuki clicked his tongue and huffed because he was an ass man at the end of the day. Cutthroat crimson eyes turned to the guy next to him because, why the hell not?

“Where at?” He asked in a slightly curious tone that curled up at the end.

He skimmed the crowd for this so this so-called ‘perfect-ass’ just so he could be the judge of that. Giving such a claim was rather bold because he can only really ever recall a single person to really have what he would deem as the world’s most ‘perfect ass.’ No matter how annoying the little shit was.

“Black pinstripe pants and vest on the left, he’s the one facing away from us, he has the tray with the sapphire martinis on it.”

Katsuki trailed his gaze to look for wherever this waiter was. He skimmed until he saw the silver tray holding unnaturally colored blue drinks in the dim lighting.

But when his eyes sank below the belt to check out the man, everything spun into slow motion. His stomach knotted, throat felt like it was stuffed to the brim with dry cotton and his eyes shot all the way open with a sudden rush of adrenaline.

There’s no fucking way—

All of his senses spiraled into overdrive because he only knew one person with an ass stacked like that.

When the waiter turned around fully, dark curls bounced with the motion and Katsuki hated the fact he was fucking right. Those sharp as daggers emerald eyes locked onto the V.I.P section and under the flashing blue and purple neon lights, a look of surprise painted the other man’s soft features when they both locked gazes.

Then within the next millisecond, that look of lethality Katsuki had repeatedly witnessed gripped that cursed freckled face.

Fuck.

“Get down!” Katsuki snatched his gun out of his holster and grabbed Mr. Aguado quicker than anyone could think.

“W-What? What’s happening—” but the crime leader’s question was cut short by his own blood curdling scream as a bullet landed square in his right kneecap.

Katsuki cursed himself as they all quickly scrambled for cover in the blindsiding chaos. Several expertly aimed bullets whizzed unnervingly close to Katsuki’s ear and his heart rate tripled in speed at the sudden urgency. He was certain he just barely fucking ducked in enough time and could feel several fine hairs sliced right off his head by bullets.

Katsuki quickly reached up to flip the poker table on its side to use as a shield as the bullets rained down. He ignored the loud fall of colorful poker chips and how the cards spilled into the air like confetti. The gunshots rang out and screams filled the club’s space as party goers began shoving and running quickly.

Katsuki cursed loudly when he took a risk to look from above the table only to be met with a bullet that grazed straight over his skin leaving behind a boiling hot trail, skinning him slightly. He bit down on the inside of his cheek as he took cover again and hovered above his mark before rage started to steam underneath his skin.

That son of a bitch is not going to blow this job for me.

Katsuki’s nostrils flared wildly as his scowl broke free from his emotionless mask. He turned his eyes towards the other two assigned bodyguards as he loaded his spare guns without looking.

He quickly spotted the head of dark green curls that was quickly retreating through the thinning crowd at high speed and Katsuki yelled and took off at full speed through pushing people out of the way and jumping over the tables that were knocked over in his way.

“I’m going to fucking murder you, Deku!” He screamed full of absolute rage.

“Owch, still using that nickname?” The breathy voice answered and Katsuki groaned at how innocent he sounded. “You’ve never been the creative one.”

The nameless man he had been bumping into for years picked up the speed as he tossed whatever vase, table, or chair at Katsuki in hopes of derailing him. But the hot-tempered blond blazed through it with sharp reflexes because today was the fucking day. He was going to shove his foot so far up that small fry’s ass—

The green eyed agent looked over his shoulder and Katsuki saw red. The fucking short stack winked at him before sharply turning down an abandoned back hallway in the club.

He hated how familiar this felt—it was almost a goddamn routine now.

But it was a routine he was about to dead end because there was no way he was going to let this mission get screwed up. Katsuki came to a skidding halt when both he and that damn Deku realized there was no else to run. Katsuki heard the freckled man curse when he closed one eye and took a skilled shot at the green eyed nuisance in front of him.

But of course—Deku moved swiftly as if he was made of water.

“Fuck!” Katsuki yelled out and fired off several more rounds in hopes of landing one.

He could feel his temper beginning to rise in a way that only this guy could pressure out of him. The blond gritted his teeth in annoyance because this happened every damn time. The other’s short height gave him an advantage on moving quicker but Katsuki’s strength still gave him enough advantage as well.

Now they were in the same position they always were in: a stalemate.

The two were now face to face sharply dodging blows and blocking punches, kicks, and bullets. Slowly but surely, all the professionalism inside of Katsuki’s body was flying out the damn window along with his patience.

“I cannot believe you followed me to Spain you fucking green stain!” Katsuki yelled out, absolutely livid. “I’m starting to think you’ve got some sick crush on me or some shit, you little stalker!”

He swiped his leg underneath the other who fell to the ground with a sharp thud and yell. Katsuki’s blood red eyes narrowed in on the pale neck that was exposed as he drew his blade from his belt quickly. With all his strength he hurled forward to take a blow for the neck, but the smaller man rolled quicker than he could land the attack and he unsuccessfully stabbed his lethal blow into the wooden floorboards.

Katsuki wildly whirled his head around and was met with a swift brutal kick to the face that had him clutching his nose in agony.

“Please, don’t flatter yourself!” Fucking Deku yelled back, green eyes resentful and face flushed...pink? Katsuki squinted his eyes in disbelief when he thought he was hallucinating. Was this guy actually fucking blushing?

“Y-You—You’re guarding my mark like always and you’re in my way again! Now stay out of my sight, I have a job to do—ah!” Deku’s sentence was cut short the moment he tried to turn around and Katsuki grabbed him in a tight choker hold by the neck.

“Oh, you’re not going anywhere,” Katsuki rebutted through a low rasp and began to reach for his gun. He shook the other man furiously when the shorter man tried to get out of his hold.

“I’m going to put a goddamn bullet in your skull for good this time. I’m so goddamn sick of you—”

Before he could finish, his world view toppled backwards at an alarming speed. He gave a loud grunt as he was slammed backwards onto the hard ground. Katsuki cursed loudly when he heard something in his back brutally crack. He squeezed his eyes closed for a half of a moment to regain his senses but when he reopened them he froze.

The smaller man had broken free of his hold, twisted himself around to straddle him and pressed a sharp knife directly against his jugular.

Shit—

Frigid ice trickled into his veins and he stayed deathly still waiting for the other to move his hand and slice him open. He flinched his head to the side at the expected movement—but was met with...nothing?

A moment too long for any expert agent to stay paused passed and Katsuki looked up. His brow furrowed. His eyes traveled up confused only to be met with deep forest green eyes that held immense conflict. Conflict that he’s never seen the other man have.

He should be dead right now—bleeding out on the ground applying hopeless pressure to his neck as blood spurted out. But he wasn’t.

Instead he could feel all the details about the intimacy of their position pressed against him. Warm breath. The hand gripping his wrist. The soft curls resting against his forehead. But most of all he noted the surprising delicate facial features of this man he had only ever encountered when bullets were being shot at him.

This close up, Katsuki saw the different shades of freckles sprinkled across the other’s nose. Light brown, dark brown or soft like mocha. Some were almost invisible, nearly blended into ivory like skin and would be totally unnoticeable if not for how close they were—

He was ripped violently from his thoughts when the knife against his skin pressed in further and Katsuki hissed when he could feel blood drawn. The delicate face twisted into a conflict snarl.

“Stay the hell out of my way,” the soft voice warned in a tone that sounded forced. As if he didn’t want to be pushed into doing something he didn’t want to.

Katsuki glowered sourly before he could control himself.

“What the fuck is your prob—shit!” He yelled when suddenly the knife pressed against his throat jerked violently, ripping through his skin—shallowly.

A swift right hook landed square on his jaw causing him to bite his tongue and the bitter taste of iron filled his mouth. The other man pushed off of him at the sound of police sirens and was high tailing it quicker than Katsuki could recover from the devastating blow to his face.

Ignoring the burning pounding of his head, the blond sat forward quickly and turned around to see the retreating back side of the other. Deku ran quickly into the stampede of the crowd in the dim lights, dodging anyone in his way as if he was on fire.

Oh no you fucking don't— Katsuki snatched his second gun out of his holster and aimed it perfectly for the other's head. He closed one eye and took a deep breath, and as if he could feel him aim at him, the nameless man turned his head slightly to stare Katsuki directly in the eye.

The sight of those unique green eyes made Katsuki's heart skip a beat instead of his finger pulling the trigger.

Everything sped up again and, in a flash, the other disappeared right out of his life—again.

Katsuki cursed as he spat out the blood rushing into his mouth and lowered his gun slowly. When the head of curls were completely out of sight, the confused assassin idly touched the small bit of blood on his neck.

The cut was so precisely shallow that it had to be a warning and not a miscalculation. He didn't cut deep on purpose. Confusion tousled around inside his chest.

Why didn't he kill me…?

"You fucking blew it, Bakugou," Aizawa said in the most disappointed voice he's ever heard him use. "How in the hell did you let the mark you were supposed to protect get shot? In the kneecap of all places on top of it? He's nowhere near happy with us and is asking for a full refund because you didn't even bring in the assailant."

Katsuki slid down in the uncomfortable chair in the Japan headquarters.

He was currently in Aizawa's boring looking office getting harshly reprimanded. He could barely lift his eyes up to meet the infuriated gaze of his superior across the table because he was beyond pissed. Katsuki was beating himself up greatly and it was all because of that headache of a man.

"I told you, it was the other agent who got in the way—again!" Katsuki barked back loudly. "That green eyed, green hair minty smelling motherfucker. The one who killed Rin Hiryu."

Aizawa gave a lengthy groan and glanced up at the ceiling as if he was praying for eternal sleep.

Katsuki frowned so hard he was certain his face would get stuck like it. He was so goddamn screwed.

After Mr. Aguado got done chewing his head off, he then went to his higher ups inside The Company and chewed their ears off. Mr. Aguado wanted blood after his kneecap was shattered, but Katsuki had failed to return to the checkpoint with the person who shot at them despite making the promise to ‘terminate the pest.’ Now he was wishing he’d used better language.

Why the fuck did he always make snap promises out loud?

“Is this the guy you keep running into?” Aizawa asked as he slid a small photograph across the table.

Katsuki finally peeled his eyes off his hands in his lap to the wooden surface in front of him. There he saw a small, old photograph of that man in a loose white tee shirt that was slung off his shoulder. His eyebrows raised up surprised because it looked as if it was taken in his teen years and his eyes were lifeless. Completely void of emotions and dull.

Extremely opposite of whenever they were locked on Katsuki himself.

“Yeah, that’s the brat,” he grumbled unhappily.

He picked up the photograph and squinted his eyes when he noticed a small tattoo directly beneath the man’s freckled clavicle on his exposed shoulder.

Katsuki’s eyebrows pinched together.

Aizawa let out the most exhausted sigh Katsuki ever witnessed and rubbed his temple. “Well, that makes sense as to why he’s been giving you trouble then. And it explains why he’s always trying to kill the mark when you’re on a green folder assignment.”

“Wait, you know him?” Katsuki said, voice slightly raised. His skin bristled a bit because it’s been eight fucking years since he first reported this guy and they were just getting answers now? “Why didn’t you let me know when I’ve been fucking tell you about him this whole time?”

“I didn’t know, and I only recently started getting a lead after digging around,” Aizawa snapped back with a fierce glare. “I got this photograph from a source that was very, very hard to make cooperate and is now dead because of our negotiations. If this really is the guy you’ve been running into, then it’s safe to say he’s just working for another agency in Japan, a far deadlier one that is a lot less flexible than we are.”

Katsuki’s upper lip curled. “What does that mean?”

“It means he works for an exclusively red folder operation.”

Oh.

“Next time you see him, you kill him on sight,” Aizawa said in a curt tone.

“What the hell do you think I’ve been trying to do?” Katsuki mumbled emptily. “He’s more slippery than he looks.”

He subconsciously touched the shallow cut along his neck.

The pads of his fingers traced the tiny hills of the straight-line scab and couldn't help but wonder why the hell hadn't the guy taken the kill? The opportunity was right there, and it was the only one he had ever gotten in the eight years they spent shooting bullets and throwing knives at each other. Well, outside of the first time they met.

He thought back to the intense conflict he saw blaze in those green eyes when the knife was pressed against his neck.

"I know, but I'm just officially giving the order since we now can confirm it's him. We don't know his name or who he works for, but if he's a constant problem then he has to go. We can't afford to keep blowing the green folder missions we get since our company is almost exclusively green."

Katsuki bit his tongue to hold back a quip.

Exclusively green my ass. Even if that were true, he was never given quite the same balance. He saw red folder after red folder with just a sprinkle of green. He looked down at the photograph in his fingertips.

Well...a lot of green. Sometimes.

"What does this number tattooed on him mean?" Katsuki muttered under his breath. "Is it a date?"

"Not a clue," Aizawa said in a short tone. He reached forward and snatched the tiny photograph back and neatly tucked it away in his blazer. Katsuki frowned and opened his mouth to object but was cut down immediately. "Instead of fantasizing about your enemy's tattoos, you should be worrying about your own job. Two fucked up assignments in a row are never good, Bakugou."

Katsuki sighed and carded a hand through his messy spikes. He was so goddamn tired. He briefly mulled if this new tiredness in him would ever go away and he would return to his old self: a well-oiled killing machine. But it seemed like every passing day just added a new weight to his person. It felt as though the invisible shackles on his ankles were getting longer.

After this Madrid assignment he felt more solidified in a decision he had been going back and forth on. He knew he wasn't in a case of burn out anymore. He was done.

Katsuki's mind unwillingly wandered back to his mother's body cold, lifeless and covered in blood again.

"...I want to retire soon, whenever I fill my assignment quota," Katsuki whispered, hanging his head away to avoid whatever look Aizawa would have given him. "I've reached the ten year threshold on my contract last week and I don't think I'm going to be signing on again. I think my time is done."

His boss leaned back and Katsuki was wholeheartedly surprised to be met with silence. He was at least expecting a sarcastic snip or some backhanded ass comment about his ridiculous request to tap out in his mid-twenties.

Instead, they just waded in a wordless exchange. He listened to the clicking of the ceiling fan and the footsteps outside the door bustling about as his boss said nothing.

“I had a feeling,” Aizawa eventually said in a soft voice. He strummed his fingers against the wooden desk accompanied by a thoughtful look. The higher ranked agent turned his head to look out the large window of his office in the high-rise building.

Katsuki’s eyes followed the trail and he looked over the colorful city of Tokyo in a distant manner. He didn’t feel attached to it anymore. Not like he used to.

“I’ve been waiting on this conversation, but I was hoping it would come after a successful mission and you could transition out smoother.” Aizawa rolled his neck as he reached underneath the desk and pulled out a red folder. Katsuki held back a sigh. “Your quota is one assignment short; this mission should’ve been your last but that’s not the case. The higher ups need a successful job out of you before your contract is one hundred percent complete. If you successfully follow this one through, then you’re set to go.”

The folder was slid across to him and Katsuki ignored the grogginess that filled his core. He focused on the positive because, this was his last mission thank fucking god. Piercing red eyes studied the black wax emblem that was imprinted with the symbol of death in kanji.

“I figured a red assignment would be easier for you to complete after you botched two green assignments in a row.”

Katsuki shrugged in response to that statement because his boss wasn’t wrong.

“I’ll see you in eight days, Bakugou. Hopefully it’ll be to give you a new identity and passport and not to reprimand you for fucking up again.”

“See you in a week old man.”

Katsuki made a mental note to give Aizawa a fucking hug next time he saw him.

This last assignment was going to be a piece of cake. Delicious fucking cake that Katsuki was going to devour in less than eight days. He didn’t even need eight days to complete it, he had this shit in the bag and would be done in three days tops.

His supervisor had somehow pulled strings to get him this sweet deal of a last mission and it was a perfect send off. It was domestic, no long ass flights involved, and to add the cherry on top: it was in Nago, Okinawa. Beautiful, tropical Okinawa with clear waters, turtles, and beaches.

Hell, when all this was over, Katsuki might even kick his feet up for the remaining four days and just fucking take a well deserved vacation while in the area.

His mark was some sleaze bag which made the assignment that much easier. According to the file, the guy, who was named Peter Moore, was the head of an underground human trafficking organization branch. He had spent years escaping the laws in the U.K, United States and South America. He had a bounty on his head and now he was settled in Japan under a false name of Henry Sekai, passing as a half Caucasian half Japanese humble hotel owner. However, the hotel was an elaborate cover up for the human trafficking.

The theme of the hotel was an extremely discreet couples' getaway set up. The name was the corniest thing Katsuki had ever witnessed in his near twenty six years of life. Ai no Rakuen. Love's Paradise.

Katsuki scoffed several times reading the itinerary for this place because, holy hell, it was fucking cheesy.

Couples' messages? Pool side mingling? Beach picnics and romantic hiking? Blegh.

Katsuki scrunched his nose up in disgust as he looked at all the pink and red glitter hearts printed in the pamphlet. Who the hell falls for this shit? He hated romantic propaganda with a passion, it was so goddamn pointless to him. Just a mindless way to brainwash the masses into buying products they don't need for temporary people in their lives.

He would rather shove flowers in a garbage disposal than give them to someone.

When his jet landed he took a taxi straight for the hotel and it was packed tighter than the club in Madrid.

Katsuki gave a long, heavy huff through his nose at the visual of nearly every damn person coupled up. It was disgusting. Appalling. Stomach retching and he feared losing his lunch just staring at all these extras. He hated the way they were completely lovey dovey. If he squinted, he wouldn't be surprised if he saw heart eyes and or some shit sparkling in their eyes like a shoujo anime. There were even a few singles who looked like they were already scouting out their next hopeless infatuation.

I guess this place is more popular than we thought he noted mentally when it seemed like Ai no Rakuen was the hottest new spot in town. He put the pieces together that the increased popularity also meant it would be easier for Peter Moore's men to possibly kidnap someone.

He waited patiently in line adjusting his short sleeved black tank top and pulled his designer sunglasses over his eyes. His frown was permanently in place as he listened to one married couple bicker but kept a straight face and remembered his persona for this assignment.

He was single, ready to mingle slash murder or whatever and then leave as soon as possible.

He dragged his black suitcase behind him as he walked up to the second line at the counter. He glanced around at the packed lobby and took his place behind a rather short man wearing a colorful sunhat. The entire setting was as if the United States' tacky ass Valentine's day and White Day had a really furious love child.

The architecture of the building was pure, unstained white with decorations of glitter, pastel hearts and expensive flat screens on the wall of the lobby playing some romantic looking movie. Katsuki nearly gagged when the male lead dipped the female lead low and whispered in her ear.

Red eyes quickly averted away from that disgusting display of commercialized affection to stare in front of him. What the hell was taking so long? He was second in line and the line should be moving quicker than it was. He grumbled and tried to peer over at the check in counter.

Katsuki leaned forward to look past the large straw sun hat decorated in purple flowers that was nearly blocking his view. He was met with the sight of an empty station and groaned loudly, drawing the attention of several people nearby.

Right as he was in the middle of weighing if this was worth it his eyes naturally trailed down to the figure in front of him and he froze. He blinked once. Then blinked again and his hand snapped up to whip his sunglasses off in disbelief.

That was definitely Deku's ass.

"You have got to be shitting me," Katsuki exasperated loudly.

The figure in front of him stiffened at the sound of his voice and whirled around, clearly caught off guard. All too familiar green eyes widened by several fractions.

Yup. He was fucking right. It was Deku's ass.

Gradually, a look of absolutely fury fanned across both their faces.

"No." Deku shook his head in denial. "Nuh-uh. I refuse. This is not happening—"

"I agree, it's not. You need to fucking leave in the next five seconds," Katsuki hissed in a low whisper. The shorter male groaned and looked around at all the families and Katsuki knew he was having the same thoughts as he was: it was too crowded to make a scene and there was too much daylight.

"I'm not going anywhere. Why are you here!?" Deku accused unhappily and Katsuki scoffed.

"Me?! What the fuck are you doing here! If you're here to screw up another one of my marks I swear—"

"—I'm not the one always sticking his gun in other people's business!"

"Yes, the fuck you do—" Katsuki stopped himself and closed his eyes to lower his temper. Count to ten. Count to fucking ten. Katsuki ran his hands down his face in disbelief. "Please tell me you're here because you're some dumbass hopeless romantic and not because you're here on an assignment."

He watched Deku splutter and blush as if both were true.

Shit.

Katsuki glared daggers and shook his head. He wasn't putting up with this shit for eight days. Especially when he had direct orders to cut this man down.

"I'm not going to argue with you, Deku." Of all the places. Of all the goddamn places and all the goddamn assignments. "You're going to listen carefully and follow what I say and leave."

"I need to leave?" The green eyed man hissed in a whisper. His face twisted into an offended expression and he puffed out his cheeks. "I was here first!"

"Oh shut up, we're not five!"

"I swear if this ends up like that time we were in Taiwan I'm going to actually murder you."

Katsuki took a step forward and leaned down slowly several inches away. He could see the lightest freckles again this close. He curled his upper lip and looked the other man straight in the eyes. "As if you have the guts to kill me."

Deku fell short on his words and his eyes widened at the proximity.

In the silence, Katsuki's eyes darted down to the other's mouth automatically.

"—Well, what do we have here!" A loud booming voice cut through the air. Both men stiffened and turned their eyes to the counter where a tall man in a white suit with fair skin and brown hair waited for them. Katsuki swallowed thickly when he recognized the man within a second.

That was Peter Moore. That was the mark.

The unsuspecting man laughed and gestured to them to come up all the way to the marble counter. Both agents looked carefully at each other behind approaching together in a quiet understanding. The hotel owner smiled wide enough that his eyes crinkled at the ends and several lines telling of old age showed.

If Katsuki didn't know from his job that this man was an international criminal, he never would have guessed.

"I'm so sorry that no one has come to the counter yet but I have to just say you two are hilarious," Moore continued with an ignorant smile. His light brown eyes gazed between the two men happily. "You remind me of me and my wife at your age, ha! Always at each other's throats, we've also been to Taiwan. Lovely place."

Katsuki fumbled his sunglasses in his hands and that damn Deku choked on thin air. Both men awkwardly paused for several seconds because what the fuck—

"You are married, right?" Moore questioned with a minor frown. The affection in his eyes slowly turned to suspicious confusion and Katsuki realized their mistake. "You two fight as though you've been together for ten years, if not how do you two know each other?"

Katsuki's brain malfunctioned momentarily.

Shit. What should I stay? We're friends who casually say we're going to murder each other—fuck no. We're friends that are on a romantic getaway together and spent a week in Taiwan—fuck no not that either. Fuckfuckfuck—

"Y-Yes!" The Deku answered from beside him and quickly grabbed his arm. It took all of his years of professional training not to let surprise show on his face. "W-We are, um, this...is my husband."

Deku looked up at him with a plastic smile and Katsuki gave one right back in hopes to cover their slip up.

"Yup," he quickly agreed and the look of adoration was plastered right back across that slime ball trafficker's face. "Verbal berating is our own special way of affection. Excuse anything you may have heard."

"Yeah, you know how it is," Deku chuckled and playfully reached up and pinched his cheek too hard to be seen as loving. "Sometimes you just really...really want to wring your spouse's neck after so many years together."

Katsuki fought the intense urge to shove Deku to the ground.

"Ha! Yes, I understand that completely," Moore answered with a grin. "So how many years together?"

"Eight," they both answered automatically.

Katsuki's heart stumbled at the synchronization and he cut his eyes down to the freckled man hanging off his arm. Deku quickly averted his eyes and tucked a curl behind his ear.

"I knew it was near ten years," Moore said as he slapped his hands together, utterly proud of himself. "You two are adorable. My name is Henry Sekai. I'm the hotel owner and I was just making my rounds. I'm so sorry for the inexcusable wait. I don't know what happened to the person who was supposed to be checking people in at this counter."

"It's fine, don't worry about it, sir," the nameless Deku answered. Katsuki tried his best to ignore the feeling of heat rushing to his face when the smaller man clung to him tighter and leaned his head against his shoulder. "I'm sure you have several other things you need to attend to!"

"No no no, it's quite alright. I can check you two in," Moore insisted with a dismissive hand gesture. "As an apology for the wait and for the fact you two are such a hoot, I'll upgrade you to the honeymoon suite and itinerary. Even though you're clearly past honeymooning, it never hurts to try to reignite that spark!"

Both deadly agents gave a strained, dry laugh.

"What name is the reservation under?"

They opened their mouths but stopped short to look at the other. Katsuki took the lead quickly before they fucked up.

“—Bakugou is our last name,” he supplied. “It should be under Taro Bakugou.”

The hotel owner hummed in approval and typed in several things in the computer in front of them. The click-clack of the keyboard felt like an excruciating metronome the longer the warm, small body stayed pressed against him. How the fuck was he here with the man who had a knife to his jugular less than two days ago?

“Found it!” Moore exclaimed and Katsuki’s throat tightened. “Here you go Mr. & Mr. Bakugou!”

They were handed two pink hotel cards that had two shiny translucent golden hearts on the center of it. He leaned down confused at the sudden fruity smell of perfume because there was no way—but he was proven wrong. The key cards were fucking scented.

“I hope you enjoy your stay. Welcome to paradise!”

Paradise.

Katsuki never felt like he was in hell more than he did in that moment.

Chapter 2: Duet

Chapter Summary

For eight years Katsuki burned to know Deku's real name. But he never anticipated that he would find out like this.

Chapter Notes

Hello!! Greetings! As a warning, this will start off slow and fluffy but don't trust me :/ Never trust me.

I started up a Spotify playlist for this fic. I already began curating a selective playlist for future scenes :) by the end it will probably include a lot of songs so here it is for your convenience:

Chapter Two: Duet

The very first time Katsuki saw the nameless man he deemed ‘Deku,’ it was in the city of Vienna, Austria eight years ago. Three years before his mother’s death when he was still an overconfident seventeen-year-old proud of the chip on his shoulder. He had been working for The Company officially for three years still gaining his bearings on everything.

It had been a quiet night when Deku waltzed in like a beautiful but deadly typhoon.

There was not not a single cloud in the sky and the air was crisp with the smell of after-rain teasing his senses. Katsuki’s assignment was to protect one of the country’s diplomats who was coming and going after a large international gathering. He was accompanied by two other coworkers from The Company—one of which was his former work partner Rin Hiryu.

Hiryu was an agent Katsuki had only known for a short amount of time, but there was a peculiar air around him that Katsuki could never quite pin down. It was almost damn irritating how elusive the man's aura was despite having worked so many cases with him. Hiryu's long black hair was always slicked back into a neat braid that reached shoulder length and his skin was a perfect glossy tan.

A lot of impressively unique things stood out about Hiryu. The man was fluent in about twelve languages and skilled in multiple deadly fighting styles that Katsuki had never even heard of. It was as if he was born to do this type of job.

But what stood out the most was the tiny tattoo on the inside of his index finger on his right hand, the one used to pull the trigger: 102.

It was set in deep black ink and with a tiny font, an old American typewriter like style someone had taken his flesh and quickly stamped it while mass producing a product. But there was something so fucking off about it—and that was saying a lot by Katsuki's standards. He worked for The Company and had socialized with his fair share of shady ass individuals.

Katsuki watched mission after mission how Hiryu barely flinched when killing someone. Then one day he caught the elder man quietly staring at the tattoo on his finger like it was the DaVinci Code.

Curiosity had burned too strong after that and pushed Katsuki to finally ask Hiryu about it. But his question was only met with intense aloofness.

"Oh, it's just the anniversary date for my girlfriend and I." Hiryu's laugh was obnoxiously fake. "The tenth of February."

His smile was tight, passionless and immensely unfriendly. The honesty stopped right below the dark bags on his eyes, given away by the lack of facial muscles that failed to turn upwards. In their line of business, Katsuki took the hint: whatever that tattoo was, it wasn't any of his damn business.

But that night as they ignorantly prepped to move the Austrian diplomat, it would be the last time he ever saw Hiryu.

They exited out of the high security plaza and into a party that just smelled like the elite. If Katsuki could bottle up the scent of the restaurant that night, he would slap a label on it and call it 'filthy fucking rich' because there were no other words for it. The mix of the various gourmet foods with French perfumes and colognes he couldn't pronounce was almost overwhelming and made Katsuki scrunch his nose in aggravation.

He doesn't remember the name of the place, or whoever was the third guard member, but he remembers how calmly the waiter approached their table to serve drinks. Hiryu was too busy talking with the diplomats at the table to notice. The elder kept his head turned, training a watchful eye at the entrance—but Katsuki's red eyes zeroed in immediately on the new figure.

When he fully focused, Katsuki's young mind was put in a trance.

The waiter looked around his age and dressed in a silk red blouse that was begging to be touched. To top it off, he wore fitted black dress pants that showed off the angles of his body and damn—he had the most perfect ass Katsuki had ever seen. It was full, curvy, and held the right balance between muscle and cushion. The waiter's head was full of soft looking dark green curls and his eyes—his fucking eyes—were large, doe like and the most striking shade of lightning green.

The waiter wore expensive looking ruby earrings that caught the light. The reflection of the luminescence from the diamond chandeliers above them gleamed through the gemstones and tiny specks of red and pink danced over his freckles. It made the other teenager in front of him alluring in a way that caused Katsuki to be mildly hypnotized.

The waiter's neat, non-threatening appearance held a gentle aura and there was not a single hint that he was carrying a loaded gun and knife strapped to his person.

Sparkling green eyes met Katsuki's blazing red ones briefly and they held the gaze for several seconds. Katsuki remembered how he couldn't resist smirking when a visible candy pink blush crept up from the waiter's neck to spill into his full cheeks.

The shy waiter offered Katsuki a gentle smile that pushed its way into his memory and would never leave for years to come. The tiny dimples that showed made Katsuki's young heart flutter.

It had felt so genuine.

Later that night, he was given the order to work on rooftop duty with Hiryu at the venue. The dinner and meeting for the diplomat had gone smooth and there wasn't a single threat in sight. The pair of sharp minded assassins waded over the ledge of the brick building, enveloped comfortably in silence sitting next to their loaded sniper guns.

Katsuki couldn't help but think about the cute waiter as Hiryu lit a cigarette.

He toyed with the idea that if he was a normal seventeen-year-old he would go back and flirt with the guy—possibly ask him out on a date. He wondered what it would be like to sit across a candle lit table and look at that sweet smile.

"Bakugou, can I tell you something personal?" Hiryu had spoken randomly. Katsuki watched as the grey smoke floated upwards and blended in with the night sky.

"Yeah, go for it, whatever."

"I'm thinking I'm going to disappear soon. I know my contract is still in play but—" Hiryu paused, licked his chapped lips and his eyes skirted off to the side. "Things in Japan are getting complicated."

Katsuki squinted his eyes at the hunched over man. “Complicated how?”

His comrade’s gaze swayed as if there was a fatal truth swimming in his eyes.

“Complicated as in I think I fucked up,” Hiryu mumbled. He took another drag of his choice of poison and exhaled the thick smoke shakily. “I was invisible for a long time, but I slipped up. Something from my past caught up to me and I need to make myself disappear before it can find me, if you catch my drift.”

Katsuki stared at him with a stone face as the smell of nicotine danced in his senses. He nodded slowly.

Someone’s trying to kill him he thought privately to himself.

“I understand,” Katsuki replied, staring down over the edge of the roof. He could see their mark safely leaving the scene and into the limousine with a higher security force. “It was nice working with you for what it’s worth.”

“You too, Bakugou,” Hiryu chuckled. “You know, you should get out of this lifestyle. I know everyone has been praising you since you joined, but you’re still so young and have some level of autonomy. You have time to turn things around and be normal.”

Normal.

Katsuki pursed his lips to the side as he thought about the cute green haired waiter.

Crimson red eyes followed the next drag of the half-used cigarette Hiryu took in silence. He decided against responding to that comment. Despite his unspoken fantasies of wanting to be normal, he needed this job. He had to help his mother out and there was no other way to settle all the money issues their family had without this gig. He wasn’t going to go back to being homeless and sleeping in sketchy ass warehouses.

The half-stressed smirk Hiryu graced him with was the final facial expression his colleague would ever give him.

That’s when they heard the clinking of metal.

In hindsight, Katsuki knew damn well he could never have connected the dots. However, that didn’t stop him from feeling the nerve shattering shock that struck his core the next split second. The only warning they were given was the slightest movement of a dark shadow in their peripheral blending in with the midnight atmosphere.

Both hitmen whipped their heads quickly at the sound, caught utterly off guard by the lack of footsteps only to see the waiter dressed in red with green eyes aiming a black gun directly at him.

Katsuki’s reflexes caused him to stand up and snap his hand to the gun at his waist but it all happened too quickly. The once honey warm green eyes were now mechanical, distant and cold as the mysterious teen pulled his finger on the trigger.

The first two shots landed directly in Katsuki's upper biceps and the next two landed in Hiryu's.

Both men screamed out in explosive agony and the next sensation assaulting Katsuki's senses was a hard elbow to his throat, forcing an unwilling choke out loud. He reached forward to try to grab the assailant through his pain, but within the next second, Katsuki was swiftly disarmed and his whole body was tripped up and shoved harshly to the cold ground. He could hear the numbing crack of his skull on the grey cement.

Katsuki hissed when his muscles spasmed all over, controlled by the hot pain of the lead deep inside his body. His vision tilted and twisted as if the green haired assailant had leveled the earth he walked on—which Katsuki would say that's exactly what fucking Deku did that night.

The frantic blond tried to scrabble back upright, but it was too late when the next two shots rang out, landing directly in Hiryu's knees, shattering his kneecaps. The older assassin fell to the ground like a flimsy house of cards that was stacked too arrogantly high and blood splattered all around.

The large body of Hiryu hit the cold cement of the roof and the green-eyed killer walked up over him to cast his looming shadow over their figures unforgivingly.

Betrayal and despair filled Hiryu's eyes.

"Mian haeyo, hyung," the mysterious killer whispered.

He coldly pulled the trigger despite one last desperate plea from Hiryu.

Katsuki squeezed his eyes shut before he could witness the gruesome hole put directly in his comrade's skull.

The piercing silence of death clawed its way up Katsuki's forearms, digging into his flesh. There was no more breathing. No more pleading. Just silence.

Katsuki's breathing became uneven, increasing in panic as he tried to think of a way out of the situation. But he also damned himself because how the fuck did they not sense this guy on the roof? Was he really that stealth?

The shy, naive look from earlier inside the restaurant made Katsuki feel like an absolute goddamn fool for ever romanticizing him.

Damn it all. Katsuki gritted his teeth together so painfully tight like the tension in a weak violin chord set to play its last note. He awaited the bullet that was surely going to penetrate his temple—but seconds passed by and nothing happened.

Katsuki's brows pinched together in confusion as he dared glance up.

There, he witnessed the green haired killer staring down at Hiryu's limp body with a distant gaze. The midnight air ran over Katsuki's face and he was able to feel the subtle sway of his hair in the wind as the dark curls of the killer moved as well.

Katsuki waited—and waited. Holding a delicate breath for death to happen.

But nothing arrived.

Forest eyes drank in the sight of the dead man at his feet as if he was studying it, memorizing all the ways the blood stains were soaking into Hiryu's black clothes. Time stood still while Katsuki watched the crimson decorated green eyed man slowly crouch down and gently close Hiryu's eyes with his leather gloved hands.

...What the fuck?

But before Katsuki could analyze any further, as quickly as the obscure moment came, it vanished. Those sharp emerald eyes snapped up to stare at him bleeding out on the concrete with both arms filled with bullet holes.

"I'm sorry you had to see that," the killer muttered in Japanese as he lifted his gun to aim at him. "It's nothing personal. You weren't my mark."

Katsuki flared his nostrils in panic.

"I'll kill you for this." He promised because all he could fucking see was red, red, red. He couldn't believe that this fucking green haired asswipe got the jump on him—

"Huh? You're saying you are going to kill me when I'm the one with the gun on you? You really are a mouthy one."

The green haired teen smiled in an unreadable way. Nothing like the smile he was given before—this was different. Distant and cold. His eyes didn't translate happiness—that same half effort smize Hiryu would give.

"Quit fucking toying with me! Why don't you just kill me already instead of fucking holding conversation?" Katsuki hissed as the pain in his arms worsened and he started to become lightheaded from the blood loss. The hot throb stemmed down to his fingertips, making his body tingle and rendering his arms useless.

He felt weak. Something he hadn't felt in three goddamn years. Now this guy was looking down on him like it was some game after killing Hiryu. It was infuriating.

Green eyes measured him up instead of replying.

They flickered up and down his body as the killer's finger toyed with the trigger as if he was going to pull it. But a single glance down at the dead body at his feet seemed to dull whatever blood lust that was in him. An emotionless veil was wrapped around the freckled face before he turned his head away from the sight of the bleeding body and pointed his gun downwards.

Katsuki watched both baffled and thankful as the other assassin stood up then turned his back to him.

His dark curls nearly blended in with the dark navy-blue sky above filled with ignorantly beautiful stars twinkling in the morbid moment. The red of his shirt absorbed Hiryu's blood as the green-eyed killer wiped his gun clean before placing it in his hip's holster.

The nameless teen turned his head to the side and mumbled a promise that dug in underneath Katsuki's skin.

"Please stay out of my way," he whispered.

Then as quickly as he came—the mysterious green-eyed killer vanished back into the shadows. He left behind in his wake a pile of emotions rattled by the gravity of what occurred. Anger, sadness, confusion and above all fury boiled deep against Katsuki's chest as he was left rooftop with the dead body of his colleague. The thick blood pooling from Hiryu crept closer and closer to Katsuki while only one question rang loud in his head.

Who the hell was that?

And he would find himself asking this exact same question for the next eight years as the curiosity grew.

The distant memory faded out of Katsuki's mind as he was escorted down the pastel pink colored hallway with his now husband whose name he still didn't know.

How all the events in his last twenty-five years of life led up to this was a goddamn mystery. Whenever Katsuki died, he had a few choice words for whatever deity was above them.

Untrusting red eyes carefully surveyed the smiling man stationed by his side as they were directed down a narrow hallway by a bubbly hostess. The thorn in his side next to him was clearly on high alert, but trying to play the part of the odd situation they found themselves in.

Deku was grinning wide and hanging off his arm as if he adored Katsuki and it was nearly appalling. However, it was convincing—and that's what they had to somehow be right now: a convincing ass married coupled.

But Katsuki didn't miss the way those cutthroat green eyes glanced up at him every few seconds while the ginger woman explained the various couples' activities that were available to them.

"Your new room will be up on the third floor!" She said with a large smile. "You're quite lucky. The boss rarely upgrades to the honeymoon suite for free. You must have made a great first impression on him!"

"Ah, he's just a sweet guy!" Deku laughed off awkwardly as he rubbed the back of his messy curls with his free hand. "We're super thankful, y'know? I feel so embarrassed that he heard us bickering like that."

"Don't feel bad. Bickering is a sign of real love!" The hostess flashed a pearly white smile.

Katsuki fought the urge to roll his eyes.

As they walked further down the hall, Katsuki studied the surroundings. It was as if he was transported to his version of what Dante's inferno looked like. The hotel doors were a classy mahogany color, but the numbers plates were pink fucking hearts with silver numbering. Couples were walking up and down the hallway holding hands, looking at their pamphlets and giggling.

He wearily glanced down to the five foot five killing machine next to him and grimaced.

This was a fucking nightmare.

When they arrived at the third floor they were led straight up to the biggest room at the very end of an over complicated maze. The door had a giant red heart stamped on it that held the number 342 in shiny golden number.

"Here you lovely people go!" Their designated hostess chimed as she handed them what seemed to be custom itineraries. "If you need anything please make sure to call downstairs. I'll be taking care of you during your extended stay. You two are part of group twenty-five so you'll meet the other couples in your group during dinner time tonight! Please be sure to be on time."

"Group twenty-five?" Katsuki grumbled. "What does that even mean? I didn't see anything about that in the advertisement." He scrutinized the pamphlet that was too small in his hands.

"Well, since we are so popular, we have everyone here sorted into smaller groups that have access to help avoid overcrowding the facilities such as the dining hall, spas and the pools." She gave a small giggle and Katsuki frowned. "You'll get paired up with a handful of other couples to spend during your week here!"

"That sounds great! Like a miniature community," that damned Deku said as if it was the best thing in the world.

"Yup! So please, enjoy your stay and be downstairs in the dining hall around 20:00 otherwise you'll miss your dinner."

With that she sauntered off. Probably to lure a couple into the pink trap of death Katsuki thought privately as he swiped the rose scented room key card through the lock.

As the door clicked open on the tiny flashing greenlight, the arm holding onto him grew tighter in anticipation. As they stepped in the room it was deathly quiet. The thin hairs on his arms slowly began to rise when the shorter male next to him finally withdrew his arm fully and they cut their eyes to each other.

The door clicked shut behind them and it was as if the same idea that ran to the forefront of their brain simultaneously. The pair of hitmen turned towards each other with snarls twisted on their faces and Katsuki nearly scoffed at how downright irritated Deku looked.

Katsuki didn't waste a single moment to launch at Deku with unbridled anger. He grabbed for the smaller man's floral shirt and slammed him against the wall, shaking the portraits of loving couples hanging up.

“What are you doing here?” Katsuki hissed slowly.

The smaller man made a move to grab his wrist and twist himself out of the pinned position, but Katsuki was having none of it. Not fucking today. He pushed his whole-body weight onto the other man, lifting Deku upwards on the wall until his feet dangled between the wall and his entire force of weight.

“Get off me!” Deku demanded and tried kicking him hard several times in the knees, but Katsuki clenched his jaw through the pain and firmly held his ground.

“Not until you tell me what the fuck you’re doing here!” He shook the other harshly and slammed him against the wall several times loud enough for whatever poor neighborhoods they had to hear. “I’m not messing around with you this time. I have a mark here I need to take out and I need to finish the job without any incidents this time! And you being here is a giant, walking flaming incident waiting to happen!”

“I said get off!” Deku nearly screamed.

Katsuki opened his mouth to retort but in a blink, Deku thrashed and launched forward, slamming together their foreheads with all his strength.

“—Fuck!” Katsuki staggered and squeezed his eyes shut at the impact.

His head pounded loudly as he tried to keep his grip that immediately went slack as Deku twisted out of his hold and unkindly shoved him backwards in the small table in the center of the room.

Katsuki staggered briefly before clutching his forehead that was throbbing in pain. Their twin labored breathing could be heard throughout the room as the tensions grew higher. Katsuki could feel his gut twisting with anger but most of all anxiety. He couldn’t blow this assignment up like the last one.

Deku opened his mouth to say something but a small knock from the door interrupted him.

Both men turned their head towards the wooden in high alerts as they stared at it baffled. Neither made a move to answer it.

“Is everything going alright in there?” The familiar voice of Peter Moore echoed through. Katsuki’s eyes went wide in sync with the other man in the room as they both began to feel panic. “There was a call from your neighbors to the front desk about really loud concerning noises.”

Katsuki cursed under his breath.

“Y-Yes, we’re fine!” Deku quickly answered throughout the door. The shorter man’s posture straightened out as he quickly opened the door up wide. “I’m so sorry about that! We didn’t mean to make so much noise.”

Deku beamed that fake smile that stopped below his eyes.

Peter Moore's eyes scanned up and down their bodies in an uncomfortable manner. What the hell is he looking at? At first Katsuki made a face of distaste as the disgusting man's eyes lingered a little too long on his figure but when a look of amusement graced the hotel owner's face, Katsuki finally took a good glance between him and Deku.

Their clothes were thoroughly ruffled. Green curls and blond spikes were tousled in every direction and Deku's breathing was still evening out in hard breaths as his stupid loose-fitting shirt was slouched off his shoulder.

"Oh. I see." The man chuckled in a suggestive manner and flexed one eyebrow. Katsuki hated the way Deku blushed. "Well, I see this was a misunderstanding. You were being loud for other reasons. But, just in case, remember, no fighting in paradise! Only happy times here. I have a very low tolerance for disrupting the peaceful environment here."

"Got it," Katsuki said curtly with a sarcastic smile. "We'll be sure to keep it down from now on. No need to check in on us."

There was an awkward pause between the three of them.

Katsuki narrowed his sharp eyes ever so slightly when Peter shifted on his feet to survey the two of them carefully. If Katsuki had learned anything from being on this job for so long it was how to spot when someone was discreetly assessing him.

Peter Moore was sizing them up, and his light brown eyes stopped on both of their ring fingers—their very empty ring fingers.

Shit.

The trafficking leader wiped off the suspicious look before giving a near convincing gleeful expression. "I'll be seeing you guys in a couple minutes for dinner. I've decided to give a special toast to your group."

"That's wonderful to hear! I would love to ask you more questions about the spa here," Deku said with a lopsided smile as he readjusted his shirt. "We'll be down shortly!"

Peter Moore bowed slightly at the waist before smiling tightly. "Yes. See you soon."

The hotel owner walked away in his all-white suit as Deku quietly closed the door again. The shorter man let out a heavy sigh before turning around with his arms crossed.

"He's suspicious of us," Deku pointed out unhappily.

"Yeah, no shit, Sherlock," Katsuki barked back. The nervous blond carded his hand through his hair before shaking his head. "We need to be more discreet unless we both want to blow whatever assignments we have."

The green haired man kicked his foot gently in defeat.

"...That man is my mark. I have orders to take him out quietly."

Katsuki paused and looked at Deku curiously.

“Seriously?” Katsuki said surprisingly.

He searched at the shorter man’s freckled face for any hint of deception but found nothing. Deku was telling the truth.

“Yeah,” the freckled hitman mumbled. “He, um, crossed a higher up and my handler is demanding that he be put down.”

Upon hearing those fateful words, the situation started clicking together in Katsuki's mind like grinding gears. He almost gave an exasperated sigh of relief because damn—for the first time in eight years it finally seemed like he and this green-eyed menace were on the same side.

That means they could team up rather than fight and boom—retirement was as good as golden. It should be easy as cake, right? Especially because, as much as he hated to admit it, Deku was a damn good assailant.

“Well, I guess that works out for us both in whatever miracle,” Katsuki mumbled, which earned him a strange look from the other man.

“And why do you say that?”

Katsuki absolutely detested the way Deku scrunched his button nose in suspicion. It was almost endearing.

“My agency has been hired by two separate governments to take him out as well,” Katsuki explained carefully. “He’s wanted in several countries dead or alive and it seems like everyone is leaning towards dead.”

An unwanted feeling prickled at his skin as Deku’s eyes searched him with a newfound intensity. It was the first time in a long time those green eyes laid sights on him in a manner outside of violence. Katsuki could see the various gears of thought in the curly man’s head clogging together slowly, putting together their odd situation.

However, when those damn doe eyes stared at him too long, trying to see if there was a thread of lie woven into his words, Katsuki’s gut twisted. It reminded him of the emotions he felt when he first met Deku and how naive he had been.

When the sensation became too intense, Katsuki huffed loudly in annoyance to shoo away the feeling.

“Look, I have the assignment folder in detail if you want to see it if you don’t believe me,” he offered when the edge in Deku’s posture didn’t leave. “If we’re going to play husbands while attempting to land a bullet in that man’s skull we’re clearly going to have to work together.”

Those seemed to be the magic words because Deku’s shoulders visibly untensed for the first time since the lobby downstairs.

“Okay, show me the folder.”

“Only if you show me yours too.”

Katsuki didn’t miss the odd way Deku’s eyes flickered to the side for a millisecond.

“Alright, fine.”

Both men turned on their heels, eyes cutting at one another. They bent down towards their respective bags stationed by each other and carefully opened up their luggage. Katsuki carefully unzipped his worn down red bag to dig carefully underneath his clothes. He could hear Deku rummaging beside him as well until his hand found the red folder buried securely at the bottom.

As he lifted it, it felt distinctly heavier than he remembered. He knew why as he heard the walking nightmare beside him exhale. This was absolutely insane. He stopped for a moment to really examine himself, taking in the feeling of the thick paper against his finger pads.

Aizawa would shoot him in the foot if he found out about this...but then again, Aizawa would also shoot him in the foot if this mission went fucking wrong again.

“Here you go,” the quiet voice beside him spoke up.

Red eyes cut to the side to see a small hand thrusted forward in his face, clutching a nearly identical red folder. Katsuki was honestly glad to see some hesitation in the other hitman because it meant he had a lot riding on this too, which meant less fuck ups for both of them.

They exchanged red folders without a word and Katsuki carefully opened the other folder, scanning it carefully. In the center there was an odd “V” sigil stamped in obsidian colored ink. Katsuki tilted his head curiously, examining the symbol, trying to ingrain it into his memory. The V was encircled by two twin snakes that had their teeth bared meeting at the top and underneath it was a number: 217.

The same one that was tattooed on Deku in the picture he was shown by Aizawa.

Red eyes flickered over to the green haired man next to him, eyeing the clothed clavicle area.

He glanced back over and opened it to reveal a clear mugshot of Peter Moore with red ink scribbled underneath: Assassinate. When he read through the rest, all the information and it all checked out. The blond man thumbed the pages as he absorbed the written words, nodding as he read on.

Deku’s mark was clearly Peter Moore. All his background criminality was listed. There were clear instructions to discreetly dispose of him, stage it to look like either a suicide or frame someone else for the murder. Katsuki’s eyebrows shot up in surprise when there was a given list of people to possibly frame if need be.

He flipped through the pages until he came across one sentence that made him stop short.

Crimson eyes carefully looked up at his supposed husband beside him.

“It says in here you’re supposed to eliminate any loose ends that know about your assignment,” He pointed out. “How do I know you’re not going to turn on me when this is all over?”

Deku nonchalantly shrugged, not even bothering to look up. Curious green eyes stayed focused on reading his own red folder, flipping through the pages as if he was reading a magazine of sorts.

“All my assignments say that,” the freckled man mumbled as if it was the tiniest detail. “Don’t worry about it. If I was going to kill you, I would have by now.”

Katsuki ‘tch’d and sarcastically rolled his eyes. “How thoughtful of you.”

Katsuki's upper lip curled up at the mocking tone.

Deku looked up at him with a fake sweet smile and closed the folder. “Well, it looks like everything checks out! I guess this means we’re at a truce while here.”

“A truce?” Katsuki mocked. “We were never at war in the first place. You’re just always in my way, like a roach that won’t fucking die.”

Truthfully, this wouldn't be their first truce. Katsuki knew him and Deku had few and far truces between them. Over the years they sometimes found themselves at roadblocks or too tired to keep fighting. So in silent agreement they would call it and go on with their lives.

“I could argue it’s the opposite. Now, c’mon and loosen up, things could be a lot worse. We’re in paradise, on an easy mission. This could be fun with the two of us! I know you’re more than capable of doing your job and you know I’m better than you at mine.”

Katsuki rolled his eyes as he sat down Deku's red folder on the floor. “Don’t sound so damn excited about it. We’re still here to kill someone.”

“Jeez, you really are a grumpy one. Cheer up,” Deku muttered under his breath. “This is basically a vacation now. All we have to do is our jobs and maybe we can even have some time to enjoy ourselves since two of us should make the mission go quicker. I’ve never had any spare time before or after on an assignment.”

“You’ve never had any extra time in your given windows?”

“I don’t have windows, I have timelines.” Katsuki didn’t miss the slight way Deku’s words hardened with seriousness. “I am told precisely what to do and when. Then ordered back to headquarters.”

“And where is headquarters?” He pushed his luck, because why the hell not. He was given another lopsided smile in return and a curious head tilt.

“Wouldn’t you like to know.” Deku playfully winked at him. “Alright, let’s go Taro. We can’t miss dinner and I’m starving.”

“And what’s my husband’s name by chance?” Katsuki asked bitterly as he zipped back up his suitcase.

The question hung in the air as they both paused in silence. Deep down, Katsuki burned to know—he had been for a long while ever since that fateful night on the rooftop. Bright green eyes looked into his and Katsuki waited, ignoring the stupid way his heart rate increased in anticipation.

“My name is Hiroji.”

Hiroji.

For the first time he was given a title to match the nameless hitman, a name other than Deku —but something felt off.

He could see Deku—or Hiroji—pause to assess if he would believe the given name. But it didn’t sit right, his brain struggled to make it fit like fingers trying to jam a square into a circle shaped hole. Red eyes studied the silk curls, the full cheeks and cute—er—non-cute freckles.

“Alright then Hiroji,” he said slowly. The syllables curled wrong against his tongue. “Let’s go to dinner and start this.”

Tension loosened between them and a newfound understanding blossomed.

The freckled man smiled wide and bright, something he had never seen. Green eyes turned upwards into crescent moons and the expression of genuine joy danced across Deku’s face.

Small dimples peeked through the vast array of freckles littered on the other’s honey kissed skin. He hadn't seen those dimples in eight years. And, he begrudgingly was happy to. Katsuki didn’t realize that he had been waiting to see them again until now.

At that moment, Katsuki finally understood why Hiroji didn’t seem right.

It couldn’t be his name because it didn’t match his smile.

When they arrived at the dining hall, Katsuki was begrudgingly impressed.

Unlike the rest of the tacky hotel, it lacked the ugly trademark pink color and was a lot less of an eye sore to the anti-romantic man. Instead, the large dining hall was painted in an elegant beige color with gold trimming all around. The ceiling was curved with a sky-blue painting on top of angels and clouds. Couples and singles bustled in and out of the hall with waiters in classic black and white attire shuffling food to various numbered tables.

“Whoa,” Deku—er, Hiroji whispered beside him. Large emerald eyes were sparkling like he had never seen anything like the crystal chandelier lights above them. “This is so gorgeous.”

“It is,” Katsuki reluctantly agreed as he eyed the painted angels above them.

As he scanned over the masterpiece, there was one part of the painting that drew him in as he studied it more. Katsuki tilted his head to the side as he noticed two figures were painted off in the corner, one limp in the other's arms while being given a small green potion.

Katsuki furrowed his brows when he noted that the figure laying limp seemed nearly lifeless. The look of death on the man's face unnerved him for how out of place it was in this type of setting.

"Bakugous!" The loud voice of Peter Moore boomed through the crowd. "Over here! I saved you two seats!"

Both hitmen tore their eyes away from the beautiful painting above them to the sound of the voice from their target. Their heads searched the crowd until landing on a small round table filled with three other couples and the man of the hour.

"Get ready to smile, grumpy," Hiroji said quietly as they both started walking over to the table. Katsuki huffed and made sure not to smile just to spite the other man. Fuck him.

"Everyone, these are the Bakugous. They are the last couple in your group," Peter introduced as he gestured to everyone sitting around.

"Hi you guys! So nice to meet you!" A pink haired woman greeted with a smile as bright as her hair.

A chorus of awkward hellos and introductions quickly took place as he and Hiroji took their seats next to each other at the mahogany table. As everyone went around, Katsuki took the time to quietly examine the three other couples at the table as they all introduced themselves. All of them had twinkling wedding rings on their hands and were smiling happily.

The first couple to speak up and say their names were Ashido-Kirishima Eijiro and Mina as they sat down. The couple had such annoyingly loud colored hair that there was no doubt in Katsuki's mind that hair dying night was a weekly ritual in their home.

The next couple to introduce themselves were Yaoyorozu Momo and Jirou Kyouka. Katsuki was almost surprised to learn the two were engaged with how extremely contrasting their styles were. Momo was dressed as if she owned several mansions and Jirou was dressed like a punk rock star. But there was a deep aura of 'I would take a bullet for this woman' radiating from both women as their fingers intertwined.

Then lastly to introduce themselves were a couple that Katsuki was damn near impressed by the size difference. The big bulky man by the name of Todoroki Inasa held out his hand for a handshake and he easily dwarfed Hiroji's hand in his own. He was loud, upbeat and very determined to get to know everyone.

However, it came across as if Inasa's husband had an entirely different demeanor to him. The shorter male who introduced himself as Todoroki Shouto had two toned hair split down the middle in red and white. He was slender and had an air of elegance to him.

"It's so nice to meet you two!" Inasa boomed as he reached over to grab Katsuki's hand.

“Nice to meet you all as well,” Katsuki said with a clenched smile and he took a far too aggressively excited handshake. Damn this man is strong. “How’s everyone enjoying their trips so far?”

“Wonderfully!” Mina giggled while placing her hand over her husband’s. “We all checked in today so I’m super excited to get to the good stuff tomorrow. There’re so many activities here it’s wonderful.”

“Yeah same,” Kyouka said as she adjusted the sunglasses on top of purple hair. Katsuki watched her eyes flicker down to the hands. “Ah, it’s nice to have someone else in the group who isn’t married yet. I was beginning to think we got placed in the wrong section.”

Both Katsuki and Hiroji froze awkwardly in their chairs.

Katsuki watched the way Hiroji stumbled and quickly shook his head. “Oh, no. We’re—”

“They’re actually husbands,” Peter Moore corrected with a tight smize. His piercing brown eyes cut over to the pair of them and Katsuki’s hairs stood up on his arm at how there was an underlying suspicion carried in the words. “I ran into them in the lobby earlier today. They’re downright hilarious, you’ll love them.”

Katsuki gave a painfully awkward nod and readjusted himself.

“Oh, sorry for assuming!” Kyouka quickly backtracked and threw her hands up. “I didn’t see any rings on your fingers, so I thought—”

“—We take them off while traveling to places, in case we accidently lose them,” Hiroji quickly cut in with a subtle nervous chuckle. “Taro nearly chewed my head off once because I forgot mine in the airport security area in Taiwan once.”

All eyes automatically turned towards him as if anticipating him to tack on to the story. Because apparently that was a thing married couples did.

“They were expensive,” Katsuki mumbled dryly.

“Oh, so that’s what happened in Taiwan,” Peter chuckled. “I was going to ask because I was admittedly curious.” The hotel owner leaned back in his chair and slicked his palm through his brown hair, visibly relaxing.

Like clockwork, everyone started nodding in agreeance, eating up the lie like it was actually believable.

Gullible. The whole goddamn lot. The ill-tempered hitman bit back the strong urge to groan because he didn’t know how he was going to deal with this bullshit. He knew he would have to socialize but this just became far more complicated and friendly than he cared for.

“That’s such a smart idea!” Inasa boomed and turned to Shouto next to him who was the only person who didn’t seem to buy the story all the way. “Shouto, we should start doing that. You nearly left your wedding band at the last hotel we were at.”

Katsuki noted the way the man’s heterochromatic eyes looked between him and Hiroji as if trying to find another reason laying in the empty space between them.

Thankfully the topic at the table shifted to some boring story about Momo always having to find things for Kyouka. Truthfully, Katsuki didn’t bother even fully listening to it. He heard bits and pieces but he toned the rest out, not caring to listen to some domestic bullshit he probably would never experience. It was so goddamn mundane—utterly normal to the point Katsuki bet that if he could taste the conversation it would rival stale bread.

When he glanced beside him at Hiroji, the other hitman had an entirely different reaction. The freckled man was leaned forward across the table, eyes alert and hanging on her words like they were the most fascinating thing in the world.

As the night went on and various platters were brought to the table, Katsuki played the stoic, quiet husband to Hiroji’s bubbly personality. The green-eyed man next to him looked as if he was in his element, easily getting along with all the others at the table who matched his energy. He radiated professional social butterfly energy and it was not what Katsuki was anticipating out of him.

Out of all the things he expected ‘Hiroji’ to be, social butterfly wasn’t it.

The grumpy blond admittedly thought of all the various personality traits annoying ass Deku/Hiroji would have over the eight years. It wasn’t because he liked the guy or anything—fuck no. He stopped finding him cute the second he took Hiryu out in cold blood—or at least he tried.

Katsuki had to convince himself that sweet smile was stupid, and the rest of the man was probably dumb as well.

Hiroji was probably a smart ass that no one liked. All his coworkers probably found him to be clumsy and the most annoying brat at the agency. The stupid freckled short stack was most likely one of those people with terrible timing constantly in every way in life. Like barging in the room at the wrong moment or calling at the least convenient times. Hell, maybe he even snored too fucking loudly.

However, as he listened to his supposed husband meld with everyone around him, Katsuki realized Hiroji was likeable. Extremely likeable as Mina declared they should become his best friend by the time dessert arrived. Which happened to be pink frosted chocolate cake—of course.

But even as the night progressed, his mind couldn’t let go of the notion that Hiroji wasn’t the green-eyed man’s true name.

When everyone had finished eating, Katsuki quietly surveyed Peter who was having a goddamn blast at the table, playing like he was completely engrossed by the conversation.

“So how did you two meet?” Mina asked full of spirit. Her golden eyes twinkled while ignoring fawning over the pair of hitmen in front of him. “You two are so cute together I just know it had to be something romantic.”

Katsuki resisted rolling his eyes. What the hell was the fixation these people had on romance?

“We met at a restaurant in Vienna,” Hiroji supplied easily and Katsuki nearly gave a dry laugh. The irony was thicker than Peter Moore’s criminal history.

“Oh, Vienna is the perfect setting!” Mina swooned and tilted her head. “Was it one of those super dramatic meetings? Like you tripped but he caught you just in the nick of time?”

“Ha, no,” Hiroji giggled and that stupid goddamn blush flushed across his cheeks again. “I was actually working as a waiter at the time across seas. It was my first day on the job and I happened to be assigned his table.”

Katsuki froze as he listened to the story align to their real first meeting. He didn’t know what he was expecting Hiroji to say—maybe make up a fake story? Say something generically cheesy?

“I was unbelievably nervous about messing up,” Hiroji continued, glancing down at his fingers that he was twiddling with in an anxious manner. “He was super kind whenever I seemed to trip up on pronouncing the German words on the menu. When he smiled at me, I was a goner.”

A soft collective symphony of awes and ‘that’s so sweet’ filled the air and Katsuki stared Hiroji dead in his face.

What the hell was this guy's angle romanticizing that?

Green eyes slowly looked at him and for some reason it didn’t feel like much of a lie when Hiroji gave that same sweet smile—damn near identical to the one that had originally captured him eight years ago.

Katsuki’s chest tightened in an odd manner.

“What made you two talk to each other?” Shouto asked Hiroji with a smile. “Did you slip him your number on a piece of napkin?”

Hiroji gave a strained laugh that rudely reminded Katsuki that this was all fake.

Of course, Hiroji was over exaggerating. Who was he kidding? That damn man never felt that way about him in the first place. The tightening in his chest quickly boiled down to a familiar bitter sensation. A sneer enveloped the blond’s face as he stabbed his fork into the stupid slice of pink cake in front of him.

“Actually, Taro had—”

“—He shot me.” Katsuki tacked on resentfully to throw off the other man. “Twice.”

The entire table’s conversations came to a crashing halt and Hiroji balked.

“I’m sorry, wh-what?” Momo nervously chuckled, perfectly arched eyebrows raising sky high.

Shouto was staring wide at them in disbelief and the two Ashido-Kirishimas were just nodding like it was actually a rad way of meeting someone.

“He’s joking!” Hiroji quickly deflected, waving his hands frantically. “Taro is a really big jokester; I would never shoot anyone. Especially not him. Right, sweetie?” There was a bite to the endearing name that sounded more like a threat. Deku looked at him like he was going to strangle him.

“Of course, I’m joking.” Katsuki gave a condescending smile back as he took an aggressive bite of the pink cake. “You should see the stupid look on all your faces. What I meant to say was it felt like he shot me.”

“And what do you mean by that?” Peter Moore asked with a concerned look.

“He came into my life quickly,” Katsuki muttered reluctantly, trying to fit together words that made sense. “Quick and fast like an annoying little bullet you can’t see coming.”

Every pair of eyes were on him as all the couples were waiting for more than that to come out of his mouth. He glanced to the side at Hiroji and awaiting him was an underlying look of disappointment.

Green eyes flickered down and the small smile that had been there all night was washed away.

Katsuki bit the inside of his cheek at the sudden look of disillusionment. His stomach coiled again for an entirely different reason.

“I meant…when he first came up to me, Hiroji’s presence shocked me, y’know?” Katsuki muttered suddenly. He looked away from Hiroji when the green-eyed man glanced back at him curiously. “I’m no good at that mushy crap but, uh. He was dressed in all red. Not that cheap cherry red color either. No, he was dressed in a really elegant shade of red—like expensive wine—a deep crimson.”

He paused to fully recall the initial breathtaking imagery of the man next to him whose life seemed to be always intertwined with his own.

The words spilled out on their own.

“The color highlighted his eyes,” Katsuki heard himself describing. It was a bizarre experience as he thought about the fateful night from so long ago and soon it flowed out like a river. Believable. Almost normal. “When he looked at me, I felt like his gaze had pierced through me—like a bullet. I had no way of anticipating him.”

Katsuki turned to hold Hiroji’s eye contact.

“It was hard not to want to know someone’s name after that,” he confessed.

The silence that followed that sentence was the loudest thing Katsuki ever experienced. Emerald eyes flickered across his face, sinking deep into him in a way that they hadn’t before. They danced to his own ruby colored eyes. Then to his nose and finally landing on his lips.

And they stayed there for one second too long.

“So, you two meeting was incredibly romantic,” Mina sighed with a large daydreamy expression. “I knew it had to be something absolutely stunning! Ahh, I wish me and Ei had met with something like that. I had gotten lucky and swiped right on him on Tinder while drunk.”

“Yeah,” Hiroji whispered distractedly, not truly paying attention.

Then as quickly as it came, the moment shattered into thin air. Green eyes urgently looked away from him as if it was wrong and they shouldn’t be indulging in whatever small spell had fallen over them.

“Well, who wants another round of dessert?” Peter said with a hearty laugh. “It’s on me!”

Everyone agreed but Katsuki noted how much quieter Hiroji had become.

Dinner concluded with Peter Moore flexing his annoying amount of blood wealth to the point Katsuki was contemplating ending the mission by launching his fork down his throat.

It was almost unnerving how effectively charming the kingpin was. But luckily for both of them, they passed whatever test the man had put them through to go out of his way to join them at dinner.

The night concluded with them all shaking hands and saying goodbye to Peter Moore who insisted that he had to be on his way to make sure everything was in order for another busy day at the hotel.

Everyone dispersed to their rooms but him and Hiroji barely spoke a word back up to the honeymoon suite.

Something was going back and forth in the green haired man’s mind and Katsuki wished that he could at the very minimum see what it was. It was infuriating and nerve wrecking to have to trust the one man he was technically told by Aizawa to kill on sight.

“We need to get rings,” Hiroji muttered as he opened the door to the room.

“Yeah.” Katsuki grumbled and nodded while swiping through google on his phone. “I looked up where to buy jewelry and there's a small shop that’s a couple minute walk away that sells rings, but it’s closed right now. I’m sure we can find something cheap there in the morning.”

Hiroji wordlessly nodded as he walked towards his suitcase and quickly grabbed his belongings out of it.

When finally inside, Katsuki actually took the time to stare around the honeymoon suite. He hadn’t before, too pumped with adrenaline and pinning down the green-eyed hitman when they first entered.

It was nice, even by Katsuki’s standards.

The room had several photos of happy couples hung on the pastel pink wall to fill the air of romance, and a couple oil paintings on the wall to give it a true homely feel. There was a classic grey couch next to the large heart shaped king-sized bed. The silk red covers covered the mattress, the liquid cloth and the dresses spotted vases filled with red roses.

This room would’ve made some couples extremely happy.

He couldn’t help but feel like they were robbing someone out of a good time as both of them stared at the room for the first time, the romantic ambiance gone fully to waste.

Neither man said anything about the one bed situation and Katsuki decided he sure as hell wasn’t about to have that conversation as he opted for the couch without being prompted.

He earned a small look of disapproval from Hiroji, but the freckled man seemed to stop himself from saying whatever objections he had. Instead, the tired curly haired man turned on his heels and went directly to the bathroom to shower.

After an hour of the shower running, Katsuki stripped down to his boxers, switched into a plain tee and laid out on the decently sized grey couch. He shuffled himself into the plush cushions with a spare blanket until he got comfortable and sleep started weighing heavy on his eyes.

The bathroom door across the way creaked open, and the greenette came back out with his hair damp and dressed in oversized light blue PJs that completely masked all lethality attached to him. The far too large cotton shirt was covered in cutesy tiny pink hearts with matching bottoms that swallowed his feet whole.

Red eyes blinked once and then blinked again at the sight in front of him.

Katsuki hated to admit it but Hiroji looked—adorable.

“Um, I think we should start getting to know each other. You know, for the mission,” the freckled man said while pulling an item out of his red suitcase. “In case we get asked more questions we should be prepared.”

“Okay,” Katsuki agreed easily. “Yeah, for the mission.”

He nodded and looked down at what the other man was holding and was surprised to see a worn-down book in his hand. The spine was creased as if it had been abused and read over and over.

“So where are you from, Taro?” Hiroji asked while getting comfortable in the heart shaped king-sized bed by himself with the tiny book.

Katsuki mused to himself while studying the other man. The green-eyed man looked as if the red silk sheets were going to swallow him whole—hell, it almost looked wrong to have such a small person in the bed clearly meant for two by themselves.

“I was born and raised in Tokyo.”

Hiroji tilted his head to the side, bright eyes surveying him. “What part?”

“San’ya, or what’s left of it anyways,” he confessed. The enunciate of his birthplace felt foreign to his ears after such a long time avoiding saying it.

He was given dead silence in return and immediately regretted his decision to speak about his hometown. Why had he told the truth?

Usually, he would lie and say somewhere else like a richer ward to avoid awkwardness. Anything but his home neighborhood that was well known for his economic issues and missing persons in contrast to the rest of Tokyo.

Why hadn’t he lied?

Katsuki stared up at the ceiling in stillness. There was no response from Hiroji, but that was typical. Utter silence and unneeded sympathy were usually the reactions he received from other people from Japan when they heard the name of the forgotten city.

The quiet became too heavy on his ears after a while so he shot the question back.

“How about yourself, Deku? Where are you from?”

“I’m actually from Tokyo as well.”

Katsuki nodded, unsurprised. Tokyo was large and dense. “Where at?”

“Taito—but not the parts that absorbed San’ya,” the gentle voice whispered. Katsuki briefly stopped to consider how much of a coincidence that was that they grew up that closely to each other. “How old are you?”

“Twenty-five.” Katsuki replied. “You?”

“Same age.”

The blond cut his eyes to the freckled man next to him. His fake husband was staring up towards the ceiling fan as if absorbing the information carefully.

“Seriously?” Katsuki snorted at the lame question. “I don’t think anyone is going to ask you what goddamn color I like—”

“—I like red,” Hiroji quickly interjected. Katsuki rolled his eyes but the other man clutched the tiny book in his hands and turned to him as if he was saying something important. “My favorite color is red, and my favorite food is katsudon. I think rain is a pretty sound and my favorite type of music is violin music.”

Katsuki opened his mouth—but didn’t know what to really say.

Violin music?

A small, distant memory blurred in the back of his mind.

“Er. I think we should know small things about each other as well as big things,” Hiroji murmured shyly. “It helps make the story we’re trying to sell more believable while we’re here.”

Katsuki stared at the freckles on the other man, trying his best to chase the fickle foggy memory that had come and gone like sand in his fingertips. But it had slipped away from him and caused his gut to feel bizarre.

“I like...green,” he muttered.

“Baseball. What’s yours?”

They kept going back and forth like this—asking questions until he found himself answering with his eyes closed and the blanket nearly covering his face. He found out Hiroji’s favorite movie was some sort of romantic superhero movie he never heard of, and that unlike Katsuki, he could only handle so much spicy food a week. Didn’t have the correct digestive system for it.

By the time he felt like he knew every nuance and useless fact about the other hitman, Katsuki had enough. He was drifting in and out of consciousness while Hiroji was thumbing through that tiny novel’s oldish tinted yellow pages.

“Sleep. A big fucking helping of it.”

“Hey, I’m serious!”

“Me too. That’s enough questions for one night, nerd. I’m fucking tired,” Katsuki muttered as he fully turned on his side facing the large heart shaped bed. “We got stupid ass couples’ aerobics in the morning and we need to start brainstorming about how we're going to find a way to get the mark isolated."

"Ah, okay, well goodnight," Hiroji said but didn't change his upright position. Instead the man cut off the lights in the room only to leave the tiny desk lap by him on—for reading of all things.

It was oddly normal and domestic.

Katsuki closed his eyes and tried to drift off as he struggled to attempt to recall that distant memory with no luck. His senses kept telling him to go to sleep but his brain refused. After everything the past eight years, his nerve endings were on high alert, waiting for the other body in the room to show signs of sleeping so that he could go to sleep—but it never happened.

Instead, the smaller man stayed up reading until nearly 02:44 flipping through those pages gradually.

"Are you still awake?" Hiroji's voice whispered.

Katsuki slowly opened his eyes and stared up at the ceiling. "Yeah."

There was a beat of silence and shifting in the bed. Katsuki eventually turned his head fully and looked to see lightning green eyes staring at him like he was a book to be read instead. Inquisitiveness danced across the freckled face as Hiroji's small pink tongue darted out to nervously lick his lips as if scared to say his next words.

"...Is your name really Taro?"

Katsuki huffed loudly and immediately tore his eyes away from the other man. How goddamn stupid did Deku think he was?

"Go to bed. I'm not telling you my real name."

"I promise I won't use it against you. I'm only curious after all this time—"

"—I fucking said no." Katsuki snapped loudly before he could catch himself. "Why the hell would I give you my real name when you've tried to kill me on several occasions and have fucking shot me countless times?"

There was a pause and Katsuki could hear Hiroji shift on the bed.

"I've never tried to kill you," the deceiving gentle voice weakly defended.

If Katsuki didn't know better he would've mistaken the voice for someone else, not a deadly killer.

"Whatever. Just drop it," Katsuki hissed and turned all the way over. "I don't give out my real name to people in our line of work. Especially not people like you."

“Right.” Hiroji’s voice was tight, strung high with tension as if he was unhappy with the reality of the situation. “That’s understandable. Sorry for asking.”

“Goodnight,” Katsuki grumbled and threw the covers over his head. “And put the fucking book away. Reading in the dark is bad for your eyes and you need to stay sharp.”

“I will soon, I just got to the good part.”

Soon never came, and Katsuki's body didn’t want to relax until it did.

He peaked over his shoulder to see the other man just sitting there neatly—still reading in the near dark room. The tiny yellowish light source from the bedside lamp only illuminated enough space to reach the printed words on the page. There was no doubt in Katsuki’s mind that the nerd was straining his eyes as he squinted slightly and pulled the book closer to his freckled face.

Gradually a tiny smile cracked on his face and Deku bit his lip to suppress a laugh. That tiny spark of joy of whatever Deku was reading made him seem—human.

Normal.

Like the roles they were supposed to be playing were true: two regular people together on a getaway.

He knew he shouldn’t. He knew he really shouldn’t—but once again the words came tumbling out before he could get a hold on them. Almost as if they were drawn out by the mere gravity of the man in front of him.

“My real name is Katsuki.”

His heart hammered unkindly against his chest.

Green eyes perked up to stare directly at him. Surprise. Astonishment—a hint of revelation was also mixed in there. All those stupid emotions swirled inside all too intensely for the blond who preferred to ignore such things.

“Katsuki?” Hiroji said. His tongue curved around all the syllables and those never-ending forest colored eyes never left his. The grip on the book grew tighter. “That’s a nice name. I-It suits you very well.”

“Now, what’s your name?” Katsuki asked, getting straight to what he wanted. “I know it’s not Hiroji.”

He burned to know deep down—to wonder what name actually graced the person who had always seemed to pop in and out of his life. Katsuki watched striking green eyes turn into pretty half crescent moons again. The freckled man smiled at him.

The same sweet smile with the same dimples. A genuine one.

“I’m Izuku.”

Izuku.

This time, he knew in his gut it was real as he fell asleep with the sound of a distant violin playing in his head.

Chapter Three — Enharmonic

Katsuki felt like he was free falling in a vast pool of darkness.

It was thick and suffocating. It pulled him deeper into his thoughts and there was nothing he could grasp onto as he wildly flailed his arms. His fingers stretched painfully for anything to give him purchase but the darkness slipped past his skin like black ink.

Part of him vibrated with fear as he fell into the abyss. However, another part of him recognized what was happening: he was dreaming. These types of dreams leaked into his subconscious when he was far into a deep sleep.

He got these dreams frequently—usually of his mother. His mind would curse him of vivid memories of her like he was trapped in reliving her short lived life over and over.

When the feeling of falling finally stopped it was always abrupt.

It felt as though his soul was ruthlessly slammed into the cold ground. But instead of the ground, he was hurled into his seven-year-old body with a snap like someone was breaking his spine.

Within an instant, the pain gracefully dissolved. Then afterwards, he would be viewing his childhood through his darkly tinted dreams.

The details were always hazy. Faces of the other homeless people were blurred as they gathered around their makeshift shelters. He struggled to remember anyone's name, even the ones he remembered being kind to him.

His frantic eyes looked around desperately as he heard the crunch of snow. This time the dream was winter—other times in the dreams it was summer. This reflected the days he spent alone without his mother. She had disappeared somewhere for nearly a full year when he was seven. All Katsuki could remember past the trauma was being alone, cold and terrified.

Blurry faced men and women were bundled up, gathered around large bins with fire and were tucked in close to each other. The people murmured and stared at him expectantly—but he never knew what they were expecting.

Then the dream went the way it always did: with him wandering aimlessly in the falling snow trying to find his mom. In the background, the faint sound of violin music played like a lullaby.

It was always the same hauntingly beautiful melody. The frigid wetness from the snow seeped slowly into his tattered shoes. The bitter bite of the cold made each step harder to take as he fruitlessly searched. He would call out for her in the cold winter with a hoarse voice. The edges of his vision were vignette black and the frost bite gnawed away at his fingertips.

He asked several people to help him, but they all shook their blurry heads and pointed towards the empty plaza.

He looked in the direction of the plaza. Standing in the middle of the open area was a broken water fountain. It was old, built of grey stone and cracked all over. It was a relic of their district's former glory that was brittle and dry now just like the district was. He walked towards it carefully, the sound of violin grew louder as he neared.

Then he came face to face with the source of the sound.

It was an elder man with a white violin. He was standing below a forgotten statue of an angel that was covered in snow. His hair was pure white, and his face was dotted with liver spots. The bags under his eyes were heavy with grief and sadness as he moved the bow of his instrument with deep purpose. Katsuki noted how he was playing as if he was in front of an entire crowd at some grand ball and not the quiet streets of San'ya with an audience of one.

Then Katsuki moved his eyes to the small wooden bench and realized he wasn't the only one there. The violinist was playing for a crowd of two it seemed.

A small boy politely sat on the wooden bench with his eyes trained on the man. He had dark hair and was neatly dressed—someone that young Katsuki would consider rich. He had a puffy red coat, gloves, yellow scarf and yellow ear muffs to keep him warm. Even his boots were shiny and expensive.

That boy didn't belong here—he was clearly taken care of by someone.

Dream Katsuki looked down at his ragged clothes and he felt a shiver run up his spine. The various holes in his shoes, shirt, and pants were letting all the cold air in as he shook under the harsh winter wind.

He sneezed lightly and the other boy in his dream turned to him.

It was like a dream within a dream as the figure faced him, revealing a white bandage wrapped around one eye. It had dark red blood stained on it, but the other eye was blurred out. The no-faced boy looked down at Katsuki's feet and asked something inaudible.

Katsuki squinted and strained to hear him. Then he crept closer as the boy kept mouthing something to him. Katsuki walked forward until he finally stood right in front of the other boy. Then finally the quiet words became crystal clear. The tiny voice was soft, gentle and caring.

"Are you cold?"

Katsuki tilted his head and like an eerie mirror, the faceless boy did too.

Katsuki scrunched his face as his memory started clearing. Bits and pieces of this dream were false, but the other parts were true. He suddenly remembered in his dream haze that this was a real memory. It was always distant and far out of his reach from being clear.

He stretched his hand up to touch the boy's face in an attempt to feel out what he looked like. However, he was snatched from the depths of his dream by a large shake to his body. He went forcefully toppling to the cold, snow covered ground.

The blurry faced boy repeated his question.

"Are you cold?"

Katsuki fearfully looked around as the dreamscape started crumbling in every direction. Pieces of the fountain caved in on itself, the hard stones shattered to the ground with large reverberations. Dread crackled against Katsuki's nerves as he felt his body shaken again. He was thrusted in the opposite direction of the boy, who was still worried about him.

"Are you cold?"

Katsuki looked up again. This time the statue of the angel began to crumble. A piece of the debris went flying straight for the faceless boy—who didn't move. He only repeated his question like he was stuck on a glitch.

Katsuki screamed and moved to save the boy in front of him from the toppling stones.

"Are you—"

Katsuki's scarlet eyes snapped open, and his body sprung up on the tiny grey couch. He automatically lurched forward, and he went crashing onto the ground when he lost his balance. He felt another body topple downwards with him and a loud groan filled the room. Katsuki's arm extended to grab the figment of the dream that was still hazy in his mind.

He thought he had grabbed the boy—but instead he grabbed something else.

Or someone else.

When Katsuki finally focused he realized he was, in fact, no longer dreaming. Instead, he was very much awake in his new hell, this stupid hotel.

Coupled with that, his hand was currently wrapped around a certain green haired nuisance's throat.

Katsuki took a second to assess their positions. His body was placed on top of the other hitman's. One of his hands was next to the menace's head, and the other was effectively pinning the man down by his throat.

But what threw Katsuki off the most was the fucking near nudeness of the other.

Damp green curls were messy and plastered to his forehead from the water. Plus, his bare chest was on display, the tattoo of the number 217 on his clavicle was clear and there was a skimpy white towel barely wrapped around his waist. It was neatly tucked in at his hips but was dangerously fucking close to exposing what was between the man's smooth legs. Legs that were wide fucking open.

And Katsuki's knee was right there.

Katsuki groaned and hung his head in defeat.

Yup. He wasn't fucking dreaming anymore.

There was a hint of surprise sprinkled across the other man's freckled face. Then that surprise changed to mild amusement.

Katsuki glowered when the man now identified as Izuku gave a sweet smile. A smile that quickly felt condescending and annoying as shit. Katsuki debated heavily on whether he should remove his hand or choke this motherfucker to death for real. He technically did have kill orders on this man.

"Wow. You're really getting into your role as a lover," Izuku teased lightly. "If I didn't know any better, I would say you look like you're going to kiss me."

Katsuki frowned in disgust. "I am choking you."

"Not hard enough to be threatening or enjoyable though." Izuku lifted his hands to cover Katsuki's larger one. He squeezed lightly on it to apply some level of pressure. "You have to commit a bit more if you're going to put your hands around my throat like this."

And with that Katsuki snatched his hand backwards like it had been bitten.

A small rush of heat ran down his spine as he noted how his hand had wrapped a little too perfectly around the slender throat.

Still heavy with sleep, Katsuki pushed himself off from the ground and shook his head. That damn Deku slowly lifted himself off the ground too and awkwardly scratched behind his head.

“And good morning to you too,” Izuku said with a small smile. “I thought we would at least get past two days without attempt of murder. Didn’t think it would be immediately the next morning after we gave introductions.”

“It’s your own damn fault, dumbass,” Katsuki bit back unkindly. His red eyes narrowed suspiciously as he remembered the crumbling debris in his dream and how hard his body had shaken. “Why the hell were you so close to me anyways?”

“You were, uh, shaking and muttering a bit in your sleep,” Izuku explained. Green eyes looked him up and down carefully—almost as if he gave a damn. “You seemed like you were having a nightmare of sorts, so I shook you awake.”

“So? Let me have the goddamn nightmare, you weirdo.”

Katsuki scowled. He walked away from the other man, eager to put some distance between them. Katsuki stopped in front of his red suitcase and bent down. He unzipped it a bit harder than needed, letting out some aggression.

The faded pieces of the strange dream were still lingering behind in his mind. It left him in a pensive state as he thought about the nameless boy with the bloodied, bandaged eye from his childhood.

Izuku walked over to him slowly. “I know but—”

“—But what?” Katsuki snapped.

He turned his head towards the other. However, an unexpected thump from his heart hit his sternum as he locked eyes with Izuku. Striking green irises were staring at him with a twinge of care.

Without notice, his gut twisted with an odd sensation. So, he lashed out.

“Were you worried or some shit, Deku? Mind your fucking business next time and don’t touch me.”

And that seemed to be the switch.

Izuku's eyes drained of all compassion and an invisible wall stacked sky high between them. Izuku straightened his back and pushed his hands down to his side. The sudden flip of emotions would've thrown Katsuki off if he didn't know the doe-eyed man was a trained killer.

"Right," Izuku said stiffly. His eyes skirted off to the side. "You should go ahead and get dressed. I already showered, so the bathroom is all yours."

Izuku turned around and tightened the towel around his waist.

Katsuki struggled to tear his eyes away as he followed the motion of Izuku's hands. The small, fuzzy towel was barely covering the other's lower body. Scarlet eyes briefly traced up and down the other's freckled backside and noted all the tiny scars and gunshot wounds. Then his eyes dipped below the hem of the towel.

He blinked once and then blinked twice.

Seeing that ass now, up close and personal, felt bizarre. Usually, it was retreating away from him at full speed but now there it was—barely cladded and in his face. If Izuku was to bend over, even in the slightest, he was positive he would get a full view of the other's sensitive areas.

Heat suddenly tickled Katsuki's nape. He quickly tore his eyes away before he could study the other's body any longer.

Focus. He reprimanded himself. Fucking focus and stop staring at that menace's ass.

Katsuki reached inside of his suitcase and grabbed his two handguns and usual outfit. He headed towards the bathroom. The air in the bathroom was still dampened with the lingering scent of fresh soap as his foggy mind started to clear up.

Once the green nuisance was out of his head, his thoughts wandered back to his dream as he prepped for his shower. He thought about the crumbling statue of the angel and that violinist.

Katsuki couldn't help but grow disquieted as he stripped himself down.

He climbed into the shower. He let the hot water hit him steadily as he unwillingly reflected on that part of his childhood. Usually his dreams were of his mother these days. Katsuki wondered what the hell triggered such an intense resurgence of that time in his life. He used to be haunted by that song and those dreams when he was a teen, but they had been buried for so long Katsuki hadn't felt any fear about them coming back.

Those dreams were always unpleasant. They were a dark, distorted version of a specific era in his childhood that he struggled with accepting. He always wanted to forget that year happened—but he apparently couldn't.

No matter how hard he tried.

It was the year his mother had up and fucking disappeared when he was seven. She had given him a sweet smile, exactly a useless handful of yen and pointed to their makeshift tent of a home on the street. Katsuki remembered how confused he had been because it was the dead of winter, and she never came back that year.

Katsuki hated that year because it was the year he had to fend for himself. As a child. Alone.

Well. Almost alone.

His mind wandered back to the faceless boy in the dream with the bloodied and bandaged eye. Katsuki paused washing his hair for a moment.

What was his name again?

Katsuki used to know it. He had spent a year with the kid but after so much that happened between when he was seven to now, it was hazy. He stared blankly ahead at the shower's white tiled surface. The blurry face in his dream flashed in the front of his mind and he struggled to clear the fog around the boy—

—But before Katsuki could dive deeper in that part of his memory, there was a timid knock on the door.

"Are you swimming in there?" Izuku called out from the other side. "We still need to go purchase rings and if you take any longer, we're going to miss breakfast. I would prefer not to bring any more attention to us from Moore."

"I'm almost fucking done," Katsuki shouted back, fully irritated. "We'll be fine! Go sit your antsy ass down."

He grumbled, resumed washing his hair, and buried all thoughts of that year of his childhood. He barely could remember the way that boy looked, much less his name. Like a hundred times before, he vowed again to let it go.

It was damn near pointless to ponder over past things like that. Especially now.

This was his last assignment, and if all went right then he could go settle down in a quiet life like he planned. All his past pains would be buried so far deep that he would pretty much be starting a second life.

Katsuki finished showering and getting ready in the bathroom in silence. His nerves were automatically on edge because of who stood on the other side of the door. He wondered how the fuck this was going to work considering the closest they've ever been to communicating was via bullets and knives.

Katsuki pulled on a tight black turtleneck. It was one of his favorites because it was thin and defined his built biceps well. Simple but neat enough to give him some level of style and highlight his muscular physique. He paired the shirt with his favorite black pants and sleek black belt to complete the look.

It was a perfect juxtaposition for how goddamn pink the hotel was and gave him a sense of balance. He meticulously combed his blond spikes into a neat formation and then put in his black fang shaped earrings. He finished off his look with his silver chain.

Katsuki sighed as he loaded up his two black pistols bullet by bullet. He cocked them for good measure because there was no way in hell he was going to spend this mission disarmed when his worst nightmare was glued to him. He strapped them securely in his hidden calf holsters under both of his pants' legs.

When he emerged from the bathroom, sitting on the bed looking as patient as a saint was Izuku. Green eyes cut to him and both men froze at the sight of each other.

Katsuki's heart did a peculiar flip.

The first thing he noticed was the tiny Band-Aid covering up Izuku's number tattoo.

The second thing he noticed was the ungodly amount of pink that assaulted his eyes.

Izuku was dressed in a neat, damn near pretty, rose pink shirt that had a white hibiscus flower pattern on it. The shirt itself was unbuttoned, revealing a white tank underneath that was tucked into light khaki-colored shorts. Very fucking short shorts. On his feet were pink sneakers and cutesy white socks that were halfway up his calf. The little bastard even had pink heart shaped earrings in. The pink perfectly complimented his dark moss-colored curls.

"You look fucking hideous," Katsuki deadpanned.

Large green eyes blinked rapidly at him as if they were snatched from a daze. Izuku refocused and looked at him with a confused face. His button nose scrunched up.

"Stop staring then," Izuku replied. He then gestured up and down to Katsuki's outfit with an unimpressed expression. "Are you really going to wear that? This is supposed to be a happy place."

"I don't do happy, Deku."

"I'll be sure to ask around for the nearest funeral for you to attend."

Katsuki ignored the smart-ass comment and shook his head.

He packed his work out gear for their stupid couple's aerobics later in his small, black backpack. He begrudgingly slung one strap over his shoulder. He put on his sleek black shoes, fully completing his outfit. When he turned around, Katsuki put his hand on his hip impatiently when Izuku continued to stare at him like he was some wild animal.

"You got all the shit you need, Deku? Or are you going to keep staring at me like you have a single brain cell?"

Izuku cleared his throat and snapped his sights away from Katsuki. "Let me get my aerobics clothes."

He watched as Izuku packed up his workout clothes in a tiny yellow backpack. Katsuki scowled deeply because he disliked how fucking sweet this man looked right now. His freckles only added to the harmless demeanor and Katsuki wondered if this was part of his ruse as a hitman. Dress like a normal dork to throw everyone around off.

Katsuki watched Izuku place his vintage, pink, heart shaped sunglasses on top of his head of curls like he really was on vacation.

Then he watched how the man packed the worn-down book from the previous night in his bag. This was enough to give Katsuki pause in his rampant judgement. He caught a glimpse of the title that was in delicate, romantic lavender lettering: Saishū kōkyōkyoku.

Katsuki tilted his head curiously as Izuku zipped it tight in his backpack.

“Alright, I got everything,” Izuku said with a cheery smile. “Anything else before we go?”

“Yeah, can we discuss how we are going to kill this bastard?” Katsuki asked the obvious question. “Did you have anything in mind specifically?”

“Well, since he knows us now, we can’t do a stealth job.” Izuku tapped his finger on his chin. “We could use this to our advantage though. We can gain his trust and find an opening that way.”

“I agree, we have to befriend him, track his habits and then strike when we’re alone. Possibly a night job and then cover up with alibis.”

“Yeah. I like that. Let’s aim to get him alone and make it look like some sort of suicide or murder-suicide to close the loop. That way police won’t go hunting around for a killer,” Izuku suggested. “I have a list of people in his circle that we could frame. He has an assistant, Minoru Koizumi, who seems to be his right-hand man.”

“You want to try to set him up?”

“If possible, yes.” Izuku nodded, his deep green eyes were very serious as he stared at the wall in deep thought. “Koizumi knows a lot about Moore’s trafficking operations. It would be a believable story for the police that they turned on each other at their headquarters.”

“So, the stage will be his headquarters then.”

“Yes. My handler called for all his underground operations to come to light. A murder-suicide at their operation grounds would be ideal.”

“Do you know where those grounds are?”

“Somewhere in the Okinawa area. The hotel is a ruse to lure victims in, but his HQ is reportedly nearby to get them sorted into the underground. We just have to find it.”

Katsuki disliked admitting it, but he liked the way Izuku thought.

It could work. It could work very well. The only issue Katsuki worried about was the detail of being overly friendly with Peter Moore. That required them acting like the perfect couple to the point the bastard would let his guard down.

The idea of pretending to be in love made Katsuki’s chest twist bitterly. He sucked in a deep breath and pushed down all his worries. Last assignment. This was his last assignment—he could do it. Fake being in love, and he was set for the rest of his life.

They walked towards the downtown area of Nago, Okinawa that they were located in.

The scene itself was beautiful. Katsuki had to give Peter Moore credit for the location he settled in. This was truly the perfect spot for a hotel that was targeted towards lovesick couples and singles. The fluffy white clouds in the sky were gently floating above them, mimicking the texture of cotton candy that was soft enough to touch and even taste. The blue ocean next to them was sparkling with the tiny rays of light it caught in its waves.

Katsuki listened to Izuku hum lightly and couldn’t help but realize the weirdo was harmonizing with the distant sound of wind chimes. He would’ve said something along the lines of ‘shut the hell up’ or ‘be quiet’ just to get under the man’s skin—but Izuku’s light humming was actually decent.

It was a gentle melody, and it lulled a part of Katsuki’s angry spirit. He cut his eyes to the man next to him to study him closely out of instinct. Large, green eyes were taking in all the various sights as they walked past the docks. Different sized boats were stationed all around with fishermen, captains and tourists all geared up to go to the different islands around Okinawa.

They passed by one particular dock that had a large, white arc at the beginning. It was decorated in pretty, green leaves and sitting at the top was the symbol of a white dove. The animal of purity was carrying an olive branch.

Katsuki raised a curious brow at the large, all white cruise boat. It was big enough for at least one hundred folks.

“The White Dove,” Izuku said as he read the gold text underneath the image of the dove. They passed by the port a little slower when they noted how this boat had a line wrapped around to the other side. “I wonder where that boat goes. Maybe we can check it out if there’s down time later.”

Katsuki snorted and rolled his eyes.

“There is no fucking ‘we’,” he reminded unkindly. “The only reason my foot isn’t up your ass is because we share a mark and got roped into this bullshit together. I can’t afford to blow this, so I’m stomaching all this crap the best I can. This is not a vacation.”

“But it might as well be! I mean look around, this place is really beautiful,” Izuku said with a curl of excitement at the end. His doe eyes laid sights on all the lush greenery that held delicate, tiny flowers. He grinned up at the pink blossoms in the trees above them. “C’mon you have to be enjoying this. Unless you've already been here before?”

“No, this is my first time,” Katsuki said. He admired the setting too, despite himself. “But you’re right. It is beautiful. That trafficking bastard has good taste.”

Katsuki adjusted his black sunglasses on his face as he caught the eye of several people. They looked him up and down, probably confused by his all-black outfit. He scowled at them instantly and took pleasure in the way the nosy extras quickly averted their gaze. Katsuki gave a delighted, wicked smirk.

Red eyes then turned their targets on the humming hitman next to him.

“So how about you, Deku?” Katsuki asked. “Have you been here before?”

“Ah, nope! This is my first time as well,” Izuku offered up casually. He skipped slightly in his step. Bubbly. Bubbly as fucking ever. “I’ve read about this place a lot though! Which makes me excited to be here.”

“Does that little book of yours happen to take place here?”

Izuku spluttered slightly in surprise. Wide eyes rounded on him, and dark green eyebrows were raised up all the way in surprise.

“What? Don’t act so surprised,” Katsuki commented. “I saw you hide that ratty thing in your backpack like you were tucking it in a little hidey hole.”

He tilted his head at how goddamn strange Izuku was acting over the mention of the book. Then when Izuku blushed, it clicked. A cruel smirk twitched its way on Katsuki’s face at the thought.

“It does take place here, doesn’t it, Deku?”

“Erm, yeah,” Izuku admitted as he rubbed his nape. Blush the same color as his shirt crept all the way up from his collarbone to his cheeks. “I-It’s my favorite book. I was really happy to take this assignment when it was offered to us.”

“Oh, this is fucking gold.” Katsuki snickered and grinned down at the shorter man. “Please don’t tell me it’s some sappy romance novel. That would be fucking hilarious for someone like you to be reading a love story.”

Izuku paused slightly, slowing his pace. His eyebrows furrowed as he looked at Katsuki.

“Someone like...me?”

“Yeah. Y’know.” Katsuki gestured between the two of them like it was obvious. “Someone like us.” He whispered the last part as if the unsaid words would hang in the air.

Killers. Assassins. Hitmen.

Surely even damn Deku had to understand what he was talking about: people like them who clearly shouldn’t fucking fall in love or buy into romantic propaganda. Katsuki sure as hell didn't. And given Izuku was the only person he knew who could best him, he assumed the other hitman had enough sense not to believe in something as fickle as love.

"What if it was a romance story?" Izuku said carefully. "Would that be so bad?"

"That would be fucking rich coming from you," Katsuki retorted without thinking. "Don't tell me you're a hopeless romantic for real?"

He turned his eyes ahead of them looking critically at all the couples walking by. They were all holding hands in the morning light. A small bitter piece of him twisted at the sight.

Katsuki waited a moment for some smart-ass response—but he got silence in return.

He finally looked down beside him to see Izuku looking longingly at the couples. Izuku slowly folded his arms in a protective way and then pursed his lips. He glanced down to the stone pavement quietly as they walked and slowed his pace. Katsuki slowed down his stride automatically with Izuku's.

"Wait. Are you?" Katsuki asked a bit more seriously.

His eyebrows raised to the sky, not expecting to hit that on the head.

He shouldn't care. Katsuki had been bumping into Izuku for years, but he only knew the man's personal choice of gun and knife. But now, the layers of Izuku's bubbly personality were becoming exposed rather rapidly. But fuck—Deku—deadly fucking Deku—a possible hopeless romantic?

His curiosity prickled dangerously as he looked at the silky head of curls.

"Hey," Katsuki probed again when Izuku didn't answer. "Deku. Are you deaf? I asked you a question—"

"—And I'm choosing not to answer if you're going to poke fun at me," Izuku snapped. There was a deep blush of embarrassment on the shorter man's face as he tightened his folded arms protectively. "It's none of your business anyways. Let's hurry up and get the rings so we can go eat."

The sudden shift in demeanor made Katsuki raise a brow. Izuku's bubbly aura deflated into something sour that surprisingly stung Katsuki.

Katsuki opened his mouth to say more but Izuku started walking quickly until he was ahead of him. The shorter man beelined right towards the nearest jewelry store without sparing him a single glance. Red eyes blinked rapidly at the sudden blow off. There wasn't even some hint of sassy retort just a flat out: fuck off.

Katsuki's chest twisted with something he didn't dare to name.

He frowned and followed behind Izuku until they both were in front of the shiny section of rings. He noted how Izuku looked visibly bristled. Extremely so. Katsuki watched as green eyes traced up and down the different items as if looking for the right fake wedding rings in his pissed off state.

“Let’s buy whatever,” Izuku grumbled. He still didn’t look at Katsuki and for some reason it slightly bothered him. “It doesn’t matter what we pick, I guess.”

Katsuki frowned deeply as he slightly bent at the waist to lean down to the other man’s height.

“...You know I’m joking, right?” Katsuki tried to back track. “It doesn’t matter if it’s a romance novel or whatever.”

He licked his chapped lips. He felt a bit ridiculous trying to coddle a man who had no issue holding a knife to his jugular less than a week ago. Katsuki told himself that he didn’t really care if Izuku was upset—but he reasoned that he didn’t need the other hitman to be pissed with him during this assignment.

When it boiled down to it, they still had to pretend to like each other.

“It’s fine,” Izuku muttered, turning away from him. The irritated air around him melted into something resigned with an underlying sadness. “Let’s choose the rings. I’m sure some plain gold bands will do just fine.”

Katsuki pressed his tongue to the side of his cheek to hold back a comment.

It was so damn obvious whatever he said about the romance shit was bothering Izuku. He guessed his inquiry was right. Damn Deku was a hopeless romantic and he was fucking sensitive about it.

Katsuki huffed through his nose. He grew annoyed the longer he studied Izuku’s closed off body language. He didn’t need this damn dork in a sullen mood when they had to go to breakfast and aerobics. He needed this motherfucker to go back to skipping and in his little Lala-Deku world. If he was visibly saddened that was surely going to raise eyebrows—right?

Katsuki eyed the assortment of rings.

“How about those ones?” Katsuki said with slight reluctancy. He pointed with his thumb to the rings with gems in them off to the side. Izuku frowned and followed the gesture, surprised to see where Katsuki was pointing. “We could, er, get the ones with gems in it. Green for me and red for you.”

Izuku stared at him, baffled. “Red and green for our favorite colors?”

“No, dumbass. Green and red for our eyes,” Katsuki hissed impatiently. He was attempting to be nice but not that nice. “It would sell the whole fake husbands bullshit if we went the super mushy route, right? I can wear the green one and you wear the red one. We’ll say it’s to keep a piece of the other with us at all times or something.”

“Are you sure you’re not a romance novel lover as well?” Izuku’s cold demeanor thawed with a tiny twitch of a smile. “That sounds like something straight out of a book I’ve read before."

"Oh, shut the hell up, dipshit, and let's buy the rings." Katsuki glowered in an attempt to hide the blush that rushed to his cheeks. "You're getting on my last fucking nerve and it's not even the afternoon yet."

"Alright alright." Izuku laughed lightly and Katsuki hated how melodic it sounded. "We can get the green and red ones. You're right, the mushy route works well."

They continued and picked out the rings. Katsuki grabbed the black gold wedding band that had a strip of rich jade gems sandwiched in the center. He held it up to Izuku's eyes and the other hitman looked at him surprised a bit. Then Izuku realized what Katsuki was doing and stood still with his hands patiently clasped together in front of him. He stared directly into Katsuki's eyes.

Another unannounced thump against his chest occurred.

Katsuki swallowed as they made eye contact for the first time without deadly intentions.

Izuku looked shy as he struggled to maintain eye contact with Katsuki. A small pink colored blush appeared across his freckled face. He held up the jade encrusted ring next to Izuku's eyes.

Katsuki tilted his head as he glanced back and forth between Izuku's doe eyes and the ring.

"Not quite," Katsuki muttered without breaking eye contact.

It wasn't the right shade. Sure, there were bits and pieces of jade and light green sprinkled inside of Izuku's eyes like stupid little stars, but the base color was deeper—more earthy and rich. He had come to know those lethal eyes well the last eight years. If he wanted to, he could probably list five different shades of green that Izuku's eyes held.

But there was no way in hell he was going to do that in this lifetime.

Katsuki inwardly cursed himself when his heart sped up a bit at the same moment Izuku gave a shy smile. He quickly put down the ring in his hand and turned again to the selection. He searched over the green hues carefully until one caught his eye. This time Katsuki reached for the black gold ring with shining emeralds encrusted in the center.

He held it up to Izuku's eyes in the same fashion as the last.

His breath nearly hitched. The gems exactly resembled the deep green irises staring at him.

"Perfect match," Katsuki said quietly.

He lowered the ring slightly as they stared at each other for a moment. Pretty. Izuku's eyes were still so fucking pretty up-close after all these years since Vienna.

This time when Izuku smiled at him, Katsuki felt an odd flip in his chest again. It was close to the feeling he felt in Vienna and made him disgruntled that such a feeling was bubbling inside of him again. But because of how light and fluttering it felt, Katsuki buried it deep.

He cleared his throat, successfully breaking the moment and unceremoniously waved his hand towards the rings again.

“Your turn, Deku,” Katsuki said without too much bite.

Izuku took one quick look at Katsuki’s eyes and then reached for a matching black gold ring that had deep colored ruby gems inside the middle. He held it up to Katsuki’s eyes for a moment before his face split wide with a toothy smile.

“Got it,” Izuku said cheerfully.

Katsuki furrowed his brow at the quickness. “What? On the first try?”

“Yeah. I think I know your eyes well enough by now to pick out the right gems to match,” Izuku said casually, confusing the other.

Katsuki stammered as he thought about what Izuku had proclaimed.

What the fuck does he mean he knows my eyes?

Katsuki was going to ask just what the hell did that mean, but he was left a little speechless by the fact Izuku apparently had his exact shade of red memorized. He almost felt a smidge bit guilty about how it took him two tries to get Izuku’s eye color—but he shook his head at the thought quickly. That type of shit didn’t matter.

Izuku smiled tightly and spun on his heels towards the counter.

He’s odd. Katsuki said to himself when that stupid fluttering feeling slithered under his skin again. Ignore him, he’s a hopeless romantic weirdo who has shot you several times.

They checked out at the counter with little conversation as a new atmosphere bubbled around them. Katsuki didn’t miss the way Izuku seemed nearly happy to have the ring. The dork stared at it like it was something he only ever imagined in his wildest dreams. There was a twinge of reservation in that freckled face, but Katsuki could see straight through the facade. Izuku was happy about getting the red and green rings.

They both slid the new jewelry on their ring fingers and the weight of it tethered Katsuki to reality. Izuku stared for a moment at his ruby encrusted ring, before blinking rapidly. He flashed Katsuki a fake smile before gesturing to head back to the hotel.

Katsuki quietly looked down at his ring then to his pretend husband.

The new weight on his hand felt heavy with the implication that this dumb situation was very real.

They made their way back to the hotel and all around them, more people were up and about. The couples and singles in the hotel had officially risen awake to begin another ignorantly happy day.

Him and Izuku made their way to the dining hall and like the last time they were inside, Katsuki couldn't help but study the painted angels on the ceiling. Particularly the one section off to the corner that he noticed the last time.

He stared at the visual of the limp, dead man in the weeping angel's arms.

The same unsettling feeling washed over Katsuki the longer he stared at it above the heads of all the happy people. But unlike last night's dinner, in the background there was a small orchestra playing classical music. The flow of the strings, wind instruments and piano were pleasant to Katsuki's ears as he and Izuku made their way to their designated table.

Franz Liszt, Liebestraum. Love Dream, Katsuki casually thought to himself when the melody became clearer. He nodded slightly to the seated mini orchestra with an approving look. Good choice. Seems like everything here isn't utterly tacky.

From a distance Katsuki could already see their circus of colorful assigned friends. Loud ass fire truck red hair, bubble gum pink and a two-toned bowl cut stood out from the distance. They were all already chatting it seemed like. A tiny hand from Jirou in the distance waved at the two of them. Both hitmen gave tiny waves back.

There's our dumb ass crew.

As they patiently waited to get to the front of the line, Katsuki watched how Izuku studied all the various couples around. Or more specifically, he studied their interlocked fingers.

"Maybe we should hold hands," Izuku suggested nervously as he glanced around. "We look like we barely like each other."

"We do barely like each other," Katsuki deadpanned as he crossed his arms. "I've had to stop myself from gagging twice this morning at the sight of you."

"You know what I mean," Izuku whispered quietly with a twinge of annoyance. "We should hold hands to blend in more."

"No," Katsuki aggressively whispered back. "We don't need to be one of those disgusting PDA couples—"

"—Just do it, Taro."

Katsuki was about to belt out a loud 'fuck off, Hiroji' but he stopped when Izuku unhappily gestured to the different pairs surrounding them. They were indeed the only ones not being lovey dovey. Everyone else was making gushy eyes at each other so hard that Katsuki could practically see the invisible cartoon hearts floating around them.

Katsuki groaned.

Fuck this. Fuck this six ways and back. He was an assassin goddamnit. Hell, he was fucking known as The Scarlet Eyed Killer—he shouldn't be subjected to this.

He stared down at Izuku resentfully.

"Don't make it weird," Katsuki hissed from behind his clenched teeth. He narrowed his eyes. "If you make it weird, I'm going to punch you right here and now."

He held his hand open and Izuku took it.

They stumbled for a bit to get it right. First, they both squeezed too tightly. Katsuki nearly crushed Izuku's small hand in his. Then they messed up interlocking their fingers over and over to the point it began to look clumsy as they stood in line for food.

Several people turned their way as they lightly bickered back and forth until finally Izuku huffed. The green-eyed man shot his other hand out and seized Katsuki's wrist impatiently. He held it steady and then Izuku carefully slotted their fingers together and gripped tightly.

Warm. That was Katsuki's first thought as they dropped the struggle and finally held hands.

His second thought was that he hated how he was possibly blushing. Katsuki had never held hands with anyone—not since he was a fucking kid.

The gesture was too intimate. Good for the facade they were putting on, but bad for his anti-romantic heart. He could feel that there were calluses on Izuku's palm, matching in the exact same places as his—but the skin on top of his hand felt nearly delicate. Soft.

"Now, was that so bad?" Izuku grumbled as they walked together in line.

"I feel a little piece of my soul dying as we speak."

"You're so melodramatic."

He nearly snatched his hand back when Izuku squeezed it lightly.

They grabbed their plates of buffet style breakfast food before walking over to their round table. Hand in fucking hand. Much to Katsuki's displeasure, it seemed like Mina, Momo, and Shouto were ecstatic to see them.

"Taro! Hiroji!" Mina greeted them with a wide grin. "Good morning you two love birds! How did you sleep?"

Like hell.

"Like we were on a cloud," Katsuki lied through his teeth. "How about you guys?"

And that offset the conversation as they settled down in their chairs with their porcelain plates.

Everyone began talking about things that Katsuki didn't care to listen to. He tuned them out, thinking of ways to stage their eventual murder-suicide as Momo blabbered something about the sky being gorgeous last night. Then her girlfriend, Jirou, reinforced it while Shouto and Inasa nodded in agreement with them. The conversation kept going for a long time as Katsuki fell into his role as stoic husband to Izuku's social butterfly personality.

Katsuki stared around casually until he caught sight of the hotel owner. He smirked slightly as the man waved to him and Katsuki motioned him over to their table.

Time to be friends with this fucker.

Moore grinned as he walked over in his white suit to their table.

"Good morning to my favorite couple!" Moore beamed at them. He clasped his large hands down on Izuku's shoulders, leaning over him slightly. "Sorry, everyone else. These two take the cake for me."

"It's no problem," Shouto said as he took a bite of a helping of vegetables. "They are quite a pair."

"I wanted to ask, how was your night in the honeymoon suite, Bakugous?" Moore asked. He glanced between him and Izuku happily with a smirk. "Did you two enjoy the jacuzzi bathtub? I recently had those installed and want to see how people liked them."

Katsuki didn't even fucking know there was one.

"Yeah, it was really relaxing! We took a bubble bath together last night," Izuku chimed happily. What a little fucking liar. "Please, sit down with us. I wanted to chat with you about decorations. How did you come up with the interior design for this place? I want to do something like this for our house."

The hotel owner sat down on the other side of Izuku in the empty chair. Then like magic, the two blended into conversation.

Katsuki had to resist the urge to roll his eyes. He was thankful he didn't live with Izuku for real as the man began to exchange specific pastel colors with Moore.

Magic mint? Persian pastel? Katsuki held back a gag.

As his faux husband lured in their prey with his freckled smile, Katsuki turned his eyes up to the painting of the angels above them. He briefly looked at the captivating, crystal chandelier before focusing all the way on the image.

It seemed to follow a circle pattern around the dome shaped ceiling, the same two figures appeared throughout. One was clearly an angel, and the other person was wingless. His eyes studied all the background angels and how gentle the scene looked.

He followed the motion of the panels. The first was of two figures dancing together under the stars, then another of them flying high together, seemingly in love. Then he skipped over the middle a bit to finally land on that disturbing bit off to the side.

“I see you’ve taken an interest in the painting above, Taro,” Moore cut into his thoughts. Katsuki turned to the man whose expression was now vastly different—more pensive. “I commissioned it myself. It tells of this story I heard as a kid about two lovers.”

“What’s the story’s name?” Katsuki asked curiously.

“Ah, I can’t recall the name personally.” Moore shrugged. Everyone’s eyes then turned up to the extravagant painting. “It was told to me as a child, so bits of it escaped me and I could never come across it again. Its morals stuck with my psyche so much that when I opened this place, I wanted to put it up in hopes maybe someone would recognize it.”

“I have never heard of anything resembling this,” Inasa said. The large man slung his arm over Shouto’s shoulder and tilted his head. “What’s it about?”

“It’s the love story of an angel and a sinner human,” Moore explained. “The painting shows them meeting, falling in love, and how other angels watched them care for each other.”

Katsuki eyed the last panel that was riddled with death.

“What’s with that part right there?” Katsuki asked carefully. He pointed to the part his eyes kept wandering back to. “It’s different from the rest.”

“Ah, great eye, Taro! That part tells the end of the story.” Moore’s voice grew quiet, drawing everyone’s attention in. “After the human falls in love with the beautiful angel, he asks to receive a potion that would turn him into an angel. This way he could grow wings and join his lover in eternity.”

“Wow,” Mina said with a dreamy look. “Changing who you are to fly away with the person you love. So sweet!”

“At this point in the story, yes.” Moore interrupted. He clasped his hands together while his eyes never left the last panel. “Unfortunately, it turned out the angel was an angel of death—not love. The angel was sent to collect the human’s soul for hell but fell in love along the way. So, when the time came, instead of delivering a potion that would turn the human into an angel, he gave him a red apple injected with viper venom. It ends his lover’s life.”

Katsuki paused his eating.

He tore his eyes away from the haunting painting to the man next to him who continued speaking.

“The angel weeps because he did truly love the human. However, nothing could be done as he watched all the life drain from his lover’s face,” Moore finished. He strummed his fingers on his thigh thoughtfully. “The human spends eternity in hell. Then the story ends there.”

“That’s...dark,” Kirishima whispered. “I have to admit I thought it would be a happy ending.”

Katsuki glanced up to the weeping angel.

“Seems a little off brand for the whole romantic paradise theme,” Katsuki said suspiciously. “What kind of moral is behind some fucked up shit like that?”

“That sometimes the person you love is also the same reason for your demise,” Moore explained. “We never truly know another person—only what they show us.”

No one said anything.

Katsuki had to admit he didn’t hate it.

It popped the bubble of stupid love sickness that everyone seemed to be stuck in. The story was realistic and tragic—exactly how Katsuki viewed the world: full of tragedy. No amount of pink, happy go lucky, cheerful shit could hide that. It seemed like even Peter fucking Moore understood.

Katsuki curiously glanced at Izuku who had stayed quiet through the story. The freckled man was staring at the green vile of poison and the red apple in the painting. Suddenly the eyes of the angels looking down at them didn’t feel the same.

“Well! Thank you so much for indulging me in that but I have to start making my rounds,” Moore said. “Time to get back to business. I’m a busy man.”

A pensive state washed over all the couples at the table as Moore rose from his seat. He smoothed out the subtle wrinkles in his white suit and gave everyone a taut smile. He said his goodbyes and bowed out.

“I could’ve gone my whole life without knowing that grim story,” Jirou said in an unimpressed voice. “Why would he say that? He ruined the happy mood. I prefer my PTO to be used for joy, not gloom.”

“Henry Sekai is an interesting man,” Shouto said curtly. He shrugged as he took another bite of his breakfast. “Makes you wonder what his inspiration for opening up this hotel is.”

There was just enough of a hint of suspicion in Shouto’s voice to make Katsuki raise a brow at him. Izuku and Katsuki knew the hotel was a facade for covering up human trafficking—but the tone of voice Shouto used seemed as though he found the whole set up odd as well.

“Well, let’s go reset our energy!” Kirishima said cheerfully. He clapped his hands together with a toothy grin. “No bad energy my dudes! We have a great group and I want to make sure we all have an awesome trip. Are you guys ready for aerobics, Paradise crew?”

“Yeah,” Izuku said with a charming smile. “I’ve never done aerobics before so I’m super excited!”

“Well, if you need any help, little man, let me or Mina know,” Kirishima chuckled. He proudly wrapped his arm around his wife’s shoulders and gazed at her lovingly. “We’re personal trainers for some of the top athletes in Japan!”

“We even have our own couple’s workout DVD coming soon,” Mina said with a thumbs up. “If you guys want, we can put you on the pre-order list. It’s entitled ‘Manliness: A Word for Everyone'."

"That's a shitty title," Katsuki said in a flat tone. "Who the fuck would buy that—"

Izuku, with all his strength, discreetly stepped on Katsuki's foot under the table without dropping his sun bright smile. The pain immediately stopped Katsuki's sentence midway. Red eyes bulged wide, and Katsuki clenched his teeth to stop from screaming.

"What Taro means is that's a lovely title," Izuku said with a false giggle. "He has a backwards sense of humor. I think my dear husband forgets that not everyone knows his comedy. Isn't that right, Taro?"

His fake name was dripped in a threat.

Katsuki sarcastically smiled back. "Right. Just think of me as always participating in 'opposite day.' If I insult you, it means I like you."

Everyone at the table laughed and Katsuki and Izuku cut their eyes towards each other.

"New rule, no being an asshole to the other couples," Izuku whispered under his breath as they made their way into the men's locker room at the gym. "We want to paint a picture that we, The Bakugous, are likable. We don't need Moore catching wind that we're patronizing the other guests."

Katsuki waved him off. "Yeah yeah, I get you. Quit your bitching."

All of this is annoying as shit, Katsuki thought to himself as he lazily sat on the wooden bench next to Izuku. Everyone around them started shuffling out of their day clothes into work out gear. The two hitmen waited until the other people in the room cleared out and it was only the two of them.

Once the door shut, Katsuki immediately hiked up his shorts and pulled out his two guns.

Izuku looked between him and the loaded guns carefully. "You were strapped this whole time?"

Katsuki hummed lightly and clicked the safety on both of his guns, carefully inspecting them. "I'm always strapped, Deku. You're telling me you're not?"

Green eyes flicked down to Katsuki's baggy shorts as if wondering what else was hiding underneath.

"I am. But not with handguns."

Katsuki raised an eyebrow at the comment—curiosity officially piqued.

He cut his eyes to Izuku as he tucked his guns in his backpack.

As they both began to strip down, Katsuki didn't really have shame about watching Izuku out of the corner of his eye. The curly haired hitman rid himself of those ugly pink clothes and revealed his freckled, well-defined body. Izuku didn't make a move to cover up as red eyes traced over his soft belly and thighs.

When Izuku was down to only his underwear, Katsuki was only partially surprised to see the man's upper thighs and ankles lined with knives. To top it off, there was a thin leather harness belt strapped to his upper body that contained knives as well. All the weapons were small, sharp and deadly. Each one was carefully capped to not poke Izuku. The black straps of the holsters and harness were tight. Really fucking tight. They gripped the soft freckled skin in a way that made Katsuki stare a little too hard at the tiny bit of spill over.

He cleared his throat and hurriedly turned around. Katsuki pulled his black muscle tank over his head and stepped into his loose-fitting black shorts quickly. He decided this was dangerous territory when he realized just how fucking squeezable Izuku looked.

But when he turned around, he was not expecting to see that perky ass sliding into skintight stirrup leggings with no underwear.

Katsuki stumbled hard, taken off guard. The leggings finished pulling over with a loud snap and Izuku's ass lightly jiggled.

He tilted his head to look from another angle.

How did that ass look even better in leggings? How the hell was that even fair? Katsuki briefly wondered if it felt as soft and bitable as it looked. He continued to stare at Izuku's backside as the man pulled a pastel green tank over his head.

"Alright—let's hurry and get out to the—" Izuku suddenly turned around to face him and Katsuki quickly snapped his head upwards. But when he made eye contact with Izuku, green eyes were wide with surprise. "—G-Gym."

Shit.

Izuku's face went up in flames.

"W-Were you just staring at my—"

"—Let's go," Katsuki quickly cut off and headed towards the door.

He turned away to hide his blush when all the blood flooded to his cheeks. Izuku hesitantly followed behind as they walked towards the loud studio area of the gym.

Fuck. Katsuki reprimanded himself. New rule for yourself, don't stare at that menace's ass. No matter how grabbable it looks.

When they finally entered the dance studio, couples and singles were stretching, doing warmups together. The loud music was blasting through the speakers perched in all four corners of the room. It vibrated through both of their cores and the energy of everyone else was way too damn high for Katsuki's tastes.

A teal haired woman, who Katsuki assumed to be the instructor, was in the front chatting with Kirishima and Mina—and holy hell was it a sight to behold.

Mina and Kirishima were in matching red and pink unitards that read 'man—' on Kirishima's ass and '—liness' across Mina's in bright, yellow font.

"You've got to be shitting me," Katsuki mumbled quietly from beside Izuku.

The two grabbed magenta yoga mats and set up towards the far back corner of the room. Both men did light stretches as they waited for the class to start. It took all Katsuki's decade worth of self-control training not to dip his gaze below Izuku's waistline. The little fucking green nymph bent at the waist and grabbed his toes—unknowingly reminding Katsuki that he was extremely flexible.

"Alrighty everybody!" The instructor's loud voice boomed. Her grin was as bright as a full moon. "Welcome to Couple's Aerobics 101! My name is Fukukado Emi and I'm going to be your instructor this morning! People like to call me Ms. Joke because I find myself being a comedian halfway through these sessions."

She tied her sea-green hair up into a tight bun and wrapped an orange sweatband to her forehead.

"Now let's get started with some basic reps!" She clapped her hands together. "This helps get the blood pumping and rejuvenate and/or build trust with your partner!"

Katsuki and Izuku both visibly winced at the word 'trust'.

"Now, turn to your partner and we're going to dive right into ten reps of squat arm rotations," Emi said enthusiastically. Katsuki and Izuku both turned to each other with awkward stares. "You're going to squat down holding on to the other with one hand. You're going to lean back and put all your weight and trust into your interlocked hands as you go down for a squat in unison! Then when you come up, you quickly switch hands and then squat again."

"Seems simple enough," Izuku said softly. More so to himself than to Katsuki. "We got this. We can do this."

"Just don't fall on me, dipshit," Katsuki said loudly. His belittling comment drew the eyes of several other people close to them.

"Make sure to lean all the way back!" Emi said happily. "The strength of your love will keep you together!"

They both turned towards each other and hesitantly reached out a hand. They grabbed hands and did as they were instructed. The pair squatted low in unison and Katsuki could see the immense concentration glued on Izuku's face. They leaned back in the squat, all the weight and trust in the other balancing them out. The two hitmen successfully did three reps, the flow going seemingly easily.

However, when they squatted all the way down on the fourth rep, Katsuki's eyes snaked to Izuku's outlined crotch. In the moment, slightly distracted when they squatted upright to switch hands again—Katsuki missed grabbing Izuku's hand as the man leaned all the way back once more.

Katsuki cursed loudly, stumbled on his feet but caught himself. However, Izuku did not catch his balance. Green eyes bulged, Izuku yelped, and the short man went toppling backwards in surprise.

Izuku accidentally fell directly into another couple beside them. The pair also cried out surprised yells as they were thrown off balance and fell to the ground as well. It was like a cringe chain reaction as everyone looked back to their corner to see what all the noise was about.

Katsuki gave a faux apologetic expression when Ms. Jokester, or whatever she called herself, gave them a confused glance.

"Is everything alright back there?" She asked over the music.

"Yeah, peachy keen," Katsuki called back and gave a thumbs up. "My husband is just a dumbass clutz."

"O-Oh, alright then!" She glanced between them wearily.

Blazed green eyes glared at him as Izuku brushed himself off and slowly got back up.

"You better fucking watch it and make sure to grab my hand next time, dumbass," Katsuki said and covered up the fact he was staring at Izuku's crotch.

Izuku bristled slightly. "But it was you who missed—"

"—I have no damn clue what you're talking about. Now let's get started again."

Izuku stared at him in disbelief as he nursed where he fell on his bottom.

They continued like this—clumsily bickering back and forth. Because who would've guessed him and Izuku had terrible fucking trust issues? Even while doing something as simple as paired bicycle crunches.

Izuku barely trusted him to do basic things. The tiny hitman would overcompensate by holding all his own weight in some of the more aerodynamic poses. This caused them to be all off balance and fall to the ground. Over and fucking over. Coupled with that, Katsuki was clumsily tossing the smaller hitman around whenever it was time to switch positions.

This behavior earned them several confused—and concerned—stares over the hour.

Inasa and Shouto looked behind several times to catch a glimpse of their mayhem. The onlooking was especially strong when Katsuki hissed 'you clumsy fucker, you kicked me in the face' and pushed Izuku to the ground. But of course, Izuku caught himself easily and would yell back 'stop tossing me around like that!'.

In short, they were a disaster.

“Alright! Last position!” Emi called out. “This one is easy so don’t worry!”

Everyone else in the room around them seemed to groan in happiness, tuckered out from the full-blown workout. Most of the room was huffing, fanning themselves or their partner.

In full contrast to this, he and Izuku hadn’t broken a sweat. This came close to nothing in Katsuki’s normal workout routine—and it seemed like it was nothing for Izuku too. The only other people in the room that seemed to have not broken a sweat were Mina and Kirishima—for obvious reason as he stared at the lettering on their asses. But also, it seemed like Shouto and Inasa didn’t break a sweat either.

“We’re going to do wheelbarrow squats!” Emi said joyfully. “This is one of my favorites because it really gets the intimate connection sparked! You’re going to have one of you get on the floor as the wheelbarrow while the other puts the wheelbarrow’s ankles on their shoulders. The person standing will squat low and do ten reps. You guys can pair positions how you want, but this usually works best with the most flexible person as the wheelbarrow.”

Everyone started getting in position, but neither hitman moved.

Katsuki turned to Izuku expectantly and Izuku looked up at him, puzzled.

“You heard her. Get on the bottom, Deku.” He pointed to the ground beneath his feet.

Izuku scrunched his nose. “Wait, what—ah!”

Katsuki impatiently grabbed Izuku by his upper arm and tossed the man to the ground with most of his strength. The green menace went tumbling down, and Katsuki would’ve been worried if not for Izuku’s lightning fucking reflexes.

The freckled hitman caught himself effortlessly in a plank before his face could hit the ground.

Izuku glared up at Katsuki again who gave a sarcastic sneer in return.

Katsuki grumbled to himself as he bent down to the ground. He grabbed Izuku’s locked together ankles and wrapped his fingers all the way around. He forcefully tugged them apart. Out of sheer reflex—and possibly spite—Izuku snapped them back shut.

Katsuki raised a brow before tightening his grip around the slender ankles.

“Spread ‘em,” he said in a low voice.

From this angle, Katsuki could see Izuku blush deeply.

Izuku slowly readjusted himself and relaxed his body. Then Katsuki pulled his legs apart from behind. Katsuki easily hoisted both of Izuku’s legs up by his ankles until he stood tall between them. When he was at full height, they were officially in the wheelbarrow position with Izuku's shirt riding slowly up. The small of Izuku's back was showing for him and all its freckles too.

Katsuki could see Izuku's blushing nape as he hung his head in defeat. Katsuki couldn't help the comment that left his smirking lips at the sight.

"Is this position familiar for you?"

"Please. S-Shut up." Izuku blushed and hid his face more. "I'm begging you. Shut up."

He decided that teasing Izuku was fucking hilarious. It nearly felt like revenge for the last eight years of hardship.

Katsuki resisted the cruel chuckle that tickled at his lips.

He refocused and placed either one of Izuku's ankles on his shoulders and began to squat low with the counting of the instructor. At first, he kept his eyes straight ahead. Then by the fourth rep, he looked down to see how the humiliated Izuku was fairing. But the flimsy workout tank had ridden up nearly to Izuku's neck.

A bare skinned back full of blush and freckles filled Katsuki's sight. He squatted low again, but this time his eyes automatically moved to the dangerous ass in front of him.

He tried to not let it get to him.

Katsuki always knew he had an Achilles' heel for innocent looking guys in skimpy clothes. But it was conflicting as all hell to see Izuku somehow fit that category.

On one hand, he couldn't stand the man. His smart-ass mouth was one of the most irritating things on this planet. Plus, Katsuki was still very much bitter about Izuku killing Rin Hiryu in front of him. But on the other hand, he couldn't deny Izuku was cute. He had a very nice, squeezable looking body with a soft stomach.

He tilted his head wondering what Izuku's skin would feel like.

"Alright! Great job everyone!" Emi said as she clapped her hands together. "You guys did wonderful! I hope this sparked love in you all!"

Katsuki glanced to his right to see a couple move out of position and give each other a sloppy, wet kiss.

"I love you, sweetie," one woman said.

"I love you too," her partner said back. "I'm so happy to be here with you."

To Katsuki, those three little words were like a bucket of ice water being poured on his head.

He overheard a small chorus of 'I love yous', 'you did a great job sweetie' and 'I'm so proud of you'. Suddenly, everyone was looking at their significant other with such deep care and thoughtfulness that it caught him off guard.

Katsuki's stomach twisted when he watched Kirishima kiss Mina on the forehead. Then it tightened to the point his chest hurt when he saw Inasa playfully carry Shouto in his arms to the locker rooms.

Scarlet eyes glanced at the new ring on his finger.

Katsuki unceremoniously threw Izuku's legs off him, ignoring the small squeak from the man. Izuku rolled safely, expertly catching himself. Pissed off green eyes stared up at Katsuki in anger. But he didn't give a shit now.

He excused himself rapidly when he watched Momo and Jirou gaze lovingly at each other.

He quickly decided he needed to get air when his heart hummed low.

Katsuki sat patiently on the bench in the men's locker room for Izuku.

He mulled over their chaotic morning and this stupid ass assignment. Several people trickled in from their aerobics class, but he didn't bother to say hello. He kept his head down and focused on his black sneakers. He could feel their concerned eyes crawling all over him as he listened to them chat about a bunch of mundane things.

He hated being in the midst of couples. It was one of his biggest pet peeves.

It felt taunting to watch all these extras live out the normal life he never got the option to experience.

He looked bitterly at the ring on his finger.

He really did think he could do a quick week here—kill Moore and then fucking leave. But, given his current predicament, he wasn't sure if he could stomach this assignment. Having to participate in all this crap was far different than stealth killing a mark.

When the room was empty, Izuku came barging in like a hurricane.

Green eyes glared around at the empty space before landing on him—and the anger in them grew exponentially.

"—You," Izuku hissed slowly. He marched up to Katsuki like he had gone crazy. "Another new rule: stop being such an asshole to me," Izuku threatened in a low tone. "I had Momo come up to me and ask if you were emotionally abusive after you left. Turns out, she's a therapist. She gave me her business card in case I, or maybe we, needed therapy."

Katsuki balked, not expecting that.

"Me? Abusive? Why the fuck would she think that?"

"Maybe—just maybe—she got the idea after you purposefully dropped me to the ground," Izuku said sarcastically. "These people don't know our history, but they do see how we interact. So you better start treating me like I'm pumpkin pie or something or I swear I'm going to break your legs, leave you crippled in our room and do this assignment on my own."

"Okay, fine. Calm down," Katsuki said tiredly as he stood up. "I'll dial back on the cruelty."

He pressed his lips into a thin line in defeat because the little shit was right.

He didn't need anyone thinking he was fucking abusive and possibly get police involved. Aizawa would hop a flight and break his legs himself if he fumbled that badly.

"We're supposed to be affectionate," Izuku continued his lecture. "You know—nicknames and all that. You can't call me Dumbass, Deku, and Dipshit all day long in front of these people. If you like 'D' names that much, choose something else. Like dumpling—"

"—Dumpling?" Katsuki immediately imagined a bin full of dumplings with green little curls and freckles. He gagged. "Absolutely fucking not."

"Well, I don't care what you choose. Just stop insulting me in front of people when we're supposed to be madly in love! Call me something nice!" Izuku threw his hands up.

"Alright. How about my darling dumbass?" Katsuki sarcastically sneered.

"You could stand to drop the 'dumbass' in front of other people."

"Fine. I'll drop the dumbass." Katsuki scowled fully, his facial muscles unhappily straining with his frown. He leaned down into Izuku's space and held the blazing eye contact. "Does this do it for you, darling?"

It was meant to sound like a threat—but it didn't feel like one.

Izuku's annoyed demeanor shifted to flustered. Green eyes widened slightly as a rose-pink blush raced down to his neck. Katsuki's eyes followed the trail of it as it stopped at his clavicle—right where the Band-Aid was.

"Ye-Yeah," Izuku stammered. He cleared his throat and took a large step back to put space between them. "Darling works."

Katsuki hated to admit it—but 'darling' fit Izuku well.

Big doe eyes. Candy colored lips. Freckles. Soft looking skin. In another life, Katsuki would've claimed the man was a sweet, darling doll face if he didn't detest him so much.

They changed back into their normal clothing and re-strapped themselves with their weapons. When they emerged from the locker room, their group was standing there waiting for them. Momo and Jirou offered them strained smiles, obviously put off by the disaster of an aerobics class. Mina and Kirishima were too busy pushing their new workout plan on people. Inasa and Shouto seemed to be in their own little world while scrolling on their phones.

"Are you two okay?" Momo asked quietly. She eyed Katsuki particularly. "You two seemed like you had a rough time in there."

“We just have trouble with aerobics,” Izuku covered up. He gave a candy sweet smile and waved his hand. “But anyways, what’s next on the itinerary list? I’m super pumped to see the rest of the hotel activities.”

“After this we have some down time, then there’s open pool hours. Movie of our choice in the far side of the courtyard, or we could possibly go to…”

...Katsuki tuned her out listening to the long list.

There was fucking more.

Everything inside of him became disquieted. He looked at the clock and realized it was barely in the afternoon. He glanced around wearily at all the lovey dovey couples.

How the hell was he going to make it through this?

The rest of the day was a disaster.

Not as bad as the aerobics class but still a disaster by Katsuki’s standards. It was awkward. Him and Izuku were awkward as hell together after everything they’ve been through. They both realized that this was going to be damn near impossible for them to get along. Katsuki tried his best and held hands with Izuku all day long in front of the other couples.

He even begrudgingly let the tiny man call him ‘sweetie’ and bit his tongue whenever he got the urge to call him a little shit.

That’s what couples did, right? Called each other stupid pet names and held each other’s hands?

Katsuki realized very quickly he had not a damn clue what couples did—or how they even acted.

However, Izuku seemed to. The freckled hitman covered up all his small blips. Every accidental insult that fell from Katsuki’s lips, Izuku corrected. When Katsuki was inadvertently rude to someone, Izuku smoothed it over with sweetness.

All the saccharine gestures made Katsuki nearly sour.

How the fuck was the bastard this good at faking it?

They didn’t have much luck running into Peter Moore again. Which was a damn bust. However, when they casually asked around it turned out the man barely spent time at the hotel. He came and checked in every morning and night during breakfast and dinner—but that was it.

Which meant he and Izuku had to hunt that bastard down off the premises.

By the time they got to the wine tasting part of the evening, Izuku seemed to be at his wits end with him. Katsuki didn't blame the little bastard. He was mildly surprised at his damn self. His behavior was way more irritable than normal.

He wanted to blame Izuku for it—but when another couple passed him by holding hands, Katsuki knew the real reason.

Katsuki decided to excuse himself to the lounge area under the ruse of being an introvert. Truthfully, he was more of an extrovert. However, with all the goddamn pink and love shit going around he felt his flight or fight kick in.

So, he separated from the group.

Katsuki sat in the hotel lounge alone.

He was currently sitting in a stool at the bar counter. It was a decent sized space filled with mingling singles and couples relaxing. There were various activities such as pool, darts, and arcade games with shiny lights. The cheerfulness in the room was filled to the brim as an upbeat song played through the speakers above everyone's head.

Katsuki churned bitterly at how happy everyone seemed here.

He watched with numbed emotions as a guy in the corner approached a girl who had come in alone. They chatted for a bit before all the telltale signs of flirting kicked in.

"Hey, Taro," Moore's voice suddenly came up from beside him.

Katsuki perked up slightly in surprise, not expecting the man. He looked over his shoulder to see Peter Moore approaching him with a smile that could only be described as charismatic. Beside him was a slender man in an all-black suit.

The newcomer seemed around Peter Moore's age. He had long black hair with a hint of grey that was slicked back. His eyes were so deep that they nearly appeared blackish purple. There was a dark air about him that screamed 'I traffic humans' to Katsuki unlike Peter Moore, who seemed like a normal everyday man.

"Do you mind if we join you? We're waiting on a colleague to get back to us about an incoming shipment for the hotel," Moore asked with a hearty laugh.

"Sure, pull up a seat," Katsuki said. He gave a tight-lipped smile and gestured for them to join him.

"Perfect. Taro, please meet my lovely assistant, Minoru Koizumi," Moore started. He gestured happily to the man in all black beside him. "Koizumi, this is one of the two delightful husbands I was telling you about."

Koizumi didn't smile as he bowed slightly at the waist. "Pleasure to meet you, Taro."

“Pleasure is all mine,” Katsuki said automatically.

He quietly sized Koizumi up—wondering how much of a struggle he’d inevitably give later.

Moore ordered drinks for the three of them. Hard, dark whiskey that smelled fucking rich. The bartender smiled at him with trained politeness as he poured the liquid into the glass cup and slid it in front of him. Katsuki happily took it, ready to wash the day away with the help of some alcohol.

Moore toasted him with a friendly grin. His light brown eyes glanced around, searching for something. Or someone. Then a puzzled frown graced his slightly wrinkled face before he could drink some of the alcohol in his glass cup.

“Hm, wait a second.” Moore turned to him. “Taro? Where’s your Hiroji?”

“He’s out and about with the rest of our paradise crew,” Katsuki said as he took a swig of his whiskey. “I need some rest after such a long time. You know how that goes.”

“Ah. You’re an introvert?” Moore chuckled slightly. “My wife is the same way as you! She always prefers to be alone or stay inside some days.”

Katsuki didn’t miss the mild sarcastic eye roll from Koizumi, who folded his arms impatiently. Katsuki’s interests perked at the odd, contrasting demeanor of the two men in front of him.

They continued in conversation, Moore laying on his kingpin charm heavily. The man really did seem to enjoy him and Izuku’s presence. He kept saying how they reminded him of him and his wife. It nearly felt like a shame that Katsuki was deliberating which gun to end his life with. Key word: nearly. The charming bastard still kidnapped people and sold them in the underground.

While talking, Katsuki caught sight of matching golden pins on both Moore and Koizumi’s suit collars. It was in the shape of a dove carrying an olive branch. Katsuki’s eyes narrowed slightly, and he decided to turn up the charm.

Halfway through the night, Katsuki was sure he had the grimy bastard hooked. Moore was loving him. Then right as the man was belting out a hearty laugh, a bundle of deep green and pink entered his vision.

Izuku waved at him and Katsuki waved at him back, motioning for the dork to join them.

“Hey there, sweetie,” Izuku said as he slung his arm around him. Izuku gave a bright, sun-bright smile as he squeezed his shoulders. “I missed you!”

Katsuki paused lightly thinking about how to properly interact in front of their mark. What would a loving husband do after being away from their partner for a short while? Hug him? Kiss him? Pet him on the head and call him a good boy? He really didn’t fucking know.

Katsuki settled for wrapping his arm around Izuku’s waist. He pulled the smaller man in towards him tightly until they were nearly nose to nose.

“I missed you too.” Katsuki hesitated. “Darling.”

Izuku stared at him—surprised before quickly giving a semi-fake smile.

“Did you have some nice me-time, sweetie?” Izuku asked as he leaned in all the way and touched the tips of their noses.

The little bastard was selling the loving husband act for sure. Moore was grinning at them with an alcohol-flushed face like he was witnessing the world’s most adorable couple.

Katsuki nodded with a smirk. He resisted the urge to count the shades of green in Izuku’s eyes before motioning his head towards the two men in suits.

“I did, but I’m having an even better time talking with Mr. Sekai and his assistant here,” Katsuki said with a discreet emphasis on ‘assistant’.

“That’s great!” Izuku’s eyes lit up and it almost felt genuine. He wrapped his arms around Katsuki’s shoulders and turned to Koizumi with the nicest smile. “Please, allow me to introduce myself, I’m Bakugou Hiroji.”

“It’s nice to finally meet the other half of the pair Henry doesn’t seem to stop talking about.” Koizumi said in a curt manner.

The man didn’t smile too heavily once again and Katsuki concluded he behaved like a black cat. Quiet, judgmental, and standoffish. With every snobbish comment the man made, he unknowingly made it a lot easier for Katsuki to kill and frame him.

After another round of introductions, Katsuki let Izuku take the lead. He listened as Izuku conjured up fake stories about their lives that made them seem so utterly, disgustingly in love. He forced down a blush as Izuku leaned into him the entire time, his small hands brushing against his chest.

When the night began to end, Moore invited them out to drinks with him and Koizumi. Katsuki faked being thrilled about it. He preferred not to get chummy with people who he had to put in the ground—but it seemed like this assignment required a lot of it.

Both Moore and Koizumi said their goodbyes. Katsuki eyed the way they left out together. Something in the air was different between them outside of two colleagues. But he couldn’t quite place his finger on it.

When the two human traffickers were out of sight, Katsuki let his body slump and gently pushed Izuku away from him.

“I’m going to go fucking crazy within the next week,” Katsuki muttered. He threw back the rest of his whiskey, not minding the burning sensation in his throat. “This is more fucking acting than I anticipated. But at least we got an invitation for drinks. We can figure out where the man operates and lives...with some work.”

He grimaced, thinking about the possible future effort.

“Or we can look through his wallet for his ID that has his address,” Izuku said casually. He leaned against the bar counter and held up a white leather wallet.

Katsuki’s red eyes widened, not anticipating that.

Then again, he never could anticipate Izuku.

“You lifted his wallet? Fucking when?” Katsuki asked. He was mildly impressed and thankful because this made shit a lot easier.

“While you were discussing your favorite shows—which by the way I highly doubt yours is Candy or Not Candy,” Izuku said nonchalantly. “As much as I would love to keep chatting with the man, we’re liable to give him some reason to doubt we’re a couple if we get too friendly with him.”

“Agreed,” Katsuki said. “You’re good at all this fake bullshit, but I don’t know if I can keep it up if we gotta be all buddy-buddy with the man.”

“I also agree. I’m better at my job than you, so let’s try to get through with little slip ups as possible.”

Katsuki curled his upper lip in offense. “Better than me? Just because you can smile and call me sweetie doesn’t mean you’re better. You’re a terrible fucking shot.”

“And you have horrible self-awareness and acting skills,” Izuku shot back. Green eyes looked at him unimpressed. “You didn’t even notice I took your wallet too.”

Katsuki paused. He was about to berate Izuku—but looked at the green menace in disbelief. Without taking his eyes off Izuku, Katsuki patted his pants’ pockets. His heart dropped slightly when he realized his wallet was no longer on his body.

Izuku was slowly smiling at him in amusement.

“What the fuck, Deku—”

Izuku held up his black leather wallet with a charming smile. Katsuki gritted his teeth because he was so close to fucking punching this man. Screw trying to avoid the abusive husband image at this rate—the little shit was asking for it.

He shot his hand out to snatch his wallet and Izuku swiftly maneuvered it out of his reach. Katsuki quickly got out of his seat when Izuku started laughing and dodging his efforts to grab his wallet. They did a clumsy dance with Izuku being quicker than him and ducking every time Katsuki tried to take back his belongings.

“This isn’t fucking funny, give me my shit back—”

“—Let’s see what you have in your wallet, Taro,” Izuku said teasingly.

The tiny hands of the freckled hitman opened his leather wallet with lightning speed. However, when his eyes caught sight of what was inside—he froze.

Katsuki groaned at the invasion of privacy.

"...Durex XXL?" Izuku muttered. His freckled face went up in flames the longer he looked at the two blue squares sitting inside the folds. "Y-You have condoms in your wallet."

"Congratulations, you can use your big ass eyes," Katsuki spat sarcastically. He took advantage of the moment of Izuku's stillness to snatch his wallet back. He put it back in his pants pocket and secured it tightly. "Don't fucking pick pocket me again. I'll stab you next time you lay a finger on my shit."

"Why do you have condoms on an assignment?" Izuku asked in a quiet whisper.

Katsuki stared at Izuku as if he was stupid.

"Isn't it obvious? Look around—this place is a fuck fest disguised in pastels," Katsuki said dryly. He jotted his chin to the pair off in the back corner, who were making out rather heavily. Izuku looked at them too and the blush on his face deepened. "Those two didn't come in here together but look at them now—ready to go fuck like animals probably. I thought I was going to get laid while I was here."

"I-I guess," Izuku stuttered out. He wearily eyed the pair who were getting friskier by the second. "B-But isn't that compromising the assignment to have sex with people? You're creating unnecessary loose ends."

"Fucking is fucking at the end of the day," Katsuki said without much real thought. He shrugged. "I need stress relief like any normal human. Thankfully, I'm handsome so I get lucky a lot on assignments if there's room for it."

Izuku swallowed. His eyes looked to the ground shyly.

"Are you still hoping to get lucky on this assignment?"

Katsuki barked out a dry laugh. "Naw. I think I can count this as a dry mission considering the little green cock block that's plastered to me."

"Little green cock block?" Izuku scrunched his face and stared at him. "You mean the wedding band?"

"No, Deku. I fucking mean you."

Izuku frowned deeply. "I take offense to that type of description."

"Good." Katsuki smirked playfully at the stupid little pout on Izuku's pink lips. "No one else is around. I can be an asshole if I want. Now open that bastard's wallet and let's see what we got. He'll probably realize it's missing soon."

Izuku huffed unhappily before shaking his head. He picked up the sleek white leather wallet and clicked open the golden lock. He opened the wallet but they both were surprised not to find anything worthwhile inside.

There was no money. No ID and no real information.

Katsuki frowned deeply because he was only partially surprised. Of course, a kingpin human trafficker wouldn't carry around his address or personal information. But what was the strangest thing was that the wallet was still full.

In all the slots were high quality all black cards.

"It's...business cards?" Izuku said and reached in to grab one. He flipped over the black card to be met with nothing but the icon of a singular white dove. "But they have no address or information on it?"

"It has this white dove on it," Katsuki mumbled as he pointed to the icon. "That bastard and his assistant had golden dove pins on the collar of their suits earlier too."

The two hitmen cut their eyes to each other at the same time.

White doves. The White Dove.

"Well, it looks like we'll be going on that cruise boat after all," Izuku said seriously. "I'll buy tickets for us to go on it tomorrow."

Katsuki nodded. Something about this felt off. There was a small prickle of ominous warning that crawled all over his skin. He only ever got this type of sensation when he felt like there was going to be more complications than usual for an assignment.

He frowned deeply the longer he looked at the white dove on the card.

When they finally made their way back to the room, Katsuki groaned loudly in joy.

He threw his sunglasses on the table and tiredly raked his hands through his hair. Izuku didn't say much to him, the awkwardness from the day still dripped heavily on them. He could sense Izuku was unimpressed at his subpar performance as a perfectly loving husband.

They both changed into their night clothes without too much of a word to each other. Izuku silently bought the cruise tickets for tomorrow morning.

"The White Dove is a love-cruise boat," Izuku said briefly without looking at him. "It transports people to and from Ie Island, Okinawa. It's a four-hour trip there. Meaning, it'll be an eight hour round trip. That'll be our full day tomorrow."

When Katsuki took his place on the tiny ass couch, he was already dreading the next day.

Katsuki pulled the blanket over himself but paused when he caught sight of the pile of Izuku's luggage off in the corner.

He hadn't really looked before. He had been too caught up in the denial of being stuck in Pink-goo-goo-eyed Land with his designated life menace.

But when he did stare, he saw Izuku plop his yellow backpack on top of a black violin case.

Katsuki blinked hard—trying to convince himself that this wasn't one of his reality-distorted dreams. He looked back and forth between Izuku and the violin case.

"Is that, uh, yours?" Katsuki asked before he could stop himself.

"Mhm." Izuku hummed in agreement without looking at him. "I play violin sometimes. I like to bring it with me during assignments. If I have down time I practice."

"Really?" Katsuki said. He felt a slight sense of déjà vu. "I know you said you liked listening to violin music, but you didn't mention that you played."

"I like to do both. Play and listen."

"But why the violin?"

He didn't understand why, but the longer he stared at Izuku's instrument's case the more he felt a forgotten piece of his memory struggling towards the surface.

"I fell in love with it when I was a kid," Izuku answered honestly. "I used to listen to violin music all the time back then." Izuku finally peered over to him. There was a hint of cautious curiosity lying at the bottom of that sea of green. "Do...Do you like classical music by any chance?"

"I actually love it," Katsuki admitted before he could catch himself. He was surprised a bit to see how Izuku and him shared a very specific interest. His own cautious curiosity took the wheel as well. "I memorized a lot of the classics. It's, uh, a small hobby of mine on the side. Do you play classical music or more modern music?"

"Both," Izuku admitted with a tiny smile. "I'm not that good though, I'm self taught. So don't get your hopes up if you're thinking I can play for you one day."

"Phfft." Katsuki clicked his tongue and shook his head. "I wouldn't dream of it."

Izuku seemed a tiny bit less annoyed and offered him a small smile.

The conversation didn't continue. Izuku turned off the lights and climbed under the covers, signaling for Katsuki to go to bed as well. But he wanted to ask more questions about Izuku —suddenly curious after seeing the violin. He reasoned it was for the mission. He had to get to know Izuku solely to play the part as his husband, right? He didn't truly give a damn about the little pain in the ass.

But there was a small budding sensation of disappointment in his chest when Izuku rolled over.

Katsuki took the hint and tried to close his eyes. He did his best to get comfortable on the tiny grey couch, but it was hard. His limbs awkwardly hung off the arms and he was way too big to fit correctly.

“You can get in the bed,” Izuku’s shy voice said in the dark. “That couch is bad for your back.”

Katsuki cut his eyes to the other hitman, thinking he had to be joking. But Izuku wasn’t. Katsuki watched as the smaller man shifted over in the heart shaped bed. There was a large openness waiting for him in the red silky sheets and it was admittedly tempting.

“No,” Katsuki rejected immediately. “I’ll be fine. I’m not sleeping in the same bed with you. You might try to smother me in my sleep.”

“I won’t.” Izuku sighed and waved him over again. “I already told you: if I wanted to kill you, I would’ve done it by now.”

Katsuki shook his head.

“Really. Get in the bed. I need you at your best—not with a potential crick in your neck,” Izuku pressed. “We can resume like normal after this assignment, but I prefer to do this without getting a chiropractor involved.”

Katsuki was going to flat out reject it. He was going to tell Izuku to go to hell and mind his own business—but when he tried to shift again on the couch, his neck muscles screamed at him in pain.

Katsuki sat up all the way in defeat. “Fine.”

He gathered all the pillows he could in his hand with a deep scowl.

“I’m going to make a barrier between us,” Katsuki announced, dead serious. “If you cross it —I will kill you.”

It was almost comical. As if a small row of fucking feather filled pillows could stop Izuku from killing him if he wanted. But to hell with it, it made him feel better and somewhat safer. At least this way they wouldn’t accidentally wake up cuddling or some shit. Katsuki’s stomach nearly hurled at the thought.

He carefully stacked the extra red pillows straight down the center of the heart shape. Izuku’s big ass eyes watched the whole time, an unreadable emotion glazed them over. When Katsuki laid down and got under the covers, he couldn’t see Izuku. However, he could sense the other man lying still on the other side.

A strange quietness blanketed them both in the dark under the clicking fan.

“You’re not very good at pretending to be in love,” Izuku murmured and finally broke the silence.

“It’s hard to mimic an emotion you’ve never felt before,” Katsuki grumbled. He shifted against the silky pillow and huffed through his nose. “So, excuse the hell out of me for not fitting the role perfectly.”

“You’ve never been in love? Not once?”

Katsuki shook his head. “No. I’m not the type to fall in love. But you seem like it though.”

“What makes you say that?”

“You have the doting husband act down like an expert,” Katsuki said bitterly. “You probably fall in love over and over again until your bleeding heart is black and blue.”

“I-I’ve never been in love either—or at least I don’t think I have.”

Katsuki frowned in surprise.

He lifted himself up with his arms to peer over the pillow barrier. Izuku was laying down, staring up at the ceiling. His green eyes were looking off in the distance like he was in a long-lost memory and there was a tiny blush rising along the bridge of his button nose.

“Really?” Katsuki said in disbelief. “There’s no fucking way. You have to have had one relationship.”

“Nope. Never even dated anyone. You?”

“No. I’ve never had a relationship either.”

Izuku finally turned to him, and they made eye contact. But this time neither looked away.

A new feeling of vulnerability settled between them.

Katsuki mulled over how Izuku was more like him than he thought. Almost enharmonic, like a music note with a different name that sounded the same.

Sure, some people in their field dated. Sometimes they dated only as a disguise to appear normal. Sometimes others dated within colleagues, which usually ended in violent breakups. But in most cases, hitmen kept their vanilla partners in the dark.

“Like you said this morning: love, it’s—it’s not for people like us.” Izuku gave him a sad smile. For some reason, hearing that he was right didn’t make Katsuki happy. “I’m only mimicking what I’ve read in books.”

Scarlet eyes studied Izuku a little longer than they needed to.

Katsuki took in all the freckles, the small indentations of dimples on Izuku’s full cheeks and the underlying sadness in his deep green eyes. He thought about the worn-down romance novel sitting on Izuku’s side of the bed in a new light.

“But you like reading about love?”

“I do.” Izuku gave a small laugh, as if what he was saying was ridiculous. “It’s nice to gaze into a window about what it might be like.”

“What made you start liking that type of stuff?” Katsuki didn’t know why he asked as his curiosity bloomed.

“Ah, well, I started getting into the romance genre as a kid because it’s always so happy and pleasant. It fills you up with such a warm feeling that you feel like your heart is about to burst at the seams.”

“I guess I never understood the appeal of it,” Katsuki admitted. “All that soft, gooey eyed bullshit doesn’t do anything for me.”

He dropped his guard for a split second—thinking about all his friends who had romantic partners. He never could imagine himself in their place, feeling as though he would be like a sinner in church to participate in such a thing. Someone with a bloody body count like his being hopelessly in love didn’t seem right.

Besides, who would love someone like him anyways?

“Love isn’t always soft,” Izuku whispered. He shifted his body to roll over towards Katsuki fully, the silky sheets spilling down his body. “It can be gentle like tender lips against your nape. Or it can be deadly like sharp claws tearing into your throat. There isn’t one type of love.”

Katsuki thought about that as he looked at Izuku’s thick, dark eye lashes.

“Well, I wouldn’t know what either feels like—soft love or deadly love.”

“...Me either, I guess.”

There was a long silence as they held eye contact.

Katsuki’s heart did that weird flip again.

Izuku sucked in his lips and turned his eyes away eventually when his face started to turn pink. Katsuki wondered what the other man was thinking about for his face to flush that deep.

“Y’know,” Izuku started. He didn’t look back towards Katsuki. “If you’re going to have trouble pretending to be my husband, this means we’re going to have a tough time convincing Moore we’re in love. Which is going to cause issues for us to gain his trust. Our plan is only going to work if we’re in harmony.”

Katsuki grimaced because Izuku was right.

They had already caused a commotion during that stupid ass aerobics class because they couldn’t get along for an hour. He winced thinking about Momo walking up to Izuku asking him if he was abusive towards him or not—it wasn’t a good look. Surely Peter Moore didn’t want to associate with them if he knew they were possibly just drama walking.

Katsuki decided at that moment to swallow his pride and put the assignment first.

“Teach me,” he said hushly.

For a moment, there was nothing but silence.

Izuku stared at him, baffled, and tilted his head in a way that was nearly cute.

Katsuki struggled to maintain eye contact with those big, deceivingly innocent doe eyes when his heart did a flip again.

“Er, for this assignment,” Katsuki elaborated. He looked up at the spinning ceiling fan, wondering if he was going to regret this. “You clearly know how to mimic all this lovey dovey bullshit to the last bat of an eyelash. So, show me how to play the dumb part of a doting husband until we finish off that bastard.”

“Are you sure, Katsuki?”

Hearing his name spoken by the other hitman for the first time only solidified his decision.

“Yeah. Teach me how to be in love, Izuku.”

Chapter 4 - Lento

Izuku stared at him for a long moment.

Endless green eyes searched his eyes and face for any hint of hesitation, but there was none. Katsuki meant it in full earnest. He maintained eye contact with Izuku so that the other would know he was serious. When that delicate, candy colored blush sprinkled across Izuku’s freckles, Katsuki could feel a shift between them.

“Okay,” Izuku said back in the softest voice he ever used before. “I can teach you what I know. We can start tomorrow.”

Katsuki nodded while Izuku gave him a timid smile.

They said goodnight with a different aura settled around the pastel-colored room. The last thing Katsuki saw before he closed his eyes was Izuku’s violin. The sleek black case tugged at something in his mind as closed his eyes. He decided not to dwell on it, but it seemed like his subconscious had other plans.

A sinking feeling enveloped him, but he let himself be tugged under. He drifted off quietly without a word.

Katsuki was dreaming again.

That night when he closed his eyes, the same sequence occurred: he fell into the darkness. However, this time he wasn't afraid. He was curious as to what was beneath the surface.

He let the darkness slither into his mind as he focused on his distorted childhood memories. The gentle melody of violins reached his ears as he was once again thrusted into his seven-year-old self. He looked around carefully, the winter scene appearing exactly the way it was before. Neither the statue of the angel or the forgotten water fountain was crumbling. They were normal just like they had been before.

His vignetted vision focused on the elderly man who had snow white hair and a pure ivory violin. He was playing his sad song again, moving his body with a type of despair Katsuki would come to understand later in life. But for now, he was curious as to what the name of the song was. The tempo was faster in this dream than it was in the previous one, but still slow and deep.

Katsuki froze. He turned his head slowly to the tiny voice.

Staring back at him was the blurry faced boy. This time the details of his hair were slightly clearer. He had a bundle of dark curls that nearly appeared black under the light of the winter night. That one eye of his was still wrapped with a white bandage that had dried blood splattered on it.

"Are you cold?" He repeated.

A small shiver ran up his spine from the chilly air.

"Ye-Yeah," he answered as if he had said it before.

The blurry faced boy quickly stood up. He couldn't see his face, but even in his dreams he remembered there being concern etched in deeply. The no-faced boy stripped himself of his red coat and winter gear, handing it over to Katsuki.

At first, Katsuki shook his head and rejected it. What was this kid doing? He was going to be freezing—but the no-faced boy ignored his protests.

Tiny hands placed the warm jacket on his shoulders and forcefully pushed his hands through the arms of the coat. Katsuki wanted to say no, but the lingering body heat inside of the coat made his bones hum happily. He held back tears as the nameless child gave him his winter clothes. Earmuffs. Gloves. Scarf. Jacket. All things he once wished his mother bought for him before she left. When he was fully zipped up tight, the tiny blurry boy led him to the wooden bench.

The sound of violin continued as Katsuki's tattered shoes were replaced with boots that were slightly too tight.

There was a blurry smile.

"There you go!" The boy said happily. He sat down on the bench too, tiny legs dangling. "You're all warm now."

Katsuki noticed the tiny lisp on his words as he spoke a beat too quickly. The mysterious boy had sat there in nothing but his jeans and a dark green sweater. His white socks had soaked up some of the wet snow, but it seemed like he didn't care. He only cared about keeping Katsuki warm.

"What about you?" Katsuki asked. The wind blew harshly but this time, Katsuki didn't feel the cut of it. He was thankful but there was a twinge of guilt in his chest. "You're going to be cold now."

"I can get another coat and stuff," the boy replied easily. He tilted his head at Katsuki. "Where're your parents?"

"They're..." He halted.

He looked at the blurry face of the other boy, struggling to clear the fog around what he looked like. He thought about his parents and how his mother said she'd be right back. But then he thought about his dad, who was dead. Katsuki swallowed in shame.

"Th-They're not here. My mom said she would be right back. B-But it's been a month."

He couldn't help the quivering in his voice. What if his mom had died too?

"She left you?" The blurry faced boy asked. "What about you dad?"

"I'm—" Katsuki blinked back tears. It was put so bluntly that he had to face the facts straight on. He was abandoned. Fucking abandoned. The emotions in the dream felt real. "—I'm alone."

"Do you have food?"

Katsuki shook his head.

"Are you hungry?"

Katsuki nodded his head.

"Do you have a place to stay?"

Katsuki shook his head again.

But then he thought about it. Technically, he did? He glanced cautiously at the other boy before deciding he could trust him. Katsuki lifted his gloved hand and pointed around the corner to the alley. The blurry faced boy followed the gesture, looking towards the row of makeshift houses and tents.

The other kid seemed to disapprove when he grew quiet.

When there was no response, Katsuki's throat welled up in embarrassment. It strangled him like invisible hands around his neck as he thought about all he didn't have.

Most kids his age had parents who loved them. Fed them. Bought them proper clothes. Made sure they were in school. Despite it not being his fault, Katsuki was somewhat ashamed. He knew people viewed the apple that fell from the broken tree equally as faulty.

He looked down at the new clothes that had been bestowed upon him bitterly. This kid clearly had someone who loved him. It made Katsuki nearly green with envy. Why wasn't he as lucky to have normal parents like this kid? Was there something wrong with him?

Was he that unlovable?

Then the other kid perked up and jumped down off the bench.

Even though Katsuki couldn't see his face in his dream, he could remember the feeling of his heart skipping a tiny beat. He was given a caring smile from the boy as the violinist in the background repeated his song once more. It was always the same captivating yet eerie melody.

"I'll get you s'food!" The smaller boy spun around quickly to leave.

"Wait, take your boots," Katsuki called out.

The other small child stopped and nodded in agreement. They shuffled around with the boots once more, and Katsuki tucked his cold feet under his pants' legs.

"You stay right here, please. I'll be right back!"

And he did. It wasn't as if he had anywhere else to go.

Katsuki sat on that snow covered bench studying the violinist, who was in his own world. The violinist was peculiar. He mumbled to himself different words Katsuki didn't know yet like crescendo, decrescendo and lento.

Other foreign sounding words came toppling out as Katsuki waited for the nameless boy to return.

An inkling of fear inside of Katsuki told him that the other boy wasn't coming back. His distorted subconscious reminded him he was unlovable and that no one really cared for him. His own mother couldn't—so why the hell would anyone else? Especially some rich kid. He should just leave. He should continue searching for his mother in this winter storm. But instead, he stayed rooted on the bench.

He made eye contact with the homeless violinist who smiled woefully at him.

Within the hour, shuffling back was the boy with the bloodied bandage. Katsuki's lonely heart filled with a tiny bit of hope. He felt more thankful than ever when the smaller boy held up a tiny plastic bag full of junk food. Katsuki briefly wondered where he got it from but didn't ask any questions as he started to munch down on a bag of chips.

"Thank you," Katsuki whispered. "You didn't have to do this for me."

"S'okay. You were cold. I can get more stuffs for you too!" The sweet voice said to him. "What's your name?"

He remembered how he thought this boy was sweet. The sweetest person he had ever known. Katsuki stared at the blurry faced boy, wishing his dream was clearer.

"My name is Katsuki."

"Kah-sue-key," the other boy repeated slowly, butchering the pronunciation of his name.

Katsuki pursed his lips and shook his head. He repeated his name once more, but slowly. The other boy, who had a tiny lisp, tried to say the syllables with him but failed every time. It was nearly amusing for young Katsuki to watch the other boy stumble until he was pink in the face.

"Ah...'m sorry," the mystery boy said sadly. He looked down shamefully. "I don't think I can say it right."

Katsuki shrugged, not truly caring. He was more thankful for the clothes and food. "It's alright, don't sweat it. You can call me something else."

Then, a tiny hand reached out and grabbed his.

Warm. That was Katsuki's first thought as his little heart did a peculiar flip.

"Can I call you Kacchan?" The blurry faced boy asked.

Katsuki's heart did another flip as he squeezed the hand in his.

"Ye-Yeah," he replied. He wasn't sure if he stammered from the cold or the warm feeling inside of his chest. "Kacchan works. What's your name?"

The boy smiled through the fog surrounding him and answered eagerly.

But there was nothing but static noise.

Katsuki frowned as strained to hear. He repeated his question, but the same thing occurred. He tried to say something again, but this time his throat clammed up without warning.

He stared ahead, confused as he touched his neck. He attempted to swallow the sudden lump in his throat, but it didn't budge. It started to grow larger, obstructing his windpipe. The fear inside of him clawed into his sternum unnervingly. He shook violently to his core because the sensation was frightening. It continued until it felt like multiple sets of snake fangs were sinking into his throat. Katsuki tried to scream but couldn't.

He tried to ask for his name again.

He wanted to know the sweet boy's name so badly. But the words never formed on his tongue as the invisible snake fangs sunk deeper. He held on tighter to the boy's hand as he slipped away. They grew further apart until their interlocked fingers slipped out of each other's hold.

No. No no no no—

He reached back out desperately for the boy who reached back for him. Katsuki's mind was desperately trying to stay within his dream-memory. He wanted to stay and remember the blurry faced boy's name so damn much. He begged for some alleviation on his airway and for the dream to continue.

However, none of his wishes came true.

The blurry face of the other child became blurrier as the edges of his vision began to blacken. His sight blackened until all he could see was the dark, endless abyss. He stayed there in the darkness for an inconceivable amount of time. Floating in nothing until he could feel his eyes slowly blink open. With each gradual blink, more light came to.

But when his vision returned, Katsuki was staring up at the spinning ceiling fan in the hotel room.

He was awake.

His heart hummed low and heavy in disappointment. Of course, he had to wake up right before he could remember that damn boy's name. It was irony in its finest form, and it was thick in the air.

Katsuki laid there. His chest felt heavy like bricks were being laid on top.

The morning silence blanketed him as he stared up blankly at the ceiling for a long time. He listened to the clicking of the turning fan in the dawn-colored room pensively. The sleep in his mind was still heavy like a thousand stones weighing him down. He searched his brain for the elusive name, but he found nothing after several long minutes.

Katsuki lifted his hands up to his face as he remembered how warm the other boy's hand was. His sullen scarlet eyes traced all the callouses and lines on his hands in the sunlight. Invisible blood stains from over the years were visible to his eyes, caked on with underlying guilt. He foolishly wondered if that same boy would be mortified to know he helped save someone who turned out to be a hitman.

Katsuki sighed bitterly and dropped his hands.

Katsuki leaned up slowly in the bed by his forearms as his tired eyes looked around the pink and red room. His back was feeling immensely better than when he had slept on the couch. He was never going to directly thank Izuku for the suggestion, but he did so privately as he rolled his neck.

Speaking of the menace.

Katsuki turned and glanced over the makeshift pillow barrier to see Izuku sleeping soundly. He was cuddled into the side of the pillow barrier, tightly hugging a pillow with his arms and legs. A light snore slipped past his lips and his green curls were a mess. The deep green contrast against the red silk was an interesting sight for Katsuki. He found himself studying the way the gentle morning light caressed Izuku's skin.

He looks innocent. Katsuki thought as he was looking at Izuku in his oversized pajamas. He tilted his head, conflicting emotions swarmed his chest and stung him like a nest of wasps. How the hell does someone as lethal as him look so innocent when he fucking sleeps?

Katsuki felt the irritation prickling against his core, but then Izuku shifted slightly, and a part of his bang fell over his eye.

Katsuki's heart skipped a beat as a subtle sense of déjà vu cradled him.

He leaned in close, over the pillow barrier, to get a better look. He didn't know why his curiosity was burning deep in him suddenly—but it threatened to consume him if he didn't move in. He felt compelled by an invisible string attached to his heart towards the sleeping man.

He stared extremely hard at Izuku's sleeping face and the way his bang covered up his eye.

He squinted his eyes to study Izuku's freckles closely.

An image of the blurry faced boy's bandaged eye appeared in his mind. Then the unclear memory overlapped with the vision of Izuku sleeping.

"Ah, Katsuki." Izuku's groggy voice drew out his name. The breathlessness in his tone made red eyes widen by several fractions. He froze on the spot as Izuku stirred and opened his eyes. Deep green eyes glanced up towards him. "Is watching people while they sleep a pastime of yours?"

Katsuki blinked rapidly.

"You're fucking awake?" He blushed deep red in embarrassment and leaned away from Izuku.

"I just woke up," Izuku said tiredly. He snuggled back into his pillow and closed his eyes. "But please, don't stop on my account. If this is part of your morning routine, continue on being a pervert."

Katsuki's eyebrow twitched as he watched Izuku peacefully go back to sleep.

This...little...shit.

Katsuki thwacked Izuku with the nearest pillow he could reach. Izuku yelled out a protest, putting his hands up in defense. Katsuki gave several more spite-filled swings.

“I’m—” Swing. “Not—” Swing. “A—” Swing. “—Fucking pervert, you eye sore!”

“I’m not judging you! There’s worse things in life than being a closeted creeper!”

Izuku blocked the next several incoming swings until he caught the pillow midair with a sheepish smile. He tugged it close and Katsuki yelped in surprise as he got tugged over the flimsy barrier with the pillow by Izuku’s strength. Katsuki’s red eyes widened at the now close face-to-face proximity.

“I have to say, I didn’t peg you as the type to watch someone while they sleep.” Izuku said seriously. “But it makes sense when I think about it.”

Katsuki groaned in frustration and pushed himself far away from the damn Deku.

“I hate you,” Katsuki hissed. “I fucking hate you.”

Fucking forget it.

He cursed that annoying fucking dream of the blurry faced boy and how silly he felt for oddly making the connection with Izuku’s bang. To hell with it. He was going to drive himself crazy at this rate thinking about that year of his life. He made himself, once again, promise to bury the memory that seemed to be banging on the surface.

He threw another pillow at Izuku for good measure.

They got ready for that god forsaken love boat without any other odd occurrences.

Katsuki was mentally cursing himself when Izuku genuinely asked if he was watching him sleep. The cautious stare from those deep green eyes made Katsuki realize, yeah, he was kind of being a weirdo. Given their history, he didn’t blame Izuku for seeming slightly on edge. But Katsuki backtracked his actions with a dumb excuse of a fly being on Izuku’s nose since he couldn’t give an honest answer.

Because how did one say: “I wasn’t watching you sleep like some creep. I’ve been having these weird dreams about the year my mother abandoned me. In that moment, with your bangs over your eye, you reminded me of the kid who took care of me. He, uh, had a bloody bandage over one of his eyes—”

Just thinking about possibly saying that out loud made Katsuki cringe.

They got dressed quickly, Izuku taking the liberty to dress in the bathroom. Probably because he was aware of Katsuki staring at his ass yesterday in the locker room.

The blond hitman picked out a long sleeve v-neck black shirt today. He matched it with his knee-high black shorts and strapped himself with his guns and knife accordingly. When Izuku emerged from the bathroom in his tacky pastels, Katsuki ignored all comments about 'it's going to be scorching today' from the short stack. He slid on his usual silver chain and black fang earrings in his ear.

But as they made their way to the downtown area of Nago, Katsuki once again found out Izuku was fucking right.

The August sun was unforgiving as it blazed down on them in the excruciatingly long line for The White Love. He detested admitting it, but the little shit had been right. He shouldn't have worn all black again—but he'd be damned if he dressed in ugly pastels like the other hitman.

Katsuki grumbled unhappily as he fanned himself with the tiny pamphlet that read 'White Dove Love Boat.' The title was in a classy golden font and tiny images of doves on it were littered throughout. He glanced through the itinerary for the love boat and saw all the little activities.

Cooking classes. Movies. Sunbathing. Romantic seaside dinner.

His stomach churned and he tried his best not to hurl on Izuku.

But, speaking of—he cut his eyes to the man next to him who was leaning over the railing of the wooden dock.

His faux husband was appreciating the view with a tranquil aura surrounding him. Izuku's head was tilted back, enjoying the early sea breeze in his silky curls. His bright green eyes were sparkling in the same way as the blue ocean under the sun.

He was dressed in a cutesy pink button-down shirt that had a black bow at the neck. It was tucked into his jean shorts and sneakers. Today his calf-high socks, that were hiding his knives, matched the same color of his shirt. To top it off, he was wearing his big ass floppy straw sun hat that was decorated in pink flowers and big ass black bow. And those stupid little heart shaped glasses. The smile pinned on Izuku's pink lips was blissful and in his hands was that romance novel.

Katsuki studied Izuku's side profile for a while against the background of the oceanside landscape. Then he shook himself out of it when he realized he was—yet again—staring.

He turned his sights on the boat itself. It was absolutely fucking huge. Katsuki counted the floors, and it was easily a triple decker—possibly four but he couldn't see from where they were in line. He could hear a soft melody coming from the top of the boat in the distance. It mixed with the sound of giggles and laughter in the air.

"This boat better be the most relaxing fucking cruise in the world to have us out here in the sun this long," Katsuki grumbled as the line finally started to move. He watched impatiently as all the people started to board, getting their tickets punched one by one.

“I told you not to wear all black again,” Izuku chuckled at him. “You’re basically asking to get cooked alive in that.”

“My wardrobe is one-hundred percent black, Deku,” Katsuki quipped back. “I have nothing else to wear and even if I had the choice, I would still choose black.”

Izuku tilted his head at him, looking at his fang shaped earrings. “Why don’t you like wearing colors?”

“Why do you? Especially ugly pastels like that—” Katsuki gestured up and down to Izuku’s cute—er, not cute. Ugly. Izuku’s really fucking ugly outfit. “You look repulsive. You stand out too much.”

“Uh, this isn’t what I usually wear,” Izuku admitted. His cheeks dusted with a light pink shade as he looked down to their feet. “This is what I packed for this assignment. I figured it would be a good cover to blend in—plus, I always wanted to wear something bright like this for once.”

“You really are treating this like a goddamn vacation,” Katsuki grumbled in disbelief.

Izuku gave him a soft smile. “I’m just enjoying being in a really nice place like this.”

Katsuki nearly snorted at the irony. Nice place. Yeah right. These fuckers kidnapped people and covered up the missing’s person reports.

“Hey. You’re not going to push me overboard, are you?” Izuku asked, half seriously and half playfully.

“I wouldn’t be stupid enough to do that with people around.”

Izuku raised a brow at him. “So, you’d do it when people aren’t around?”

“I guess you’ll just have to wait and see, huh.”

Izuku glared at him, and his stupid little fingers clutched the book angrily. Katsuki grinned like the devil as they finally made their way to the front of the line and the employee bunched their white dove shaped tickets with a captivating smile.

“Enjoy your time on the White Dove!” She said, flashing her pearly white teeth. “There’s no other love boat around to make paradise seem more perfect!”

Izuku mirrored the friendliness while Katsuki scowled. He snatched both of their tickets out of her hand, not for one second buying into the overt kindness. Her brown eyes bulged at the sudden aggression and Izuku lightly hit his arm. Izuku quickly mumbled apologized and quickly hooked onto his arm to drag him away.

“Taro,” his faux husband hissed. Blazing green eyes shot him a disapproving stare as they walked up the ramp to the deck together. “Why would you do that?”

“She was over-selling the romantic bullshit. It was annoying.”

“Your first lesson on how to be in love starts now,” Izuku said. The arm hooked onto his tightened to the point Katsuki felt the unspoken threat. “People who are in love are happy. And happy people are relaxed. Therefore, they aren’t unnecessarily rude to someone who is just doing their job.”

“I think being rude to her was quite necessary. Some people need their stupid romantic bubble popped.”

“You really hate this stuff. Don’t you?”

“Yup. With every fiber of my goddamn existence.”

Izuku sighed helplessly. He shook his head lightly as they made their way to the boat’s deck. Both of their eyes widened by a small fraction as they took in the sight.

In contrast to the pink painted hotel, The White Dove was much like the dining area. Classy with soft colors of white, cream, and gold trimmings. The deck was mahogany and dipping down from the top deck to the bottom were bright romantic white fairy lights. Waiters dressed in all white beach casual clothes were serving food and drinks and giving out bright smiles.

The deck was full of plush, long beach chairs that were paired off in twos. Above each pair was a large white umbrella to protect from the beating sun. Off to the side on the deck was a small band with various instruments playing an upbeat tune.

Izuku’s eyes lit up as he saw that in front of the band there was enough desk room for some couples to dance joyfully together. Katsuki’s eyes glared as he watched two people make out on the railing.

“For fucks’ sake. This is—”

“—Nice!” Izuku finished happily. Immediately the short stack started to drag Katsuki by his arm off to the deck. “Hurry! Let’s stake our claim on one of the chairs next to the band.”

Katsuki let himself be pulled along without saying too much as he watched the excitement in Izuku triple. He wanted to be annoyed. Really, he did. But the longer he carefully studied the other man in that moment, he witnessed seeing an emotion he hadn’t seen yet.

Izuku was genuinely happy.

He had seen many emotions spark across Izuku’s delicate freckled features: Resentment. Spite. Annoyance. Regret. Homicide. Conflict. Katsuki had even seen an emotion border lining hate, but it was never quite fiery enough to reach all the way. But he had not once seen Izuku truly joyful.

The radiant expression on his delicate features was jarring. It was a true juxtaposition to what he was used to and made Katsuki swallow all the snarky comments he was about to make. The small seed of his curiosity for Izuku beckoned to be watered as he looked at the shimmering lights reflected in deep green irises.

They sat down at the chairs that were close to the band and the front of the boat. Izuku plopped down, book in hand, with a curious gaze. His head was upright like a small fox that was gazing around happily. Katsuki sat down next to him and immediately pulled his sunglasses from the top of his head over his eyes.

“Well, we have four hours to kill,” Katsuki mumbled. He leaned back and crossed his legs. “What should we do until then, dork?”

Izuku grinned at him happily and held up his book. Katsuki disliked the way he saw actual notes in the neon-colored tabs.

“I was hoping we could begin your lessons on how to fake being in love! I already have a lesson plan for you.”

“A lesson plan?” Katsuki scoffed and muttered under his breath to himself, “you really are a little fucking nerd.”

Izuku narrowed his eyes at him and leaned in. “What did you say?”

“Nothing,” Katsuki quickly backtracked. Izuku’s eyes narrowed when the blond smirked arrogantly at him. “Now what is in this lesson plan of yours, Deku?”

Izuku huffed before opening to some pages of the book. They were marked up and down with notes, highlights, and neon-colored tabs. “I tabbed some pages in this book that I want to have you look at and we can take it one step at a time. We’ll begin at the basics.”

Katsuki scowled. “There are basics to pretending to be in love?”

“Yes. Affection and intimacy being two big ones.”

“I have no issue being intimate with someone,” Katsuki muttered, cocksure. He gave a toothy grin that oozed arrogance. “In fact, all my partners are extremely satisfied afterwards, Deku.”

“I-I’m not talking about that,” Izuku hissed the last word with a large blush. “Get your mind out of the gutter and focus. Step one to pretending that you love your supposed husband you’ve been married to for eight years is holding his hand—”

“—We do that—”

“—Without being forced,” Izuku finished forcefully. “It looks weird that I’m the only one initiating touch between the two of us. You have to take the lead sometimes—without me stepping on your foot or poking you in the side.”

He shot a pointed glare and held up his hand for Katsuki to take.

The blond gritted his teeth and reminded himself he asked for this. Katsuki slowly took the smaller hand within his and intertwined their fingers without any struggle. He remembered how Izuku interlaced their hands yesterday and got it right on the first try.

He felt the soft part of Izuku’s skin under his finger pads again.

“There you go,” Izuku said happily. “Now, read from pages one to thirty while we wait. It’s a good example of how to behave when you’re pining after someone.”

“Pining?” Katsuki frowned deeply. As fucking if he would behave as though he was pining after fucking Deku. “Can we skip that part? I thought we were supposed to be madly in love already. Let’s cut to the established relationship shit. You know, where we ignore each other.”

“That’s not how that works if we’re supposed to be pretending to be in love. Pining doesn’t stop when two people get married, y’know.” Izuku gestured to the people around them who were giving each other lovesick stares. “It continues on if the bond is strong enough. That’s how relationships are maintained and two people can truly withstand anything that way. You want each other all the time and—”

“—I get it,” Katsuki groaned loudly. He waved his hand, shooing the invisible little hearts around Izuku away. “I fucking get it. Please, shut up. I don’t need to hear you rambling about this bullshit. I’ll read this whole damn book if I don’t have to hear you talk.”

Izuku rolled his eyes and pushed the book in his free hand. “Take this seriously. I don’t know how much more I can keep defending you when you offhandedly insult someone. Start absorbing this and when we get around the other couples, try it out.”

Katsuki grumbled and swallowed his pride.

He scraped together some motivation to get through this bullshit with some logic. He reasoned that he liked being the best at everything. It was one of his strong suits to be an overachiever. He was the best sharpshooter. Best hitman at The Company. Hell, from the reviews from his long list of sexual partners, he gave them the best orgasms they ever had.

Surely pretending to be a doting husband for a week wouldn’t be the thing to break his perfectionism streak. He hated love but he hated failure more.

He opened the godforsaken book to page one but stopped.

His heart twisted lightly—but he didn’t know why. Sitting on the inside on the back of the cover page was an endless sea of tally marks. They were small, precise and in different colored ink. The fadedness of some told Katsuki the ones at the top were old while the fresh blackness of the ones at the bottom were brand new. It was two hundred minimum marks.

He pursed his lips, wondering if these were counts for what he thought they were.

His eyes then skimmed over the first sentence of the novel.

“We are not the ugly parts of ourselves.”

Katsuki’s world halted as a chord deep in his dormant emotions was stuck.

For some reason, he didn’t expect a single word in this book to resonate within him. He anticipated every line to be mushy, lovey and all around too sweet for him to stomach. This opening line was the exact opposite, and it pierced a very specific part of himself.

Katsuki eyed Izuku curiously before deciding to take his impromptu homework seriously.

They laid side by side with their hands intertwined. The refreshing smell of the salty ocean filled his senses as they relaxed under the umbrella. Izuku closed his eyes and leaned his head back as they fell into full vacation mode. Katsuki diligently read, trying his best to think of it as full-on homework. Slowly, he found himself immersed in the scenes, analyzing the written emotions as time pressed forward.

After a while Katsuki came to a small conclusion about how to pretend to be in love better: touching.

The people in this book touched a whole fucking lot. Hugs. Random little brushes of the hand. On top of that, every touch meant something. It didn't feel entirely random. It appeared that every kiss or caress signified a silent translation of "I cherish this part of you."

It made Katsuki look up at the blissful couples around them slightly differently.

He watched a man kiss the beauty mark on his lover's shoulder.

Katsuki then turned his head to the peacefully quiet man beside him. Izuku was happily watching the band and the people dancing in the sun. The beautiful tranquil expression on his face disarmed Katsuki's defenses for a moment. There was a small glow around Izuku in the yellow morning sun. His skin was glossy, and his lips looked pinker than usual under the sun's hue. Scarlet eyes studied the thick, black eyelashes that were shading Izuku's eyes in a way that the green shade appeared darker.

Izuku contently stared at the happy couples through his pink tinted glasses. He seemed relaxed, but Katsuki could see the underlying hint of longing in his green gaze. Katsuki glanced between the plain text in his hand and back to his faux husband. He then scanned his eyes over a particular scene.

Meaningful touches.

He decided no better time than the present to practice.

Katsuki hesitantly lifted their interlocked hands and placed an experimental kiss on top of Izuku's hand. Right where the skin on his hand was softer than the rest.

Izuku snapped out of his daze immediately and turned to him. His floppy hat nearly flew off his head from the speed. Green eyes were wild and there was a deep blush racing down his neck.

"What are you doing?" Izuku asked tightly.

"What does it look like, idiot? I'm kissing your hand," Katsuki said as though it was obvious. He held up the book for context. "That's what they did on page twenty. Seems a little fast to me, but that's a normal affectionate thing between pining husbands. Right?"

"Oh. Ye-Yeah," Izuku said. He awkwardly readjusted his hat and blushed deeply. "Um, good job. Keep reading."

Katsuki raised an eyebrow at the odd reaction. “Oi. What’s wrong—”

“—Bakugous!” A loud, familiar voice boomed. Katsuki turned his head towards the source to see Inasa and Shouto walking towards them. “Hey! Nice to see ya!”

Both men were dressed in casual resort wear, shorts and floral print shirts. Shouto had a red floral-patterned shirt on. He looked happy and relaxed, as did his husband who was wearing a baby blue shirt. Katsuki’s eyes automatically moved to where they were holding hands, their sparkling gold rings shone in the bright sun.

“Oh, hello!” Izuku said automatically, enthusiastically waving with his free hand. Katsuki put the book down and gave a small wave. “I see you two wanted to try out one of the cruises as well.”

“Yeah, we want to maximize the experience,” Inasa said happily. Shouto gave a tiny thumbs up. “This one caught our eye because of how classy it is, and so far, so good. The views are fantastic! How are you two liking it so far?”

“We’re loving it so far. A little hard to fill the full time, but I don’t mind relaxing on the deck,” Izuku said easily. The two hitmen gazed towards each other, and Izuku gave his signature saccharine smile. They turned back to the two men in front of them.

“What my husband said,” Katsuki emphasized with a faux sincerity. “Just enjoying the sights.”

“We were actually going to go to the baking class, do you guys want to tag along?” Shouto asked with a relaxed smile. “It would be nice to have familiar faces around.”

“Oh, that sounds like fun!” Izuku said happily. “I’ve always wanted to learn how to make new pastries.”

He perked up again, in the same genuine way he did when they first got on the boat. Red eyes studied the joy radiating off the smaller hitman. Then he saw Izuku halt mildly and look at him with a reserved expression. There was a hint of shyness that he wasn’t expecting in that deep green gaze.

“B-But only if Taro wants to,” Izuku quickly corrected. He gave a sheepish smile. “We can stay here if you want.”

Katsuki sucked at his teeth. Why did Izuku give a shit about what he wanted? He could easily tell Izuku wanted to live this romantic paradise bullshit to the fullest. It was so obvious the nerd was tapering his excitement.

“No, let’s go,” Katsuki said finally. Green eyes widened by a small fraction. “It can’t be that bad. Let’s go make some stupid baked goods.”

When they walked into the downstairs kitchen area of the cruise boat, Katsuki regretted his words. Why did he always make dumb ass snap judgements out loud? He should’ve stayed on the deck reading that shitty romance novel while Izuku skipped off with Inasa and Shouto.

The whole kitchen was decorated with little, tiny paper hearts and romantic decorations. There was a chalkboard sign that read “Pastries for Lovers: Cooking up Chemistry” in white lettering. The handwriting looked as though someone spent a little too much fucking time on it. In Katsuki’s, not-so-humble opinion. Over their heads all too happy music played to set the false atmosphere of joy in all the cruise goers.

They took their positions at one of the many garnet tabletops. Waiting for each person was a frilly fucking pink and red apron. The upper half of it was in the shape of a heart and the whole thing was lined in white lace.

Shouto and Inasa took the opening spots next to them happily, acting as though they weren’t back in pastel hell.

Katsuki huffed out loud and crossed his arms. “Why is this place such a barf fest—”

Izuku discreetly elbowed him in the side harshly enough that Katsuki had to suppress a groan of pain. He stumbled slightly into the counter clutching his side and glared at the other hitman. Izuku gave a condescending smile.

Katsuki let out a shaky breath and grumbled as he put his apron on. He unhappily tied the strands around his waist, securing the hellish thing to his body. Izuku muffled some giggles the entire time, finding amusement in his suffering. Damn nerd was watching him as if he was putting on a show.

“You’re enjoying this view a little too much De—Darling.” Katsuki gritted his teeth as he blushed deeply.

“Oh, I am. This is priceless.” Izuku snickered. “It’s so fun watching you squirm, sweetie.”

Katsuki glowered deeply. Watch him squirm? Izuku always had such a smart-ass mouth. The green haired man tilted his head and quirked a brow as if this was one of the best checkmates he’s ever had.

Suddenly his itch to fuck with Izuku kicked in and he smirked. Which is why when the green haired menace grabbed his apron, Katsuki snatched it out of his hand.

“W-What are you doing—” Izuku hissed and Katsuki shook his head.

“Let me do it,” Katsuki scolded in a whisper only they could hear. He tutted his finger with a smirk. “We’re madly in love, remember? I'll put your apron on for you.”

Izuku blushed deeply but allowed it to happen, going along thinking it was part of the act. Katsuki carefully put the apron over his thick head of curls and then turned Izuku around. Izuku allowed him to tie the apron but when Katsuki cinched the strings with his full strength, Izuku’s breath dangerously hitched. Katsuki grinned sadistically as he pulled the strings tight enough that he heard Izuku mutter a curse.

He leaned down from behind and whispered directly next to Izuku's ear.

"It's even more fun watching you squirm, darling."

He tied it tight enough that Izuku had to restrain a groan. Katsuki stepped back and admired his work as Izuku immediately leaned against the counter clutching his stomach.

"Welcome to Pastries for Lovers!" A loud voice suddenly boomed. They both turned their sights to a man with dirty blond hair and a physique so fucking big that even Katsuki was impressed. "My name is Inui Ryo! I'm the head chef on board and I'm excited to get you all cooking up some chemistry!"

Izuku glared daggers at Katsuki as he readjusted the straps on his apron.

"This is one of my favorite activities because it'll be rewarding to enjoy a dessert you and your loved one made together!"

Several waiters dressed in the cruise's uniform came out and placed all the cooking utensils and ingredients in front of each couple's station. Katsuki looked down at the all the different assortment of ingredients carefully—but more so he looked down at the sharp knives. Extremely sharp knives.

Him and Izuku cut their eyes towards each other.

Well.

This had potential to be the worst misalignment the world had ever seen.

"We'll be making Boston cream doughnuts," Ryo said. He clasped his hands together. He put his own apron on, which was several sizes too small for someone his size. "You all can take them with you to share once you leave! Let's get started. I'll take you through it step by step!"

The instructor started taking them through it all, step by boring step. Part of Katsuki wondered why he agreed to this. Why the hell had he? But then he thought back to the rare look of radiant happiness on Izuku's face.

He pursed his lips, not really understanding the odd sensation of conflict in his chest.

Katsuki nearly sighed again, mostly frustrated with himself, as he started preparing to bake. However, he caught himself when Inasa and Shouto glanced at them and gave a friendly thumbs up. The happy married couple seemed like they were honestly enjoying baking together. It made Katsuki reel in his attitude when he comprehended that they were in front of other people.

He didn't want a repeat of the aerobics class, so he thought about those twenty pages he read.

Katsuki studied how Inasa rubbed Shouto's upper arms as he made a joke about the dough.

Touching.

Of course. Stupid, meaningful touches.

“Alright! For this step usually a dough mixer is required but, in this class, we think intimacy is the best mixer. You’re going to stir your dough mixture together for about five to ten minutes until it looks, well, dough like!”

Katsuki looked at Izuku who was already tentatively listening to the head chef and shuffling around the ingredients.

Izuku’s head bobbed between the instructor and the ingredients in his hand as he followed closely along. A tiny pink tongue stuck out of Izuku’s mouth in concentration as he whipped the mixture for the dough. He was rough and clumsy about it to the point Katsuki snickered. Izuku flushed deep with embarrassment until he yelped, some of the flour flying up in the air.

“Oh, whoops,” Izuku exclaimed and tried to reposition himself. “This is tougher than I thought.”

“Well, duh. When you’re doing it like that it’s going to be hard. Your technique is shit,” Katsuki critiqued. “You can’t just whack at it like you’re beating someone up, there’s an art to it.”

Katsuki then looked around at all the couples around—touching each other.

He cleared his throat before positioning himself directly behind Izuku. With their height difference he could see over the top of his bedhead of curls. Izuku craned his neck up and looked at him with a baffled stare at the proximity.

“People are, uh, around,” Katsuki excused lamely in a whisper. “Just trying to seem like we’re in love this time and not like we need counseling.”

To drive home his point, Inasa loudly laughed and held up his flour covered hands for Shouto and them to see. Despite them knowing it was all for show, it didn’t help quell the burning blushes on their faces. Izuku nodded in a hesitant fashion, facing forward again with the pink dough whisker in hand. Katsuki brought his hand over Izuku’s on the handle, nearly eclipsing the tinier hand with his own to guide the motions.

Warm. Izuku’s hand was always warm, Katsuki noted.

“You have to mix slowly,” the blond said in a low tone. He gently twirled the pink whisker in the bowl and naturally settled his other hand on the counter, trapping Izuku in. “Think of it like you’re still trying to get all the various ingredients mashed together. Flick your wrist a bit more—there you go, just like that.”

“Ah,” Izuku laughed lightly. From where he was at, Katsuki could see the deep blush on Izuku’s cheeks as he gave a tiny smile. It was once again pure and genuine. “Th-Thank you.”

Katsuki hummed. He guided Izuku’s motions a bit more, until it seemed like the tiny dork got the hang of it. Slowly, Katsuki retracted his hand, feeling the slight temperature change on his palm from warm to cold. He moved to rest his hand on the other side of Izuku and loomed over him as he mixed the dough batter. He looked so damn concentrated to the point it was almost fucking cute.

“Have you ever baked before?” Katsuki asked, egged on by his budding curiosity.

“No,” Izuku admitted. Katsuki’s eyebrows raised up in surprise and Izuku’s blush deepened. “I-I always wanted to try though. So, this makes me really happy.”

Ah. That’s why he was so excited about it.

“Well, keep at it. If you need any more help, let me know De—er, Darling.”

“Will do! Uh, thank you. For showing me,” Izuku said quietly. “I appreciate it.”

“You’re...er, welcome,” Katsuki replied slowly.

There was a grave amount of tense silence as Izuku whisked the bowl of dough. It hit both men like an avalanche: this was quite possibly the most normal interaction they ever fucking had. Katsuki nearly didn’t know what to do next. He had helped Izuku with something and for once there was no snarky comment. No eye rolls. No sneer. And coupled with those facts, for an odd reason, he didn’t feel inclined to move his body away.

He intensely watched the blushing freckled man practice the new skill he had learned while trapped between him and the counter.

Katsuki then looked over and saw Shouto playfully kiss Inasa. The sight jarred him enough and made him a little too aware of the intimacy of their positions. His eyes flickered down to study how dangerously close Izuku’s back was to his chest.

Katsuki then pressed his lips in a thin line and finally pushed away from Izuku to get back to work on his own batch. He tried his best to shake off the normalcy of their interaction because it was fucking Deku. Goddamn Deku who shot him—who he hated.

Katsuki attempted to remind himself that Izuku was a menace. A short fucking menace. But every time that little giddy look sparkled in Izuku’s big eyes—Katsuki was beginning to waver on the title ‘menace.’

Time pressed forward and he and Izuku surprisingly worked well in the kitchen.

Izuku seemed shy about his lack of baking skills, but Katsuki taught him slowly. He reasoned it was only because he didn’t want to look like an abusive husband like yesterday—but it was begrudgingly fun seeing Izuku’s eyes light up whenever he picked up something new.

While they waited for the dough to rise, they chatted with Inasa and Shouto. The married pair was laughing and chatting with them happily.

“So, what made you guys choose this resort?” Inasa asked casually as he dusted off his hands.

“Ah, it just caught our eye,” Katsuki said easily. He eyed Izuku in a contemplative manner. Touching. He then placed his arm around Izuku’s shoulders. The freckled hitman easily leaned into him. “We saw one of those commercials for it and my husband here loves stuff like this.”

“Yeah!” Izuku grinned wide. “It’s been great. Everything is as advertised so far.”

The conversation continued through the time it took the dough to rise. He kept his arm on Izuku’s shoulders as the smaller man leaned into him all the way, looking visibly relaxed. As they were chatting, they learned that Shouto and Inasa had been in a relationship for nearly most of their life. They had known each other since they were kids and when they got to university, Inasa asked out Shouto on a date. Then during their university graduation, he proposed.

They were lifetime sweethearts. Izuku’s eyes nearly turned heart shaped while staring at them in awe.

Katsuki also learned more about Izuku in that time. Like how his stupid little face had dimples that showed whenever he tried to suppress a smile. Then the way his eyes almost looked brighter under the fluorescent lights whenever he talked about being happy to be in Okinawa.

When they returned to cooking, Katsuki pondered as he continued kneading the dough.

What if this really was a vacation to Izuku?

Katsuki huffed as he kneaded the dough thoroughly, letting out some extra aggression. Small flakes of the flour sprung up from and landed on the sleeves of his black shirt. Katsuki leered at them. He wasn’t about to ruin one of his favorite tops over something like fucking pastry making. He rolled his sleeves up until the hems were tautly around his biceps and got back to work.

As he was kneading, he noticed out of the corner of his eye Izuku slowed down on making the filling.

Katsuki slightly turned his head, wondering what the hold was up—but what he found wasn’t what he expected. Izuku was looking down, not even realizing Katsuki’s eyes were on him. A pastel pink blush was on top of his freckles as his green eyes zeroed in on Katsuki’s arms.

Katsuki faltered for a moment before realizing what was happening.

The damn nerd was checking him out.

Out of pure reaction to the staggering fact, Katsuki gripped the soft dough in his hands to restrain himself. Izuku’s eyes flickered from his arms down to the way Katsuki’s fingers sank deeply into the soft dough. The pastel blush grew deeper and then Izuku snapped his eyes forward and turned his face away from him.

Katsuki’s eyes widened from shock.

Fuck. Did he see that right?

“Alright!” The instructor’s voice cut through. “Time to roll down the dough and cut out the shapes.”

Katsuki’s brain struggled between paying attention to the instructor and staring down Izuku. The green haired man was blushing deeply, eyes so forcefully focused on his baking. Katsuki blinked rapidly wondering if he had hallucinated it—but he knew this wasn’t one of his lucid dreams. He had really caught Izuku checking out his damn biceps.

A large part of Katsuki’s ego swelled and he grew cocky.

He made it a point to roll out the dough with a slight flex of his arms to see if he could confirm his suspicions—and yup. Izuku’s eyes discreetly flickered over his muscles. The pair of hitmen placed the doughnuts into the oven and waited for them to bake. When it came time to take them out of the oven, Izuku was struggling to keep his eyes off his exposed arms.

As they went to the countertop side by side, Katsuki noted how Izuku was still blushing near him. The nerd tried to play it off with casual conversation—but there was a small hint of shyness that wasn’t there before.

He raised an eyebrow.

“Now you’re going to take your stick and punch a little hole in the doughnut,” The instructor said. He lifted the fluffy doughnut in one hand and a small stick in the other. He then used the stick to pierce through the pastry and swirled it. “Move it around in circles until the little hole is nice and gaping. This way you can put the tip of the piping bag in and put the custard in easily.”

Katsuki scoffed in disbelief.

“This is the most suggestive fucking baking class.” He used the little stick to poke a hole in the fluffy doughnut and twirled it around as instructed.

“What are you talking about?” Izuku said with an ignorantly cute smile. He did the same as Katsuki but with more vigor. “This is so relaxing and wholesome. We’re making cute little doughnuts.”

“Oh, please. You can’t be that goddamn naive,” Katsuki hissed. “These are nothing but metaphorical creampies in pastry form.”

“Stop being so crude,” Izuku harshly whispered. He glanced around wearily and then glared at Katsuki. “People can hear you so don’t say that.”

“What? Don’t say creampie?” Katsuki exasperated. He emphasized the last word a little too loud for Izuku’s liking. Several eyes turned towards them. “That’s exactly what the hell these are—”

“—Now once you get the hole all adjusted, it’s ready to be filled to the brim!” The instructor said gleefully. “Just insert the tip of the piping bag when giving the hole the custard. Nothing more. You don’t want to stretch your hole too wide.”

Izuku grimaced.

Katsuki gave Izuku a smirk when the freckled man started filling up the doughnuts. The off-white custard eased inside as Izuku applied pressure to the thin, plastic piping bag. When Izuku finished, a little bit dripped out from the hole in the doughnut and onto the pink baking pan.

“C’mon, nerd. Fucking look at ‘em.” Katsuki chuckled darkly. “You really don’t see it?”

“No. I don’t.”

Izuku glared at him with blushed cheeks and returned to the task of filling up the doughnuts. He had a pout on his pink lips that made Katsuki’s sadistic side rear its head. Izuku’s rose colored world was so romanticized to the point the man barely saw things as sexual. It was so obvious he always saw everything as cutesy and romantic.

Katsuki thought about how easily fucking flustered this nerd was and decided to test him limits.

As Izuku was meticulously filling up their batch of doughnuts, Katsuki picked up one that Izuku had already finished. Green eyes turned to him as Katsuki held it up with a cruel smirk.

“What are you doing? They’re not ready to be eaten yet—”

“—Creampies are always ready to be eaten,” Katsuki said mischievously.

His smirk grew as he lightly squeezed the pastry in his hand.

Izuku’s breath hitched as the cream came oozing out, dripping downwards. Green eyes went wide and stared at Katsuki like he had just committed a crime against humanity. But Katsuki didn’t give a damn when suddenly a small, heated tension sparked that neither anticipated. Izuku’s eyes flickered down to his arms and Katsuki’s smirk widened.

Burning scarlet eyes bored into deep viridian.

Without breaking eye contact, Katsuki lifted the abused pastry to his lips. He slowly dragged his tongue up, licking the trail of white custard that had dripped out. Izuku’s whole face burned red when Katsuki dipped his tongue in the hole, curling it enough to edge out a helping of the sweet cream.

Izuku squeezed the plastic piping bag so hard in his hands it burst.

Several people in the vicinity gasped in shock. Shouto and Inasa sharply turned to them and Izuku yelped loudly. He flinched when all the white custard splattered across his hair, eyes, mouth and nose. Large bits even went flying onto his apron and some of his shirt.

Katsuki's eyes bulged as he froze with his tongue deep in the pastry. Izuku quickly fumbled around to clean up. He was muttering a string of apologies as the thick fluid dripped down his face.

Crimson eyes dilated fully without Katsuki's knowledge.

Well, shit.

Izuku looked nearly sinful. All those conflicting emotions resurfaced in Katsuki as he stared down at Izuku. Half his brain screamed that this man had tried to kill him—the other half screamed this man was exactly his type in the looks department. But eventually all those swarming feelings of conflict were overshadowed by a very specific image put into his mind.

He put down the squeezed pastry when Izuku started to desperately wipe his face clean. The poor nerd's cheeks were burning red so harshly that Katsuki had doubts they would return to normal. Izuku kept muttering and wiping himself down to the point Katsuki felt a little pity for him.

When too many eyes were on them, he cleared his throat.

"C'mere," Katsuki muttered. "Let me help, you damn cultz."

He stepped forward and stilled the bustling Izuku by his shoulders. The short man froze in his grasp, not even daring to meet his gaze. Katsuki slowly took the napkin out of his hand, having some pity on him and helped him get cleaned up. Because that's what a good partner did: cleaned up their partner after making a mess. That's one lesson Katsuki didn't need help with.

When the custard dripped over Izuku's full lips, Katsuki found himself gazing a little too hard. He wiped it up, and damn. From what he could tell through the thin layer of fabric, Izuku's lips were plush and soft.

"You really exploded without giving me a warning," Katsuki mirthfully whispered, unable to help himself. "Got a little too excited?"

"S-Shut up," Izuku hissed, embarrassed. "It was an accident because you had to go and do that."

"In my defense, I didn't expect you to cream all over yourself."

Izuku spluttered and Katsuki's grin pointed ear to ear.

"Why—Why are you s-so—so—" Izuku tripped over his words before giving up. "I'm going to go clean up in the bathroom."

He blushed impossibly deeper and quickly snatched himself out of Katsuki's hold. The blond hitman chuckled deeply from his stomach, enjoying teasing Izuku too much. The cream covered man bowed out of the room and beelined straight for the restrooms—yet again.

Katsuki didn't even realize his smirk had blossomed into a smile until after Izuku departed. His cheeks hurt from the strain because he had not truly smiled in this long. The jump of warmth and happiness that surged through his veins was foreign—but it felt good.

He watched Izuku skirt around the corner with a quickness he had never seen the man have. But when the bundle of green and pink was out of sight, Katsuki thought about the visual of Izuku covered in custard.

He couldn't deny the man was a looker. Cute face. Plump ass. Soft voice. All physical attributes he liked in a man. But Izuku was even more attractive while covered in what looked to be something very dirty. However, while all that was obvious to Katsuki, he thought of Izuku's nervous reaction. It had made him chuckle so deeply that he liked it.

There was a trickle of warmth at the bottom of his stomach.

While his faux husband was regrouping in the restroom, Katsuki finished up the baking.

He filled the doughnuts up, making a stupid little heart in red icing of on top of each one. He smirked at how they looked perfect. He privately thought to himself that he and Izuku had done a good job as he tucked the doughnuts in the pink box. He tied the black ribbon around the box.

When Izuku returned, he was as good as new. Not a speck of custard was on him and Katsuki nearly fed off the embarrassed glance Izuku gave him. That warm feeling at the bottom of his stomach returned.

"Well, it was fun making the little creampies," Katsuki said offhandedly. He handed Izuku the pink box filled with their creation. "We even got a little bow to top 'em off."

"Please. Stop it," Izuku begged. He snatched the box from him with a harmless glare. "If you don't be quiet, I'm going to punch you in the mouth to make you."

"Eh. Wouldn't be the first time, I could take it. Your left hook is weak."

Izuku huffed and turned away from him.

As they left the kitchen, Katsuki concluded: while he hated Izuku, he liked teasing him.

They docked at Ie Island and gave their goodbyes to the Todoroki husbands. Shouto and Inasa mentioned that they were going to go exploring around and see what type of boutiques and restaurants the island had to offer. As they split ways, Katsuki concluded that they weren't that bad of company.

Two lovesick fucking fools—but nice men all around. More tolerable than the overly enthusiastic Ashido-Kirishimas in Katsuki's book.

The blond hitman placed his sunglasses back over his eyes the second the southern sun settled on him. He kept his sleeves rolled up to ease some of the heat blazing onto him as he held onto their pink box of Boston cream doughnuts. His muscles eased a bit under the tropical setting as the palm trees above their heads swayed with the ocean breeze.

Izuku's face had finally drained of all red blush after nearly an hour. A familiar, serious expression had now settled on to those freckled features. Katsuki took that as his cue to cut to business and ignore the budding feeling of warmth at his core.

"Alright, let's try to search for something out of place," Izuku said as they started walking in tandem towards the city area. "I feel like maybe there has to be more to the whole white dove thing than we see."

"It's probably code for something," Katsuki agreed. His eyes looked around the bustling island-goers. Nothing was suspicious so far. "What else does a white dove mean?"

"A white dove symbolizes three things usually," Izuku said easily, his own eyes glancing around as well. "Peace, love, and unity."

"Sounds like hippie shit. Maybe we need to find some bonfire areas."

"Or a church," Izuku suggested. "The dove is a religious symbol."

Katsuki nodded in agreement. Izuku was good at deciphering things—maybe all that time he spent with his nose in a book helped. He probably had a shit ton of symbolism fully loaded to use for moments like these.

As they walked around the city area of the Island, Katsuki admitted it was beautiful. Under the midafternoon light, all the lush greenery was breathtaking. He could see in the distance a thick forest. Above them the mountains and hills stretched towards the sky with the variety of palm trees. Birds flew overhead, chirping and singing their melodies into the wind. The sleek buildings of the city area were mostly made of glass and reflected the bright, white sun.

After combing through the area, they found a small church sitting off to the outskirts of the city. It was like most normal churches Katsuki had seen in his life. There were stainless glass windows aligning it in bright colors. They searched around it for any hint or direction of where to go.

Katsuki reasoned that if he was a human trafficker, he wouldn't give plain ass directions to his HQ. Too traceable. He would probably leave some weird clues that people who were smart enough to decipher would wind up finding it.

"Katsuki—look," Izuku suddenly said. He shot his hand out and grabbed his arm.

Izuku pointed upwards to the stainless glass windows above their heads. Katsuki looked up, fully taking a gander at them.

The images on the artful window were a flock of white doves flying towards the top of a mountain. Red eyes peered off into the distance to gaze at the mountain on the island. The image was nearly the same as the landscape.

“Well shit,” Katsuki said. He tilted his head in surprise at how it was nearly a map of where to go. “A church was right on the money. Good job, Deku.”

“I told you I’m better at our job than you.” Izuku gave him a condescending bright smile and Katsuki glowered.

“Don’t push it,” Katsuki warned with a sharp gaze. “Actually, I take back what I said. Fuck you.”

Katsuki spun on his heels, irritated at Izuku’s small laugh.

They walked towards the mountain pass, passing by the sunny beaches along the way. People with surf boards excitedly ran past them in their bright swimsuits. Their giggles were light and cheerful as someone played music from their phones. Families having a day out sat under the palm trees that were perfectly aligned along the sidewalk. Some people were eating ice cream and chatting. Some people even had on big sun hats like Izuku’s as they lounged in the sand.

After a while, they came to the opening of a path that transitioned between the concrete of the city and up a small hill. It continued and followed a small trail up the mountainside into the thick foliage. The pathway was still lined with palm trees in an organized way that clearly had human help.

But as they trudged on, the once welcoming trees suddenly felt more ominous. The higher up they went, the less neatly aligned they were. The numbers started growing and with every step the concrete path started to appear more broken. The cracked concrete stretched up, looking as though they hadn’t been tended to for years.

It was when they reached a dirt road that the looming trees became so dense to the point they blocked out all the sunny sky above. Both Katsuki and Izuku put their sunglasses away into their pockets at a point when it became hard to see. The deeper they ventured, the temperature on Katsuki’s skin dropped in the dark shade. All the city noise became mute in the background and the only things Katsuki could hear were him and Izuku’s footsteps and breathing.

The aura was different up here. Izuku seemed to feel the shift in the air too, green eyes were now calculating and sharp as they strained to see around in the dense collection of trees.

Then there was a sudden rustle of footsteps the second the dirt path turned into nothing.

Both hitmen froze on the spot and in sync squatted low to the ground. They cut their eyes at each other in a silent exchange before reaching for their weapons. Izuku rolled down his pink socks to reveal a long fang shaped dagger and grabbed it with deadly intentions. Katsuki secured the box of pastries in one hand and hiked up his pants with the other. He reached for his loaded gun and secured the silencer on it.

They waited in the shadows for the footsteps to continue. It was two people, from what Katsuki could tell. The footsteps continued until they stopped. Rustled and shifted. Then walked off into the distance in the same direction he and Izuku were heading.

Katsuki jutted his head in the direction of the footsteps and Izuku followed suit.

They kept sleuthing in the dark until they came to a clearing and a large drop incline. They peaked over the declining hill to see what looked to be a grey warehouse sitting completely out of place. The lights were on, and it seemed like there was a large section of it that was embedded into the ground. Possibly leading somewhere. It was isolated, giving off an aura that caused goosebumps to dance over Katsuki's limbs. If he had passed this without knowing the assignment, he probably wouldn't have given it a second look.

But sitting on the side of the building was an emblem of a white dove carrying an olive branch.

Bingo.

"C'mon," Katsuki whispered and stood to full height. "Let's find a way down and survey the building. We need to confirm it's actually the headquarters."

Izuku nodded in agreement, and they backtracked a bit. They tried tediously to find a way down without hurting themselves. As they stumbled through the woodwork looking for a pathway down, they heard the footsteps come back.

They both froze as they looked around in the dense darkness. They ducked down to the ground again on their hunches as the footsteps grew closer. Katsuki carefully laid down the box of pastries on the dirt ground. He shifted his feet in a way that would allow him to go on the offense while Izuku shifted in defense. When the footsteps passed directly behind them, Katsuki spun around with his finger on the trigger and Izuku gripped his lethal dagger.

But both quickly staggered when they caught sight of the goddamn Todoroki husbands' backsides.

Katsuki hissed a curse as he rapidly fumbled to hide his gun and Izuku rapidly withdrew too. The Todoroki couple spun around the next split second to see Izuku and Katsuki fall into each other in the dirt in a clumsy attempt to hide their weapons. Katsuki and Izuku both groaned in pain as Katsuki accidentally went tumbling into Izuku without warning. His chin hit Izuku's forehead, and his body fell directly on top of the smaller one.

Neither of them cared about the awkward position as they desperately tried to conceal their weapons because what the fuck—

"—Bakugous?" Shouto exclaimed, eyes narrowing in confusion. "Is that you?"

Shouto's mixed matched eyes squinted in the dark as he and Inasa walked up to where they were laying in the dirt. Katsuki pushed his gun under Izuku's body and Izuku concealed his knife.

“Oh! H-Hey there, Shouto!” Izuku said lamely. He gave a smile as he tucked his hands under his back. “Yeah, it’s us.”

Katsuki concealed the fact he was on edge as he noticed how both Todorokis stances were discreetly on the offense. They each had one hand behind their backs and were eyeing them up and down. Katsuki and Izuku eyed them up and down right back.

“What are you two doing up here?” Inasa questioned. His once friendly voice was on edge and suspicious. There was no hint of the warmness from earlier as plain out confusion enraptured his strong features.

Izuku and Katsuki spoke at the same time.

“We were sightseeing—”

“—We were about to fuck.”

Izuku’s eyes went wide, and the two Todoroki husbands strangely eyed them.

Katsuki cleared his throat and gave a tight-lipped smile. He looked at Izuku to take the fucking hint. Sightseeing? In a goddamn forest where there was barely any light while they were laying on top of each other? Fucking was far more plausible.

“We wanted some—” How the hell did he put this? “—Privacy. The baking class admittedly put some images in my head. It made me a little impatient to get back to the hotel to have my husband.” A half-truth.

He smiled down at Izuku. He reminded himself that lovers touched and quickly wrapped his arms around Izuku’s shoulders, drawing him in close.

“Ye-Yeah,” Izuku tacked on, smiling as well. Katsuki felt him slyly hide away the dagger and gun under his pastel shirt. “Guilty as charged! Ha. Sorry. We’re kind of into the whole doing —y’know—in different places.”

Shouto raised an eyebrow.

Shouto and Inasa both shifted. They concealed an unknown item behind their backs before dropping their hands to their sides. The movement was so subtle that to the untrained eye, it looked like nothing. But to Katsuki’s blood-soaked scarlet ones, it was a red flag. He had no doubts that they were carrying either guns or knives.

Katsuki kept a poker face, realizing the seriousness of the situation.

“Ah. Well, risky business keeps the marriage fresh I suppose,” Inasa awkwardly chuckled. He gave a fake smile that Katsuki saw straight through. “You two are very adventurous to have climbed up here!”

“Yeah. We are. But what are you two doing here?” Katsuki questioned finally. He lifted himself up by his elbows, still entrapping Izuku’s body below him.

All four sets of eyes glanced between each other.

“We were just trying to see how far up the mountain went,” Shouto explained. Katsuki could see the man visibly force himself to steady his words—which meant that was a fucking lie. “We wanted to get a picture from the top of the mountain together during the sunset.”

“Well, the hiking path is the other direction,” Izuku said, forging innocence. “Just in case you guys are lost! We saw it coming up here. We went the other direction of it on purpose, heh.”

“Right,” Shouto said quietly without taking his eyes off Izuku. He turned to Inasa and touched his shoulder. “We must’ve made a wrong turn.”

Katsuki pressed his lips in a thin line. “Yeah. Must’ve.”

It was quiet enough to hear a pin drop as no one moved.

“Let’s go, Sho. We still have enough time to catch the sunset.” Inasa quickly said. He gave Shouto a tight-lipped faux smile.

“Alright. I guess we’ll be seeing you two,” Shouto quietly replied. “Stay safe and have...fun.”

He still stared down at their tangled bodies in a distrustful way. In contrast to this, Inasa brightly smiled at them like a flip was switched. Quickly the tension in the air melted into nothing and Shouto and Inasa seemed like normal everyday vacationers.

“Yeah, see you later for the boat ride back to the hotel!” Izuku said with a small wave and smile. “Have fun on the mountain top!”

There was a split second of distrustful glances exchanged. Then the Todorokis turned around and went towards the hiking path, glancing over their shoulders the entire time. Katsuki stayed positioned on top of Izuku until the pair of footsteps died off.

They both let out shaky exhales and Katsuki rolled off Izuku. He laid in the dirt next to him, sticks and rocks digging into his back.

For a moment the direness of the situation settled into their skins. It seeped in with each excruciating second. As they both gazed up at the thick canopy of palm trees, neither hitman said a word. They both replayed the entire interaction in their heads like a movie as they gazed up to the swaying palm branches.

“You know we have to go follow them,” Izuku said quietly.

Katsuki reluctantly nodded his head. “Yeah. I fucking know.”

This assignment was shaping up to be a bigger pain in the ass than he thought.

They stealthily followed alongside the hiking trail until they heard a familiar pair of voices. As they crouched low, both Katsuki caught sight of Shouto and Inasa with their arms folded looking just as equally baffled and tired as he and Izuku were. The crouched behind an inconspicuous bush and ease dropped.

“There’s something weird about the Bakugous,” Shouto said and Katsuki’s gut sank. Goddamnit. “I can’t put my finger on it but they’re off. First, they make a scene in the aerobics class and the baking class. Now they’re suspiciously having sex in the woods—close to the warehouse?”

“I think they just have marriage issues,” Inasa countered. “But I agree. It is a big coincidence that they were that close to the White Dove headquarters. It...feels strange. But I don’t believe they are associated with Moore.”

“Well, let’s keep a close eye on them and make sure they’re not working with him. My gut is sensing something is wrong.”

Well. At least they could confirm that the eerie warehouse was the headquarters. But that begged the question, who exactly were they—

“I hope you’re right and they don’t complicate things,” Shouto grumbled. “I swear, the captain does not pay us enough for these undercover operations. I could be back in Osaka with my father right now having a cup of coffee and working on easy misdemeanor cases.”

“I agree but think of it this way: once we get this case wrapped up, we’ll both be promoted to sergeants. I’m sure of it!” Inasa said enthusiastically. He leaned down and placed a small kiss on Shouto’s cheek. “The bust will be easy as cake and we’ll be on the first flight to Osaka.”

Both Katsuki and Izuku’s hearts dropped at the same time.

They were fucking cops.

Katsuki didn’t know how to describe the rigid emotion that settled into his chest as he and Izuku walked back off that mountain. The air around them was stale as they absorbed the new information.

Two people in their goddamn Paradise Crew were fucking undercover police officers.

The gloomy overshadow of the canopy slowly dissolved as they walked towards the town area. The trees gave way back to that overly sunny sky that was now dusted with a light burnt orange. The clouds were absorbing the beginning pastel sunset and looked to be a mix of blue, orange and purple.

Neither hitman said a word as they walked aimlessly. Eventually Izuku announced that he needed to call his handler and Katsuki agreed that was the best move. They both ended up putting some distance between each other out of ear shot as they made their calls.

But of, fucking course that goddamn Aizawa didn’t answer. Katsuki pinched the bridge of his nose. Why the fuck could this man never answer in phone in a timely manner?

“Hello. You’ve reached my direct line. Things at work have picked up recently so I’ll get back as soon as possible. If this is Bakugou, you better come only bearing good news, my patience is thin with you.”

Beep.

Katsuki sighed heavily.

“Hey. So. We have a code secretive 110—like direct secretive 110. These people are very close to me every day. I’ll explain the situation in full but—” He looked over his shoulders to glance at Izuku. The green-eyed man raked a hand through his curls while talking softly on the phone. “—Some...unexpected things have come up. Give me a ring back ASAP.”

He ended the voicemail there.

Katsuki twirled the cell phone in his hand in deep thought. He watched a couple dressed in pink and orange walk by hand in hand.

He really didn’t fucking feel like getting called back to The Company without a completed assignment. He needed Moore’s head on a goddamn stake. Coming back empty handed would require so much protocol, debriefing and it would be a technical third strike in a row for missed missions for him. That type of faultiness always resulted in employees needing to make up double the assignments—and Katsuki was trying to fucking leave.

Eventually, Izuku came back and had a dampened mood dripping from him. His viridian eyes looked heavier—disappointed almost.

They began aimlessly walking.

Somehow, they found themselves on the beach, sitting in the sand under the golden sun. They sullenly watched the elegant blue ocean dance with the painterly sunset colors. Katsuki placed the pink box of doughnuts between them and leaned back to enjoy the view.

“Did you get any answers on what you have to do next?” Katsuki asked. He felt odd but he didn’t know why as he watched the sun begin to lower.

“No,” Izuku said with a tiny shrug. “I couldn’t reach my handler. I got our secretary—but he wasn’t much help and can’t issue direct orders. He told me to hang tight until our handler came back from overseas.”

Izuku was in the same boat as him. Katsuki dragged his tongue along the inside of his cheek while thinking.

“I can’t do cops,” Izuku confessed quietly without taking his eyes off the waves. “It’s strictly against my policies and outside of my operations. But I have direct orders that I need to take care of Moore—so cops are bad news.”

Katsuki nodded in understanding. “I can’t do cops either.”

Despite The Company having high end clients like specific political and government leaders, they still operated under the table. Cops were too straight forward in how they followed the law and regulated justice. Their world view would probably be shattered to know not everyone believed in the right to a fair trial. Police were too idealistic.

Katsuki liked to think of them like night and day. Police officers operated in the glorious sun. In contrast, he operated in the malignant shadows. He executed orders they couldn't and dished out balance in a way that was still too taboo for society to discuss. Because while Peter Moore was wanted dead or alive, many government officials were leaning towards death. Seemed like no one cared to go through the issues of a legal trial where their own dirty laundry might get aired out.

Katsuki sighed and took one of the doughnuts out of the pink box. He bit into it bitterly.

"What shitty ass luck," he grumbled as he ate. "I can't believe we're stuck with fucking cops."

"So. What now?" Izuku asked.

"I guess we wait to see what our higher ups say," Katsuki said distantly. "I can't make a move until I disclose the details to my boss. If he says abort the mission I have to head back. It's a stalemate."

"Same on the stalemate. I can't risk cops tracing me."

Katsuki hummed in agreement. He thought about the situation, and he was genuinely stumped. He had never had this happen before. What were the chances that he would have an obstacle like two undercover cops and the fact Aizawa was unable to be reached? He and Izuku were officially in limbo, stuck in Paradise together.

Damn. He guessed they were actually on vacation for a while.

A group of loud teens walked back on the beach with a loud radio blasting music. It faded into the background as Katsuki looked at the calm landscape. Katsuki took another of the sweet treats and motioned to the box.

"Try one of these creampies, nerd. They're actually good."

Izuku shook his head at him but didn't reprimand the crude language. He picked up one of the doughnuts and started biting into it. Izuku hummed in delight and leaned back in the sand as well. He put his sunglasses back over his eyes as the sun started to go down. Katsuki watched, interested, as Izuku laid down on his back and stared up at the clouds while eating.

"Enjoying yourself, dork?" Katsuki teased and tilted his head.

Izuku smiled up at him with puffed out cheeks full of pastries. "I am, this is sorta relaxing."

Katsuki chuckled lightly and shook his head. He studied as the colors on the beach started shifting to deeper hues. The gentle pastels became more vibrant and richer as the sunset grew near. The golden orange that was draped across the landscape encompassed Izuku as well.

Katsuki took that moment to really look at him. He looked at his cutesy clothes, his freckles and the dreamy look on his face as he stared up at the clouds.

It was then Izuku perked up and grabbed his bag. He took out the romance novel and handed it to Katsuki.

“You still need to finish the last ten pages,” Izuku said seriously. “You heard Shouto. We’re already suspicious to them—we can’t have any cracks now.”

“Yeah, yeah,” Katsuki mumbled. “I don’t disagree.”

The angry blond didn’t even try to fight it. He took the book reluctantly but flipped straight to where he left off.

As he read through the book, he realized it was good. There was no way in hell he’d admit it out loud to the menace next to him, but the book was decent. The characters were complex, and the story line was told in a nonlinear fashion that it gripped Katsuki’s interest and had him begging for more.

However, while reading the part where the man crossed a fictional desert for his loved one, Katsuki paused. He pondered if he could ever love someone that much—or could anyone love him that much.

He glanced up to see another couple walk by holding hands.

A small pang hit Katsuki’s sternum.

He finished the last ten pages without an issue, but slowly a gnawing feeling steadily consumed him. He felt out of place here like a sore thumb as he watched all the loving stares people were giving each other.

“What’s another way to pretend to be in love?” Katsuki asked, suddenly feeling like he wanted to know more.

“Um, you could do actions,” Izuku said thoughtfully. He tapped his finger to his chin. “You tend to just linger there and go along with whatever. But from what I know, people have love languages. Like touch. Giving gifts. Quality time together. Words of affirmation and acts of service.”

“Deku. Can you explain that to me in detail a bit more? You might as well have been speaking Cantonese when you say shit like that to me.”

Izuku lightly laughed and turned towards him with happy crescent moon eyes. “I mean the way you express your love for others. Romantic or platonic.”

Katsuki thought about it more. “Ah—okay. I get it. Literal fucking love languages.”

He mulled it over but didn’t really know what his love language was. Hell, he hadn’t even known there was any. He questioned deeply if he had ever expressed affection in such a way outside of sex with strangers he never saw again. He tried to think back to the only person he'd ever loved—which was his mother. He was fiercely protective of her up until the day he fucked up and she got killed.

He supposed his love language...was...fuck. He didn't know.

He thought about his mother more, trying to connect anything.

But then as if someone had smashed a hammer to his spine, he involuntarily flinched and clenched his teeth. The image of his mother's bloodied, dead body resurfaced violently. He could see those lifeless red eyes looking up at him, filling every inch of his being with guilt and unchecked anger. He clenched his jaw so hard he felt the pain run down his neck.

No. No goddamn mom thoughts right now.

He quickly shoved all thoughts of her back in the steel volt in his mind and shut it tight.

Katsuki looked down at the well-used book in his hand to distract himself.

He instead focused on the fact he was stuck in Okinawa until Aizawa graced him with his presence. Knowing he was going to be here possibly longer, made him feel odd. However, possibly staying for a shorter amount of time made him feel odd as well. The former and the latter amounts of time felt bizarre to him for different reasons.

He stared down at the romantic man lying next to him trying to figure out why the latter made him feel strangely disappointed.

Katsuki then cleared his throat and tried to make conversation.

"It must suck that I'm the one you're stuck with while you're here," Katsuki said and held up the book for emphasis. "You clearly love this romantic shit. I feel like I cock blocked you almost—or er, romantic blocked? Is that a term?"

"No, it's not, but it's alright," Izuku reassured. He gave Katsuki a gracious smile under the orange sun. "Ironically, it's been interesting getting to know you. I finally got to know the personality of the annoying man who has been guarding my marks for eight years."

Katsuki scoffed and raised a brow at Izuku. "Oh yeah?"

"Yeah." Izuku grinned up at him mirthfully. "You're as intolerable as I assumed you were."

"And you're as much of a little shit as I thought you were." Katsuki smirked.

Gradually, they laughed together at the irony of their situation. It bubbled up slowly, building like a steady slow tempo until it reached a steady chuckle in both. Izuku snickered and smiled so hard that his eyes crinkled and Katsuki deeply chuckled until he felt that warmth trickle back into his core.

They laughed together for the first time, and it felt nearly harmonized.

Katsuki liked it.

He really did hate Izuku—but he liked this moment.

He listened to Izuku's laugh as he watched the sun finally set. All the beautiful colors around them slowly faded into desaturated blue darkness quietly. Everyone on the beach stopped talking and moving about to watch. For once, Katsuki felt his life halt entirely. There was nothing he had to do but admire the setting in front of him. The sun lowered itself with strength, confidence and an unnamed type of sadness below the blue horizon to finally rest for the day.

Both hitmen grew quiet as they stared at the sight in front of them, unaware of the set of light brown eyes watching them.

It was now fully nighttime, and neither of them received a call back. Katsuki didn't know if he was okay with it or not. Izuku appeared a little on edge, but for the most part they went along with the motions. They had finished eating the dozen doughnuts they cooked, chatting lightly with each other and the truce they had felt almost real.

Katsuki's guard was let down a tiny bit as he watched the freckled man stuff his face with treats while wearing those dumb heart shaped glasses.

They boarded back on The White Dove with everything up in the air. They got back on deck and the upbeat beachy atmosphere now felt a little more slowed down and romantic. Instead of lounge chairs, there were now classy white tables for people to sit at on the deck. The fairy lights had more of an impact against the backdrop of the navy-blue sky. They almost put to shame the endless sea of stars twinkling brightly above them.

The pair of hitmen easily took a seat at one of the tables on the side to look out and admire the dark ocean view. Katsuki stared a little bit at Izuku's profile as the boat started to move. The wind picked up and brushed his curls back. At that moment, Izuku took off his heart shaped glasses and revealed deeper emotions inside of the sea of green in his eyes.

Katsuki's burning curiosity tripled the longer he looked at the sight in front of him.

Izuku stared off into the blended night sky and ocean as if searching for something. Katsuki tilted his head inquisitively as he considered the man in front of him.

He had always believed the first emotion he felt about the freckled man was anger. Unchecked, pure fucking resentment. He thought the bitter emotion coursed through him like a raging river and struck lightning on every nerve he had. But when he truly thought back on it—the first emotion he felt wasn't anger. It wasn't even hate or mild dislike.

It was morbid curiosity.

A shift of gears churned in his chest as Katsuki was finally honest with himself.

"Good evening, sirs," a waitress greeted. She did a light bow with the silver tray in her hand. "Pink martinis for your evening?"

Both Izuku and Katsuki glanced at each other before saying okay. She took the sparkling pink martinis off the delicate tray and placed it in front of them. A miniature, delicate hibiscus flower was perched on the side of the delicate glass. As they sipped on sweet drinks, the band was in the background playing slower music. Feeling like testing his music muscles, Katsuki decided to try to guess the temp range. It was lento if Katsuki had it correct. He listened a bit closer when the next song changed and found he was correct.

Then out of the corner of his eye he saw two figures approach them. Katsuki cut his eyes to see both Shouto and Inasa coming up to them with plastic smiles. He kicked Izuku lightly under the table to come back to earth from his thoughts.

“Taro. Hiroji,” Shouto said tautly. There wasn’t an ounce of trust in those eyes of his. Shouto slowly glanced between them and Katsuki could tell he was surveying them. “Good evening to you guys.”

“Shouto. Inasa,” Katsuki mirrored. He nodded his head curtly while Izuku happily waved. “Good evening to you too.”

“How did you guys enjoy your hike?” Izuku said with a friendly faux smile. He tilted his head, selling it fully.

“It was good. We got our photo,” Inasa exclaimed, grinning just as wide as Izuku. Katsuki now began to wonder how genuine his emotions were. “How about you guys? Did you um...have a decent time? Or get a chance to go elsewhere on the island?”

“We spent the evening at the beach,” Katsuki said. He took a sip of his drink. “I ate the creampie—I mean doughnuts. We ate the doughnuts we made.”

Inasa’s eyebrows shot up to the sky and Katsuki hated how well that fucking fit for their alibi. Izuku blushed deeply on the other side of the table and awkwardly chuckled.

There was a beat of silence between the four of them. Katsuki decided very quickly he didn’t like the way Shouto and Inasa were sizing him up. But before he could even begin to leer at them—a new figure appeared in all white.

Slowly an arm snaked around Izuku’s shoulders in false kindness. All eyes turned to the new figure and standing there in all his glory was Peter Moore. The resort owner’s smiling face was grinning ear to ear in all the false friendliness he oozed before. He was close to radiant in the night light under the fairy lights. He was decorated in multiple colorful hibiscus leis around his neck and clutched a few in his hand.

“Good evening,” they all said in a clumsy unison.

Katsuki smirked lightly. Poor bastard didn’t even know one set of these husbands were trying to arrest him and the other was attempting to land a bullet in his skull without tripping alarms. Katsuki had to take another sip of his pink drink not to snort at the thick fucking irony.

“I just wanted to come by and say hello!” Moore said a little too happily. “I always take the evening boat back over to the mainland. It’s a captivating ride. Fills my heart with joy and love every time!”

Katsuki began to wonder if this was even an act anymore. Maybe Moore wasn’t the fucking brains behind this—but then he reminded himself The Company never got a mark incorrect. This bastard was just that good at disguising the ugly parts of himself.

“Oh, by the way, these are for you,” Moore said as he lifted the leis. “I make sure to give them out to anyone who comes along the cruise.”

All of them let the man bestow upon them the string of flowers. He put a thick, deep scarlet Plumeria lei around Katsuki’s neck. Then he turned and put two bright pink ones on Shouto and Inasa’s. Then finally he gave Izuku the last one in his hand, a white orchid lei.

“And also, you all may have this, whoever wants it,” Moore said as he pulled out a tiny branch with green leaves on it.

Katsuki scrunched his nose. Why the fuck was he giving them a twig?

Izuku tilted his head as he took the stick out of the hotel owner’s hand. “An olive branch?”

“Mhm!” Moore agreed, looking at all of them with a charismatic grin. “I found it laying around and for some reason it reminded me of Hiroji’s eyes! I hope you don’t mind me saying this, Taro, but your husband has such a beautiful shade of eye color. Truly a beautiful find.”

Then before Katsuki could even respond to that weird comment, Moore placed the olive branch behind Izuku’s ear.

“Yeah,” Katsuki said tightly, looking between Izuku and the olive branch. “He has pretty eyes for sure.”

The olive branch was as delicate as Izuku’s facial features. However, there was an unsettling queasiness that settled at the bottom of Katsuki’s gut staring at it. He then wearily eyed the emblem of The White Dove that was on the boat’s flag, sailing high in the wind. He stared at the olive branch the bird was carrying.

Then he stared around and realized no one else on the damn boat was wearing a white orchid lei.

Katsuki glanced sharply towards Shouto and Inasa to see if they could sense the ominous nature of Moore’s supposed harmless act. But those two didn’t seem to be paying fucking attention at all, just playing with the pretty pink flowers around their necks.

When Moore gazed a little too long at Izuku, it felt like nails scratching down a chalkboard.

“Thanks for the leis, but I promised my husband a dance before you all came over,” Katsuki said suddenly. He extended his hand across the table for Izuku. “I want to make sure we have enough time to dance before the boat docks.”

“Are you ready, darling?” Katsuki said, gazing at Izuku expectantly.

He decided being near these three people was too many fucking liabilities. He hadn’t a damn clue why there was an eeriness looming over him—but he trusted his gut.

Izuku blushed but took the hand that was waiting for him. Katsuki intertwined their fingers, thankful for the warmth to some degree. The two hitmen smiled at all the three other men, and quickly they all said their goodbyes. Which Katsuki was fucking thankful for. When they walked away, he felt like he could breathe again. The suffocating air around the tension between the five men was simmering in a way Katsuki didn’t quite think was possible.

“They’re watching us for slip ups,” Izuku whispered. “This would be a good time to maybe strengthen our roles, not give them a chance to doubt us.”

Katsuki glanced over his shoulder to see Shouto and Inasa sit at a table and give a friendly wave. The two undercover cops sipped on their own pink martinis and started laughing. Katsuki huffed, agitated. Were they even fucking married?

They took their positions on the large opening. The brown wooden floorboards shimmered slightly under the twinkle of the stars and fairy lights around them.

“I have to confess, I have not a damn clue how to slow dance,” Katsuki whispered.

“Disappointed but not surprised,” Izuku said with a hint of humor. They turned to face each other and Izuku smiled up at him. “That seems on brand for you.”

“I’m guessing you know how to slow dance?” Katsuki sneered. “You probably think it’s some form of foreplay.”

“If that’s how looking at it helps you do it—then yes, think of it like foreplay,” Izuku said curtly. He put his free hand on Katsuki’s shoulder, and the blond was slightly taken back by the counter to his suggestive innuendo. “Now, put your other hand on my lower back,” Izuku said seriously.

Katsuki hesitantly slid his hand around Izuku’s waist to land at the small of his back.

He followed Izuku’s lead as they pressed in close to each other. Izuku squeezed their interlocked hand lightly. His body was warm and Katsuki felt himself unwillingly blush at the level of intimacy. Izuku started to sway lightly to the violin rhythm and Katsuki took a deep breath in as they went along with the music like everyone else around them.

Izuku was blushing, but it seemed like he didn’t let it get to him as they forcefully gazed into each other’s eyes to blend in. The music dipped into a rift that allowed Katsuki to lose himself to the delicate sound of the music. The longer he stared down into Izuku’s endless green eyes, the heat swelling at his neck seemed to grow in temperature.

He vaguely remembered hearing something about extended eye contact stimulating arousal.

“How long should we stare into each other’s eyes?” Katsuki asked after a while. He watched how Izuku swallowed, and his eyes flickered a bit to his lips.

“Long enough to be convincing—they’re still looking,” Izuku answered slyly.

Katsuki nodded and continued to sway to the music while studying Izuku. He swore Izuku’s palm spiked in temperature the longer they went on for. The candy blush on his cheeks were beginning to match his shirt again. Katsuki tilted his head, studying how the blush on Izuku’s face deepened the color of some of his freckles. Then scarlet eyes landed on Izuku’s full lips. Green eyes slightly dilated.

“What are you thinking about?” Izuku asked above a whisper.

“How this song fucking sucks,” Katsuki answered honestly. “They haven’t played anything fully tasteful this whole stupid boat ride.”

“I-I actually was hoping they’d play this one song, but it hasn’t come up yet,” Izuku said quietly. He finally broke eye contact and chuckled lightly. “It’d be cool to hear a violin cover it.”

Katsuki tilted his head at the sudden bashfulness. “What song is it?”

“It’s silly. Don’t worry about it,” Izuku awkwardly laughed off. He smiled up at him. He resumed eye contact with more purpose. “Let’s just keep going—”

“—No, seriously, Deku. What song?” Katsuki pushed. “Is it something from one of your little guilty pleasure romance novels or whatever?”

“It’s from a romance movie,” Izuku admitted. His blush deepened. “The setting with the boat and being on the deck is reminding me of this one scene.”

“Ah. Of course. You’re a nerd for romance movies too.”

Katsuki then hummed and broke eye contact with Izuku. He glanced at the band who was playing a song he didn’t care for at all. He then looked around and thought about how genuinely happy Izuku was earlier when seeing the romantic boat and then again when he was learning how to bake for the first time.

Katsuki clicked his tongue. “Go request the song you want played.”

“W-What?” Izuku stammered, not anticipating that. “No, it’s alright. People will think it’s lame.”

“Fucking go and do it you damn dork,” Katsuki emphasized with a smirk. “I can tell you’re practically drooling for it.”

Izuku looked at him cautiously for a moment before giving a genuine, thankful smile. Izuku broke away from him to walk up the band and Katsuki stayed rooted in place thinking about how to properly slow dance. He touched his red lei and looked over to the two undercover detectives, who were still fucking discreetly watching them. Shouto was in Inasa's lap and to any mundane eye it looked as though they were just two lovers enjoying their company.

He grumbled wondering if those bastards could see through him and Izuku.

"Ah, they said they can't play it," Izuku muttered as he came back to where Katsuki was standing.

The blond sharply turned his head and frowned. "What?"

He paused, taken back by Izuku's crestfallen features. It made Katsuki raise his brows because the damn nerd nearly resembled a goddamn kicked puppy. His big eyes were glued downwards, staring at the floorboards and there was a hint of shame embedded in his face. He wrung his hands nervously.

"Why can't they play your sappy song?" Katsuki asked carefully.

"They said it would mess with the mood."

"So, they can play it," Katsuki corrected. He frowned harder. "They just won't."

"Er, yeah," Izuku confirmed sadly. "It's alright let's just keep dancing—"

"—Let's go talk to them," Katsuki quickly said.

He snatched Izuku by his elbow and dragged him across the deck. The smaller man was hissing protests and trying to get him to stop—but Katsuki ignored him. He yanked the man all the way across the boat. The sudden irritation ticking at his core was making him act out. Why? He wasn't sure. But the look of disappointment on Izuku's face was aggravating. He had suggested the nerd go play that damn song so he could be happy because he liked shit like this—only for him to get denied? No. They were going to play the stupid ass song.

He stopped in front of the band and looked over them. Red eyes dug straight into the lead violinist. The chords stopped abruptly.

"Oi. Why won't you guys play the song he requested?" Katsuki asked with narrowed eyes.

"Oh, it-it's too fast," the brown-haired violinist said. He awkwardly lowered his instrument, gazing between the cringing Izuku and pissed off Katsuki. "We're staying in the low tempos today—"

"—I don't give a flying fuck." Katsuki hissed in a threatening tone. "You guys have been playing tacky ass songs all night. No one gives a rat's ass what tempo it's in when it's making their ears bleed. Play the song he asked for."

"B-But sir, we have to follow protocol."

Katsuki's eyes darkened and all the fury of a thousand storms threatened to unleash as he glared into the violinist. He leaned down with the most intimidating leer to grace his features.

He stared straight into the cowering man's eyes and curled his upper lip.

"My goddamn husband said he wanted that fucking song played so play it."

Katsuki's voice was so low and menacing that the violinist instantaneously straightened out. The brown-haired man cleared his throat and gestured to the rest of the musical team with some fancy hand motions. He resumed position with his brown violin and began playing the song that Izuku requested.

Katsuki immediately recognized it.

"The fucking titanic song?" Katsuki exasperated.

He looked down at Izuku baffled—shocked—but somehow not surprised in the slightest.

"I like it," Izuku confessed with a timid smile. "It's pretty and it fits the setting."

Katsuki sighed, realizing he made a fucking scene over Celine Dion.

However, as the music played, Izuku's face slowly melted off that disgruntled expression and a new one blossomed on it. That same genuinely happy gaze was back and the warmth at the bottom of Katsuki's core struck again.

Katsuki shot one last glare at the violinist who flinched in fear. He resumed holding Izuku's hand and they took their spot back on the deck and danced along to the music. He had to admit, it was pretty. Izuku started laughing and poking fun at his outburst, but Katsuki shrugged. The gentle breeze carded through his hair as they swayed to the song.

Under the stars like this, Katsuki quietly agreed with Izuku.

The song did fit the atmosphere of the cruise boat.

The sound of the ocean waves blended with sound to make the perfect melody as they lost track of time. The corner of Katsuki's lip tugged upwards as he looked at Izuku under the lights in the white lei and olive branch in his hair.

Neither noticed how Shouto's and Inasa's eyes softened while looking at them. The pair of undercover officers glanced at each other before leaving the boat deck to go enjoy their evening together.

They arrived back in their hotel room in limbo. Katsuki stripped down immediately, showered and was thankful he was back inside. He pondered over what was going to happen now. For the most part it was no big deal. They just had to chill out until someone called them back. They could handle that—maybe take a couple days to just watch TV and sleep in the room. When he emerged from the bathroom, he was surprised to see Izuku sitting frozen in thought on the edge of the bed still fully dressed.

He was hunched over, and a pensive expression was pinned to his face. The green-eyed man had taken the olive branch out of his hair in deep thought. He twirled it in his fingers lightly.

“I was the only one Moore gave a white lei to tonight,” Izuku said without taking his eyes off the branch. “And this plant. It could just be a weird alignment, but do you think that means something?”

Katsuki pressed his lips in a thin line. He walked up to Izuku and plucked the twig from his fingers, examining it carefully.

“Yeah,” Katsuki said honestly. “Don’t know what yet, but it felt intentional.”

Izuku nodded emptily as Katsuki laid the olive branch on the nightstand.

That night, Katsuki didn’t dream. Or maybe he did and didn’t remember it. He wished he had, feeling oddly attached to the lucid dreams now after two consecutive nights. All he could vaguely recall from his distant dream memory was the sound of violins. Once again, it was that same unique melody that haunted him.

They were woken up the next day by a loud pounding on the door.

Katsuki had jolted awake while Izuku groaned grumpily. Red eyes squinted in the bright fucking sun as he looked at the clock. It was fucking 06:02 in the goddamn morning. Who the hell was waking them up—

The pounding counted until Katsuki angrily yelled out, “Hold your fucking horses, we’re coming!”

Izuku tousled in the sheets. He unhappily sat up and both hitmen looked at each other over the pillow barrier on the bed. Katsuki grouchily arose shirtless and scratched his ass through the black boxers. Izuku yawned loudly as he rubbed his eye with the oversized pink pajama top sleeve. They walked up to the door and Katsuki grumbled as he snatched it open.

“Why the hell are you knocking on our door this early—”

“—Surprise!” A loud unison yell from the Ashido-Kirishimas belted out way too goddamn loud.

Katsuki felt murderous. Well, more murderous than usual.

Standing in front of them was their entire paradise crew. The Todoroki husband looked grouchy as well, as if they too were dragged out of bed to be here. Momo and Jirou looked decently awake enough. In their hands were plastic coffee mugs with black caps. And right in character were the Ashido-Kirishimas: bright and fucking sunshiny holding what seemed to be—camping gear? Katsuki blinked rapidly and then noticed all their Paradise Crew was indeed dressed as if ready to go into the woods.

“What is this?” Izuku asked through his thick sleepy voice.

“Yo! Get this,” Eijiro said, looking a little too excited for Katsuki’s taste. The red-haired man held up a bundled pink sleeping bag. It was decorated in small hearts and Katsuki had to hold back his gag reflex. It was way too early for this. “We won the resort lottery! We get access to the camping grounds for two days in the Yanbaru forest—for free! We’re getting a car and everything to travel up into the mountains!”

“And how exactly did we win this lottery?” Katsuki said unamused.

“Oh, the resort owner, Mr. Sekai, told us this morning,” Mina said happily. She clapped her hands together. “He said that they pulled our group number out of the lottery. I’m so excited!”

Katsuki’s gut instincts flared. “Sekai. Sekai is inviting us into the woods?”

“Yup. All expenses paid,” Momo said. She sipped her coffee. “Usually, it’s an extension package couples can add on to their resort experience. It’s super expensive though—but this should be interesting.”

“Yeah. Interesting indeed,” Shouto quipped.

Katsuki suspiciously eyed the olive branch on the nightstand.

Chapter 5 - Adagio

Katsuki was a single moment away from losing his goddamn mind.

This assignment truly was testing not only his patience, but his sanity. At this rate, he wasn't sure which was going to cave first. He was damn close to saying fuck it, walking up to Peter Moore and shooting him on general principle.

Currently, their crew was waiting downstairs for them as he and Izuku packed their bags to go camping in the Yanbaru Forest. They were given camping gear in hiking bags with their respective names pinned neatly on them. All the backpacks were filled with the gear they needed. Everyone's hiking backpack was the usual grassy olive color that was found in outdoor gear.

However, Izuku's was a different color.

Izuku's was white.

"You're aware this is suspicious, right?" Katsuki asked as he finished getting dressed. "First the white lei, the olive branch and now your bag is a different color than everyone's. White on top of it."

"Of course, I am aware," Izuku said seriously. He pulled the ivory hiking bag on and secured the straps. "But until I hear back from my handler, I can't make any serious moves with police breathing down my neck. I need to lay low and stay low."

Katsuki cocked his gun before he zipped it in his bag.

"Just keep sharp, Deku."

They finished getting dressed and walked out of the hotel suite side by side on high alert. Katsuki was wearing black cargo shorts, a charcoal black flannel and underneath a black tank top. He put his black boots on, and this time put his guns in his bag instead of on his person. In contrast, Izuku had on high waisted khaki hiking shorts and a salmon-colored t-shirt. He was wearing pink hiking shoes with normal ankle high socks.

On his collar bone was another band aid—covering up his numbered tattoo.

That small detail made Katsuki wonder a bit. It seemed like Izuku made it a point to cover it up every time his shirt's hem was low. He stared at it a bit as they walked, which earned him a curious gaze from Izuku.

"You're staring again," Izuku said casually. "Are you sure you think I'm an eyesore?"

Katsuki immediately frowned and snatched his eyes away. "The ugliest eyesore there is, Deku."

Izuku shook his head as they continued downstairs.

They walked into the lobby, and immediately Katsuki could feel the burn of a million eyes. Several inconspicuous hotel workers glanced at Izuku's backpack. Any other time, he would've summed it up to Izuku's God awful clothing choice. However, this time felt different. Each set of eyes that landed on them felt like they were assessing them.

A little too closely.

He was holding off on the worst-case scenario in his mind, but he knew what was possibly happening. Izuku was being targeted by Moore. The white colored gifts were probably the equivalent of the goddamn bat symbol in the sky for his lackeys for the next victim.

When they made it to the parking lot, they found their crew loading up a bubblegum pink minivan. It was decorated with white hibiscus floral decals and on the side said "Paradise Camping" in magenta print.

Katsuki's worries about the white backpack were immediately buried. He felt the aneurysm growing in his stomach at the sight in front of him and restrained from cursing.

"Hey guys!" Mina said with a bright smile. She was wearing purple butterfly shades and casual hiking gear. "You made it just in time, we already loaded up the car. It's a tight fit but we got all the stuff here! Put your bags in when you have the chance."

“This is going to be hell on wheels,” Katsuki grumbled under his breath only for Izuku to hear.

“Just remember to smile,” Izuku said with a shrug.

They loaded up their backpacks into the minivan and it was stuffed tight. When it came time for them all to get into the godforsaken van, Eijiro got in the driver’s seat and Mina took the passenger seat. Momo and Jirou sat next to Shouto and Inasa in the middle. However, in the third row in the back there was a lump of luggage.

Katsuki frowned.

“There’s not enough room for us in the back,” he announced. He put his hand on his hip and gestured unhappily to the pile up of duffle bags. “You all put your shit on the seats.”

Mina peered back curiously but then smiled at him like there wasn’t one fucking seat.

“Oh! Yeah, it was a really tight squeeze. But we figured you two could share a seat together!”

Both hitmen blushed beet red. Share a goddamn seat? With Izuku? Heat raced all the way up to Katsuki’s cheeks as the thought made him absolutely scandalized.

“You’re shitting me. Why the hell would you think that?”

“B-Because Hiroji is small enough to fit on your lap,” Mina explained. She glanced between them, unsure of why it would be a problem. “Unless you don’t want him on your lap, then maybe we can shift seats around. Sorry that we assumed—”

“—I-It’s alright!” Izuku quickly interrupted. “It’ll be fine! C’mon sweetie, let's get in the car.”

Katsuki’s eyes nearly popped out of his head.

He gritted his teeth so hard together to stop from erupting in anger that he was sure his dentist could feel it. Izuku shot him a look that said ‘let’s just do it’ because they were around people —but Katsuki was not prepared for this.

He swallowed and tried to dissociate when he took his seat in the back.

It was an extremely tight fit for an hour car ride. The bags on his right were pressed into his side, boxing him in. But despite this, he reminded himself: this was his last goddamn assignment. Maybe whatever deity up there had thrown in all these goddamn trials to make sure he got his stress gauge filled before departing.

He settled one arm on top of the duffle bag pile up as Izuku climbed into the back seat.

Green and red eyes met each other for a split second. The rush of burning embarrassment sparked between Izuku and Katsuki. Izuku turned around and awkwardly settled into his lap and Katsuki resisted cursing.

Izuku's ass was plusher than he assumed it would be. He thought at first it would be a balance, mostly muscle with maybe a tiny bit of soft cushion—but from what he could feel through their two layers of clothing, Izuku was mostly cushiony. Probably explains why his ass was always so damn soft and jiggly looking.

"Alright! To Yanbaru!" Eijiro said. He gave an enthusiastic fist pump. "Seat belts on everyone! Remember, safety first, it's going to be an hour ride!"

Izuku muttered an apology as he wiggled in his lap to get a better fit. When it seemed like Izuku was finally slotted against him, he buckled them in. Their lower halves were snuggly fitted together in a way that suggested many things to Katsuki. Izuku tensed up, clearly uncomfortable and Katsuki just knew there was someone in the sky above laughing at them.

The car started to pull off, and Jirou took the audio cord to start playing music for them all to enjoy. Soon the cramped space was filled with jokes, laughter, and songs as they began their journey.

The green-eyed man leaned against the window, eyes soaking up the vast landscapes that whizzed past. Katsuki turned his head too, deciding to watch the makeshift motion movie. As they drove further north, the rich city scape started to fade. Modern architecture and palm trees turned into more traditional buildings with various greenery.

Then once they hit the forest area, it was a viridian explosion. In the distance was an endless stretch of mountains covered in trees, and the foliage took root everywhere. Gravity pulled both men backwards a bit as they began the incline upwards. Katsuki was nearly breathless at the full view of the subtropical forest.

Keyword: nearly.

Frigid eeriness prevented appreciation from fully settling in. The premonition in his bones started aching deeply. He pulled out his cellphone and Izuku did the same.

Both hitmen glanced at each other wearily as the car went further up the mountain. While the view was stunning, Katsuki couldn't enjoy it. The feeling in his gut tightened when the service bars on his phone dropped one by one as they went further into the vast forest lands. He looked over at Izuku's phone and the same thing happened.

Then when the bars finally hit zero, he saw two words that were probably the worst thing in the world: No Service.

Katsuki cursed and he could sense Izuku grow unhappy as well.

The pull of a damper feeling hooked into his chest. He really fucking hoped Aizawa didn't call him until he could find a location with service. Possibly the top of some hill or mountain. He could already hear the angry voice his supervisor would use on him for dropping the fact there was a code 110 and then not answering the phone.

Within time, the smooth concrete started to shift into unsteady dirt paths.

The van hit a couple of bumps and rocks the further into the forest they went. Katsuki bit his lip when it created a level of friction. Of course. Of-fucking-course. He could feel the stimulating heat under his collar. It just had to be Izuku's ass. Izuku's naturally round, perky, plump—

—Fuck.

Stop that. This is fucking Deku. Green menace to society and little thorn in your side.

Katsuki clenched his jaw. He tried his best to ignore the fact he was getting hard. The pressure from Izuku's soft backside was directly on his cock and with every turn, the bumping made his hard-on grow thicker. He leaned his head against the headrest and closed his eyes. He reminded himself to breathe. This hell of a car ride would be over soon.

But suddenly Izuku grinded down on him.

Katsuki's eyes instantly shot open.

There was no fucking way. That had to be a mistake, right?

But then the car bumped around again, and Izuku squirmed in his lap. The little shit's wiggles sent ripples of a very familiar heat into Katsuki. He tightened his fists to stop from overreacting and making it more awkward for them. Maybe Izuku was shifting to get comfortable—which wasn't good for Katsuki but he could deal.

He pressed his lips tightly together when he felt his erection slot directly between Izuku's cheeks.

He felt all the blood rush down to the one fucking place he didn't need it to be. As the car ride got bumpier, Izuku wiggled more. Then he started flat out squirming downwards with every bounce in Katsuki's lap. Without warning, his brain provided very specific images of Izuku eagerly bouncing on his lap for an entirely different reason.

No. Katsuki pushed down the lewd vision and shook his head against the headrest. Nope. Absolutely not—we're not fucking doing this.

He shot a hand forward and yanked Izuku backwards by the collar of his stupid pink shirt. Izuku muffled a small yelp as his back was pressed against Katsuki's chest. The flustered blond pushed his lips right against the shell of Izuku's ear.

"The hell are you doing?" Katsuki harshly whispered. "Stop grinding down on my dick—what the fuck?"

Green eyes went wide and Izuku paled. "Th-That isn't your gun?"

"My gun? Of course it fucking isn't."

"B-But it's so—"

"—Hard? Yes. Now stop wiggling."

“Just relax,” Katsuki nearly growled. He moved his hands instinctively to Izuku’s hips to hold him steady when the damn man squirmed again. “The more you move, the more uncomfortable it’s going to get for both of us.”

He could hear Izuku nervously swallow. “O-Okay, I’ll try to sit still.”

Izuku nodded, and he curled his fists anxiously on his own lap. Katsuki expected Izuku to lean forward—but instead he stayed with his back pressed against his chest. From this angle, Katsuki could see that deep pink blush paint all the various freckles on Izuku’s nape. They hit a rather hard bump and he could hear Izuku restrain a whine.

Katsuki gripped Izuku’s hips firmer in a failed attempt to keep friction from forming. But with every bump, he found himself steadying Izuku in his lap. It was beginning to be worse than the freeform bumping, and a lot more suggestive. Against his better judgement, Katsuki wondered what was going on in that thick head of curls when he heard a light gasp. But he was given a very good idea when he glanced down at Izuku’s lap.

Izuku’s small hands were failing at covering up the tent in his shorts.

Scarlet eyes went wide and Katsuki’s brain nearly short circuited.

Another bump.

Another muffled whined.

Katsuki stared at Izuku’s lap hard enough to burn holes through his shorts. He watched the man press down on his erection in an attempt to be discreet. The fucking nerd was trying to hide how he was turned on too. Which, holy hell, was groundbreaking to Katsuki. The heat prickling at his skin nearly tripled at the realization that Izuku liked a cock poking into his ass.

Before he could process the sweltering shift in the air, the van came to a jerking halt.

“Alrighty! We’re here everyone!” Mina’s jovial voice rang out.

Everyone cheered except Izuku and Katsuki who were too busy dealing with their current problems. All the other people in the car started getting out and the trunk popped open. Izuku made a move to leave, but he was halted by the large hands holding his hips in place. Izuku’s breath hitched when rough fingers dug into his soft skin.

“U-Um. Can you let go of me?” Izuku whispered bashfully.

He turned his head to see Katsuki staring down at where they were pressed together. Gradually, burning scarlet eyes dragged up his body to meet his deep green eyes.

They maintained eye contact and Katsuki slowly let go of Izuku’s hips without a word. The blushing freckled man nodded, mumbled a small ‘thank you’ and stumbled out of the car with a quickness. He took his floppy hat off and placed it over his crotch area in an attempt to be modest.

Katsuki snapped out of his daze and placed his hand over his mouth in shock.

Fuck.

He could still feel the warmth from where Izuku had been plastered up against him. It had kicked up all those conflicting feelings he had about the other hitman once again. The same feeling that birthed in Vienna, took flight in the aerobics workout and soared high in the baking class. Now it was fully eclipsing the rational part of Katsuki's thoughts.

Suddenly, the fact that he had been nearly killed by Izuku on several occasions didn't seem like a big deal.

He stayed rooted in the car to rid himself of the very dirty thoughts playing inside of his head. They featured a certain hitman who had the softest ass in the world. He tried to will away his erection, but he was immensely unsuccessful.

"Hey, c'mon, Taro! We need your help with the bags," Momo called out for him.

"Coming," Katsuki grumpily answered.

The first thing Katsuki truly studied was the subtropical atmosphere.

The air smelled like crisp oxygen, greenery, and campfire. It was a breath of fresh air as trees stretched up to the sky, they were taller than anything he had seen in person. He could hear the tranquil sound of running water off in the distance as the harmonization of birds chirping echoed all over. The bright sun shyly peaked through the canopies to sprinkle down various sunspots onto the dirt ground.

The campsite itself was endearing and was composed of a large clearing. Several other campers were also here, set up in different private nooks. Each space in the campsite had room for a van, several tents, and a placement for the campfire in the center. The burnt smell of the flames from another group lingered into Katsuki's nose as they walked up to their designated space.

Maybe this won't be so bad, Katsuki thought to himself. He liked hiking.

They all began leisurely setting up their separate tents. It wasn't too bad of a task, but fucking Izuku could barely meet his eye. It was as if Izuku was a trained ballet dancer with the way he was expertly avoiding and skirting around him. The green-eyed man barely spoke as they pieced the pink tent together. Katsuki too was feeling oddly flustered. Izuku acted as though being around Katsuki for too long would be like tempting a snake to bite him.

By the time they finished settling in, all Katsuki could think about was the fact Izuku had been sitting in his lap. Turned on. For only Kami knows how long.

“Alright. Here’s everyone’s sleeping bags,” Shouto said. “There’s one for each pair of us it seems like.”

He gave each couple what looked to be one big ass sleeping bag. It was pastel pink—of fucking course—and large enough for two people with a snug fit. When Shouto shoved the horrid item into Katsuki’s hands, the realization sunk into both flustered hitmen.

They grew quiet in the already thick tension. Katsuki cursed everything under the sun as he walked over to his and Izuku’s tent and unceremoniously threw the damned thing inside. That was a problem for later he decided. When he walked back, everyone was standing around looking happy and eager to get going on their adventure.

“What should we do first?” Jirou asked happily.

Immediately a chorus of suggestions sprung up.

“Hiking!” Eijiro said. “We should get some steps in!”

“Oh, let’s try to get kayaks and go down the river!” Mina suggested. “I always wanted to try out forest kayaking.”

“Sleep,” Katsuki grumbled. He folded his arms and sneered. “You guys woke me up at the ass crack of dawn.”

“I think I saw a small lake on the way up,” Momo suggested. “We can go hiking and then stop for a dip. It’s super-hot out and that would be a fun way to unwind.”

Everyone looked at Momo and then slowly nodded and agreed with her.

Katsuki agreed too, being a fan of hiking. Maybe he could get himself in a different headspace while doing an activity he enjoyed. Preferably a headspace that was void of thinking about Izuku being turned on while lightly gasping in his hold.

Katsuki and Izuku glanced at each other for one second before Izuku blushed deeply.

Green eyes snapped away from him within the next moment, as if dreading something.

As they hiked with the group, originally it felt tense. Both he and Izuku checked their phones discreetly, seeing if they could get any service. But each time, they found nothing.

The reality of the words ‘No Service’ hit Katsuki upside the head like a wrecking ball. They truly were off the grid and had no choice but to go with the leisure motions. As their group continued on, they kept sharp from anything suspicious connected to Moore—but for the most part there was nothing.

Just beautiful greenery on top of more beautiful greenery.

They reached the top of one hiking trail that opened out to a gorgeous vantage point. From this angle, it looked like all the mountains beneath them were a sea of viridian. As though the endless inclines and dips were permanently rocky waves embedded into the earth.

He turned to his side to see Izuku looking just as astonished at the scene.

Katsuki couldn't help but think how seamlessly Izuku blended with everything here. His unruly curls, his large green eyes, and his freckled skin were almost camouflaged into the forest. Even the various hues of green around them were the same ones clustered in his eyes.

Their party ended up taking photos, having laughs, and growing slightly closer along their hike.

After a while, Katsuki put his phone away. He accepted defeat when they went up and down several trails as a group.

He thought he would be annoyed, but the truth was it was probably the most peaceful thing Katsuki has done in a while. He always liked hiking—or liked the idea of it. He did it a couple times when he was in high school before The Company started having him work full time.

He couldn't recall the last moment he took time out for himself. Like truly for just himself—not on call waiting to get dragged to go handle some bloody business.

But now, for the first real instance in nearly a decade, he stared up at the sky without thinking too hard about the time. His chest felt as fluttery as the birds above them, and his muscles were eased.

They kept on like this for an hour, following the hiking trails deeper. Their crew was mindful not to fall over any cliffs or sharp ledges on the unruly dirt paths. As they ventured further into the forest, the steeper the inclines and declines became.

It made Katsuki a smidge worried, but the entire time they were guided by the signs that read 'Hiking Path This Way' and avoided the red ones that said, 'Dead End.'

When they finally reached the last fork in the road, they found themselves at the small waterfall that opened into a lake.

It was nestled privately in a nook far away from the campsite. The foliage, vines and trees were dangling over it as if protecting the small haven from the outside world. Above there was a small cliff perched over the lake where the waterfall poured a light stream of water down below. The soundtrack of the wildlife chirped, buzzed, and harmonized in the background.

"Whoa, this place is magical!" Eijiro said happily. "Like a subtropical sanctuary!"

The redhead grinned and set down his hiking bag on the ground by the lake. Everyone else joyfully followed suit. Eijiro bent down and unzipped his bag to reveal sunblock, a colorful beach ball, floaties, and towels for all of them. He started blowing up the beach ball with deep breaths until he was red in the face.

“It is super nice,” Inasa commented merrily. “I see a path up to the cliff where the waterfall is. I always enjoyed cannonballing!”

Shouto laughed from beside him and eagerly agreed. “It has been so long since we let loose.”

Everyone casually stripped down and changed into swimsuits they apparently packed. Of course, the Ashido-Kirishimas had matching ones. They were bright red and pink with ‘Manliness’ stamped on their asses again. Then the agenda for their work out DVD was pushed on the group once more. Katsuki was a single hair away from just purchasing it so they could be quiet.

Katsuki stripped down to his boxers, having not brought a swimsuit. He hadn’t planned on getting in any water when he packed for this assignment, but to hell with it.

Everyone started running off towards the top of the cliff, but Izuku was still hesitantly fingering the hem of his shorts. He was turned away from him, as if waiting for something. Then, Izuku took a deep breath.

Katsuki’s brain went haywire when Izuku dropped his khakis.

“Panties?” Katsuki exclaimed automatically.

Izuku startled and turned around with wide eyes. He cupped his crotch protectively, clearly embarrassed beyond belief.

Sitting a little too pretty on Izuku was the frilliest, thinnest pair of pink panties Katsuki had ever seen. They were slightly sheer in the back, giving a full view of Izuku’s freckled ass and it had cute little pink bows adoring the sides.

“Don’t—Don’t you dare say a word,” Izuku hissed out. He was glaring deeply with a beet red face. “I didn’t get dressed thinking I was going to take my clothes off today.”

“So, you do this frequently?” Katsuki muttered in disbelief. “I think you’re far more invested in the clothing for this assignment than you’re leading on.”

Izuku blushed deeply. “Stop looking at me you pervert.”

“Pervert?” Katsuki exclaimed loudly, offended. “Quit calling me a goddamn pervert when you’re the one wearing women’s underwear—”

“—So?!” Izuku snapped, clearly sensitive about the subject. “I-I can wear what I want if I like it. Lace doesn’t have a gender.”

Katsuki worked his jaw, and his morbid curiosity took him to a place he never thought it would. His mind reflected back to all the times they had fought up-close.

Did Izuku wear this type of stuff on all his assignments?

“You got a lot of frilly shit like this, Deku?” Katsuki asked in a low voice, unable to stop himself. He reached out and snapped one of the thin straps on Izuku’s hips with a finger. “Does it make you feel pretty or somethin’?”

Izuku spluttered before storming off.

Katsuki took that as a yes, cute underwear did make Izuku feel pretty.

That fact alone did nothing to help the growing heat against the bottom of his belly. He imagined that since Izuku liked romantic novels, he would probably enjoy being treated like a pillow prince of sorts.

As they walked up the cliff, Izuku’s ass was directly in his face. Katsuki could fucking see everything. With each step Izuku took a small ripple from his thighs up to his ass occurred. It made Katsuki bite the inside of his cheek until he tasted iron.

By the time they caught up with the rest of the group, Katsuki was mentally thinking about dead birds to kill his boner.

“Hey, we were wondering where you two w—o-oh!” Inasa’s eyes bulged at the sight of Izuku. He turned his gaze away as if he was a man of respect. “H-Hiroji! Sorry about that! I didn’t realize you two didn’t bring swimsuits.”

“We forgot to pack them,” Katsuki lied easily. “It’s alright though we’ll just change when we get back to the campgrounds.”

Shouto’s, Jirou’s, and Momo’s eyebrows all shot up at Izuku’s frilly underwear. In full contrast, the Ashido-Kirishimas stared and nodded in approval.

“Very manly, Hiroji!” Eijiro said with a grin and a thumbs up. “I like it! I have a pair like that but in red.”

“You’re lucky, Taro,” Mina said with a wink. “Hiroji, those are super cute on you! I sometimes give Eijiro lingerie too. It definitely helps your partner always feel appreciated!”

Izuku laughed awkwardly, still cupping his crotch in embarrassment. Katsuki watched the way his legs pressed together and couldn’t help his eyes from landing on his blushing chest. Katsuki felt himself salivate a bit. Izuku had perfect nipples too.

“Okay! Cannonball time!” Eijiro announced. “Everyone, get in line!”

They all awkwardly shuffled with the lead of the Ashido-Kirishimas’. One by one everyone jumped in with yells and loud splashes.

Jirou did a normal jump holding the beach ball, and Momo gracefully swan dived like a practiced athlete. Eijiro and Mina did a rather impressive, synchronized backflip. Inasa did a cannonball and nearly splashed all the water out the lake while Shouto casually jumped in.

By the time it was their turn, they both stood there staring over the ledge. Or at least Izuku was.

Katsuki's eyes were too busy crawling up and down Izuku's body, drinking in the smooth tanned skin.

The blond hit man was taken back at how the other man had freckles everywhere. Freckles were delicately placed on his shoulders, thighs and on his fat ass.

Katsuki bit his lip and groaned.

He detested the way he was so obviously sexually attracted to Izuku. He always knew he was to some degree, a manageable degree, but now it felt like he was a helpless object being sucked into Izuku's ass's gravitational pull.

He had to snap himself out of it.

Considering fucking a stranger on an assignment was one thing but contemplating fucking the man Aizawa told him to kill was another. Maybe he could remind himself that Izuku was an annoying little shit and not a fuckable, flexible, squeezable—no. Ugh. Goddamnit, no. Yeah. He needed to shake himself out of it pronto.

Which is why he reverted straight back to being an asshole.

He walked up behind Izuku, placed his hands on both sides of his shoulders and smirked fiendishly down at him. Izuku glanced up, baffled at the sudden contact.

"Remember when you asked if I would push you overboard yesterday?" Katsuki asked with a glint in his eye.

Izuku went still and narrowed his eyes into dangerous slits. "You wouldn't dare."

"Oh. I would."

Izuku protested immediately and began thrashing. He tried to snatch himself out of the tight grasp, but Katsuki was the stronger one between the two.

The blond gleefully shoved Izuku over the edge of the cliff and Izuku screamed as he went tumbling down. Katsuki let out a sharp laugh watching Izuku fall but shrieked in surprise when a hand grabbed onto his ankle and dragged him down too.

They went ungracefully falling into the lake below together with a giant splash.

Katsuki's nostrils burned with the blunt feeling of water slamming into him. The invading liquid rushed into his nose, mouth, and ears. He choked ungracefully and had to forcefully close his eyes as he was dunked further under water by the heavy pull of gravity. He immediately began kicking to swim and gasped for air when he broke the surface.

Izuku came up shortly after and pressed the heel of his palms into his eyes. The freckled hitman groaned loudly and shook his head. Izuku glowered and immediately splashed water at him.

"Why did you push me?!"

Katsuki yelped and splashed water back, glare in full force.

“Why the hell did you drag me down?!”

Izuku puffed his cheeks out and splashed back again, angry. Katsuki returned the gesture, refusing to be the last to get splashed. Red and green eyes clashed in the moment, and they went on like this for a while. It wasn’t until it dawned on both men how ridiculous they were being, much less how ridiculous they looked, that they stopped. They stifled laughs, staring at the other’s soaking wet hair in the sunlight.

“—Ahem.”

Both hitmen froze and turned their gaze to their party. Everyone was wading in the water looking at them unsettled.

Shit. Katsuki forgot they were in front of people...yet again.

Momo wearily glanced between them before swimming forward. “A-Are you two good?” She asked.

“Oh yeah! We’re fine!” Izuku said quickly with a forced grin. “Ha. Just playful shenanigans.”

Izuku placed his arms around his shoulders lovingly with a faux smile. He leaned in fully to the large body as if they weren’t just having a water fight like two kids in a pool. Katsuki reluctantly followed suit and wrapped his arms around Izuku’s back and held him tightly. He reminded himself of affection, touches and actions.

He leaned down and gave Izuku a cliche kiss on the forehead, ignoring how wide green eyes went.

“This is just how we get along,” Katsuki reassured when Momo was giving him that ‘are you sure you’re not an abusive husband?’ stare. “We think it’s funny to mess with each other.”

“Hey, it’s chill man,” Eijiro said as he began floating. “Every couple expresses themselves differently!”

“Yeah! We do!” Izuku said with a fake smile as bright as the sun. “L-Let’s just have some fun! Diving was great!”

Everyone shrugged it off, seemingly accepting their dysfunction. It seemed like Eijiro, and Mina accepted that they were a disaster, and Shouto and Inasa squinted—but let it go. Out of everyone, Momo seemed to be the most concerned. However, when Jirou threw the beach ball to her, the black-haired therapist let it go.

They began bumping the beach ball in the air and everyone started relaxing fully.

They spent most of the day by the lake.

Everyone was having leisure fun. Jirou was playing music while Momo and Mina exchanged hair care routines. Inasa and Eijiro showed off some dives and Shouto relaxed on the side where all their clothes were. It was enjoyable and slowly they started melding together better as a group.

The diving incident brought him and Izuku back to their usual sardonic banter. Katsuki would sneer anytime Izuku commented on his wild spikes, and he would reply back something along the lines that Izuku had too many freckles. While they were still slightly blushing at each other, they were exchanging witty lines back and forth whenever something occurred.

By the time dusk filled the atmosphere, Katsuki found himself staring up at the sky of canopies and sun. He was free floating in the water with Izuku while everyone else was off to the side talking. He had floated out to the middle of the lake area by himself originally, but then Izuku swam up towards him under the excuse of 'spending time with his husband.'

Then Izuku started floating too so they basked there in the evening sun, wordlessly side by side. The pair quietly listened to the sounds of the forest. Katsuki turned to Izuku, seeing him look tranquil as well pulled at a heart string in his chest. He cleared his throat.

"Uh, sorry about pushing you off a cliff," Katsuki muttered. "Sometimes I get the urge to be a dick and I can't really stop it."

"It's okay," Izuku muttered back. "Sorry for dragging you off with me. You deserved it though."

"Yeah, I really fucking did."

They both lightly laughed as they basked in the setting sun.

Katsuki returned his gaze forward, to stare up at the orange sky that was hiding behind the thick covering of treetops. The visual struck him in a peculiar way as he listened to the sound of all the animals and insects in a symphony together. When a set of birds flew from one tree to another, Katsuki realized that he hadn't worried about anything for most of the day.

The underlying danger of Moore had faded to the back of his mind. He knew he had to find a way to call Aizawa—but when he looked at Izuku who had his eyes closed, floating peacefully in the water, he felt the need to tune out the rest of the world too.

Katsuki took a deep breath and closed his eyes, allowing himself to unwind and focus on the feeling of the gentle water hugging his skin.

"Do you hear that?" Izuku asked in a tiny whisper.

"Hear what?"

"The ryukyu robins. They're singing to each other."

Katsuki listened closer, focusing only on the birds. He heard some level of shuffling and ruffling but tuned it out to really hear what Izuku highlighted. Then when he narrowed in, he heard light chirps and the call of robins spinning all around them.

Katsuki smiled lightly to himself.

“Y’know. This is probably the most relaxed I’ve been in a while,” Katsuki admitted into the silence.

“Me too. It feels sad to admit this out loud, but this really is the closest thing to a vacation I’ve gotten.”

“It’s not sad,” Katsuki corrected. “It’s the same for me, I might fuck with you but don’t feel bad about enjoying this.”

“Thank you,” Izuku whispered. “I’m glad you understand.”

They floated there for a while, until Katsuki turned his head to gaze at the quiet man next to him. He was surprised to see forest green eyes staring back at him already, giving him a soft gaze. Katsuki was about to return the gesture, feeling oddly compelled to but stopped when his focus shifted past Izuku to the edge of the lake.

He frowned.

“Wait,” Katsuki said suddenly. He shifted his body from floating to swimming in place. “Where the hell did everyone go?”

Izuku frowned too. The green-eyed man turned his body in the water as well to gaze towards where they last left everyone. And just like Katsuki said, they were all gone. They both swam towards the edge of the lake in confusion only to find their hiking bags and a small note sitting there for them.

Think of this as free couples’ therapy!

—Signed, Everyone.

Katsuki flipped over the small note in his hand unhappily. He searched for more or an explanation but found nothing but a tiny little heart drawn in black ink.

“Did they really fucking leave us alone to bond?” He hissed in disbelief. “They can’t be serious…”

Well, he guessed it was no real question. He and Izuku were always making a scene to get this fake dating thing down. Everyone probably thought they had marital issues stacked higher than Mount Everest—but to go this far?

“K-Katsuki—where’s our clothes?” Izuku’s shaky voice whispered.

Everything in Katsuki’s mind came to a screeching halt. He frantically looked around for their pile of clothes because there was absolutely no fucking way those extras did that. But when he saw the very empty rock where they had left their garments—his heart sunk.

“I’m going to murder them,” Katsuki hissed, crumbling up the note in his fist. “I’m going to actually fucking murder them. Those goddamn imbeciles.”

He looked down at his soaking wet boxers and groaned. Then, with mild hesitation, he glanced out the corner of his eye towards Izuku. The blushing freckled man was bashfully cupping his goddamn crotch in horror.

“C’mon,” Katsuki said impatiently as he grabbed his hiking bag. “Let’s get back to the damn campsite.”

Izuku nodded furiously, face already painted pink. Katsuki strapped his bag to his bare back while Izuku put it over his front, loosening the straps to modestly cover himself. Katsuki muttered a prayer to himself to give him the strength not to blow a blood vessel.

Turns out, hiking barefoot in a subtropical forest even for two hitmen was a fucking task.

Every stick, twig, and rock that dug into his foot brought Katsuki closer to committing six counts of homicide. Sure, him and Izuku were fucking dysfunctional, and they casually threw each other a cliff and almost got into another fight but they didn’t. They got past it!

This was probably Momo’s idea, Katsuki bitterly thought to himself as they went up a particularly steep incline. She’s the therapist. She’s been up in our goddamn business since the aerobics class.

It was dark now, and in this type of dense forest, Katsuki was straining to see. The thick canopy above them was blocking out most of the white moonlight, only giving way to a couple of spots. Which didn’t help jack shit. They had hiked at least an hour or so away from the lake on foot. Every shrub and tree was beginning to look the same in the darkness and it was difficult to distinguish.

He stared up at the sky every now and then when he could smell the ting of incoming rain—that was not forecasted.

“We need to hurry,” Izuku said, slightly on edge. “It smells like a storm is coming soon—and I don’t think we can keep going on the dirt path when it’s wet like this. We’ll fall off.”

Katsuki grunted in response, agreeing.

As they continued, it felt like the signs were off. Like a shifting maze made of trees and foliage and it was fucking with his senses. He knew the people in their group probably thought of this as a harmless prank. They probably figured it would help spark something between him and Izuku while they were practically nude—but he was livid.

Katsuki looked behind him in the dark to Izuku who winced when he stepped on another rock. The freckled hitman yelped in pain and stumbled a bit. He slid his foot back on the unstable dirt but both red and green eyes went wide when Izuku completely lost his balance. He started falling backwards—right off the ledge of the incline.

Before he could think, Katsuki’s body moved on its own.

His arm shot out and grabbed Izuku by the straps on his hiking backpack, and he dug his heels into the ground to work against gravity. With all his strength he snapped Izuku back upwards and steadied him from falling off the ledge.

“A-Ah, thank you,” Izuku muttered when Katsuki hoisted him back upwards.

“Fucking watch your step,” Katsuki hissed. He let go of Izuku and began climbing again. “If you break your ankle being a klutz, I am not taking care of you.”

“I wouldn’t want you to take care of me anyways,” Izuku countered back with a mumble. “You probably have a skewed version of care.”

Katsuki shook his head as they continued onwards. But then he heard something rustle from on top of the incline and stopped. He held his arm out for Izuku to halt when the rustling became clearer.

Then a small bead of water hit Katsuki’s nose. He glanced up in dread when several more trickled down. Then it quickly became a pattern and a light sprinkle. The rustling happened again and then stopped. They both stilled, quiet in place as the rain began to come down.

After two beats of silence, Katsuki started moving again. He didn’t want to get caught in a storm on a steep incline and he knew Izuku had no desire to either.

They continued walking with no incidents until they came to a fork in the path. The sign that was there pointed to ‘Dead End’ in the path to the right and ‘Campsite’ to the one on the left. Katsuki probed his tongue against his cheek when something felt off about it.

They veered left and slowly the path started progressively turning into something much rougher and unkept. After about a minute in, it was clear as day to Katsuki that this was the path least taken—not back to the campsite.

More rustling and they both froze in the pitch blackness.

Chilling goosebumps raked up and down Katsuki’s skin.

“We should turn around,” Izuku whispered seriously. His voice hardened with a sharp edge. “I think someone is switching the signs—”

It happened in a split second.

Katsuki barely caught the visual of a large man that sprung out from the darkness in front of him. The man was wearing all black, a ski-mask and wielding a deadly dagger in one hand and a gun with a silencer attached in the other.

Instantly, the man used his knife and went straight for Katsuki’s jugular.

Pushing through the sharp pain on his feet from the unsteady ground, Katsuki promptly maneuvered backwards. The tip of the deadly blade missed, grazing him by a hair.

With quick-thinking instincts, Katsuki swiftly slung his hiking bag to block the next deadly blow that went for his throat. The sharp weapon pierced through his backpack and without hesitation, Katsuki spun his bag to disarm the man of his knife. He grunted loudly as he turned to land a powerful kick in the man's gut, causing him to double over.

The man hissed and drew his gun up, aiming square for Katsuki's head. However, before he could pull the trigger, Izuku worked rapidly like deadly lightning. He dropped his bag and grabbed the gun in the man's other hand. With precision he twisted the attacker's wrist until he screamed out in pain and dropped the weapon.

The attacker tried to quickly grab for Izuku, but the freckled hitman kicked his legs up from underneath him and dropped him in a second.

Katsuki dropped his bag that still had the knife lodged inside it. He took the opportunity to quickly wrap his arm around the man's neck from behind as he struggled back upwards.

The man tried to fight him off, but he was stronger. Katsuki used his body weight to gain control and squeezed his arm tightly around the thin throat until the man began taking desperate gulps for oxygen. Gasps filled the night air as the man squirmed and groaned. Katsuki gritted his teeth as he carefully tightened his hold on the attacker. They both dropped to their knees and Katsuki then pinned him on the ground underneath his overpowering weight.

The rain fell heavier, and the air shifted.

The dark suddenly felt more rigid and ominous as both he and Izuku glanced around into the pitch blackness, waiting for more assailants. Izuku drew his fang shaped dagger from his bag and searched around the area from which the man came. Green eyes were no longer sweet, but deadly and alert. The freckled hitman took an offensive stance, ready to strike at the nearest level of movement.

They waited in silence, the pitter patter of pouring rain operating like an unnerving metronome.

The pulsing of adrenaline in Katsuki's veins shifted him out of his once leisure-like mindset into cold, calculating solemnity. He watched Izuku peer into bushes, check behind all the trees and walk down the rest of the pathway. The green-eyed hitman left to scout the rest of the trail as they stayed tethered to vigilance.

But when Izuku returned, he shook his head and lowered his weapon.

"There's no one else," Izuku whispered into the rain. "He came alone."

Katsuki then turned his attention to the man in his grasp who went still.

Scarlet eyes laid sights on the attacker in the ski mask, and then shifted to the sharp knife that was still lodged into his backpack. Immediately, his deadly training kicked in. That not so kind, darker part of his spirit gripped him by his spine, taking over. Katsuki forced all empathy to drain from his body as the attacker tried to struggle against him. Katsuki violently shook the man in his grasp as a warning.

“Do you work for Moore?” Katsuki hissed menacingly.

The man didn’t answer and only glared up at them, as if he took a blood oath to stay quiet.

Izuku then stepped forward and placed down his hiking bag. He knelt with them to eye level of the man before swiping off his ski-mask.

Both Izuku and Katsuki were only partially surprised to recognize the man as the bartender from the lounge. Izuku pursed his lips and Katsuki felt it in his gut too: this confirmed their unspoken suspicions.

The freckled hitman searched the attacker’s deep pockets until he pulled out two items. The first was a syringe filled with a clear substance and the other was a picture of Katsuki and Izuku on the White Dove. It was a photograph of them smiling at each other, dancing hand in hand wearing their leis.

He flipped the small photograph, and on the back, it read: Lean male/green eyes. Don’t use excessive force or bruise skin. Capture in woods. Spouse is an aggressive brute. Separate from spouse or kill if unable to separate.

“Ah, he was my designated kidnapper,” Izuku said curiously.

Katsuki watched how Izuku uncapped the syringe and pushed the bottom slightly until a small droplet formed at the end of the needle. He used his index finger to swipe it and put it at the tip of his tongue. Izuku made a serious face before cutting his eye at the man.

“And this is ketamine.” Izuku sighed before standing up straight. “I guess they were going for the lovers lost in the woods angle.”

“What do we do with him?” Katsuki said seriously. The man’s brown eyes glanced between him and Izuku as he stayed pinned on the ground. “If I get a call from my supervisor, and he tells me to stay, I can’t leave until we finish off Moore.”

“Me either,” Izuku said in a pensive tone. He tilted his head at the failed kidnapper. “If you can, knock him out but don’t crush his windpipe. We don’t want it to look like he was strangled. It has to seem like we never encountered him.”

Katsuki took the hint at what that meant.

The man started screaming but couldn’t get a word past his throat as he began clawing at Katsuki’s bicep in the pouring rain. Katsuki closed his eyes as he pushed down all his emotions in the same manner he always did for this part of the job. The fingernails dug into his skin, burning, and leaving multiple scratch marks. Blood was drawn, leaving behind traces of desperation as Katsuki’s heart went numb.

The man in his grasp struggled helplessly until he fell limp.

Katsuki then unlocked him from the sleeper hold and checked his pulse. Still beating. Katsuki cut his eyes up to Izuku who was glancing down, green eyes sharp and calculating.

“Moore is going to wonder why his lackey was unsuccessful,” Izuku said slowly. The rain from up above started pouring harder onto them. “What would be an inconspicuous set up?”

“Him slipping and falling off the side of a cliff in a rainstorm is a plausible scenario,” Katsuki said as he let out a deep exhale. He pointed to the back of the man’s neck with two fingers. “We could quarter break his cervical spine. It’ll look like he slipped, fell and hit his head bluntly.”

Izuku nodded distantly. “Yeah. That works.”

The green-eyed man carefully cleaned his prints from the photograph and syringe with the rain droplets before sliding them back into the man’s pockets. Katsuki walked over to the knife and gun and did the same, rearming the man as if he never drew his weapons. He carefully cleaned under the man’s nails until they were spotless.

After they finished making sure they were invisible, Katsuki carefully positioned himself over the limp body and squatted. He grabbed the man’s head in his hands with careful technique but didn’t move right away.

Him and Izuku exchanged stares, acknowledging the moment.

Katsuki snapped the man’s neck precisely.

The rain felt different now as they trudged on. Before, it felt foreboding. Like a thin veil that hid away the lurking danger in the forest. Now it felt heavy like the rain at a funeral, as though the sky was the only being weeping for the loss of life.

Neither he nor Izuku spoke in the silent rhythm of the pouring rain. In an odd way, he was familiar with this side of the other hitman. The quiet, calculating side that was in deep thought. Usually, he was on the other side of Izuku’s lethality, so it didn't feel wrong, but it didn’t feel all the way right either.

Deep down, Katsuki understood it was part of their jobs to tie up loose ends.

But there was something about it that left a residue feeling over his palms every time he had a higher kill count than intended for an assignment. It was beginning to accumulate now, stacking high on the pads of his fingers.

They staged the scene to look as though the man simply stumbled and fell over the incline in the pouring rain. Which was plausible considering he and Izuku were struggling not to do that now. Without their boots, the dirt floor of the forest was impossible to climb, and the rain made visibility low.

It wasn’t until they found a small nook embedded into the side of a cliff that they decided to give up.

Katsuki sighed in relief and leaned against the wall of the tiny cave. It was barely a cave, more of a slight indentation but it worked for two people. He felt icky. His body was drenched, hair wet and flat against his forehead.

His backpack was heavy with water weight as he threw it to the ground resentfully. He looked at Izuku who tiredly dropped his backpack too, not caring anymore about his modesty in the skimpy underwear. Katsuki took off his boxers without shame and Izuku averted his eyes. The blond sighed as he wrung out the rainwater in the boxers before sliding them back on.

“I don’t think the storm is going to stop soon,” Izuku pointed out. He looked out past the thin veil of pouring water dripping in front of the mouth of the concave. “I’m sure the group meant it in humor since it wasn’t forecasted to rain—but this isn’t all that fun.”

“Yeah, they’re fucking idiots.” Katsuki grunted. “I guess we’ll camp here until it breaks.”

Izuku nodded in agreement as he sat down on the ground. He curled his legs into his chest with a far-off look into the rain. Katsuki sat across from him, legs stretched out and long enough to hit the other side of the small concave. They both looked up at the dark atmosphere and noticed the lack of beautiful birds singing.

Katsuki took a moment to assess Izuku. The freckled hitman looked downright exhausted—and nearly as though something else was bothering him. Katsuki watched how Izuku brought a hand up to his clavicle and dragged it over the bare skin where the number ‘217’ was tattooed. The band aid covering it was lost to the heavy rain.

“Are you feeling okay?” Katsuki asked, eyeing him carefully. “You tasted that ketamine earlier. You’re not woozy, are you?”

“Oh, I have a tolerance against it,” Izuku explained distantly. “Don’t worry about me.”

Katsuki raised his eyebrows but decided it made fucking sense. “Moore is going to try to kidnap you again I’m sure,” he decided to change the subject to what they should focus on. “How should we navigate that?”

“We could use it to our advantage.” Izuku grew quiet as he thought deeply about their next move. “It would be easy to get him alone since he has his sights set on me. We can confirm he thinks we’re normal citizens too, since he only sent one heavy bodied assailant as though it would be enough. Let’s possibly take him up on that drink offer. With the two of us, we’ll overpower him and his assistant with no issue.”

“True.” Katsuki clicked his tongue. “Poor bastard chose the wrong vacation goers.”

There was a moment of silence.

“Do you...Do you feel anything when you do it?” Izuku asked, barely above a whisper.

Luminescent green eyes gazed at him in the dark.

Any other time, Katsuki would've deflected the question and acted as though he was the stone-cold killer he used to be in his early days. But this time he didn't. There was a tender look of vulnerability in Izuku's endless green eyes that lowered his defenses.

"Most days I don't," Katsuki answered honestly. He shifted slightly. "But more recently—yeah. I do."

"I feel a little bit too," Izuku admitted, making Katsuki feel a bit more human. "I try my best not to, like I was trained. But it's something about when the moment comes to finish—the inkling of the subconscious I try to drown speaks out."

"A mark is a mark," Katsuki said quietly. "Subconscious or not, we have a job to do. Loose ends aren't good. Especially ones that are trying to traffic you."

Izuku let out a dry laugh, it was slightly sarcastic. "Yeah, I guess not."

Katsuki looked curiously at the man in front of him. A question that's been forming since he started to get to know Izuku tumbled out of his mouth.

"Why do you do this job?" Katsuki asked.

He considered all the things about Izuku. He was shy. Timid for the most part. Coupled with that, he was a hopeless romantic who binged on books and films. Izuku was bizarrely patient and alright with teaching him how to pretend to be in love. It didn't add up to him.

"I do it to survive," Izuku said distantly. His green eyes looked away, shielding his emotions. "And you?"

"Money," Katsuki said with a shrug. "I guess that's the same thing. Survival."

He took the hint from Izuku's tone of voice that said to back off. But unfortunately, that only watered the budding seed of curiosity he had growing inside of him.

He watched how Izuku dug into his bag and checked his phone once more, no signal once again showing. The green-eyed man carefully placed his fang shaped knife on the ground next to them. Katsuki did the same—in case there truly was more than one kidnapper out there looking for them.

Katsuki leaned his head back and leisurely listened to the sound of the pouring rain.

Hours passed by in casual conversation with Izuku, and Katsuki found himself realizing they shared more ground than he thought.

They had the same favorite classical music selections. He learned Izuku's favorite food was katsudon. Izuku liked the fact he enjoyed spicy meals. Katsuki talked about his distant wish to live in the countryside and Izuku shared about his violin lessons. Which, in a strange way, captivated Katsuki. He always wanted to take music lessons but never had the leeway.

When sleep finally invaded their bodies, Katsuki tried his best to get comfortable in the tight, damp space.

He leaned his head against his hiking backpack and tried to close his eyes. Izuku did the same on the opposite side of the cave. But due to the proximity, Katsuki felt the small tremors and shivers that raked through Izuku's body.

Katsuki peeked one eye open and could see Izuku huddled in on himself for warmth but was greatly failing. His small body was shivering with the gusts of the incoming winds. Crimson eyes flickered down to the thin piece of clothing barely covering Izuku's private parts and the way his hands were still cupping his crotch.

He felt sorry for him to an extent.

"Are you cold?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku shook his head and blushed. "No."

"But you're shivering."

"It's alright. I run cold."

Katsuki sucked at his teeth as he thought about it. He felt slightly compelled by an unknown force as his thoughts tousled around. He debated heavily. Close contact with Deku—it was something he was fully against, or at least he thought was. His mind wandered back to the car ride over here and suddenly he didn't feel so against it anymore.

Never in a million years would he have thought about this a week ago. Never. But he shifted himself to his side, opening a clearing that was perfectly Izuku-sized. He gestured with his hand 'come here'.

"Lucky for you, I run hot."

Izuku's eyes went wide, and he looked at Katsuki as though he had gone mad.

"Y'know, it won't be weird in this situation," Katsuki tried to reason. More so for himself than Izuku. "It's chilly, wet and we're in a dark forest. If you want, we can—"

"—I-It's okay!" Izuku stuttered. His face burned. "I-I'll be fine."

"C'mon. Get your stubborn ass over here." Katsuki impatiently waved his hand. "I told you already I'm not taking care of you. That includes if you catch a cold."

Katsuki liked the way Izuku grew a bit timid. It fed into a very specific side of him that devoured the pink blush racing down that freckled neck. All those loud, conflicting emotions inside of him wrestled again when Izuku finally conceded. The green-eyed hitman nodded his head bashfully, still not meeting his gaze.

He removed his hand from his crotch and Katsuki felt his nostrils flare and his stomach knot with heat.

Izuku's panties had a pouch fitted for his cock and other equipment. So they technically weren't women's underwear. Red eyes blinked twice at the sight and the tiny pink bow on top of the pouch. Izuku crawled towards him and then froze.

Viridian eyes regarded him, unsure. The heat from the proximity was nearly palatable. Katsuki swallowed as he forced his eyes away from Izuku's crotch.

"Which way should I, uh, face?" Izuku muttered.

"Turn around," Katsuki said simply.

He didn't want to say too much else, unable to trust his voice as all the heat started to gradually rise.

Izuku nodded quickly, averting his eyes. He turned around and Katsuki held his breath for a moment as he pushed against him.

The blond swallowed when his mouth started to salivate at the newfound body heat. Izuku was even softer without clothes, and the skin-on-skin contact lit his nerve endings with torridness. He tried to tell himself it was a natural body reaction as Izuku snuggled back against him, fitting perfectly as a little spoon.

Katsuki hesitantly positioned his arms and wrapped tight. He placed his head next to Izuku's on his slightly damp hiking bag. Gradually, the shaking from the smaller body within his arms slowly stopped. After a few minutes he heard Izuku give a small breath of relief. From his angle, he could see Izuku close his eyes.

"Better?" Katsuki asked in a low voice.

Izuku nodded and pushed back against him slightly. "Better. Thank you."

The motion sent a low roll of heat waves through Katsuki. He knew Izuku was only attempting to get closer for body warmth, but it was in its own way intimate. Katsuki shifted and drew Izuku in closer, pressing against him tightly. Their ankles knocked together until their legs intertwined and the closeness sparked a warmth in the air that was thicker than the car ride up.

Katsuki pondered their proximity.

Never in this lifetime would he have thought about Deku in this way, but his conflicting thoughts were beginning to shift balance towards the darker side of his thoughts. Egged on by his curiosity melting with heat, he shifted slightly to peer over at the frilly underwear in a different light. The warmth at the bottom of his core spiked in temperature.

"By the way, I think your panties are cute," he rasped in Izuku's ear.

Izuku's eyes snapped open, and the other man started to squirm against him again.

"S-Shut up. Y-You said you wouldn't make it weird—"

"—I mean it honestly," Katsuki said, tightening his hold to stop Izuku from squirming away. "They're pretty on you."

Izuku went still and he turned his head. In the motion, their noses brushed and suddenly they were both aware of just how close they were. Katsuki could feel the other man's breath on his lips as they stared at each other in silence for a while.

"You probably like it, don't you?" Katsuki whispered in a gruff voice, fully curious to what makes Izuku tick. He lifted his head to look down at where Izuku was squirming ever so slightly. His plush thighs were pressing together, and his ankles were locking around Katsuki's. "Feelin' all delicate like that in contrast to what we got to do all the time. Makes you feel soft."

There was a heavy silence.

Unspoken tension swelled between them as all of Katsuki's rational thoughts were slowly drowning in a sea of green. Viridian eyes flickered down to Katsuki's lips while scarlet eyes greedily drank in the sight of Izuku's body.

There was a shift as they stared at each other.

"G-Goodnight, Katsuki," Izuku whispered.

He broke the moment and faced forward again.

Katsuki observed how Izuku closed his eyes and forced them to stay closed. The erratic heart inside of Izuku's chest cavity was so clear and the nervousness in the air was tangible. But above all, Katsuki felt his erratic heart too. He closed his eyes as well and nuzzled into the soft neck.

"Goodnight, Izuku."

"Guys! I found them! They're over here!"

Mina's shrill voice was like a blasting alarm. Katsuki groaned as he blinked his eyes open unwillingly. The sound of what felt like a stampede of footsteps rushed towards them. It was a blur of colors that screamed the rainbow to Katsuki. Pink. Red. Red and white and purple.

He grumbled. Unimpressed scarlet eyes stared up at their paradise crew who were staring down at them like they found the treasure to Atlantis. Katsuki shifted on his forearms and lifted. There was a heavy weight around his shoulders that made him peer down.

There, he found Izuku's arms lazily wrapped around his neck. The smaller man was snuggly tucked underneath him, fitting perfectly as if Katsuki was a warm blanket. Their legs were tangled and Izuku's hands were woven into his hair.

"Oh, my goodness, we're so, so sorry!" Mina rushed and apologized. She quickly took out blankets and heating pads. "W-We didn't know it was going to rain and we tried to go back for you, but the signs were all weird last night! The winds must've blown them all wrong!"

“Are you guys alright?” Shouto asked wearily. “We thought you two being naked in the woods might be something you’d be into, but we didn’t anticipate that storm.”

“We’re fine. No thanks to you dipshits,” Katsuki griped. “Thanks for fucking leaving us stranded.”

Izuku, still heavy with sleep and groggy, groaned. His eyes remained shut as he tightened his hold on Katsuki’s neck and massaged his hands through blond spikes. Katsuki raised a brow as Izuku softly yawned and lifted his hips until their pelvises intimately pressed together.

Then, mid-yawn, Izuku’s eyes gradually blinked open.

They made eye contact for a moment and Izuku immediately froze, sobering quickly. Rose colored blushed ran down Izuku’s freckled throat, and Katsuki found that he enjoyed it. Izuku quickly retreated his arms, lowered his hips, and cleared his throat.

“Ah. G-Good morning, everyone,” Izuku said sheepishly with a smile. He scratched behind his head. “Nice to see you’re all safe from the storm.”

“We’re so sorry again, we’ll have to make it up to you,” Momo said with a sincere apology.

“Let's just get back to that stupid campsite,” Katsuki muttered. “I’m starving.”

He stood up and stretched. He graciously took one of the blankets from Momo, happy to have some layers of clothes. But as he was about to wrap the blanket around him, Jirou made a sharp gasp.

“Oh my. I see you two were up to no good last night,” Jirou said with a hint of surprise.

Both Izuku and Katsuki froze, looking at her both slightly nervous and confused.

“Wh-What?” Izuku probed, looking at her with cautious eyes. “Why would you think that?”

Jirou smiled and pointed to the scratch marks on Katsuki’s arm with a knowing glint in her eye. “It seems like the impromptu couples’ therapy worked a little bit.”

Both of them looked at the bloodied nail marks on Katsuki’s bicep. It appeared as though an animal—or human had run their nails down his arm in either the heat of passion or the coldness of death.

Katsuki and Izuku dryly laughed as they all started to head back to the campsite.

They got back to the campsite with ease. Katsuki noted how some of the signs had been switched to the opposite of what they were last night, meaning this forest was a death and kidnapping trap for Moore. He wondered what other shit was lurking in its depths at night. There were probably even booty traps ready to snatch the nearest unsuspecting pair of lovers.

Upon arrival, Katsuki immediately scarfed down all the food he could see in sight. His hunger was threatening to chew through his stomach. He'd never been more thankful for graham crackers in his life. Izuku bolted straight for the tent, immediately getting dressed in a pair of pink shorts and a white t-shirt. Katsuki got dressed in his usual black gear.

When they fully reset, the group seemed excited to go about their day.

"Alrighty! Camping day round two!" Eijiro shouted enthusiastically. "Who's ready for another awesome day!"

"I am. If you guys don't leave us stranded again," Katsuki mumbled.

This time, Izuku didn't correct his rude comment.

It made him smirk thinking about how the usually polite man agreed with him.

But when he looked down at his faux husband, Izuku glanced up and met his eyes. There was an underlying shyness behind them now. Izuku pushed his hands in his shorts pockets and followed the group to their next destination.

They found themselves deciding on kayaking in the large river with everyone.

They went to the more citizen-friendly part of the forest and rented out several tandem kayaks. It was relaxing, peaceful, and allowed them all to get a spacious view of the forest.

On the way here, Izuku slyly mentioned wanting to stick together and possibly not going that deep into the forest. Mainly because they didn't want to have to have too many bodies stacked and trip Moore's suspicions. One clumsy failed kidnapper was an easy spin, but two would without a doubt make any professional human trafficker raise an eyebrow.

Everyone eagerly agreed, still feeling some guilt for leaving them butt ass naked in the wilderness. They all felt remorseful, but in a strange way it worked out for him and Izuku. Everyone in their Paradise Crew believed they had rough sex in that cave last night. Which cleared up any doubts of them being a couple for Inasa and Shouto. The two cops made a joke about how they must've had a thing for doing it in the woods.

So, they were officially a dysfunctional couple with a public sex kink.

Not exactly what Katsuki had in mind for their cover image, but he'd take it.

They still had no cell signal, but once again Katsuki found himself uncaring. He kept his eyes peeled for any more wanna-be-kidnappers but with the overt buddy system Izuku enforced, there was no issue.

They rowed out into the open river in the bright sun, admiring the passing visuals.

Large trees towered over them, like watchful guardians. The reflections of the forest in the clear water made the river appear as if there was an upside-down forest they were paddling over. Every now and then there were hints of white, purple, and pink delicate flowers blooming up from the earth. They were still heavy with last night's rain, slightly bowed as if greeting them as they rowed past.

What Katsuki liked most was the melody of the birds above them.

The tune relaxed him back into that leisure state of mind. He was rowing in the back while Izuku was facing him, rowing in the front. Viridian doe eyes were starstruck in awe at the captivating landscape encapsulating them. In Katsuki's humble opinion, Izuku's eyes somehow absorbed the hues around them to become an even deeper shade of green.

However, despite the relaxed setting, Izuku seemed more quiet than usual.

Maybe it was the combination of the fact that his little pantie-wearing secret was exposed, or possibly the bare back cuddling. Or maybe it was a combination of a lot of unspoken things.

Whichever the reason, Katsuki wasn't quite sure he liked the silence.

So, he cleared his throat and probed at the one subject he knew Izuku would be gun-ho to discuss.

"What's the next lesson on how to pretend to be in love, nerd?" Katsuki said as they paddled a healthy amount of space behind the group, out of earshot. "We still gotta make it through the next five days."

"O-Oh, right." Izuku looked at him with a gentle smile. They slowed down on rowing a bit and settled into the calmness. "I was, uh, thinking we could work on faking compliments. Lovers tend to say things they like about each other. Like their hair or their smile. Or in general what they find nice about the other person."

"Basically, stating out loud why they fell in love with them?"

"Yeah!" Izuku exclaimed, happy that Katsuki seemed to be catching on. "You could think of it like that. Why don't you give it a shot? Attempt to compliment me."

"I liked your little panties yesterday," Katsuki teased with an arrogant smirk. He flexed an eyebrow at Izuku while looking down at his shorts. "Got another pair of those on?"

"N-Not like that." Izuku blushed deeply, glared at him, and closed his legs. "Something non-suggestive that you can say in front of other people. Like an example would be, someone mentions that your joke was hilarious. I then would laugh, agree and say you're always funny and make me laugh all the time."

Katsuki's smirk widened. "You think I'm funny?"

"Focus."

"Alright, alright," the blond huffed unhappily. He looked up at the trees, trying to figure out something about Izuku he liked. He stared around at the forest, and it felt like a small piece of his distant memory compelled him. Green. He liked green. “I like your eyes. They look like this forest and my favorite color.”

“O-Okay, maybe something not a physical attribute,” Izuku muttered with a blush and gently rowed. “Try something about my personality.”

“C’mon…”

“Alright, fine.” Katsuki grumbled and slouched a bit with a frown. “It’s going to be hard complimenting the man who shot me when we first met.”

He thought hard about it as he steadily rowed down the river. He tried to see past Izuku’s little shit of an aura. What did he like about Izuku that wasn’t his looks? He liked that he threw a blade well. Fucker had perfect aim with a dagger. He also had good common sense on how to stage a homicide without raising alarms. But those were all things he probably shouldn’t mention.

“I like that you’re patient,” Katsuki eventually came to. It was a bit vulnerable, but he was finding he was like that more and more with Izuku. It was easy to be honest with him for an unknown reason. “Not too many people are patient with me, and I uh, appreciate it.”

“There we go. I almost believed that. Good job!” Izuku smiled happily at him as if he was a kid who got his lines right for a play. “Now just remember to say that around people.”

Katsuki blinked, not expecting Izuku to think it was fake. He had forgotten for a moment that what he said didn’t have to be true. For an odd reason, Izuku not knowing he meant it earnestly caused disharmony in his chest.

“Right. Yeah.” Katsuki nodded emptily as they continued down their leisure path. “I’ll make sure to pretend to compliment you in front of everyone.”

Nightfall came with no incidents. Katsuki was both happy to be leaving this forest of doom, but reluctant that he had to go back to the hotel. It was odd, getting a vacation within a vacation where he was detached from everything—having fun.

And it was even more odd that he was having fun with Izuku.

Throughout the day he remembered to hold his hand, casually kiss his forehead, and compliment him on something. At first, he told himself he should just make shit up to prevent that nails on the chalkboard feeling inside of him. However, faking the goddamn compliments caused even more dissonance. So Katsuki settled for real shit he found that he liked about Izuku.

“Yeah, that’s my Darling. He’s really quick on his toes,” he said when they went hiking again.

“Hiroji is smart,” he said when Izuku successfully identified a poisonous plant and prevented Jirou from walking into it. “Biggest nerd I know.”

“He’s always had a kind personality,” Katsuki said when Shouto asked more about them.

It was both surprising and natural how easy it flowed. It shocked Katsuki a bit, and it seemed to have shocked Izuku too. But the man easily swayed in his role without much complication. But there was a scratch at the back of Katsuki’s head that made him wonder. If what he was saying was true—was what Izuku said true too?

“Taro has always been steadier between us!” Izuku happily mentioned to Momo when she complimented their tandem kayaking.

“Ah, he might be a little rough on the outside, but he’s super sweet and protective deep down,” Izuku endorsed when Katsuki checked his knee for scrapes when he accidentally fell.

“Taro makes me laugh all the time,” Izuku said with a grin as they started back to camp for the night. “It's part of the reason I fell for him. I enjoy his company a lot.”

Katsuki didn’t know why he cared about what was real or fake—but he did.

He tried his best to snap out of it by the time they sat down around the campfire. The orange light against the navy background was soothing. In this type of darkness, the stars above them were twinkling and clear as day. He could count the constellations as clearly as Izuku’s freckles. They were huddled around in a circle in their outdoor chairs, peacefully listening to the background music of the wildlife.

The fire was illuminating everyone’s faces as they laughed.

Currently, they were attempting to correctly place the wieners and marshmallows on their individual sticks. Izuku was hunched forward, the orange flame flickered and dancing in his glossy eyes. His stick had several marshmallows on it, and he was holding it directly over the flames. There was a tiny, over-excited glint in his eyes.

Katsuki sucked in his lips to stop from laughing when—just like he suspected—the marshmallows on Izuku’s stick melted and fell into the flames. Izuku gasped like he was surprised before attempting to save the last one. Then, when he did finish, the lone marshmallow was burned nearly fucking black.

The dork was visibly frustrated. Katsuki sighed in defeat when Izuku put more marshmallows on his stick. Then repeated the same thing.

Katsuki decided to have mercy on the poor man.

“You’re going to burn it like that, De—Darling,” Katsuki finally commented. “Here. If you want it gooier on the inside, you’re supposed to hold it down to the embers. Not on top of the flames.”

Green eyes looked towards him, shimmering with all the light of the stars and the fire.

Katsuki easily scooched over, and placed Izuku’s hand in his. With care, he guided Izuku’s hand downwards to place the marshmallow above the greyer ashen part of the wood. The tiny embers floated up into the air and Izuku’s smile widened.

Katsuki waited until the marshmallow seemed like the perfect temperature. He then carefully took it from Izuku and with precise technique, made the perfect smore. He turned to give it to Izuku who was staring at him like he was superman or something.

“Thank you,” the freckled man said happily. “Ah, this is so exciting.”

Katsuki wondered if this was Izuku’s first smore.

He watched how Izuku carefully held it in his hands and took a small bite, humming happily as the sweet treat melted against his tongue. There was a hint of leftover white marshmallow on the corners of his lips when he finished.

Out of instincts, or out of trying to make sure they still looked like a sappy couple, Katsuki reached forward. He swiped the bits of food off Izuku’s lip carefully.

“You always make such a fucking mess,” Katsuki mumbled as he cleaned him up.

Izuku blushed deeply and mumbled ‘thank you’. His eyes skirted off with that same shy gaze in them.

“Hey, I just want to say sorry about leaving you guys in the woods,” Momo said suddenly, breaking the moment. “It was my idea and I’m still feeling guilty about it.”

“Don’t worry!” Izuku gave a charming chuckle. “It was, uh, good bonding time for us like you said.” He then reached for Katsuki’s hand and squeezed it lightly.

“You know, I’m a couples’ therapist,” Momo said softly. She leaned forward and Katsuki decided he didn’t like where this was going one damn bit. “I had originally thought it was a good idea because you guys argue a lot. I want to make up for the woods incident with an actual free session.”

If there was one thing Katsuki hated, it was fucking shrinks.

In his humble opinion, he didn’t need someone poking around in his head and bringing forward all the things he didn’t need to think about. He was a perfectly fine and well-oiled killing machine without all that emotional shit.

“Arguing is our love language,” Katsuki replied with a sarcastic smile. He unhappily leaned back in his chair and shot Momo a challenging glare. “I’m sure a lot of you guys argue with your partner too.”

“Ah, Mina and I don’t argue,” Eijiro chuckled. He proudly pointed to his chest with his thumb with a grin. “She tells me to shut up and I do!”

Mina smiled at Eijiro and patted him on the head lovingly.

“Why do you think you two argue so much, Taro and Hiroji?”

“Consider it foreplay,” Katsuki defensively snapped. “I like getting my husband flustered.”

Izuku frowned at him, and he could tell the freckled man resisted elbowing him in the side. “W-We’re just working through things, that’s all. We decided to take this vacation because as you see we argue but this has been good for us. I’m sorry, we don’t mean to cause anyone any worries or ruin your vacations.”

“Well, why don’t you tell me something unique about yourselves? As individuals.” Momo smiled at them. “We all can share something!”

“Unique?” Izuku questioned, tilting his head.

“Mhm! It can be anything,” Momo said happily. The smile on her face was welcoming, but the feeling inside of Katsuki’s chest was not. “Something about you that not a lot of people know, or you think doesn’t happen a lot to many people. For example, I was switched at birth. I ended up finding my real parents in my teens, so I have two sets of parents now.”

“Oh!” Eijiro spoke up. “I have black hair naturally, but I dye it.”

“I was struck by lightning once as a child,” Shouto added. “It activated my heterochromia condition.”

Everyone went around sharing a small bit of themselves, making a safe, cozy environment. But Katsuki wasn’t exactly keen on the idea. No matter how easy going everyone seemed to be.

So, Katsuki kept his mouth shut.

He frowned deeply but didn’t let go of Izuku’s hand. He curiously peered over to his faux husband. Izuku had his lips pressed in a thin line, contemplative, as if he was thinking of something.

“I...I overcame a small lisp when I was younger,” Izuku confessed in a small voice. “I had selective mutism as a child, so I ended up being a bit late on my speech development.”

Katsuki’s whole body went still in time.

The flame stopped flickering, the birds stopped chirping and all his senses ceased registering the world around him.

A lisp? He thought distantly.

That part of his brain tugged and screamed at him as he gradually turned towards Izuku. He unwillingly heard that tiny, small voice from his childhood and dreams. The one that always spoke out to him and cared. He was slightly surprised how easily he was triggered into thinking about those darkened nightmares. But the idea of a lisp reminded the blond of his blurry faced savior.

He watched the color of the flames dance and swirl against Izuku's green curls and in his eyes.

A piece of his heart panged unknowingly.

"I have lucid dreams," Katsuki admitted, feeling compelled by the bit of information Izuku dropped. All eyes turned to him, possibly surprised at the lucid dreaming part but more so at the fact he spoke. "So I, uh, wake up feeling like I slept a long time but I don't feel well rested."

"That probably adds to your grouchy factor a lot," Momo said thoughtfully and Katsuki soured a bit. "What do you dream about?"

"Nothing important," he mumbled back. "Uh...fish sticks."

"Aw, come on now. Don't lie. We're all having a good, honest time with each other."

"I...I dream about this boy I knew when I was younger."

"A boy?"

This time Izuku's eyes turned to him curiously.

"Yeah. We spent a full year together from the ages seven to eight," Katsuki confessed.

He stared into the flames, feeling lost a bit.

Hearing about Izuku's lisp pushed him back into that part of his headspace. It was dark, neglected, and covered in cobwebs. He slowly dusted off the opaque broken fragments of memories as he gazed into the flickering flames.

"What was the boy's name?" Momo said evenly. "He must be a big part of your life to appear in your dreams repeatedly."

"I actually can't remember what he looks like or even his name," Katsuki said quietly, feeling oddly ashamed as he struggled to gaze into the foggy memories. "Shitty of me, I know."

"Well. Why do you think you get these dreams? Especially if you can't physically place what he looks like."

Katsuki pressed his lips in a thin line. "I think I get the dreams a lot because part of me wants to remember him—but a large part of me doesn't so he stays blurry and unclear."

"What does that boy mean to you?" Momo asked carefully.

Katsuki quickly shook his head when he could feel a lock on that volt in his mind come undone. It cracked open and pieces of darkness seeped out. He took a deep breath and decided to close it again.

“Nothing,” he backtracked. “It’s, uh, not that important.”

“You don’t have to answer if you don’t want to,” Momo said in a gentle voice and Katsuki cursed. Damn she was good at her fucking job. “But I appreciate you offering up that bit of info, I would love to know what the boy meant to you if you dream of him so often.”

That volt cracked open again. He heard the boy’s laugh tangling with that same haunting melody of violins.

“I...I guess he meant a lot,” Katsuki said. He averted his eyes away from everyone to the ground below him. His chest was in an odd limbo, feeling both lighter—relieved—but churning about like he was finally allowing himself to feel. “He was one of the few people I ever met that cared about me. But I don’t want to remember him all that much.”

“Why do you think you’re suppressing him if he means that much to you?”

“Remembering him reminds me of how little my mother cared about me,” Katsuki hissed bitterly. His face automatically twisted in a scowl, feeling angry but guilty in the same breath. “She cared. She did—but within her limitations as an irresponsible gambler and drug addict. She had left me in the streets to fend for myself. I was wandering around worried about her while I nearly fucking died of hypothermia.”

He could feel everyone’s eyes crawling on him—especially Izuku’s.

He wanted to stop the words from tumbling out but soon that volt cracked open, and it all came rushing forward.

“If he cared about you, why does it make you feel angry?” Momo questioned.

“It—It makes me angry to think about how some random rich kid cared more about my wellbeing than my own mother ever did. And I feel guilty for being angry at my mother, since she’s passed. So, to avoid feeling angry, I don’t remember him,” Katsuki admitted.

It was a truth he hadn’t pieced together. However, it all clicked as to why his subconscious was constantly banging at the surface of his mind all the time.

“It’s hard to face a bitter fact like that, knowing he took care of me instead of the person who should’ve. He couldn’t even pronounce my name—had to call me ‘Kacchan.’ Some days it felt like he was the only person to ever love me, and I never saw him after that.”

“Well, besides Hiroji,” Momo said.

“What?” Katsuki frowned and gave her a confused stare. Who the hell was that?

“Hiroji loves you,” She repeated. She gestured to the man sitting next to him. “You two are married.”

And with that, he was snapped out of the spell.

He blinked rapidly, hearing Izuku's false name and suddenly recalled where exactly they were at. He stared in horror realizing he had let his fucking mommy issues spill out like that to a therapist. He saw all the pitiful, unneeded stares everyone was giving him. As if they fucking understood him more—but they didn't. Not a single damn soul here could ever understand him.

"Right. Yeah." Katsuki built his mental wall higher and let go of Izuku's hand—feeling a little too vulnerable. "Of course."

"I think remembering that boy will help you," Momo suggested. She clasped her hands and nodded happily. "You should allow yourself to reflect on that year and stop suppressing it so deeply. This way when you do feel like there are days that no one loves you, you can remember what he did—and lean on your partner for support. You love and care for Taro, don't you Hiroji?"

Katsuki cut his eye to the green haired man next to him.

He was stunned to see near glassy eyes staring at him in shock. Izuku's eyes were wide, as if he had seen some ghost and there was a phantom ghastliness to his features. He was stiff, frozen and he hadn't even moved his hand since Katsuki let it go.

"Ye—Yeah. I-I d-do," Izuku breathlessly whispered. His eyes searched all of Katsuki's features, studying them meticulously. He blinked back crocodile tears and Katsuki suddenly was deeply unhappy. "I lo-love and care about him a lot."

Sourness ate Katsuki from the inside out hearing those fake words.

Internally, he bitterly complimented how good of an actor Izuku was. With the way he was staring at him, anyone would think Izuku gave a shit about what he said. However, this was an assignment—and Izuku was only someone who was pretending to care about him.

All the grievous emotions flooded into Katsuki's core, taking him over. He regretted letting all that out and he wished he could rewind time. He realized his life's pain was minimized to play a part in an act that they were simply posing in. They were two people pretending to care about each other, and hearing Izuku say he did without any real base struck a chord.

It hurt, in a way.

He turned his head from Izuku, and the feeling of repulsion dragged against his skin.

He bitterly threw his smore into the flames and abruptly stood up.

"I'm going to go look at the stars or whatever," Katsuki muttered without sparing a single person a glance.

The hurt part of him was screaming for breathing room but to also have someone understand. Maybe it was Izuku's tone that felt like it was all nearly real, but he had to remind himself it wasn't. Katsuki faced the ugly reality that he had spent all his life alone, and probably would continue to do so.

Even after this assignment.

Katsuki didn't go too far. He stayed within the safety of the campsite. There were too many people around for Moore to stage any type of murder or kidnapping.

He was currently on the ledge of a cliff, sitting on a large moss-covered root of a giant tree. It jutted up from the ground in a delicate arch like nature's bench. The tree wept forward, protectively watching over the river they were just kayaking on.

Below him Katsuki could hear the sound of melodic laughter from other campers. It only added to the growing bitterness swelling within. He could see the stars from here, and endless green. Green. Green. Green.

He looked down sourly at the small leaf in his hand he plucked.

The sound of a snapped twig grabbed his attention and he turned. He was greeted with even more green—but a green he didn't fucking care for right now. Izuku was giving him a pathetic, pity-filled expression. Katsuki dug a glare into Izuku. He could see the rims of his big eyes slightly red in the night setting but was unsure.

Katsuki huffed, rolled his eyes, and turned back around.

"Came to check up on your husband?" he asked mockingly. He tore the green leaf in his hands in two aggressively with a sneer. "You know, you don't have to be attached to my ass all the time."

Izuku didn't respond.

The freckled man stepped forward carefully, moving aside some hanging vines and being mindful not to trip on the roots that were laced all around. He sat down next to Katsuki on the arched root. He quietly stared into the sky with him.

Katsuki waited for Izuku to say something—but nothing came.

They stayed there in silence for at least an hour, watching the stars as Katsuki plucked little leaf after tiny leaf from the ground.

Red and green eyes looked up solemnly at the constellations.

"I wonder if certain things are written in the stars," Izuku said with a blue undertone. He kept his glossy eyes trained up towards the twinkling sky. "Do you believe in fate, Katsuki?"

"No," Katsuki answered easily. He shredded another leaf. "Fate doesn't exist."

"Why do you think that?"

“Because the only thing that’s real is the consequences for your actions,” Katsuki said curtly. “We all have free will over our decisions and blaming fate on the outcome is an easy scapegoat. But I’m guessing you believe in fate.”

“It depends,” Izuku’s small voice said. “Usually I don’t, but sometimes it’s hard to ignore the signs.”

The sullen green-eyed man grew quiet before shifting slightly and looking down at his feet.

Katsuki didn’t say another word, not really liking the idea of entertaining Izuku’s hopeless romanticism at the moment. The wound of talking about his mother and his unknown savior was too fresh. This is why he hated discussing it. It always felt like someone was sinking their thumb in the open wound on his heart until he bled. His chest was clenching unbearably, and he felt a little too raw.

Katsuki turned and caught sight of Izuku’s eyes studying him in a completely different light. The other man’s mouth was taut, as if wanting to speak but was being held back by an unknown force.

It twisted Katsuki’s heart in a way he didn’t care for.

So, he turned forward again, looking up at the sky.

“D-Do you believe it’s possible for two people to be meant to be in each other’s lives?” Izuku suddenly asked. He timidly scooched over on the root, closer to Katsuki. Shy green eyes looked down at the leaf in Katsuki’s hand. “For example, let’s say, if they were forcefully separated the first time, fate would bring them back together...yeah?”

Katsuki huffed. Izuku reached out a hand for his, and he shifted away coldly.

“Izuku. I don’t really care about this romantic shit right now—”

“—It’s not romantic,” Izuku corrected, swiftly retracting his hand. He pressed it in his lap and hung his head. “I-I’m just talking. I wanted to know how you would feel about possibly having...a person you were meant to cross paths with.”

Katsuki scoffed.

“It sounds over optimistic,” he cut down unkindly. “I don’t believe two people are destined to meet each other. Fate doesn’t bring them together because fate isn’t real. No one on this dumb earth is destined to meet anyone. The only thing we’re destined for is death.”

Izuku didn’t say anything after that. Just stared at him with a sad smile.

They sat alone in a peculiar type of silence Katsuki couldn’t place his finger on. It rotated between Izuku looking at the stars, then looking at him as if he was equally as perplexing. Then slowly Katsuki found himself looking at the forest shrubs, vines and how Izuku really did blend in with them all. But for a moment, he found himself thinking about Izuku’s eyes.

Every time he tried to move his thoughts away from those big green eyes—the visual of them staring at him in that shocked manner came back. It felt nearly haunting.

Then, they both glanced up once more at the night sky to see two shooting stars falling at the same time. The sparkling white lights shot down across the atmosphere, adding more splendor to the already decorated sky above them. Katsuki watched as the twin stars fell in tandem, intertwining in a way that crossed their paths among the glittering constellations.

Katsuki wasn't one for wishes. He wasn't one for hoping—but in that moment as he thought of the phantom of a boy from his past, he wished for one thing.

I hope you're doing well.

He turned to Izuku, who was glancing up at the stars with a melancholy expression.

Katsuki quietly asked, "What did you wish for?"

Izuku smiled at him in a way he never had before. Viridian eyes were heavy with a thousand unspoken words.

"I have nothing to wish for anymore. My one wish has already come true."

That night, Katsuki's mind drifted into sleep a little bit differently, still guided by the distant echoing of violins in his head.

He kept seeing green all around him in the forest and it was pulling him in a direction he was unsure of.

He didn't want to take Momo's advice, but he found himself lying in the sleeping bag next to a strangely noiseless Izuku that night feeling odd. They didn't make a scene or fuss about sharing the sleeping bag in the chill night. Katsuki easily turned away from the other man. Just as he was on the edge of sleep, Izuku whispered 'goodnight' with a crack in his voice. After that, a deafening silence pierced through him as he had no choice but to reflect upon what he let out into the ether.

He closed his eyes and wandered to that dark, neglected part of his mind. He couldn't tell the difference between what was the dream and what was his vivid imagination. There, in the far recesses, he clearly saw a giant steel volt. It was covered in dust, cracked at the edges and pieces of opaque glass were shattered on the ground beneath it.

He walked towards one sparkling piece carefully, feeling the cut and crunch of glass underneath his feet. The volt slid open, seeping darkness onto the ground. When the blackness touched that sparkling piece of foggy glass—the glass turned clear.

He bent down and picked it up, peering through the looking glass to see a very clear memory.

Inside, he could see his childhood less blurred. The sun was shining, and the sound of two boys laughing in the summer sun was as crisp as fresh rain. He could feel the playful pull of a smaller hand in his as they splashed up and down in puddles. He was chasing behind the boy who had dark curly hair bouncing in the wind.

Then the boy turned around and smiled at him.

“I’m so happy we’re friends, Kacchan!”

When Katsuki opened his eyes that next morning, he remembered a tiny new detail.

It was small, but it was as important as the key on a large lock. The part of the fog covering the boy’s eyes wafted away like smog in the wind to reveal Katsuki’s favorite color.

The boy had green eyes.

Chapter 6 - Interlude I

Katsuki remembered he was seven years old when he declared his favorite color was green.

He came to this conclusion when his first friend looked at him. He could remember it now, without the weight of suppression against his fragile memory. He could remember how the kind boy had given him all his winter clothes and junk food he found somewhere.

“Can I call you Kacchan?” The blurry faced boy asked. His green eyes were now gleaming through the fog surrounding him like glowing gemstones.

Katsuki remembered how his heart did another flip as he squeezed the hand in his.

“Ye-Yeah,” he replied. He wasn’t sure if he stammered from the cold or the warm feeling inside of his chest. “Kacchan works. What’s your name?”

The boy smiled through the fog surrounding him and answered eagerly. “It’s [illegible].”

It was like violent static noise.

That piece of his memory was still unclear through the reflection. He could see pretty, bright green eyes through the haze now, but he struggled to see any other details beside dark, curly hair. The color he was unsure of.

Was it also green? Or was it black? It could've possibly been a midnight blue or deep purple. Whichever the case, the curls on the other boy's hair were dark with an overlay of another color from what Katsuki could remember.

And Katsuki decided then, to remember.

He remembered the boy departed after that, saying he had to hurry off. Katsuki didn't want him to go, still eager for more warm droplets of kindness in the cold winter. He stared desperately at the boy who gave him a reassuring smile.

"Will you be back?" Katsuki had asked.

He didn't let go of the hand in his. He thought of his mom and how this boy was the closest thing to a friend he'd ever had.

The other boy stared at him, seeming almost shocked at the sudden declaration.

"I-If you want me to come back, I'll come back, Kacchan," his new friend said.

"I do," Katsuki nodded eagerly at the prospect of not being alone anymore. "I want you to come back."

Gradually, a bright, gap tooth smile was given to him. "Okay! I'll come back tomorrow. Just for you, Kacchan. I have to go now though. Have a good night!"

Katsuki smiled sadly at his kind savior and said goodnight too.

There was an inkling of bitterness bubbling in red eyes when the other boy walked away.

Katsuki sourly assumed the other boy probably was going to a nice, warm home while he was stuck here. In the cold streets in the dingy alleyway. When his savior was fully out of sight, Katsuki forced back tears. The frigid loneliness in his bones ached deeper than the winter cold.

He sauntered back to the sketchy alleyway with his head down. Out of caution, Katsuki zipped his bag of food inside of his new puffy winter jacket in an attempt to hide it. He knew they wouldn't do anything because his mom had made friends with them—but he was still fearful being so small.

He had never been alone like this, and he wondered if someone would try to hurt him.

The young blond strolled past all the various homeless people who lived on the same street. Several eyes raked him up and down, taking in his new clothes with curiosity. People were assessing him, probably wondering how he went from wearing nearly nothing to this shiny new wardrobe.

Katsuki went to bed in the tiny, thin tent that night feeling slightly warmer.

The howling wind rattled the tent like an earthquake as Katsuki tucked himself under the thin blanket he found a few weeks ago in the dumpster. He kept all his new clothes on to stay warm as he quietly ate the various candy bars, chips, and juices with a thankful heart and stomach.

In his dreams that night, he saw pretty green eyes.

The boy with kind green eyes came back the next day just like he said he would. Katsuki was so happy that he then asked him to come back again after a day of playing together. The smaller boy seemed shy but overjoyed that Katsuki wanted his company.

So, the boy with green eyes came back every day that week at the same time.

The sky was always bleeding from dark orange to desaturated blue when his mysterious savior arrived. He always came bearing new clothes, blankets, and food for him each day. To accompany these gifts, his smile was bright as the sun and his hair was as soft looking like the clouds.

Katsuki noted how the first day he came back, the boy was wearing brand new clothes, nearly identical to the ones he gave up to Katsuki. Then the following day, he had come with more food and blankets. Clean, warm blankets that smelled like fresh linens.

The smaller boy bundled him up in his shabby tent like he was some puppy to be taken care of.

Young Katsuki was curious about his friend. He was especially inquisitive about the white bandage on his friend's face. It was covering his right eye and caked with dark red blood in several spots. Whatever wound was beneath it seemed to be nasty.

"What happened to your other eye?" Katsuki asked that week. "It looks painful."

He reached out to touch it, but before he could his friend harshly flinched away.

The action made young Katsuki freeze, shocked at how quickly his friend's bubbly demeanor changed. The loud laughter came to an immediate halt and the only visible green eye looked away from him. His friend's small, gloved hands nervously toyed with the hems of his red coat.

"S'nothing," his friend clearly lied. The small voice used made Katsuki disgruntled. "I was playing with my big brother, and I fell. I'm clumsy."

He itched to call out the fib, but Katsuki didn't want to push and scare his new friend off.

"Okay," Katsuki replied slowly. He narrowed his eyes slightly with a deep frown. "Well. Tell your brother not to play so rough. You need to see."

His protective side stirred up a little bit.

Katsuki decided if he ever met his new friend's big brother, he would want to have a word.

He imagined the big brother to be slightly older, and probably larger in stature than either of them. But he didn't care at the moment. Seeing blood seep through the white bandage angered Katsuki deeply. The fiery young blond was always someone who was more protective than the average person because of his dynamic with his mother.

But he didn't push it.

He wanted the other boy to stay, so he let his friend lead the conversation back to comics and his favorite superheroes. Deep down, Katsuki wanted his friend to stay with him and never leave. He had hoped his mother would come back—she had to—but he didn't know when.

Maybe his friend could stay with him until she came back? It had to be soon. She had been gone for so long already.

Every day that week they talked, and his new friend brought him more supplies. And every day, when his friend's little yellow watch read 22:22, he would say he had to go.

Young Katsuki was lonely, confused, but he figured his friend had parents who were probably looking for him too. Maybe they let him go out to play after school but told him he had to come back at a specific time.

He watched the green-eyed boy run home. Back to whatever warmth he was living in while Katsuki was stranded in the cold.

It made Katsuki hopefully wonder.

That Monday of the following week, while cooped up in his tent laughing and talking, Katsuki took a moment to pause. He looked at his friend's sparky clothes and the warm blush on his cheeks in a longing manner. He eyed the cleanliness of the other boy. His friend smelled like mint and cinnamon. Katsuki, shamefully, could smell the unappealing must wafting on his own body.

Katsuki swallowed dryly and leaned in close to his friend's face.

"Can I...Can I come home with you?" Katsuki's voice was full of hope.

But the other boy stiffened.

"Home? With me?" His friend clarified.

Katsuki nodded eagerly.

His little heart fluttered, thinking about a possible warm shower and the opportunity to clean his hair. He hated walking around feeling dirty, smelly, and gross. However, his heart started sinking when his friend looked down at the bundle of blankets underneath them.

His new friend nervously plucked at the cotton blanket under them.

“I-I’m sorry, Kacchan,” the other boy whispered wearily. “I don’t think you should.”

Katsuki’s heart dropped straight to the bottom of his stomach fast enough to make him nauseous.

“Why?” Katsuki hissed.

His eyes immediately started stinging with salty tears at the denial. He knew it would be a stretch. He fucking knew but still he thought maybe. His new friend had been so kind but—but hearing that refusal felt like a slap in the face. A sad green eye gazed at him and even though the other was bandaged up, Katsuki knew it was staring at him with the same amount of useless pity.

His friend reached a hand forward to steady his shaking fists. “You don’t want to come home s’with me—”

“—Yes I do.” Katsuki’s tone was forceful. “Would your parents not want me there? Is that the problem? Am I—Am I too dirty for them? Would they freak out?”

“No, Kacchan. I-It’s not that—”

“—Then what?” Katsuki snatched his hand away and all the tears poured down. “Why the hell not? You—You have clothes and food. You wear all this pretty fancy stuff all the time and smell nice like soap. I smell horrible and I’m dirty and sleep in this dirty tent. You probably get to sleep in a bed! Why can’t you let me come home with you?!”

Safe.

Katsuki sourly glanced around at the shabby tent that had holes in it.

A gust of winter air came through at that moment, reminding him how close to freezing to death he was. The winter breeze caressed his cheeks and nose, making him shiver harshly. Red eyes blinked through the stinging tears as he stared at his friend, who also shivered.

Then it clicked.

His friend would stop shivering at 22:22. He would run home and get in bed, get a bath and probably a hug. But Katsuki would keep shivering long after 22:22.

The anger inside of him churned until it boiled.

“Get out,” Katsuki hissed.

His fists shook as he surveyed all the blankets and clothes. He tried to stop the emotions inside of him from tittering over, but he couldn’t. It all built up high until it collapsed within him. No hot meals. No showers. No more school. No more seeing his mom. Being stuck in this fucking tent. He had no other family or anywhere to even go.

“Wh-What? Kacchan, you don’t mean that—”

“—I said get out!” Katsuki screamed.

He stood up, head knocking the top of the plastic tent and he grabbed his friend by his yellow scarf around his neck. He ignored all the crying and screaming from his new friend as he wrestled him down and unzipped his shabby excuse for a home. With all his strength, jealousy, and resentment, Katsuki threw out the boy with green eyes into the street straight into the snow.

Watery green eyes looked at him, hurt in disbelief. “Ka-Kacchan—”

“Just leave me alone!” Katsuki yelled. His chest heaved as he started crying hot tears that immediately froze on his skin. “Go run home to your precious mommy and daddy and leave me to fucking freeze to death!”

He zipped up his tent before his friend could come back in. He could see the shadow of two tiny hands on the door of the tent and hear all the little sobs.

“Kacchan! I’m sorry! Please. Please, let me back in,” his friend said. Sniffles, sobs, and more all came pouring out. “Puh—please. Ka-Kacchan…”

Katsuki covered his ears and screwed his eyes shut.

He choked back a sob as he shut out the only person who cared. Part of him was screaming to let his new friend back in while the other half was fed up with being homeless and burned to lash out.

He wanted his mom. He wanted her to come back and he wanted to stop feeling so dirty. He cried harder until he could hear nothing—and no one but his own heart breaking.

When Katsuki finally calmed down, his friend was gone. He unzipped the tent, and in the dark night he could see the scattered snow prints of tiny feet wandering off out of the alleyway.

He wondered if it was after 22:22.

The next morning, Katsuki had a little bit of remorse for how he treated his new friend.

His tiny heart was still jealous and bitter, but he felt loneliness stronger than either of those emotions. He glanced around at all the other homeless people gathered who were heating themselves up by the fire in the metal bins, talking amongst themselves. They all were huddled with someone. Paired off or in groups with friends. The ones who weren’t were sleeping off to the side or muttering.

Katsuki went with his usual movements.

Every morning he searched for his mother with a heavy heart. This was officially the sixth week of him searching for her with a heart full of fragile hope.

He went his normal route, guessing where she probably might be at. He stopped at her favorite clothing store. Her favorite restaurant. Her favorite park. He even looked around a certain street with adults who played card games, he didn't know what they were exactly, but he knew his mother liked being there.

When he found no trace of her, he wandered back to her favorite park and sat there by himself.

Katsuki gazed at the families there with deep longing.

He watched a young mother hug her child with a warm embrace. The pair giggled as she spun the toddler around, eliciting giggles and cheers from the happy child. He wrinkled his nose a bit to force the tears back, but they came rushing forward like a stampede. One by one each drop fell onto his blue jeans, leaving behind a wet stain.

He tried to ease his mind as he thought about the last time he saw her.

Her red eyes had been gentle, motherly, and full of love. The two of them had been living out of the tent for about two months by that point.

Before that, they had a house that was full of his favorite things like games, toys and his dad was alive. Katsuki's childhood had been filled with nothing but bright, radiant colors. He loved his mom and dad, his room and everything in his life.

However, that all changed quickly when his father grew ill when he was six. That shiny light in his home turned off with the snap of Fate's fingers when she commanded his father's spirit to leave his body. Katsuki's colorful world was smothered in dull hues as he stood over that grey tombstone that read 'Bakugou Masaru' dressed in all black.

Things became rocky after the funeral.

His mom had to get a full time job and he spent a lot of time with babysitters. But when he was at home, things became strained. He ate less. Bathed less. His mom cried more. Soon after he turned seven, people tried to take him from what he could remember. Men and women in fancy suits with shiny clipboards. They said that he was going to go elsewhere and get a new family—one that could properly take care of him.

Katsuki didn't want to be separated from her though.

His dad made him promise to watch after her and said that she needed him.

"Katsuki," he could recall his father saying right before he passed. His brown eyes were nearly dull and lifeless as he laid on that bed sick with death. "Katsuki. Please take care of your mother. She needs someone there…to help her be better. She needs you."

Katsuki agreed with tears in his eyes.

He was needed and those damn people in suits didn't understand that. Clearly, his mom didn't want to abandon him either. She looked horrified that day when the lady with black hair told her that he would be going somewhere else.

That night, he remembered that he and his mom had left before the people in suits could come back.

At first, Katsuki was unhappy and fussy. He was unsure why they were leaving their warm home. He didn't want to go, it was his favorite place. It smelled like sweet cinnamon like his father used to and young Katsuki wasn't ready to let that go. But it didn't matter what he wanted—his mom said they had to go.

He asked if they would ever go back home, and his mother curtly said no.

If they ever were to go back home, they would be separated and Katsuki had to learn to grow up. He resisted throwing a fit as he glanced around his once warm home.

He could see a ghost visual of his father in the home that night waving goodbye to him. His father's phantom mouthed 'take care of her' as he gradually grew faint. Then finally, the figure of his imagination fully faded sadly as they climbed out the side window.

The sadness in young Katsuki at that departure stuck with him for years to come.

He and his mother then snuck away in the night and left behind nearly everything. Katsuki only took his All Might action figure and that was all he was allowed. They had been on the train for a long time, the cityscapes passing them by for hours. Katsuki had lifted his All Might action figure up to the window as the trees whizzed by in the distance, making it seem like he was flying.

When they arrived that day, they were in Tokyo. His mom purchased a new mini home for them. She said it was like camping, but in the city! Which Katsuki thought was neat since it was only autumn. The two of them found an alleyway hidden away from the world.

She trained him well to avoid anyone who might look suspicious so they wouldn't be separated. Katsuki followed her instructions carefully because he wouldn't ever want to leave his mom. She needed him. She really did—especially on the days she would cry and ask the sky to bring back his dad.

Katsuki was convinced it was going to be the two of them together forever.

Or at least he thought.

"Mommy needs some time to get things together. Okay?" She had explained. She caressed his hair and left him with his favorite All Might action figure. "You're a big boy now and can handle yourself for a bit. When I come back, we'll have a home, and you'll have all the comics and toys you can think of. Just stay right here until I get back and don't let anyone take you, okay? I love you."

Katsuki had agreed. He nodded and watched her walk away with a pretty smile on her face.

He replayed that memory over and over again like a broken tape.

“Mommy will be back.”

“I love you.”

Maybe she was lost. Grown-ups could get lost too, not just kids, right? She said they wouldn’t be separated so there was no way she left him.

...Right?

After doing his daily sweep of her in the area twice with no luck, Katsuki finally settled down in front of the violinist who endlessly played.

The smoothing music was gentle enough to calm him down long enough to realize he had been upset at the wrong person. He thought about kind green eyes and all the warm blankets that he had been given. He doesn’t know why he even asked to go home with him when he knew he had to look for his mother.

He sniffed under his arms again a little bit and flinched back.

The winter day started to bleed into orange early in the afternoon like he had every day before. Katsuki anticipated this being the first day out of the week his friend wouldn’t return. He probably was sobbing to his parents about the mean boy who harshly rejected his kindness.

But he was soon proven wrong, when the very person he thought wouldn’t come back, did.

Wandering around the corner, crying with puffy eyes and a red nose was the boy with green eyes.

Katsuki felt his heart squeeze when he made eye contact with that one watery green eye.

“Izuku?” He spoke.

His new friend walked up to him sobbing and holding out his arms for him.

“Kacchan. I-I’m so-sorry—” the smaller boy cried. His voice was raspy as though he had been crying all day. “P-Please don’t be mad, Kacchan. I don’t want you to be mad at me.”

Katsuki tried to tell him that he should be the one that’s sorry, but the tiny hands of his friend grabbed him immediately. Short arms encircled him, and his friend tucked his head into his neck and cried more.

“Yo-You’re my only fr-friend and I don’t wa-want you to be mad,” the weeping continued. “B-But I-I can’t take you home. I just can’t. Please. My big brother s’mean and I don’t want him to hurt you too.”

Too.

Katsuki froze when he heard that word.

He reeled back a bit to study the other boy who was sniffling. Snot ran down his chubby face in the cold and his cheeks were pinked from a combination of crying and the chilly weather.

Katsuki frowned deeply as he considered the bloodied bandage in a new light. He lifted a hand to touch it, and this time his friend didn’t shy away. The smaller boy flinched in pain but allowed Katsuki to trace it. From underneath the thin layer of material, Katsuki could feel the swelling of a black eye and a large cut.

“Did he do this to your eye?” Katsuki asked, knowing the answer already.

That lone green eye glanced off to the side, fear circling inside of it.

“Ye-Yes, but you can’t tell anyone,” his friend whispered dreadfully. “I-I’m not supposed to tell anyone, Kacchan. I could get in a lot of trouble if they found out I was talking about it.”

So, he was right.

Katsuki imagined whatever big brother his friend had to be cruel, ugly, and vicious for picking on someone smaller than him. But what the fuck was up with family picking on him? Katsuki couldn’t fathom hurting someone he considered family.

“Trouble with who?” Katsuki’s nostrils flared in rage. “Why don’t you tell your parents and make him stop?”

“Please,” his new friend pleaded. His question went unanswered as the smaller boy hugged him tighter. “You have to promise. You won’t tell anyone.”

The tiny voice cracked, and it tugged at Katsuki’s heart.

He hesitantly wrapped his arms around his friend, slightly self-conscious of his unpleasant odor. But he was more compelled to suddenly protect the other boy in his embrace. As the smaller boy cried into his neck, Katsuki promised himself if he ever met this big brother, he would beat him up—or kill him.

“I promise,” Katsuki whispered. He hugged him tighter and buried his face into the other child’s fuzzy hat. “I’m sorry too. I shouldn’t have gotten mad at you yesterday without hearing why. I get angry a lot...it’s hard to not feel angry sometimes.”

“It’s okay, Kacchan. I forgive you,” the smaller boy said back. “I understand you get angry and use a lot of bad words. That’s why I like you.”

Katsuki felt tears prickling at his eyes at the small glimpse of acceptance.

When they pulled back from their embrace, both boys were smiling at each other. All bad feelings and icky thoughts dissolved into nothing as Katsuki looked into that large pretty green eye.

It was only when they were finally holding hands again, Katsuki noticed the music had stopped playing.

Katsuki turned curiously towards the elderly man. The violinist was now sitting on the ground, watching them while his calloused hands were cradling his violin. The liver spotted man didn't say a word as his dark brown eyes gazed at them. His expression was full of adoration and his lips had a small, half lopped smile.

This was the first time Katsuki had ever heard him stop playing. It made the young blond curious why—but before he could ask, there was a small tug at his arm.

"Kacchan, I-I found a better place for you to sleep if you want," his friend proposed. "I found it yesterday when I was walking."

Katsuki straightened out, not expecting those words. He turned back to the smaller boy. "What do you mean?"

His new friend fiddled with the hems on his jacket and squeezed their intertwined fingers.

"I know I ca-can't take you home s'with me, but I found a place that would be warmer and safer."

Katsuki's heart leaped against his sternum.

Yes. Absolutely yes.

He didn't even care about what place his friend was possibly referring to because the idea of somewhere warm was amazing. The numbness at the end of his toes and fingertips was eating away at his nerves to the point it was beginning to burn. Katsuki nearly felt like crying after hearing the proposal. The excited young blond was about to jump at the offer but halted.

He glanced at the shabby tent and saw a ghost visual of his mother waving at him. She mouthed the words 'stay right here' and pointed to the tent. Suddenly he felt like sharp hooks were sunk into the flesh of his heels keeping him stuck in place.

"I...I can't go too far," Katsuki whispered. The visual of her waving at him faded slowly with the falling snow. His heart sank down low again, and he hung his head in defeat. "My mom said she would be back for me. I don't want to go too far off and miss her one day. She needs me."

"It's not far at all!" His friend reassured with a bright smile. "I remembered what you said about your mom, so I made sure it was close. Follow me, Kacchan!"

Katsuki perked up again, a tiny flicker of hope growing in his chest.

His friend helped gather his belongings and they walked side by side to a place that was still in the more worn down, neglected parts of the city. They followed the pathway of crooked sidewalk nearby. It winded around a corner near the alley like promised. The concrete was cracked and uneven, showing no one had tended to it in years.

By the time they arrived at the place his friend was talking about, Katsuki felt his heart beating hectically.

They were standing in front of an abandoned church.

The building was tilted slightly, slanted on the ground as if the wind had knocked against it hard enough to make it lean. The color was white, and the shape was pointy on top. At the peak was the symbol of what Katsuki could make out to be a rusted golden cross. He remembered his mother talking about these types of churches, saying that it was a religion from abroad her mother tried to get her into, but she never wanted to.

All the paint on the outside was chipped and worn, as if the building was showing how it was just as neglected as Katsuki. There were wooden boards on all the doors to prevent entry. Katsuki wondered just how this was supposed to be his new home—but quickly his friend showed him the way.

The tinier boy motioned with his head and ran to the back of the building. Katsuki curiously followed, and when he peered around the corner, he saw the other boy lifting one wooden board. The rusted screws fell out easily revealing a small entrance leading inside. It was too small for grown-ups but just large enough for him and his new friend.

They both smiled wide at each other.

The smaller of the two squeezed in first and they did a funnel system to shovel all Katsuki's belongings inside. Then when he handed his All Mokight action figure to the smaller boy, Katsuki squeezed in. He stumbled in slightly, but quickly gained his footing. He looked up and all around him was pitch blackness except the shining of moonlight through the colorful stained-glass windows surrounding them.

Katsuki took a moment to stare upwards.

The ceilings were so high that it was the first time that Katsuki truly felt small. He felt microscopic as he stared up at all the beautiful windows covered in cobwebs. The moonlight peered through to cast down rays of light that were glittering with bright hues. Pink, blue, orange, and green hues scattered all around in the dark room. A myriad of colors decorated both boys standing in the middle of the abandoned church as they stared around in awe.

Katsuki looked at the boy next to him under the twinkling colors.

The little rays of light made him appear multi-colored and heavenly. Katsuki smiled thankfully. His savior of a friend then turned to him with a kind smile and told him to follow him. They walked down the long aisle together holding all his stuff.

Katsuki looked up, studying the large round stained-glass window in the center of the church. It was the biggest, and the focal point. It had a symbol of a red apple and green snake in the middle of its spiral. The snake circled around the apple, showing its fangs. Out of all the ethereal art inside, that one stood out to Katsuki, and small goosebumps ignited on his skin.

He kept his eyes trained on it until they went around to a backroom.

The smell of heavy dust tickled the back of Katsuki's nose as he looked at all the forgotten benches, books, and candles all covered with a sheet of transparent cobweb.

Then his friend stopped in front of a tiny door underneath the stairs. He placed down the bundle of clothes and blankets to open it. It revealed a tiny nook that looked as if someone had previously cleaned it. It lacked the dust layer and was straightened up to look neat. There were tiny shelves jutting out from the sides that had candles on them.

His friend stepped forward hesitantly into the dark nook and took a candle. He reached into his puffy red coat and pulled out a matchbox and fumbled with it until he struck a flame. He carefully lit the candle and set it on top of the tiny shelf.

"I cleaned this up for you, Kacchan," his friend said shyly. "I know it's not much, but you won't be in the cold anymore."

He turned to smile at Katsuki, and the young blond felt his heart skip a beat as he looked at the small space.

That night his friend set him up in the tiny nook.

They used all the blankets to make the tiny nook seem like a fluffy fortress rather than a tiny hidden hole in an abandoned building. The candlelight made the atmosphere appear cozy and warmed the space. Everything was plush and his new friend said that he would bring him lots of pillows to make it even more comfortable for him.

Katsuki looked around the small space. It was as close to home as he could remember.

Afterwards, his new friend led him downstairs, where it was slightly creepy. They used the forgotten candles to light their way in the pitch blackness all the way to the bottom of the building. The tiny flames barely lit anything, but they could at least see a little bit in front of them.

The wooden floorboards changed to grey cracked cement as they made their way down some large steps. When they finally got to the bottom, they saw several rats run past and they screamed in shock. In the moment, his friend hastily clutched onto him in fear, and they then looked at each other. Tiny laughter bubbled up between them as they continued down.

His friend didn't stop clutching his arm and Katsuki puffed out his chest, liking the feeling of being needed and bigger.

He smiled privately at the smaller boy.

They got to the bottom of the basement and tucked away in the shabby corner was an open shower—or something of the sort. The shower head was there and there was a drain over the cracked white tiles in the corners. It looked dirty, a little moldy but for the most part it translated to one thing to Katsuki: he could finally clean himself.

Katsuki stared at his friend, and his friend happily gestured towards the shower. Katsuki muttered a quiet ‘thank you’ as they got closer to the forgotten shower. His new friend averted his gaze as Katsuki stripped down.

Slight shame gnawed at the young blond as he finally let his clothes drop and there was a clear ill-smelling stench in the air. He huddled into his body a bit, trying to draw back in the shame of his filth as he turned on the water.

The liquid felt almost foreign on his skin as it touched him for the first time in nearly two months. His body shivered a bit. The water wasn’t exactly warm, but it wasn’t cold either as he tried to adjust to it. He looked around for soap and found nothing. But before he could be sad about it, a tiny hand came forward and gave him a generic lavender bar of soap and a rag.

Red eyes widened and Katsuki turned to see his friend shyly smiling at him.

He took the items and looked at them carefully as the other boy turned away again. Katsuki started slowly scrubbing his body with the soap and rag, but as the pretty purple bubbles turned brown, he froze. He didn’t know why but he clammed up and his throat swelled.

He stood there frozen for a while, assessing the grim that had built up on his skin.

He tried to lather the layers of dirt away with the bar of soap in his hand, but it felt endless. More purple bubbles turned brown and Katsuki’s throat swelled as the water poured down on him. Tears pricked like needles at his eyes again and he couldn’t figure out why. He blinked rapidly, trying to push through the putrid smell and discomfort that strangled him.

What the hell was wrong with him?

He started to shake slightly, and his arm felt heavier as he attempted to clean his body.

He let out a quiet sob.

Quickly, his friend stepped forward and gently grabbed the bar of soap when Katsuki’s shaking grew crippling. The blond boy squeezed his eyes shut as he stayed frozen in place in shame. He wanted to disappear or act as though he wasn’t humiliated by his soiled body. The other boy helped scrub his body in the lukewarm water that didn’t blast at full power.

His friend didn’t seem to care about getting his clothes wet as he picked up the task.

Katsuki felt raw.

In that moment, he could feel the weight of poverty crushing down on him as he watched the purple soapsuds turn dingy brown. He closed his eyes, thinking maybe this filth would cause his friend to think he was disgusting and leave him alone. However, the kind boy only smiled and helped clean him.

He even sang a stupid song to help keep Katsuki distracted.

“Clean the Kacchan until he’s happy,” the tiny voice of his friend recited in a sing-song tone as he lathered Katsuki’s hair. He foamed it until the bubbles went from brown to purple. “Clean him until he’s brand new! Clean him until he’s smiling and full of sunshine!”

Katsuki eventually sat on the cold tile and let himself be taken care of.

He listened to the little made-up song and found himself humming along with it. It distracted him enough from his shame that he didn’t feel too woeful. They harmonized those three lines over and over as Katsuki cried softly. His friend didn’t mention the filth, the tears, or even care about his dampened clothes.

Katsuki smiled painfully as he allowed the sprinkling water pouring on his face to mix with his salty tears.

When he finally smelled like lavender and his body was scrubbed fully clean, the kind boy settled him into the cozy nook under the stairs. He was checking his little yellow watch a lot, and the time seemed to be inching closer to 22:22. Katsuki looked around his new abode and didn’t want the other boy to go.

He laid down in the heap of blankets and allowed himself to be tucked in. He gazed up at the boy with the bandaged eye who looked down at him happily.

“I hope this will be okay,” his friend said shyly as he finished bundling him up. “I know it’s not much, but it’ll keep you safe and warm at night when you’re not looking for your mom.”

“Th-This is great, thank you,” Katsuki said unsteadily.

He tried to grin but found himself overcome with gratitude when he felt the numbness in the tips of his fingers start to fade all the way. The blood came pulsing back in a rush that felt painful, but he welcomed it. Katsuki tried to desperately shove back the feeling of crying that was pushing at his eyes but couldn’t.

He smiled and choked back a sob. He covered his eyes and cried into the heels of his palms.

“Thank—Thank you so much,” Katsuki’s voice splintered at the edges as he shook. “I’m so sorry for being mean to you yesterday.”

His friend immediately laid down next to him, hugged him tight and wiped his tears.

“S’okay, Kacchan.”

That was the beginning of a friendship Katsuki cherished that year.

In the mornings, Katsuki did his routine check for his mother. With each passing day without her, he could feel his unease increasingly gnaw through him until he started to taste acidic bile at the back of his throat. To distract himself, he focused on the one steady constant in his life: green eyes.

At the exact time every day, the boy with pretty green eyes met him in the plaza. They sat together for a while to listen to the violinist side by side on the bench where they met. The elderly man's eyes lit up whenever he saw them together and he grinned wide, showing off his crooked, rotten teeth.

They grinned back happily and always cheered and clapped for him at the end of every song.

Accompanied with that, the new place to stay allowed Katsuki to feel immensely better and safer. He didn't have to worry about the harsh winds of the winter storms nor showering. The coziness of the blankets insulated him enough that he was toasty inside of the small space. It was perfectly big enough for him and his friend to play in—and play they did.

He eventually learned his friend's favorite superhero comic was All Might as well, and they talked all evening about the comics.

His friend then started bringing him comics and posters with the bags of food after that. They taped the posters up on the walls inside of the tiny nook and they found flashlights for them to use instead of candles.

The pair of boys stayed under the covers a lot that winter making up stories and pretending they were real heroes. Some days they played make believe inside of the large church, jumping off the creaky wooden benches with blankets wrapped around their shoulders like capes. Other days they played tag, running up and down the church's squeaky wooden floors full of energy. Some nights they even did hide and seek or shadow puppets in the sparkling rays of light from the stained-glass.

The possibilities were endless as they ran as free as their imaginations.

Katsuki had never had this much fun, and it fed the lonely void in his chest.

Then every night at 22:22 his friend would tuck him in, hug him, and quietly wander off into the night back to wherever home was.

Katsuki felt cared for. He felt happy and nearly felt loved.

Then when the dark winter melted into bright spring, his friend's bandage came off.

Katsuki knew the other eye was probably green—but it didn't stop him from admiring the matching set in front of him. Whatever injury he had healed up smoothly and seeing the full face of his savior made young Katsuki's heart clench.

Green eyes. Such pretty, unique green eyes.

One day they found themselves listening quietly to the violinist in the plaza.

Like always, the elder man played his haunting song on the ivory violin with a distant expression. As Katsuki listened on this day, he was finally able to pin down why this song was so different. Usually when the violinist played other songs, he played like a normal musician. He stood with his back straight and swayed softly with the enchanting melodies.

However, with this one particular song the man played, it was as though he was an entirely different person. He played it over and over until some days Katsuki could see his fingers crack and bleed like he was possessed. His body jerked and swayed with the motions as if he was being puppeteered by invisible hands. The passion in the man's eyes burned so fiercely that Katsuki wondered what it was.

"Oi. What song are you playing?" Katsuki asked loudly.

The smaller boy perked up and elbowed him in the side. Katsuki hissed and pouted, and his friend shook his head disapprovingly at him.

"Kacchan! Don't interrupt it's rude—"

But the violinist stopped.

Both boys froze at the sudden screeching of disharmonious strings and turned towards the elderly man.

There was an indescribable look he was giving them with his weighted down wrinkles. He reminded young Katsuki of what he thought zombies should look like. Frail but somehow still defying the odds. Then the man's chapped lips cracked a grin and the corners of his eyes wrinkled with happy smile lines. The snagged teeth in his mouth showed proudly with all their cavities.

"I was wondering when my two biggest fans would ask what I'm playing," the violinist snickered. "I was beginning to think you two would never ask."

Both boys balked.

"It's called, The Dance of the Love Birds," the violinist said proudly. "I composed it myself! It's one of a kind."

"You made that song?" The smaller boy said with stars in his eyes.

"That's so cool," Katsuki said astonished. "You're a genius."

Katsuki's eyebrows shot up at the idea of someone that talented. This crazy old man made music and he played like a professional—that was so amazing!

But then Katsuki stopped and wondered a bit. He glanced up and down at the man's tattered clothes and assessed the holes that were scattered throughout them. Katsuki resisted frowning because why was the man out on the streets if he was so talented? He belonged playing in a fancy orchestra. He should be world renowned and rich.

“I sure did make this song!” The violinist said with humor in his voice. His smile flattered a bit as his eyes glazed over a bit in thought. Katsuki watched how his hands started to shake a bit. “I-I made it for m-my wife and I for our wedding. S-She’s gone now...but I-I think of her when I play it. I play it...and play it. That way, I can always think of her.”

Katsuki’s heart hurt for the man.

There was a tear that streamed down the violinist’s face, catching in the folds of skin as it rolled down. The elderly man smiled in a way that felt mournful.

“It’s my life’s mission to perfect it,” he continued. “The beginning is the wedding song I originally composed, but I realized it was incomplete when I understood there was more to love than sweetness. There’s hurt. And pain and betrayal—” he hissed the last word. “—There’s anguish and there’s mourning. I-I feel like no one makes songs that capture it all! So, I have to!” He finished, sounding a bit desperate at the end.

Katsuki watched how the elderly man nodded his head rapidly. He stared at them like they were the only ones to understand.

“I-I have to do it. I have to,” the violinist whispered, slightly crazed.

“I believe you can,” The boy with green eyes said with a gentle smile. “It’s so beautiful already.”

The violinist’s gaze focused back and there was a little bit of hope planted inside of his brown eyes. He stared at the smaller boy as if he had been in the desert for years dying of thirst and the boy had given him his first drink of water.

“Y-You really think so, little one?” He asked slowly. “You think I can make it complete?”

The smaller boy swung his legs and nodded his head with a big grin. “I do!”

“I do too,” Katsuki added. He smiled at the man and gave a thumbs up.

“Thank you both,” the violinist said. More tears started pouring down the man’s face. “You have no idea how much it means to hear that you like it! No one else in my life believed in me. They all told me I had gone mad for focusing on the music so much, but they didn’t understand! They didn’t understand what a calling felt like! It eats you from the inside until you can let it out.”

The man’s shaky hand clutched at his heart to emphasize his point.

“What’s your calling?” Katsuki asked curiously.

“My calling is that I want to create something beautiful,” he said as though it was a secret. “Something that would never leave someone. I want it to imprint on their hearts and in their minds so whenever they hear this melody, they will remember where they were when they first heard it. They will smile, look towards the one they love and be reminded of all the gorgeous reasons to live."

Katsuki never forgot the speech he heard that spring.

That part of his memory stood out as it was wrapped in the haunting melody of violins.

The rest of that spring and the following months, the two boys continued to be the man's private audience. The violinist asked them what they liked about his composition and what they didn't. The boy with green eyes talked about the beat being too slow but Katsuki said some parts didn't match. The man eagerly took the feedback and adjusted accordingly every time.

It was a cycle after that.

Listen. Critique. Re-compose. Listen once more.

After a while, 'The Dance of the Love Birds' ended up being Katsuki's favorite song.

The pair of young boys ended up finding a love for violin music in that way as they helped the man perfect his song. Katsuki started to imagine himself making music and composing songs for people to play. In his young imagination, he saw him and his best friend possibly going to one of those fancy concerts together. They could listen to people play on pianos, violins, and such together. They could even hold hands and all that stuff while listening to the pretty songs!

It would be perfect.

The elderly violinist was so happy to have company for the first time in decades that he started teaching the young boys the words he muttered.

Da Capo. Duet. Enharmonic. Lento. Adagio.

All the once foreign sounding words had new meanings as Katsuki soaked them up. He eagerly learned everything he was handed, since this was probably the closest thing he'd come to school until his mom returned.

It was the happiest spring that Katsuki could think of.

His heart fluttered every time he hummed the unique melody they helped the man craft.

The months passed by without his mother, and Katsuki was beginning to contemplate if she was either dead or gone elsewhere.

He and his best friend found themselves exploring the city together more during the hours the other boy would visit. They wandered freely with young hearts and cheerful laughs. Katsuki watched joyfully as dark curls bounced in the spring breeze with his friend's skipping. Green eyes would gaze up at him like he was the best person in the world, and it made Katsuki's heart full.

Some days they huddled in the corner of the comic bookstore together. The two boys snickered and laughed while thumbing through the pages. They did everything together to the point Katsuki was looking forward to spending time with the green-eyed boy more than searching for his mother. The sun bright smile of the other boy lit up his life as they explored the city hand in hand.

He didn't find himself counting the days he had been without his mother anymore as long as green eyes were looking at him. The short spring sunlight started to extend in a telltale sign that summer was peaking around the corner. Gorgeous pink blossoms bloomed on the trees and littered in the other boy's curls like confetti.

Time blew by Katsuki quickly with the smaller hand wrapped in his.

Then, it came to halt one day outside of a television store.

He had been passing by the store looking forward to going back to the plaza. The news was playing like always on all the tiny TV screens that were stacked high like Legos. He usually never bothered glancing at the window, but when he did this morning, it made him freeze when he saw the date.

April 19th.

It was the day before his birthday.

There was a level of unnerving shock that settled into him from seeing those numbers on the screen. He will be turning eight tomorrow. He'll be eight tomorrow and his mother was still nowhere to be seen.

His heart went from fluttering in anticipation to see his best friend to humming low at the reminder his mother was still missing. He wrinkled his nose as he tried to will away a dark feeling that scratched in the back of mind. He pondered that she might be dead because there was no way she would have left him this long.

But part of him had a fear.

He feared that maybe she really was alive—and that he wasn't that important anymore.

He glanced down at his new sandals that his best friend had brought for him.

"Let's go somewhere tomorrow," Katsuki proposed later that day.

The two boys were currently playing in their favorite park. They were fighting with sticks as if they were swords. The violinist had encouraged them to go out and enjoy the weather as he adjusted the song based on their critiques. The elder man had somewhat functioned as a dysfunctional adult for them as he watched over them the best he could in his slightly unhinged mental state.

“Somewhere like where?” The boy with green eyes asked. He giggled while blocking the blows from Katsuki. He gave three jabs to Katsuki’s stomach that made the taller boy laugh.

“Like, Saitama,” Katsuki said quietly. “They have pretty parks and good food.”

The smaller boy froze mid-swing. His sudden hesitation let Katsuki, who was already in motion, hit him in the neck with the blunt end of the stick. The blond boy paused too and nervously lowered the wooden stick in his hands.

“Saitama?” His friend echoed. His brows furrowed in worry, and he looked at Katsuki unsure. “Th-That’s kind of far, Kacchan.”

“I know, but I always wanted to go,” Katsuki muttered. He kicked the grass a bit and shrugged his shoulders. “My mom said we would go there one day for a carnival, but she...never took me. It’s okay if you don’t wanna go. I figured maybe we could explore more outside of where we live.”

“I dunno,” his friend said wearily. “I have to make sure I’m walking home at—”

“—At 22:22. I know, I know,” Katsuki said grumpily. He probed the end of his stick into the ground a little aggressively. “Never mind. I thought we could do something for my birthday tomorrow. But we can find something around here to do.”

“Wait,” his best friend said curiously. His eyes lit up and Katsuki averted his gaze when he blushed. “I-It’s your birthday tomorrow, Kacchan?”

“Yeah, my birthday is April 20th,” Katsuki muttered. He glanced around at the other people in the park and pursed his lips. “Maybe we can have a picnic here or look to see when a carnival happens in Tokyo—”

“—Let’s go,” his best friend suddenly said.

The smaller boy stepped forward and surprised Katsuki at the sudden change of mind. His friend looked at him with those big green eyes, eager to please. Katsuki felt his heart squeeze, but he glanced at the tiny yellow watch on the other boy’s wrist.

“Are you sure?” Katsuki mulled over. “We don’t have to if you’re gonna get in trouble for coming home late. I'd be happy if we stayed here too.”

“No, let’s go to Saitama! We just have to make sure we’re back in enough time, right? It should be simple.”

“Yeah,” Katsuki agreed. He smiled with all of his teeth and swiftly felt equally as enthusiastic. “It should be simple.”

There was a twinge of fear in pretty green eyes, but ultimately deep resolve took root. A bright grin spread across the other boy’s features as he punched his small fist high to the air.

“Let’s give you a good birthday, Kacchan!”

It rained cats and dogs on his birthday.

Katsuki thought at first that it would derail everything. He remembered how he stared at the large stained-glass windows of the abandoned church that morning. They didn’t shine in the magical way they usually did with the grey clouds outside. There were no glittering sparkles of pinks, purples and blues dancing all around. Only grey.

The banging of the rain against the hollow building sounded ominous like a warning for him to stay inside. He started thinking over all the things they could do inside. Play tag. Puppet shadows again maybe, he could pretend to be All-Might this time or they could go bother the old man in the plaza for one of his looney stories.

But maybe with the rain, his friend wouldn’t come.

However, the boy with green eyes showed up right on time.

The smaller boy had come dressed in a yellow rain jacket and had a red umbrella over his head. His smile was bright as though it wasn’t storming outside. In his other hand was his usual plastic bag, and this time it was filled with an extra rain jacket and food like always.

Katsuki realized that day he could always count on his friend and his attachment grew a bit stronger.

They boarded the train easily, paying for the tickets with the yen his friend conjured up from thin air. Katsuki didn’t question it anymore. The money. The food. The clothes. Somehow, the smaller boy always seemed to have the right thing they needed to have a good day.

They arrived in Saitama holding hands and acted as if the sky was full of sun.

It was possibly the best birthday Katsuki had ever had thus far.

Usually, his birthdays before that were spent with his parents. From what he could remember, the ones with his dad were always fun. His parents were merry, smiled, and held him up to blow out the candles on his cake. They happily kissed afterwards and then sandwiched him between another kiss on both of his cheeks as he giggled.

But his seventh birthday was spent with his mother who was weeping.

She tried to smile through her tears, but he could tell it was hard. His dad had passed that year and the emptiness in the house was tenfold. All the radiance his father possessed left with him that year and in his absence, two broken spirits tried to mend without him. The candles on Katsuki’s cake didn’t get blown out that year. The wax melted into the frosting as he hugged his mother for as long as he could.

But this time, he had a friend. The best friend in the world.

His best friend held his hand as they splashed through puddles. The smaller boy eagerly pulled him along as they explored a whole new part of the country. The pretty pink blossoms above them acted like raindrops of their own as they fell down on top of their umbrellas. Katsuki watched, mesmerized slightly, as his friend's pretty dark curls bounced with every hop they did into a new puddle.

Sweet green eyes then turned to him and smiled brightly.

"I'm so happy we're friends, Kacchan!"

Katsuki smiled so hard his cheeks hurt. "I'm happy we're friends too, Izuku!"

The rest of the day was spent looking around the new city. They purchased street food, looked at the parks, and splashed in the rain. They even were able to get bowls of spicy ramen and his best friend sang 'Happy Birthday' to him with his little voice that had a lisp.

Everything had been perfect for Katsuki.

Or more so, it had been perfect until the storm picked up.

The winds became increasingly fierce to the point people on the streets were forced to take cover. Huddles of crowds stood inside the little shelter the overheads of some stores provided. Others waited inside as the sky angrily rained down on the land.

The two boys found themselves in a 7/11 pressed against a window with a large crowd of people. Both of them were looking up at the sky through the foggy glass waiting for the rain to stop.

But it seemed like it wasn't going to. The boy with green eyes nervously checked his little yellow watch. 20:45.

Katsuki bit his lip, undeniably feeling guilty. He told himself that they would make it back for the train. All they needed to do was board the 21:30 train to make it to where they lived in Tokyo at 22:00. That would give his best friend enough time to get home—or at least that was their plan.

The sky above had other ideas as it rained harder. Then it was announced on the tiny television in the 7/11 that all trains were halted until the storm died down.

The next train would run at 22:30.

His friend was trying to smile. When they finally boarded the train that night, the boy with green eyes was gazing at him through his sadness. Katsuki could tell he was holding back tears and his small hands were resisting tremors. The guilt chewed through Katsuki's chest because how could they be so stupid. They should've just stayed inside the church playing with comics—or anything else.

But his friend had a family who loved him, right? Surely, they would understand. Kids make mistakes sometimes, that's why they had adults.

When they got back to their part of Tokyo, Katsuki expected his friend to speed off. But instead, the other boy took his hand and walked with him back to the abandoned church. He looked down at the little yellow watch and it read 23:15.

His best friend tucked him in that night like he always did, and the smaller boy gave him a taut smile. There were clusters of tears on the rims of his eyes and Katsuki felt his heart snap in two at the sight.

"Did you have a good birthday?" His friend's small voice forced out, clearly holding back emotion.

"I did," Katsuki said sadly. "It was the best birthday I ever had. But please don't cry, I'm sorry. I'm sure you won't get in that much trouble. Ju-Just explain that you got lost in the storm! They should be happy you made it home!"

His friend laughed and quickly wiped his tears away before they could fall. Katsuki didn't know what was funny, but he made sure to give his best friend a tight hug. His friend's arm wrapped around him tightly, and he buried his face in Katsuki's neck. Katsuki could sense that there was more emotion filled in this hug as they squeezed each other.

He almost didn't like it—it nearly felt like a goodbye.

"Th-Thank you for being so kind, Kacchan."

Katsuki waited in the plaza the next day.

He watched as the sky turned the pretty, orange pastel color that usually told him his best friend should be on his way. But as Katsuki waited and waited, the smaller boy never arrived.

He sat patiently like he always did. However, when nightfell came, he acted. Katsuki searched around a little bit worried. He called out the other boy's name with a twinge of fear. This was the first time he spent time searching for two people. He looked for his mom that morning and he searched for his missing best friend that night.

When he could find neither a piece of his heart splintered in half like worn down wood. He bit his lip to keep it from quivering. But the fear that his only friend was never coming back sunk deep into him like a sharp spear.

He imagined what happened: His friend coming home late, and his parents worried over him. Maybe they were worry-warts who fussed a lot too. The other boy fussed and cried at everything, he had to get that from somewhere. Maybe his best friend confessed to hanging out with a homeless kid and they freaked out like parents do. Maybe his parents forbade him from coming back out and made him stay inside.

It made Katsuki distraught to think about more than he thought it would.

He didn't want to be separated from his friend. He didn't.

He stayed there all night, listening to the violinist by himself. With every new footstep he turned his head, but every time it was a person who didn't have green eyes. Katsuki felt his bottom lip quiver until he bit back a sob.

He cried softly that day on the bench and his best friend never came to tuck him in.

The next day, it was the same thing.

Katsuki's eyes were puffy as he stared down at the pavement in front of the violinist. His chest felt like a million tears were gathered inside, wanting to violently burst out as the pressure on his heart hurt. He cried softly into his hands when the ugly heaviness inside of his body became too much. He wondered if this was it and this was truly where he would be left alone in the world. No mom. No friend. No more food. Just him alone, in that abandoned church.

"Where's your friend, little one?" The violinist finally asked on the second day of Katsuki's friend's absence.

Katsuki stopped crying long enough to look up and wipe the tears and snot from his face.

"I-I don't know," Katsuki admitted, distressed. His voice cracked as he thought about being abandoned a second time. "He—He got home late the other day and I think he's in trouble. B-But he always comes. Always. I-I don't even know where he lives so I can go see him."

He worried deeply that this was the end and his young mind spiraled.

"That's no good," the violinist said in a serious tone. "You two are best friends. I can sense you're supposed to be together; it's fated! You have to find him otherwise only sorrow will happen when you're apart. You know, there's a saying about love birds. When one dies, the other fades away too. It gives up so it can be with its other half."

Katsuki frowned immediately. What did that have to do with anything?

Sometimes he forgot that the violinist wasn't exactly in his right mind until moments like this. The man rambled and switched topics so quickly it gave young Katsuki mental whiplash.

He watched as the elderly man ran his hands through his snow-white hair. His brown eyes gave Katsuki a serious look as he continued rambling.

"Wh-When my wife passed, I didn't die, but a part of me did," the violinist confessed. "Some say my sanity died. Others say my mind left me—but really it was my heart. It's hard to imagine a world without her, so I stay with her by playing my song and perfecting it."

"Stay with her?"

Katsuki scrunched his nose but slowly an idea blossomed. His face laxed into an expression of realization as he processed the words. He looked at the platinum ring on the withered hand of the violinist.

“Mhm, yes!” The violinist chuckled. “She’s always with me when I play this violin. My sweetheart is always by my side. With this violin she is always here.”

Out of all the things the violinist said, Katsuki took away one word: stay.

He clung to it as tightly as his fear of abandonment clung to him.

He thought about his parents and how they were always together until his dad died. His mom was always joyful and smiling up until that moment. And now, even this crazy old man had a wife who loved him until her dying breath. The violinist was clearly happy until that tragic moment in his life occurred.

Like jamming puzzle pieces together, Katsuki’s young mind made his new revelation fit as he forcefully connected the dots. His mom and the violinist were happy because they had people who loved them and people who stayed. People who didn’t leave.

Fueled by the terror of abandonment, Katsuki’s young mind focused on the one thing his parents and the violinist had in common.

He stared a little too hard at the shiny ring on the violinist’s fingers.

“How—How does marriage work?” Katsuki finally asked.

The violinist stopped playing. His brown eyes looked baffled as he glanced at Katsuki. “Um. Why, little one?”

“I just wanna know,” Katsuki said casually. He curled his fists into balls on his lap and leaned in tentatively. “I know what it is, but I want to know how it works. If you get married does that mean the person stays with you?”

“It does,” the violinist said. A distant smile tugged on his chapped lips as he was swept away in a far-off memory. Katsuki had no doubt he was thinking of his late wife as a look of lost love shone in his eyes. “They get to always stay with you. Until death do you part.”

They always stay with you.

Katsuki looked at the elderly man seriously.

“Tell me. How do people get married?”

The next day Katsuki waited with the violinist in the plaza for the boy with green eyes.

Katsuki was nervously clutching a bundle of weeds and flowers. He had found them in the park and was holding two makeshift rings made of brown string that knotted into a neat bow at the top. He had spent all night listening to the violinist ramble on and on about marriage and why it was a good thing.

Usually, Katsuki didn't think about crushes or anything of the sort. Love was weird to him.

That was stuff that didn't make sense, and he had to focus on helping his mom. She needed his undivided attention, so he couldn't worry about stuff like that. Plus, he wasn't even around other kids long enough to care anymore. When he was in school, he thought everyone had cooties anyways.

Anytime he watched his parents kiss he went 'ew' loudly and made a disgusted face. But he didn't have to do anything like that if he didn't want to. He only cared about convincing his friend to marry him so they could stay together. Then the other boy's parents would have to understand. That would mean no more missed days. Right?

He—He just wanted the boy with green eyes to stay with him. That way he wouldn't be...lonely.

So, Katsuki awkwardly sat there in the plaza, wishing with all his might for the other boy to show up. He wished harder than anything he could imagine as he watched the passing clouds in the sky.

Then like a magical miracle, his best friend came right on time.

Katsuki's heart flew out of his chest at the sight of dark curls and green eyes—but his heart stopped beating when he fully took in his friend's appearance.

There was a white cast on the other boy's left arm, and it was sitting perched in a blue sling. The smaller boy's bottom lip was split with a scab on it and there was a tiny, purple bruise on his upper right cheek. Directly beneath his green eyes.

Katsuki dropped the makeshift bouquet of weeds and the string rings onto the bench, forgotten.

He was given a sad smile as his friend approached him with his plastic bag on the other hand, full of food.

"H-Hi, Ka-Kacchan," his friend said in a hoarse voice. "I-I'm sorry about not coming. I brought you some food though! So, it'll be okay now."

"What happened to your arm?" Katsuki immediately asked. He ignored the food in the bag, focusing on how mortified he was by the bruises. Bruises that were almost everywhere. "And your face?"

He didn't even care about the slight hunger in his stomach as he looked at the ugly yellow and purple spotted discolorations. The closer he got on his friend, he could see odd scrapes and cuts littering his arms. He grabbed him by his non-casted arm and pulled him close, ignoring how the smaller boy clearly winced.

His damn brother. Katsuki thought. His nostrils flared in rage. This had to be his stupid big brother.

“I-I fell that’s all, Kacchan—”

“—You’re fucking lying,” Katsuki spat harshly. His scarlet eyes burned into watery green ones. “I can tell you’re lying again. You didn’t fucking fall.”

His friend flinched at the harsh language being directed at him.

“I…I don’t s’want to talk about it,” the smaller boy whispered. He snatched his arm from Katsuki’s grasp and stepped backwards. He held up the plastic bag, clearly a diversion from his own issues. “Let’s go back to your room. Ca-Can we play and read the new All Might comic?”

Katsuki glared hard, clearly wanting to push the issue. He wanted to puff his chest out and demand his friend show him where the hell his brother was at so he could beat him up for this. But the longer those big puppy-like eyes stared at him, Katsuki let his anger be swept away for another day.

He grumbled as he took his friend’s hand, grabbed the bundle of flowers, and improvised rings.

“Okay, we can go back to my room.”

The boy with green eyes smiled.

They sat in the small nook on the soft pad of blanket layers.

It smelled like scented roses from the candles and dust a bit but neither boy cared. Katsuki had put down the bundle of forgotten flowers and the two little rings in the corner by his pillow. His friend pulled out the newest All Might comic from his plastic bag.

The pair huddled together, wrapped in a blanket snuggly. Above them, the candles were lit with flickering orange flames on the shelves, and in their hands were flashlights as they read through the pages. The smaller boy was leaning heavily on Katsuki, resting his head on the taller boy’s shoulder. As they flipped through the pages, Katsuki let the other boy teach him words he didn’t recognize.

It was then that Katsuki realized he was falling behind in reading. He could barely pronounce some of the longer, more complicated words without his cheeks pinkening from embarrassment. But his friend was patient and helped him sound out each one.

“Do you like school?” Katsuki asked quietly when they finished the comic. He closed the booklet and turned to look at his friend. “I miss it a lot. I used to be the best in my class, y’know.”

“I like learning,” his friend replied softly. His green eyes stayed trained on the comic cover in front of them. His small finger traced the outline of the cape on the cover. “But my class is full of mean people, and no one really likes me. I would rather stay here with you than go to school.”

Katsuki perked up hearing that word: stay.

“You want to stay here with me?” He echoed.

He turned slightly to his friend with wide eyes, and his heart fluttered like a flock of sparrows. His friend smiled the best he could with his busted lip.

“Of course, I do. You’re my best friend, Kacchan.”

“Then...Then marry me,” Katsuki said suddenly.

His friend reeled back, staring at him baffled and Katsuki hastily turned towards his pillow. He quickly grabbed the two strings and the bundle of flowers. The young blond awkwardly stared at his friend for a moment trying to remember all the stupid, weird things the violinist told him about how to marry someone. Give them flowers, kiss them, and then say something like ‘I do’?

Katsuki cleared his throat and pushed the flowers in the other boy’s face. His friend stared at them like he didn’t understand what was happening.

“What is marry?” The boy with green eyes said, tilting his head.

This time it was Katsuki’s turn to be puzzled. “Marriage, like your parents.”

“Like my parents?” His friend stuttered and blinked rapidly. He shook his head and his un-casted hand nervously pulled at the blanket underneath them. “Kacchan. I don’t know what marriage means.”

“It’s when two people like each other a whole lot. They will get married and have babies,” Katsuki explained slowly. He gestured between them. “Like me and you. We’re the babies our parents had.”

His friend stared at him blankly.

“Don’t your parents kiss and all the junk?” Katsuki questioned slowly. He was surprised to come across a word his best friend didn’t know. Usually, the other boy was such a nerd that he was always shoving new words down Katsuki’s throat. “You know, hand holding, saying ‘I love you’ and being super icky with each other? That’s marriage.”

His friend scrunched his nose. “They don’t do any of that.”

“Well, that’s okay,” Katsuki said, shrugging it off. He cleared his throat again and pushed the flowers into his friend’s hand. “When people are married, they stay together. Forever. They get to spend all their time together.”

“Really?” His friend perked up. “S-So if we get married, I get to spend all my time with Kacchan?”

“Yup!” Katsuki grinned wide. “We can spend all the time in the world together. B-But most importantly it means we always have to be together, okay? It means we always come back to each other—or at least that’s what the old man told me.”

Green eyes sparkled in a way that reminded Katsuki of the glittering night sky.

“I-I like that, Kacchan! How do we get married?”

“We have to wear these rings and kiss to seal the deal,” Katsuki said. “It’ll make it official.”

He scrunched his nose a bit at the end statement. From what the violinist said, everyone who got married kissed after putting rings on each other.

Katsuki held up the fabric rings and told his friend word for word what the violinist had rambled on to him about. The smaller boy nodded, and with every sentence his little smile widened. There was a pink blush on his cheeks as he took in the new concept of ‘marriage’ into his brain that made him giggle and squirm.

His best friend then asked what ‘romance’ was and Katsuki embarrassedly explained. Green eyes grew even bigger at that, and the smaller boy let out a tiny ‘wow’ upon hearing how much two people could love each other.

Katsuki held out his hand for his friend to tie the fabric ring around his finger. The smaller boy was eager. Katsuki watched as he wrapped it twice and tied a bow on it. Then next, his friend held out his hand. Katsuki wrapped it thrice and tied a pretty bow on the top for his friend. The blond boy took the other’s hand in his and they both blushed.

Silence dropped for a second. They looked at each other nervously and scooted in close under the candlelight.

Katsuki gulped as his friend fluttered his eyes closed and pursed his lips. He studied the way his friend’s face flushed pink under the yellow-orange light and the heat in the small nook felt extremely high. Katsuki sucked in a breath and quickly leaned in. They exchanged a quick peck on the lips.

They pulled back and Katsuki was sure he was the color of the sakura blossoms outside. His friend was staring at him with wide eyes, holding onto his hand tightly. There was a new spark in green eyes as he stared at the other boy. A new spark was in red ones too. Katsuki began to wonder if crushes were all that bad anymore.

Katsuki felt himself gradually smile as he looked down at their hands. He liked the way the matching strings on their fingers locked together.

“Now we’re husbands and you always have to come back to me,” Katsuki said. He looked seriously at his best friend. “Alright? You gotta promise.”

His friend nodded eagerly. “Okay, Kacchan. I’ll always come back. I promise.”

“A-And if you want, you could stay here,” Katsuki whispered desperately. He tightened his grip on the smaller hand to the point it made the other boy slightly wince. “I know your big brother is hurting you. If your parents aren’t stopping him, then you should stay here—with me. I won’t ever hurt you. I’ll protect you from all of that.”

“I-I—” The smaller boy stuttered over his lisp. “I don’t know if I can do that. I still have to go to school and stuff and check in—”

“—You don’t even like school,” Katsuki pushed. “You said the other kids are mean to you. Then your brother broke your arm. Why not just stay with me?”

Katsuki looked at his friend with a new light in his eye. His mom wasn’t here but he had a new person—this person. This sweet, kind person with beautiful green eyes. He gave a lopsided smile that was hinged purely on hope as he continued to explain.

“My mom isn’t coming back. I don’t think she is any more,” Katsuki said finally.

His chest hurt and it felt like a nail was being driven into his sternum at the admission. He didn’t like the fact, but it was a reality he had to accept. She missed his birthday, and if that was any indicator, then that meant he was alone. He saw that ghost visual of his mother smiling fading in his mind. Her red eyes were dull, and the smile was no more. The phantom of her disappeared into the background with the thick crowd of Tokyo never to be seen again.

His best friend looked at him sadly.

“I think she’s dead—or she forgot about me,” Katsuki finished. He cusped the smaller hand between his and nodded devotedly. “But since we’re married now, we could move away. The two of us. We could find another empty building and live in it together, somewhere warm where we don’t have to worry about the winter. We can be happy and married.”

“Really?” His friend whispered. He stared at Katsuki with an inkling of hope. He leaned in and this near Katsuki could see all those horrible scratches, cuts, and bruises on his skin. “J-Just the two of us?”

“Mhm,” Katsuki confirmed with a hum. He beamed at the spark of his future shifting to something brighter. “We have to prepare. If you could, we should save up more money and clothes. Get those big suitcases the grown-ups always have. The fancy ones with wheels.”

“I can do that,” His friend nodded. “I-It might take a while for me to get lots of money, but we can start to save it!”

Katsuki grinned wide and the tears caught on the rims of his eyes.

His friend laughed happily, and small tears formed in his eyes as they held hands in the tiny nook.

The rest of the spring went on without another incident.

The boy with green eyes came back every day much to Katsuki's delight. Then the violinist was overjoyed when they told him they got married. The elder man had laughed and chuckled so hard Katsuki was sure one of his loose teeth was going to fly out. He played The Dance of The Love Birds for them in the plaza as the two boys danced under the forgotten statue of the angel above.

Every day his best friend brought a tiny handful of yen. It wasn't much, but it was something.

They stocked up clothes and food in the tiny nook along with comics as the small area began to look like a home. There was part of Katsuki that didn't want to part with it, but if it meant he and his best friend would be away from that stupid big brother, then so be it. They would find a better home with maybe even a bigger room.

The two young boys watched the changing seasons go by easily. The bright spring blossomed into a vibrant summer, and everything was faultless to young Katsuki.

They celebrated his best friend's birthday in the plaza happily. They didn't want to make the mistake of what they did on Katsuki's birthday.

The violinist used some of the yen he got from his street performances to buy them a chocolate cake, birthday hats, and pretty sparklers. All three of them sat in the plaza under the statue of the angel eating the dessert and singing happy birthday for his best friend. Katsuki learned that day, his friend apparently didn't celebrate his birthday. It wasn't something his family did.

The mere thought of that made Katsuki upset because what type of parents did his friend have?

But whenever he asked, his best friend grew quiet about it.

So, Katsuki avoided asking. He wanted them to stay happy and smiling. They had a whole future together and stupid parents were no longer going to be a problem. He held his best friend's hand with visions of their future dancing around in his head that year.

If this was marriage, Katsuki loved it. Especially when pretty green eyes would stare at him, and his best friend would give him a peck on the cheek.

Soon after that, vibrant summer fell into crisp autumn.

His best friend's arm eventually healed and Katsuki felt like they almost had enough money to buy several train tickets to go far away. They picked out a place one day with the map Katsuki had stolen from one of the 7/11s nearby. In his room that night, the two boys settled for a random town that was far south.

It looked far away enough that it would be sunny, awesome, and right near beaches. Naga, Okinawa. He had no clue how they'd get there, but with just the two of them, they would.

“I'm so excited to go live in the sunny place!” His friend said brightly after daydreaming about their escape.

Katsuki was too. The Sunny Place was going to their safe spot, and no long would winter eat away at him. Katsuki contemplated if he could get a job and he could take care of his friend to repay him for all the kindness he bestowed on him.

They set a date to leave right when crisp autumn would shiver into winter.

It had almost been a full year without his mother now, and Katsuki had stopped searching for her when the first snowfall happened.

He no longer went to her favorite store. No longer wandered by her favorite park. He avoided all her favorite restaurants and focused solely on his best friend. He forced all his thoughts to stay on track towards the new future he was building because if he strayed too long on his mother—he worried.

In recent days, he had settled on the notion she had died.

Part of him leaned towards this theory to spare his feelings, even though it hurt about the same. His imagination was cruel, and he could vividly see her in a ditch somewhere and forgotten. Even in his mind he could smell the rotten flesh and picture how her eyes were rolled back and sunken. When he thought about her too long, he could see her decaying away.

So, he avoided searching for her anymore. He couldn’t think about her without feeling nauseous.

But he had his new husband and his new husband had him.

However, two days before they were supposed to leave, things flipped upside down.

His best friend had come to the nook that night with excitement in his pretty green eyes. He was holding a poster that had colorful letterings and pictures on it. It had pretty people dressed in bright clothes jumping through hoops and a lion on the front.

“Kacchan! There’s a carnival in town!” His friend exclaimed. He grinned wide and held up the poster close to the blond boy’s face. “Th-There’s going to be big roller coasters and a Ferris wheel and everything! But the best part is that it’s free!”

Katsuki took the poster from his friend’s hand and scrutinized the paper. “A carnival? A real one?”

“Mhm! You said you always wanted to go to one!” His friend cheered. He jumped up and down on the mess of blankets and pillows. “We can go to the carnival, have fun and then come back here right before bedtime. Th-There’s even going to an All Might guy there, and he can sign our comics for us!”

Katsuki perked up. “All Might? What?!”

His best friend nodded furiously with his gapped teeth. “Yes! We could see All Might, Kacchan. All Might!”

Katsuki looked up at the big poster on the side of the wall in his small makeshift room. He saw the tall figure posed with his hands on his hips and his cape in the wind. Katsuki sucked in an excited breath and looked at his best friend with a toothy grin.

“Okay! Let’s go to it. I always wanted to go to a carnival!”

The day came for the carnival and Katsuki hummed his favorite song to himself.

He sang all the high notes and low swings in The Dance of the Love Birds. By now, he memorized the melody by heart. He was sure his best friend knew it by heart too.

Katsuki got dressed that evening, thinking happily about how he was finally doing all the things his mom promised they would do. First his best friend took him to Saitama and now they were going to a carnival. He blissfully daydreamed about where else he and his new husband would go.

He organized all his stuff and took a good look around the nook.

A pang of sullenness settled into him as he stared around at his makeshift home. He had a bundle of good memories here, even if they were attached at the root to the pain of being left by his mother. He thought about the violinist in the plaza and how he would even miss that looney old man.

Katsuki glanced at the red suitcase that was thrown off in the corner with his stuff stacked high on top.

His best friend had brought the bag for him to start packing his things. Katsuki had tried, but he didn’t quite want to yet. He was admittedly attached to this dusty old place. He would miss the coziness. He would miss the routine like someone who had gotten used to the poison they were spoon fed. He knew it was not the best way of living, but it was the only stability he had since his mom left him.

Uprooting that gave him unsolicited fear. The only thought that gave Katsuki any peace was looking forward to living with his best friend.

He figured tomorrow they could pack up the nook together just like they had built it together. It would be a fitting way to start their new journey.

Katsuki zipped up his winter jacket that was slightly too tight now and put on his boots. He wrapped himself up in his winter gear as he prepared to go meet his best friend at the carnival. He fiddled with his gloves that were becoming too small as he wandered out into the winter air.

He eagerly walked towards where the carnival was, and it was easy to find.

Loads of people were dressed in their winter clothes happily chatting and talking with one another. Their breaths were like little clouds in the chilly air. The loud sound of distant upbeat music echoed into Katsuki's ears as he drew closer. He could even hear clapping in one direction and cheering from another. The smell of buttery burnt popcorn and sweet carnival food wafted into his nose. He smiled happily as all the families were floating in and out and what looked to be groups of teenagers were all walking to the entrance.

Katsuki found himself waiting there, under the colorful candy cane colored arch.

On the large sign it read 'Japan Traveling Carnival Park' in bright, pink neon colors. The 'C' on the sign flickered and he could hear that electric buzz above him. From where he was, Katsuki could perfectly view the large Ferris wheel and all the fun rides. He grew excited in anticipation as he could hear all the screams and laughter. He smiled as he waited for his best friend to come.

He waited for a while.

Then he waited some more.

Katsuki wearily looked around for a bundle of pretty curly hair. He awkwardly glanced down at the little red watch his friend had gotten him. It was past the time they had said they would meet up. But it was okay. They were married so Katsuki didn't have too much fear about not seeing his best friend. Even if something happened, they would always come back to each other.

Then suddenly a big hand reached out and grabbed him by his arm and forced him to turn around.

Katsuki was about to yell, startled but stopped. His voice ran dry like a barren river at the sight of blonde hair and red eyes that matched his. His heart stopped.

"M-Mom?" He whispered. The word was heavy on his tongue.

Mom. It was his mom.

"Hi, sweetie," she said. "I'm back. I'm so sorry that it took so long."

Katsuki's throat clammed up instantly from shock.

Red eyes and blonde hair. Red eyes and blonde hair looking at him like a mirror. Katsuki struggled to make sense of what he was seeing as his eyes started prickling. Gradually, the sounds of the crowd increased in volume in sync with his erratic heart. All the cheering, screaming, and overpowering smells were no longer exciting. Now all the stimulation was drowning out his senses as he started hyperventilating.

The visual of her dead in a ditch with her eyes rotting was now gone.

She was alive.

She had been alive this damn whole time.

Katsuki's heart tugged between relief and anger.

"M-Mom. W-What—" What the hell did he even say?

He suddenly heard the sound of a giggle similar to his best friend's and snapped back to his right mind. His head started pounding furiously as he looked around frantically. His best friend. Hi-His best friend. He had to find him first.

Where was he?

Katsuki eyed his mother like she was a ghost. He couldn't do this now; his best friend was going to be waiting for him and they were supposed to go away together—why was this happening now? Why did she have to come back when he figured it all out? Why did she leave him? Why didn't she love him enough like his best friend did? Why, why, why—

"Katsuki? Katsuki, what's wrong?" His mom asked as if she hadn't been missing for a year.

Katsuki shook his head furiously. He snatched his arm away from her in horror and stepped back like her touch burned. He stared with mixed fury and sadness at her yet at the same time he wanted to embrace her.

He didn't know if he wanted to scream or cry—so he did neither.

Gridlocked in a state of confusion in his mind, Katsuki silently gawked at her through watery eyes. Suddenly the happy carnival sounds mimicked buzzing wasps stinging into him and all he wanted was to go back to nook and hide away.

"Katsuki, sweetie, I'm so sorry. I didn't mean to leave you that long," Mitsuki said softly.

She kneeled down and touched his face. He flinched automatically, unsure if he liked it. She let out a sigh and then apologetically cupped his hands.

Katsuki looked at her clothes. Her nice fucking clothes. She even somehow smelled like fancy perfume. Her white sweater was clean, and her earrings and necklace were made of shiny pearls. Her purple coat looked soft to the touch and her hat was fuzzy.

Katsuki looked down at his clothes that were a size too small.

She had left him—this whole time. She had really left him.

His face crumbled and he sobbed.

In the midst of his racing mind, his mother pulled him into an embrace. Familiar warmth wrapped around him, and he hesitantly hugged her back. He gripped onto her as he flashbacked on all the times he had wandered out in the city looking for her. He thought about the endless nights he wished she was safe. And she was. She was alive and smelled like rich perfume.

He hugged her tighter and all his tears busted through like a floodgate.

“M-Mom, I missed you,” Katsuki rasped out as he cried. “Why did you leave me here?”

“I know baby, I know, I’m so sorry,” Mitsuki hushed sorrowfully. She gently cradled him and carded her hands through his tangled hair. “I didn’t mean to. I thought it would be quicker, but it’s all better now, okay? I got a place for us. You even have your own room—but we have to go now. W-We can’t stay here too long.”

Katsuki pulled back, confused. “A house?” A room? “W-We have to leave now?”

Mitsuki gave a strained, urgent smile and nodded. “Yup!” She stood up and forcefully grabbed his hand. Before Katsuki could process it, she was dragging him along in the dense crowd. “But we have to go now, baby—”

“—Wait,” Katsuki said frantically. He planted his feet and yanked his arm back. Both of their bodies jerked and Mitsuki frowned in disapproval. “I-I have a friend. We were supposed to leave for Okinawa together.”

“Okinawa?” She stared at him like he was crazy. “Leave together? Katsuki, wh-what? You were going to leave when I told you not to go anywhere? With a stranger?”

“You left me!” He hissed in defense and yanked his hand back and hugged it to his pounding chest. “Y-You left me. I thought you died like dad did!”

This time Mitsuki’s face softened.

“But I’m here now, sweetie.” She kneeled down again and gazed into her son’s angry, burning eyes. She touched his tear-stained cheer with desperation as she tried her best to calm him down. “You don’t have to worry about all that anymore, but we have to go. And we have to go now otherwise we’re not going to make it to the nice house and everything.”

Katsuki wearily looked over his shoulder in the dense crowd. He searched for green eyes. Pretty, green, unique eyes. He wearily eyed the time and how it was almost an hour past when they said they were supposed to meet up.

He looked at his mom with apprehensive eyes. “C-Can my best friend come live with us?”

“Who, sweetie?”

“Izuku,” Katsuki said softly. He kept searching but didn’t see the curly head of hair he wanted. “He’s m-my best friend and the same age. He’s meeting me here. We were going to go to the carnival together.”

Mitsuki bit her lip and looked over her shoulder. “O-Okay, we can wait but not for too long, alright? If we don’t see him soon, we can come back and get him.”

Katsuki nodded as they started looking into the crowd.

But with each passing figure, Katsuki’s heart hummed in disappointment. Nobody had green eyes or curly hair.

He glanced at his mom as they waited. She smiled back at him and gently held his hand. It almost didn't feel real. He expected her to be a vivid hallucination and phase through him. But she never did. She gave him a loving kiss on the forehead and detangled his spikes as they waited for his best friend. As she doted on him, slowly all his anger dissolved.

She was here.

She was safe and even though she came back a year later—she did come back. He hesitantly grasped her hand and they waited there. He thought it was strange how his mom looked over her shoulder every few minutes, skittish. At first, he assumed she was keeping her eyes peeled for his friend when Katsuki described to her what he looked like.

But then it became clear she was watching out for someone else.

Another hour passed, making his best friend two hours late.

His mom was officially past antsy.

"O-Okay, Katsuki. We need to leave, otherwise something bad might happen," Mitsuki said a little forcefully. She checked her shiny watch and Katsuki's heart dropped. "We can come back tomorrow and look for your friend, alright? But you have to come with me now."

She stood up and reached out her hand towards him to follow.

Katsuki looked over his shoulder one last time.

Katsuki worried as he thought about his best friend's old, bandaged eye and broken arm. He thought about all those ugly scrapes and bruises that littered his skin. He then realized that they were leaving in two days—but if his mom was here, then maybe she could take them both in. Right? They could share a room and now they had a grown-up to help them. Maybe they didn't need to go all the way to Okinawa.

"Promise we'll come back for Izuku?" He asked in a shaky voice, feeling torn. "H-He needs me too, mom. His brother beats him up."

Mitsuki smiled reassuringly at him. "We'll come back for him. I promise."

Katsuki nodded and grabbed her hand because he believed her.

That was the last time Katsuki believed her and the first of many promises his mother broke.

They didn't go back for his best friend and it shattered Katsuki's heart in a million pieces.

When his mother finished whisking him away to another part of the country, she didn't listen to a word he said. She kept saying it was dangerous to go back to Tokyo. Bad men were looking for her and lurking about, but Katsuki didn't fucking care.

All he cared about was his best friend and how the smaller boy was somewhere possibly worried about him. She told him the other boy would be fine without him and that he had a family that clearly cared for him. Brothers fought all the time and that a broken bone or busted lip was nothing to cause alarm. She kept trying to explain to Katsuki that she couldn't take another child away from a home when she already was trying her best to keep them together.

Katsuki shook his head at the explanation. He frantically explained to his mother that he and his friend were married and that meant they were supposed to always come back for each other. He lifted his hand to show her the string on his finger—and all the color drained from her face.

Mitsuki was mortified to hear Katsuki say such a thing.

She told him that they were kids. They were only playing make believe and that they weren't really married. Katsuki tried to dismiss her and say she was wrong, but she kept repeating it wasn't real. It wasn't real. It wasn't real.

The words harpooned a section of his young heart that Katsuki didn't expect it to. Hearing that their marriage wasn't authentic was like standing on a glass floor and having it shatter underneath his feet. He felt like he was left free falling as sharp shards cut into him.

Katsuki had a visceral reaction.

He lashed out harshly with curses, yells and he broke everything he could touch out of spite. Mitsuki tried to wrestle him into calming down as he sobbed from the sudden separation in a full-blown tantrum.

After that, his mother kept him inside for a long time. Katsuki cried harshly on the floor of the new home his mother caged him inside of. She didn't enroll him in school right away, saying that things needed time to 'cool off' before they could go back to normal. But Katsuki didn't know what the fuck normal was anymore.

Normal for him had been painful hunger.

Normal for him was having body odor bad enough that other people in the streets avoided him.

Normal for him was sleeping in that dark nook hoping the rats didn't get into his food.

Normal for him had been green eyes, a little yellow watch and a kind boy who tucked him in every night.

The searing pain of separation broke through him when he realized he would have none of those things anymore. No violin music. No looney old man to tell him jokes and rant about the stars, fate, and love. No more green eyes. He was torn in a way he never thought he would be. He finally had his mom back—but why couldn't he have his best friend too?

Katsuki gritted his teeth as he looked around at his new normal.

It was a sterile, white apartment. The space was tiny, smaller than the house they lived in with his dad, but it was big enough for two people—maybe even three. His room was decorated in all the All Might things he could imagine with a nice twin sized bed on it.

It was everything Katsuki starved for on his hungriest days.

But somehow it didn't ease the hurt that was crushing him from the inside out.

The years passed and his mother kept him under a tight, watchful eye.

She was now mother of the year suddenly. It reminded him of the days his dad was alive.

She smiled, cooked, and went to work like a functional person. She made it a point to drop him off at school every day and pick him up. She forcefully enrolled him in afterschool activities to keep him out of trouble when Katsuki started showing signs of aggression in class.

Then when she learned the aggression stemmed from kids making fun of his reading level, she hired a private tutor on weekends to get him up to speed on the year of schooling he missed.

But despite all this, the older he grew, Katsuki's naivety melted away.

He found out quickly that his mother wasn't supposed to have kept him back when he was seven. She was legally ordered to hand him over to Child Protective Services after being deemed as unfit to raise a child.

She told him the bullshit reason that she left him in that alley was to spin a lie that he ran away. This way, CPS would stop thinking she was still keeping him. She said eventually they gave up, and that was when she came back for him.

There was more to the story though, Katsuki figured.

He dully listened to her when she spun the intricate webs of her excuse. Despite his mother's best efforts to be believable, he could see the holes in her web glaring at him.

Many questions remained unanswered. Such as, where did she go? Who had she been with? Where did she get all the money from to suddenly put them in the countryside? And finally, why had she lost custody of him in the first place?

All these were tiny details his mother never elaborated on, but Katsuki would come to find them out later in life.

She begged for his forgiveness and the opportunity for them to start over. She even begged for him to forget the boy with green eyes.

But at that young age, he couldn't.

When he was eight and nine, Katsuki could only think about his best friend.

He imagined going back to Tokyo and tried to find a way to sneak out—but it was impossible. His mother was like a hawk and getting around her was not easy.

At the age of nine, he told some kids at school he was married during White Day and faced the humiliation of everyone in his class laughing at him. They poked fun at the dirty string on his finger and called him names to the point Katsuki lashed out again.

He beat a kid up so badly his mother was called, and he was suspended.

After that incident, his mother forced him to take off his ring and throw it away. She told him no more mentions of marriage and that he was going to stop playing pretend right that instant. It cut so deeply that Katsuki grew bitter at the mention of anything about marriage.

It was useless and it didn't work.

He was without his best friend and no one understood that he had to go back to him.

He hated the mention of anything related to romance after that.

When he was ten, Katsuki became a loner.

He shot up in his class rankings and his teachers deemed him a bright, promising pupil. Every single one of his teachers doted over him even though he leaned with an interest in music. Specifically, the violin.

Whenever he heard those melodic chords, he thought about what the violinist said about whenever he played that song, his wife was with him. Now, whenever Katsuki heard classical music, his friend was with him.

So, he listened to it all the time.

When he was eleven, Katsuki learned his mom slept around with the dads in his class.

He had been waiting outside the school for his mom to get him when a group of extras in his year approached him. He didn't know a single damn one of their names and didn't give a shit to learn. They came up to him jeeringly and used words like 'slut', 'whore', and 'homewrecker' to describe his mom.

One of them mentioned that she deserved to get beat up until she had several broken bones. They all gathered around him, called him street trash, and pointed out his worn down clothes. Seeing those extras point their fingers in his face snapped something violent inside of Katsuki.

Without fail, he found himself lashing out again.

This time it was worse than the outbreaks before. He aggressively wrestled down a boy on the concrete and landed furious punches into his face until there was a sickening crack of a broken nose and jaw.

By the time his mom pulled up to the school that day, it had been a bloodied, hectic mess.

But when they got home, he told her what was said. She froze and stared at him, surprised.

She didn't reprimand him.

His mother quietly iced his bruised knuckles and told him he didn't do anything wrong. Sometimes people deserved to get punched in the mouth. She only critiqued how he went about it: next time, if he was going to humble someone, he should do it in a way that he didn't get in trouble.

Katsuki took that lesson to heart.

The next person that year who spoke ill of his mother found themselves missing teeth, but he was smart enough not to do it at school.

After that, not a damn soul messed with him again.

When Katsuki was twelve, he found himself distantly missing having a best friend.

He thought about green eyes a lot and birthdays.

Every year, his mom threw him a lavish birthday party with the two of them since he didn't have any close friends. She bought the biggest cakes and all the comics he could dream of. They sang happy birthday, but at this age he wished he had other friends. However, the extras at his school were too annoying.

On his twelfth birthday, his mom bought him a musical composition book. He had privately told her he wanted to be one of those people who wrote for fancy orchestras. He didn't mention the looney violinist who was his inspiration, keeping that part to himself.

She was thrilled and leaned into his classical music love eagerly. She bought an old vinyl player and gathered classical records for him.

Every day she came home with a new one and Katsuki happily listened.

Now every time Katsuki heard a new song with violins, he thought about the boy with green eyes.

He sadly wondered if the boy still didn't have birthday celebrations.

When Katsuki turned thirteen his mother started slipping back into her old ways.

The first crack in her perfect mom demeanor happened suddenly.

She stopped picking him up from school without notice.

Katsuki had waited there for what seemed like an eternity with his heavy schoolbooks. As everyone else went home, it felt a little too familiar. He knew it was just fucking school but that didn't stop the dull ache of abandonment from creeping back on him.

The fear of being left alone again loomed closely behind him like his shadow that evening as he walked home.

It took over an hour to make it to the apartment.

When he had gotten home, she was laid up on their couch with one of his classmate's dads. He recognized the man with salt and pepper hair, who was definitely married. Or maybe he was going through a divorce now. Katsuki truthfully didn't fucking know or care. The young blond's presence wasn't acknowledged as the adults giggled on the couch with glasses full of red wine.

Katsuki bitterly wandered into his room and slammed the door that day.

His mother apologized the next morning and told him that he was big enough to walk to and from school.

So, Katsuki had to start getting up an hour earlier to get to class on time.

The next crack in her perfect mom act came with her absence from home that year.

Unexpectedly, Katsuki found himself alone at home in the mornings, or at nights. And if his mom was home, she had men over who played card games a little too enthusiastically. He learned it was called 'poker' from one of the gruff looking men with a cigar.

A guy with a scar over his eye blew smoke in Katsuki's face as he explained the game.

"You're old enough to know what the fuck gambling is kid!" The man chuckled. Mitsuki laughed too and took a swig of her red wine. Her cheeks were rosy as she looked gleefully at the cards in her hand. "It's fun as hell, boy. You should give it a try."

"No thanks." Katsuki waved his hand to waft away the smoke and scowled. "I'll be in my room if you need me, mom."

"Of course, Katsuki. Have a good night, sweetie!"

He saw his mom lose a lot of money that day and every day she played poker. The greedy men walked in their apartment and left with their cash and the stench of cigars stuck to the walls.

Shortly after this new habit, the number of groceries they had dwindled. They grew thinner and thinner with each month until the only thing in the house was instant noodles and spoiled milk.

His mom made up the excuse that work was paying her less, but Katsuki didn't believe it.

After a while, Katsuki couldn't tell if the hollowness in his core was from loneliness or hunger anymore. His fear of abandonment was looming behind him like his shadow, latched on and whispering insecurities in his ear.

"The problem is you," his self doubt murmured. "You're just not good enough a son for her to be a good mom for."

"She's going to leave you," his anxiety muttered. "One day you'll wake up and be by yourself again."

"You're unlovable," his self-hatred stated bluntly. "Who could ever love someone like you?"

The whispers in his head grew louder everyday.

Then the final crack of her perfect mom act happened when she disappeared for four days. Directly on the anniversary of his dad's death.

The first day Katsuki freaked out. He had gone door to door looking for his mom until sun down. He drew a shabby picture of her to make sure people knew what she looked like. His eyes were slightly crazed, and he gritted his teeth to prevent himself from crying. With every new face he encountered, he was given a sad head shake when he asked if they had seen her.

It made him spiral slightly, alone in that sterile apartment by himself.

He began worrying about things like the bills and the food—were the lights even paid?

What if they were thrown out into the streets again? What if he was going to be left alone in the goddamn cold once more? What if this time he actually got frostbite and died because there would be no boy with green eyes—

Katsuki slept in his closet those nights alone to calm down. The tight space gave him some level of comfort and familiarity.

Then when his mom did come back, she reeked like alcohol and was crying profusely.

She busted through the door on the third night of her absence, nearly terrifying Katsuki. He had whirled towards the door ready to defend himself from an intruder, but instead there was his mother, soaking wet from the rain, sobbing.

Her knees gave out and Katsuki rushed to catch her. She collapsed in his arms and clutched onto him while weeping.

"Masaru," she sobbed. Her voice was hoarse as her nails sunk into him. "My Masaru is never coming back…is he?"

Katsuki froze.

He gazed down at his crying mother in his arms and she looked up at him with the most broken-hearted expression he had never seen. There was a deep woefulness that Katsuki had only seen the violinist have in his eyes when he thought of his late wife. It was uncanny how identical his mother's eyes were to that old man's now.

Suddenly, what his dad said about his mother needing him clicked.

The gears in his head turned when he realized his dad probably knew about his mother's instability with money. He thought back on it, and he remembered how his mother never did work originally. His dad took care of mostly everything as they lived a plush life. Now he was gone, and his mother was struggling to stay afloat.

His dad had been passing him the torch.

Later that evening, Katsuki settled into his role as an emotional support system and pushed down all his own feelings.

Mitsuki began emotionally unloading on him about his dad, wishing that he was here to help her. As Katsuki listened, it felt like she was handing him heavy boulder after heavy boulder as he took on all her anguish.

She let it all spill out: the money problems, her gambling addiction and how she had been off on a gambling spree when he was seven. She even talked about how his dad tried to satisfy her addiction by working extra shifts all the time to keep them afloat.

With each new bit of information, Katsuki felt as though his feet were sinking into quicksand. He realized how dire their situation could and would inevitably become.

He stayed up all night with her as she cried on his shoulder. Then when the clock struck midnight, she revealed the single photo she had of the three of them. It was when Katsuki was at least five, and the sun was shining bright. He was sitting on both of his parent's shoulders, reaching high for the sky. They all looked so happy and perfect together.

His mother gave the photograph to Katsuki with a look of motherly love.

"You should have this," Mitsuki said with a weak smile. "This is the only photograph of your father I have left. Hah. Now that I say that out loud, I realized how badly I fucked up. I-I'm sorry for all of this, Katsuki. You deserve better. I'll try to be better again."

It was an empty promise because Katsuki realized she couldn't do better—even if she wanted to.

His mom wiped her tears, not his, and gave him a slack hug before hiding away in her room. That night, Katsuki laid awake in his room and through the walls he could hear her crying.

With a heavy heart, thirteen-year-old Katsuki realized he needed to grow up quicker.

He made the connection that all of his pain stemmed from expecting his mother to take care of him. And the only way to make his pain end was to stop expecting her to. Because at the end of the day, she needed him, not the other way around.

The epiphany made an old, rustic pain resurface.

He glanced up at his All Might posters with a dull feeling. Suddenly all the cravings for the newest toys, games and comics felt silly. It was childish, something he could no longer be if he wanted to survive.

But before Katsuki could let his childhood go, a scratch at the back of his head that year was digging into him to answer an unknown question.

One particular day in summer rolled around that year and Katsuki found himself skipping school.

July 15th.

His mom had gone off to work and instead of walking to school, Katsuki walked to the train station. He had money from writing some extra's papers for them. It was exactly enough yen to cover a handful of train rides with no issue.

That morning, Katsuki took three trains that spanned most of the day all the way to Tokyo.

When he stepped off the train that morning, he found himself in a city he barely recognized. The bright neon lights felt brighter and somehow the crowd felt denser. Or maybe possibly he felt more alone.

Over the last five years, things had clearly shifted around. He weaved through the winding crowds and streets like he was navigating a misplaced memory. Sometimes he got the direction right when he recognized a place he used to know. Then other times he felt stuck and lost when he had a clue where he was. It took him nearly an hour to navigate his way back to that lone, forgotten alley where he used to sleep.

When he did find it, no homeless people were gathered.

Instead, frivolous little jewelry stores had been put up. The whole area was bright, commercial, and neon. Weird pop music he never heard played as he looked at the strange new sight. The plaza was fixed up and the cracked forgotten statue of the angel was no longer there—and neither was the violinist. The fountain was running now, nearly overflowing with precious water. Tiny children threw pennies inside and made wishes out loud as he stayed there frozen in shock.

Katsuki felt like a phantom haunting this place.

He sat on the wooden bench where he first met the boy with green eyes with. Scarlet eyes glanced around like the creature of habit he was. He searched for pretty dark curls fruitlessly, feeling silly. He stared pitifully, hoping to see that boy run around the corner.

"Kacchan! I'm here now!" His imagination supplied for him.

He felt himself crumble slightly knowing that voice would probably only ever be in his head now. When two boys playing tag passed him, Katsuki gritted his teeth and got up from the bench.

His heart was beating out of his control as he walked toward where he knew the abandoned church to be. The path was easy to find, he simply followed the cracked and neglected sidewalk to get there. When he came upon his old home, his feet stayed rooted in place.

It was untouched.

It sat there, weathered more by the five brutal years that had passed. The rustic cross on top was broken now, and it seemed like this building was the only piece of his past that remained. Slowly Katsuki followed the pulling in his chest and tried to steady his rocky emotions.

Melancholy, regret, and hurt danced in harmony inside of his chest to make Katsuki a perfect sonata of sadness. It was painful to gaze upon the abandoned building that held so many precious memories.

He walked around the back and pulled back that one wooden board to see the crawl space they used to use. He hunched down to see if possibly he could fit, and when he couldn't the anger swirling inside of him rose.

Katsuki used his foot to kick open the tiny hole and widened it. Pieces of wood flew all over as he let all his unchecked aggression spill into the motion. He kicked and kicked until the weak wood gave under his weight. Katsuki choked back a sob and blinked back burning tears that he didn't quite understand as he forced himself an entrance.

When it was large enough for his new, awkward teenage body, Katsuki hunched down. He found himself crawling in as his body moved like he was possessed.

He stumbled inside, and stood in the same spot he had years ago. He looked up at the stained-glass windows that were now dingier. The sparkling rays of light were duller now as they casted specs of purple, blue, and green onto his sullen face. They no longer shone with the same wonderous glow and in a way, now it felt sad. He eyed all the forgotten, beautiful windows. Especially the large circular one sitting dead center.

Katsuki walked down that dark aisle to the nook in the back. He easily found the small door under the stairs cracked open. He reached for the door but was halted by his memories. He heard all the laughs and giggles that once used to be his favorite sound coming from inside.

"You're my favorite person, Kacchan," his memory whispered. "My favorite person in the whole world. I hope we can be friends forever."

Katsuki made a pained face as he forced himself to reach for the cold metallic handle. He opened the nook slowly; the pain in his chest tripled as he eventually fell to his knees. He made a raw expression when the door was opened all the way and he could see inside the forgotten bit of his childhood.

Sitting inside were all his old things, covered with the dust of neglect.

It was perfectly positioned with how he left it. Suitcase in the corner. Clothes folded and ready to be packed. Messy blankets were everywhere. His All Might figurine was placed next to melted down candles.

Katsuki crawled inside. When he was fully in his old spot, his heart squeezed under all the regret he held as a naïve child who believed his mother's word. He sat there cross legged for a while, knees touching either side of the nook. His head almost hit the top and his bones were aching slightly at the awkward positioning.

Katsuki hated how he was too big; he didn't remember growing up or even feeling it. Yet here he was, larger and now he could no longer afford to be the same child—if he ever was one.

Scarlet eyes looked down where his pillow was and sitting there was a small note, also covered in dust.

He picked up the small, white paper with trembling hands. He read the single line on it that was written in shaky handwriting. He read it over and over until the final bit of his emotions were overcome with agony.

"I love you, Kacchan. Please come back."

With only those two sentences, Katsuki's delicate emotions were crushed, and he wept.

He cried like his soul needed to expel all the heavy emotions weighing him down.

He read the note over and over again, paralyzed in that spot for the rest of the day.

He studied the nook that held his childhood that year and all the posters that were poorly taped up. He wept harder when he stared at the suitcase and wondered about what could've been. He wondered what would've happened if his mother hadn't found him. He wondered what would have happened if his friend had come on time that day.

Would they still be friends? Would they still be happy? Would they have stayed together?

But worst of all, Katsuki wondered how long his forgotten friend had waited for him to come back.

He pictured the tiny boy with green eyes patiently waiting for him until he too outgrew this nook. He imagined an older version of the boy woefully giving up. He could vividly picture the kindness in those viridian irises draining like someone was sucking poison out. His once savior probably casted away the compassion from his body to prevent himself from being disappointed ever again.

He wondered where he was, and if he was alright. The guilt chewed at Katsuki, thinking about the broken bones and bruises. How he had just left. There was nothing he could do but hope the boy was safe, and had gone far away from that big brother of his.

But that's all Katsuki could do—hope.

Katsuki pocketed the note as he dried his tears. He coiled up on the dirty blankets beneath him and stared up at the cobwebs on the ceiling. His body was too heavy to move as he allowed himself to lay there and truly feel emotions for the first time since he was eight.

He softly hummed the melody of The Dance of the Love Birds as he laid there, head full of the boy with green eyes.

"Happy birthday," Katsuki whispered to the childhood ghost.

He could see a transparent visual of the boy with green eyes in the nook laying with him. The boy smiled brightly and sweetly called him 'Kacchan.' He imagined his friend tucking him in one last time, giving him that caring kiss on the cheek before exiting the nook with a sad smile.

"Goodbye, Kacchan."

"…Goodbye."

That was the last time Katsuki ever allowed himself to cry.

He boxed up his emotions along with the notion of being a child.

On the train ride back home, Katsuki concluded that the small, year-long interlude of his life was a happy blip. A mistake in the divine plan that was not meant for someone like him.

The years following that were filled with a type of sorrow Katsuki would come to know as his real home. Looking back on that year was both happily blissful and scorchingly painful. The parts that evoked hurt felt like venom in his veins to think about. The bruises. The broken bones. His mother's lying. The guilt of leaving. It all added up until it crushed him under a landslide of self-hate.

However, the blissful parts were nice. Whenever the dreary days weighed too much on his soul, he thought of the boy with green eyes and those nice pieces of his childhood. Those days were bright, joyful and gave him something to peacefully dream about.

But most of all, it was the only proof Katsuki had that someone loved him at one point.

He wished one day he had the opportunity to say it back. His only desperate wish was to let the boy with kind eyes know how thankful he was.

However, that moment never came, and Katsuki never got his wish.

Now, whenever he looks back on that year, it stings in a bittersweet way. To stop the past from hurting, Katsuki locked it up tight. He shoved all the good and bad in a volt in the back of his mind where it was safe out of reach.

It all nearly felt like a dream, until it became one.

Chapter End Notes

Please let me know what you think below! Mainly because I think this was my favorite chapter to write thus far. All thoughts, theories, screams, cries are welcome.

This chapter super satisfying for me because I've been super excited to get into both of their backstories. We're getting a bit more ramp up to where the plot is going and their dynamic. ☺💚🧡 Thanks so much for reading!

Chapter 7: Andante

Chapter Summary

Andante (tempo): In a walking tempo, moderately slow.

Chapter Notes

Hello and welcome back to everyone's favorite hitmen husbands!

First, thank you so much for 1000 kudos on this fic! I'm having a ton of fun with it. I love crime AUs a little too much so this is a delight you all are enjoying it as well! Next up, thank you to my moon and stars, LunaToons on AO3 for betaing and giving feedback like always! She's amazing.

Lastly, let's assume as a group Peter Moore doesn't have bugs/cameras around the hotel area. In my mind, he's a tricky criminal who is super careful. The hotel is a real business and has to pass regulations and random checks. With the high influx of visitors he gets he's not going to risk someone finding private cameras in the room and getting his business shut down. He uses the hotel more so to lure people in like flies to honey so he can then kidnap them off the premises. Such as on Ie Island (where his headquarters is) or in the Tanbaru Forest. This way no alarms/connections are directly brought to him.

Okay! Enjoy the chapter.

Katsuki was roused awake by the gentle sun. It touched his face lightly in the bright pink tent, warming his skin as he fluttered his eyes open. The lingering weight of nostalgia weighed down on his memory and left him wading in a mental state of limbo.

The only two things in the forefront of his mind were green eyes and curly, dark hair. He could see the blurry faced boy of his past, and he longed to uncover the rest of the phantom vision that haunted his mind.

Katsuki shifted in the sleeping bag, sitting up with a dazed expression. His eyes were hazily unfocused on the world around him. Truthfully, he didn't even feel like he was in the Yanbaru forest. His mind was partially trapped in his memories, like he was still exiting a portal from another realm. Mentally, he had one foot in Tokyo and the other in Okinawa. The side of him still existing in Tokyo had phantom hands pulling on him, tugging and aching for him to return.

He could perfectly see the ghostly visual of the boy, still surrounded by a thin veil of hazy, memory fog.

Katsuki wished he could take his hand and wipe the fog away, view the boy as a whole and finally say thank you—but he knew he couldn't. The boy was forever gone and would probably forever remain a mystery clouded by fog. Reaching down into the visual part of his memory from that long ago felt like attempting to touch the bottom of a well with just his arm's reach.

With mixed frustration and relief, Katsuki carded his calloused hand through his messy hair. He reflected briefly on that year he had repressed in the back of his mind. It was all almost clear to him now like shining crystals in the light save for the tiny details of the boy's face and name.

He hated to admit it, but Momo was good at her job. It had been years since he thought about that era of his childhood and all it took was one nosy ass therapist on vacation for all the mental blocks to come tumbling down.

Katsuki finally pulled himself out of his daze to look down next to him in the sleep bag.

However, he was surprised to find an empty space where he expected to see Izuku. The fluffy white pillow held an indent where Izuku's head should be. All his clothes and hiking gear were packed up and placed neatly off to the side. It was as if the other hitman had awoken early to prepare to leave and possibly had departed already.

Katsuki frowned slightly at that thought. He was unsure why the unannounced absence made him feel disquieted, but it did.

Where did he go?

Led on by a type of curiosity only fucking Izuku could make him feel, Katsuki grumpily crawled out of the sleeping bag to go find the man. He didn't bother changing out of his sleep clothes as he aggressively zipped open the fuschia colored tent to make his way out into the open world.

The gleaming morning sun greeted him first. Then next was the melody of birds chirping and the sound of running water from the river. It was quiet all around the campsite with the smell of smothered out fire filling the air. According to the sky's orangish tint, the time was only brushing past dawn. Which meant no one else was awake. To confirm that thought, Katsuki could hear Shouto snoring lightly from the tent next to theirs.

Katsuki wandered around, feeling strange for even caring where Izuku was.

Maybe it was officially a force of habit from being attached at the hip for several days now. Or maybe he was still concerned about the fact Moore was attempting to kidnap the man. Which, now that Katsuki considered it, made him irritated at Deku. Why the hell would that dumbass go off on his own after what happened on the first night?

Katsuki was already considered an aggressive brute of a husband in some of these people's eyes—he didn't care to get pinned as potential murder suspect if his faux husband went missing. Knowing nosy ass Momo, she would perfectly fucking describe his face to police and, holy hell, the issues that would come from that would surely make Aizawa kill him to cover up The Company's identity.

As Katsuki wandered around the quiet summer morning, he eventually found Izuku sitting by the riverside. The freckled man's back was facing him, and he was stationed peacefully in the grass. The soft light of the sun haloed his silhouette delicately as he watched the running water flow past him.

Katsuki stepped on a twig as he approached, and the sound made Izuku turn his head. They made eye contact and Katsuki's heart thudded against his chest hard enough to make him stop in his tracks.

Green eyes.

Big, pretty green eyes and dark curly hair.

A chill raked down his spine. It was as though a ghost was standing directly behind him and whispering inaudible, static filled words into his ear: "It's ~~Izuku~~."

"…Izuku?" Katsuki said slowly. The name tasted different on his tongue.

"Ah, good morning, Katsuki," Izuku replied with a soft smile. The rims of his eyes were puffy and red. "You're up earlier than I thought you'd be. How did you sleep?"

He didn't answer right away because his tongue felt knotted. For unclear reasons, Izuku's voice fell on his ears differently. An odd sensation tousled around inside of him and Katsuki's brows pinched together as he surveyed the deep viridian irises in front of him.

It was odd. Izuku had big, green eyes and dark curly hair. The same as his unnamed savior. The resemblance of those two vague features tickled the back of Katsuki's head and gave him pause. However, when the silent tension strung too tight, it was clear. Izuku began nervously plucking at the blades of grass underneath him.

"Is…Is everything okay?" Izuku asked meekly. He shyly turned his face away from Katsuki's intense gaze to glance down at the ground pensively. "I-I didn't mean to wake you up if I did."

"Er—no. You didn't," Katsuki corrected quickly. He realized he was, once again, staring a little too hard at Izuku. Why the hell did he do that so much? "I was surprised to find you gone, that's all. Y'know, there's still a creepy human trafficker trying to snatch you up in these woods."

Izuku nodded distantly without saying a word.

Katsuki decided then to brush off the strange, ghostly feeling. He was making shit weird between them again. He did his best to move on from the peculiar sensation that was evoked by his odd dreams and memories. That year of his life seemed to be plaguing him recently and he couldn't afford for it to spill over on this assignment. It was his last, he should stay level headed. Katsuki decided at that moment to deal with the childhood memories later—or maybe never.

Izuku arose from his spot on the river side to approach him with an unreadable emotion dancing in his eyes. He gave Katsuki a kind smile before walking past him.

"Let's head back and finish packing, we'll be going back to the hotel soon," Izuku said with his back turned and shoulders tense.

"Sure thing," Katsuki replied quietly, feeling unusual.

He frowned at the retreating backside of his faux husband, put off by the bizarre exchange.

When they returned back to the campground area, Momo and Jirou were up and about. The two girlfriends greeted them with warm hellos. Izuku greeted them too and gradually the chit chat between the four of them woke up the other two couples. All of their Paradise Crew began cleaning up their campsite and packing up their respective tents.

Katsuki was happy that he and Izuku were flowing easier, but he was slightly irked. Irked for a reason he didn't exactly like because he was annoyed at the fact Izuku was being quiet around him. Why the hell did he care? He and Izuku weren't exactly chatty, but normally there was some level of sarcastic banter between them. Katsuki realized then he had become accustomed to the back-and-forth tug of war he and Izuku had.

But now, that was missing for the first time in eight years.

Izuku looked damn near exhausted today and gave him nothing.

They got dressed without a word. Izuku put on a simple bubble gum pink t-shirt that said 'beach clothes' in cutesy white lettering and light-blue jeans shorts. Katsuki put on his usual black tee, silver chain, and black colored pants.

After getting fully dressed, they took down the small tent and Katsuki expected some level of sarcasm from Izuku. But the little shit didn't make a single goddamn jab at him or respond to any of the sarcasm Katsuki threw his way. It felt wrong.

But what was stranger was how Izuku was being oddly gentle with him.

He offered to pack up Katsuki's belongings for him while Katsuki packed up the van. Each one of his pieces of clothing were neatly folded and placed in his backpack with care when Katsuki checked.

It made him curiously peer at Izuku who silently gave him a gentle smile.

They all got back into the van in the same seating fashion as before. This time neither he nor Izuku made a fuss about the seating arrangement. Out of habit, or finally learning how to play pretend husband, Katsuki helped Izuku into his lap and buckled them in without an argument.

The van began to move and slowly Katsuki watched the green forest behind them fade into the background. He turned his head forward and caught sight of Izuku. His faux husband was stiff in his lap like before, but this time the mood was different as the smaller man stayed utterly silent. He appeared entirely uncomfortable for different reasons now as he wrung his wrists.

Izuku leaned forward, awkwardly shifted to place his head on the window. From this view, Katsuki couldn't see his face, but he could see Izuku's head droop. His body periodically jerked as though he was drifting in and out of sleep but struggled to stay under.

Katsuki exhaled through his nose slightly and decided to lean forward to whisper subtly in Izuku's ear.

"Hey, are you okay?" He asked, despite himself. He didn't want to give a shit, but clearly something was off. "You've been quiet. Usually, you're annoying the shit out of me by now."

Izuku perked up, surprised. He twisted slightly to peer at Katsuki behind him with a distracted look on his face.

"Sorry," Izuku said quietly, his eyes skirted downwards. "I…I didn't get any sleep last night. I think I was too on edge and it's finally catching up to me."

Katsuki pursed his lips, looking at the slightly-less-puffy rims of Izuku's eyes. He wasn't quite sure that was the whole truth, but he decided to take it. The van hit another bump, and they both jerked in tandem. At that moment, Katsuki could clearly see the exhaustion on Izuku's face.

"Lean back," Katsuki simply commanded, led on by a pull in his chest. "You're not going to get any rest hunched over like that."

He moved backwards himself to emphasize his point and gestured for Izuku to do the same. Izuku's eyes widened and his face deepened with a red blush. He shook his head rapidly.

"No, it's okay—"

"—C'mon," Katsuki said forcefully with an annoyed inflection. "Lean back. I'll steady you while you nap. Ain't an issue after fucking cuddling damn near nude in your little panties. Nothing can be more embarrassing than that."

He grabbed Izuku's shoulders and slightly pulled to ease him into it. At first, Izuku gave some resistance, grimacing at the prospect. Then when Katsuki tightened his grip on Izuku's tense shoulders, the smaller man steadily gave in and inched backwards.

Katsuki watched how Izuku exhaled in defeat before leaning all the way backwards, and pressed flush against his chest. Izuku shifted slightly to get more comfortable and Katsuki helped him, snuggly fitting the smaller body against him. He wrapped his arms around Izuku's middle and when they hit another bump, it was barely noticeable with the protective hold.

Izuku laxed all the way, and comfortably leaned his head against Katsuki's shoulder. He turned his face inwards to the crook of Katsuki's neck, making his breath tickle Katsuki's skin lightly like feathers. The blond hitman studied the way Izuku hesitantly lifted his hands. He placed them over Katsuki's arms that were holding him in place. The soft fingers squeezed him lightly, as though to make sure he was real.

"Better?" Katsuki asked.

"Better," Izuku agreed with relief. He gave a tiny smile and looked up at Katsuki with that same unreadable expression. "Thank you."

"Don't mention it, dork."

Tired, green eyes looked right into his own and Katsuki's heart skipped a beat.

"You're…here," Izuku muttered distantly, voice laced with sleep. "I'm glad you're here."

Katsuki wasn't exactly sure how to respond. Izuku's fingers began to draw tiny circles on his arm then steadily, Izuku drifted off to sleep.

Katsuki didn't dwell on the small act of affection nor the erratic beating of his own heart. He reasoned they were still attempting to play pretend husbands when he glanced to the front and could see Shouto watching them through the rear-view mirror. Katsuki had forgotten the other six bodies in the van, truthfully. He had been too focused on making sure Izuku was comfortable.

Then a small snore reached his ears and Izuku nuzzled into his neck more.

Scarlet eyes shifted to the window to distract himself from the twisting in his chest as he tightened his hold on Izuku. Katsuki lazily watched all the large trees of the forest shrink in perspective. They grew tinier and tinier as they drove down the mountains, away from the tranquil environment. The wind blew through the leaves, rustling them and it appeared as if they were waving goodbye to them.

A small piece of Katsuki felt inexplicably dejected to see the forest fade. He knew that all the leisure demeanor that came with it would soon diminish as well. A shift in the air settled into him as he realized when they made it down the mountain, his cell phone signal would return.

When that happened, he would have to check back into reality.

Katsuki quietly gazed between the fading forest and the man sleeping soundly in his arms. He studied Izuku's dark, curly hair and thought about his pretty, green eyes.

His heart clutched in an unusual manner.

When they finally arrived back at the pastel pink hotel, it was exactly how they left it.

The welcoming palm trees casted shadows over them in the subtropical heat as hordes of vacation goers were checking in and out. Couples flooded the premises hand in hand smiling and giggling at each other. The lovesickness in the air was tangible with invisible hearts floating over the masses and the sticky feeling of adoration clung to everyone.

Katsuki sighed lightly as they all got out of the van. Izuku looked far more refreshed and was slightly chattier as they grabbed their bags. Shouto returned the keys to the front desk as everyone gave hugs and parted ways for the day. When it was only the two of them standing in the center of the marble floored lobby, both hitmen reluctantly took out their cell phones.

Katsuki winced and Izuku grimaced deeply.

60 missed calls and 40 goddamn text messages.

Everything was mostly from Aizawa. A handful were from Sero and there was one from fucking Denki. Katsuki grumpily read the first three recent messages on his phone. It was a mess. A pure, fucking mess. He could practically feel Aizawa's hands around his throat, strangling him nearly to death through his sheer spite across the country.

[Dumbass Denki]: Dude!! you're in maaaajor trouble, where are you????

[Sero Hanta]: I hope getting skinned alive is one of your many weird kinks because Aizawa is going to murder you

[The Old Man]: Bakugou.

Katsuki groaned loudly and scratched behind his head. Fuck.

He hesitantly glanced at the man next to him, who was clicking through what seemed like a wide variety of messages as well. With each click, the color from Izuku's face drained more and more until he was visibly pale. Izuku lightly cursed under his breath when he clicked on his email app.

Katsuki supposed they both were in some level of shit.

Izuku cut his eyes towards him and gave a sheepish smile. "I, uh, have to go call my handler A.S.A.P. Should we head upstairs?"

"I have to call my boss too," Katsuki said. He fiddled with his phone unsure if he should even have this convo around Izuku. The weight of the phone in his hand and seeing Aizawa's name graciously reminded him that his boss instructed him to slaughter Izuku on sight. "I…I should probably do it in private, so I think I'm going to find a spot elsewhere. No offense."

"Uh, yeah, you're right," Izuku agreed quickly, looking embarrassed. "Here, let me take your bag upstairs for you."

Katsuki was caught off guard slightly when Izuku moved quickly.

The other hitman grabbed his backpack for him, easily handling it and gave him a sweet smile—again. Before Katsuki could say anything, his faux husband was already heading off in the direction of the magenta painted elevators with both of their bags.

Katsuki frowned slightly at the kind gesture and the stiff posture.

Katsuki found himself wandering in the back of the hotel until he stumbled upon a peaceful rose garden.

The rose garden itself was expansive. Roses of all colors were sorted off into sections, making it appear color coded. Red. Purple. Blue. Even orange flowers were planted. To compliment the lush greenery, the large garden was decorated with luxe marble statues and beautiful fountains. Intricately carved chestnut colored wooden benches were stationed all around for people to sit at. But off to the side was something else that caught Katsuki's attention.

It was a garden maze.

The entrance of it was a delicate wooden garden archway that was painted white. It was encased in overgrown green vines and pink flowers.

It beckoned Katsuki to come inside, and he eventually wandered in. It would be the perfect place for privacy, he reasoned. As he walked through, Katsuki took in the tiny details. The pure green hedges of the maze twirled and winded through the lush backyard of the hotel. All the hedges were perfectly trimmed with not a single twig out of place. The tall rows were far above Katsuki's head, making him feel small almost.

He walked down the maze's path that was full of brown gravel and silver stones. At every new turn was a wooden garden archway that had luscious vines entangled all over like at the entrance. Lavender bell flowers hung from the vines of the archways that led Katsuki down this private path. When he felt like he was deep in the maze, he stumbled across a large circular opening. In the center was a white marble fountain with a figure of a weeping woman cradling a large vase. Out of the mouth of the vase came the pouring water.

Katsuki surveyed the area to make sure he was alone before sitting on the edge of the expensive fountain.

He mulled over Izuku and the whole fake marriage charade first.

For a brief moment, Katsuki contemplated telling Aizawa the full details of the mess he was in. Maybe he could get some advice on how to properly go about it? But then he attempted to figure out how to even fucking explain that he was currently teamed up with the same green nuisance he had been complaining about for eight years.

He looked down at the wedding band on his ring finger and twisted it while thinking of pretty green eyes. Izuku turned out not to be as terrible as he thought. In fact, even though he was a little shit there was a lot about his presence Katsuki was begrudgingly fond of.

But quickly, he imagined himself explaining what had happened to Aizawa, specifically the part where he showed Izuku the details of the red folder. The exclusive top secret red folder that no one else's eyes were ever supposed to see. After that, he could perfectly hear Aizawa curse him out, and then book a flight to come kick his ass.

Yeah, let's not tell him about Izuku, Katsuki thought to himself, wincing. Keep that shit to yourself and take it to your fucking grave.

He stopped fiddling with the wedding band and reluctantly dialed Aizawa's number.

Immediately the phone was picked up before the first ring could complete.

"You better have a really good reason why you've been unreachable for the last forty-eight hours," Aizawa instantly snapped through the phone. Katsuki winced and pulled the phone away from his ear when his supervisor's voice raised loudly. "Why the fuck would you drop a code 119 and then disappear to Kami knows where, you thick headed child?"

"Look, I've been trying to keep a low fucking profile so don't yell at me, old man," Katsuki snapped back. His eyebrow twitched in irritation. "I won some lottery to go camping in the woods for free. I had no signal for the last two days."

"Why the hell would you even enter a lottery—"

"—I didn't," Katsuki hissed defensively. "It was randomized. But where the hell were you? While you're so busy yelling at me, I called you right away and you didn't even answer or return my call that day or the next morning."

There was a long pause on the other end.

"…Sorry about that," Aizawa said as he exhaled roughly. Katsuki knew that exhausted sigh well and could perfectly envision his long-time mentor pinching the bridge of his nose to calm down. "I got busy and was in Czechia trying to behead a snake."

Katsuki glowered at the coded language. "Behead a snake? What the hell does that mean?"

"It means it's above your pay grade," Aizawa said brusquely.

"You're always so fucking shady," Katsuki griped. He hunched forward, deciding to drop it. "So, what should I do? Those cops are in my Paradise Crew here. Do we drop the assignment? I think they're attempting to make an arrest."

"We can't drop the assignment," Aizawa said calmly. "While you were busy camping, I ran the red flag by the clients, and everyone agrees Moore needs to be put down. None of the stakeholders in the governments believe he deserves a right to a fair trial, and no one wants the police involved to open a possible deeper investigation."

"…Really?"

"Really."

There was another long pause and Katsuki could hear Aizawa light a cigarette on the other end.

"Honestly, between you and I," Aizawa said quietly. His voice was hush and low. "It seems like they want him quietly disposed of so some dirt on themselves doesn't come forward."

"What dirt could a human trafficker have on government officials?" Katsuki whispered back.

"I'm afraid that's what I was abroad attempting to figure out," Aizawa grumbled. "I don't usually like when full circumstances aren't disclosed to us before we send a man on an assignment. But it turns out, whatever dirt is between them is above both our pay grades. So, just finish off this assignment and come back so you can retire, alright? Last assignment so no more questions. Remember, we get issued the folders and execute the jobs, nothing more. A mark is a mark. Always remember that."

"Right. A mark is a mark."

That small, simple line was The Company's motto and something Aizawa hammered into him since he was fourteen.

A mark is a mark at the end of the day.

No emotions. No questions. Just do the job and do it well. It reminded Katsuki to stay grounded and get out of this paradise from hell alive and well.

"See if you could possibly probe those two cops for when they're going to do a raid, it might be around their scheduled check out time," Aizawa continued. "We need to be ahead of the curve on them. Under no circumstances do you allow them to arrest Peter Moore. You snipe him dead from a distance if they have him in handcuffs, got it?"

"Got it," Katsuki repeated dutifully. "I'll make sure to finish it before any of that occurs, old man."

"Good. I'm counting on you. No more hiccups and please, fucking please, no more camping trips."

"Yeah, yeah, I heard you."

"Alright, I have to go. Keep me updated."

"Bye, old man. Remember to take your vitamins."

"Goodbye Bakugou. Remember to keep your head on straight."

The line clicked and Katsuki took a deep breath in to stay centered. He fiddled with his phone in his hand pensively and thought about the assignment.

It was a little obscure the more Katsuki dwelled on it.

Usually when police were involved, Katsuki would be immediately ordered to return to headquarters. However, on the other hand, they weren't usually hired by politicians for red folder assignments. Their red folder assignment clientele were usually gruff, shady crimelords. Politicians were usually green or yellow folders. The hard tone Aizawa used made it clear as day that Moore needed to be six feet under before Katsuki stepped foot off Okinawa.

He felt a headache incoming when he thought about all the stupid ass complications.

Undercover cops. His faux fucking husband he was supposed to kill—and now that same husband was officially branded to be kidnapped by the very man they were attempting to murder. There was so much that could go wrong before they successfully staged the murder-suicide they were planning.

Everything about this case was shaping up to be out of the ordinary.

When Katsuki made his way back up to their room, he was surprised to find Izuku sitting on the edge of the bed looking at his phone pensively. It was a stark contrast to see the sullen man sitting there on the edge of that large, heart shaped bed. His dark green hair and deep green eyes perfectly juxtaposed the silk scarlet colored bedding as he hung his head.

Katsuki fully stepped in the room and he wasn't immediately given any mind. There was a distant expression swirling inside of Izuku's emerald eyes, as if considering something. The freckled man didn't even bother to look up.

Izuku pursed his lips to the side as he read a message on his phone.

Katsuki slowly shut the door, and the clicking sound finally caught Izuku's attention. Izuku snapped his head up and locked his phone swiftly with a single click of the side button.

"Hey," Izuku said a little too quickly. He gave another gentle smile to Katsuki and tilted his head. "What did your handler say?"

"Well. After chewing my head off, he told me I have to stay and finish off the assignment," Katsuki admitted. He walked over and sat on the edge of the bed next to Izuku. "How about you?"

Izuku fiddled with the phone in his hands as a droplet of silence spilled between them.

"Same," Izuku eventually said tightly. He smiled and tucked his phone in his pants' pockets. "We still need to put distance between us and the cops in the meantime preferably."

"Yeah, that's fine," Katsuki said. He hunched over and looked at Izuku with a serious expression. "I was advised to attempt to find out their check out time. That could possibly lead us to seeing if and when they're going to do a raid. Basically, I can't let them arrest Moore."

Izuku nodded. “Okay. That works.”

Katsuki stood up and stretched with a loud yawn.

He started going over scenarios in his mind on how the hell they were going to press that information out of the two cops—if they even could. Maybe they could try to kill Moore as soon as possible. But then that could get sticky if they found themselves in a hive of fucking police at bad timing. Cops were dumb but not dumb enough not to question two men who showed up dressed in all black with fully loaded guns to a king pin’s headquarters.

After going through a couple scenarios in his mind, Katsuki turned around.

He was a little surprised to find Izuku eying him up and down, clearly not even fucking thinking about their assignment. Green eyes were filled to the brim with curiosity as Izuku’s hands were tightly clasped together. Katsuki raised a brow when the freckled hitman ran his eyes up and down his whole goddamn body.

“Did you get a good enough look?” Katsuki teased sarcastically, wanting to see if Izuku would finally respond to some banter. ”I can turn to the side for you if you need another angle.”

Izuku quickly turned away with a pink flush on his face. “I-I wasn’t looking at you. I was zoning out.”

“Yah-huh. Sure you weren’t.” Katsuki rolled his eyes. “Well, what now?”

“We should wait until dinner when we see Shouto and Inasa again,” Izuku suggested. “We’ll poke around then with some questions. But uh, maybe we can relax in the lounge area? We have to pretend like we didn’t dispose of the bartender in the woods so hiding away only makes us look suspicious right now. But if we go to the bar lounge and look ignorant, it’ll seem like we don’t know anything. Let me buy you a drink or something.”

He silently agreed with the notion of going to the lounge area, but he grinned a little at the naivety of Izuku in the last sentence. With the way big green eyes gazed at him, Katsuki knew Izuku didn’t know the implications of that saying, which made it more humorous.

“Buy me a drink, huh?” Katsuki repeated with a hint of amusement. “Why does that sound like you’re flirting with me, nerd?”

Then, on cue, Izuku spluttered and blushed like he usually did.

“I-I’m not!” Izuku denied swiftly, clearly scandalized. His eyes went wide with embarrassment as he waved his hands. “I-I was only being nice.”

“You sure? First you gawk at me and now you want to buy me a drink. Doesn’t sound just nice to me.”

“Nevermind, Katsuki,” Izuku mumbled, his face fully red. “Why do you always make such crude comments?”

Katsuki grinned at the stupid little pout he was given when the air around them went back to normal.

“I’m not the one offering to buy you a drink, Deku. Next time just ask me on a date.”

“Just forget it. Disregard that I ever offered.”

Katsuki barked out a sharp laugh when Izuku stood up and hurried out of the door of their room, face in flames.

They made their way down to the lobby bar side by side with their usual banter restored. It made Katsuki a lot happier, even though he sure as hell wouldn’t admit it out loud. But getting a response out of Izuku was something Katsuki needed more than he thought.

As they were walking, they fell into a small lull. In his mind Katsuki was diligently plotting on how to possibly pressure the two cops into giving them details. Then his thoughts were abruptly halted when a small hand grabbed his unexpectedly. It took Katsuki slightly off guard, especially since they weren’t around people. What was the point in holding hands right now?

He turned to Izuku, waiting for some sort of explanation. But in place of words, he saw a deep red blush. The demeanor made Katsuki quiet as well, but he still let Izuku intertwine their fingers together.

For the first time, it didn’t feel weird.

In fact, it was comforting. And in an odd way, familiar.

“I think this is the first time you didn’t put up a fight with me over holding hands,” Izuku said gently. He gazed up at Katsuki in a proud manner.

“Don’t tempt me,” Katsuki mumbled without any real bite.

He smirked down at Izuku who smiled up at him fondly.

Katsuki was about to make another sarcastic jab but stopped when he felt a tender caress on his hand. Scarlet eyes snapped downwards, unsure if he felt that right. But there it was. Izuku’s thumb was lightly caressing him in a private, affectionate manner. A gesture that was solely saved for lovers—and currently they weren’t in front of anyone they had to convince that they were devoted husbands.

Katsuki raised a single brow.

He cut his eye towards Izuku who quickly turned away from him like he was caught. The caressing immediately stopped. Izuku awkwardly chuckled and scratched behind his head.

“Sorry, I-I didn’t realize what I was doing for a moment,” Izuku quickly covered up. “I must still be sleep deprived.”

Katsuki was a bit confused and speechless.

...What the hell?

He briefly considered maybe Izuku was pitying him to an extent. He had accidentally let their whole fucking paradise crew know about his mommy issues last night. Dead mommy issues on top of it. Not everyday you find out the guy you hated for eight years had an strung out, grambling addicted mother.

Maybe Izuku was being bizarrely kinder to him because of it—which soured Katsuki slightly.

He hated, no, despised people who pitied him. It's why he didn't fucking talk about his past trials and tribulations to the extras in his life. If he ever mentioned his situation, their eyes would soften, voices coo like he was a toddler and they would start treating him like he was a single traumatic event away from a full breakdown. Deep down, Katsuki didn't want Izuku to treat him like that.

But—maybe the kindness was because of another reason.

Katsuki sucked at his teeth.

He reflected on all the people who always wanted to get into his pants. He refused to take partners who pitied him. It made him sick to his stomach to even think about a pity fuck. That mere concept was the reason why he only fucked people who expressed pure, untainted sexual attraction to him. Anyone who wanted to see what he was like in bed was always ultra-nice before dropping to their knees in front of him.

He thought about Izuku's erection in the car ride and the cave cuddling.

He unwillingly pondered how Izuku would look down on his knees.

They arrived in the packed lounge, and like usual people were all around. The blond attempted to ignore the tender caressing on his hand that had picked up again. He wanted to chalk the behavior up to Izuku's sleep deprivation—but the sensation of that gentle touch felt like it was attempting to translate some unknown message to him.

Katsuki tried to distract himself from the fuzziness that the caressessing evoked by looking around the lounge. Friend groups were joking around tables, others were playing darts and pool and several others were stationed at the bar.

The two of them casually made their way over to the bar area and immediately they picked up on the replacement for the bartender.

The man they had disposed of in the woods was replaced with a taller, buffer man who looked a hell of a lot meaner. He had a buzz cut and in the shotty lighting could Katsuki make out his hair to be dark purple. The new bartender's eyes were a sharp teal that dug into both him and Izuku in a scrutinizing manner. He had a nasty scar over his eye and an aura that screamed even to Katsuki that he'd be a future problem.

Whoever this replacement was, he sure as hell wasn't a bartender.

The pair ordered drinks in the crowded lounge, making sure not to give away anything. It felt like playing mental chess as they fake flirted in front of the bartender. They had to be two to three steps ahead of Moore, elegantly playing a waltz of loving husbands.

Izuku was leaning into him, still holding his hand. He had an adorable smile that made even the anti-romantic hitman smirk back at him. Izuku squeezed his hand and the private, tender gesture continued.

Warmth settled into Katsuki's chest as Izuku's thumb continued to softly traced circles—and it was beginning to confuse the hell out of Katsuki.

He couldn't distinguish what was real and what was for show anymore.

To make matters worse, despite Izuku's words upstairs, he still bought his drink for him.

The freckled hitman heavily insisted and offered to buy him all the drinks he wanted. He called over the bartender and placed an order for two piña coladas after Katsuki said the fruity drink was his favorite. They both watched the menacing bartender awkwardly fumble with making their cocktails—clearly not his fucking forte. The gruff man had to remake them twice before the two glasses were slid over to them with a rehearsed smile.

Then after studying both of them closely, the frightening man walked off the other side of the long bar, tending to other couples after a while.

They drank down their beverage with light conversation. The entire time Izuku was gazing at him like he was fascinated with him. Big ass green eyes stared at his face, and even darted to his arms the second Katsuki rolled up his sleeves. At first, he thought Izuku was simply putting on the doting husband act. But when the bartender was clearly not even fucking looking at them anymore, Izuku still didn't stop.

The hand intertwined with his own didn't leave. And the soft gentle on and off caressing kept on. Izuku gazed at him like he was a long lost friend and then the freckled hitman started asking him all about his life.

"Did you always live in Tokyo, or did you move elsewhere after you were a kid?" Izuku asked with a curious glitter in his eyes.

"Besides classical music, what other musicians do you listen to?" He pressed when Katsuki mentioned knowing the song playing from the speakers above their head.

"You're really funny, do you have a lot of friends?" Izuku chuckled with a shy blush when Katsuki made an offhand comment about a man's toupee.

It made Katsuki struggle between what was real and what was not again. Izuku seemed genuinely interested in getting to know him—far more than before the dumb camping trip.

Something had changed. He didn't know what, but something did.

When Izuku brushed a stray lock of hair out of face, Katsuki pursed his lips.

The freckled hitman was being nice to him. A little too nice for Katsuki to write it off as his faux polite demeanor. What the hell was going on?

When both of their drinks were empty, Katsuki took a bite of the sweet pineapple on the rim of his drink's empty glass. He enjoyed the feeling of the refreshing fruity taste across his taste buds and hummed happily. Before he could even place down the discarded rim of the pineapple, Izuku quickly plucked the pineapple from his own glass and placed it onto Katsuki's.

Katsuki's eyes blinked slowly, caught off guard again.

"You don't want it?" Katsuki asked carefully.

"You can have it," Izuku insisted. "You seem to like pineapple."

Katsuki squinted his eyes. Izuku kindheartedly smiled at him once more.

He licked the pineapple while looking at Izuku. Then on the flip of a coin, Izuku's eyes subtly darted down to look directly at his mouth. It was the same discreet gaze the nerd had during the baking class, and it was so fucking obvious Izuku was checking him out—again. The damn dork probably didn't even realize it as his big ass eyes were trained on Katsuki's mouth.

Katsuki raised a single brow before testing a theory.

He gave the slice of pineapple a long, very gracious suck and let the juices dribble down the sides of his mouth.

Izuku's face blushed deeply and he modestly squeezed his thighs together.

Oh. There it is.

Katsuki looked at Izuku's thighs and a warmth trickled in. He tried to guess what color panties the nerd was wearing. Pink? Red? Green? When his own body tingled slightly, Katsuki continued to suck into the pineapple with sloppy wet sounds, enjoying the way Izuku failed at muffling how his breath hitched. Katsuki swallowed the sweet chunk of fruit and Izuku's dilated eyes so clearly followed the bob of his Adam's apple.

Katsuki pensively gauged the freckled man up and down.

"Oi. You're staring at me," Katsuki said with a twinge of satisfaction. He leaned his weight against the bar counter and tilted his head at the man who was undoubtedly in a trance. "You keep ogling me like a piece of fucking meat."

Green eyes blinked rapidly and Izuku shook his head in defense. "Oh—I was just looking at h-how big you got."

“How big I got?” Katsuki scrunched his nose at the strange comment. “The hell does that mean?”

“S-Since Vienna!” Izuku immediately snapped out of his daze. He was far more alert now as he spluttered in embarrassment. “You—You’ve g-gotten big! Y’know, since we f-first…met.”

“So, you’re admitting to checking me out without shame now?” Katsuki raised an eyebrow.

“What? No! I have never checked you out before—”

“—You little fucking liar. I know you’ve been eyeballing me. I’ve caught you several times.”

“Well, for someone who keeps calling me an eyesore, I’ve caught you too,” Izuku huffed like a child snapping back at an accusation.

“And? I’m not going to deny it right now.” Katsuki leaned in with a slight smirk when Izuku froze.

He moved in close enough to feel Izuku’s breathing change and see how the other man stiffened in the barstool but didn’t lean backwards. Green eyes darted between Katsuki’s wet mouth and his burning red eyes as the blond moved in closer to him. Katsuki flexed a brow before giving a smirk. For an unknown reason, the idea that Izuku was into him made his ego swell high.

“You’ve been awfully nice to me all day, and that usually means one of two things,” Katsuki whispered, dropping his voice low. “You either pity me after what I spilled during the camping trip, or you want to fuck me. Which is it?”

Izuku was rendered speechless like he was stuck between the two choices.

He hung his mouth open, searching for the words.

For the first time, Katsuki looked at the other hitman’s lips in a different light. Scarlet eyes darkened as he studied how goddamn plump and pink they were.

That half of his brain that usually reminded him how acting on his attraction to Izuku was a terrible idea was suddenly utterly quiet. All the bullets, punches, and stab wounds exchanged now all appeared to be maybe violent foreplay in his mind as he considered the other hitman in a more erotic light.

“Well? Which is it?” Katsuki pried in a low whisper, unsure why he was burning to know.

The freckled hitman furrowed his brows, seemingly conflicted.

Before Izuku could answer, suddenly two figures approached them.

One man was dressed in an all-white suit and the other in a sleek black one. Moore and his assistant were standing side by side with their shining golden dove pins on their collars like shining symbols of hospitality.

Of fucking course.

The tension in the air was immediately broken down with the presence of the two people they were plotting to kill. Katsuki lazily wiped the pineapple juices off his mouth with the back of his hand and Izuku rubbed his blushing nape, clearly flustered.

Katsuki discreetly cut his eyes at the bartender across the way. The gruff man was putting his cell phone away in his pink apron.

“Welcome back to my favorite couple!” Moore said cheerily.

The hotel owner flashed his usual enchanting smile, but it was off kilter now. It wasn’t all the way convincing. There was a crack in his well-formed mask, making the shining pearly white smile appear dimmer.

“Yes. Incredibly nice to see you two together,” Moore assistant, Minoru Koizumi, said without any inflection. “We hope you had a lovely trip.”

The skinny dark-haired man gave a taut closed lipped smile at both of them. The smile stopped right below the dark circles on his sunken face and the creases of his eyes didn’t upturn all the way. It was so obvious to Katsuki both of these men were extremely displeased to see him breathing and Izuku not shipped off to who knows where.

“Yes, it was so fun!” Izuku laughed. He gave a polite grin and took a sip of his drink. “I’ve never been camping, so thank you for that experience.”

“It’s no problem at all,” Moore said. He smoothed out the wrinkles on his suit with a tight smile. “Would you two want to talk about it more in my private lounge around the corner? I’m always looking for ways to improve the paradise experience!”

Fucking slime ball.

The goosebumps on Katsuki’s arm ignited and a chill crawled up the hills of his spine. All three sets of eyes were carefully looking at him and Izuku. The bartender cleaned a glass a little too aggressively. Moore didn’t stop smiling and a tiny twitch in his brow was notable. Then finally Koizumi squinted his eyes ever so slightly.

The hold Izuku had on his hand tightened.

“Yeah, we wouldn’t mind,” Katsuki said wisely. “We have to be back for dinner though. Our crew doesn’t like to eat without us.”

He could see both Moore and his assistant stiffen at that. It was carefully worded enough to let the two traffickers think they had the people in their Paradise Crew waiting for them.

“Yes, we all got super close on the trip!” Izuku emphasized with a charismatic chuckle. “Thank you for that, again. We’re like all best friends now.”

“Of course, glad to hear it,” Koizumi said, clearly forced. “How about we chat about your trip over a game of billiards. Do you two play by any chance?”

“I’m decent at it.” Katsuki shrugged.

“I’ve played a couple of times,” Izuku said.

“Perfect! Let’s go play a game,” Moore said with a perk in his voice. “Come this way!”

They two men gestured for him and Izuku to follow them as their golden dove pins caught the light.

When both Moore and Koizumi’s backs were turned, Izuku and Katsuki exchanged serious expressions.

They were led to a room that was stationed discreetly in the lounge area.

It was hidden away in a tiny nook and behind a mahogany door with a golden nob. Moore opened it with a bright, welcoming smile and sitting inside was a room that contrasted against the whole setting of the hotel. Nowhere in sight was a lick of pink, and instead all around them was luxe, polished dark colored wood and deep wine colored walls.

Black leather couches were stationed next to tall wooden bookshelves that were full of novels with deep colors like moss, crimson, and navy blue. In the center of the room was a green billiards table and off to the side were exactly four cue stickers. Sitting on all four walls were opulent oil paintings with dark golden frames, countless shiny awards, and pictures of Moore with what looked like politicians.

One of them Katsuki recognized was the governor of Tokyo. The two were shaking hands and cutting a big red ribbon on a fancy, tall building.

“Make yourself comfortable,” Koizumi said.

Katsuki watched how Koizume snapped his lanky fingers to the private bar stationed off to the side.

A man with an eyepatch was dressed in a charcoal vest, long white sleeved shirt and velvet obsidian bowtie was standing there, still as a statue. Katsuki was weary how he hadn’t even noticed the man, his breathing practically undetectable. The man began pouring them drinks out of a dark bottle of whiskey without a single smile. The distant sound of the radio was off to the side, reaching Katsuki’s ear a tad.

Izuku wandered around the lounge a bit, admiring all the items perched on the wall. He strolled like he was in an art museum, drinking in all the pictures on the maroon walls before he froze in place. Katsuki noted how he stopped in front of the picture of Moore and the governor of Tokyo in front of that shiny big building.

Izuku cut his eyes towards Moore with a stone cold stare that only Katsuki noticed.

“Tell me all about the camping trip! Start to finish,” Moore asked. He walked up to the bar and took one of the glasses and started to sip on the dark liquid. “I want to hear every detail of how much fun you two had."

Including how we murdered one of your men, Katsuki tacked on in his mind.

Katsuki made a move to grab a cue stick, but Izuku walked over and did it for him. The freckled man chalked up Katsuki's cue stick without a word and then turned to Moore with what Katsuki learned to be his fake grin.

"Oh, you know, we did the whole typical camping thing," Izuku said easily. He moved to chalking up his own cue stick and walked around the pool table to the other side, across from where Katsuki was positioned. "Some kayaking, some s'more making, and we even found this awesome lake with the other people in our crew! And all of that stuff."

"No hiking?" Koizumi said curiously, grabbing a cue stick. He stumbled his heavily decorated ring hand on the wooden surface. "Most people always like to do some hiking."

"Oh, we did a little bit of it with our crew," Izuku explained, waving his hand. "It's a gorgeous forest, seems like a given."

Moore hummed and raked his eyes up and down Izuku's figure slowly.

The hotel owner wordlessly set up eight colorful cue balls in the triangle formation without taking his eyes off the freckled man. He gestured for Izuku to make the first move and Izuku fluidly broke the formation with the first strike.

The loud knocking sound mimicked the tight tension in the room. All four men struggled not to watch each other and focus on the game. The colorful cue balls rolled over the green surface of the pool table and Katsuki eyed how one solid colored ball went into a pocket.

"What time of day or night did you all hike?" Moore asked as he made the next move, missing making a score. The hotel owner pursed his lips displeased before covering it up with a sun bright grin.

"Does it matter what time it was?" Katsuki rebutted.

"I only care to know for my own personal research!" Moore insisted innocently. He leaned his weight onto the cue stick with a friendly grin and gave a hearty laugh. "I want to see what Paradise goers enjoy the most! This always helps me improve upon the experience."

"We did all our hikes when the sun was out if that helps," Katsuki lied easily. "That forest is really big so it's dangerous to hike at night. Plus, Hiroji is afraid of the dark. We make sure we're snuggling in bed before sundown."

Izuku choked on his drink and stared at Katsuki with wide eyes.

Katsuki grinned slightly and shot a wink to Izuku who flushed at the sudden gesture.

"Taro. That's supposed to be private," Izuku murmured, playing along. His face pinkened and Katsuki admittedly was starting to enjoy seeing Izuku flustered.

“Sorry, darling,” Katsuki said with a deep chuckle. “You know I find it a little adorable. You have the cutest little phobias.”

He bent over the table to position himself for a shot while making eye contact with Izuku. With a handsome smirk, Katsuki effortlessly knocked three solid-colored cue balls down two pockets without looking. He gave a cocksure grin when Izuku seemed genuinely impressed and tilted his head at him.

Koizumi made the next move, strolling past Katsuki and clearly sizing him up along the way.

The man sauntered a bit too close to him to be seen as friendly and it came across as a mode of intimidation. Katsuki cut his eye at Koizumi, who met his intense stare with his void like eyes. The elder man pushed his hand through his deep black hair, running some of his fingers along the wiry grey strands that were showing in the front before he took a sharp, precise shot at a cue ball and knocked it into the pocket.

“You have good aim,” Katsuki complimented with a fake smirk.

“Same for you,” Koizumi replied as though he was suspicious. “Extremely good aim.”

Katsuki didn’t take the bait and played it off casually.

They continued on with the game with the four of them shuffling around. Koizumi and Katsuki made score after score while Izuku and Moore made some, but not a ton. Katsuki couldn’t tell if this was another faux act, but Izuku complimented and touched him a lot, saying how great he was with his stick. The freckled hitman fixed the collar on his shirt for him mid-way through the game, hand smoothing out any wrinkles.

When the game winded down, all the questions were easily deflected and answered.

What part of the woods were they in? Hell if they knew.

Did they spend any time away from the group? Nope.

Were there any issues with hiking or did someone in their group wander off? Nope, everyone was as snug as peas in a pod.

After all the intrusive questions and he and Izuku faux flirting, Moore’s friendly façade was slipping. He had an unnaturally tight grip on his cue stick, and Katsuki assumed this was his first time ever being checkmated. The way he was looking at Izuku was concerning Katsuki a bit.

To the untrained average citizen, Moore merely seemed like he was admiring Izuku’s delicate features—especially his eyes. But to Katsuki who had seen the cruel, malicious intentions in the world, he knew Moore was pissed. The look wasn’t one of admiration, it was closer to a low simmer of rage. Like a child who was just told ‘no’ after their parents didn’t purchase the valuable toy they wanted.

To confirm Katsuki’s suspicions, Koizumi was subtly irritated as well. The elder man was picking at his nails while discreetly side eyeing Katsuki.

After he and Izuku slipped through all the subtle intrusive questions without a flaw, both traffickers seemed to be assuming they were just a normal married couple.

There was an expression of doubt traced into Koizumi's and Moore's slightly wrinkled features. Katsuki saw them exchange weary glances that translated to 'maybe that stupid almost-kidnapper really did simply fall off the cliff.' A clear look of defeat was creeping slowly in on Moore's face as they continued playing.

Katsuki had to admit he and Izuku made a damn good team when they were one cue ball away from winning the game.

"You're doing great, darling," Katsuki complimented with a knowing smirk. He easily slung his arm around Izuku's waist in an affectionate manner. "You always pick up on things so fast, I love it."

"Ah, thank you," Izuku said with a mild blush and leaned into him.

"Did you happen to see anything weird by any chance? Or hear anything?" Moore asked in a last-ditch effort.

Katsuki then moved to knock the last cue ball in the hole without removing his arm around Izuku's waist. The ball rolled into the pocket, signaling that they won the game.

"No, why?" Izuku replied with feigned innocence.

"There's been a couple of…hibagon sightings."

"A little fucking strange, but no," Katsuki answered with a shrug. "We didn't see any sasquatches. Only some nice sights of the forest."

"Well," Moore sighed, clearly out of any more questions. He gave them a calm gaze, seemingly not mistrustful of them anymore. "Thank you so much for answering all those questions! Ha. You two are really such a delight. Hiroji, you remind me of my wife so much with how much of a ray of light you are."

Moore's tone indicated that he seemed unsuspecting; however, Koizumi was another story. The dark-haired man was sizing up Izuku and watching them both a little too closely. His dark eyes narrowed distastefully when Izuku placed his hand over Katsuki's.

"Thank you, Mr. Sekai," Izuku replied. He intertwined their fingers, and the subtle clink of their wedding rings could be felt. "I'm sure your wife is a lovely person as well."

Katsuki didn't miss the way Koizumi rolled his eyes and scoffed the second Izuku said 'wife.' The lanky man then wrapped his arm around Moore's shoulders and gave a fake smile, not even bothering to hide his irritation.

"Well, this has been such a pleasure, but my partner and I have to be going now," Koizumi quipped and put a little too much emphasis on the word 'partner.' Katsuki's interest piqued a bit. "We have a couple of business engagements to wrap up before the end of the day. Don't we, Henry?"

“O-Oh, yes!” Moore chuckled. He fixed the crooked golden dove pin on his suit. “Please help yourself to the lounge if you would like! Otherwise enjoy the rest of your stay!”

Katsuki and Izuku both waved goodbye to the illicit business partners. The pair left out, signaling for the gruff looking bartender with an eyepatch to follow them.

The tall brute of a man lagged behind the pair like a lap dog, and it made Katsuki nearly scowl. He knew Moore and Koizumi wouldn’t be dumb enough not to travel without extra muscle considering they were in their late fifties but seeing the two new bartenders only meant when the time came, they would have to kill a lot more people than originally planned.

The heavy wooden door clicked shut and both hitmen exhaled loudly.

“Do you think they suspect anything?” Izuku asked. He sat on the end pool table, swinging his legs slightly.

“Nope,” Katsuki said and ran his hands through his hair. “They looked a little defeated and at their wits end. Especially since they’re fucking used sasquatches as an excuse to pry about the trip.”

“Yeah, they’re really odd,” Izuku said in a mumble.

“Really odd and really fucking.”

Izuku’s eyes bulged wide. “What?”

Katsuki shook his head and downed the rest of his drink, enjoying the burn down his throat.

“You didn’t see the way the creepy crow man rolled his eyes when the wife was mentioned?” Katsuki said quietly. “Then on top of it, he was possessively touchy with him at the end. They’re not only business partners, they’re fucking. Which—is a fantastic thing for us.”

“Fantastic in what way?”

“What better stage for a murder-suicide than an affair gone wrong? Nothing kills more than love.”

Izuku nodded slowly and caught on. “True. You’re right.”

Katsuki tilted his head at Izuku, who was staring down at the picture of Moore and the governor on the wall now. Green eyes were calculating and there was a small frown on Izuku’s lips as he studied the picture. Katsuki looked at the picture as well, unsure why Izuku was surveying it so hard. Katsuki cleared his throat and decided to change the subject when the silence between them stretched a bit too long.

“You suck at playing pool by the way,” Katsuki teased with a grin. “You’re lucky you had me to carry you the whole time.”

“Ah, I’ve never played,” Izuku laughed distantly with a shrug. He turned his attention to Katsuki and gave him a smile. “This was my first time. But you’re really good, though.”

“Duh. I’m fucking incredible at it,” Katsuki said arrogantly. “I learned when I was a teenager from my supervisor. He wanted someone to play billiards with, so he made me learn when he wasn’t teaching me how to break a man’s neck.”

“Yeah, I have a lot of hidden talents,” Katsuki said carefully. “If you’re lucky you might find out more.”

The pink blush on Izuku’s delicate features didn’t go unnoticed by Katsuki. His morbid curiosity burned to know the answer to why Izuku was being so damn nice to him.

Was it because of his newly revealed mommy issues or the fact maybe—just maybe—Izuku was slightly into him more than he led on? Maybe that really was the reason Izuku didn’t take the kill when he had the chance back in Spain. The other hitman did always emphasize that he had never tried to kill him. Was his guess about a little crush a lot more real than he thought?

He looked at Izuku’s plump ass a little differently.

Katsuki then decided he was going to finish testing his theory.

“Want me to teach you?” Katsuki offered with a sly grin. “Think of it as repayment for helping me get it together for this assignment. We wouldn’t have passed their stupid little lie detector test if you hadn’t showed me how to properly be a doting husband.”

“Sure,” Izuku agreed naively. “I would appreciate that.”

Katsuki motioned with his head for Izuku to come to the other side of the pool table with him as he chalked up his cue stick and reorganized the cue balls.

“First thing, you’re holding the cue stick wrong,” Katsuki said simply. He emphasized his point by holding up his hand. “You’re supposed to make a loop with your pointer finger to steady the cue stick as you shoot.”

He looped his pointer finger over onto his middle and Izuku mirrored him. The green-eyed man curiously tilted his head to see if he did it correctly. Katsuki clicked his tongue and shook his head.

“No, like this,” Katsuki pushed.

He stepped forward into Izuku’s space, noting how Izuku’s blush returned due to the proximity. Katsuki carefully reached forward to grab Izuku’s hand with a gentle touch, brushing their palms together. He used his fingers to position Izuku’s fingers into the standard formation forming the loophole. Green eyes flickered between Katsuki's face and their entangled hands.

"Now that you got the loop formed, you can use it to position the cue stick better," Katsuki explained, purposefully dropping the octave of his voice. "But you have to make sure your body formation is good too."

"Body form?" Izuku asked slowly, eyeing Katsuki carefully.

"Mhm," Katsuki leisurely hummed. He leaned deliberately into Izuku's space, eyes flickering down to the full pink lips that were mere inches away. His senses tingled with the smell of cinnamon and mint. "Body positioning is incredibly important if you want to hit the right angle."

Izuku's gaze grew more intense and Katsuki could see his grip on the cue stick tighten.

Led on by the sudden heat, Katsuki sauntered slowly behind Izuku, regarding his backside up and down. He waited for Izuku to move, say something, but the freckled man remained still like prey willing to be preyed upon. Scarlet eyes raked over the tempting hills and curves of Izuku's body.

Izuku's features looked a lot more appealing under the yellow tinted fluorescent lights. His shiny, silky curls were nearly begging to be fisted and his skin was perfectly soft. Katsuki didn't take his eyes off Izuku's blushing nape as he carefully positioned his hands on Izuku's body.

The freckled man stiffened slightly when Katsuki placed one hand on his hip and the other on the middle of his back. Katsuki leaned forward and pressed his ear directly against the shell of Izuku's ear.

"You have to make sure you're bent over properly," Katsuki instructed.

He pushed on Izuku's back and slowly leaned him downwards. He waited for some level of resistance, but he got none. The corners of Katsuki's mouth twitched upwards as Izuku let himself be suggestively positioned over the pool table. Katsuki dug his fingers into Izuku's hip and curled him ever so slightly to bow his spine.

"And properly arched. Bad arching isn't going to get the results you want."

"Like this?" Izuku said ignorantly. He arched his spine in a position to get a good angle for playing the game, but from his view above, Katsuki was drinking in how eroctic Izuku looked.

"Yeah. Fucking perfect." Katsuki chuckled a bit before pressing his pelvis into Izuku's backside.

There was an audible muffled gasp from Izuku at the sudden contact. The surprised man snapped his head to look up at Katsuki and his freckles were painted dark red. Katsuki played it casually, as though he was merely helping Izuku get the perfect pose for playing billiards.

He leaned over the smaller man until his chest touched Izuku's back. The jingle of his silver chain echoed in the room as he loomed over the smaller man who was looking at him with nearly dilated green eyes.

"Make the loop," Katsuki commanded solidly while maintaining the heated eye contact.

Izuku did as he was told without a word.

He hesitantly looked back towards the cue balls waiting for them. Izuku swallowed and pushed back slightly against Katsuki's solid figure to get a better position, but Katsuki didn't give any leeway. The friction where they were pressed together coiled further as Izuku made the loop with his fingers.

Katsuki placed one hand over the cue stick in Izuku's hand, right above where the warm, smaller hand was. He then moved to wrap his other hand around Izuku's hand that was forming a loop, pinning his wrist down to the table. Izuku held his breath as Katsuki guided the tip of the long wooden cue stick through the tiny loop of Izuku's fingers.

He slowly pushed the stick through the loop with a subtle rock of their bodies. Both red and green eyes watched as Katsuki guided the cue stick in and out and how he did it once more. Izuku swallowed heavily when Katsuki pushed it further than necessary, stretching his fingers around the girthier part of the shaft.

Katsuki hummed as though he was thinking, tilted his head and pressed his slight hard on into Izuku's plush backside more. He trapped the smaller man between him and the hard table's surface when he could feel Izuku's legs slightly shake.

"I-Is this good?" Izuku asked inquisitively.

Izuku squirmed slightly at the tension and there was a mild tremor that raked across his body at the feeling of Katsuki's hard-on pressing into him.

"Tighter," Katsuki whispered into Izuku's ear.

"T-Tighter?"

"Make your hole tighter." The deep rumble in his voice vibrated down both of their flushed together bodies. "It has to be a snug fit."

Izuku faltered slightly before doing as he was told. He only made the loop slightly smaller.

Katsuki 'tsk'd. "You gotta make your little hole tighter than that for me, Izuku."

Izuku then made the loop of his finger smaller until it was a perfect fit around the tip of the cue stick. The freckled man craned his neck until he could make eye contact with Katsuki again. Red and green eyes burned into each other, electricity charging into the air. Katsuki tightened his grip on Izuku's wrist.

"L-Like this?" Izuku whispered. His warm breath tickled Katsuki's lips.

“Yeah, there we go. Just like that,” Katsuki said with a smug look. “Now take the hit.”

Izuku struggled to tear his eyes away from Katsuki while Katsuki relished in the feeling of Izuku slightly trembling against him.

Izuku pushed the cue stick forward through the hole at the same moment Katsuki experimentally pushed into him subtly.

Izuku’s breath hitched in surprise at the motion, but he knocked the eight cue balls with enough force that Katsuki felt the rock in both their bodies. The plush backside slotted against him fucking perfectly and Katsuki’s lips twitched into a full smirk. Izuku flawlessly broke the formations of the cue balls, and they scattered all around. Some fell into various pockets on the table while others danced across the green surface aimlessly.

Both hitmen watched them roll around, however Katsuki knew neither of them gave a shit about the game right now.

He could hear Izuku’s breath move into uneven intakes and exhales. Izuku’s shaky hand dropped the cue stick on the table, but Katsuki didn’t remove his hands. He grasped onto both of Izuku’s wrists and pinned them down on the table as his erratic heart started to pick up.

Neither man moved.

Katsuki lowered his head close to the crook of the freckled neck. He hovered enough that if he moved an inch lower, he could place the perfect hickey on the tanned skin. The blush on Izuku’s skin was burning through to the surface and it was tempting as all hell to mark him. Katsuki could feel Izuku tremble against him more, attempting to form words but failing. In place of coherent thought, Katsuki heard the most breathless fucking whine slip past Izuku’s lips.

Then Izuku did something that flipped the situation on its head: he coyly pushed back into Katsuki’s cock and two twin groans spilled into the air.

“Fuck,” Katsuki drawled out.

Eagerly, Katsuki ground back on the tight ass that rocked into him. Shots of hot rapture crept up his legs and spilled into his core as they somehow found themselves in a steady, subtle rutting motion against the pool table. Izuku was exhaling through his nose as he tried to move his hands, but Katsuki kept him pinned in place as they moved slowly with steady rolls of their hips.

He leaned into Izuku, making his grinding motion clearer. He lowered his head into the freckled neck and out of instinct, Izuku tilted his head to the side for him. Katsuki brushed his lips over the pulse of Izuku’s jugular before stopping.

“You didn’t answer my question earlier,” Katsuki murmured. “Which is it, Izuku? Fuck me or pity me?”

Katsuki rolled his hips harshly and Izuku shuddered.

"Shit. Kacc—K-Katsuki, wait—"

Suddenly, a loud, blaring ringtone buzzed into the air.

The sound of the upbeat jingle ripped through the tension and swiftly Izuku shot upright at the sound. He broke out of Katsuki's hold, ungracefully forcing them both upright as he dug into his pockets for his cell phone. Izuku snatched out his smart phone and there was a visible grimace on his face. Katsuki's red eyes glanced down, wondering who was calling and it only confused him when he caught sight of the number '117' in place of a name.

"…I-I have to take this," Izuku whispered distantly, face still flush. "I'll be right back."

The freckled hitman didn't meet Katsuki's gaze as he walked away without another word. The rose-tinted blush sprinkled onto his tanned skin nearly looked permanent. It satisfied Katsuki greatly to witness as he surveyed the way one of Izuku's hands bashfully hid his hard-on in his pants. His hair was ruffled, and he seemed nearly ravished.

The corners of Katsuki's lips twitched upwards into a grin.

Right before Izuku closed the door to the private lounge, their eyes met.

Unspoken words dangled in the air between them, waiting for either man to grasp them.

Katsuki anticipated for something to be said but was met with an unmistakable glance of longing from Izuku. Green eyes flickered up and down his body, soaking him in. Then Izuku blushed deeply and shyly glanced away before shuffling off.

The heavy door clicked shut, and Katsuki leaned against the pool table. He crossed his arms, reflected on what had occurred and a confident grin spread across his face.

He felt like he got his answer: Izuku didn't pity him. He definitely wanted to fuck him.

If his mind wasn't clouded by lust right now, Katsuki would've understood that him and Izuku having sex was an entirely debauched concept. However, the rational side of Katsuki's thoughts were fully drowned out by the pure, hungry carnal side of his soul. He adjusted the heavy hard on in his pants while mulling over Izuku's own erection. He bit his lip thinking about Izuku's perfect ass and how he always did admire it. No matter how it was usually a warning sign that shit was going to go sideways on assignments.

But that wasn't the case now—or ever would be again. He would never see the short stack again after this assignment, or ever again in his life. So truly what harm could possibly come from deciding to fuck Izuku right before he retired for good?

It would be poetic to end eight years of frustration with a thorough, animalistic hate fuck.

The heat under Katsuki's collar boiled at the thought of pounding deep into that plush, tight ass. Maybe he could even play with whatever lacy panties the little pervert was wearing. The full fantasy of plowing Izuku straight into that stupid heart shape bed painted effortlessly in his head.

He could hear the labored moans and practically feel the nails scraping down his back as Izuku whimpered under him begging him to fuck into his prostate harder. He could even imagine himself strumming the pleasurable chords of Izuku's body like a violin, making him scream out in high notes for him as he made him cum over and over. This was all entirely possible too since it was clear as day Izuku was attracted to him just as much as he was to him.

Katsuki devilishly smirked and leaned into the sudden desire sparked.

Yeah. He decided he was going to fuck that man within an inch of his life.

When Izuku came back from taking his call a while later, he was blushing furiously. The pink hue on his face ran all the way down his neck, stopping right above his clavicle and where his Band-Aid was. His body posture was slightly meek as he hung his head away, cleared his throat and scratched behind his head.

"Sorry about that," Izuku apologized quietly. "I, uh, had to see if there was any update on this assignment. But everything is still set to go."

"That sounds good," Katsuki said.

Without shame, he eye fucked Izuku. The dark crimson eyes translated all the carnal curiosity that was churning inside of Katsuki. At the moment, he truly did not give a flying fuck about discussing killing Moore and Koizumi. He knew they would get to that eventually, but right now he was a little too pleased about the possibility of getting eight years of frustration out.

His eyes stopped directly on Izuku's crotch area.

The freckled hitman stiffened slightly under his hungry gaze. Katsuki's eyes snapped back up and immediately Izuku's gaze skirted off to the side. Katsuki gave a wolfish grin. He always liked them a little shy, it was even more fun to take them apart that way. It was so clear Izuku was considering Katsuki differently now after the deliberate sexual flirting. Green eyes struggled to stay focused on one place in the room. They darted around the lounge, looking at all the photos on the wall.

It nearly seemed like Izuku was weighing on a decision back and forth.

Katsuki grinned wider when he hoped it was the decision on whether or not to have sex with him.

Katsuki decided at that moment to get the ball rolling and help sway the clearly torn man. They could talk business another time, but right now he had a couple positions in mind to get Izuku twisted into.

With full arrogance, Katsuki caught Izuku's gaze again and smirked handsomely. Without breaking eye contact, he moved a hand upwards to unbutton the top three buttons on his shirt.

The material of his shirt fell open fluidly, letting a good eye-full of his well-defined chest show.

Katsuki fucking loved how Izuku's pretty green eyes went wide at the sight. Feeling like he got his prey, Katsuki then took a confident step forward towards Izuku, ready to get straight into it. However, he was stunned a bit when Izuku quickly stumbled backwards, keeping the distance between them the same.

"I-It's time for dinner," Izuku said in a hurry, fully flustered. "We should get going before we miss all the good food."

Katsuki raised a brow. He glanced down at his half-exposed chest and back at Izuku with a suggestive expression.

"There's clearly another cuisine on the table right now, Izuku. The stupid dining hall food can wait a little bit, don't you think?"

"N-No!" Izuku said quickly.

Katsuki frowned. "No?"

"Ye-Yeah. No. I heard they're having, erm, yakitori and onigiri today. Those are some of my favorite dishes—well o-outside of katsudon! I love katsudon a lot. Hah. H-Have I ever told you that? But I don't think they're going to have any katsudon today. It wasn't on the menu. B-But I still would really like yakitori so let's hurry because I don't want to miss it."

Katsuki became a little confused at the nervous muttering.

"Alright. Sure, whatever, nerd. That's fine but afterwards—" He tried to step forward again. But in the same motion, Izuku took another clumsy step backwards, knocking his back against the door like Katsuki was contiguous with something.

"L-Let get going!" Izuku nervously laughed off.

The freckled man quickly turned around in a hurry and fumbled while gripping the golden door handle. He pushed open the wooden door and hurried off in the blink of an eye.

Katsuki stayed there, frozen for a split second.

...What the fuck?

He stared at the empty spot where Izuku just was at with a baffled expression and mental whiplash.

Then it clicked.

Ah. Right. He's probably super fucking shy about casual sex since he's the hopeless romantic type.

Katsuki sighed and carded his hand through his hair. He started to walk out of the private lounge to find Izuku off to the side in the main lounge with a burning red nape. Katsuki dialed back his flirting a bit for now as he approached Izuku. He buttoned back up his shirt when Izuku struggled a bit too much to look at him.

Katsuki let the moment go—for now—as they started on their way to the dining hall. The air between them was thicker, quieter, and this time Izuku didn't reach for his hand. The smaller man was timidly holding his hands behind his back and looking at their shoes as they walked.

By the time they made it to the dining hall, Katsuki concluded fucking Izuku would be a little trickier than he thought. He reflected on how Izuku reacted when he found the condoms in his wallet with a little bit more meaning. Sleeping with people on assignments was probably considered taboo to him, unlike Katsuki's view that it was perfectly fine. But the sexual attraction was there and Izuku wasn't that dumb to think it wasn't.

All this probably meant Katsuki had to do some work to get the dork out of his shell—which was fine.

Katsuki liked a challenge and if Izuku was anything, it was fucking challenging.

They got their food and true to Izuku's little weird ramble, the man stacked fucking yakitori high on his plate. Katsuki took a couple of pieces of meat, vegetables, and rice for his plate as they walked over to their color group.

Along the way, he could see Izuku deliberate on whether or not to hold his hand—and for the first time Katsuki decided to be the one to do so. He reached for Izuku's free hand and fluidly intertwined their fingers like he had been taught, and he could fucking feel the little gears in Izuku's head working overtime.

"Hey Bakugous!" Mina welcomed them as they sat down.

Katsuki and Izuku easily said hello to everyone, particularly keeping an eye on Shouto and Inasa who gave them ignorantly happy smiles. The pair of cops were chatting and talking about the food around downtown Nago they sampled today. As they talked about all the different sweets they devoured, everyone began eating their meals.

Izuku tried to let go of his hand, but Katsuki didn't let him. He halfway considered it, but no. Katsuki was priming Izuku for fucking which meant the little bastard wasn't going to shy away from holding his goddamn hand now. Especially not after being so nice and dropping all those hints.

At the tightened hold, Izuku stiffened slightly and looked at Katsuki in a baffled way. The blond hitman raised a brow and took a solid bite of the meat skewered on the stick without breaking eye contact.

Izuku's stare intensified.

“Bakugous, did you guys catch up on sleep or do anything fun today?” Eijiro asked with his pointy smile. “Mina and I found this sick spot around the hotel for bowling! I had no clue there was so much stuff jam packed in here. It’s so endless.”

“We played pool and hung out around the lounge area,” Izuku answered. He smiled happily and squeezed Katsuki’s hand in his. “It was fun. Actually, this whole trip has been fun. I almost don’t want this trip to end.” The end of Izuku’s sentence tapered off into a sullen tone as though he was truly sad about it.

It made Katsuki wonder if that sentiment was real or fake.

“Me either,” Shouto tacked on with a distant tone. “There’s still…a lot of unfinished things to do here.”

The code in the detective’s words made Katsuki resist rolling his eyes. Of fucking course the goddamn cop would speak like he was in a television show and some third party was viewing them. Where did he think he was? ‘Law & Order: SVU?’

“When do you all check out by the way?” Katsuki asked, cutting straight into the info they needed before his patience wore thin. “We leave in a couple of days and I’m hoping we’re all together until the end of the trip.”

“Ah, sorry bro, we’re actually leaving in about two days.” Eijiro smiled apologetically. “We have a fitness leadership workshop we signed up for! But I agree it’s been fun.”

“We leave in four days,” Momo said. She pushed around the food on her plate a bit. “Todorokis. How about you two?”

“We leave in five days,” Shouto said smoothly. He was unsuspecting that he possibly gave away a bit of information that he and Izuku needed. They had five days to kill Moore now—which meant to Katsuki he also had five days to get into Izuku’s pants. “We have a big event coming up after that time, so it would be nice to enjoy the facilities here. You never know when they’re going to get shut down or if you’ll be able to come back.”

Katsuki resisted rolling his eyes again.

Yeah. This guy definitely believed he was a guest star on ‘Law & Order: SVU.’

“So true!” Mina agreed, clearly not aware of the plot happening. “I was telling Ei the same thing. This is probably the only time we’ll be in Paradise like this so we should live it up to the fullest! I made a fun checklist of stuff we could do as a paradise crew before Ei and I leave!”

All the people at the table murmured in agreement and Izuku perked up. “That sounds great! What’s first on your list, Mina?”

“Well, the day after tomorrow there’s going to be a fun pop-up amusement park in downtown Nago,” Mina replied. She pulled a neatly folded pink paper out of his bra and read from it.

“It’s called Japan’s Traveling Carnival Park. It’s been touring the country for a while now and it’s on its yearly stop to Okinawa. I always wanted to go! It could be so much fun.”

Katsuki’s whole body uncomfortably stiffened.

Japan’s Traveling Carnival Park.

What were the fucking chances?

Katsuki frowned a bit, unsure if he wanted to actually attend that. He was still clearly affected by those memories and going to the exact place where shit pivoted possibly wasn’t the smartest choice.

Right as Katsuki was about to reject that suggestion, Izuku spoke up. His big green eyes were wide, sparkling and his hand holding Katsuki’s squeezed affectionately.

“Really?” Izuku gasped. His thumb affectionately caressed Katsuki’s skin again. “That’s perfect! Kac—Taro and I always wanted to go to one together.”

The sense of hopefulness in Izuku’s words didn’t sit all the way right in Katsuki’s head.

That tone wasn’t fake.

He looked at the other hitman bizarrely, and when Izuku turned towards him, he appeared like a kid in a candy shop. Katsuki’s words ran dry like a barren river when he looked at Izuku’s big green eyes and curly hair at that moment. All the uncomfortable memories of the childhood separation came flooding back in. Big, green eyes and dark, curly hair.

When Katsuki didn’t utter a word—Izuku’s excitement faltered as though he had remembered something.

“B-But only if he wants to go,” Izuku retracted quietly. He turned his gaze away from Katsuki and put on a fake smile. “Taro isn’t really big on crowds like that.”

“...It’s fine, we can go.” The words were pulled out of him the longer he looked at Izuku’s big green eyes.

His faux husband peered at him curiously at the sudden shift in demeanor. Everyone else at the table looked overjoyed at the idea about the carnival.

“Alrighty! Carnival it is!” Eijiro said excitedly and high-fived his wife.

The conversation was swept into Mina’s list, going over all the things she had researched them to all do together. Izuku melted into the flowing river of conversation, periodically glancing at him as though to make sure he was alright.

But for an unknown reason, no. Katsuki wasn’t entirely alright. The memory of when he was separated from his unknown childhood best friend sparked up at the idea of attending that carnival. He could perfectly feel the cold, see that blinking ‘C’ on the pink, neon sign and hear the time tick away on his little red watch. Katsuki ended up wading in an awkward space. He distantly listened in on the various conversations at the round table as he struggled not to zone out.

Katsuki grew quiet and shifted into eavesdropping while eating his food.

To entertain himself, the odd feeling hitman glanced up at the mural on the dome shaped ceiling. He admired the beautifully tragic painting once again. His eyes kept dancing across all the panels, soaking in the details. He looked back to that strange last panel of the angel of death and the lover who took a bite of the venomous apple.

“I won a random assortment of comics today at some raffle today actually,” Jirou mentioned offhandedly to Izuku. The mention of comics caught Katsuki’s attention a bit. “I don’t really want them, and I don’t think they’ll fit in my suitcase. Do you or Taro like comics?”

“Oh yeah! We both really love them,” Izuku answered easily. He grinned wide and there was a look of content on his face like he was thinking of some far-off memory. “His favorite superhero is actually All Might. If you have any of those comics, we’ll take them.”

Katsuki stopped chewing his food mid-bite.

Did I tell him that?

He frowned. He was really unsure he mentioned that at all. He hadn’t thought about comics in fucking ages, and he was positive he hadn’t told Izuku that All Might had been his favorite character. Red eyes cut to Izuku a tad when that phantom feeling from earlier in the day returned.

“Oh, retro! Nice,” Jirou said with a thumbs up. “Luckily for you, they are! I’ll make sure to drop them off at your room later.”

“Perfect! Thank you so much!” Izuku happily giggled. He looked as though he was genuinely happy to hear that.

Katsuki searched his sharp memory for the information he had given to the other hitman.

He was pretty careful about what he revealed and didn’t reveal considering he still had to keep in mind Izuku worked for a potential rival company similar to his. However, Katsuki was nearly damn sure he never fucking mentioned All Might of all things. Maybe Izuku guessed? But All Might comics were so fucking niche. They weren’t particularly popular enough for even someone with Izuku’s aim to metaphorically hit a bullseye like that.

It was weird.

The conversation veered off into something disinteresting and Katsuki tried his best to shake off the whispering phantom that was attached to his skin. He felt the ghostly hands of the past grip his shoulders and heard a whisper in his ear again. The voice was full of blaring static: “It’s ~~Izuku~~.”

“You’re so awesome, Hiroji!” Momo laughed in the distance.

Izuku's fake name clashed harshly in his mind against the unknown words the phantom memory was whispering. It felt deeply wrong, and tugged at his skin and forced chilling goosebumps to ignite.

Katsuki lightly shook his head, ignoring the way Izuku's false name caused him discomfort.

They ended up going out with the group after dinner. Everyone was high energy and decided to go hang out at the beach together. It was a fun time as they all set up their beach towels and changed into bathing suits. Their entire Paradise Crew was enjoying the relaxing setting as they watched a couple of surfers handle the large incoming waves.

However, when the sun began to set, Katsuki could see Izuku was struggling to stay awake.

It had been a long day and even to Katsuki the idea of a bed was appealing. The freckled hitman struggled to keep up with the high energy of the group and periodically Katsuki caught him closing his eyes for a bit under the ruse of 'resting his eyes.'

When he caught Izuku closing his eyes under their beach umbrella for a fourth fucking time, Katsuki decided it was time to go.

He insisted to the knuckle headed freckled man that they should go head back to their room. The first time he suggested it, Izuku rejected it. Izuku blushed and gave a sheepish smile. He shifted over on the sand, still acting as though Katsuki was contagious and that he was shy about what had happened earlier. But when the blond man caught him dozing off against his shoulder, Izuku agreed then that a bed did sound nice.

They said goodbye to their Paradise Crew as they headed back towards the hotel.

The entire walk back to their room, Katsuki fiddled quietly with the pink hotel keycard. He looked at the little hearts and palm tree icons that were painted on the plastic surface.

He eyed Izuku who was utterly quiet. But if the silence was from shyness or tiredness, Katsuki wasn't sure. What he did know though, was that he was getting rid of that pillow barrier tonight. Katsuki plotted in his head that he would fake some accidental cuddles, spoon the fuck out of Izuku, get some more grinding in and that would easily lead to a morning jerk off session. Then boom. Hate sex. Easy as fucking cake.

He swiped the card to the suite with a slight eagerness.

They walked into the room and the first thing Izuku did was rub his eyes.

The smaller man was clearly tethered on the edge of a deep sleep. Izuku proceeded to stretch in a way that reminded Katsuki of a fox as he started towards gathering his belongings to use the bathroom for his night routine.

Katsuki grinned a bit, realizing this was his chance to set the stage. When Izuku's back was turned, digging in his suitcase, Katsuki walked over to the bed. He began to discreetly move the pillow barrier off the bed while Izuku was distracted.

“You’re really fucking sleepy huh?” Katsuki asked. Izuku nodded with his eyes closed.

“Extremely, I can barely think straight,” Izuku muttered with a light yawn. He grabbed a fresh set of pajamas and a towel and started to make his way to the shower. “If I’m not out in twenty minutes, please come check on me. I sometimes fall asleep in the shower when I’m tired like this.”

“Will do. Good night, Izuku,” Katsuki said slyly as he moved the last pillow off the bed.

“Goodnight, Kacchan,” Izuku replied tiredly.

Both men froze.

“...What did you call me?” Katsuki said slowly.

He dropped the red pillow to the ground and rounded on Izuku whose eyes were now wide awake. The freckled man’s mouth hung open in shock as they stared at each other in horror.

“Izuku. What the fuck did you just call me?”

“I-I called you Kacchan. But Katsuki, w-wait—”

“—Why the hell would you call me Kacchan?” Katsuki nearly growled and he looked at Izuku with deep disgust. “Don’t call me that, Izuku. What the fuck?”

A piercing spear of hurt cut straight through Katsuki and an inexplicable gut punch of betrayal twisted the inside of his stomach.

He knew they weren’t exactly friends, but it felt like a stab in the chest to have Izuku bring that up after they had been getting along so well. He stared with burning eyes at the man in front of him as his throat started to close up like someone really was choking him. He was truly regretting letting that shit out during the camping trip, but he didn’t think Izuku would be twisted enough to call him the very nickname he told them all about.

Then Izuku’s big, green eyes softened.

They softened with fucking pity.

Katsuki’s sharp features twisted into repulsion and his heart began to hammer out of control.

Kacchan. Kacchan. Fucking Kacchan. The sound of that simple, innocent nickname kicked up all the buried emotions sitting at the bottom of Katsuki’s core. Suddenly he was being crushed underneath the guilt he felt for leaving and the hurt that came from the separation. All the ugly, feelings of loneliness that he wanted to ignore sneered in his face reminding him how broken he was.

“Kacchan, wait. Please don’t get mad. I can explain—”

“—No,” Katsuki rejected instantly in a deep hiss. His defenses shot up out of his control. He shook his head and marched up to Izuku with a blazen look of fury, ready to put the other man in his place immediately. “You do not get to tell me not to be mad about you using that nickname after I was vulnerable. Don’t ever call me Kacchan again, you fucking creep.”

Izuku flinched for the first time Katsuki ever witnessed but it didn’t stop him.

“Where the fuck do you think you get off calling me that after I fucking told everyone why I was given that nickname? Hah?” Katsuki hissed. His voice slipped into a louder volume. “Do you think that it’s fucking funny? Are you that goddamn twisted in the head?”

“No, of course not.” Izuku’s face crumbled, his lips slightly trembled as though he was struggling to say something more. Pain fanned across his face as he stared up at the angry blond looming over him. “I didn’t mean it like that. It slipped out.”

The color drained from Izuku’s face as he stayed petrified there gazing at Katsuki with pity. Pity he didn’t fucking want, and he didn’t need—especially from Izuku. Katsuki nostrils flared as he leaned into Izuku’s face with a nasty scowl.

“Listen to me carefully because I don’t deal with bullshit like that,” Katsuki threatened. “People like you don’t get to use that nickname, so you need to erase it from your goddamn memory.”

“People like me?” Izuku echoed. His face warped into a raw, vulnerable expression. “What does that mean?”

“It means fucked up people like you.” Katsuki used his words to dig into him and twist like a knife plunged deep. “People who don’t fucking flinch when I snap a man’s neck. Fucked up people who murder a man in cold blood in front of another. Fucked up people like you who have been a goddamn thorn in my side for years. You don’t get to corrupt that memory for me with how fucked up you are because I already am fucked up enough to taint it myself.”

An unmistakable aggrieved look eclipsed Izuku’s face. His delicate freckled features twisted, clearly wounded. Big, green eyes were struggling not to let tears fall and he appeared as though he had been violently slapped.

Katsuki only then realized that his own eyes were prickling with tears. They stung, and pushed at the burning rims of his eyes for the first time since he was thirteen.

The silence between them swelled with hurt and neither man moved.

Izuku’s lips were quivering. Katsuki’s fists were curled. When Izuku’s hurt expression became too much, Katsuki glanced away—but his eyes landed directly on Izuku’s black violin case.

His heart clutched painfully as all the past memories started tumbling forward.

It all hurt a little too much suddenly. Katsuki’s chest heaved slightly when his breathing convulsed. The strange phantom feeling from earlier gripped him again as he looked at the dings and scrapes on Izuku’s violin case; it was then that Katsuki decided he needed to be alone. Far away from Izuku and his big, green eyes.

“I’m going to go get some air, don’t wait up for me,” Katsuki whispered. His chest tightened to the point he felt pain.

Izuku didn’t respond, and Katsuki didn’t glance to see if he was still staring at him.

He grabbed his keycard and marched straight back out from where he came.

Katsuki walked along the beach under the full moon by himself until he lost track of time.

It was well into the witching hours and there wasn’t a single soul awake with him now. He took off his shoes and walked steadily on the beach to calm down. This was one of the only things he could do to calm down—take time away from everyone to empty his head. He was beyond thankful no one else was around as he blinked back tears, preventing them from falling.

The entirety of the beach was like a ghost town. But while solitude usually was a remedy for his disharmony, Katsuki felt alone. He felt far more alone than he usually did as he sunk his feet into the soft sand.

He glanced back at the hotel that was shaded under the tall palm trees swaying with the wind. From this distance, Katsuki could see the white and yellow window squares in the high skyscraper complex. Some windows were dark, signaling whoever was inside was asleep while others were still illuminated showing people’s silhouettes.

He glanced up at one particular one, trying to see if he could see Izuku still awake, but the light was officially off.

He didn’t know why he cared—he shouldn’t.

Izuku so casually threw around a nickname he had no right of using. However, the pained emotion that had plagued Izuku’s deep green eyes haunted Katsuki. Izuku seemed beyond hurt and Katsuki wondered if he should’ve said what he said at the end about Izuku being fucked up. Katsuki sighed and pushed the heels of his palms into his eye sockets.

He stopped walking, sinking in the sand a bit. The wind howled and blew through his hair. Katsuki turned his sullen eyes to look out at the moonlit ocean waves. The subtle lighting made them appear more fragile and soothing. All the glittering reflections from the city lights, and the moon danced in the ocean like tiny stars were drifting on its surface.

After another hour, Katsuki felt himself finally calm again.

He looked down at his black watch and realized it was 04:44. Izuku was probably asleep, which was what Katsuki wanted. He could go back upstairs and build that pillow barrier again and they could act as though this never happened. After hearing Izuku call him Kacchan and look at him with such deep pity, all Katsuki really wanted now was to finish off the assignment and part ways.

He walked back to the hotel, entering the empty lobby. The checkered marble floors were shining, and the usually packed hotel was entirely empty in a ghostly way. He walked to the elevators and pressed the heart shaped up button. As he was waiting, a gentle breeze blew through the open window to the side. It called him as the sheer white curtain wafted with the flow. Katsuki was going to disregard it like normal, however with the drifting wind came a soft distant melody.

Katsuki frowned when it evoked a sense of ominous nostalgia, and he could have sworn his ears were playing tricks on him. The sound of a distant violin playing in the night called to him and he was compelled to walk over to the windowsill. He gripped the ledge and peered his head out to be met with nothing but the hedges of the rose garden maze in the back of the hotel.

The melody was faint. Faint as a dying ember struggling for oxygen, but Katsuki could hear it ever so slightly. He listened closer and he could've sworn that it sounded similar to—

No.

It couldn't be.

The phantom holding onto him returned and Katsuki pushed away from the window, with slightly shaky hands.

The elevator dinged for him, and the doors slid wide with a creek, but Katsuki rushed past.

His heart began to pound quicker in tempo as he thought about that song. A unique song that, as far as he thought, only three people knew about. He found himself heading out the large white doors of the back of the hotel to follow the calling of the soft violin. The feeling of a phantom spirit guided him by pulling his wrist as he thought about everything that came with that song.

He thought about big, green eyes. The white violin. He thought about the cracked, forgotten statue of the angel and the leaning abandoned church. He could even feel the chill of the winter winds and suddenly Katsuki felt like he wasn't in Okinawa anymore. He was transported back to the dense city of Tokyo, lost and confused.

Katsuki wandered around the dark rose garden, searching for the source until he could hear it was coming from inside the maze. Scarlet eyes glanced at the beautiful vine covered entrance that seemed more like an enchanting portal to another realm.

Suddenly, he could hear the distant memory of two giggling boys playing tag. Then his mind supplied for him the unclear vision of his savior, eagerly wanting to play tag. The blurry faced boy stopped, turned to him, and smiled through the fog. The memory of his savior happily gestured for him to follow into the maze and then ran off.

Katsuki proceeded in carefully, feeling like he had finally lost it.

He went down the winding, twisting paths that nearly felt like navigating the labyrinth inside his own mind. He followed the sound of that melody and could see glimpses of the memory of his blurry faced savior giggling and running all around the corners of the maze.

He tried to follow the sound but was met with a handful of dead ends—like he always was.

Then gradually, the melody picked up in tempo and Katsuki began to trust his gut. He walked with the beat through the intricate maze, purely guided by listening to that haunting song.

The closer he got to the source, the more real it became.

Each note was played exactly how he remembered it to be and then gradually more memories followed.

The phantom figure of the blurry faced boy running through the maze grew clearer. With every new note, Katsuki could clearly see a new feature.

He saw dark, curly hair that was now dark, green curly hair. He saw light freckles that were still faint. He saw honeydew skin and two dimples. Katsuki's heart started to beat erratically as he wandered deeper into the maze and his memory. With each step the phantom boy felt more real. Then when he was around the corner from the mystery violin player, the phantom of his savior, turned to him.

The vision of the boy was now perfectly clear, and he gestured for Katsuki to follow him as he ran off towards the sound of the violin.

Katsuki followed the melody, fully compelled. When he rounded the corner, he stopped right under the vine covered archway that opened to the marble fountain of the woman with a vase. Then his eyes landed on a single, lone figure that was hunched over.

Sitting there underneath the statue was Izuku, playing The Dance of The Love Birds with the same white violin from his childhood.

All the oxygen left Katsuki's lungs as he watched in a trance. Izuku's body swayed with the music and he treated the ivory violin like it was a natural extension of his body. His eyes were closed, brows pinched together and his facial expression was purely vulnerable as he played. But what was the most haunting thing was that Izuku played the chords exactly like the old violinist used to: with a frightening sense of passion.

Then the phantom whispered into Katsuki's ear once more. However, this time there was no static as the memory intertwined with the eerie melody:

"Can I call you Kacchan?"

"Ye-Yeah. Kacchan works. What's your name?"

"It's Izuku."

"…Izuku," Katsuki whispered uneasily into the dark night. "It was you?"

The song abruptly stopped and Izuku whipped his head harshly towards Katsuki.

Twin bloodshot eyes stared at each other in shock.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below if you have any thoughts, comments, or screams. No preview this week because it's basically all spoilers.

Side note, the song I repeatedly link for The Dance of The Love Birds is called "Passacaglia violin and viola". It's in the Deathly Beautiful spotify playlist as the 6th song listed :) I can't compose music but in my mind that suits it going forward in this story. I hope you like it as much as I do! Thank you so much for reading! ^^

"…Izuku," Katsuki whispered uneasily into the dark night. "It was you?"

The song abruptly stopped and Izuku whipped his head harshly towards Katsuki.

Twin bloodshot eyes stared at each other in shock.

Everything in Katsuki's stomach knotted until he felt like he was on a sinking boat. He was drowning deeper and deeper in ghastly realization by the second. He even struggled to breathe as it all came flooding in, forcing all the air out of his lungs. Even though the song had halted, it lingered behind in his head—somehow even louder than before.

The rise and fall of that melody from so long ago trickled all over his thoughts like gentle rain. It made every single one of his distant childhood memories come barging in, flashing at lightning speed right before his eyes. But this time they were clear. They were crystal fucking clear and full of freckles, green eyes, and dark, curly hair.

Katsuki took a hesitant step towards Izuku, eyes wide in disbelief.

Then like a startled animal, Izuku lurched backwards as if he got too close to a flame. Without taking another second, he began to stumble over himself and scrambled to leave. His trembling hands clumsily tossed the violin and bow back into the worn-down case. He snapped the case shut with force.

Katsuki's eyes widened even more, and his heart rate sped up in tempo. Izuku was leaving. Izuku was trying to leave. Katsuki began running towards him, reaching out a hand for the juddering man.

"W-Wait—Izuku—"

The name clashed in his head. Immediately, visions of the past and present struggled for dominance.

The two versions of Izuku in his mind blended together as well as water and oil. On the surface sat the current version of Izuku that he knew: the bloodied hitman who he tousled with for eight years. Under the surface was the version of young Izuku: the one who sheltered him, bathed him, and showered him with affection. The version that helped him survive and left a note that said he—

Katsuki's throat clutched on that last thought.

The moment Katsuki drew too close, Izuku darted away into the dark maze. Katsuki shot out a hand to grab Izuku and stop him, but the fabric of the silky shirt slipped past his fingertips as if he failed at catching a ghost.

"Izuku!" Katsuki called out with desperation. His voice cracked at the end, and he didn't know why but he knew he couldn't let Izuku go—he couldn't. "Izuku—fuck. Wait—"

His body operated like it was being jerked around by the hands of fate as he sprung forward to seize the frantically retreating man. Both of his hands forcefully grabbed Izuku's arms. His fingers dug into the other man, checking to make sure this wasn't a dream, but also to stop him from fleeing. He clung on to Izuku as though he was his last lifeline.

Without an ounce of hesitation, Izuku tried to twist out of his tight hold. The violin case dropped to the ground, shaking the earth beneath them as though they were a natural disaster together. And maybe they were.

The case snapped back open, and the violin came tumbling out the second they began to tousle about.

Katsuki's pleas fell on Izuku's seemingly deaf ears. No matter how much he begged for Izuku to be still, it felt as though Izuku struggled more against him. It became clear that Izuku had no intention of staying when their scuffle became more severe. Katsuki hissed as they began pushing and pulling on each other in a familiar way that they had in the last eight years. But this time it was somberly different as tears clutched the edges of their eyes.

Every time Katsuki thought he had Izuku, the other man would push against his chest with all his strength. But Katsuki couldn't be budged. He couldn't be pushed away. Not right now. Not after so long.

"G-Get off of me," Izuku's broken voice begged.

Katsuki gritted his teeth and shook his head. "J-Just wait a moment—"

"—No, let me go you asshole—"

The next few moments were as big of a blur as inside of Katsuki's mind. Izuku harshly yanked himself away one more time and tripped in the process and Katsuki's grip on him refused to let go. The two of them went toppling down on the soft grass with Katsuki on top of Izuku trying to pin him to stay still. They struggled back and forth like harsh, clashing waves in a storm.

It was only when Katsuki wrapped his arms around Izuku from behind, restraining the man's arms to his side, did they finally stop.

The pounding of Katsuki's erratic heart deafened his hearing. His pulse was racing out of his control, and he could feel Izuku's was too.

Synchronized heavy, uneven breathing filled the night air as the stars and moon shone down on them. Katsuki kept his arms securely wrapped around Izuku, feeling as though he had finally caught the phantom haunting his past. Izuku had his head down, and his hands were forcefully clutching the blades of grass until he uprooted several of them.

"Please." Izuku's voice was hoarse and heavy. "Let go."

"I can't," Katsuki replied. His voice was rickety. His hands were shaking. He barely recognized himself as he gaped at the ground below them in shock. His mind was clouded by the sound of two boys giggling, and the warm feeling of his forgotten savior's touch. Izuku's touch. "I can't let go. I've been trying my whole life, but I can't."

His grip on Izuku tightened as he hugged the other man closer.

They stayed there, frozen in place.

Katsuki didn't know how much time passed as he struggled to process what was happening. The leaves on the hedges rustled. The sound of the running fountain echoed between them. They both stayed there, unmoving as their breathing calmed down.

His mind obsessively repeated the same memories over and over again. Dimples. Freckles. Green hair. Green eyes. Pretty fucking green eyes that looked at him like he was the world.

When it seemed like an eternity passed, Izuku hesitantly lifted a hand. He touched where Katsuki was sinking his calloused fingers into him. It burned slightly. The grip was nearly painful and all the way desperate. Until that, Katsuki hadn't registered that his own body was shaking. His hand trembled with rocky unease as Izuku's warm fingers covered it.

They silently communicated when words failed.

Izuku touched his hand in a way that mimicked water being thrown over a raging flame. The burn of anxiousness smothered out slowly, and Katsuki relaxed his hold. His arms went slack ever so slightly as he started to come down from the intensity of the moment. Izuku did too. Katsuki didn't let go all the way, only enough for Izuku to breathe again and gasp for a large gulp of air.

"Is…is it really you?" Katsuki questioned with a splintering crack. "Was it you that year in Tokyo?"

"Y-Yes."

That single word simultaneously pierced him and comforted him.

It was Izuku. It was really him.

The freckled man turned around in his arms, facing him. Katsuki released him and placed his forearms on either side of Izuku's head as they locked eyes up close. Katsuki threatened to spill tears as he studied the person from his past closer, trying to etch all Izuku's features into his mind.

Neither one of them moved as they laid there with their faces twisted in disbelief.

They inspected one another quietly. Shock, longing, and hurt melted together in endless green and red. There were so many emotions spilling out that Katsuki's heart clutched trying to process it all. The pair of long-lost friends gazed at each other for several moments as though the other was a walking daydream. Or a nightmare. Katsuki wasn't sure which one this would classify as.

"Did you know?" Katsuki asked. "This whole time?"

"No." Izuku shook his head and screwed his eyes shut. "I figured it out at the campfire when you mentioned being called 'Kacchan'."

Katsuki's heart fell into his stomach so fast he became nauseous.

The campfire.

He thought back on what Izuku had said about fate. Specifically what he said about being destined to cross paths with another soul on this hell hole earth. Now those words felt heavy with deep implications as he looked at the person underneath him. This should be impossible.

He struggled to say something. Anything.

He wasn't sure what he wanted to say as he stayed paralyzed in place, caging Izuku in. All he knew is that he didn't want Izuku to flee again. A twist in his stomach grew at the idea of releasing Izuku, terrified that this was all a vivid hallucination.

“Why didn’t you say something sooner?” Katsuki asked past the lump clogging his throat.

“I—I don’t know,” Izuku whispered. He opened his eyes and set his vulnerable gaze on Katsuki. “I-I thought about saying something. All night and all day today, I wanted to tell you, but I didn’t know how. E-Especially after all this time. It was messing with me. Like really messing with my head. You have to be feeling weird about all of this too, aren’t you?”

“Of course. It feels like—” fate.

Katsuki swallowed that word.

It was thick in his throat and tasted bitter yet sweet. He stared at Izuku’s watery eyes, and his heart hammered to the point he thought it would break free from its holding.

“It feels like a really big coincidence,” Katsuki finished, tapering off into a whisper.

Izuku gazed at him harder. Viridian eyes flickered all around his face, examining his nose, his lips and even the soft way his blond locks of hair fell forward.

“Yeah. A coincidence.”

Silence fell again.

Katsuki leaned away. His heart had finally climbed down from the mountain of anxiety it was perched on and he could think straight again. He fell to Izuku’s side while keeping his eyes still trained on him. It was as if he could barely look away, afraid that if he did this would all vanish.

On the other hand, Izuku stared up at the sky as though there was further explanation up above them.

All the memories of their intermingled lives danced about. It was almost too much to think about—or even accept. How had they recollided here, in Okinawa of all places? The very same location they said they would run away too when they were kids—

Izuku turned his gentle gaze towards him with the softest expression he had ever seen. He wondered what was going through Izuku’s head. Was he happy? Was he sad? Was he in shock—or was he struggling to stay awake after going so long without proper rest. Big green eyes blinked tiredly; a sleep deprived lag so clearly present.

Katsuki’s heart squeezed without warning in a way he wasn’t prepared to tackle.

“We should go back upstairs,” Katsuki whispered eventually. He was still unsure if this was all real.

Izuku wordlessly agreed, no longer putting up a fight.

They both stood up, regarding the other quietly. Katsuki's limbs suddenly were awkward. He didn't know what to do with himself as he became hyper aware of his whole body. He watched how Izuku carefully picked up the fallen violin and bow. Both their eyes lingered on it for a moment, looking at all the cracks it had. Then Izuku placed it back into the case with care and sealed it tightly.

After that, they walked back to their room side by side.

As they made their way back through the empty foyer, all Katsuki had was questions. Boundless questions that were now plaguing his thoughts. He tried to connect the past and present Izukus to each other, but he was clearly missing the middleman.

How did someone as nice as Izuku wind up a cold-blooded killer? Just like he had.

What had happened in those ten years? Izuku said he did this job for survival. So, what the hell did that mean? Did he need money? Did he need food? Did something go terribly wrong in his life? Did someone die? The questions kept coming as his imagination cruelly filled in the gaps.

Katsuki's migraine intensified until thick, acidic bile burned his throat.

When they made it back to the hotel room, a mountain of questions sat stacked on the forefront of his mind. He wanted to blurt them out, but as he looked at Izuku, his lips sealed tight. Izuku's shoulders were hunched. His bloodshot eyes looked like they were set ablaze with tiny red veins crawling across the whites of his eyeballs like spiderwebs.

His faux husband stared at the baby pink walls and heart shaped bed as if they really were in limbo. It all seemed dissimilar. Before it was as though the overly lovesick room was taunting Katsuki, reminding him how he was stuck in this gimmicky paradise and that love would always be something within reach but not something he could touch. Now it felt dull. Full of nothing but a facade and Katsuki realized he was so goddamn blind.

This whole time. This whole time Izuku was here.

They changed into their pajamas without another word, stealing glances at the other in the moonlit room. When Izuku climbed back into the bed he was awkwardly fiddling with his fingers, staring at the spinning ceiling fan. Katsuki made a move to climb into the bed as well, feeling absolutely drained. However, his foot stepped on the soft pile of pillows that he had removed earlier. He halted.

He surveyed them.

He hesitantly reached down but stopped.

Izuku watched him closely the whole time, the fidgeting with his hands halted.

Katsuki sighed and suddenly the pillow barrier seemed incredibly stupid. He climbed under the covers without a word, and they laid side by side again. Katsuki folded his hands over the edge of the cover and eventually turned his head towards Izuku. Nearly luminescent green eyes stared back at him like he was a complex problem to solve.

“You’re not going to put the pillow barrier back up?” Izuku asked.

The clicking of the ceiling fan filled the room. Katsuki toyed with the idea, but the new clarity in his mind wouldn’t allow him to even fathom doing that.

“No, no barrier anymore,” Katsuki said exhaustedly.

Izuku gave him a tired smile, obviously struggling to stay awake. Almost like he was afraid to fall asleep. A part of Katsuki’s heart tugged and twisted at that. Maybe Izuku was scared this was all a dream too. He hadn’t considered that there was a possibility Izuku had the same fears as him. Maybe he even had the same nightmares.

Eventually, Izuku fell fast asleep. Katsuki became slightly memorized by the gentle rise and fall of his chest as his breathing evened out.

“Goodnight,” Katsuki whispered.

He clutched the covers and hoped when he awoke, that this would all still be real.

Katsuki found himself dreaming again.

He floated into his younger self softly, in contrast to previous times when he was hurled into it. Everything was different now. Everything was softer. Clearer. The edges of his vision were no longer vignetted black. Instead, they were stained bright magenta and there was a warmhearted touch wrapped around him. It was as if he was being hugged in a blanket someone had hand stitched together, solely for him. He stared around at the scene, and everything was in sharp, high definition.

It was the middle of spring. The pink flowers on the trees had blossomed and there were birds up above circling round and round, chirping. He could almost remember how the pollen in the air tickled his nose. People were walking around in bright colored shorts, dresses and sandals, laughing in melodic ways.

He was in his plaza again. The way it had been before the construction. He was standing underneath the statue of the broken angel. He gazed up at it, looking into the stone eyes that stared back at him in an ominous manner. Beneath it was the looney old man. He was smiling with all his crooked teeth, happily playing the violin. The song he was performing was as soft and gentle as the spring breeze.

There was a subtle tug on Katsuki’s hand.

He looked down to where a smaller hand was holding his and saw the two fabric rings. He could remember smiling, enjoying how they matched. He also remembered seeing the way young Izuku smiled softly at him.

“I like being married to you, Kacchan,” young Izuku whispered like it was a secret. He swung their intertwined hands and giggled. A cherry-colored blush adored his round face. “This is the most fun I’ve ever had.”

Katsuki remembered laughing as he swung their arms together in sync with Izuku.

“Me too, Izuku.”

Young Izuku kissed him on the cheek then kissed him quickly on the mouth. They smiled shyly at each other as Katsuki moved to steal another kiss. But before he could, there was a loud sound from up above. It mimicked roaring thunder without the clash of lightning. Katsuki glanced up at the clear blue sky, confused. Then slowly, the banging grew louder and louder. With each bang, the pink tinted dream started to fade.

Katsuki returned his eyes to young Izuku who was smiling at him fondly. Izuku whispered ‘goodbye’ as the dream started to end. The fingers intertwined with his slowly faded and Izuku’s hand fazed through him. Sadness trickled into Katsuki as he tried to desperately grab it again, but it was useless. He watched helplessly as it all dulled to white.

Young Izuku’s smile was the last thing he saw.

The banging continued and Katsuki sluggishly blinked awake.

When he became more aware of his surroundings, the loud thumping could be distinguished as knocking. Katsuki groaned slightly because he was getting really fucking sick of motherfuckers banging on their door.

He opened his tired eyes all the way and the first thing he saw was Izuku. The other man was still sound asleep, mildly snoring. His hand was very close to Katsuki’s on the bed, and he looked a single scootch away from cuddling him. Somehow, they had moved closer on the mattress throughout the night, their bodies turned inward and knees touching lightly.

The ruby encrusted ring on Izuku’s finger caught the morning light from the window. The sight of that wedding ring made Katsuki’s heart skip unannounced. He looked down at his own hand. He stared at their matching rings with all their glorious irony.

The loud knocking continued and broke Katsuki out of his sleepy daze.

He grunted slightly as he carefully climbed out of bed, doing his best not to wake Izuku. He walked over to the door and opened it ever so slightly to see Shouto standing there with a friendly smile. Katsuki didn’t return the morning cheer. The undercover detective gave him a small wave and peered inside the room curiously.

“Good afternoon,” Shouto said in a quiet voice when he caught sight of the sleeping Izuku. “Sorry to bother you guys. I was nominated by our Paradise Crew to come do a check in since you two missed breakfast and lunch.”

That alerted him.

“We missed breakfast and lunch?” Katsuki groggily asked.

He furrowed his brow and leaned out to read Shouto's sleek watch. His eyes widened. It was well into the afternoon. Fuck. They really had been asleep all day.

"Mhm. We wanted to make sure you two were okay," Shouto said. He shrugged lightly. "We're all about to go bowling soon. If you want, we can wait on you."

Katsuki sucked in a deep inhale at that proposal. He didn't exactly feel like sharing Izuku's attention today—or any time soon for that matter. There were so many questions that were burning inside of his chest that he was holding back. If he didn't get the chance to have them answered, he feared he might explode from holding them inside. At that moment, Katsuki glanced behind him at the long-lost childhood friend. His green curls were sprayed across the silk pillow as he cuddled in further to the covers.

Katsuki turned back around to Shouto with a reluctant expression and leaned against the door frame.

"I think we'll pass today," Katsuki quietly whispered. His eyes stared down at Shouto's red and white sneakers. "We, uh, had a late night, so I think we're going to take the day to rest and relax for a while. Just the two of us."

"Ah, that's fine," Shouto said with an approving look. He smiled at Katsuki as though he was happy to hear that. "Getting some quality time in?"

Katsuki froze a little. "Um, sure. Quality time. We'll see you all tomorrow at the carnival."

"Sounds good. See you then Taro," Shouto said. He waved goodbye and then walked back down the long hallway with his hands in his pockets.

Katsuki watched him go carefully. Although he knew he should be focused on the assignment, his brain was stuck on Izuku. It felt like all the memories and questions burning inside of him were ropes. Ropes that were restraining him in place, coiling and searing through his skin. He couldn't move on even if he wanted to.

He quietly locked the door and sauntered back over to the bed. He slid under the covers again and carefully studied how Izuku subconsciously scooted closer to him.

Katsuki didn't move as he stared at their matching wedding rings.

By the time Izuku woke up, Katsuki had ordered room service for the two of them.

The service worker rolled in several silver platters for them, filling the room with the savory aroma of the food. Katsuki remembered Izuku had mentioned his favorite food was katsudon. Or something like that. The waiter placed the two bowls on the wooden table in the room with a loud clunk.

Izuku was fully awake now. He sat up in bed. His oversized green pajamas swallowed his figure whole as he rubbed his eyes. Moss colored curls were tousled in every direction, making Izuku's bed head somehow the most adorable shit Katsuki had ever seen. Katsuki watched as Izuku's eyes widened in surprise at the food on the table and then glanced at the clock on the nightstand.

Izuku's eyebrows shot up sky high.

"Shit!" Izuku yelled. He scrambled for his phone, stood up and stared at Katsuki like the world nearly ended. "We overslept, we missed—"

"—I know," Katsuki interrupted. He closed the door behind the kind service worker with a tight smile before locking it. "I already told the group we're going to take the day to ourselves, and I ordered room service."

Izuku stopped his flailing. He stood frozen in the middle of the room clutching his phone with both hands.

Katsuki raised an eyebrow at him when Izuku stared at him for a prolonged period.

After a while Izuku nodded slowly and put his phone back down. He wiped his sweaty palms on the fabric of his pajama pants and looked towards the two bowls of katsudon on the table.

"Oh. Well. That works," Izuku muttered lamely. "Um, thank you."

"Not a problem at all."

Katsuki walked over to the small round table and sat down in one of the wooden chairs. He picked up the candy-colored chopsticks and leaned back in the chair to start eating. When Izuku still didn't move, Katsuki gave a pointed look and gestured towards Izuku's steaming bowl of food.

"Are you just going to stand there or are you going to eat?" Katsuki asked, mildly impatient.

"S-Shouldn't we be working on taking out Moore?"

Katsuki frowned. "I think Moore can wait a day or two. Shouto basically hinted the police raid isn't for another four days. We have time."

Izuku snapped out of his daze before shyly walking over to the table. "Right."

Izuku sat down across from Katsuki, and the awkwardness was tangible. Words were teetering on the edge of Katsuki's tongue, begging him to say something. Anything. But he didn't. Silence as searing as a million burning stars waded in their muteness. The two ate, stealing glances at the other.

Katsuki could feel the weight of his age on his skin with how intensely Izuku was staring at him. Green eyes flickered at his features. Like he was trying to make sense of him. He wondered if Izuku was having trouble overlapping his younger self and present self as well. They should talk. But he simply didn't know where to start. He feared if he began simply asking one question, it would snowball into a million.

So instead, he watched Izuku scoff down the katsudon. There was an indescribable wrench in his heart when Izuku finished his food first. Katsuki then glanced down at his bowl and without a word pushed it across the table. The other man froze, stunned.

“You don’t want it?” Izuku questioned carefully.

“You can have it,” Katsuki muttered under his breath. “I’ve never seen you inhale food faster. I’m sure you swallowed some of that chicken fucking whole.”

He grabbed Izuku’s empty bowl to ignore the way his heart twisted and set it aside. Izuku quietly muttered ‘thank you’ before digging into it. There was a distinctive look of bliss on that freckled face, and Katsuki subconsciously made a mental note that Izuku really liked katsudon.

As Izuku ate the second bowl of food, Katsuki poured tea for them with his legs crossed. The white porcelain cups were neatly decorated with ink drawings of two tiny birds.

“I…I have a lot of questions,” Izuku suddenly said. He put his chopsticks neatly across the empty bowl and grabbed his cup of tea. “If it’s alright, I would like to ask them. B-But only if you’re comfortable.”

“Same,” Katsuki replied. He sipped his tea without taking his eyes off Izuku. “You can go first.”

“What happened? O-Or where did you go?” Izuku whispered, barely inaudible. “I know you mentioned your mother b-but I…I worried something bad happened to you that day. I thought maybe someone kidnapped you at the carnival because I was late. Or worse.”

Katsuki’s heart hammered in his chest like a pounding drum. He averted his gaze when Izuku made a pained face.

“My mother came and found me that day,” Katsuki admitted. “She said we would come back —but we never did. She feared ever setting foot in Tokyo again for some reason so…we didn’t.”

Izuku nodded slowly. He gave a forced smile. “I-I’m glad you found her again.”

Katsuki didn’t say anything because he was unsure if he really felt the same.

“I came back to Tokyo when I was thirteen,” Katsuki confessed. Izuku’s breathing stopped slightly. “I went to the church, and it was still there. I—I went inside of the nook.”

Izuku’s eyes averted this time. He stared down at the small ripples in the tea.

His fingers strummed along the porcelain cup as if he knew where this was going. Both men waded in the stretch of quiet. Katsuki leaned in with a face twisted in woe as he thought about the note that was left behind. The first question that he wanted to know burned on his tongue as he studied how dejected Izuku’s expression became.

“How long did you wait for me to come back?” Katsuki murmured.

Izuku gave a melancholy half-smile. “Does it matter how long I waited?”

“Izuku,” Katsuki hissed. “How long did you wait?”

“…A year.”

The shattering of his own heart was immobilizing.

It crumbled underneath the lifetime worth of guilt that was already stockpiled, but hearing that answer caused the weight to multiply by tenfold. A year. He cursed under his breath and leaned away with his hand covering his mouth in shock. A full fucking year Izuku waited for him to come back—and he never did. He fixated on the thought of young Izuku growing sadder day by day, abandoned in the winter just like he was.

The expression twisted on his face must’ve been of pure remorse because Izuku leaned forward and gently placed his hand in front of him on the wooden table.

“It’s okay, Katsuki. Your mom came back for you, and that’s what we wanted…right?” Izuku gave him an understanding smile. Katsuki didn’t quite feel like he deserved such a thing. “That’s the whole reason we stayed so close to that plaza so she could come back for you. T-The whole running away thing was something we came up with solely because we thought she died, right? But she hadn’t and she came back. I’m glad that you were reunited with her.”

Katsuki shook his head.

No matter how kind Izuku’s words were, they couldn’t absolve the poisonous guilt that was coursing through his veins. They weren’t solely running away because his mom had abandoned him—there were other things: like Izuku’s bruises. He thought about the dust covered note and what it said on it.

Sharp, red eyes cut towards Izuku.

“What about that older brother of yours?” Katsuki asked. His voice was wary. “Did he ever stop hurting you?”

Izuku tensed. He curled his fingers on the tabletop and his face hardened slightly.

“We don’t have to talk about that, Katsuki.”

“Yes. Yes, we fucking do, Izuku,” Katsuki insisted anxiously. “I fucking left you there knowing someone was hurting you. You came all the time with goddamn bruises and a full-on broken bone once. And your fucking eye was cut up. You have no fucking clue how the guilt of that ate away at me for years. I-I wanted to take you with me and my mom, so he couldn’t hurt you anymore but she—we—we didn’t fucking come back.”

“You couldn’t control that. You were a kid—”

“—Did he stop or not? I need to know, Izuku.”

Izuku retracted his hand and leaned back in the creaky wooden chair. Katsuki's heart thumped with every beat of silence. He couldn't help but notice the body language shift. Izuku curled into himself slightly, hung his head away and clenched his jaw.

"No. He didn't."

Katsuki became nauseous as he imagined all the years filled with bloodied eyes, broken bones, and possibly much worse injuries. His stomach quaked with nausea as he studied Izuku's defensive, closed off body language.

"I'm…I'm so fucking sorry, Izuku."

His throat dried up, like someone had snatched all the possible words from his mouth and scraped his esophagus along the way. He didn't know what else to say but how he felt: sorry. Slightly pathetic. Remorseful. His well rooted self-hatred sunk its clutches further into him to the point his chest heaved.

"You have nothing to be sorry for. It's not your fault," Izuku repeated.

"It is. I left you there. You were being hurt, and I left you."

"But you were a kid," Izuku emphasized. "You were a kid who was left abandoned in a giant city waiting for an irresponsible adult to come back. Then she did. You did what any child would've done in that moment if they were reunited with a parent who loved them. S-Some things in life aren't controllable for us all the time. This was one of those things."

With that explanation, a bridge between young Izuku and older Izuku began to form.

Katsuki grasped at the small bud of an explanation. This had to be how Izuku ended up as a hitman. He must've tried to get out of an abusive household—right? Was that the missing middle?

"Do you still see your brother?" Katsuki asked after a while.

"Um. Yes. Our living arrangements are complicated," Izuku confessed, slightly skittish. He took a small sip of his tea unhurriedly. His eyes grew distant and unfocused. "But—I try my best to put distance between us for obvious purposes."

"Is that the reason you took this type of job? To try to get away from him?"

Izuku frowned deeply and placed his teacup down. "No."

"But you said you do this job to survive."

"I do." Izuku's voice tightened with vindication. "But he has nothing to do with that." Izuku seemed unsure of his words in the last sentence.

"Then why?" Katsuki exasperated. "Why would someone as kind—or was as kind as you—go into this type of shit? Willingly?"

Izuku seemed pained by that. Pained enough that he didn't answer.

His green eyes grew darker, clearly wounded. He studied Katsuki carefully from across the wooden table. Katsuki stared right back at him, struggling to piece together what had transpired.

As he tried, his head was beginning to hurt more. If not to get away from that shit faced abusive brother, then why the hell would Izuku do this type of gig? Katsuki's brain struggled once more to join the past Izuku and the present.

"I don't fucking get it," Katsuki continued. "You were so kind, gentle, and well off. You weren't meant for this type of life. I always thought you would go on to be a teacher or go into a profession that helped people. Not kill them."

"I'm sorry I didn't turn out how you wanted me to," Izuku muttered sarcastically. He sneered deeply at Katsuki and there was soreness evident in his words. "I know you think I'm fucked up but please understand not everything in the world is a simple choice. My apologies for tainting that memory for you."

Shit.

Katsuki licked his dry lips and shook his head. "I didn't mean it like that."

"You did," Izuku bitterly cut off. "It's fine. I know I'm fucked up, alright? I get it. I always had a feeling you would be disappointed about what I am if we ever met again." The green in Izuku's eyes drowned in a deep cynicism as he hung his head. "I know I'm not normal."

"I'm sorry," Katsuki said quietly. "You're not any more messed up than I am. I actually always assumed you would be disappointed in me if you saw what I grew up to be."

"I'm not, if that helps." Izuku gave him a sad smile. "I'm really just happy that you grew up. I assumed you were dead. Y-You hadn't taken any of your stuff with you, and I struggled to understand why you didn't want to bring your favorite toy with you if you had left. Knowing you're alive is…all I could really ask for."

Katsuki stared at Izuku like a puzzle as his heart clenched.

There was a sense of relief upon those words reaching his ears. He didn't know how to respond as his self-hatred clutched on to him tighter, having a mild reaction to the fact Izuku wasn't disappointed in what he had become.

"I shouldn't have snapped on you like that yesterday," Katsuki apologized, ignoring the way his heart skipped. "I was out of line."

"No, it's alright. You should've," Izuku rebutted. "I hadn't said anything. As far as you knew I was simply some guy who you've been fighting with for years using a nickname that was dear to you. It made you uncomfortable. And if it still makes you uncomfortable, I won't ever use it again."

Katsuki opened his mouth, stunned by the suggestion.

His immediate reflex was to tell Izuku ‘no, it’s fine,’ but then he realized, should he? Should he tell Izuku to call him fucking ‘Kacchan’ like they were seven years old again? Would that be weird? Fuck. It probably would be. They had been at each other’s throats for so long that not even their current ‘truce’ would bridge the gap this fast. This was such an unusual situation to navigate, and his pulsing migraine didn’t help a damn thing.

Izuku stared at him for a moment, as if wanting him to correct it. But they stayed in a quiet stalemate.

“I don’t care if you use it or not,” Katsuki settled for. He turned his eyes away to the rosy curtains and took a large gulp of his tea. “That’s your choice I guess.”

There was another drop of muteness as Izuku kept his eyes trained on the carpet.

It didn’t go unnoticed to Katsuki how Izuku reframed from answering his question about how he became a hitman. However, the idea of Izuku running away from him again made Katsuki step back from pressing on about that. There was an antsy aura clouded around Izuku, and he clearly was teetering on the edge of a flight or fight response. Katsuki really didn’t want him to try to flee away once more.

Especially not when they finally unearthed such an important connection.

Katsuki leaned forward on the table. He stared at the way Izuku’s curls coiled in some places and were wavy in others. He took in the details of freckles and noticed how a couple of them formed a small diamond on both of his cheeks. Katsuki couldn’t quite put together the beginning and end of Izuku just yet, but he decided maybe it was alright for now.

Izuku turned to him again, but this time he was equipped with a soft expression. He clearly buried whatever emotion that had been triggered before.

“If you don’t mind, I would love to hear about your life after the carnival day,” Izuku whispered. He gave a smile worth a thousand suns.

“Sure, on one condition,” Katsuki wagered.

“What would that be?”

“You buy the next round of food,” Katsuki said. The corners of his lips tugged upwards ever so slightly. Not a full smile, but just enough that it made Izuku smile more at him in return. “I’m still starving.”

“I think that’s manageable,” Izuku laughed slightly. He pushed a stray curl behind his ear.

Izuku went to order more food, picking up the fuchsia phone on the nightstand.

Katsuki studied the back of him. He observed the way Izuku had a bias for leaning on his left foot, putting his body weight there while placing his hand on his right hip. There was a slight sway in his body as he stayed idle and ordered Katsuki’s favorite dish.

Izuku turned and smiled at him. He gave a thumbs up like they were all set to go.

To Katsuki, it all functioned like an atypical dream. His thoughts were floating in and out of self-hate, remorse, relief, but above all all-consuming curiosity. His inquisitiveness tugged on his heart and mind until they were working overtime to tie the two ends of Izuku into one cohesive stream. Yet, without the middle explanation it was fruitless, and it appeared like Izuku wasn't inclined to give it to him.

Katsuki tried to let it go, but he couldn't.

He curled his fists in his lap when his heart began to beat quickly in a tempo he hated. He knew then that this might be his damnation as Izuku sat across from him again with those pretty green eyes.

They spent the rest of the evening discussing what had happened between then and now. Or at least bits of it. Izuku still didn't elaborate fully on his own past. He deflected like an expert and clung to whichever sentence gave him enough wiggle room out of talking about himself. Because of this, Katsuki kept most of his past private too.

He only lightly touched on certain topics such as his mother's drug addiction and the events that led up to her death. Plus, a rundown of the basics: how he took on the offer of being a hitman to alleviate the weight of her gambling debt.

By the time he mentioned that the sky was bleeding from happy, bright blue to dark, moody purple.

They were out on the balcony, leaning against the metal railing. Katsuki viewed from above as the other vacation goers bustled about. However, Izuku was watching him. The wind blew through his curly hair and a pensive expression was pinned on his doll-like face. It wasn't a look of pity like Katsuki originally thought Izuku would give him. Or had given him. Instead, it was a look of vague understanding, and strange kinship.

"You mentioned she passed away," Izuku started when Katsuki finished talking about the money issues. "I'm sorry you had to experience that. If you don't mind me asking, how did it happen?"

"It's my fault really," Katsuki murmured. "I had botched this assignment for some shady gangsters when I found out we were lied to about what the assignment was. I refused to give back their payment because I needed to pay my rent and my mothers. So, I mouthed off like the fucking brat I was that young and took shit into my own hands. They said I would regret crossing them, but I guess I didn't really think about exactly what they meant."

Katsuki inwardly winced as those memories came rushing forward.

He could still smell the stench of rotten flesh and feel the burn in his chest. A bloodied corpse sitting in the middle of the room with a single bullet hole in the skull.

"My supervisor warned me I needed to be careful," Katsuki continued with a distant expression. "He even told me I should personally make amends and give back the money. But I was so overconfident that no one would get the jump on me that I didn't stop to consider they would go after my family. They killed her to get back at me because I made shit personal. There was nothing my agency could do because they couldn't directly tie it back to him. But I fucking know it was him—the timing of it lined up precisely and when I saw that smug faced fucker again, he took a jab at me about it."

"What was his name?" Izuku asked. He looked enraged on Katsuki's behalf.

"Akaguro Chizome," Katsuki spat the name like it tasted rancid. "Ring any bells?"

"No," Izuku said honestly. "I've never heard of him."

"He's a notorious drug lord in the underground Osaka scene. Sometimes deals in black-market weapons trade. He has his sleazy hands in all corners of that city."

Katsuki could perfectly remember the way the vile man leered at him, sitting in his false throne of a chair in his headquarters. Even now, the deep chuckle of Akaguro still vibrates through Katsuki. The gangster warned him that he would only have himself to blame for the blood that was going to be shed. Katsuki was too young to consider that the blood wouldn't be his. Now, it was all he could think about.

"I hope you're planning on getting even with him," Izuku said sourly. Katsuki could almost feel the protective vengefulness radiating off of him. "He shouldn't be allowed to get away with that if he was the person who lied about what the assignment was."

"I'm going to get my revenge when I have the time," Katsuki guaranteed. The wind blew again, its cool touch soothed some of Katsuki's anger. "Right now, I'm focused on the assignments I'm given. Ironic in a way. I took this job to keep us both alive, but it wound up causing her death. When the moment comes, I'll go back for that bastard and all his goons."

"Good."

Izuku nodded at him in approval. For the first time, Katsuki felt a bit understood.

Usually, when he spoke of his mother's murder, people expected him to take the high road. All that 'live and let live' bullshit. Hell, even Aizawa told him executing revenge on Akaguro Chizome would be trouble. His supervisor had immediately cut all ties with the gangster after he found out they lied about the assignment's details. But Aizawa still advised Katsuki the best he could do was mourn quietly.

Izuku was the first person who hinted that he should lean into his malevolent side. The Scarlet Eyed Killer part of him.

It was attention-grabbing to hear Izuku agree that there was blood weight that needed to be evened. Maybe it was because Izuku knew how much his mother meant to him as a child. Or maybe it was simply because Izuku was possibly as messed up as he was.

Whichever the case, Izuku became a little more interesting.

The evening went on to more casual conversation. Such as, where did they go to school. He told Izuku he dropped out after high school, feeling like he no longer needed the righteous pathway of higher education. Izuku told him he had remained homeschooled for all of his life.

“Homeschooled?” Katsuki questioned. He was a little surprised. “Why?”

Izuku shrugged. “It's the way my family operates.”

They found themselves wandering back inside once the sun set. Katsuki turned on the pink lamp, letting the rose-colored hue spill all over the room. Eventually they sat on the ground, leaning their backs against the bed. The pair ordered more food as they caught up, putting on the TV in the background.

At one point, Katsuki took Izuku’s violin out of its case and inspected it. He held back showing too much amazement. It really was the same damn violin.

“Did that looney old man give this to you?” Katsuki asked.

He turned over the frail instrument in his hands, examining all the nicks and scrapes. He never thought he’d see it again, yet here it was: withstanding the test of time somehow like he and Izuku had.

“He did,” Izuku replied with a sad smile. “Said it was mine to keep for as long as I liked.”

“What happened to him?”

“I’m not entirely sure.” Izuku made a contemplative face. “That year I waited for you to come back, he offered to teach me violin to keep me occupied. He showed me just about everything he knew. But then one day while I was in school, construction on the plaza happened. Police forcefully moved all the homeless people in the area somewhere. I came back, and everyone had vanished. There was no trace of him left.”

Katsuki imagined it: young Izuku eagerly walking to the plaza for his impromptu violin lessons. Then standing there shocked by the emptiness. Laughter of people was replaced with cold construction and yellow tape, telling him he couldn’t walk into the place he had grown attached to for two years. Katsuki didn’t even want to fathom what type of hollowness possibly set into Izuku that day.

“I’m sorry,” Katsuki whispered once more. “I’m so damn sorry.”

“You’re saying sorry a lot.” Izuku gave Katsuki a soothing smile. “No more saying sorry, okay? We can be sorry about what happened all we want but we’re here now.”

“Alright,” Katsuki chuckled. He scratched behind his head. “But I do have one more question.”

He looked into Izuku’s eyes and for the first time, he wasn’t fully thrown off guard by all of this. Green eyes finally were familiar in a way that wasn’t eerie or ghostly. He could see the alignment of young Izuku and older Izuku overlap a bit. But only a bit. A lump swelled in his throat as he struggled to ask that mystery that was digging into him for years.

“Why were you late that day to the carnival, Izuku?”

The words suspended in air as Izuku visibly stiffened.

Then slowly, Izuku relaxed. His shoulders sagging slightly underneath some invisible weight. He gave a desolate expression. That was all the answer Katsuki needed. Izuku didn’t have to elaborate on what happened when his eyes gazed at him like that.

“I think you know why.”

And Katsuki did. Izuku’s crestfallen features filled in the gaps.

It was his older fucking brother.

More rage ticked inside of Katsuki. It ticked and ticked like a bomb ready to explode in all directions. He realized at that moment this rage was old. It had sat inside of him disregarded for years. It was a fury he saved solely for Izuku’s older brother. It birthed at the sight of that broken arm and all the bruises. However, he had buried this rage when they were separated and never revisited it again because he hadn’t needed to.

But now, knowing that the mere reason life could have been different was because of that fucking brother filled his chest with that old anger.

Katsuki had to take a large inhale to expand his ribcage to make room for it. He started to open his mouth and say sorry once more—but Izuku stopped him. The other man leaned over, touched his hand, and squeezed it for the first time today.

The gentle touch was like cool water for Katsuki’s fire. He realized he nearly missed it after being absent all day. It felt different now, like a missing piece of a jigsaw being put in place after searching for it all over the couch. It was rewarding, gratifying, and comforting in a way Katsuki couldn’t exactly explain. His heart skipped and gradually, he simmered down.

He squeezed Izuku’s hand back in hopes of a silent communication.

He wished he could say sorry one last time.

The evening blended with them trying to find more normalcy. Izuku made him promise not to say sorry for things out of his control, and Izuku promised the same.

The separation not being his fault was a truth that Katsuki wasn’t aware he needed to be told. But upon hearing that, a tiny bit of his self-hatred melted. It eased up ever so slightly, allowing him to breathe a bit more. But despite this, there was still a side of him that wanted to do better by Izuku as repentance for leaving him. Especially because he left him with someone who hurt him enough that he was still skittish at the mention of it.

While Izuku had casually suggested that Katsuki should kill Chizome, Katsuki wasn't quite sure he could suggest the same violence to Izuku. Part of Katsuki wanted to. He had never even met this older brother, but he wanted him to feel some level of agony for beating a child.

However, Katsuki let it go. At the end of the day, family affairs were complex and Katsuki was merely a stranger. A long-lost childhood friend, but a stranger, nonetheless.

Now they sat comfortably on the heart shaped bed, watching old superhero movies that they had binged on in their years apart. It mended a part of Katsuki because he always wondered if Izuku enjoyed these films as well. They talked about their favorite characters, favorite scenes, and even what superpowers they would have if they lived in such a world. It was astonishing how they pretty much agreed on everything.

Well, almost everything.

"You're kidding me," Izuku gasped loudly. He threw a small piece of popcorn at Katsuki with a scandalized glare. "You thought Heroes Rising was better than the first All Might movie?!"

Katsuki easily caught the air-born piece of popcorn in his mouth. He chewed it with an arrogant grin as the TV played one superhero movie in the background.

"Yeah, I fucking did because I have taste," Katsuki teased. He leaned on the backboard of the bed with his arms crossed. "Something you clearly fucking lack if you thought the first movie was better than the second."

"But it was so good! And not to mention groundbreaking! The graphics of the quirks in the CGI helped push cinematography into the next level. Are you going to ignore that?!"

"Yup," Katsuki said. He popped more popcorn in his mouth and flexed his brows. "You can't convince me otherwise."

"I'm happy we didn't see the movies together now," Izuku grumbled with no bite. "I would've left you at the theater for uttering that nonsense."

"You were too much of a cry baby back then to have left me," Katsuki shot back. "You probably would've just sat pissed off outside of the theater with your arms crossed. Probably would've had the same stupid little pout you have on now."

Izuku gasped. "I do not pout—"

Katsuki shot Izuku an unimpressed stare that read 'really?' and Izuku stumbled over his words. Quickly, Izuku fixed his face. He sucked in his lips and flared his nose to appear more serious. Katsuki snickered loudly because it was clear Izuku was reframing from pouting as he did his best to frown instead.

"Like I said. I don't pout," Izuku corrected, looking ridiculous.

Katsuki shook his head and ate more popcorn. "Keep telling yourself that. You pout every time you don't get your way like a fucking brat. Even when I was running into you on assignments, you fucking pouted whenever you saw me."

Izuku's mouth dropped, and he looked as though he was about to protest again. However, his words were cut short by another knock on their door.

Both men froze and stared at each other. Something about the moment was slightly broken, like cold water being splashed on them. The knocking continued, reminding them that they were very much still in this hotel for more reasons than to catch up with each other.

Katsuki muttered under his breath that he'd get the door as he moved the bowl of popcorn off his lap. The TV continued making loud noises as the movie got to an action-packed scene.

Katsuki opened the door carefully, still feeling a bit overly protective of Izuku's time. Standing there with a bright smile was Jirou. Her dark purple hair was pinned up and the gauges in her ears looked a little bigger to Katsuki today. She gave him a big smile and held up a giant brown box.

"Hey, Taro!" Jirou said cheerily. "Here's those comics I was talking about the other day."

Katsuki blinked. "Oh, damn. Thanks, I forgot about these," he said as she pushed the box in his arms. It was heavy. Really fucking heavy actually. He grunted slightly as he held them up.

"Me too," Jirou laughed. "But I heard you two were getting some quality time in and figured I come drop them off now."

"Well thanks."

"Not a problem. Enjoy your night!"

She gave him a two-finger salute before waving goodbye. A small suggestive wink was given and Katsuki resisted blushing. He turned back around with the box in his hand, kicking the door closed.

Izuku's doe eyes widened at the sight.

"Oh! The All Might comics!" Izuku exclaimed happily. He sat up, alert and gave a big grin. He clasped his hands together like he was containing his excitement. "Wait! Let's pause the movie. Do you want to go through the comics and see if any of them are familiar?"

A tiny piece of Katsuki eagerly agreed.

"Sure," Katsuki said coolly. He shrugged like it wasn't a big deal, but that tiny quiet voice was gleeful. "I think that sounds like a decent plan."

It ended up being a wonderful idea. Katsuki had no clue that reading and pawing through all these old comics would bring him this much joy. He was secretly ecstatic to be viewing them, beyond ecstatic honestly.

But it was odd in a way.

He had buried all this, glittering child-like wonder when he was young. No comics. No fun. No toys or even fathoming dwelling in selfish enjoyment. He pushed all those thoughts to the bottom of his mind and only indulged in the All-Might movies as a guilty pass time. But only on the days his life was extra blue. There was something about comics that he never could touch again when he was a teen. Before, he was unsure why that was. But now, staring at Izuku's happy freckled face gave him the exact answer why he never had the strength to revisit his love for comics.

The evening quickly faded into the late night. Every second was spent indulging themselves in the fictional heroes they admired in their past.

Katsuki hadn't even realized he spent the full day with Izuku and only Izuku. It was like someone had repaired up a piece of him, as if he was a forgotten quilt with large holes scattered throughout. Simply looking at these drawings patched tiny squares of missing childhood over his gaps. He almost felt whole, and everything seemed relatively alright.

However, despite all this, the image of younger Izuku and older Izuku still struggled to blend.

He tried to push the pieces together and make them fit.

Currently, they were now reading through all the comics Katsuki had neglected.

Izuku filled him in on all the fantasy world happenings he had missed with enthusiasm he'd never seen someone have. Well, he had only seen younger Izuku have this type of enthusiasm —and here was Izuku: displaying the same type of zealousness.

Izuku was shaping up to still be…Izuku.

Katsuki furrowed his brow.

They sat on the bed closely, shoulder to shoulder. Neither one of them mentioned the unneeded proximity as they started rummaging through the box of comics. Izuku was babbling about something that Katsuki didn't register all the way. The memories of all the days in the nook reading together were overshadowing the present. He could still recall the smell of burnt wax on the shelves when Izuku read to him for hours.

Scarlet eyes discreetly surveyed the man next to him, who was curling into him.

If Izuku moved in just a smidge more, he could easily plant his head on Katsuki's shoulder. Katsuki blushed lightly and wondered if Izuku was aware he was doing this, or if it was a strange instinct. The gleeful man was thumbing through the flimsy comic pages, green eyes sparkling with innocent marvel.

Izuku turned his head to him, beaming brightly.

"Do you remember this one?" Izuku asked. He held up a comic that read 'issue #323' in bold, white font on the top. "This was the one you asked me to read to you a lot. I'm pretty sure I read this to you about a hundred times."

Katsuki chuckled, finding a comforting nostalgia in the moment. He reached for the comic, and even though it was lighter than feathers, it contained all the heavy weight of the past.

“Yeah, I fucking remember.” Katsuki grinned in a way he hadn’t for a long time. “I’m surprised you didn’t get sick of it. You must’ve really liked it too.”

“Oh, I actually hated this issue,” Izuku said with a dry laugh. “It’s probably my least favorite honestly.”

Katsuki frowned. “What? But you read it so much.”

“Yeah, I know. But I only liked reading to you,” Izuku confessed. He smiled nervously and twisted the ring around his finger. “Back then, you could’ve asked me to read it every day for hours. I probably would have done it just to see you smile.”

Katsuki didn’t know what to say to that.

His eyes flickered to the way Izuku was twisting his metal ring. In Katsuki’s mind, it shifted to a fabric ring. He quietly thumbed the thin paper of the comic under his fingertips. He struggled to tear his eyes away from Izuku, who was giving him a gaze that was purely sentimental.

Izuku was still sweet.

Those words were exactly something he would have anticipated young Izuku saying. But now this older version of him was saying it, and it seemed nearly as authentic. A tiny voice in the back of Katsuki’s head, that sounded awfully like a young version of himself, wondered if Izuku still felt the same about reading to him. It was silly, but he wondered if those feelings of deep care were still present. Or had that dried up like a forgotten river?

Izuku cleared his throat and reached for the comic.

“If you want, I can read it to you again. J-Just for old times’ sake,” Izuku offered calmly. He was clearly embarrassed, but hopefulness pushed through. “I wouldn’t mind.”

Katsuki tensed at the thought. He didn’t know why—but hearing that gave him relief. That tiny voice in the back of his head was quietly cheering, and he could feel his inner child clap happily. He pawed at his black shorts, hesitant.

Despite the younger side of his spirit feeling ecstatic for the offer, this was intimate.

“How about I read to you this time?” Katsuki suggested. All the alarms were going off in his head the second he said that. He pushed past the warnings his brain was giving him as his heart sped up. “You know, I’m not that illiterate seven-year-old anymore. Let me return the favor for a bit.”

“O-Oh, okay,” Izuku stuttered. His expression was both proud and intrigued. “That would be cool! Sorry, I think I forgot that you probably could read the comics on your own.”

“It’s alright, nerd,” Katsuki said. He grabbed the comic back from Izuku with a small smirk and flipped open to the first page. There was light dust on the pages as he rubbed it off. “Let me show you my new and improved reading skills.”

Izuku laughed and scooted in every so slightly. He nervously fiddled with his fingers and leaned into him to see the text on the page. Now they were firmly pressed together, side by side. It was entirely not needed, especially if Katsuki was reading out loud—but neither of them said a word about it.

“Do…Do you want to read how we used to?” Izuku asked suddenly.

“Hah? What do you mean?”

“We used to read under the covers most of the time. With a flashlight and we would get lost in like a little makeshift world.”

Katsuki’s eyebrows shot up a bit. “We’re a bit old for that don’t you think?”

“It would be kind of fun!” Izuku insisted with a delightful smile. The edges of his eyes happily curled up with his grin. “I haven’t done that in so long. It’ll be just like when we were kids.”

Katsuki’s eyes glazed over Izuku’s body before meeting his gaze. Izuku shifted lightly on the mattress, a tiny hint of blush peeked from underneath his freckles.

“We’re far from being kids anymore, Izuku.”

“I know,” Izuku said. His cheeks pinkened a tinge. “I-I think that it would be fun. I—I don’t know.” He averted his eyes to the silk bed sheets and scratched behind his head. “I’m having fun catching up with you and I-I thought with the movies and going through the comics we could keep doing things that we used to.”

Izuku looked nearly like a kicked puppy, and he pouted. The little fucker pouted.

Katsuki loathed the way he instantly folded.

“Fine,” Katsuki grumbled.

Izuku immediately perked up, and Katsuki told himself that this was simply indulgent.

The way pretty, green eyes lit up made Katsuki’s younger side feel satisfied.

They began to clear the bed of the comics, placing them neatly back in the brown box. They picked out a couple to read and there was a fluttering excitement growing inside of Katsuki. He had no clue he could really feel like this, it was new. Or was it old? It was a mixture of both when he examined it.

They shuffled covers together, both snickering at the way it was a bit ridiculous. They took the front end of the blanket and secured it on the top of the high headboard. The red silk blanket fell gracefully. It created a neat, enveloped tent for them on the bed as they secured the other end of the blankets to the opposite edge of the bed. The space underneath the makeshift tent-covers was snug in a familiar way.

It was almost like the nook they sat up. But Katsuki didn't say that out loud when he looked at their rings again.

They both climbed inside and leaned against the headboard. Katsuki placed down the selected comics with a smirk and Izuku had a happy smile on his face. His grin was so wide Katsuki was sure his cheeks must've hurt.

Izuku lit the flashlight on the back of his phone under the dark covers. He placed the device between their bodies, so the white light spilled upwards. The red silk reflected against the bright luminescence, tinging them both in a deep hue of red. Katsuki opened up to the first page and Izuku scooted in. Their shoulders flushed together and soon they both were lost in the moment.

Katsuki read out loud. Izuku hung on his every word like he was reading what the secret to life was. They laughed in some parts and gasped together in others. Time didn't feel real underneath the blanket to Katsuki. The concept of the outside world ceased.

There was no Moore. No Aizawa. No assignment. Only this small makeshift tent that reminded him of the single year that was most important to him. It felt like they were transported to a secret place only meant for the two of them to make up for lost time.

As he was reading, Katsuki could feel Izuku shift closer to him on the mattress. Izuku carefully leaned down his head to his shoulder—exactly like he used to do.

Katsuki had turned to him, and they made eye contact briefly.

He was going to say something but stopped himself when the words jammed in his throat. The heat under his collar tickled a bit as he turned his eyes back to the words on the page. Then, as he continued they shifted a bit. He didn't notice exactly when their feet tangled, but they had. The soft skin against his was nice in a way that Katsuki cherished secretly.

After however many hours had passed, they slid down to a more comfortable position. Izuku had his head against one of the soft pillows. He was lying on his side, body turned inward to Katsuki with a tiny smile.

Katsuki was turned inward as well on his side. He propped his head up with one hand as he held up the comic for both him and Izuku to see. Neither made a move to untangle their legs as he read. With every laugh and moment of suspense in the comic, Katsuki could feel Izuku move. And he moved closer each time until they were nearly face to face.

"And that's the end," Katsuki said as he flipped to the last page. "To be continued."

He looked towards Izuku, only now fully aware of how close they'd gotten.

He could see all the shades of Izuku's freckles. The dark ones and the light shaded mocha ones. He could see the different patterns that they formed as Izuku laid his head against the red pillow. His messy curls were sprawled everywhere, and his deep green eyes were staring right back at Katsuki with an unreadable emotion.

“That was actually really nice,” Izuku confessed after a while. He smiled delicately at Katsuki, and their feet knocked a bit. “Did you enjoy reading to me for once?”

“Surprisingly, yeah I did,” Katsuki agreed with a chuckle. He couldn’t stop himself from smirking. “Never thought I would be reading these goddamn comics again, but it was nice to catch up on them. How did you like my reading skills? Better than when I was seven I hope.”

“Of course. You did great,” Izuku said. “I could get used to you reading to me.”

“Oh, really now?”

“Mhm. You have a good voice for it. Maybe you should make audio-books.”

Katsuki snorted sarcastically and rolled his eyes. “I curse too much. Not a damn soul would buy any audio books narrated by me.”

Izuku shrugged. “I like when you curse. So, I’d buy them.”

Another sweet comment.

Katsuki’s smirk shifted into a subtle, tender smile without his knowledge.

He was beginning to align young Izuku to older Izuku a bit. At the core, it seemed they were both still the same sweet person. Katsuki studied Izuku a bit longer in that moment of silence. Izuku seemed to do the same. Saccharine, doe eyes stared into his endlessly like Izuku was studying the galaxies and nebulas above them. Neither said anything as they lingered in the lost years.

An usual sensation flooded Katsuki’s chest as he gazed at Izuku. It twisted, flipped, and pulled. He couldn’t get enough of looking at the missing piece of his childhood in front of him. It was almost ridiculous. Katsuki wondered when the shock would wear off—or if it might ever.

As Katsuki was considering the other man’s features, he didn’t notice he had drawn closer. The sound of Izuku’s breath hitching was the only indicator that he had moved.

There was a shift in the air.

The comic was placed down and the heat under the covers had spiked. He knew they should move. Or talk. Or, hell, even check the time. But they didn’t. They were stuck in each other’s gravities.

Izuku lifted a hand, hesitant.

Katsuki didn’t dare move, only continued to watch him.

The warm hand cupped his cheek and touched him like he was made of glass. Izuku's soft fingers caressed his cheek bone. The entire time, Izuku studied him like he was a work of art. Like he was some valuable painting that had been missing for centuries and finally returned to where it belonged. Then, Izuku stared at his mouth for a while. As though there were words there to be read. Katsuki stared right back at Izuku's, examining the soft curvature of his cupid's bow.

The intimacy of their positions reminded Katsuki of their make-believe marriage vows. He remembered how the nook had been dimly lit, just like the makeshift tent was now. He remembered how they quickly locked lips, both too young to really understand they stole each other's first kiss.

He wondered if Izuku was thinking the same thing as the man stared at his mouth.

An unknown emotion gripped Katsuki by the heart. It was heavy, warm, and kicked up a hurricane of backlogged memories. Katsuki wasn't sure what emotion it was, but it slowed the moment down and made him savor it.

"W-We should get ready for bed," Izuku whispered. "It's getting late."

Katsuki's half-lidded gaze intensely burned through Izuku, and he could sense the nerves rattling off of the other man. Izuku was shaking slightly, the legs entangled with his were jittering faintly.

"…Okay," Katsuki whispered. His raspy voice grazed the bottom of his vocal cords as they stared into each other.

Izuku broke apart from the moment, clearly in a transfixed daze. His pupils were dilated until there was nothing but a slim ring of viridian on the outside. He swallowed dryly and rubbed the back of his nape as he sat up.

Izuku muttered an apology as he climbed out of the makeshift tent.

Katsuki flopped on his back, carefully listening to Izuku's shuffling. He waited until he heard the shutting of the bathroom door to exhale. He laid there, lost in thought for a while. The sound of the shower ran in the background but all that was running through Katsuki's head was Izuku.

He privately ghosted his fingers over his lips, trying to identify the new emotion that slithered in.

When the next day came, they felt different.

The air was heavier. The way Izuku looked at him was softer but more comfortable.

It was the total opposite of where they were the day before. Stale, and dancing around the other one. Katsuki wished he had a larger vocabulary to describe the new atmosphere that developed. It was warm like close skin on skin contact, yet icy as distant friends who hadn't spoken in years all at once. There were a multitude of unsaid questions rattling between them that neither reached out to touch. Both were too afraid to break the fragile atmosphere.

They skipped breakfast and lunch again, and no one came up to check up on them as they ordered room service. Katsuki stared at the pink colored door all morning, realizing once they stepped outside everything would resume.

The world around them would materialize again. Moore and Koizumi. Shouto and Inasa. Suddenly, Katsuki remembered the heavy armory that was neatly tucked away in a secret compartment in his suitcase. He could perfectly envision Moore's deceptively charming smile awaiting them. He could even see that fucking bastard adjust the golden dove pin on his white suit.

But more importantly, that police raid was happening three days from now.

There was an unspoken pressure of time against his shoulder blades as he and Izuku quietly stayed tucked away in the room.

When night fell arrived, the expected knocking on their door came with it.

"Bakugous!" Mina's loud singsong voice cut through the air. "Wakey wakey, love birds! It's time for the carnival!"

Katsuki was currently sitting on the edge of the bed, fastening his black leather watch. He sighed inwardly, utterly not inclined for any of this. There was a prickle on his skin that mimicked invisible barbed wire, sinking and piercing into him from all angles. It was beginning to feel awfully a lot like that shit the old man would ramble on about. Fate. Stars. All that crap.

"We'll be out in a minute," Katsuki yelled. "Hiroji is still getting dressed like a fucking slow poke."

"Sorry!" Izuku called from inside the bathroom. "I-I'm just fixing my hair."

Katsuki donned his normal, short sleeved black button down. He didn't think there was a need to get spiffed up. His pants were regular ink-black jeans with rips, and he wore black combat boots. Katsuki accessorized himself with his black fang earrings and his silver chain around his neck.

Izuku seemed nervous, however. The nerd picked up his normal pink clothes and then nearly had a panic attack. His face painted as rosy as his wardrobe before he quickly clutched his whole suitcase and ran into the bathroom. Now they were running fucking late and he could practically feel Shouto on the other side of the door tapping his foot.

"C'mon, you're holding up everyone," Katsuki said impatiently. "That bird's nest of yours wasn't combed all day yesterday. You're not going to make it look nice now."

"Fine, fine. I'm coming," Izuku grumbled.

The door cracked open, and Katsuki exhaled in relief. Finally. He stood up, grabbed his phone and turned instinctually towards Izuku. He braced himself for the usual flood of pink in every shade imaginable but froze when the sight in front of him wasn't that.

Stunning. That was the first word to come to mind.

Izuku was wearing a white blouse that had a soft, watercolor pattern of baby pink camellias. The flowers spilled across the flowy fabric like someone had hand painted them on to match Izuku's beauty. It complemented his dark denim jeans and black flats. But what caught Katsuki's eye the most was the way Izuku's hair fell, neatly combed with a product that emphasized the curls of his hair. They looked soft and framed his heart shaped face in a sophisticated manner. He looked pretty, doll-like even. A darling, doe eyed doll face.

Izuku shifted on his feet slightly and Katsuki became hyper aware he was gawking. He could hear his inner voice tell him to move or fucking speak. But it was impossible to peel his eyes away from the striking man in front of him. He could hear their group outside chatting indistinctly and feel himself dryly swallow.

"This is the part where you tell me I look hideous," Izuku said with a light hint of sarcasm. He gave a nervous smile and fidgeted in place. He twirled the ring on his finger while looking at Katsuki up and down.

"Yeah," Katsuki whispered, still dazed. "I suppose it is." There was a trickle of silence as they regarded each other. "This is also the part where you tell me to stop staring."

Izuku nodded distantly and echoed his words. "I suppose it is."

Izuku stepped forward and nervously pushed a stray curl behind his ear. He grabbed for his phone, wallet and rose-tinted heart-shaped glasses. He placed the glasses on top of his curls perfectly. When he turned around he tilted his head shyly, smiling at Katsuki.

For the first time, Katsuki noted that there were at least three shades of green swimming inside of Izuku's eyes. He cleared his throat when he could sense himself gawking far too long and held out a hand for Izuku to take.

When Izuku's fingers intertwined with his, that unnamed emotion sparked all over him.

The group walked together into the downtown region of Nago. The summer breeze was gentle and carried all their laughs into the dark night as he held Izuku's hand in his. He knew it was for show but something about it was obviously different now.

Little, tiny caresses were tracing his skin as they walked.

The atmosphere was enjoyable enough that Katsuki nearly forgot why he was in Okinawa. The shade from the palm trees didn't feel ominous. It was relaxing and cool for the first time. Shouto and Inasa didn't register as detectives. Instead, they behaved like newly found friends and cracked jokes with him and Izuku. They appeared like normal high school sweethearts who were on vacation. Jirou and Momo were smiling in a friendly manner, asking them about their trip down memory lane with the comics.

Then, in all their over enthusiastic glory, were Eijiro and Mina. The two had bright, beaming grins on their faces and were overjoyed to have everyone together for their last night in Paradise. The couple was sporting a giant pink and red bag that read ‘Manliness.’ They proclaimed they had some manly goodies to give to the group once they arrived at the carnival.

And when they did, it was exactly how Katsuki remembered.

He wasn’t sure if that was a good thing or a bad thing when a strange feeling settled into his core.

The smell of buttery popcorn, salty pretzels, and flavor filled treats wafted into the air. Crowds of people were filing into the entrance, passing them all by. Some were people Katsuki recognized from the hotel, or even the camping area. All holding hands and bulked together in groups, giggling and pointing towards the rollercoasters and large Ferris wheel in the background.

Katsuki and Izuku looked up at the same time. Sitting there was that same candy colored arch.

It looked freshly renovated with sparkling new white and red paint. The large, neon sign above them was still in bright, magenta lettering. The ‘C’ no longer flickered like it was broken. Instead, all the letters synchronized in blinking on and off. It flashed enthusiastically, nearly in tune with the exultant music. The glittering lights and dazzling tune screamed ‘come one, come all.’ It drew attention from all corners of the downtown area.

Izuku’s hand squeezed his a little harder as they both stared up at the entrance.

“First up! Before we go inside, Ei and I got something important for everyone!” Mina announced. She held up the large bag, shaking it like a special treat was waiting inside. “It’s super crowded and we don’t want anyone to get lost. So, we went out and bought something that’ll make our group stand out in the crowd. In case we’re separated for any reason.”

She eagerly opened the bag and Katsuki, like a reasonable person, imagined maybe it would be a hat. A sparkly one that was silly and stood out. Maybe even a t-shirt that read ‘World’s Best Paradise Crew.’ But no. Of course, leave it up to the fucking hot pink and blazing red duo to open that goddamn bag and bring out six matching pink boas.

Everyone’s expressions lit up at the sight of the long bundle of feathers. Katsuki made a sound of deep disgust. Izuku tilted his head and hummed like a curious fox. Shouto and Inasa were nearly indifferent and Momo and Jirou were taken aback slightly.

Every muscle that Katsuki used to frown kicked into action. He glowered when the husband-and-wife duo started donning the boas around everyone’s neck.

“This is…festive,” Momo commented with a curious curl at the end. She picked up one end of the boas and whipped it playfully towards her girlfriend.

“Alright. I’m not sorry, but these are fucking ridiculous,” Katsuki deadpanned. He didn’t even bother biting his tongue. “You can’t be fucking serious.”

“We’re extremely serious, bro!” Eijiro exclaimed. He placed Izuku’s boa around his neck, wrapping it twice. “Separation is not something to take lightly. Mina and I were reading that a handful of people have gone missing around Okinawa recently. We freaked out! It would be totally awful if something happened on our last night here. We want to make sure we take all the right precautions.”

Mina wrapped the boa around Katsuki’s neck and grinned playfully.

The soft tickle of feathers against skin was a sensation Katsuki didn’t quite think he’d ever feel. He was about to say something further but reframed when he thought about the ‘missing people’ part of Eijiro’s spill. Despite everything, the two gym aficionados were right. Seems like Moore’s kidnappings were tracking across Okinawa, just not tracked back to him. They should still be mindful.

Izuku lifted his own boa and tickled underneath Katsuki’s nose with the feathers until he sneezed.

Katsuki whipped around, surprised, but was taken back at the absolute adorable expression Izuku had. The doe-eyed man giggled under his breath and his blushing face was slightly tucked into the boa. The hand intertwined with his squeezed lightly.

“Let’s have a good time tonight,” Izuku said with a candid grin. “What do you say?”

The music picked up and the roaring of the rollercoasters from inside grew louder. The blue and pink neon colors flashed and twinkled against both of their faces as they locked eyes. The young part of Katsuki’s soul cheerfully beamed and he found himself easing into letting go.

“Alright. Let’s have some fun.”

Everyone started laughing and shuffled in together. Katsuki knocked shoulders with Shouto as they all pressed into one big bundle. Izuku easily slid into his arms and Katsuki found himself holding on to him tighter than he usually would. Eijiro held up the selfie-stick and made a peace sign accompanied by his sharp, toothy grin. He began counting down for everyone to smile.

“On three: Paradise crew!” Eijiro said. “One, two, three!”

“Paradise Crew!” Everyone sang in unison.

Katsuki used to wonder what it would feel like to have the power to rewind time.

When he was only just a kid, he imagined that if he was a superhero like All-Might, he would hope his power would be phasing through the past. He would vividly daydream about going back in time to that day his mother found him. He imagined full of longing that he could force her to stay and wait for Izuku. He even imagined a different reality that Izuku showed up on time, and they walked into the carnival holding hands. Maybe then he would have never been found. Maybe then they would have stayed together.

He clung so hard to those daydreams like they were the last molecule of oxygen inside of a chamber. But there were always gaps in them. Pieces of the dream would go black, skip or glitch. He could never imagine the side of the carnival, like a sky high mental roadblock. He had no clue either what they would do together once inside. And he was always too tethered to his hurt to ever look up carnivals again.

But now, as they were fully immersed in the setting, Katsuki felt like he was living out his daydream that he could rewind time.

Izuku was laughing, giggling, and pointing at all the neon things around him. The carousel. The bumper cars. The light up signs that read ‘Fun House’ and ‘Marriage Drive Thru.’ It was all in the spirit of youth as their group went station to station. The reflection of all the flashing lights caught in Izuku’s rose tinted glasses the entire time.

Big, pretty green eyes looked up at Katsuki like he was a beautiful illusion. That unknown emotion rattled in Katsuki’s core again when Izuku gave him that look.

The first thing they did was get dragged to an aerobatics show by Mina.

Their group sat in the high stands, watching in amazement as impossibly flexible humans in glow in the dark leotards did flips and leaps. The dazzling performers mimicked birds in the sky with how aerodynamic they were. Twirling, flipping, and swooping down into dangerous nose dives. The ribbons attached to their bodies were like liquid fabric as intricate patterns were painted in the air.

Izuku had let go of his hand to stand up and cheer when one impressive move was executed.

“That was so cool!” Izuku exclaimed with a tiny gasp. He rocked from his heels to his toes with his hands excitedly clamped together. He whirled around with a giant grin. “Did you see that?!”

Katsuki smiled. “Yeah I did, darling.”

He hadn’t.

He had been too distracted observing Izuku’s facial expressions. The freckled face shifted from impressed, joyful and astonished so fluidly it was more captivating than the show they were watching. He was charmingly emotive in a way Katsuki never noted before.

His faux husband grinned at him and turned back around to give a big cheer to the performers. Some of them caught sight of the excited man and gave him a personal bow that made Izuku squeal happily. When Izuku sat back down, Katsuki wove their fingers together again. He held Izuku's warm hand in his lap with both of his as they continued to watch the show.

Neither one of them noticed the way they were leaning into each other.

Their next stop was walking around and looking at all the various carnival games.

All the booths were uniformly aligned in endless rows and uniquely decorated. Some had flashing purple and green fairy lights that competed with the fancy merry go round in the center of the park. Others were filled to the brim with teddy bears and colorful paper flowers glued to the sides of the booths. Their group made their rounds to the different booths, enjoying the time together.

Katsuki won the strongman game that was lit up with bright white lights. He hit the high striker with such force that it damn near left a dent in the bell. The booth worker looked at him with a little bit of fear but gave him the blue-ribbon prize. Pinned it right above his heart and Izuku laughed the entire time.

As they continued on walking, Katsuki observed the various stuffed animals. There were pink ones, blue ones. There were even matching orange and green ones. However, he scoffed in surprise at the All-Might themed teddy bear that was sitting inside of one.

It was fluffy, and its fake fur was artificially colored with yellow, red and blue dye. It even had a red cape pinned to its shoulders giving it the full effect of the superhero movies. Katsuki tilted his head because viewing it now was odd; he had wanted that thing so badly as a kid. Now, he felt like he missed the chance to ever have it. He was far too old to want it at his age, and he reminded the young side of his spirit of that when an unreasonable bitterness settled in.

Izuku noticed his prolonged stare.

"Do you want it?" Izuku asked him.

"Naw, just looking," Katsuki said. He brushed it off, willing away the bitterness. "It's funny seeing it, y'know? It was advertised in the back of one of the comics we used to read. Do you remember?"

"I do. You like it a lot."

"Liked," Katsuki corrected the tense. "I'm too old for things like that now."

Izuku pursed his lips slightly. "But no one is ever too old for things that make them happy."

Katsuki tilted his head curiously at Izuku for that.

Before he could rebut, Izuku's face hardened with resolve. The man began zealously pulling him by their joined hands towards the location of the teddy bear. Katsuki protested immediately. He hissed, nearly slipping up on Izuku's real name when they found themselves in a mind tug-of-war. But eventually Katsuki relented. Turns out, Izuku was as stubborn as a ram. He yanked Katsuki until they stood in front of the booth that had the All-Might teddy bear dangling up above.

Katsuki finally looked at what type of game it was, and he was only a tiny bit surprised to read 'knife throwing' in a big, blown-up typewriter font.

The back wall of the booth was full of red and white bullseyes, gleaming in the light. Izuku waved down the worker who had on a colorful top hat with a big grin. Several other people lined up as well, interested in participating. The worker gave his rehearsed spiel with an award-winning grin and handed everyone ten tiny knives that weren't sharp enough to hurt anyone. The worker did a small bow before signaling everyone to begin.

It was barely a competition when everyone threw the first knife. Katsuki was curtly reminded that Izuku was still very much lethal. The sight snapped him right out of his nostalgia filled daze.

Izuku hit every single bullseye dead center with a sickening sweet smile. The level of accuracy stunned the booth worker and the other carnival goers. When Izuku threw the last knife, lodging it deep in the wood with the high-pitched sound of the metal vibrating, it caused some attention to be drawn.

Shouto and Inasa gaped with pinched brows as everyone else in their Paradise Crew cheered loudly for them. Even the worker gawked at the precision. He walked up to each knife, flicked it and hummed in approval. He turned to congratulate Izuku and handed over the large teddy bear.

Katsuki unwillingly envisioned young Izuku again and all his purity. Then he looked at the twelve bullseyes in front of him that had knives lodged into them in a way only an expert could achieve. The disharmony of the past Izuku and the present one clashed again as Katsuki struggled to maintain focus.

"Um, here. For you," Izuku said nervously.

Katsuki peeled his eyes away from the bullseyes to see Izuku looked up at him with an awkward smile. The shorter man pushed the teddy bear into his arms with a kindhearted gaze. There was a worried air around him as Katsuki took the teddy bear in his arms.

"Thanks," Katsuki said with a small smile.

"No problem at all." Izuku curiously glanced between him and the doll while twisting his metal ring. "I-I'm glad you have it now."

Katsuki looked down at the bear in his hand, and his thoughts dived deep into his childhood memories. He stroked the bear's artificial fur under his calloused hand and the young part of him cheered happily. That side of him wanted to hug Izuku, and act as though they hadn't been at each other's throats for the latter half of their lives.

Katsuki studied the way Izuku blushed and toyed with his pink boa.

The sight in front of him caused his heart to skip one beat. Two beats. Three beats.

However, he struggled to overlap the two Izukus, they glitched when they got too close. Big, pretty green eyes were swirling in his mind and Katsuki's veins were pumped full of questions. Questions that he wasn't sure he could ask without ruining the moment.

His heart struggled with that nameless emotion.

As Katsuki grappled with trying to understand what the unknown feeling was, Izuku fed him with their joint hands all night.

Never in a million years did Katsuki think he'd be thankful for a hideous teddy bear, but as he stared down at it, he smiled. Then he smirked privately at Izuku when the man wasn't looking with his heart beating loudly. Izuku was gazing around, too full of wonder as he pointed to the clowns and street performances.

Eventually, they all agreed to go on the Ferris wheel after stuffing themselves with churros and cotton candy. Truthfully, had this happened a couple of days ago, Katsuki would've grumbled and fussed. He would have said this was cliché and stupid to mask his true emotions about romance.

He had gotten so used to automatically turning his nose up at anything that reminded him of the painful separation. But now, with Izuku's hand intertwined with his, he didn't really feel the need. It was odd. He didn't feel defensive all the way anymore, and Katsuki was questioning why that was.

He glanced between the stuffed animal and then to Izuku inquisitively.

"Have you ever been on a Ferris wheel?" Izuku asked as they stood in line. His voice was hush but bubbling with excitement.

"Nope," Katsuki said with a pop at the end. He focused on the tiny caressing Izuku was still doing with his thumb. "This will be my first time."

"Me too. I guess we can experience it together."

Katsuki could feel the years spent apart wading between them. He wondered how frequently Izuku thought about going to this carnival. More so, he wondered if Izuku thought about going with him—or at least the younger version of himself. Katsuki pursed his lips as he looked behind them in line. He stared at the other couples in their group who were happily laughing.

As they got closer to the front, Katsuki studied the large Ferris wheel. The carts on the thing had different colored hoods. Yellow. Pink. Blue and soft lavender. Every time it rotated, it stopped briefly at the top, letting each set of passengers enjoy the view before they began their descent down.

When they finally arrived at their turn, Momo gave them a sweet thumbs up. It was clear the therapist was overjoyed at the lack of arguing him and Izuku had done all day. Katsuki tsked under his breath.

The kind carnival worker helped them inside of the cart with a welcoming smile. Izuku scootched in happily and Katsuki ducked as he sat next to Izuku in the color cart. He plopped the teddy bear on the side that Izuku didn't sit on. As he looked around the cart, he was impressed. Twinkling fairy lights glittered on and off inside, setting a soft mood in the dark night.

The wheel started their incline up, and Katsuki turned his eyes to the window.

They lifted up and up until they made it about a quarter of the way. It almost felt like they were birds in the sky, a type of freedom that Katsuki wasn't sure he'd ever felt. The people in the crowd became progressively tinier as the sounds drowned out in the background. All the mixed lights flashed, dazzled, and danced in Katsuki's vision as they looked overhead above the carnival.

It looked just as magical as he daydreamed it would all those years ago.

"Are you enjoying the sights?" Izuku said suddenly.

Katsuki turned his gaze. He locked eyes with Izuku, who had been staring at him for who knows how long. Izuku's expression was entirely tranquil. He was once again twisting the metal ring around his finger. Katsuki subconsciously touched him lightly.

"I am," Katsuki agreed, smiling at Izuku. "You seem like you're enjoying yourself a bit more."

"I think so, hah." Izuku smiled timidly while shrugging his shoulders. "Only attempting to make my best of it while we're here."

A piece of Katsuki silently admired Izuku for that.

He learned there was a side of Izuku that always tried to make the best of any situation.

Izuku made the best of them being stuck together—even when they couldn't stand the other. He made the best of Katsuki's issue when he didn't understand how to pretend to be in love. He made the best of the boat ride. The beach. The camping trip. Even the cooking class. Katsuki started to see another alignment of Izuku's core as he thought about their past.

Young Izuku made the best of that abandoned church for him too.

Izuku always brightened up the things he touched.

“Did you ever think about coming here? After I disappeared?” Katsuki asked as they rose higher in the sky.

“Of course. I thought about it all the time, I always wanted to go to this place.” Izuku tilted his head at him. “I know this is silly, but I thought a lot about coming back here with you. It feels…nice that we’re here. Together.”

Katsuki smiled again. For once, he didn’t feel alone in his thoughts of dismay in an odd way. The younger part of his spirit hummed happily, settling into a security he hadn’t felt in ages. Or maybe he hadn’t ever really felt it. He never felt remotely understood a day in his life, and his sliver of understanding from reconnecting with Izuku was touching a piece of him he thought didn’t exist.

He gazed on at Izuku, and a state of vulnerability settled in his chest.

“Me too,” Katsuki confessed. He had not a clue why he was confessing to that—but he did. “I…I thought about it a lot when I was a kid too. Sometimes I even imagined that if I found this carnival again, you’d just be here. Waiting. Especially because we always kept rambling about all that silly shit. The stuff about always coming back to each other. It’s fucking stupid, I know given that’s not how marriages works and were just kids clinging to some dumb thing that made us happy.”

The wind lightly howled between them. The silence that fell upon them wasn’t like the other silence they found themselves trudging through. This time it was comfortable. This time it was full of understanding gazes.

Izuku leaned into him when another chilly night-breeze blew in through the cart.

The warmth radiated off of the other body in a gentle way as he drew closer in the car until their legs touched. Katsuki could feel the tone shift, the wind blew the cart as they reached near the peak of the Ferris wheel.

As they grew closer to the top, the view only grew more captivating. The tiny colorful lights down below mimicked an ocean of sparkling stars. Katsuki privately thought Izuku was striking against that backdrop. He waited for Izuku to look out the window and enjoy the view, but pretty green eyes never looked away from him.

“Y’know, it’s fascinating,” Izuku said. “How it all worked out.”

“What do you mean?”

“Despite everything, we still came back to each other.”

His heart filled with unexpected warmth.

“I guess we did. Didn’t we?” Katsuki whispered in a hush manner.

He hadn’t considered it. He hadn’t even pieced together that small fact but suddenly that tiny four-letter word called ‘fate’ came fumbling forward.

Scarlet eyes considered Izuku in all his closeness as he looked into the deep green eyes. He surveyed the moment and the way Izuku twiddled with his ring and only then did Katsuki realize he was gripping his. A small green curl of Izuku's fell forward on his forehead and his hair gently swayed with the breeze.

There was a swelling pull in his chest towards Izuku again.

It pulled him closer and closer to Izuku as he stared at the man underneath the twinkling lights. Izuku studied him back, and soon there was a small brush of their fingers. It sent tiny traces of electricity that climbed all the way up Katsuki's nape. His eyes flickered down to Izuku's lips, and Izuku wordlessly intertwined their fingers together.

The pulling in his chest became more forceful when Izuku shyly tilted his head and leaned in. Katsuki lifted up his other hand to cradle Izuku's soft cheek—make sure he was real and so was this moment. Katsuki tilted his head too, counting one freckle, two freckles, three freckles, four. He leaned in closely until he could hear Izuku's quickened breathing and feel his exhale against his lips.

The cart stopped at the top and time stood still for Katsuki.

Izuku had fluttered his eyes shut and the beautiful carnival setting behind him arranged the perfect, romantic atmosphere. The gorgeous man in front of him was leaning into his touch as he laid himself out bare. Delicate curls were as soft as Katsuki imagined as he twirled one around his finger. Even the gentle air was like hands pushing him down to kiss Izuku. He wanted to. He wanted to so badly. Anyone with eyes could see it was a perfect moment to do so.

But as Izuku leaned in all the way, Katsuki's guilty heart weighed down with a revelation.

"This…This is my last assignment," Katsuki whispered right before Izuku's lips touched his.

Izuku's eyes snapped open.

Izuku's pupils shifted, dilating before constricting as he homed in on Katsuki. The ache in Katsuki's chest tripled when Izuku's face twisted from confusion to mild distress. His faux husband cautiously leaned backwards and Katsuki did too, and they regarded each mutely. The hand intertwined with his retracted. The absence left him feeling cold.

Izuku opened his mouth, snapped it shut and then furrowed his brows.

"What do you mean this is your last assignment?" Izuku asked with an edge. He reached a shaky hand up to slide his heart shaped glasses on top of his head so he could stop viewing Katsuki through the rose-tinted hue. "Last like you're being fired?"

"Last as in after this I'm retiring for good," Katsuki whispered, feeling regretful for unspoken reasons. "I filled my quota and contract requirements."

Izuku stared at him in disbelief like he didn't quite understand that concept. His face crumbled in uncertainty and the magical atmosphere around them became dull.

The feeling of the plastic underneath them in the Ferris wheel cart was suddenly uncomfortable. All the roaring noises of the rollercoasters and the crowd played like static noise in the background. The lights didn't seem as shiny, and the sensation of amorousness denigrated out of the air. Like someone had burned the feeling down to the ground.

He and Izuku stayed in a gridlocked moment in time as the cart swayed slightly in the breeze. The sound of the creaking metal bolts reached Katsuki's ears.

"Does that mean you'll stop overlapping on my assignments?" Izuku murmured.

The wheel started moving again, bringing them down gradually.

"Yes," Katsuki said. He clenched his fists in his laps. "I'm moving to the far countryside to settle down for a long time. I, uh, actually own a bit of property out there that I don't use. I was going to set up in that town. It's quiet. Safe. Y'know, normal."

Izuku's beautiful green eyes drowned in blue melancholy. "…We're never going to see each other again after this. Are we?"

"I mean you could—" come visit me.

Katsuki halted when he realized how ridiculous that sounded.

Bitterness grew ripe in Katsuki's veins when he comprehended that suggestion wasn't practical. It was written across Izuku's face too that he understood the words that caught on Katsuki's tongue. But it was more evident he understood why it wasn't possible.

Because despite everything the last two days, they weren't seven anymore.

They couldn't hide under the covers and act as though the last seventeen years hadn't happened. They couldn't act as if they weren't simply two people who collided once, and then happened to collide again in this vast universe like doomed comets. Katsuki knew they couldn't pretend as if they hadn't spent more time hating each other than they ever did loving each other as blissfully ignorant children.

Izuku's hands started nervously plucking at the pink feathers on the boa. One by one the delicate feathers floated unceremoniously to the ground.

Izuku stared around the romantically lit cart, speechless.

They remained in the suffocating limbo as the Ferris wheel stopped moving. Probably letting some other couple above them enjoy the picturesque view they squandered. Their cart rocked a bit, squeaky iron echoing with all the overwhelming carnival sounds. They stayed quiet as the mechanical wheel let them down, getting closer to the ground one click at a time.

Suddenly, the unknown emotion came flooding back the moment Izuku dared glancing at him.

Katsuki couldn't turn his eyes away from Izuku's. Gorgeous green eyes were glossy with the start of tears and there was no mask of emotions on Izuku's face. He gazed fully vulnerable at Katsuki with unfiltered, raw longing. Katsuki's heart skipped, and he felt that unknown emotion swell until it filled his entire rib cage, spilling over.

Then it clicked. He finally identified what the unknown emotion in his chest was.

It was yearning.

The Ferris wheel stopped once more, but this time it was their cue to exit the ride. The young worker greeted them with a happy grin but neither Izuku nor Katsuki returned it. They looked at her like the sky was full of rain clouds and someone had poured ice water on them.

Izuku hopped out of the cart like he was on fire, legs wobbly. Katsuki slowly climbed out. His heart hammered like a beating drum in his chest. The loud percussion of his pumping blood filled his ears and drowned out the loud noises in the background. His eyes were slightly wide as he stared at the gravely ground underneath his shoes.

Pining.

He was fucking pining—for Izuku.

Then his heart pulsed with a painful splinter as he thought about young Izuku.

The visual of the past and present glitched as he thought about the knife throwing. But then he thought about the kind hugs. But then his mind raced to the two bullets lodged in his biceps that dangerously nicked his vitals as he was left to bleed out. But once more he imagined Izuku tucking him in at night—but the recollection jumbled and this time instead of young Izuku tucking him in it was present day Izuku.

Katsuki's chest convulsed a bit.

Suddenly, he wasn't too happy about the police raid being so soon. He needed more time to piece things together. No. They needed more time.

Why did they always need more time?

He turned to Izuku who had his head hanging downwards, not looking at him. He clutched one arm with body language that curled into himself. He appeared almost as if he wanted to disappear. His brows were pinched together, and his eyes were slowly becoming wetter and glassier. The pair waited off to the side for the rest of their group to get off the Ferris wheel in awkward silence.

Katsuki eventually found his voice again. He stepped towards Izuku, following that stupid pull that was plaguing his chest.

"Izuku—" he started but choked on his words when the man stepped backwards.

Izuku lifted a shaking hand and snapped his heart shaped glass back over his eyes. The rose tint acted like a veil, shielding the heavy emotions that laid behind it. To the ignorant eye, Izuku looked joyous when he offered up a strained smile. But to Katsuki, he could see the desperate denial that was overtaking him.

“L-Let’s make the best of what’s left of the night,” Izuku quickly said. He nervously plucked more feathers from the boa. He nodded dutifully. “No real reason to focus on that. Right?”

“Izuku,” Katsuki said, disappointment heavy in his vocal cords. He tilted his head, unsure if he liked the approach Izuku was taking. “Is what I said bothering you—”

“—Man! That was so fun!” Mina interjected happily from behind them. Their whole group skipped over to them with bright, happy go lucky smiles. Katsuki made a disgruntled sound when their conversation was cut short as Mina slung her arm around Izuku’s neck. “Did you two get a load of that view? It was so lovely!”

“Yeah!” Izuku eagerly agreed. He anxiously plucked more feathers. “It—It was really something.”

“I vote we get drinks next!” Eijiro announced enthusiastically. “That’ll be a great way to end the night.”

Katsuki wanted to object. He wanted to say absolutely not, drag Izuku away and force them to talk. But what about? The fact that he was retiring? Or the fact that they potentially wouldn’t see each other again after finally finding the other. It all was as futile as trying to catch all the grains of time in the palm in his hand. He realized that he was losing Izuku. Once again.

“Drinks sound lovely,” Momo sighed dreamily. “I saw a pop up bar that had a dance floor! We could relax over there.”

“Sounds great to me,” Shouto agreed. He grabbed his husband’s hand and stroked it lovingly. “This will be a great way to end the night.”

Inasa kissed Shouto’s cheek in a way that made Katsuki’s heart painfully remember the past.

He turned to Izuku; he was also staring longingly at the undercover detectives in front of them. Katsuki was uncertain of what to do next—so he decided to go along with what they had to do: pretend to be in love. However, when he reached for Izuku’s hand, the other man didn’t reach back fully. He brushed it off like he hadn’t seen it, and started chatting with Mina in an upbeat tune.

Everyone began cheerfully chatting and Katsuki found himself drowned out in the background.

Izuku clung to Mina’s energetic energy like someone struggling to stay afloat in the rocky sea. His faux husband struggled to meet his gaze again and Katsuki watched how pretty pink feathers were torn off with nervous ticking.

Pluck after pluck Izuku peeled them away while hanging onto the gripping story Mina was telling. She was emoting with her hands with expressive facial gestures that made Katsuki wonder what she was saying. However, it was static to his ears. Everyone was white noise in the background as he focused on Izuku.

All the colors drained and the only thing Katsuki could see was big, pretty green eyes.

They found their way at the pop-up bar that was a small box of a room sitting on the grass. It was as if someone had carved out a room from a house and placed it on the lawn. Flashing pink, green, and purple neon lights were lit up all over and the sound of a synth heavy song played over their heads.

Inside, it felt bigger as it was packed shoulder to shoulder with people. The front of the bar had a well lit stage that was elevated. Spotlights beamed down from the ceiling onto the wooden stage, illuminating the row of dancers covered in feathers and glitter. The attractive stage performers shimmied and moved their limbs in an enticing manner as they threw confetti onto the crowd.

Their group was able to secure a table off to the side of the square dance floor. The reflective panels of the dance floor looked like someone had hand polished them until not a scuff was visible. Perfect reflective light from the neon lights above was captured on the dance floor, illuminating the whole room.

Katsuki quickly learned that the Ashido-Kirishimas were drinkers. Heavy drinkers who had deep wallets that were part of the exclusive ‘Manliness’ sports line. The husband-and-wife duo bought everyone a round of drinks until their hearts filled. Izuku heavily drank as did Katsuki.

He was never one to pass up on free alcohol, but the ache inside of his chest was begging to be drowned out and several shots of vodka were doing the fucking trick.

His vision swirled a bit. It swayed like he was on a boat around the third shot and second cocktail.

Izuku’s face was perfectly flushed as pink as his glasses. Drunk giggles and cheers were tossed about and eventually their group all stood up to go dance. The happy couples were whisked away by the high energy, but Katsuki stayed behind. He could feel that buzz in his stomach and lull in his head when he was tittering the line between drunk and obliterated.

When Izuku stole a glance at him again, Katsuki envisioned young Izuku standing there, lost in the crowd.

He grimaced.

Katsuki promptly ordered a pink martini to suppress whatever the fuck that was. He downed it rapidly, enjoying the swimming feeling in his head. Everyone was swinging, shaking, and moving their feet to the beat—truly dancing the night away.

Out of everyone, Izuku seemed the most blissful. He danced like it was possible to sweat out his sadness through his pores. Desperate. Nearly needy. His eyes were closed, and head tilted back as he blissfully allowed Mina and Jirou to twirl him.

He stared at Izuku as the newfound sensation in his chest doubled—tripled—damn near quadrupled. Katsuki had never pined for anyone before. Or at least, not since he was a kid. It only added to the growing irony that the one person he pined for as a kid was Izuku.

Now here they were, and he was pining for him all over again.

As Izuku danced in the crowd, Katsuki wistfully watched him.

With each passing song, the vision of young Izuku and present Izuku blended together. The pieces molded together without the middle under the flashing neon lights. Katsuki's heart sparked with relief that he had finally found the missing boy. Visions of them laying together in the nook flashed in and out of his mind. The bright neon lights in the bar reminded him of the glittering stained glass of the abandoned church.

Katsuki took a sip of his drink when his heart clenched.

As the night progressed, Katsuki was unable to move from his chair. He remained perfectly nailed in place by woeful nostalgia.

But that apparently was entirely unacceptable to drunk Izuku.

The man caught his gaze in the dizzy neon lights. He marched over to Katsuki, tripping slightly in the thick wall of bodies but expertly keeping his drink upright so it didn't spill. As Izuku approached him, he chugged down his bright orange drink without breaking eye contact. He slammed the empty glass down on the wooden surface in front of Katsuki with a challenging glare.

He swayed on his feet slightly and Katsuki instinctively steadied him by his hips. But Izuku didn't seem grateful as he leaned down and pouted at him.

"Come dance with me," Izuku demanded with a slur. Izuku jabbed his finger into his chest with a deep pout. "You—We're supposed to be making the best of the night and you're sitting here like a grumpy cat."

"Maybe I don't wanna dance with you because you didn't hold my hand," Katsuki shot back sarcastically. The warmth of the alcohol in his belly tickled him as he chuckled, not fully in control. "That's what you fuckin' get, darling."

"Only because you didn't tell me you were going to retire." Izuku clumsily grabbed his hand. Katsuki gripped it back. "Why didn't you tell s'me sooner?"

"Why the hell would I have told you?"

"Because we're friends!" Izuku shouted angrily above the music. "You should have said something! This—this whole time I thought we would see each other again but we're not. You're supposed to tell your friends these things."

"We haven't been friends since we were eight," Katsuki deadpanned. "We've tried to kill each other on multiple occasions after that."

“No.” Izuku shook his head and frowned. “No. No. No. We’re friends. You’re the closest thing I’ve ever had to a friend, and I’ve never tried to kill you, so stop saying that! You should have told me you were going to leave be-because that makes me sad.” Izuku’s voice trailed off into unsteadiness.

“And why does that make you sad?” Katsuki asked with a sneer, slurring his words. “You should be happy to be rid of me. Didn’t you say, and I quote, if we were in the MCU you’d personally stop the Avengers from reversing the Snap if it meant that I’d come back?”

“Yeah.” Izuku stared at him hard and chewed his bottom lip. “But I didn’t mean that.”

His green eyes were only slightly visible behind the pink hued glasses. The lenses were reflecting the dancing neon lights, hiding his emotions. As Izuku gazed at him, all the flashing colors blended together like a hypnotic swirl as Katsuki tried to focus. He struggled, however, and he decided he wanted to see Izuku’s pretty eyes without the veil of pink.

Katsuki carefully used both hands to slide the glasses on top of Izuku’s head. His heart swelled when he finally could see the doe eyes without any obstruction.

Izuku stared at him longingly and grabbed his hands. He carefully interlaced their fingers and pulled himself close to Katsuki.

“I looked forward to seeing you,” Izuku gently confessed. “You make me happy in a terrible way.”

Katsuki’s heart tugged and soared hearing that, and his younger spirit smiled. Izuku leaned all the way into him, head bopping with drunkenness as he rested their foreheads together. Katsuki knew then he was a doomed man when the minty smell of Izuku’s cologne reached his nose.

After that, it all became a blur. Mina came back over, insisting that she buy them one more round, and Shouto and Jirou were both pink in the face from drunken laughter. Inasa was patting some of the sweat off his body in the warm room with a pink napkin. So much was happening around them, but all Katsuki could think about was Izuku.

Izuku. Izuku. Izuku.

Sweet, adoring Izuku who was leading him by the hand through the dance crowd. Katsuki goofily smiled the entire time, hoping the night would never end.

He’d dance here for eternity with Izuku if it meant easing the flustered yearning in his chest.

The alcohol in his system acted like a sweet type of poison as it pumped through his body. All he could really see was streaks of color, and Izuku’s freckled face. They danced in the middle of the room, everything bent and swirled out of shape. Then as the music continued, the melodies stopped reaching Katsuki’s ears. Everything slowed, the music slowly faded and Izuku gradually ceased his dancing.

Izuku hugged him.

There was no warning, no words. Izuku wrapped his arms around him in the middle of that crowded room and suddenly there wasn't a single soul around them anymore. It was just the two of them, underneath the glittering lights. Katsuki was stunted at first, but then gradually he understood. He wrapped his arms around Izuku too, in a silent way of saying 'me too'.

Katsuki looked down at his emerald wedding band and his emotions gave like splintered wood.

After this, they wouldn't be playing pretend anymore.

Yes, they had finally found each other—but in two days, Izuku will be gone. They would go their separate ways and the boy with green eyes would remain a distant, distasteful memory. Katsuki clutched on harder to Izuku who hugged tighter to him in response. They swayed slowly in the dense room as if they were the only two people there.

Katsuki realized that this was once again the end of them. The young side of his spirit fussed. It fussed like the broken child he used to be, nearly stomping its foot. Then it whispered to him that they didn't want to be separated. They wanted to stay—and always come back to each other like they promised.

The last thing Katsuki remembered was staring at their wedding bands.

Katsuki cursed the fucking sun the next morning.

His skull was pounding like someone was using his brain as a taiko drum and his tongue was uncomfortably dry like he had been licking wood all night. He groaned obnoxiously loud and squinted at the source of light that was blaring directly into his face. The flat surface of the mattress shifted under his weight. It was only then did he realize he was laying on top of someone.

What the hell is going on?

Katsuki blinked awake and forcefully slowed himself down to gain his bearings.

His stomach rocked like he was nauseous, and everything in his body felt nearly vile. Katsuki wearily glanced around and surprisingly found himself back in their hotel room. He attempted to recollect how he got from the carnival to the hotel, but only blurry bits and pieces came rushing forward.

It was scattered and full of weird visuals that didn't make sense: Sparkling green eyes. Momo gasping. Shouto tilting his head. He even remembers hearing bells in the blur of colors that were clogging his brain. But overall, none of it connected—or even made fucking sense.

A sinking feeling of dread dropped down to the bottom of his gut. Off to the side was Izuku's violin case that was for some reason open, and the violin was sitting on the bed with him—or them.

Izuku's snoring rippled in the air reminding him he wasn't alone.

Katsuki lifted himself slightly up to find Izuku sleeping underneath him. The other man's legs and arms were wrapped around him like a spider, clinging tightly. Soft hands were running through his hair and there was a giant fucking hickey sitting perched on his freckled neck above his tattooed '217'.

Katsuki grimaced immediately at the sight. Fuck. Fuck Fuck Fuck—

He frantically looked down but was relieved to see both him and Izuku were fully clothed.

Izuku's blouse was unbuttoned by two and Katsuki's pants were unzipped but still intact. Everything was intact, actually. It appeared like they stumbled in here, collapsed on the bed and attempted to take off their clothes but fucking failed at it because they were too damn drunk.

He mentally beat himself up because, holy shit, that was the first time he had blacked out in years. Much less on an assignment. This was probably one of the bigger mishaps he had ever done. He prayed that he didn't let anything fucking slip to Shouto or Inasa.

How the hell had he been so thoughtless?

Then he remembered how fucking sad Izuku looked when he told him he was retiring. Katsuki winced. Right. That's how he had been reckless: trying to drink down his fucked-up feelings about his childhood friend turned nemesis.

He rolled off of Izuku and decided to go get some painkillers for his pounding hangover.

Izuku stirred awake, reaching out for him as he sat up on the side of the bed,

"Katsuki?" Izuku's groggy voice called out for him. "Are you awake?"

"Yeah, I'm up," Katsuki said. He looked down at his clothes in mild disgust. "Do you remember what happened yesterday after the bar by any chance?"

Izuku sat up all the way. Green curls were tossed all around, pointing in every direction. Izuku scrunched his nose and squinted his eyes when the bright sun hit him directly in the face.

"No," Izuku grumbled and sat up too. "I blacked out when Mina gave me my fourth shot of vodka and some fruity sounding drink. I had no clue they would be drinkers like that. Their tolerance is higher than anything I've ever seen."

"Yeah. Leave it up to the fitspo couple to be extreme rage machines," Katsuki grumbled. "Fucking pink and red lunatics."

Izuku mumbled in agreement, grabbing his head, and plugged in his dead phone.

Katsuki stood up from the bed and was prepared to go grab the largest dose of acetaminophen that was in his suitcase. However, when he walked past the wooden nightstand, he stopped short. Scarlet eyes caught the gleam of something that wasn't there before. He whipped his head around towards it with a confused expression.

Sitting there was a neat piece of paper.

It was off white, had a golden seal on it, a blue ribbon, and there was a red emblem stamped in the corner. The gold trimming twinkled in the morning light, beckoning Katsuki to pick it up. Katsuki grabbed it with caution, inspecting it closer and the sound of Izuku's phone turning on could be heard in the background.

He held it closer to his face as he started reading—but his confusion fucking grew more when he processed the title of the document. At the bottom were a sleuth of curvy signatures on dotted lines. One signature looked familiar—familiar like his.

But what was even more concerning were the names on it. Printed in clear, bold font in black ink.

All the color drained from his face.

He attempted to make sense of the paper in his hand as he clutched it till it crinkled. He read the two names over and over. Told himself there had to be another explanation. But the more he read it, the more it seemed official. Especially when on the other side was the formal watermark for the city of Nago, Okinawa.

He whirled around to the man who was lying on the bed, still half asleep.

"Izuku…Why the fuck does this marriage certificate say Bakugou Izuku and Bakugou Katsuki?"

Chapter 9 - Maestoso

.

"Maybe it's not real."

"What the hell do you mean it's not real? It looks real as shit, Izuku. It even has the official stamp of Nago, Okinawa on it and says, 'marriage is legally recognized in the country of Japan'—and it has our goddamn government names on it."

Katsuki wanted to slap himself. Or maybe he wanted to slap Izuku. Or possibly slap both him and Izuku at the same time in one fell swoop. He sat down on the edge of the stupid fucking heart shaped bed in horror and rested his head in his palms.

"I-It could be one of those fake marriage thingys!" Izuku reasoned in a high-strung tone. He stared at the daunting piece of paper, thinking that it couldn't be real. He was visibly sweating, clearly sick to his stomach as he gawked at their names that were in crisp, black ink. “W-We should go find out where we got this from—it might not even be legally binding.”

Katsuki scowled. “And if it fucking is?”

Izuku’s stunned face twisted in confusion. He didn’t utter a word as he glanced between Katsuki and the piece of paper.

“I-It can’t be,” Izuku eventually spoke, fully in denial. “Your surname isn’t actually Bakugou, is it? I thought that was fake.”

Katsuki scoffed. “Of course it’s my real surname. Why would I lie about that?”

“But why would you use your real surname for an assignment?” Izuku hissed, now looking incredibly upset. “Th-That’s plain reckless and extremely poor undercover behavior. I don’t ever reveal my real surname or first name on assignments—”

“—Look, the surname thing, sure. I probably should’ve checked in with a fake one,” Katsuki quipped unhappily. “But, in my fucking defense, I figured this would be a one and done type of assignment: a bullet in that scummy bastard’s skull from a rooftop in the dead of night and then I would leave. I didn’t anticipate I would get up close and personal with the son of a bitch. And neither did my supervisor—but here we fucking are.”

Izuku made a disgruntled sound and clutched the roots of his hair.

“I can’t believe Bakugou is your real last name,” Izuku muttered, eyes staring wide at the marriage certificate.

“Well, Bakugou might be your real surname name too if we don’t fucking figure this out,” Katsuki reminded him curtly. “So back to the question: what do we do?”

“W-We’ll figure it out as we go,” Izuku said wearily. He placed down the paper with shaky fingers onto the nightstand. Both of them stared at it like it was Satan’s spawn. “I-In the meantime we—we need to figure out if it’s real before even considering what happens next. I still don’t think it’s legitimate.”

A brash, sarcastic chuckle escaped from Katsuki. “Let’s really fucking hope so.”

Izuku then looked down at his clothes and Katsuki did too. He cringed. Fuck.

They both were still wearing their outfits from the night before, crumbled and disheveled. There was a light waft of the smell of alcohol on them and getting a whiff of it made Katsuki’s stomach churn in repulsion.

He then observed Izuku and grimaced to the point he practically flinched. It was somehow even worse for the smaller man. Sitting there, nearly taunting him, was an extremely large hickey on Izuku’s neck. It was about the size of his fist, reddish purple and it appeared as though someone had spent an extremely long time sucking. Multiple bite marks up and down Izuku’s whole collarbone were evident.

Katsuki sucked at his teeth. His, hopefully still, faux husband hadn't even noticed yet. Izuku's eyes remained glued to the marriage certificate and his hand was clasped over his mouth in utter shock.

There were so many goddamn problems right now.

Which to tackle first? Katsuki for once in his life didn't know where to begin. So, he started with the obvious problem: his wardrobe. He stood up and zipped up his fly and buttoned his pants when could see he was nearly undressed below the waist. He didn't even have fucking socks on. Who the hell takes their socks off first? Katsuki wanted to slap his drunk self for thinking so goddamn backwards.

The sound of the zipper made Izuku's eyes whip down to his crotch area. His brows pinched together.

"D-Did we—" Izuku swallowed nervously. "Did we do it?"

Katsuki scoffed at the innocent language. "Can you walk properly?"

"Yeah?"

"Then I think it's safe to assume, no."

Izuku's eyes widened at that.

Katsuki gave Izuku an unimpressed stare in return as he smoothed out his rumpled shirt. Impossibly big green eyes darted from Katsuki's crotch to his face. The creaky gears turning in Izuku's head were practically audible and they were running a mile a minute. When it clicked, Izuku blushed and hastily turned away.

"O-Okay, well, that's a non-issue," Izuku muttered timidly, eyes darting in every direction but towards Katsuki. "Er, let's get ready for breakfast and see if anything bad happened last night. If we accidentally let our real names spill to the group, especially Shouto and Inasa, we need to do damage control, fast."

"And what exactly would be our excuse for being Katsuki and Izuku?" Katsuki asked tiredly.

"Roleplaying?" Izuku suggested, entirely unsure and overwhelmed. He grimaced and shrugged his shoulders. "They already think we enjoy doing it in the woods—what's adding in one more kink to the mix?"

Katsuki's expression transformed into deep doubt. Extremely fucking deep doubt. They were dealing with two detectives, and despite Katsuki thinking cops were dumb, they weren't that dumb. Shouto and Inasa were already partially suspicious of them—but at this point, he'd take any excuse.

"Sure, why the fuck not." Katsuki threw his hands up with a huff. "Forest sex kink, shitty martial issues, plus I'm apparently a fucking brute—why not add random ass drunk roleplaying to the mix? Hell, let's just tell them we're here to kill the guy they're attempting to arrest while we're at it."

“Look, it’s the best we got.”

“I know, and that’s sad. Really fucking sad.”

Izuku nodded in agreement. He wore a puzzled expression that gave away that he was still processing everything. It was a hard concept to grasp. They might’ve not only blown their cover—but possibly were married. Izuku shuddered like he had smelled something sour and shook his head. He stole one more glance at the gleaming, gold trimmed certificate before hurrying towards the bathroom.

Izuku fiddled with his fingers as he walked directly in front of the long, full-length mirror on his way.

“I’m going to go get showe—sh-sh—w-what is that?!” Izuku’s all but screamed.

His shrill voice cut through the air like a whizzing bullet when he caught sight of his reflection. All the color drained from Izuku’s freckled face as he waltzed up closely to the mirror. His face contorted in disbelief as he aggressively tugged the hem of his blouse down. The next sound that erupted from Izuku was a cross between a wheeze and a shriek as he craned his neck to get a better look.

Katsuki winced and held his pounding head more.

“Is this a hickey?” Izuku accused. “Katsuki—You gave me a hickey?”

“It would appear that way,” Katsuki grumbled. “If it makes you feel any better, I don’t recall doing it.”

“No,” Izuku said flatly. “No, that doesn’t make me feel any better.”

He was too tired to counter Izuku’s sarcastic remark. As he sat there, part of him was a little annoyed that he couldn’t remember doing that.

Despite all the awkwardness he and Izuku were trying to navigate, it didn’t fully take away from the fact he still found Izuku beyond attractive. Plus, in light of recent events, he could finally admit he was pining for Izuku. Drunken shenanigans didn’t take away from that. That stupid warm feeling inside of his chest was still burning strong.

Actually, when he examined it, the feelings of affection were somehow burning stronger than yesterday. It was hot. Scorching. It virtually threatened to devour him if he didn’t extinguish it soon. The all-consuming need inside of his bones made him deeply want to kiss Izuku. And with the added pressure of their time running thin, the urge was sitting heavy on his nerves. It told him to go to Izuku, now, and openly say fuck it since they had possibly less than twenty-four hours together before they would likely never see each other again.

However, the fact that he might’ve already done that, and more, was a little fucking upsetting. He got the wedding but no goddamn honeymoon.

Izuku’s finger traced a circle around the large spot above his tattoo. “Why is it so big?”

“It, uh, looks like a cluster.”

“A cluster?”

“Multiple hickies in one spot that shape up to be one big hickey.”

Izuku’s eyes caught his through the reflection of the mirror. Katsuki had never burned with such embarrassment with the way Izuku’s green eyes were boring into his soul. The other man was surveying him suspiciously—and Katsuki surveyed him back, but maybe he was simply admiring his handy work. Even while drunk, he had given a wide variety of pretty little marks. Katsuki had to admit, he liked the way Izuku’s lovely skin appeared right now: marked up with his teeth was an excellent fashion on Izuku.

“Are you sure you didn’t punch me in the throat?” Izuku suddenly asked.

“What—” Katsuki spluttered in surprise. “Izuku, that is clearly a fucking hickey.”

“This looks exactly like the bruise I had when you punched me in the throat in Taiwan, so excuse me for having doubts.” Izuku shot him a glare. “But if it is a hickey, then you really do have the world’s biggest mouth. Literally and figuratively.”

Katsuki’s eyebrow twitched.

Of course, he was pining for a goddamn brat.

Katsuki ended up getting showered first.

Izuku decided he needed time to pace around the room until there was a hole in the floor. The flustered freckled man was muttering a mile a minute about different things. Such as, what the hell were they going to tell the group? If they had let their real names spill, what type of kinky roleplay would involve fake names like Izuku and Katsuki? Then finally, what time was the raid tomorrow and how long did they have left to kill Moore before time was permanently up? However, the marriage wasn’t one of Izuku’s many mutterings.

Both of them were promptly ignoring the elephant in the room that was the shape of a rectangle and stamped with a red seal.

After showering, Katsuki patiently got dressed and told himself it was fine. It was all going to be fucking fine. Izuku and him were not married and they had not let their names slip. He took in a sharp, relaxing inhale and stationed himself on the edge of the bed. He couldn’t help nervously tapping his foot after he finished donning himself with his silver chain and black, fang earrings.

As he waited for Izuku to shower, his denial began kicking in full swing.

There was no way they were really married—right?

Sure, they did things they wanted to and had done as children together yesterday. But their drunk selves wouldn't go get fucking remarried—or, er, married. Technically their first stupid little marriage was fake too. But this one, if it was the worst-case scenario, was extremely real. Very real with very real consequences.

The weight of the wedding band on his finger was heavier than before. He glanced down at the shining emerald on his hand. It gleamed like it was laughing. He then wearily glanced towards the bathroom door when he couldn't hear the shower running.

"Are you alright in there?" Katsuki called out.

"I-I'm fine—I just—" Izuku stopped short. "I, uh, found more hickies."

"What?" Katsuki exclaimed. His eyes went wide.

He used his hand to cover his mouth in shock and prayed that more memories from last night would come to him. How were there more hickies? Then it hit him upside his head like a brick: Izuku's blouse had been casually unbuttoned about halfway. Oh. Oh fuck—

"There's a really large one on my chest," Izuku said, sounding peeved. "Right on my nipple. It looks like someone chomped all around it."

Now Katsuki was really fucking upset. Why couldn't he remember doing that? Izuku had extremely cute nipples and Katsuki would probably—no, not probably—he would definitely sell his left leg just for a chance to bite them. Izuku probably had cute moans too.

Katsuki cursed under his breath and punched the air silently.

Izuku emerged from the bathroom wearing a light pink, silk scarf around his neck. It was thin, short and tied neatly into a loosely hanging bow. The piece of delicate fabric hid the large bruise and his tattoo entirely. It fluidly spilled over in front of his simple, white button down. Izuku looked both flustered and pissed when he finally finished putting on his sandals.

"Did you have any hickies?" Izuku asked. His face was twisted in a little pout as they got ready to leave their room. "My entire chest is covered in them."

Katsuki shook his head. "Naw, no hickies."

"How is that fair?" Izuku grumbled under his breath.

Katsuki raised an eyebrow. "Did you want me to have hickies too?"

Izuku didn't reply to that.

They both grabbed their key cards, wallets, and when it came time to walk out, they took one last daring glance at the wedding certificate sitting on the nightstand. It was silently mocking them with the question if it was real or not. Izuku stared at it with a conflicted expression before he turned to leave.

Then quickly a part of Katsuki's dangerous curiosity kicked in.

"Wait," Katsuki called before Izuku could walk out. The other man turned around with an expectant look with his hand on the doorknob. Katsuki cleared his throat and tilted his head. "Can I see it?"

Izuku scrunched his face, puzzled. "See what?"

"The hickey," Katsuki said simply. He gestured to his own chest to emphasize his point.

Izuku stared at him blankly.

"The hickey," Izuku parroted slowly. Katsuki nodded. "You want me to lift up my shirt and let you stare at the hickey on my nipple rather than immediately going to figure out if we're legally married or not?"

"…Yeah?"

"I can't with you—" Izuku threw his hand up, yanked open the door, and marched out.

Katsuki hurriedly followed him. He didn't see the problem with his question.

"I'm just trying to see if it'll trigger more memories," Katsuki defended as Izuku walked in front of him. A pissed off aura was rapidly emitting from Izuku's small frame. "Maybe seeing it might help me remember what we did last night."

Izuku whirled his head around but didn't stop his stride as he gritted his teeth.

"Shut up, Bakugou Katsuki!"

Izuku walked ahead of him the entire way down. The freckled man was blushing furiously, and every now and then rubbing his chest like it was tender. That unfortunately made Katsuki question if Izuku had sensitive nipples. Even worse, Katsuki was extremely curious to know how Izuku's chest looked, littered with his marks.

When they arrived for breakfast, they did their best to act cool. Katsuki was the first to initiate the hand holding. Izuku squirmed a bit in discomfort at the contact but went along with it. They still had to act like they were married.

The pair grabbed their normal plate full of food and walked over stiffly to their usual table. Katsuki was tense, as was Izuku. Their backs were unnaturally straight, and their eyes were on high alert as they approached. Surprisingly, everyone was chatting like usual. Mina and Eijiro were giving their morning Manliness promotion, Momo doted over Jirou and Shouto looked sleepy. Everyone was relaxed, cool, and calm. Not a soul batted a suspicious eye at them when they sat down. Instead, Inasa smiled at them with a large, overly friendly grin.

“Hey, you two love birds!” Momo said cheerily. A little too cheery, when Katsuki considered it.

Izuku offered a strained smile. “H-Hey! How are you guys?”

“We’re doing pretty good,” Mina replied in a sing-song tune. She was glancing between them with an amused stare. “But more importantly, how are you two doing?”

“Hung over,” Katsuki said sharply. He stabbed with his fork at the food on his plate. “Not exactly in the best mood.”

He looked towards Shouto and Inasa at that moment, who were quietly assessing them. Katsuki discreetly analyzed them back, attempting to catch any hint of distrust in their body language. However, he found nothing. In fact, there was nothing negative in any of the other couples’ smiles or stares. It was as though he and Izuku had said something hilarious to them before they had sat down.

Every single one of them were smiling and snickering.

Katsuki grimaced when Jirou choked back a laugh and winked at Izuku. Izuku stared back puzzled, and the two hitmen cut their eyes towards one another. This was both a bad sign and a good one.

What the hell had happened last night?

“W-We actually blacked out,” Izuku said in a rush. The desperation in his voice was thick. “We’re sorry if we said anything strange last night! You shouldn’t take us too seriously. Taro and I can be a little, uh, imaginative, when we’re drunk like that.”

“I don’t know if imaginative is the right word,” Eijiro chuckled under his breath.

“I would think ‘flirty’ is more fitting,” Shouto said. He gave a cool half-smile as he leaned back in his chair. He looked between them with an assumed stare. “You know, I had doubts you two even liked each other until last night. But, uh, I guess you two are clearly married for a reason.”

All the blood drained from Katsuki’s face. Oh, fuck. This was much worse.

“W-What do you mean?” Izuku questioned.

Katsuki dreaded what the answer could possibly be.

“Well,” Inasa started, grinning from ear to ear. “After the last round of cotton candy shots, you two started groping each other in the middle of the dance floor. Taro began exclaiming that his husband had the ‘world’s most perfect ass’ and ‘no extra in the world could ever compare’. Then he gave Hiroji’s backside a good slap.”

Kill me, Katsuki begged internally. Just fucking take me out.

He lifted his head up to the ceiling and took a deep gulp of air. He was cursing everything right now. He did his best and pushed down all the burning heat that was rising.

He didn't miss the way Izuku glanced towards him curiously.

"Yeah, then Hiroji started rambling on about how strong Taro was," Eijiro said in a hysterical laugh. He chuckled so hard he doubled over, gripping the table for support. "Something about Taro being loaded with multiple types of guns? Then he began pointing to Taro's biceps saying they were dangerous weapons and begged to be choked with them via sleeper hold in the middle of the dance floor."

Now it was Katsuki's turn to glance towards Izuku.

Green eyes went wide, and a deep blush raced onto Izuku's freckled face.

"Th-That's hilarious," Izuku said gravely. He tried to mask his embarrassment with a strained high-pitched tone that didn't fool Katsuki. Weary green eyes glanced around at the table accompanying his forced smile. "D-Did anything else happen?"

"Oh, yeah," Jirou chimed in. "After you two were finished groping each other, Hiroji, you said something about you two should get married again?"

"Yeah, which was a little strange," Shouto said, sounding confused. "I asked, 'what for?' and Taro said that it was a good idea because last time you two were married, you were seven. To which I said, 'That's illegal'."

Shouto tilted his head, and it matched the baffling memory in Katsuki's head.

That small gesture triggered other memories in Katsuki's mind. They came tumbling forward, nearly painful since his skull was already pulsing in pain. A tiny piece of the night strung together. He suddenly could remember Shouto telling them there was no way they could have been wed at seven, and if they were they should seek out a lawyer.

Then Katsuki remembered berating Shouto, yelling at him and saying he sounded like his dead mother. Katsuki winced at that. Then, on cue, the memory of Momo gasping in shock pieced in. She told Katsuki he shouldn't talk about his mother like that, and Katsuki aggressively waved her off. Next, he could feel Izuku's warm hand tugging him along. Sparkling green eyes were enticing and Katsuki couldn't say no. He could see them leave the pop-up bar together with drunk, matching smiles.

After that it was a blur.

"And where did we go exactly?" Katsuki asked when the memories were cut off.

"To the Marriage Drive Thru at the carnival," Jirou answered simply. "You two said you'd be right back and that we could keep dancing. But, uh, you never came back. We tried looking for you after a while, and we found you two making out at the entrance. Then you said you were going back to the hotel for your honeymoon. We figured you went to go…you know. Do what married couples do after feeling each other up all night."

Izuku gulped heavily and touched the silk scarf on his neck. “Oh. Ha, wow. What a wild night.”

“Extremely,” Katsuki grumbled. “Thanks for filling those gaps in for us.”

“No problem at all!” Mina said with a bright grin. “You two are really fun! It’s been great getting to know you. I’m sad we’re checking out in a couple of hours; I think we would all be awesome friends.”

“Yeah! It’s been super dope!” Eijiro said. He gave an eager thumbs up. “We should have a group chat!”

Katsuki felt a little jealous at how fucking chipper both Mina and Eijiro were.

How the hell were they not hungover? Both of these motherfuckers drank way more than anyone at this table combined. As he watched them act unaffected, Katsuki seriously considered the ‘Manliness’ workout and nutrition plan. If it meant that the Ashido-Kirishimas were immune to alcohol poisoning, then it might actually be a good fucking program.

The conversation shifted into making lighthearted jokes about him and Izuku. They both laughed it off, holding hands the whole time to sell the image. Izuku even pulled down his scarf a bit to show off his hickey to solidify their cover. After a while, everyone eased into another subject about cats. Momo pulled out her phone and started showing pictures of her and Jirou’s ‘fur babies’: Jiji and Stormy. Izuku’s eyes glanced at the picture of the adorable cats and had to agree with the other couple’s assessment that they were indeed the cutest cats in existence.

When everyone was cooing, distracted, Katsuki and Izuku quietly exchanged glances towards each other.

The discreet stare clearly translated various levels of embarrassment. Katsuki thought about what he had said about Izuku’s ass and Izuku thought about how he publicly claimed to want to be choked. But while all that was humiliating as hell, it was good news. They smiled slightly in relief. They hadn’t spilled anything to their Paradise Crew about their names or the real reason why they were here.

In a roundabout way, they had finally solidified they were a couple—at the very end of this pain in the ass assignment.

But now one question remained on the table: what occurred at that damn Marriage Drive Thru?

They backtracked all the way back to the carnival directly after breakfast. Izuku and Katsuki gave a lame excuse not to spend the day with everyone. They couldn’t think of something all the way plausible on the spot, so Izuku blurted out that he might’ve dropped his wallet at the carnival. Next, Katsuki said he was far too hungover for any more activities and just wanted to spend the day with his husband. He cringed at the word—it tasted far different in his mouth as it hung over their heads.

Everyone easily believed their excuse, considering how drunk off their asses they had been. They all said goodbye, exchanged phone numbers even though Katsuki had no plans on calling any of these people after this. But he did it in politeness when Jirou hugged him with a smile.

The trek back to the carnival felt oddly similar to walks of shame Katsuki experienced after one-night stands.

All the streetlights, concrete roads and pathways were familiar yet not in the bright daylight. The nighttime magic of the carnival faded entirely, and the atmosphere felt stale, like a bitter aftertaste in his mouth. Almost as though the curtains on a magic show had been pulled back to reveal there was no magic all along. Only smoke and mirrors and he fell for it like a fool.

They stumbled into the carnival area that was majority shut down. Some people were out and about, but the energy was significantly dampened as people passed them without the dazzling music or cheer. The pair of hitmen wandered around, searching for the ‘Marriage Drive Thru’. Eventually they found it neatly tucked away in the corner behind the large merry-go-round. Even the carnival rides seemed different, entirely lackluster without dazzling lights blinking upon them. He could see all the reddish-brown rust and loose screws poking out the machines.

They took a second to pause in front of the Marriage Drive Thru.

They stood side by side in tight trepidation.

The crime scene of their possible fuck up was conveniently placed in a pop-up building. It was sturdy and had the lettering of ‘Marriage Drive Thru’ in a colorful bright yellow and pink font. Each letter was encased by a row of lightbulbs. It probably was alluring and glittery at night—but now it looked bland with the power shut off.

Katsuki cut his eye towards Izuku. The other man was flexing his hands between open and balled up in a fist. After a wide breadth of quietness, Izuku inhaled and turned towards him.

“Let’s hope for the best,” Izuku soothed, unsure.

Katsuki nodded, also slightly unsure. “Yeah. The best.”

They walked into the pop-up building and it was everything Katsuki imagined it to be. The setting was plastic, stiff, and lifeless. It was clearly put together under a tight, low budget. The inside was a poor excuse for a mock church. It even had cheap, wooden benches that were lined up and down, creating an aisle. All over were fake, slightly dingy white flowers, and fairy lights. Katsuki couldn’t tell if they were even on because so many of them had a fuse blown.

In front of them at the end of the aisle was a large wedding arch. It had sheer white drapes and pink flowers entangled upon it. On the top read ‘Just Married!’ in dazzling, glittering gold cut out lettering. Off to the side was a dusty brown trunk that had wedding props sloppily tossed inside —and someone was reorganizing it, hunched over singing 'Chapel of Love' happily to himself.

"E-Excuse us," Izuku announced as they approached the man. The man rummaging around in the trunk whirled towards them, as though surprised someone was here. "Hi, is there someone we could talk to about the business?"

He was an older gentleman in a tacky, dull grey suit. It was decorated with one of those stupid water squirt corsages pinned directly above his heart. He had a long face, like he was in a perpetual state of shock and had a strange handlebar mustache that twisted on itself on the ends. Katsuki couldn't stop himself from making a displeased face. His upper lip curled.

He sure as hell hope this wasn't the fucking person who married them—fake or not.

"Why yes, hello!" The man said. He gave them a fake, forced grin that Katsuki could see through. Three of his teeth were gold and the other two were silver. "Was there something I could help you two with?"

"Are you the owner by any chance?" Izuku asked nervously.

"Yes I am. Kimoto Yasuo at your service." The man nodded and straightened himself out. He smoothed a hand over his slicked back, thick noir hair and assessed them. "Oh! I remember you two! How is it going? Enjoying the newlywed life?"

Katsuki flinched at the term 'Newlywed.'

"That's actually what we wanted to talk to you about," Izuku said. He shifted nervously. "W-We found a marriage certificate with our names and the Nago city seal on it. We were trying to see if there had been some mix up or possibly that this was all for show—"

"—We're here to figure out if these marriages are legally binding or not," Katsuki injected non-too-gracefully and got straight to the point. "This shit is all fake, right? Marriage certificate and all?"

Yasuo blanched at them as if he was offended.

"Of course it's not fake," Yasuo said, face twisting in distaste. "All marriages done here are as official as any other marriage sealed elsewhere. We use a civil officiant and bring all the proper paperwork for convenience. All documentation is real and submitted to the city for permanent record every morning. If you're married here, you're married legally."

Married.

Legally.

The shock set in instantaneously, and the room swayed—or did he sway?

Katsuki's vision swarmed momentarily with white spots and his stomach did a backflip. Next, the throbbing in his head increased into a high, painful tempo against his temples. He tried to swallow but his throat was dry and scratchy. Katsuki lifted a shaky hand and gripped his hair in an attempt to alleviate some anxiety.

Married legally. They were fucking married, for real this time.

It was quiet enough to hear the buzzing of some insect in the cramped space. Suddenly, Izuku let out a shaky breath and it reminded Katsuki that someone was next to him in the shifting room. Specifically, his husband.

His fucking husband.

Izuku wordlessly stumbled like the ground beneath them was tilting and grabbed for the edge of the aisle benches. He held onto it desperately for support with one hand as he gripped his stomach like he was suddenly sick with the other hand.

Katsuki just stared and stared at the owner's mustache. He couldn't comprehend it. Real? These fucking marriages were real? He tried to wrap his mind around it—but he felt like he was sinking in quicksand as he allowed the reality to stir.

"Is there a problem?" Yasuo asked. "If you would like, I could show you the tape from the wedding. For legal purposes, we document all weddings that happen here and then give every couple a copy for sentimental reasons. But, uh, I remember you two didn't exactly wait for me to give you your copy."

Katsuki's brows pinched together. There was even a fucking tape?

He dared to finally look Izuku in the eye. The large, deep green eyes of the other man were unreadable. Izuku stared back at him wordlessly before biting his lip and turning back to the business owner.

"S-Sure," Izuku said, clearly forcing his tongue to form the word.

Izuku stood up straight but still clutched his stomach as though he was seasick. Katsuki turned to the owner too, who gestured for them to follow him to some backroom. With each step Katsuki felt like his body was heavier by tenfold, weighed down by the new information.

They arrived in a tiny, shabby office in the shape of a square. It had several mini fans on, a futile attempt to combat the summer heat. In the center of the room was a single slanted wooden desk and two chairs that looked like they were on the brink of collapse. If someone were to sit in them, Katsuki was sure they would fall straight to the floor. The draft of air circulating the room felt sticky and there was the smell of leftover nicotine lingering around but no cigarettes in sight.

All of this did nothing to ease Katsuki's ever growing anxiety. It gnawed through him the longer he stared around the room.

The owner shuffled through an egregiously disorganized file cabinet that was shoved into the corner. Several loose, single papers were laying around and some of the file drawers weren't even closed. Edges of manilla folders were stained, burned with cigarette imprints and poking out and bent in places they shouldn't be.

"Here we go!" Yasuo exclaimed, holding up a silver DVD. It shined horribly in the light that was spilling in from the window. "Bakugou Katsuki and Bakugou Izuku. Right?"

"Ye-Yeah," Izuku whispered. "That is, uh, us."

Yasuo either didn't care about their clear upset or he was promptly ignoring it.

"Want to watch it? I don't mind!" Yasuo nonchalantly gestured for them to sit down in the chairs. "I always love seeing the reaction on young couples' faces to their vows."

Neither Izuku nor Katsuki replied.

Vows? They had fucking vows?

Izuku was the first to take a seat. He eased into the rickety chair that leaned with his weight. He wearily looked down at the legs on the wooden chair that were bending ever so slightly with splinters poking out. Katsuki huffed heavily through his nose and did the same. The chair he sat in squeezed his large frame tightly and he could feel a dip that he shouldn't have in a chair made of solid wood.

Yasuo practically skipped over to his large, flat screen TV. It was sorely out of place, too luxe and shiny for such a rundown business. The sadistic owner popped the disc in, and thinly smiled while twirling his mustache. Yasuo propped himself against his desk and crossed his arms with the remote in his hand. The DVD began to play, and it was crystal fucking clear.

Great. We get to see this shit in high definition, Katsuki thought sourly.

Him and Izuku watched in shocked silence as their drunk selves stumbled on the screen hand in hand. The camera focused in and out with shitty handling—even shook a bit. It zoomed in on him and Izuku diving through the brown trunk of costume attire.

It was like gazing into some alternate reality with the way they were getting along fucking perfectly.

He and Izuku's hands were tightly woven together, rebalancing like perfect halves whenever the other wobbled. Izuku picked out a red bowtie and Katsuki picked out a green one. They pointed to the shoddy bowties, then to their shining wedding rings and snickered like something was funny. Both of them were too drunk to tie properly—but neither of them seemed to give a shit as they laughed. Then Izuku grabbed for a white wedding veil and giggled slightly as he toyed with it before donning it on himself like a crown.

"Do I look pretty?" The Izuku on the screen slurred through his drunken speech.

Katsuki watched himself on the television nod like an eager fool. "The fucking prettiest."

They walked up hand in hand towards the aisle with a man who was dressed in black slacks. The bastard didn't even have a formal top on—just some blue and purple Hawaiian print shirt. Cheap wedding music played from up above and Katsuki could identify the tune as the cliché ‘Here Comes the Bride’ melody. He groaned out loud, unable to hold back his cringe.

Katsuki and Izuku watched themselves stand in front of the Civil Officiant holding hands. They looked like two kids playing dress up who didn’t know what they were doing. It was familiar, just like when they would play make believe in that tattered abandoned church. He watched themselves sign a bunch of disclaimers and waivers right before the Civil Officiant started reciting whatever magical words had sealed their fates.

Katsuki couldn’t bear to listen to it—he zoned it out and placed his pounding head in his hands. His racing thoughts tuned out whatever the fuck was being said on the screen.

This was a disaster.

This was quite possibly the biggest shit show he possibly had ever been in.

How would they even tackle this? Would they immediately get a divorce? Was that even fucking allowed right away? They weren’t supposed to see each other ever again after they executed Moore soon—but this was a whole different fucking mess. They couldn’t even extend the goddamn assignment if they wanted to because of that stupid police-raid.

As Katsuki’s thoughts were spiraling further down a black hole, suddenly they stopped. The sound of his own voice tugged him back to the surface.

It was him—but it didn’t sound like him.

Katsuki furrowed his brows and returned his eyes back to the screen. Standing there was himself in that crooked bowtie in his all-black clothing. He was holding Izuku’s hands and looking into his eyes like no one else was in the room.

But what threw him off the most was his voice.

His gruff voice was dripping in a tenderness that he’d never used with anyone.

“I promise to always come back to you, darling,” the Katsuki on the screen said seriously. He gripped Izuku’s hands tightly in his and slightly wobbled with a plastered grin. “I’ll find my way back to you, again and again and again. I promise to always be by your side and I’ll fucking kill anyone who gets in the way of us.”

The officiant gave Katsuki a weary glance at the casual mention of murder.

Izuku on the other hand was staring at Katsuki like he had recited a love poem. Big, green eyes were sparkling with hope and Izuku leaned into Katsuki’s touch with a sweet smile.

“And I promise to always come back to you too,” Izuku proclaimed. “I’ll always find my way back to you.”

“Promise?” Katsuki watched himself whisper desperately.

The drunk, unfocused gaze in his eyes sobered for a split moment.

The universe slowed as they held each other closer, translating words that were failing between them. There was a thoughtful pause as he and Izuku stared into each other's eyes with unfiltered rawness. Hurt. Relief. Joy. It was strange. Such an emotional expression was one Katsuki never imagined he could make. He had assumed that part of him was broken and rusted away.

Katsuki examined how his eyes were soft and adoring. He wasn't frowning. All his facial muscles were relaxed in a way that he forgot he could do. His gaze was half lidded, weighed down with heavy emotions as he caressed Izuku's skin with his rough fingers. He was holding onto the smaller hands in his like Izuku was his lifeline in the rocky ocean.

If Katsuki had to imagine what an expression of love looked like, this would be it.

"I promise, Kacchan." Izuku stared back at him with equal gentleness. "I missed you. I'm so happy we found each other again just like we said we would."

Katsuki wearily glanced towards Izuku next to him, who stared at the screen with an unreadable face. His hands were clasped together, and his face was void, entirely opposite as it was on the screen. Distant, unfocused green eyes gazed at the two of them holding hands. However, despite the emotionless mask, tears gathered at the bottom of Izuku's eyes. It was mis-matched, in a significant way.

He looked deeply sad.

"With that, do you, Bakugou Katsuki, take Mamushi Izuku to be your lawfully wedded husband?" The officiant on screen asked. He glanced between the two men like he was witnessing something pure.

"I do," the Katsuki on screen said.

The officiant turned to Izuku with a smile. "And do you, Mamushi Izuku, take Bakugou Katsuki to be your lawfully wedded husband in return?"

"Of course, I do," Izuku laughed lightheartedly. "Kacchan has always been my husband."

"Then I now pronounce you Bakugou Katsuki and Bakugou Izuku!" The officiant said happily.

Katsuki grimaced in anticipated horror and watched himself lean in to kiss Izuku. He imagined that they would share a sloppy, desperate kiss. Clumsy, drunk, and possibly cringe.

However, when their lips met, it was nothing like he'd ever witnessed.

He kissed Izuku like he was made of fragile memories and caressed his cheek like he was touching him for the first time. It was a delicate, majestic kiss. Soft in a way that Katsuki never thought he could be. Izuku's eyes fluttered shut, and he gingerly tilted his head to let Katsuki kiss him deeply. Izuku threaded his fingers carefully through his hair, letting himself be stirred through the kiss in a trusting manner. Almost like a ship allowing itself to be carried off by the current of the sea.

An unannounced thump banged on Katsuki's ribcage as he watched.

He was unsure if this was better or worse than a sloppy kiss.

He knew how to react to a raunchy kiss. Flinch, wince, and turn away. Curse under his breath and wave his hand dismissively. They could have easily brushed off this matrimony as a drunk decision if the kiss had been that. But this—this was not that.

There was something simmering beneath the surface between him and Izuku. It was excruciatingly obvious with how they handled each other, even while drunk out of their minds. Whatever it was—desire, pining, or just plain need—it was starved. It was utterly raw, ravenous and desperate to be fed. Their kiss was feeding into it, and that hunger threatened to consume them whole as he watched them inhale the other's essence like they needed it for survival.

Katsuki stared on, curious in the worst way, as he observed himself be gentler than he knew he was capable of.

He tore his eyes away from the screen to glance down at his hands in his lap. He saw the usual vivid flashes of caked up invisible blood sitting against his finger pads. He could perfectly envision all the vermillion violence he assumed his hands were made for. Then he gazed back at the screen. He didn't see all the violent years there as he held Izuku like he was precious.

At that moment, he could have been fooled.

His hands appeared like they were crafted for holding Izuku.

Then the single, lone witness to their drunk marriage clapped their hands on screen. That witness came forward and it turned out to be the owner of the Marriage Drive Thru. Yasuo was giddy, beyond happy and he was staring at them with an amused grin.

"Man, I love young love!" Yasuo announced. In the next split second, his friendly expression fell to flatness. He held out his hand and made a 'give it to me' motion. "That'll be 6,958 yen. For the marriage license fee."

Katsuki and Izuku broke from the kiss. Both of them took in new breaths—as husbands.

Katsuki studied how they affectionately stared at each other. Smiles gradually bloomed as they held each other's faces within their palms. The way Izuku was gazing upon him was familiar. It was nearly identical to the expression Izuku had given him that day in the nook so many years ago. Hopeful, naive, but most of all affectionate. Izuku appeared as though he didn't want to be anywhere else as they looked at each other as newlyweds.

Then, Katsuki watched himself fork over the yen without hesitation. He didn't even bother to look as he took the money out of his wallet and handed it to the owner. The entire time he kept his eyes trained on Izuku.

The owner of the business grinned in greedy delight. Yasuo counted the cash and pocketed it without a moment's hesitation.

"You'll find the official marriage certificate in the front!" Yasuo said. "Congratulations you two!"

"Now let's go have our honeymoon, darling—I've been thinking about nailing that ass of yours for eight years," was the last thing that could be heard as the video cut off.

Both Izuku and Katsuki sat there, speechless.

For an unknown reason, Katsuki was waiting for a post credits scene. He prayed for something to pop up on the blank screen that said 'gotcha!'. Katsuki even waited for Ashton Kutcher to stroll out and announce that this was the opener to the tenth season of 'Punk'd', in a surprise comeback for his career. However, none of that came. The screen remained black and blank as the information sank in through their pores.

Izuku was his goddamn husband by law.

He could hear Aizawa's voice in his head and feel his foot down his throat, "I told you to kill him not fucking marry him, Bakugou!"

"How soon can we get a divorce?" Katsuki asked.

He pushed down that strange fluttering feeling and didn't bother looking at Izuku next to him. He didn't even know if he could as he thought about how obscenely soft he had been with the man while drunk.

Yasuo looked at him in shock. "A divorce? So soon?"

"Yes," Katsuki hissed through gritted teeth. He frowned and the chair underneath him creaked loudly when he leaned forward. "Clearly, we were wasted beyond belief. There has to be some type of fucking law that prohibits intoxicated people from valid marriages. Nullify this shit or whatever."

"Sorry, no can do. This is a marriage drive thru, not a divorce drive thru. You're going to have to take that up with the government offices."

Katsuki's nostrils flared in irritation. He pushed down his anger as he glared at the man in front of them.

"And just how damn long would that take?"

"At least a month or so. Things get tricky with separations."

Katsuki balked. A month? He needed to be gone tomorrow and start his new fucking life. Suddenly he understood the analogy of marriage functioning like a ball and chain.

"There's no other way to get this figured out right now?" Katsuki pressed.

“I’m afraid not.” Yasuo offered them a false, sympathetic smile. “You can file a motion with the city of Nago if you would like. But you have to be patient. Divorces usually take a while, even for accidental marriages.”

“Why the fuck is it so easy to get married but hard to get divorced?” Katsuki grumbled under his breath.

Yasuo shrugged lackadaisically. He clearly didn’t give a shit about their situation. He’d probably done this a lot, scamming folks into getting hitched while drunk out of their damn minds and reaped the benefits. A man who preyed upon the vulnerable like this was scum in Katsuki’s eyes. If he had been given an order to kill him he’d do it in a heartbeat without batting an eye.

Silence washed over the room as the full situation pieced together. The man pulled the DVD out of the player attached to the TV and neatly tucked it away in a disc covering.

The clicking and turning of the multiple fans vibrated the air. Katsuki could feel the accumulation of perspiration on his skin. He wiped his brow, and his hand was unsteady. He then realized Izuku was unsettlingly quiet. His new husband hadn’t said a word since that tape played. He turned to Izuku in that moment, expecting to see a pissed off expression—or even a distressed one. But Izuku was neither.

Izuku was still staring at the blank screen, as though it was still playing. His eyes were distant, zoned out like his mind was trapped elsewhere.

“Well, here you two go,” Yasuo said as he handed them the DVD copy of their vows. There was a light push in his voice, signaling that he wanted them to leave as soon as possible. “It was so lovely meeting you two, but I have some business of mine to tend to before we open again.”

Katsuki sucked at his teeth. He hesitantly grabbed the DVD disc that was in a cheap plastic cover. It was light but heavy all at once. A walking contradiction just like he and Izuku were.

Izuku pursed his lips but didn’t look at him.

They walked out of the Marriage Drive Thru with an anomalous feeling. It was nearly strangling him as he thought about their predicament. They had actually gotten fucking married—just like when they were kids.

That vision of younger Izuku and older Izuku started blending together a bit better than they had yesterday. Seeing the Izuku on that tape smiling was dangerous. He looked as though he still cared for him deeply, or at least seemed to. Young Izuku and older Izuku melted together slightly but were still playing tug of war in Katsuki’s mind. It hurt his heart, unsuspectingly.

They began walking out of the carnival in silence, side by side. Izuku’s eyes were glued down at the cracks in the sidewalk and Katsuki was looking at the DVD in his hands.

“We have to, uh, destroy that,” Izuku said, finally speaking his first words since the DVD played. “It has our legal names on it. It could be incriminating if we don’t get rid of it.”

Katsuki nodded. He had already planned on that, but there was a heaviness in Izuku’s suggestion that sounded like he was dragging the words. He curiously thought of Izuku’s surname. Or technically, his bachelor name now: Mamushi. It was fitting when Katsuki considered how venom green his eyes and hair were.

“So, when do you have time to figure this shit out with me?” Katsuki asked, addressing the obvious elephant in the room. “Do you have some down time after completing the assignment tomorrow to get this sorted out?”

Izuku worked his jaw. He anxiously looked up at him.

“I—I’m not sure. I was supposed to report back to headquarters directly after I finished the assignment. I usually get sent on back-to-back assignments, there’s not much leeway but I can try my best.”

“And where is headquarters or home for you?”

Izuku wearily assessed him. His eyes were sharp with a defensive edge—the same one the first time Katsuki had asked this question nearly a week ago.

“Only so I can know if you’re far from me or not, Izuku,” Katsuki amended in an attempt to alleviate the defensiveness. “My company’s headquarters is in downtown Yokohama. But after this assignment, I’m moving to the countryside of Hokkaidō—and I don’t plan on coming back. If we can get this sorted before that, it would be preferred.”

Izuku’s eyes softened. He twisted his fingers in a nervous tick.

“My headquarters are in Shinjuku, Tokyo. I live there as well.”

That was much closer than Katsuki assumed it would be.

He guessed Izuku had always been close this whole time.

“Good, we won’t have to travel some crazy amount.” Katsuki nodded. “I have free time after this assignment to get everything together and fill out my retirement papers and such. You know, disclaimers, NDAs, getting threatened to never speak about the ten years of homicide. The usual. Are you free to meet after this?”

“Um. Probably not. If I’m being honest.” Izuku glanced down to their feet. “I could call in some favors, but it would ultimately be risky. But I can mail copies of whatever you might need to file for the divorce if you give me your address. I think that would be the best route versus waiting for a meet up if you’re pressed for time. I’m barely at my apartment.”

“Okay. You can mail me the items I’ll need for you. It’s best to get this settled sooner rather than later.”

The disappointment in Izuku's voice was potent.

They continued walking down the street without another word. The morning sun was growing hotter as it rose up into the sky. The sky lit up a bright blue and several fluffy white clouds passed by overhead, giving some shade with the swaying palm trees. More people were spilling out the various buildings with lighthearted chatter and coffee cups in their hands.

As they walked back to the hotel side by side, uncomfortable silence washed over them.

Why does this feel…off?

Something inside of Katsuki's core creaked with unease. Even though this marriage was clearly accidental, discussing getting a divorce was uncomfortable. Maybe it was their history. Or maybe it was the fact Katsuki still felt like they needed more time. Talking about the divorce almost felt taboo, like they were severing something that tied them with a dull knife.

As they were nearing the hotel, a familiar laugh caught Katsuki's attention.

He turned his head sharply to see Inasa and Shouto walking hand in hand, looking as though they were on a casual stroll. Neither of the undercover detectives seemed to spot him or Izuku as they walked around some back-alley corner. There was a strangeness about the way their body language was tense that made Katsuki's instincts flare.

Katsuki glanced at Izuku who seemed to be on the same page with him. Izuku looked up at him with a serious expression and jutted his chin towards the two men.

Wordlessly, Katsuki and Izuku shifted their walking to a loose follow behind Inasa and Shouto discreetly. They trailed until they found themselves weaving in and out of winding streets and in a lesser populated area. The two cops shuffled behind a building and let out sighs and pulled out their cell phones.

Izuku and Katsuki crouched behind a wall out of sight but directly within earshot.

"I got a message from the station," Shouto said quietly. Katsuki shifted his head slightly, straining to hear him. "My dad just told me the raid team will get to Ie Island around 12:00 sharp. They're going to attempt to apprehend Moore immediately. We got intel that Moore's going to be at the White Dove headquarters starting at 00:00 to begin prepping another trafficking deal for that afternoon. We'll catch him red handed. Are you ready?"

"I'm fully prepared," Inasa answered. His voice was equally as quiet. "I did more background research last night, and he's far more dangerous than I thought. His smiley demeanor is off putting compared to the grotesque things he's done in his life. It'll be nice to see him behind bars."

"I have to say though, I'm a little sad," Shouto said. There was a small sigh. "This case has been oddly relaxing with the camping and having a nice hotel room to ourselves. I'll miss it here a lot."

“We can always come back here and vacation, Sho. That won’t ever be an issue. We can basically do a second honeymoon here if you want to.”

“That’s very true.” Katsuki couldn’t see, but he could hear the smile in Shouto’s voice. “A second honeymoon sounds wonderful. Well. In the meantime, want to take a walk along the beach? We should probably go back to the hotel and rest up and prepare but let's soak up the view before we get serious.”

The two detectives shuffled towards them, and Katsuki and Izuku immediately ducked out of sight.

As Katsuki held his breath, an inkling of jealousy wrapped around him. It trickled in slowly as he digested their words. He didn’t understand why—but he was envious of them. They had all the time in the world to address their problems and come back while he and Izuku were sorely pressed for time—because of them. It was unfair.

Shouto and Inasa disappeared out of sight steadily, talking about their dog at home. When Katsuki could no longer distinguish their footsteps, he stood up straight. Izuku did too and now the silence lingering between them was even more apprehensive.

Katsuki looked down at his watch that read 11:04. They had little more than twenty-four hours to kill Moore. As he stared at the numbers, the minute ticked up and 11:05 flashed on his watch. That small action made his heart clench.

He could practically feel time sliding between his fingers.

He couldn’t catch it even if he wanted to.

When they arrived back at the hotel it was tense in a way Katsuki couldn’t name.

They had the rest of the day but somehow it felt like they had no time. The marriage was looming over their head, and they hadn’t spoken a word about it—or addressed how their inebriated selves even thought it was a good idea to get married.

They settled into the room and immediately Izuku started rummaging through his suitcase. He unlocked the bottom of his luggage to unveil a secret bottom compartment. It popped up to reveal a small briefcase. It was sleek, compact and contained an embossed logo: a ‘V’ being encircled by two snakes. Katsuki immediately recognized the symbol as the one that was on Izuku’s red folder that he had been shown.

Izuku lifted the briefcase up on the wooden table and clicked it open with some magic code. It popped open and revealed that it was lined with deadly knives, small handguns, and tiny vials of clear liquid with biohazard signs on them.

Izuku’s expression was unmistakably reluctant as he stared at the weapons.

Katsuki wandered over to his own suitcase that was directly next to Izuku's. He did the exact same thing. He lifted up his own weapon's briefcase and placed it across from Izuku's on the table. While Izuku's was matte, Katsuki's was leather with silver buckled and passed as unsuspecting. Katsuki popped it open and got to work immediately. Izuku followed suit.

Strangely, the quiet side-by-side preparation was relaxing.

Katsuki started clicking together pieces of his guns and counting the bullets meticulously. He knew how many shots he had and how many reloads as well. He was good at counting his bullets in the heat of exchanges. He never made the mistake of clicking a trigger only to be met with an empty barrel—it wasted time. If he were to run out of bullets, he had his blade.

He grabbed for the weapon in question and took a moment to examine its darkness and lethality. The black stainless-steel material was still shiny, proving to be high quality after all the throats it had slit. It nearly glittered while reflecting his mirror image—but the red eyes that looked back at him weren't the soft ones he had seen on that wedding tape. They were the hardened eyes of The Scarlet Killer.

This was familiar. This is what he was used to. He read his mother's name that was engraved in the handle and his own that was choppily carved on the other side.

While thinking about Moore, he experimentally tossed the hilt of it between his hands, testing the weight after being so long without the weapon.

Izuku stole a glance at him as he did this.

The freckled hitman blushed and rubbed his nape. Izuku was prepping his knives and guns too. But he also took the time to carefully load the various biohazardous liquids into tiny, color-coded syringes. Green. Red. Yellow. Katsuki caught sight of one vial that was labeled 'Tetrodotoxin'. Izuku loaded that one into the yellow syringe.

They continued like this. Silent, awkward and probably halfway thinking about vicious murder.

When the silence never broke, Katsuki decided to take the leap.

"Do you want to talk about what happened on that tape?" Katsuki finally asked. He sat down his blade after methodically sharpening it and looked up across the table at Izuku.

"Only that I'm sorry for getting drunk and suggesting that we get married," Izuku said quietly. He took out his knives and a sharpener and started carefully sharpening them in front of Katsuki. "I shouldn't have drunk so much, I should've cut myself off. I'm never that irresponsible on assignments usually—you probably hate me even more right now."

Katsuki let out a quick, sharp laugh. "Surprisingly, I don't think I hate you."

Izuku stopped sharpening his knife for a moment. His brows furrowed.

"You don't?"

“Naw, I don’t think I do,” Katsuki reaffirmed. He shrugged as he began to load the bullets in his favorite handgun. “Don’t get me wrong, you’re still a little shit. But I’m glad we found each other again after Tokyo. Even before I knew it was you, I don’t think I entirely hated you. I wanted to but I don’t think I ever did. You were annoying and aggravating but—I didn’t hate you. Besides, we both decided to get married. I signed that shit just as much as you did. We both fucked up, it’s a shared responsibility.”

Izuku’s expression grew gentle. “If I didn’t know better, I would say you’re getting soft on me.”

“Don’t fucking push it,” Katsuki scoffed. He narrowed his eyes with a deep frown. “I said I don’t hate you, doesn’t mean I’ve forgotten eight years of flopped assignments because you shoved your gun in my goddamn face.”

Izuku laughed lightly and resumed sharpening his blade. He eventually sat down in one of the chairs as he began prepping his weapons.

Katsuki decided at that moment, he wanted to be close to Izuku.

He took the chair that was stationed on the other side of the table and moved it directly next to Izuku. Green eyes looked at him curiously, but Katsuki acted like it was casual as he shuffled all his gear over. They faced each other, feet knocking slightly as they loaded and sharpened each and every one of their weapons.

Eventually, Katsuki took out his company laptop and he worked on hacking through systems to get blueprints of the headquarters on Ie Island. He poured himself a small glass of whiskey to give himself a little relaxation. Several hours passed until he was able to achieve the layout of the building, but when he did, he could see Izuku was impressed.

They made their strategy plan to hit the headquarters around 02:00 and slaughter Moore and Koizumi. They were still sticking to their plan to stage a scene that looked like a trafficking deal gone bad with a murder-suicide. The entire time while they planned, Katsuki could see Izuku stealing quick little glances at him. They were shy, observant but also it felt like Izuku was trying his best to memorize him before they parted ways.

Katsuki did the same—but a lot less shy about it.

He let his eyes linger on Izuku’s face, soaking up the multitude of freckles that decorated his skin. He knew this would be his last time seeing this doll face. While he rejoiced about that fact six days ago—he wasn’t so sure he was happy about it now.

When he started counting the shades of Izuku’s freckles a third time, Izuku finally caught his eyes with his.

Big, gorgeous green eyes were looking upon him with pure intent. Izuku offered a small, genuine smile.

“I’m happy I got to spend this week with you, Katsuki,” Izuku confessed quietly. He finished sharpening his last knife and placed it neatly in line with the others on the table. “It was nice getting to know you. As both Katsuki and Kacchan."

Katsuki couldn't stop the smile that found its way on his face.

"I'm glad I could spend this week with you as well." Katsuki cocked his last gun and set it aside on the table. He leaned in slightly, locking their feet a tad bit more. "Weird how that all worked out, huh? Can't believe I'm a little disappointed this is our last night together."

"Actually—" Izuku nervously fiddled with his fingers while looking him up and down. "Before things get serious, do you want to relax a bit with a game? We have a couple more hours."

"Sure, I like games." Katsuki shrugged. He set the alarm on his phone for 01:00.

He tilted his head at Izuku when he could see green eyes flicker to different places on his figure: his eyes, his arms, his jawline then finally they settled on his mouth. There was a clear, underlying desire stirring in Izuku and a smirk slowly twitched on Katsuki's face. That marriage issue wasn't going to be resolved right now. Plus, they only had one more night left. Why not make the most of it?

"What game were you thinking of?" Katsuki asked in a deliberate low voice.

Izuku's throat bobbed like he was thirsty. Izuku then fluidly stood up from his seat and walked over to his bag. He reached into a small compartment before pulling out a deck of cards. He held it up for Katsuki to see as he sauntered back over to the table.

"Poker. Do you know how to play?" Izuku asked as he sat back down in the chair. He gently sat the deck of cards on the table next to their weapons.

Based on how Izuku was looking at him, Katsuki didn't think that's what he was going to ask.

With a curious stare, Katsuki leaned backwards and raised a neatly plucked eyebrow.

"Of course," Katsuki answered and folded his arms. "But I don't have any money to wager you. You're not going to drain me of my cash right before we have to part ways."

Deep green eyes locked on him with a mild challenge. The eye contact conjured up a spike of heat in the atmosphere. Izuku silently tilted his head and raked his gaze up and down Katsuki's figure. There was a pause as though Izuku was contemplating something serious as he bit his lip.

"The wager could be different pieces of our outfits," Izuku said finally.

At that, Katsuki grinned fiendishly.

He was a little taken back by the sudden boldness, but he fucking drank it in. It was undeniably delicious that hopeless romantic Izuku was clearly lusting after him as much as he was lusting for him too.

Katsuki bit his lip, leaned in and rested his elbows on his knees. His smirk turned feral when he saw Izuku's eyes dilate fully, and his thighs squeeze together. There was a small hitch in Izuku's shallow breath as he assessed Katsuki with a lust-stricken gaze.

"So, you want to play strip poker?" Katsuki clarified.

Izuku nervously nodded but didn't back down.

Katsuki deeply chuckled and rested his chin on top of his fist. He gave a cocksure grin as he ran his gaze from Izuku's lips all the way down to his thighs. He let his eyes sit directly on the slowly forming bulge in Izuku's shorts.

"There are easier ways to get me naked," Katsuki suggested. He snapped his eyes back up to Izuku's. "Isn't that what you want, to get me out of my clothes?"

"Yes." Izuku swallowed thickly like he was forcing down the last bit of his shyness. He sat back down, digging his intense stare directly into Katsuki's. "Don't you want me out of mine too?"

Katsuki chuckled. "More than you know."

"Then let's play."

Katsuki watched with growing interest as Izuku's eyes darkened.

Izuku leaned back and took the cards out the deck. Katsuki kept his smirk pointed as he leaned back too. He carefully picked up his whiskey, swirled it and started to steadily sip on it as Izuku began dealing out their hands.

Katsuki soaked in Izuku's body language at that moment. The other man was bouncing his leg slightly—out of nerves or excitement Katsuki wasn't quite sure. Maybe it was both. Izuku's eyes were dilated to green rimmed eclipses and his pink blush made him look beautifully flushed.

There were quicker ways to do this—he knew that. He could stand up and throw Izuku on that dumb heart shaped bed and simply undress him. But he'd play along with Izuku's game if it's what the other man wanted. Maybe he was still shy and if this helped ease him into it, then Katsuki would play whatever game he wanted. Katsuki swallowed another burning gulp of drink and picked up his hand.

"What's your ante?" Izuku asked softly. "We can pick which clothes go for the other."

"In that case, I choose that pretty little scarf around your neck," Katsuki said coquettishly. He grinned wickedly while pointing to the satin cloth. "I haven't been able to see my handy work all day. And yours?"

"Your shirt," Izuku said timidly. He laid out the cards on the table for their game.

"Going straight for the big thing huh?"

“Of course.”

He enjoyed the way Izuku smiled at him.

They started the game, playing prudently and Katsuki was examining his hand thoughtfully. He glanced down at the set in front of him and realized he easily could win this round. But he was more interested in seeing Izuku’s eyes on him. He purposefully threw the round and Izuku perked up with more interest. Katsuki stood up, looming over Izuku.

With a seductive grin Katsuki started undoing his black shirt. With every snap of each button, he knew he had every last ounce of Izuku’s attention. Green eyes fluidly trailed down until Katsuki undid the last one. He shrugged off the piece of clothing with a roll of his shoulders and it fell fluidly to the floor.

Izuku gripped the cards in his hand harder.

Katsuki played ignorant to the way Izuku was assessing him and massaged his fingers into his chest like he was working out a small muscle kink. He rolled his neck and flexed his arms casually before sitting back down in the chair. He rested his head against his fist and spread his legs wide. He could see Izuku get an eye full of the large bulge in his pants.

“Like what you see, darling?” Katsuki asked in a playful tone.

He adjusted himself in his pants purposefully and Izuku’s blush deepened.

“That’s a stupid question,” Izuku murmured. “You know I do. You just want your ego stroked.”

Katsuki’s grin widened, and he gripped his cock. “I want way more than my damn ego stroked.”

Izuku flipped over the next card with a deep lustful gaze.

The next round Katsuki won. Izuku rid himself of the scarf to give a full view of the mark on his pretty freckled neck. The small hint of fever in Katsuki sparked larger at the sight. His eyes dropped down to the sliver of chest that was showing on Izuku, and his mouth watered thinking about the other marks on Izuku’s skin.

The following rounds Katsuki purposefully lost. He liked watching Izuku squirm and wiggle with every piece of skin he showed. Even his goddamn ankles got a reaction out of Izuku—it was amazing. Slowly, Katsuki found himself losing his belt, his socks, then finally his pants.

When it came time to strip himself of his long baggy shorts, he stood up and unzipped directly in Izuku’s face. He did it slowly, enjoying the way Izuku was beginning to blush at the outline of his length with one less layer of clothing. He stepped out of the pants slowly and revealed the two black harnesses strapped to his upper thighs holding his guns.

“I didn’t realize you had strapped yourself today,” Izuku muttered. His eyes were distracted, flickering between Katsuki’s crotch and the weapons sitting comfortably on Katsuki’s muscular thighs.

“I’m always prepared, I told you that,” Katsuki answered easily. He tilted his head when Izuku licked his lips hungrily. Carefully, he reached out a hand and gently grabbed Izuku by the chin. He angled Izuku’s head up to get a visual of the blushing man. “You look like you like the sight.”

“I do,” Izuku whispered softly, sounding nearly hypnotized. “Steel looks good against your skin. It’s a nice contrast.”

At that comment, Katsuki was a bit surprised.

He took that singular thought and pocketed it away, noting to himself that Izuku liked the look of dark, steel against flesh. Katsuki sat back down, spreading his legs all the way. When the next round came he had the hand to beat out Izuku—but he purposefully lost again. He undid the straps around his thighs with a devilish grin and let the heavy metal drop to the ground hard enough to shake the surface.

Now he only had his underwear left.

“Are you throwing the game on purpose?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki gave a sharp chuckle and bit his lip.

“Is it that damn obvious?” He asked with a sly look. He glanced down to his nearly nude body that was covered in old scars. “I guess we have one more round until I lose completely. Unless your next ante is my earrings or my chain.”

Katsuki leaned against the table and his eyes darkened with heat as he stared at Izuku, giving the challenge. He hooked his thumb under his silver chain and pulled at it lightly to emphasize his point.

It was hard to contain his pure fucking excitement of the situation. Izuku was so goddamn timid, and he could tell he was going to have fun taking him apart.

Izuku stared back at him from over his hand of cards. His pretty blush was visible as he tried to hide his nerves. His leg was bouncing quicker as his eyes darted between Katsuki’s earrings and his underwear.

“Your boxers,” Izuku said confidently. “Your ante?”

Katsuki grinned like a wolf. “Your shorts.”

Izuku was barely looking at his eyes when he talked. He was drinking up Katsuki’s figure as he dealt out the next hand of cards. Katsuki could see how Izuku thought he was going to win the next round. But as Katsuki looked at Izuku’s shorts, he decided to flip the game around.

He showed his hand fully when it came time and Izuku’s face fell.

Katsuki had a royal flush.

The air shifted in that moment as Katsuki laid down his cards on the table. He stood up again and this time made a deliberate step towards Izuku. The other man didn't say anything, simply put his cards down as well. Katsuki could see Izuku's breathing shift, more shallow and sharper intakes.

Before Izuku could reach for his belt, Katsuki gracefully sank to his knees in front of Izuku. He reached forward, brushing his fingers with Izuku's warm ones. They fumbled a bit, silent exchange lingering.

Izuku slowly slid his hands away and parted his legs for Katsuki to move forward between them. Without breaking the heated eye contact, Katsuki delicately unbuckled Izuku's belt. He could feel Izuku shift in the seat as the belt was discarded to the ground. Then he looked down to the single two buttons sitting on Izuku's pants.

He popped each one slowly, giving Izuku time to back down. But he never did.

When he undid Izuku's shorts fully, Katsuki cursed under his breath in a groan.

"These are fucking beautiful," Katsuki whispered, mesmerized.

With his index finger, he lightly traced the top of the black lace that was exposed. It was soft to the touch, and it looked gorgeous against Izuku's skin. He snapped his eyes up to Izuku, who was biting his lip and staring down at where Katsuki was touching him. Katsuki took both of his hands and curled them under the hem of Izuku's shorts, ready to pull down if given the word.

But Izuku didn't say anything, just stared at him like he was in a vivid daydream.

"What are you thinking of?" Katsuki asked carefully. "I need you to say something, Izuku."

Silence, for a moment.

"I'm going to miss you more than I should," Izuku eventually confessed. He spoke in a hush whisper, as though scared to admit it out loud. "I'm going to miss you a lot, Katsuki."

Beautiful green eyes poured out unfiltered, heavy emotions. Izuku lifted a hand to caress Katsuki's cheek and there was a tenderness that took Katsuki off guard. It was soft to the point he nearly flinched at the implications.

Katsuki's heart fluttered against his will, and a bittersweet sensation overcame him. It tugged him down from being too in his own head, grounding him in the reality of the situation. It finally set in that this truly might be the last hours he had with Izuku. Katsuki gingerly placed a hand over Izuku's and curled his fingers around the smaller ones.

"Then let's make the most of these last few hours," Katsuki proposed. "Do you want this?"

"I do. I want to feel you so badly it hurts."

"Okay. Let's pretend for one more night."

Izuku nodded, solidifying the unspoken resolve lingering between them: they didn't have forever, but they had this one night.

Izuku lifted his hips when Katsuki tugged down his shorts in one swift motion, exposing the black lace underwear and tight holsters holding knives on Izuku's thighs. Emotions from an untraceable source ignited within Katsuki, burning him from his core. They all came tumbling down, crushing him underneath their invisible weight. Want, desperation, and even need came barging forward to fill his veins.

Izuku's hands threaded through soft, blond hair and he leaned down to kiss Katsuki with force.

The kiss stole Katsuki's breath and gave him it all at once.

It felt like someone had pushed life into his lungs for the first time. He thought he had known what it was like to kiss someone, but this was entirely a feeling he never experienced before. A tantalizing sparkle rippled through him, causing him to deepen the kiss with a fiery need he had never experienced. As they began to work their lips against each other, purely sweet intentions laced with desperate lust.

Katsuki kissed Izuku back fiercely, relishing in how soft the other man's lips were as he took control over the kiss. They pushed and pulled for a moment before Izuku conceded and Katsuki gripped the base of the thick, curly locks right above Izuku's nape and started guiding his motions. He stood slowly, not breaking the kiss as he loomed over Izuku and dragged his tongue along the soft bottom lip.

They broke apart for sweet air and it slammed into his lungs.

He felt different, nearly new.

Izuku was grasping onto his arms now, eyes looking up at him with an amount of adoration Katsuki didn't know was possible. They slipped into another kiss and this time he guided Izuku up and walked him over to the bed. They shuffled together, feet stumbling, and smiles intertwined with their sealed lips. The back of Izuku's knees knocked the edge of the bed, and he fell down with a gentle bounce.

Katsuki grinned as Izuku shuffled on the mattress, positioning himself in the center of the heart. He on the other hand walked over to his suitcase and pulled out the condom and lube he had tucked away. Izuku tilted his head, curious. Katsuki returned and he held up the two items for Izuku to see fully.

Izuku's blush was the cutest fucking thing Katsuki ever saw.

Katsuki climbed into the bed, a little too eagerly as he shifted towards Izuku. He couldn't help but stare for a moment. The other hitman looked stunning like this. Izuku's viridian eyes and curly hair against the deep crimson sheets evoked a heated sensation at the bottom of his stomach. With gentleness he didn't realize he had, Katsuki placed his hand on Izuku's chest, pushing him down against the flat surface of the bed.

Rhythmic pounding against his palm could be felt. His hand rested right above Izuku's heart.

Izuku curls sprayed across the pillows and his hands gripped the sheets. He spread his legs, welcoming Katsuki to come between them. They slotted together as Katsuki slowly undid the buttons on Izuku's shirt. He failed at holding back a curse when Izuku's chest was fully in view.

Hickies and freckles were littered everywhere but more eye-catching was the harness belt latched onto Izuku's torso. The leather was hugging him tightly, crisscrossed straps decorated in metal studs and sharp knives. Katsuki's eyes trailed the length of Izuku's body, loving how the harness belt matched the ones on Izuku's thighs and his lace panties.

Izuku made a move to unfasten the buckle on the torso harness but quickly Katsuki caught his wrist and stopped him.

"We'll keep these tonight," Katsuki said. He grinned wide and licked his lips slightly. "I like the look of your thighs decorated in knives. It's fucking incredible. I can't wait to watch them fucking quake with them on."

Izuku lightly shuddered. Katsuki moved to slide Izuku's shirt off his body completely, exposing him fully nude in nothing but the leather straps and black lace underwear. Now he had a full view of the panties that were holding Izuku's straining erection rather poorly. There was a small wet spot where the tip of Izuku's cock was, trying to break free.

Katsuki generously began to palm Izuku's erection, eliciting out the prettiest keen. He moved down fluidly, latching onto the small bruise that was painted across Izuku's perky nipple. He gave a gracious open mouthed kiss to the sensitive bud, swirling his tongue around it. He closed his eyes as he listened to Izuku sigh and moan when his tongue started swirling, licking, and flicking at the flesh. Izuku's body jolted with every action, sending warm flashes of pleasure all over his nerves.

"A-Ah, Katsuki," Izuku whispered, shakily.

"Feeling good?" Katsuki asked in a murmur against Izuku's warm skin. He pinched the other nub in his fingers, rolling it to make Izuku shake a bit.

"I-I am—I like it a lot." Izuku nodded shyly and arched himself into Katsuki's mouth. "Please, keep going. Can you play with them more?"

"How can I refuse when you ask so sweetly?"

Katsuki smirked and gave another long suck at the sensitive bud, relishing in the way Izuku quivered.

Izuku's shaky hands threaded through his hair once more when Katsuki switched to the neglected bud. He bit it lightly, drowning in the deep groan Izuku let spill into the air. The man underneath him bucked up until his hand, chasing the friction. Katsuki removed his hand and pressed his erection directly on Izuku's, grinding into him sensually while giving a gracious suck onto Izuku's flesh.

Izuku moaned so loudly and lewdly that Katsuki was sure someone heard it. He started grinding down on Izuku as he sucked, nipped and swirled his tongue across Izuku's chest. He traced his thumb across Izuku's bottom lip as he did this, taking in every second.

He pulled back, pulling Izuku's nipple a bit with him with his teeth. Izuku groaned and spasmed under him, wrapping his legs around Katsuki's waist. Katsuki let go of the sensitive skin and slowly began to trail kisses from Izuku's chest all the way up to his neck. He followed in his former self's footsteps, kissing directly on the hickies, darkening the spots a bit possessively when he thought about how this might be the last time he'd ever taste the freckled skin.

He gave a light kiss to the '217' tattoo on Izuku's skin.

They had sunk into another soul drowning kiss as Katsuki rolled his hips against Izuku's. He wrapped his arms around Izuku and cradled the back of his head as he traced his tongue into Izuku's mouth. They pulled apart and Katsuki slowed down a second. He looked at Izuku who was gazing at him softly.

His heart skipped a bit at the vulnerable expression Izuku was laying bare in front of him.

Katsuki wasn't quite sure he ever had this with another person he took to bed.

"What are you thinking about?" Izuku whispered.

"A lot," Katsuki honestly admitted. "I'm deciding how I want you—soft and deep or rough and hard. I can't decide."

"Do both," Izuku breathlessly whispered. His large doe eyes sweetly gazed up at Katsuki. "I want you to take me like you've been waiting for me your whole life—because we have. You're my Kacchan, my sweet Kacchan who I only dreamed about for years." There was a pause, and then Izuku's face twisted into a much less sweet expression, nearly dark. "But you're also my Katsuki." Izuku harshly said his name with a fierce bite.

Beautiful green eyes darkened even further as Izuku leaned in. He wrapped his hand around Katsuki's throat and pulled him down until their lips nearly touched as he continued to speak.

"You're my brute of a Katsuki who can hold a knife against my throat and a gun against my goddamn skull," Izuku hissed. Nails sank into Katsuki's throat, tacking tiny crescent moons. "So, fuck me like I'm your Izuku and your darling."

A thread inside of Katsuki snapped. The two versions of Izuku pieced together like a jigsaw falling in place. He gave a sharp laugh as it all blended into one because Izuku was fucking right. Izuku was his pain in the ass, but he was his savior and that was both a curse and a blessing he had to accept. Because at the end of the day, Izuku was his as much he was Izuku's.

Katsuki grinned ferally.

He lifted a hand to grip Izuku's jaw tenderly and tilted his head.

“You’re damn right,” Katsuki agreed in a low tone. His hand then squeezed until he heard Izuku hiss a bit in pain. “You are my darling, aren’t you? The little devil that I’ve been fighting with for years. I should fuck you like you deserve and more.”

With that, Katsuki threw all his overthinking to the wind.

They locked in another all-consuming kiss that was sharper, harsher and hungrier. Katsuki’s grip on Izuku’s jaw turned bruising as he kissed him deeper than before, biting and searching for the sparkle that had ignited. They broke apart with Katsuki biting the plump lip in between his teeth with a dark look.

Without missing a beat, Katsuki reached for the lube on the side of them.

“Get on your stomach, darling,” Katsuki said.

“My stomach?” Izuku looked confused.

“Yes, your stomach,” Katsuki said with a smirk. “I didn’t wait eight years to not eat your ass.”

At that, Izuku flushed but still obeyed. He rolled onto his belly and coyly spread his legs and slightly arched himself in anticipation.

“Hah.” Katsuki laughed a bit. “What a good obedient boy.”

Katsuki drank in the sight of the leather harness spreading across Izuku’s back in a lovely double diamond shape. His fingers curled around one of the harness straps and none too gently yanked Izuku into arching his back more. He leaned down against Izuku’s ear as he forced the man’s legs apart.

“What the hell did I tell you about making sure you’re arched well?” Katsuki reminded him in a low tone.

Izuku nodded and grasped for purchase, hugging one of the silk pillows in his arms as Katsuki began to shift down. He positioned himself behind Izuku, and he could feel his mouth water at the sight of the plump ass he’s waited fucking years for.

He took his calloused hands and began to massage Izuku’s ass, enjoying the softness mixed with muscle as Izuku buried his face into the pillow. Red ran down from the tip of Izuku’s ears to his shoulders as Katsuki spread apart Izuku’s cheeks, sliding the thin strap of the panties to the side with the motion.

He decided to not have mercy.

He went straight in, running his tongue against Izuku’s entrance, and Izuku jumped slightly at the sensation, but Katsuki snapped his hips down instantly as he probed his tongue against the fluttering hole. Izuku groaned as Katsuki licked, and lapped at his sensitive area, tenderly working it open.

Plush legs started to shake a bit and Katsuki made a hungry groan at the feeling of the tremors against him. He picked up, giving sweet kisses as he dug his fingers into Izuku's flesh more. When his tongue started to push in further, Katsuki realized just how damn sensitive Izuku was. He was whining like this was his first time being eaten out, and the shaking picked up to a steady rhythm.

Within the next minute, Izuku began twitching away from him like it was too much as he moaned loudly. But Katsuki wasn't having that. He tightened his grip on Izuku and yanked him back onto his tongue, making sure to push deeper and eat him out with each fuck into his hole.

"Fuck!" Izuku nearly screamed.

His breathing hitched into a delightful octave as Katsuki pushed his tongue in further, swirling and sucking. The vulgar sound of wetness echoed into the room as Katsuki's breathing picked up and Izuku's small tremble turned into an outright quake. Izuku was cursing and gripping the pillow so tightly Katsuki could've sworn he was going to tear it in two.

Then Katsuki heard something that shattered all his control.

"Ka—Kacchan," Izuku slurred into the pillow. It was faint, barely audible and it sounded like a cross between a plea and a moan. Then it happened again as Izuku fucked back on his tongue. "Kacchan, please."

Katsuki gave a long, flat tongue lick at Izuku's sensitive hole and heard that muffled cry of his nickname. His dick pulsed in his boxers harder than he thought it would.

He grabbed the lube and spread a generous amount on his fingers, massaging it until it was slightly warmer. He pressed his three fingers against Izuku's fluttering entrance and he could feel Izuku stiffen slightly.

Katsuki curiously considered the tenses in Izuku's muscles. He was nervous. It was radiating off of him in waves. Katsuki wordlessly switched three fingers to one. He decided to keep his tongue licking at Izuku's hole as he slowly slid in his finger. He eased some of Izuku's tenseness with his tongue, messaging the fluttering entrance gently with his wet appendage as he pushed in, knuckle deep. He groaned in his throat at how fucking tight Izuku was. His one finger was being perfectly hugged.

Izuku's tenseness eased a bit, but it didn't stop the flow of soft moans. Katsuki pumped his singular finger in and out, easing in more with each thrust as Izuku whimpered and shuttered. He probed a second finger at the tight entrance and Izuku automatically stiffened again. This time, Katsuki reached under and gripped Izuku's cock and began to pump it, twisting his wrist at the tip.

A throaty, ecstasy filled groan filled the room.

Katsuki slipped in the second finger at the same time he squeezed the tip of Izuku's cock. He smeared the dripple of precum that leaked out with his thumb as he looked for the one particular spot. He fucked his fingers in and out until he curled them and Izuku jerked immediately with cry.

Katsuki could practically taste the rapture that spilled all throughout Izuku on his tongue. Izuku looked over his shoulder at Katsuki, blushing furiously, and his eyes were bleary. Katsuki curled his fingers again and was given the same reaction, but Izuku pushed back against him this time. With a steady rhythm, Katsuki began to abuse and pulse against that spot, forcing out a cacophony of groans, hisses, and moans from that pretty mouth.

“Have you ever had your prostate milked before, darling?” Katsuki asked, enthralled by the handsome look of bliss on Izuku’s face.

“N-No—ah!” Izuku attempted to answer as Katsuki pressed firmly against the sweet spot. He dropped his head and groaned loudly. His thighs shook and his knees tried to close but Katsuki kept them apart with a firm grip as he pressed and caressed Izuku’s spot.

“How does it feel?”

“It feels intimate?” Izuku said, unsure.

Katsuki snorted. “I mean does it feel good or bad. I sure as hell would hope it feels intimate when I’m two knuckles deep in you.”

“It feels good,” Izuku said again, moaning.

Katsuki grinned and picked up the pace, ramming his fingers at the right angle, curling and pulling more moans out of Izuku’s pretty, pink mouth. The echoes of ecstasy grew louder with every twist and pulse until Katsuki felt a delicious tremor. It was harsher than the rest and he decided he wanted to feel that again. He kept going, merciless and fever filled with every thrust. Izuku gasped in shock and tried to scramble for his wrist.

“Ka-Kacchan, w-wait, you’re going to make me cum—”

“—That’s the goal,” Katsuki quipped in a low, raspy voice. He didn’t stop his moments when Izuku’s hand tried to hold his wrist. “I need you pliant if you’re going to take me in.”

Within no time, a third then fourth finger was added and Izuku began shuddering and trembling harsher than before. Katsuki fucked them in and out with more purpose now, jolting Izuku frantically. With every beat, Izuku’s eyes fluttered closed until he went cross eyed. There was a splintering crack in Izuku’s voice and quakes harsher than before rolled all over Izuku’s beautiful body. The pulsing cock in Katsuki’s hand twitched as he twisted and squeezed the sensitive tip at the same time he pushed against Izuku’s prostate.

It was possibly the most majestic moment Katsuki had ever seen.

Izuku twisted his eyes shut, arched all the way against the four fingers inside of him and screamed out “Kacchan” in a gorgeous, high voice. He came into Katsuki’s hand harshly, jerking his whole body as spurts of cum poured out.

Izuku released a strangled groan as Katsuki hit his prostate several more times for good measure and then retracted his fingers. Katsuki moved both his hands away, looking at the slick lube that was drenching one and the hot cum that was pooled in the other. Izuku looked over his shoulder at him and Katsuki licked the cum off his palm while digging his heated gaze into Izuku. He lapped up every last drop, cleaning his hand thoroughly and swallowed all of Izuku's seed.

Izuku's eyes darkened with interest as he turned on his side to look at him better.

Katsuki slid off his boxers, kicking them off to some corner of the room as his cock dropped with weight on the bed. He tore the condom open with his teeth vigorously and slowly started to sleeve it over him. Izuku was biting his lip and looked at him wearily.

"Got something on your mind?" Katsuki asked when Izuku's stares became intense.

"You're big," Izuku said bluntly. "I, uh, thought you were but—" He licked his lips. "—You're bigger than I thought."

"Nine and a half, darling, and thick as a coke can," Katsuki said smugly. He lathered up the lube on his length, stroking it slowly and deliberately. "I'll make sure you feel every inch too. Don't worry."

He placed his hands on Izuku's back and held him down on his belly as he began to line himself up. Izuku tensed immediately at the feeling of the wet tip against his already spent hole. Katsuki could feel his muscles tighten under his palms. Slowly, Katsuki moved one hand to hold Izuku's.

Instantly, Izuku gripped back. He held his hand as he arched backwards, egging Katsuki on.

Katsuki moved slowly, working Izuku open with care.

He pressed in and the warm entrance felt like it sucked him in as well. Izuku buried his face in the pillow as Katsuki stretched him out slowly. The hot length eased with care into his tight body. Izuku was tight. Really tight, if Katsuki was being honest with himself—he was unsure if he had ever had someone hug him like this. The friction was unmatched and addictive as he sank inside, inch by inch.

Katsuki leaned his head down to Izuku's nape and planted soft kisses as he started to thrust with more purpose. Izuku had his hand gripped so tightly that Katsuki could see his knuckles turn white. When his cock was deep enough to reach Izuku's sweet point, Katsuki angled it just right and thrusted against it.

Instantly, Izuku moaned into the pillow. Katsuki thrusted again but was met with another muffled moan. He 'tsk'd slightly and reached a hand up to grip the base of Izuku's curls. He yanked Izuku's head backwards out of the pillow.

"Don't hide your fucking moans," Katsuki hissed. He reeled back and thrusted in again with more vigor and Izuku sharply choked on his desperate moan. "I want to hear every single pretty sound you make. I can tell you're holding back on them."

“Then make me make them,” Izuku said challengingly. “Make me scream.”

“Oh?” Katsuki asked, falsely coy.

He tilted his head in interest as he gripped the base of Izuku’s hair tighter. He none-too-kindly pulled Izuku up by his roots, ignoring the small protest. He forcefully craned Izuku’s neck backwards and bit the outer shell of his ear.

“Is that the game you want to play with me?” Katsuki warned. He traced his other hand along Izuku’s neck, feeling his adams’ apple bob with anticipation.

“And if it is?” Izuku questioned. “What are you going to do about it, Katsuki?”

Katsuki made his hand a necklace around Izuku’s throat and squeezed.

“I guess I have no other choice than to make you scream.”

In one foul swoop, Katsuki jerked both him and Izuku upright on their knees. Izuku gasped in surprise at the harsh handling on his throat as his back slammed against Katsuki’s chest and the cock inside of him buried to the hilt.

Katsuki fluidly changed his hand from choking Izuku to wrapping his whole arm around Izuku’s neck in a sleeper hold. He expertly squeezed, just enough pressure to be sadistically pleasureful and not enough to make the sweet man lose consciousness. Izuku reached up to grab onto his bicep and pushed back against him when Katsuki started a merciless, sharp rhythm.

Izuku cried out through the hold as he sank his fingers into Katsuki’s flesh. His was body helplessly fucked into as he was held in place. Soft green curls bounced, choked screams crackled in the air, trembling thighs quaked. Katsuki fucking loved the way Izuku’s eyes went crossed as he drove into him over and over again. Izuku felt fucking delicious. The tight hole was sucking him in, soft and wet. The slippery lube spilled down Izuku’s thighs as it wet Katsuki’s cock in delicious friction.

Katsuki groaned and gripped Izuku’s hair harder. He gave steady blows of deep, sensational thrusts, purposefully laying on unforgivingly to Izuku’s prostate until the other man quaked and arched with uncontrollable ecstasy.

“I could snap your neck like this,” Katsuki whispered cruelly. He tightened his hold around Izuku’s throat and gripped his hair to pull his head back. Izuku tried to groan but only gasped in sharp intakes. His face was red, colored in blissful ecstasy. Katsuki’s smirk spread as he pressed his lips against Izuku’s ear and murmured, “You’re so vulnerable right now—I’m surprised you trust me after all these years. But you’d probably let your Kacchan do anything to you, wouldn’t you?”

Izuku nodded and made a weak attempt to meet Katsuki’s thrusts.

“Fucking pathetic,” Katsuki spat. “You’re enjoying this aren’t you? Do you like getting choked out like a little fucking masochist?”

Izuku couldn't answer as Katsuki picked up the pace. He choked, dug his nails in further to Katsuki's biceps and quaked harshly as he attempted to keep up with the pounding rhythm. His body trembled against Katsuki, pushing back on the thick cock railing into him. White spots danced across his vision.

With a sharp, choked outcry Izuku came again. Ribbons of cum decorated the red sheets down below.

"Oh, you're really fucking enjoy it." Katsuki chuckled darkly. "I wish you could see your face, darling. You look so goddamn sweet, gasping for air and nearly in tears like a goddamn crybaby. Such a little cry baby for my cock." He fucked into Izuku harsher as his own orgasm built. "You're a goddamn dream, you have no idea. Look at how well your fucking taking it. Fuck. Take it, darling—take it all." He rolled his hips deeply, grounding inside of Izuku and eased up on the choke hold slightly.

Izuku sharply gasped for air as he tried to keep up with the pace of the cock splitting him open.

"M-More—give me more, please," Izuku begged, voice starved. "K-Kacchan, please. I need it—I need you so much."

"You're going to be the goddamn death of me," Katsuki harshly hissed. Beads of sweat rolled down his face.

He released Izuku, harshly pushing the man face down on the bed with deliberate, dominating force. He enjoyed the useless way Izuku's shaking legs couldn't hold him up and his arms were no better. Izuku could barely remain on all fours, and he eventually slumped forward with a groggily whine. Katsuki grabbed a hold of both straps on Izuku's harness and hoisted him up, holding him with his strength. Then he sharply yanked Izuku backwards on his cock, angling himself just right.

A sharp gasp of surprise echoed out from Izuku as he was pulled back on the large cock again. The warm tip hit directly against his sweet spot and made him cry out. Katsuki did it again and again, leveraging the harness to a full advantage, until he picked up a steady rhythm of fucking Izuku back on his pulsing length while holding up his weight.

"Is this what you wanted? Hah?" Katsuki demanded as he snapped his hips into Izuku's body. "I'm going to fucking wreck you at this rate. You'll barely be able to think soon."

He watched the way his cock drove in without a lick of mercy into the plush backside. The force he was using bounced Izuku's cheeks with every thrust, punching out captivating high-pitched moans from Izuku's whimpering mouth. The vulgar sounds of their skin slapping and the wetness of the lube squinching met his ears as he picked up the pace.

"—Kacchan, Kacchan*, Kacchan*," Izuku babbled with a hoarse voice.

His head bounced with the fervent motions; eyes shut as all the ecstasy rode throughout his body. He grabbed onto his own harness with his hands as he allowed himself to be roughly maneuvered, fucked back on the cock splitting him open. He attempted to form several more incoherent words that contained syllables of Katsuki's name. Then Izuku whined wantonly and clenched, and his cock began to pulse.

Katsuki's nostrils flared as he gripped the leather straps harder.

He hoisted Izuku back with all his strength, reaching deep and going steadfast. Katsuki's groans started to grow steadily uneven as the current of rapture in his body began to coil tightly in his stomach. His toes curled as Izuku tightened around him, signaling that there was somehow a third orgasm on the way.

"F-Fuck," Katsuki harshly grunted. "You're going to milk me, darling."

Izuku hiccupped, and tears gathered on the edge of his eyes. He tightened further on the thick shaft as he was vigorously snapped back on it over and over.

Katsuki groaned deeply and gave several deep, needy thrusts into Izuku. Deliberately hitting the angle to make Izuku scream as his orgasm came rushing forward. It was pure ecstasy, and it lit all his nerves on fire. His vision went white, and his grip on the harness grew tighter as he came harder than he ever had in his life. Katsuki cursed loudly and snapped Izuku upright all the way as he buried himself to the hilt. Izuku's beautiful back arched with the tension in the hold as he buried himself all the way inside.

Katsuki groaned in his throat as his warm cum spilled into the condom and the delicious tight walls made sure to squeeze it all out of him.

Izuku gasped in sharply as he came a third time, untouched and dry. He sobbed instantly, voice raspy and fucked out. Katsuki could see from over Izuku's shoulder as Izuku cock spasm and a tiny bit of cum oozed out. In contrast, Izuku's whole body violently shook with unfathomable pleasure as his eyes screwed shut. His body clamped around the cock inside of him. His mouth hung open, letting a litany of whines loose and his brows were pinched together.

Katsuki wrapped his arms around Izuku, pulling him against his chest as the weeping man rode out the dry orgasm. Loud sobs wrecked through Izuku's throat as he leaned his head back on Katsuki for support.

"I got you, darling," Katsuki whispered. He tightened his grasp as Izuku gave one more full body tremor. "There you go, feel it all the way through you. You're doing so fucking good."

Katsuki kept going, offering up sweet nothings in Izuku's ear as the smaller man became doused in overstimulation. With gentle care, Katsuki lowered them on the mattress, and he slid out of Izuku with a wet pop. Izuku whined at the loss and Katsuki was slightly surprised to feel Izuku push back on him, but he wrote it off as instinct from being fucked out.

He carefully cradled Izuku in a spooning position until he finally came off his last wave.

Izuku's gasping slowly shifted to panting then finally labored, heavy breathing. They laid there, quiet. Katsuki planted a delicate kiss against Izuku's temple as he calmed down.

A gentle draft blew in from the open window, cooling them down. A small hand reached up and touched Katsuki's arm after a while. He loosened his hold a bit, letting Izuku shift around in his arms. There was a tiny spark of pride that flickered in Katsuki when he heard Izuku groan and winced. Pain was radiating up his backside, no doubt. There would be a limp there and Katsuki was a bit prouder than he should've been at that moment.

Izuku turned to him fully, blissful green eyes stared at him and Katsuki stared back.

"Katsu—" Izuku started and stopped. He touched his throat when his voice caught on the hoarseness. He cleared it a bit and smiled shyly at Katsuki.

"Give your throat a break," Katsuki chuckled. He touched Izuku's neck as well, giving a solid once over at his handy work. Pretty bruises, specifically an undoubtedly recognizable choking mark, were slowly beginning to form over the hickies. Katsuki's eyes darkened a bit. "You look fucking great like this."

Izuku hummed hoarsely. He leaned in and gave Katsuki a chaste kiss.

"You know," Izuku started, throat scratchy. "We technically consummated our marriage."

Katsuki scoffed and shook his head. He smirked, amused. "You're a fucking nerd."

They laid there for a while, suspended in time. The intensity of the moment climbed down, and calmness settled into the air all around them.

Katsuki realized he could indulge in this for much longer than the time they had. He did his best not to look at the clock, waiting for whenever the blaring alarm he had set decided to go off. He wanted to stay blissfully ignorant in this moment with Izuku, and it seemed like Izuku wanted the same.

Everything stilled as they laid there in each other's hold. He had his arm wrapped around Izuku's shoulders, drawing him in close as Izuku leaned his head against his chest. Izuku's voice returned after a while, and they found themselves chatting lightly. The bundle of burning questions inside of Katsuki fizzled away. He rationalized that he could spend the next few hours pressing down on questions about Izuku. There was still so much he didn't know. Or he could enjoy Izuku's smile.

He decided on Izuku's smile when the smaller man leaned into him affectionately.

Katsuki's heart clenched when he realized this was probably the closest he had come to feeling like someone cared for him. There were little touches that Katsuki knew were far inappropriate for them. Forehead kisses. Izuku brushed his hair behind his ear. Gentle caresses that should only be saved for lovers. Real lovers. Katsuki didn't know exactly when their facade slipped into the bed with them, but it did. It started to borderline feeling like they were simply two husbands having a post-coital cuddle. Izuku measured his hand against his playfully at a point, their matching rings glimmering in the soft moonlight together.

Katsuki realized they could take these off now—but neither of them said a word as they stared at their hands pressed together while cuddled into each other.

Katsuki then slowly curled his fingers, intertwining them with Izuku's.

Warm.

"Thank you," Katsuki whispered into the dark room. He stroked Izuku's freckled skin with his thumb, relishing in the softness he might never feel again. "I meant to tell you that earlier. Thank you for being there for me that year in Tokyo. It means a lot to me. You—" Katsuki sucked in a deep breath. "You saved me, when no one else was there."

Izuku smiled back at him, with a woeful nostalgia gleaming in his eyes.

He stared at Katsuki like he already missed him.

"You saved me too."

Chapter 10 — Vivace

The color was dull in the room late at night.

The soft pastels were overshadowed with a tinge of grayness that looked as if someone had drained all the life from the atmosphere. It was currently the dead of night, and there was a sensation inside of Katsuki twisting and turning as he dressed in his gear alongside Izuku.

His stealth outfit consisted of midnight black material. Not the normal shade of black of his outfits, it was deeper, closer to spilled ink than anything. It absorbed all the light and masked him like he was a shadow of death.

His shirt covered his torso fully and it was taut against his body for mobility. Sitting on top was his sleek leather holster, holding his guns for quick draw. His pants were slightly baggy, to give room for his gear but were secured to his body by two straps on each leg. One hugging his thighs and another his calves. They had discreet leather pouches to hold his reloads.

He loaded up all his pants' cargo pockets with his various other items: mainly his bullets, his knife, and pain killers if it came down to it.

Katsuki thought about Koizumi's slimy face. He slid on brass knuckles over his leather gloves for good measure. He then carefully covered his face with a black gaiter mask and tucked his distinctive blond hair under a black hat.

Izuku dressed similarly but with slight differences.

Instead of black, Izuku's gear was deep, velvety green to the point it nearly blended with the darkness. It was only when he got up close did Katsuki realize the sheen of viridian it had.

It was a full body suit, clung tightly to his frame for maximum mobility with his leaner stature. His holster was now on the outside of his body along with the lethal number of knives and two guns pocketed on his torso's holsters. Donning his face was a black gaiter also and his suit had a large, hooded covering for his hair. Striking green eyes were the only things that could be seen in the dark attire.

However, what stood out the most to Katsuki, was the two twin daggers attached on either side of Izuku's hips.

They were in the shape of fangs. Long, silver and possessed ridges on the side where it curved inwards. On the bent outside, it was sharp enough to cut swiftly through calloused skin. It was a type of design crafted for causing agonizing pain on one side and quickly ending suffering on the other. The hilts had deep green tassels at the ends.

The way the tassels swayed with Izuku's walk was enticing.

For the most part, Katsuki had always seen Izuku at work in the daytime. Or when he was undercover. These were situations where Izuku needed casual gear to blend in so he could get close to marks. Now, that wasn't the case. Izuku was dressed to kill, nothing more. Seeing him like this was an entirely different feeling.

They packed up their luggage and wiped any evidence of themselves from the room. The only items they didn't pack were two compact black backpacks.

Their plan was straight forward: Get to Ie Island, kill Moore, and stage the scene to look like a twisted love affair gone wrong. Afterwards, they would change into hiking clothes and go to the hiking area on Ie Island. They would act as though they had been there, enjoying some early morning hiking when the police raid hit since there would be little time between killing Moore and checking out of the hotel for good.

Having a bullet proof alibi was needed. After the time for the police raid had finished, they would come back to the hotel, which would be in chaos from the raid. Everyone would no doubt be kicked out from the fiasco. They could inconspicuously grab their luggage from the room and leave with the rush of confused people, blending in like nothing had happened.

It could work—Katsuki believed it could. It had too.

He zipped up his bag, put it on his back and fastened the straps tightly.

“You got everything?” Izuku asked, slightly quiet.

Izuku slung his backpack over his shoulder as well. As he did this, he assessed Katsuki carefully. His eyes wandered all over as he chewed on his bottom lip.

“Yeah, I got everything,” Katsuki responded.

“You sure? Do you have your cell phone?”

“I’m sure.”

“What about the silencer for your handgun?”

Katsuki raised a brow at Izuku. “Yes. I’m positive.”

“Wh-What about your change of clothes. Did you pack the hiking gear?”

Katsuki frowned deeply. He was baffled by the sudden pestering—but when he turned to look at Izuku, it clicked.

Big, green eyes stared up at him and Izuku gave him a small, saccharine smile. It perfectly mirrored the way Izuku used to stare at him whenever he came to visit in Tokyo. The memory of how doting, careful, and attentive young Izuku was painted in his mind. He could still vividly feel that first shower in the church etched in his skin. Tiny hands carefully picking the dirt out of his hair and scrubbing away his tears. Smiling the entire time too.

His heart sung low when he realized what was happening.

Izuku then stepped forward and adjusted the backpack strap on his chest. Izuku’s hands were unsteady as he did this, shaking like an uneasy tide. Katsuki reached up to clasp a hand over them.

The trembling stopped.

Izuku looked at him, eyes wide like he was snapped out of a faraway memory. Katsuki pulled down both of their masks so they could see each other’s faces properly.

“You don’t have to take care of me anymore,” Katsuki whispered with unfiltered vulnerability. “You don’t have to worry about me anymore, alright? I can take care of myself.”

Izuku’s whole body clammed up.

The delicate, freckled face sparked with sudden shock, but slowly relaxed. Izuku soaked in the words, letting them trickle down in his chest and fill him with understanding.

“Okay,” Izuku whispered. He offered a bittersweet smile. His eyes watered slightly, shining with the tiny reflection of bright moonlight. He carefully retracted his hand. “No more worrying."

Katsuki didn't quite know what to do with himself.

He felt like he was being split between dreary reality and the illusion of the pastel Paradise. The burn in his chest mimicked someone throwing a bucket of scathing hot water on him. All he wanted to do was scream out in pain from being so torn on the inside. But he couldn't.

He had to keep his emotions in check, especially now.

Izuku pulled up the mask over his face once more, and Katsuki decided to set aside his emotions until later. He could sort out all his mixed feelings after Moore had a bullet lodged in his skull.

Katsuki pulled up his mask too, and they both headed towards the balcony window. Izuku grabbed the long, black rope that was laying on the table as they headed out. They had decided to embark via balcony and drop down into the lush backyard of the hotel. This way they could avoid anyone on a nighttime stroll while they were in full gear.

As they carefully knotted the rope, Katsuki could see Izuku wince slightly when he made a sharp movement. Katsuki wearily looked at him. Maybe he should've taken it easier—

"Are you going to be okay?" Katsuki asked as Izuku threw the other end of the rope over the balcony. He looked down at Izuku's feet and noted how Izuku was discreetly pulling his weight off one side. "You're limping. If you need me to cover you, let me know."

"That won't be needed," Izuku said. "My backside stings a little, but I'm alright. Nothing I can't handle."

A pang of guilt echoed in Katsuki. "I should've tried to be gentler."

"You were perfect. I wouldn't change how it happened for anything. You're underestimating my ability to work through pain, and this is just a bit of discomfort."

Katsuki took Izuku's word for it. The man was deadlier than three hitmen from The Company combined.

They scaled down the building carefully with Katsuki going first. There was a small gap between the end of the rope and ground, forcing Katsuki to jump down onto the grass. He gave a light grunt but landed well. Next followed Izuku. Izuku landed swiftly, but a shock of pain radiated in his muscles. His eyes went wide, and a startled choke rattled in his throat as his knees gave out.

Katsuki held his breath when Izuku stumbled. The freckled man immediately fell over, but quickly caught himself by holding his hands outward for balance.

Izuku's face painted pink with embarrassment and Katsuki's twisted into a scowl.

"Not needed, my ass," Katsuki chastised. He yanked Izuku from the ground by his backpack and frowned. "I should've been fucking softer—"

“No,” Izuku shot down rapidly. He groaned and stood up straight. He winced and shook his head at Katsuki. “I’m fine, Kacc—Katsuki.” The quick shift of his name didn’t go unnoticed.

“I’m covering you,” Katsuki said sternly. “Don’t fucking argue with me.”

“Katsuki, really, I’ll be okay,” Izuku insisted. “You’re more useful on the full offense. You have weak points on defense.”

“No. You could get hurt.”

“Now it’s your turn to stop worrying,” Izuku cut him off. His eyes softened while he yanked down the rope and put it in his backpack. “I’ll be fine. Really.”

“I’m still fucking covering you,” Katsuki mumbled, narrowing his eyes.

Izuku sighed in resignation. He began to walk towards the back exit of the hotel property. Katsuki followed suit with his mind racing in several different directions.

How the hell could he be so stupid? He should’ve taken Izuku gently, or at least attempted to. Katsuki had never exactly been the softest in bed, he had always been naturally rougher. All his previous partners seemed to enjoy it—and he had defaulted to his usual choke and fuck state.

“You’re underestimating my endurance,” Izuku said casually as they walked towards the docks in downtown Nago. “I have a higher pain tolerance than you’re giving me credit for.”

“You make it sound like you get fucked before killing someone frequently.”

“I-I don’t,” Izuku stuttered.

“So, you’re just used to your ass being sore or some shit?” Katsuki mumbled, a little jealous of the other partners Izuku may have had before him.

They reached the boat docks and he walked slightly ahead. He caught sight of a small jet ski that was chained on the pier and decided that it would do. Whoever the owner was could miss their lavish ride for a little while.

“I, uh, actually never been sore like this before,” Izuku muttered after a pause.

Without thinking too much about it, Katsuki asked, “the others not get the job done well?”

“T-There have been no others. You were the first.”

Katsuki stopped in his tracks.

Izuku bumped into his back at the sudden halt. Katsuki whirled around, eyes stretched with disbelief. The mask Izuku had pulled over half his face didn’t hide the blush rising on his cheeks. Katsuki's face contorted with shock, and he quickly snapped his mask down.

“You were a fucking virgin?” Katsuki hissed through his gritted teeth. “Izuku—What the fuck?! Why didn’t you tell me that before?”

“I didn’t want you to overthink,” Izuku murmured. He shrugged and his eyes averted to the side.

“Taking your virginity is something definitely worth fucking overthinking.” Katsuki groaned. “Fuck. Fuck—Izuku, what the hell? Is that why you were so nervous?”

“Yes,” Izuku confirmed. “B-But I liked it! I really appreciated every second. I-It’s fine, Katsuki.”

“No, fuck that. It’s not fine,” Katsuki spat. “I choked you until you were basically purple in the face and—shit. I was so goddamn rough with you, and you’ve never been intimate like that—”

“—I like that you’re rough,” Izuku interrupted. His brows furrowed. “This is why I didn’t say anything. Plus, I was scared you’d back out because you wouldn’t want to have sex with a virgin. No offense but you don’t seem inclined to be someone’s first time.”

He wasn’t. He avoided virgins like they carried the plague—but for a good reason. He wasn’t delicate or gentle enough to give someone the gateway experience they deserved into sexual exploration.

“But there’s no use in talking about it,” Izuku said. “I don’t regret anything, and I hope you don’t either because I was a virgin.”

He started marching forward towards the end of the dock, but Katsuki quickly caught him by his arm and pulled him back.

“You still should have told me,” Katsuki whispered.

“So, what? You want a do over?” Izuku asked, entirely sarcastic.

Katsuki’s eyes burned holes into Izuku intensely.

He was stunted in the realization that he did want a goddamn do over. He wanted more than a fucking do over truthfully. He wanted more moments, he wanted to feel Izuku again and again. Help him explore his body and now that he knew he was Izuku’s first a large part of him didn’t want someone else to be his last.

“I—” Izuku swallowed and slowly pulled his face covering down. His eyes searched the ground, in his mind he was carefully choosing his next words. “I never felt like the moment was right before you. I wanted it to be special.”

Katsuki’s heart hammered at a tempo faster than he had ever experienced.

“And what made the moment right this time?” Katsuki asked.

Izuku smiled at him like he had asked a silly question.

“It was the right moment because it was you.”

Me? A warm sensation filled every fiber of Katsuki.

“W-We should—Um. We should get going,” Izuku muttered quickly. He dodged the way Katsuki was studying him and pulled his mask back up. “Let’s hurry over to headquarters before we let too much time get away from us.”

Izuku walked with a slight haste to the jet ski and Katsuki wordlessly followed.

Izuku began hot-wiring the jet ski expertly, purposefully not looking back at Katsuki.

As he did that, Katsuki studied Izuku.

He drank down the heaviness in the words and a small itch of possessiveness crept in. It was the right moment because it was you. The sentiment rattled, shook and imprinted on a very specific side of his mind. What Izuku had revealed was possibly the most special notion anyone had ever told him. It was as if he was given a gift that he normally assumed he’d break if he touched. But he hadn’t.

Izuku finished, paused and looked over his shoulder at Katsuki who hadn’t stopped his intense staring.

“Do you happen to know how to drive one of these?” Izuku asked. He was still blushing and not daring to meet Katsuki’s blazing gaze. “I realized that I don’t exactly know how to drive a jet ski.”

“I know how to,” Katsuki answered.

He stepped forward and mounted the water vehicle. He looked around at the black and silver gears and controls. It was vaguely familiar enough that he felt confident he wouldn’t crash and burn. Once upon a time, he had to learn how to operate one of these on the spot during an assignment. Katsuki revved the engine and speckles of water shot back on the wooden pier.

He nodded and then gestured for Izuku to get aboard. The other hitman climbed on, and snugly fit against his back. Katsuki tensed up a bit at the flush contact as Izuku leaned in and wrapped his arms securely around him.

“Make sure not to let go,” Katsuki instructed. Izuku squeezed him tightly and nodded.

Katsuki pressed the gas. As they blasted across the dark tinted body of water, Izuku gripped him hard. His head was tucked on his back and his hands held onto him with trust.

At that moment, Katsuki decided he liked the feeling of Izuku holding on to him.

They arrived on Ie Island shortly after. The sunny paradise atmosphere of the island was drained away like someone had cut its jugular and let it bleed out. Lifeless and dull in a way to be unnamed. The leaning palm trees were ominous as they loomed over him and Izuku, as though watching every step they took with unseen eyes. The stars were misaligned, and the moon was only a sliver of light in the sky, masked by dense gray clouds.

By the time they trekked up to the location of the headquarters, Katsuki could feel something was off in his bones. He didn't know exactly what—but he hoped he was wrong. Goosebumps ignited underneath his long sleeves, causing subtle, unsettling friction on his skin.

The forest of palm trees was nearly black. There was no visibility this late at night, and the moonlight was blocked from view in the canopy. The only thing Katsuki could see was Izuku's green eyes. They were sharper, deadlier than he had seen them before. There was an ice coldness that trickled out from the endless viridian the closer they came to the headquarters.

"Do you remember where the security room is inside?" Izuku whispered as they climbed.

"Yeah, I got it," Katsuki whispered back. "We'll go kill the lights once we get inside."

Izuku nodded in affirmation. They went up one last familiar hill and stopped on top.

The wind howled a loud warning as they peered down. The gray, concrete warehouse sat there, waiting for them. The white dove symbol appeared dark and as though it was painted in blood, chipped and worn down. The building had several lights on, some flickering and some dim.

As they surveyed the scene, Katsuki could see two figures that resembled Moore and Koizumi walking inside the front door with a third party. The unidentified man was slender, tall, and had black hair. He was dressed up in expensive, tacky clothing. A bright green tie. A dark green suit. He even had large emerald rings all along his hands and an emerald brooch pinned to his blazer. It was weird as hell and Katsuki could only conclude this man had a lot of money and was obsessed with the color green.

Accompanying them were the two faux bartenders from earlier in the week, looking over their shoulders for anything suspicious. But despite their watchful eyes, they missed the cloaked hitmen lurking from up above. The door clicked behind the party of trafficking men as they walked into the hidden headquarters.

Izuku and Katsuki quietly descended, careful of all the branches and twigs along the way.

They eventually found themselves up close and personal with the tattered concrete building. The texture of it was rough, and there were security guards making their rounds they carefully slipped by. They discreetly shuffled around to a side door when one guard veered to the other direction at the sound of something in the distance. The guard stayed gone for a moment, and that was enough time to sneak in.

Izuku plucked a neat, silver instrument from his harness. Katsuki had assumed it was a tiny knife, but when he took a closer gander it was a small lock picker.

Izuku kneeled down, carefully working his hands in sharp, twisting motions until the lock popped. Katsuki grabbed his gun and Izuku armed himself with the twin fang daggers.

They crept inside carefully with Katsuki leading first. He carefully peered around and was taken back by what he was seeing.

The inside of the warehouse was an entire contrast from its shabby outside. It was neatly put together, like they had entered some royal, grand hall. There was red carpet rolled out on the marble floors like delicate welcome matts to lead the way. The walls were painted a crisp charcoal shade of gray. There were even mahogany tables shelving fine, white porcelain vases and wax candles. Up and down the halls were planted mini trees every few spaces, giving the building a polished feel.

It was strange, how well put together this all was. It did nothing to help the growing goosebumps racing down Katsuki's spine. But what staggered him most were the walls.

The large halls were lined with luxe oil paintings much like Moore's private lounge. Only difference was that these portraits resembled Moore like shadow reflections. They were paintings of men and women with his facial features. Light brown hair. Light brown eyes. They were all in white suits, posing regally in plush, red chairs with their legs crossed. In every single painting the succession of people were all proudly wearing golden dove pins.

The cold, judgmental eyes of the paintings stared down at him as if they could see.

"Let's hurry and get the fuck out of here," Katsuki hissed lowly for Izuku to hear. "This place is giving me the damn creeps."

The other hitman glanced over his shoulder, clicking the side door shut carefully and re-locking it to cover their steps. Izuku stared up at the paintings, making eye contact with one before nodding in agreement.

The pair worked quickly, shuffling in and out of hallways, careful not to make any sound as they crouched low. Katsuki had memorized the layout of the building and their first stop was the security room. It was on the other side of the mysterious structure and required them to be extremely cautious. As they were crouching, ducking from pillar to pillar and corner to corner, a herd of footsteps came their way.

Both of them froze and they rapidly blended into the shadows. They pressed their backs against a wall out of sight as the group of men passed by.

"Do you have my companion ready today? Or do I still have to wait?" An unfamiliar voice asked. "I thought you said you would have him for me to inspect."

"Ah, we've had some trouble obtaining him," Moore's voice answered. The cheery, delightful tone was gone, replaced with a dangerous edge. "But not to worry, it was a minor snag with unpredicted weather. We'll make sure you'll be in possession of him soon."

"Thank you," the voice said. "When you said there was someone with green eyes, I couldn't help myself." There was a deep chuckle. "I love green. And you said he also has green hair?"

“Yes, beautiful green hair. He is stunning,” Moore tacked on. “Very sweet personality as well. He’ll make a good companion once you break him in.”

“Perfect. I always knew I could depend on a member of the Moore family to get me what I wanted. Your family has always done such good business in companion trade.”

Katsuki frowned deeply because he knew who they were referring to. The way they spoke so fucking casual about Izuku as if he was an item made a deep, disgusted flicker spark inside of his chest. His nostrils flared.

He looked to his side to stare into the very same green eyes they were currently discussing. There was a distant, pensive tint inside of them now. That usual sweetness drained as the voices faded away with the footsteps. The group of men walked up a large, spiral staircase as they continued to discuss their trades. When the footsteps and voices were no longer audible, Katsuki pointed down the next hall and signaled left for which direction to veer.

They moved quickly, dodging any one along the way. Men dressed in gray suits with loaded machine guns indifferently strolled up and down the grand hallways, talking about their days as though this was a regular night for them.

When they reached the security room, they crouched low before peering inside the open door. Inside were screens stacked on top of screens, showing all the different hallways. Tiny room numbers and locations were labeled at the bottom of each screen. Inside were two men, chatting and drinking coffee with their feet kicked up on the control panel. They were barely glancing at the screens, talking about something utterly useless.

“Look, I’m telling you BTS paved the way,” one of the men said. “It’s undeniable that they were one of the first pop groups from Korea to reach all the way across seas and break down the doors for others to follow suit.”

The other security guard scoffed. “You’re fucking joking. There are other groups besides BTS. You’re only saying that because you’re biased.”

“I’m not biased, I’m just not blind. Other groups, sure, are good but they don’t have Kim Namjoon.”

Katsuki made a move to get up and hurry and knock these idiots unconscious before his ears started bleeding. However, before he could, Izuku held up a hand for him to stop. Katsuki watched curiously as Izuku took out a small, slender contraption that mimicked a blow dart. He loaded up two darts that were labeled with the word ‘curare’.

Izuku carefully sank to the floor and aimed the small weapon. He sharply blew into it, tiny needles flying true to land in the necks of both men.

“Shit!” One of them yelled out and snapped a hand up at his throat. “What the fuck is this?!”

Panic swelled like storm clouds in their eyes as they pulled out the small needles. They hastily searched around, looking for where it came from. But they didn’t see either hitman outside the door, ducking out of sight. The security guards tried to reach for a red button to call for help but quickly failed. Both men went slack and dropped to the ground with their eyes wide open.

Izuku and Katsuki stood up slowly and walked inside. Izuku quietly closed the door. Katsuki stared carefully as Izuku put the small blow dart back in his harness's pouch. He briefly wondered if Izuku always had that tranquilizer on him. How had he never seen it before?

He looked down at the men who were struggling, flailing on the ground like fish out of water.

One attempted to reach up for him, clearly a distressed cry for mercy. But fleetingly, their motions went slack. Heavy limbs slumped against the floor and the voluntary movement twitched out of their bodies gradually until there was none. Both men's expressions were wide with fear, shock and pure, palpable agony. The whites of their eyes slowly turned burning red from the lack of blinking. Tears gathered but never spilled on the edge of their eyes and there was a soft, strangled noise that sounded like a prayer.

"How long until the tranquilizer wears off?" Katsuki asked.

"It doesn't," Izuku said simply. He stepped over one of the men on the floor. He didn't bother glancing down at them. "It's a mixture of tranquilizer and a subtle, untraceable poison. Their hearts will stop soon."

Katsuki stepped over their bodies as well to get a better look at the area. Dirty cigarettes were in ash trays, and their guns were sitting next to black flasks that reeked of alcohol. Next to their guns was the red button the one man had attempted to reach for. It read 'Emergency only: Building Lock Down' in big, black lettering with an override key sitting next to it.

Katsuki then looked up at the bright screens. On the televisions they could see a mix of different things occurring in the large building.

But as he took in the various happenings, Katsuki felt sick.

On at least three small screens was the view of red decorated bedroom chambers. People were copulating inside of them, naked bodies tangled all around each other. Some in groups and some in pairs. Other screens held empty rooms, weaponry stashes, and others showed the inside of what looked like a dark, dreary gray room. At least ten different men and women sat inside, caged up inside of steel boxes behind bars.

There was no audio, but Katsuki could fill in the silence. People were weeping and screaming at the top of their lungs, voices hoarse no doubt. Some were knocked out, face down in their own vomit in their cages while others were curled up in a fetal position rocking back and forth.

Katsuki's stomach twisted in sickness and the burn of acid ate away at the back of his throat. He realized what that screen was. Then he realized what those red rooms were. Katsuki's skin crawled at the disheveled appearance of some of the people on screen, and he nearly hurled when he recognized a woman from the hotel. She was bleeding from a cut on her forehead with a ghostly look in her eye.

“Fucking bastards,” Katsuki spat distastefully. He gripped his gun harder, suddenly fueled with a lot fierier rage than before. He fucking hated humans like Moore and Koizumi.

Scum, Katsuki thought bitterly. All of them.

He snapped his eyes down at the men on the ground and was happy when he could see the life in their eyes was gone. Their gazes were unfocused now, and their mouths hang open with slight froth forming on their dry tongues.

Fucking good.

Katsuki curled his upper lip and rebalanced himself from the disturbing imagery. He turned to Izuku but was surprised to see the other hitman leaning over the control panel, still intensely locking eyes on the screen that held the captive group of people. Etched on his face was something Katsuki had never seen there. It was purely vicious, sharp, and deep with hate.

Izuku didn’t move as he stared at the static filled screen and the people crying out for help.

“Are you alright?” Katsuki asked after a while.

“They’re keeping people in cages,” Izuku hissed. The furrow in his brow deepened.

“I know,” Katsuki muttered. He scowled in distaste as he glanced back at the bodies on screen. “But they’re all going to burn in hell soon. Shouto and Inasa are going to come after and the bust I’m sure is going to set the people free.”

Katsuki looked down at Izuku’s hands. They were clutching the edge of the control panel with such intensity the leather of his gloves threatened to snap.

Katsuki wearily glanced at Izuku. “…Are you sure you’re alright?”

“Ye-Yeah, I’ll be fine,” Izuku whispered but his voice was slightly unsteady. He shook his head, snapping himself out of an unknown spell and peeled his hand away from the counter. “It looks like the business deal is taking place on the third floor in a room called 3A.”

Izuku pointed to one of the screens in the upper right corner. Sitting there was Moore, Koizumi, and whoever they were selling to. Their bodyguards stood behind them and it seemed like there was another stocky built man in there as well, standing behind the buyer. The audio was mute as the trio of men probably discussed Izuku. Papers were signed and laughs were exchanged as the men shook hands with pointy, greedy smiles.

Katsuki glanced towards the kidnapped people on screen then to Izuku.

“Let’s get started,” Katsuki said slowly as his hate spiked. He pressed the bright red ‘lock down’ button and pocketed the override key into his pants. “I’m ready to put a bullet in the roof of their mouths.”

The bright lights in the building killed and panic lights flooded all over. The red lights from up above tinted everything in deep shades of scarlet to match the emotions coursing through his veins.

A dark, crimson rage pumped through Katsuki.

He could feel it crawl up his legs, wrap around his bones and make his body its home once more. He was familiar with this sensation as he and Izuku walked through the dark building like they were its owner. They listened to the guards scatter all around, yelling out commands. Everyone was panicking, saying they had to protect Koizumi and Peter from any possible intruders.

They gradually made their way up the stairs towards room 3A with movements that were more hostile but still reigned in. While there was a shift in Katsuki, there was also a shift in Izuku. Katsuki recognized something in the green painted hitman had switched seeing those people on screen. His movements were far less ‘going with the motions’ and now they were vicious with a deadly bite.

Every guard they encountered they dropped dead in one swift shot. Izuku used knives that were coated in poisons to take down anyone who came too close and Katsuki sniped dead anyone that was within his vision. By the time they cut their way up to 3A, clear intent to kill flashed in Izuku’s beautiful venom eyes.

With the two of them, they took down the guards outside the door with no issue.

But while watching Izuku squeeze the life out of a man in a lethal headlock with his legs, Katsuki comprehended he had never truly seen Izuku’s deadly side. The other man had been pulling his punches and techniques with him for eight years. Blood drained from the guard’s face as his skin ripened to blue then purple. His brown eyes rolled back like he was finally called by an Angel of Death to return to the ether.

When Izuku released the man, shuffling on the other side of the door was audible. Click clacking of expensive dress shoes against marble floors echoed and hush voices murmured. Then quickly, the sounds disappeared. Izuku stood upright in an alerted position and pressed his ear carefully against the wooden double doors.

Katsuki snapped both security guards’ necks to ensure no mistakes were left.

“Something is happening inside,” Izuku muttered carefully. He leaned in more with a concentrated expression. “It sounds like—”

But before Izuku could finish his sentence, the wooden double doors opened with great force.

The sudden shocking slam sent Izuku stumbling backwards. He quickly caught himself and Katsuki lifted his gun to immediately fire it. Standing there were the three bodyguards, faces twisted with scowls and murderous intentions. Their guns were pointed, and it only took a second for them to try to kill them.

Katsuki quickly dodged when a storm of bullets rained down and Izuku did the same. Izuku quickly disarmed one bodyguard, taking his gun and shooting him between the eyes. Katsuki shot the hand of another, forcing the man to scream out and drop his weapon then landed a bullet in his temple. Katsuki sharply turned his gun on the third guard that Izuku had begun struggling with—but the two were too close. They were exchanging blows back and forth far too rapidly for Katsuki to take a clean shot.

The bodyguard had swiftly taken out a knife and attempted to slash for Izuku's throat but failed and cut his suit instead. Izuku hissed as he staggered backwards and looked down at his torn piece of clothing. It limped forward to reveal his clavicle area and tattoo.

Katsuki was about to jump in, but in the background, he could see Moore fleeing with his business partners. The three elder men were shooting at them as they attempted to get away at high speed.

"Shit," Katsuki cursed, and he ran inside the large room.

He dodged more whizzing bullets that came close to nicking his skin. Gracefully Katsuki changed out handguns to fire expert sharpshooting. Three of his bullets landed. One in the unnamed negotiator's skull and the other two lodged in Koizumi's shoulder and the back of his knee. Both men dropped to the ground as Moore looked down at them in terror.

There was a split second where Koizumi and Moore held eye contact. But it didn't last long. Moore fled down the stairs, leaving the bleeding man on the ground.

A flash of hurt trickled onto Koizumi's face right before a loud gunshot rang out.

Katsuki whipped his head to see Izuku holding the last bodyguard's gun to the man's chin. Blood painted the ceiling, walls, and across Izuku's face. Speckles of red decorated on the sliver of his skin that was showing, blending with the look of lethality burning in his eyes.

The man's eyes rolled back, and his body slumped to the ground.

Katsuki took off after Moore as Izuku rounded on Koizumi, who was attempting to crawl towards his gun. Izuku ran to him and quickly stepped on his hand. Koizumi hissed and tried to pull back, but Izuku dug his heel in and pinned him in place by holding the barrel of the gun to his head.

Katsuki's vision was straining in the dark, red lighting. All the hallways stretched long like an endless nightmare as he searched around for Moore. Along the way, he cleanly shot down several guards who were too slow for his reflexes.

He searched for a while. He checked every room, kicking down every door, not leaving a single one unturned.

Eventually he walked up to those chambers on the top floor and barged in on the sex parties happening. Several naked people scattered as Katsuki pointed his gun to them. He was about to land a bullet in all their skulls but halted when he caught sight of bruises and ankle bracelets on some of the people. Those people had the most fear in their eyes. It was spiraling with dread, brokenness and they nearly looked like they wanted to be shot.

There was only one person in this room who didn't have an ankle bracelet. It was a larger man, who appeared entirely healthy. He had gaudy, glittery rings on his fingers that shone in the dark, red lighting. Then, as Katsuki was surveying him, he noted the golden chain around his neck. It had a golden dove pendant.

Katsuki's rage intensified. It trickled up the back of his throat when he put together the pieces.

He pointed his gun at the piggish man with the rings. The bastard was trembling behind one of the frail men with an ankle bracelet, using him as a human shield. The captured man's bruised face silently begged Katsuki. That helpless, hollow look told Katsuki what to do. Without batting an eye, Katsuki expertly shot at the top of the gaudy man's skull, not hurting the whimpering man. The large body staggered back into the wall, painting the wall red. All the men and the women in the room stared up at Katsuki, like a blessing but still terribly afraid.

Katsuki put his finger over his masked lips in a 'shush' motion.

"You never saw me," he said very seriously. "There will be police here soon. When they arrive, you're going to tell them there was some type of deal gone wrong. Got it?"

They all frantically nodded.

Katsuki walked into the next two chambers and did the same thing as he searched for Moore.

His frustrations began to grow when he couldn't find the kingpin. He peeked behind every corner—he even checked that disgusting cellar holding the kidnapped people. That was worse than he thought when the putrid smell of vomit mixed with human waste slammed into his nose. Their screams and cries were a high-strung disturbing melody that would haunt Katsuki for years to come.

When he searched up and down the whole building, Katsuki headed back to the room with Izuku and Koizumi. The other hitman was carefully staring down Koizumi, who stared him down right back.

"You know," Koizumi said coyly. "I recognize you even with that mask, Hiroji. Green eyes are a rarity after all and that was your selling point to the buyer. But I suppose Hiroji is not your real name, is it?"

Izuku stayed unfazed and didn't take the bait. No use in talking to a dead man, Katsuki figured.

Koizumi then looked at Katsuki who walked up to them. He chuckled and shook his head. "And Taro. Of course. I knew there was something off about you two. But of course, Peter never fucking listens to me."

Katsuki ignored Koizumi's bitter ass rambling and turned to Izuku.

“I can’t find him,” Katsuki explained with an edge. “There must be a secret room in here somewhere. I checked everywhere.”

At that, Koizumi gave a tell: his face faltered for a millisecond too long and Izuku caught it.

“You’re right and he knows where,” Izuku said flatly. He dug his foot into Koizumi’s hand and looked him in the eye. “Well, I guess this is the part where you tell us where he went. I’m sure you know there’s a hard way to go about this and an easy way. It’s in everyone’s best interest if we can do it the easy way.”

“I’m not telling you two anything,” Koizumi said through his gritted teeth. He winced in pain as he tried to shift off his shoulder but failed. “Both of you can go to hell.”

“Alright, I guess this is going the hard way,” Izuku said tiredly.

He smiled from under his face covering, eyes unnervingly polite as he shifted his gun to grab one of the blue needles on his waist. It was the one Katsuki had remembered as filled with a muscle paralyzer. Izuku had casually explained it to him before they left. He detailed that half a dosage was enough to immobilize someone while a full dosage was enough to make someone’s heart stop beating and kill them.

Izuku uncapped it and poised himself to stick Koizumi in his neck, most likely for a half dose.

But in the next instant, Koizumi decided to fight back. He grunted loudly, pushing through his pain as he grabbed for Izuku and the needle. It caught both hitmen off guard, and by the time either one of them realized what was happening, Koizumi had pinned Izuku down on the ground, and snatched the syringe from his hand. He rammed the needle into Izuku’s neck and Izuku screamed loudly in pain.

Katsuki saw bloody red. “You son of a bitch—”

Before he knew it, Katsuki instantly bum rushed Koizumi. His fist balled up tight enough that his leather glove tore at the seams and he slammed with all his weight into Koizumi’s skull.

The sickening crack of bone could be heard against his brass knuckles. Koizumi’s nose broke, teeth chipped, and blood sprayed around. Katsuki hit the man hard enough to nearly break his neck as his head whipped around and his eyes rolled back. He slumped to the ground coldly.

Katsuki’s expression immediately shifted from livid to worried.

He frantically bent down to Izuku who was slowly pulling out the long needle from his neck. His eyes were screwed shut as he let out a small gasp. Katsuki hastily took the syringe and pocketed it and began inspecting the site of injury.

His heart was pounding furiously. He had never had this happen before—feeling his emotions flood with worry, fear, and fucking terror. Suddenly, this assignment didn’t matter too much to him anymore. The room warped like he was viewing it through a fisheye lens as he stared around at all the dead, bloodied bodies.

He scrambled Izuku into his arms and hastily lifted him.

“Izuku, we need to get you out—”

“—I-I’ll be fine,” Izuku whispered painfully. He sucked in a small breath as he tried to lift his arm. It was sluggish, but still mobile. “It’ll pass in a few minutes. Put me back down.”

“A few minutes?” Katsuki hissed like Izuku had gone mad. “What the fuck do you mean? That was a full dose.”

“Mithridatism,” Izuku said with a smile. “I have immunity to most toxins. T-This dosage was a bit high, but I’ll rebound in a second.”

Katsuki was rendered speechless.

He heard of consuming poison in increments to become immune to it, but only people who had a fucking a death wish practiced that. It was taboo and immensely understudied. But clearly, reckless ass Izuku didn’t give a shit about all that. Gradually, Katsuki’s heart slowed down from the racing tempo it was in. He lowered Izuku back on the ground and just like Izuku said, the man recovered within the next five minutes.

Izuku shrugged it off like he had merely tripped over a rock and stubbed his toe. He sat forward and worked the crick out of his neck and stretched.

Katsuki stared at him in disbelief.

What the fuck?

If he was questioning if he was truly pining after Izuku before, he sure as hell was now. What a perfectly deranged little shit.

Izuku turned to him and gave his cheek a quick pat. His eyes turned up into happy crescent moons and Katsuki could see the outline of his smile behind his cloth.

“You’re very sweet for caring like that,” Izuku said gently. “But I told you no more worrying for you too.”

“Right,” Katsuki said. He nodded dumbly.

It terrified him how quick he had been to throw the whole assignment if it meant Izuku was about to possibly die. He stared his emotions directly in their face, and they murmured back at him: “You care about him more than you think you do.”

As Izuku stood up, Katsuki realized he was much deeper in his affections than he thought.

Fuck. What was he going to do about that after all this?

“Help me tie him up,” Izuku said. “He’s the only person that can tell us where Moore is hiding. Our best shot is interrogating him.”

Katsuki shook himself out of his thoughts and focused back on the assignment. What he was supposed to be doing. While they dragged Koizumi’s body, Katsuki stole tiny glances at Izuku and felt his heart hammer rapidly.

When they finished tying Koizumi up, Katsuki took a look around the room.

This must be where they negotiate deals Katsuki thought to himself as he stared around the high ceiling.

It was similar to the dining hall at the hotel, in an eerie way. Only difference was the layout was darker with deep, maroon-colored walls and gold trimmings. Off to the side of the room was a flamboyant display of wealth. Trophies, autographs and even a baseball collection of cards, bats, and a collector’s edition of used gloves.

There was a crystal chandelier overhead that reflected the emergency red light in a hauntingly beautiful way. The scarlet light speckles mimicked blood drops in Katsuki’s mind as they blended with the actual blood that was all over the room. Katsuki squinted in the dark lighting, surprised to see on the top of the ceiling was a replica of the mural in the dining hall.

But this painting continued past the last panel back at the resort.

His morbid curiosity studied the last half of the panels. Izuku caught him staring and looked up with him. Up above they could see the continuation of the story.

Next to the panel with the angel holding their dead lover was the angel descending down below to hell. Angry flames in the shape of hands pulled at the angel’s wings as he walked on hot coals to the deepest, darkest parts of the underworld.

“Seems like the story did have a continuation,” Izuku said curiously. He tilted his head as he looked at the other panels. “What a weird thing to leave out. Maybe he did that to scare people? It looks like the angel goes to hell to retrieve his lover’s soul to rectify his betrayal.”

Katsuki looked at the last panel, and it was just that. The weeping angel was cradling the transparent soul of their dead lover and floating back to the surface. He looked at the strangely painted face of the crying angel, howling in pain. An ominous feeling like snakes slithering under his skin occurred, and Katsuki quickly felt creeped out.

“This place is the fucking worst,” Katsuki mumbled, disquieted.

He shook his head and walked over to where Koizumi was tied up. The man’s head was limp as his arms and legs were bound to the large, lavish wooden chair.

Katsuki slapped Koizumi awake with a vicious backhand. The man’s head snapped to the side and a loud groan spilled from his lips.

“Wake the hell up, you fucking disgusting pig.”

Koizumi bobbed his head and he hazily looked around, clearly disoriented. He tried to jolt forward but was held tightly in place by the brown ropes and duct tape that bound him to the chair. There was a subtle flicker of satisfaction that rang out in Katsuki’s core as Koizumi gazed up in fear.

Koizumi studied Izuku and Katsuki who were standing in front of him with their arms folded. Izuku was leaning against the table in the fancy room while Katsuki was looming over the chair.

“W-What—Where am I?” Koizumi’s groggy voice asked. He looked around frantically, darting from the doors to the walls. His desperation quickly turned to distaste when he caught sight of the three dead bodies on the floor, blood pooling around them. His eyes then snapped back up to Katsuki and he glared sharply. “Where’s Peter, you fucking vermin?”

“We were sort of hoping you’d tell us that,” Katsuki said casually. He reloaded his gun while looking down at Koizumi. “Seems like your lover exited somewhere—but the building is on lockdown so he couldn’t have gone far.”

Koizumi chuckled darkly. “You two imbeciles. He’s probably going to the control room to get the—”

“—Override key?” Katsuki interrupted. He held up the silver key by the loop on his finger and dangled it tauntingly. Koizumi’s face faltered and Katsuki cocked his head to the side. “We got that covered. No one is getting in or out of here without our goddamn permission.”

“Or over your dead bodies,” Koizumi snapped. “This building is full of armed guards.”

“Who are now dead,” Izuku rebutted tiredly. He looked at Koizumi with slight impatience as he glanced at the clock. “Your only chance of getting out of here alive is letting us know where he went. We can offer you a trade of sorts since he’s our mark and not you. We’ll let you go in exchange for him.”

Katsuki held back a smirk because Izuku was lying through his teeth.

“No.” Koizumi shook his head and frowned until the lines on his face pulled tightly. “I’m never going to let you two go and slaughter him.”

Izuku walked up to him, leg still slightly limp and crouched down to Koizumi’s eye level.

“You would die for him? After he left you here?” Izuku asked coldly. “Is that really someone you want to protect?”

“I love him. I would give my life for him.”

“And I’m sure he’s counting on you to do just that,” Izuku said with pity. “You’re disposable to him. He didn’t even look back when he fled.”

“You don’t know anything. He’s going to come back for me because he loves me.”

“Are you sure about that?”

There was no answer. Koizumi’s face twisted with sincere doubt.

Katsuki could tell Koizumi wasn’t sure if that was true. He had been abandoned by the man he loved, traded in for his own life while Moore would go home to his waiting wife and continue on like nothing happened if he made it out of here alive.

Gradually, Koizumi began chuckling and hung his head. His weathered body shook with his eerie laughter, slipping into a spiral of doubt. When he looked back up, his hateful dark eyes mimicked voids of endless loathing. They were saturated with turmoil and spite.

Then as Koizumi stared at Izuku, the slashed part of Izuku’s suit fell forward once more.

The flap of material limped down and revealed Izuku’s ‘217’ tattoo for Koizumi to see. Izuku hastily slapped the cut piece of material back over his skin, but it was too late.

“Wait—that tattoo,” Koizumi whispered, sounding astonished. His eyes inched wider and wider by the second and Izuku looked like he committed a grave mistake. “I recognize that type of tattoo. You’re from the Viper Academy. Aren’t you?”

Katsuki frowned in confusion as Koizumi started laughing more. The laughter became dripped in sarcastic, cruel undertones that made icicles form along Katsuki’s spine. Koizumi’s dark eyes dug into Izuku like he found an old wound that he was ready to rip open for pure enjoyment.

“Oh. You poor, pitiful creature,” Koizumi continued with an unhinged smile. “This makes an unbelievable amount of sense now. Let me guess, One is upset with Peter for cutting our deal with him and telling him to go to hell? Did One put a kill order on Peter because they have to find the next round of kids themselves?”

Izuku didn’t say a word.

Katsuki grew disquieted at the implication.

Find kids?

Katsuki’s brain paused as he pieced it together. He sharply cut his gaze to Izuku, and the other hitman’s collective demeanor slipped slightly. Izuku’s nostrils flared, he cocked his gun and pointed it directly at Koizumi’s face.

“Tell us where Moore went,” Izuku hissed dangerously. “Now. I won’t ask again.”

“What number are you? I didn’t get a good look,” Koizumi said lazily. He seemed not to care that he was staring down the barrel of a loaded gun. “200s I think I saw? Was it above 250 or below?”

“His number...?” Katsuki whispered carefully.

217.

Katsuki's stomach turned.

"I said tell us where Moore is," Izuku demanded more forcefully. He pressed the end of the gun between Koizumi's eyes. "Quit trying to talk around this."

"Ah, right. 217. You're below 250," Koizumi continued. He smiled with all his bloodied teeth, mocking Izuku. "That means you were one of Peter's first deals when his father handed him the torch of the White Dove business, say…about twenty-three years ago? Did I get that correct? You look about the right age."

Izuku's hand shook, and his face twisted with sheer anger. "Shut up—"

"—No. Let him speak," Katsuki said suddenly.

A piece of Katsuki was twisting and his eyes were wide at what was being said. Katsuki grabbed the end of Izuku's gun and peeled it away from Koizumi's face. Izuku nervously swallowed. Through their connection at the weapon, Katsuki could feel small shakes and tremors.

"When you say deals, you mean kidnapped," Katsuki corrected, sickened.

He thought about the people in the cages with sunken eyes, screaming out for loved ones.

"No. I actually mean sold," Koizumi spat out unkindly.

"If that's his number, then his mother sold him to Peter when he was under the age of five because she couldn't handle taking care of a child, needed money, and wanted a discreet way to continue on with her life. At the time, we were helping parents who had some unfortunate life circumstances start over by getting rid of children they couldn't or simply didn't want to take care of. Not all took the offer to give us their kids. But some did—seems like his mother did. Which means he's the 217th child to be sold to the Viper Academy."

Katsuki whirled his head to Izuku who's eyes were wide and glossy.

Tears were threatening to spill any second as his shaking grew worse. Quickly, Izuku snapped out of it. He violently snatched his gun out of Katsuki's hold and took a large step backwards, unable to meet Katsuki's eye. He snapped his mask off his face like it was suffocating him.

"I've heard so much about you band of fucking homicidal brats," Koizumi teased with amusement. "Which one are you? Are you a regular for hire or part of the Viper Seven? Perhaps the viridian viper? The horned viper? Or the double headed viper?"

Katsuki took one look at Izuku and knew which one he was.

"There's so many more of you, but those are the ones I hear graduated top of their class," Koizumi continued. "I always wanted to see how Peter's first shipment grew up. You all were so tiny when I picked you up that day."

Katsuki's chest wretched painfully as the truth slammed into his body: Izuku was trafficked.

The horrific, petrified expression on Katsuki's face must've been potent because Koizumi began to laugh again. This time the chuckle was crazed and the trafficker's whole body shook with twisted delight. Both Izuku and Katsuki stood still, too stunned to speak. Koizumi hummed happily, soaking up the disturbed expression on Katsuki's face.

Katsuki studied Izuku's shoulders. Waves of uncontrollable tremors raked up and down Izuku's body.

"What? Is this news to you?" Koizumi taunted Katsuki. Wide, mortified scarlet eyes tore away from Izuku to the man in the chair. The twisted man was smiling past the blood trickling from his nose. "You must not be from the Viper Academy then, you're far too stunned. But I'm curious, you two are killing partners and you didn't know he was groomed for this?"

The words stung like a swarm of wasps digging into his heart.

Katsuki had to take a step back when a familiar, depraved feeling clawed at his sternum. It rumbled and pushed against his chest, beckoning to break free from the imprisonment of his self-control.

In rapid succession, every memory of Izuku flashed before Katsuki's eyes.

He saw young Izuku, smiling and laughing with him all the time with purple bruises. He saw the busted lips and the way his face would sink whenever the clock would hit 22:22. It all rushed past him at lightning speed without the delicate romanticization. Now he could clearly see the dark pieces stick out like jagged edges, and they cut him deep. He saw Izuku's soft smile in Vienna and how sad he looked after killing Rin Hiryu. Then finally, he saw all the moments they had shared in Okinawa and the intimate night they had in the pale moonlight.

His world tipped on its head.

Katsuki walked over to Izuku and carefully placed his hands on his trembling shoulders. Automatically, Izuku flinched. Out of fear or shock Katsuki wasn't sure and that only fed the clawing that was growing harsher inside his chest.

"Izuku. You're shaking," Katsuki whispered.

Katsuki turned Izuku around, forcing them to meet eyes. Shame was painted all over Izuku's face. The tears that had been holding on for dear life in his eyes earlier had spilled down his freckled cheeks. He stared around the room, clearly caught off guard.

"S-Sorry. I—" Izuku started. He stopped and his face twisted in hurt. He hung his head away from Katsuki. "G-Give me a minute to re-balance and I'll be fine."

"Is what he said true?" Katsuki asked slowly. His grip on Izuku's shoulders tightened when Izuku didn't answer. "Tell me it's not fucking true," he desperately whispered through his gritted teeth and his nostrils flared. "You chose this life…right? You weren't forced into it?"

Izuku tried to pull away, but Katsuki dug his fingers into Izuku and forced their eyes to meet. "Izuku. Answer me."

"I—I didn't want you to know." Izuku's voice shattered.

Katsuki's heart broke in half and out crawled a monstrous entity.

He could feel it rumbling and clawing deep in his core. The urge was so potent and poured out over him as he thought about Moore and Koizumi. He wanted them to bleed. He wanted them to fucking suffer for what they had done. Scarlet eyes darkened into swirling pools of blood and a vicious snarl pulled on Katsuki's lips.

"...Go sit down until you stop shaking," Katsuki instructed calmly.

Izuku made a confused face but did as he was told. He sat down slowly into the plush cushion of the chair while looking at Katsuki slightly baffled. He wiped his tears.

Blazing scarlet eyes cut sharply towards Koizumi.

Katsuki's shoulders squared out, his scowl deepened and the depraved being inside of him began smiling with all its sharp teeth. With meticulous consideration, Katsuki weighed his gun in his hand and decided it wouldn't do. He put it back in his holster.

He walked slowly, keeping his eyes trained on Koizumi in the quiet room. When he stopped, he was standing in front of the wall full of baseball merchandise. He surveyed the precious collection of signed baseball bats that were hanging up under spotlights.

Katsuki reached for the heavy metal one.

He weighed it in his hands. Heavy. Dense. Exactly what he wanted. His cold eyes read the black signature on it that spelled out 'To Koizumi, thanks for coming out to the game!' in neat handwriting.

"I see you're a person who likes baseball," Katsuki said casually. He stepped back and gave the bat a test swing with perfect form and full strength. It cut through the air sharply. "Y'know, I'm a big fan myself. I have a couple of bats at home too. One is called Ground Zero, and the other one is called DynaMight."

He swung the heavy item over his shoulder and sneered in Koizumi's direction. He walked back over to stand in front of him, other hand clenched in a tight fist.

Izuku stared, confused but intrigued.

"You two really are insane," Koizumi said tiredly. "Why are you talking about baseball—"

"Just sharing some facts since you seem to like to." Katsuki squatted down low and tightened his grip on the baseball handle. "But I'll get to the point. I'm a hitman, and you're keeping my mark from me. I hope you don't think you can wait this out and believe this will be over if you get free somehow." Katsuki lowered his voice to a menacing tone. "I specialize in tracking and torture. It's a selling point of my portfolio that I never leave a loose end."

Koizumi scoffed. “Are you gloating about being a murderer—”

“—Only as much as you’re gloating about being a human trafficker,” Katsuki spat back. He stood up and lowered the bat off his shoulder. “But I’m warning you what will fucking happen if you don’t cough up where Moore is right now.”

“I’m not telling trash like you anything.”

“You need to be mindful of how you fucking speak to me,” Katsuki warned darkly. He held up the end of the bat and tilted Koizumi’s chin to look at him. Crazed scarlet eyes gazed down into the man’s soiled soul. “I’m a fucking sadist at the end of the day. I’ve worked in this field for nearly ten years. It’s hard not to enjoy it a tiny bit—especially when it’s scum like you. Hell, I’m so cruel I’m sure you might’ve heard of me.”

“No.” Koizumi leered. “I don’t think I have heard of an arrogant, blond hitman.”

Katsuki cocked his head. “The Scarlet Eyed Killer.”

Then like a switch, recognition sparked along Koizumi’s face. His age lines tightened when his eyes grew wide and there was a flood of disbelief then finally the horror set in. Katsuki smirked maliciously and pushed the bat further into the pale neck, but only enough to cause some discomfort. He enjoyed the way the blood from Koizumi’s mouth trickled down his pale, trembling neck.

“Ah. There it is—the fear,” Katsuki mocked.

He applied more pressure until Koizumi choked.

“So, you have heard of me. I’m sure you know then, I’m the person gangsters request by name when they need someone handled and want them to fucking feel the agony in every single bone. I don’t do the job without pain unless instructed.” Katsuki leaned down and smirked menacingly an inch away from Koizumi’s face. “And guess what? I wasn’t fucking instructed to for this assignment.”

In a swift movement, Katsuki leaned up and reeled back.

He gripped the handle of the bat with both hands and swung full force with all his rage into Koizumi’s knee cap. An ear shattering scream was punched out of Koizumi as his bones broke under the sheer strength. Koizumi began struggling and screaming desperately. In the process, he tipped the chair over on its side, and Koizumi tried to crawl on his side out of his restraints.

Katsuki unkindly kicked the man on his back with all his leg strength. He felt his foot punch deep in Koizumi’s stomach to the point the man gagged like he was going to vomit. The chair turned from the force, putting Koizumi on his back again, groaning in pain.

Katsuki snarled and pressed his foot on Koizumi’s bobbing neck. He applied all of his weight until the man went deliciously purple in the face and his eyes bulged wide much to Katsuki’s satisfaction. He dug his heel in further, resisting the urge to stomp Koizumi's pearly white teeth in when he realized he still needed him to talk.

He stepped in on the pale throat like a footrest as he landed another devastating blow to Koizumi's other knee cap. All his disgust, rage, and blood lust fueled his swing as he dug his heel into Koizumi's throat until the man started violently coughing.

"Next is your goddamn rib cage," Katsuki growled. "Be wise with your next words when you open that filthy mouth of yours."

He lifted his foot off Koizumi's neck and the man began sobbing instantly.

Tears streamed down his face as his mind, no doubt, was blank with thought numbing pain. Katsuki counted to ten for a possible answer for Moore's whereabouts, tapping the bat against the floor next to Koizumi's head with each number. But nothing came as Koizumi gasped for air. Katsuki shook his head and took his stance again. He landed another hard blow, this time directly to Koizumi's heaving chest.

The sound of ribs breaking mixed with another scream. The noises bounced off all the dense walls in the room as Koizumi coughed up blood in spurts. The dark liquid trickled down the sides of his lips. Katsuki 'tch'd, disgusted as Koizumi gagged to breathe.

"If you don't tell us where he went in the next minute, I'm going to smash your skull in," Katsuki warned serenely. "And trust me, I'll have fucking fun doing it."

Katsuki dragged the bat up to Koizumi's chin and rested it there for a thoughtful moment. Koizumi looked at the door, as if waiting for Moore to come back and save him. But no one arrived. The ticking clock inched tick by tick as all three of them waded in time.

Katsuki saw despair enrapture Koizumi's face right before he reeled back again and swung.

"—W-Wait!" Koizumi hoarsely yelled right before the bat nearly collided with his jaw.

Both Izuku and Katsuki froze.

"I-I know where he went. I-I can tell you—" Koizumi began coughing violently.

The battered man choked up more blood, gargling the dark liquid as he attempted to talk. He sobbed and a tear raced down. Koizumi screwed his eyes shut as he struggled to breathe and mumble. His words were so minced that neither one of them could understand what he was attempting to say.

Katsuki decided to have a lick of mercy. He bent down and lifted the chair back upright to prevent the man from drowning in his own blood. Koizumi spat out large gushes of crimson liquid onto his own lap as he violently shook. He heaved through his broken chest as he stared at the floor. Katsuki pondered what was hurting more, his broken body or his broken heart?

"If I tell you where he is, will you let me go?" Koizumi asked, riddled with despair. "I'll say I never saw you."

“Of course,” Katsuki lied, humoring him. “Now, where is he?”

“There’s a secret safe room in the basement of this building off the charts, in case something like this was to happen,” Koizumi confessed. “It’s in the closet labeled ‘SR’. You’ll open it and it appears like a normal custodian closet. But if you pull back this piece of wood on the side, there’s a hidden door. He’s possibly waiting there for more of his men to come. You can only get in and out with a key he and I have. I-It’s in my pocket.”

Katsuki reached forward and dug in Koizumi’s blood-soaked pocket. Just like he said, there was a small golden key.

“Now.” Koizumi coughed and spat out blood onto the ground. “Can I go? I’ve been humiliated enough.”

Katsuki pocketed the key and circled to stand behind Koizumi. He put down the bat and unsheathed his blade. It shone in the dim, red lighting of the room. In the reflection he saw his bloodthirsty eyes staring back at him. They were furious, angry and called to him to make sure he made it hurt.

Katsuki finally lifted his head and locked eyes with Izuku.

Izuku was sitting there, astonished. He even seemed possibly impressed—taken back in a good way. A piece of Katsuki was afraid Izuku had seen his cruelty and would think of him differently, but after what was revealed—this kill was different. Violent vermilion eyes met vindictive viridian. Understanding was exchanged and Izuku looked at him with a subtle, thankful expression.

Katsuki placed a hand on Koizumi’s shoulder to steady him as he pressed the blade at his throat.

“The murder or the suicide?” Katsuki asked Izuku.

A litany of confused sounds erupted from Koizumi. He wheezed out his last words that were bargains for his life. Money. Women. Men. All the shiny things in the world that glittered gold, but Katsuki was only interested in seeing him bleed red. The voracious side of Katsuki ate up every sob and cry. It fed into his satisfaction that this scum was begging for his life at his hands. Katsuki gripped Koizumi’s hair and yanked on it to keep him still as he held the blade into his bobbing throat.

Izuku’s face flashed with some level of pity. But that notion was swept away the longer he looked at Koizumi begging for his life.

“The suicide,” Izuku whispered. “Let him have his tragic ending for his tragic love.”

Katsuki smirked and Koizumi screamed more.

“I think that’s a perfect ending for his story, darling.”

Katsuki slit Koizumi’s throat while holding eye contact with Izuku.

The secret room was exactly where Koizumi said it was. When they pulled open the door, there they found Peter Moore, cowering in the corner of the dark room.

"Koizumi? Is that you?" Moore's shaky voice asked. "I-I called for backup, they should be here any moment now. Sorry I left you! I had to get to a place to call to make sure people came."

Katsuki flicked on the lights. Horror painted Moore's face at the sight of the blood splattered hitmen standing calmly at the doorway. Katsuki rested the bloodied bat on his shoulder and Izuku calmly cleaned his dagger.

"Sorry," Katsuki said cruelly with his blood stained smirk. "We're not your lover, but we have come to collect your heart."

Izuku lifted his dagger and expertly slung it in Moore's chest. The king pin's eyes went wide as he looked down at the sharp metal lodged in his heart like he was a piece of cheap wood. The wound bled red all over Moore's white suit, soaking through. The liquid crawled into the fabric, covering the golden dove pin with a deep red. He started convulsing as blood spurted up from his lips.

Moore's last words were a mixture of calling out to his wife and Koizumi that he loved them.

It took them longer than Katsuki thought to stage the scene and properly cover their tracks. A sprinkle of sunrise crept through the windows as they worked. They wiped the security cameras of evidence and strategically placed bodies to look like a fierce coup. An even number of men on both sides, violently killed in a shootout. In the process, they found a blade that matched the structure of Izuku's to put in Koizumi's cold hands.

In the end, they placed Moore and Koizumi side by side, Romeo and Juliet style to sell the scene. The stage was set to look like Koizumi had stabbed Moore in the heart then slit his own throat directly after in a brutal, final scene of their love affair.

As they did this, Katsuki was elated.

It warmed his heart to know these criminals were gone, wiped clean from fate's slate. However, he couldn't shake how disturbed he was by what Koizumi revealed. No amount of blood lust could make that go away, and the more they moved away from the assignment—that fact weighed down heavier. Izuku was a victim of trafficking and he had been sold into a bloodied life against his will.

Izuku was quiet and refused to meet his eye.

He nearly seemed ashamed and there were tears clinging to the edge of his eyes as they cleaned any stray blood splats off the walls. When they changed into their hiking attire and exited the scene, the mood shifted drastically.

The sun was peeking up from over the horizon now, spilling hues of burnt orange and golden yellow across their skins. They trekked deep into the woods on the other side of Ie Island, far away from headquarters and near the more deserted regions. Izuku was walking ahead of him clumsily, pushing away branches and leaves from his face. Every motion he did held frustration, anger, and there were tiny sobs leaking out from his mouth.

It was painful, listening to that.

Katsuki's whole chest felt like a bomb had exploded inside of it, and all the wreckage contained within him was unsalvageable.

"Why didn't you tell me?" Katsuki didn't recognize his own voice. It was broken, hurt. "Izuku, why didn't you fucking tell me? I feel like a goddamn idiot. All this time."

He could see young Izuku smiling and how the freckled man acted like an innocent child at the tiny things like baking. Relaxing. Dancing on the boat. Making fucking smores. Enjoying reading his romance novels—saying how he thought a life like that would be nice. All the memories twisted painfully, and tears pushed at the back of Katsuki's eyes at the thought that Izuku would have to go back.

"You weren't supposed to know," Izuku whispered through his gritted teeth. "No one is supposed to know that."

"But why not tell me?" Katsuki shot back. He tried to rush forward and stop Izuku who simply yanked himself out of his grasp. "Izuku, don't fucking do that!" He snapped.

He grabbed Izuku more forcefully this time and spun him around. He made them stand still in the middle of the dim forest with the sounds of the birds chirping beautifully for the wrong moment. Katsuki's tears started pouring when Izuku finally met his gaze. Izuku was shattered. His face was full of steady streaming tears, rims puffy as his body began to shake.

"Wh-Why couldn't you tell me?" Katsuki asked. His grip on Izuku tightened. "You were fucking trafficked—And, this whole fucking time we talked about doing this job for survival but you didn't have a fucking choice."

"I do do this job to survive," Izuku said woefully. He whipped out of Katsuki's hold and glared defensively. "What do you think would happen to me if I refused? I'll end up how Hiryu did in Vienna—hunted down by everyone I grew up with because that academy forces people to not have a lick of empathy. None of us have a real choice. But the only choice I do have is to make sure I live."

Izuku's tears finally broke through like a dam.

He cried heavily and his face twisted full of sorrow. This was the first that Katsuki ever saw Izuku weep like this.

"But I didn't want you to know." Izuku's voice was scratchy and hoarse. "I-I didn't want you to think I was fucked up and taint your memories like you had said that day. I didn't want you to think the boy who saved your life was just some psychopath in training. You saw how you reacted when I called you Kacchan the first time by mistake. Why would I willingly tell you I was raised to kill?"

Katsuki winced and his heart shattered further.

Izuku cried softly and pressed his hands into his eyes. "I wanted you to think I was normal like you—pretend I was the regular person I'm not. Is that so bad?"

"I'm not normal, Izuku," Katsuki whispered. He stepped forward. "I shouldn't have said that to you. I lashed out and I don't think that of you at all. I'm the furthest fucking thing from normal but I—I don't know what to think about the fact you were sold into this. I chose this life. That's far more fucked up than someone who didn't get a say in it. I woke up one day willing to kill. You never did."

"That's not true." Izuku shook his head and stepped back. "In my type of program, you're trained to kill. You get bloodlust instilled very young," Izuku said seriously. "I woke up one day willing to kill just as much as you were—but the difference is I didn't have regular feelings like you. You did it out of desperation with your back against the wall. I did it because it was a Thursday afternoon."

"But that's not fucking fair to you. You should get a choice."

"Life isn't fair!" Izuku nearly yelled. "It never has been because not everything is about free will, Katsuki! It doesn't matter if I was trafficked or not—I am still a killer. All my life I have only pretended to be a normal person, mimicking what I see in those books and movies. I have no clue how to be in love or be kind. I pretend like I am because when I read, I-I think it might be nice. B-But I don't even know if I'm capable of it outside of pretending. So, it doesn't matter if I was trafficked, if police showed up at my door they're not going to let me go because of some sob story. They would think I'm better off dead because it's too late for me."

Katsuki's eyes softened as he stared at Izuku's tear stained face.

"You're more than capable of being kind, Izuku. I'm living proof of that."

Those were the words that broke a fragile part of Izuku.

"I know." Izuku chuckled sadly and clutched above his heart. "A-And that's what's confusing. When I'm with you, I've never felt like I was pretending. In Tokyo, I cared for you so much I knew it was real. B-But, I lost it after you left. Then when we met in Vienna, even though I didn't know it was you—I felt a flicker for a while. I pitied you, and I hadn't pitied anyone for a long time until Vienna. A-And now, h-here in Okinawa, I feel like I actually lo—"

Izuku's words halted. His eyes grew sadder.

A gust of wind blew.

"…Why am I telling you this?" Izuku whispered distantly. "We're never going to see each other again." His smile twisted into the saddest thing Katsuki had ever seen. "You're going to go live the normal life you deserve in the countryside and I'm going to go back to my family in Tokyo. I-It doesn't matter how I feel."

Katsuki reached out, trying to stop Izuku when he took off deeper into the forest again. He was tipping, clearly drowning in his dark ocean of thoughts.

"Izuku, wait—shit," Katsuki cursed when he nearly tripped over a root. He looked up to see Izuku disappearing quickly away from him. "Izuku! Wait!"

"—No. I'm d-done." Izuku shook his head and walked further. "This is done. I-I can't keep looking at you. It's starting to feel like I'm torturing myself with something I'll never really have. W-We should part ways early, I promise I'll send you what you need for the divorce, but I c-can't do th-this. You weren't supposed to know—"

Katsuki rushed forward, pulled by the part of his heart that didn't want to be separated from Izuku. He grabbed onto the weeping man, who was suffering from his own overwhelming panic.

Izuku struggled against him, and once again it all felt familiar. Familiar like the last eight years of assignments. Familiar like the rose garden. Familiar like they always were a push and pull of desperate forces compelled towards each other. But in this instance, it was unfamiliar in the sense that for the first time, Katsuki knew he could never let go again.

They stepped in tandem in the tussle, and part of the ground cracked under their weight.

It happened quicker than either of them could think.

Izuku gasped when the ground underneath his feet gave out. He slipped backwards uncontrollably, and Katsuki yelled in sync with him as he went toppling forward, breaking through the surface.

Katsuki knew this feeling.

He had felt it in his dreams, and it was just as terrifying to feel it in reality. They were free falling in darkness and it was utterly suffocating. His vision was useless and all around him echoed the sounds of breaking branches and leaves. Izuku clung to him, petrified. When they slammed into the bottom, the sound of several bones snapping breached Katsuki's ears.

Izuku screamed at an ear shattering octave.

Katsuki's whole world was disoriented in a dizzy spin. His vision was dark. His body hurt and there were little chokes and cries coming from underneath him. The desperate sounds forced him to register that he had landed directly on top of Izuku, who broke his fall. But in the process—he broke Izuku. Katsuki scrambled off, mortified when Izuku bawled in pure pain.

Dirt, twigs, and leaves fell all around them like confetti. Katsuki hastily looked around.

They were in a pit. A fucking hole in the middle of the forest.

Izuku was struggling to sit up as he attempted to roll on his side. Nausea rocked through Katsuki when he caught sight of Izuku's ankle, it was twisted in a sickly direction it shouldn't have been. Izuku looked down at it, and another agonizing sob escaped him.

"Katsuki." Izuku curled into the dirt. "M-My leg—"

"Don't move," Katsuki said hastily.

He sat up on his hunches frantically looking around the pit's dirt floor. He saw several branches and decided they would do. Ignoring his own pain, Katsuki took off his backpack and picked up one branch. He snapped it in two on his knee. He tried his best to work quickly, Izuku's whimpering was getting progressively worse. Katsuki worried what other parts of his body were possibly broken from the drastic fall.

Katsuki took his shirt off and ripped it in two. He shoved one half of the cloth in Izuku's mouth and began to properly position himself.

"This is going to hurt," Katsuki warned. "On three, okay?"

Izuku nodded and screwed his eyes shut.

Without bothering counting to three, Katsuki immediately shifted Izuku's ankle in proper positioning. Izuku screamed into the cloth and the feeling of several broken bones rolled under Katsuki's fingers. He winced. It was much fucking worse than a simple twisted ankle, bones were probably cracked, shattered and disordered. Izuku needed extreme medical attention.

Katsuki tried to ignore how it hurt him to hear Izuku's muffled cries as he made a makeshift splint for Izuku's ankle. He wrapped his piece of torn shirt around Izuku's throbbing ankle and the two branches. He tied it tightly enough and it broke his heart to see Izuku's wrecked face. The other man's fingers were digging into the dirt, and he looked as though he was stuck in multiple types of agony.

Katsuki finished and gave Izuku the painkillers in his backpack. He positioned himself against the dirt wall of the pit and pulled Izuku between his legs. Whimpers, hisses, and whines fell from Izuku's lips as he was hoisted up to rest against Katsuki's chest. Strong arms wrapped around Izuku's torso to keep him upright as his head tilted back on his shoulder.

When Izuku seemed steady enough, Katsuki finally tore his attention away from him. He stared up, fucking baffled.

They were extremely far down, so far below the surface that the opening above looked like a measly little circle. The sun was seated fully in the sky now, shining down on them tauntingly. There was no possible way to climb out and the trap had been covered up so well, it had to be dug on purpose.

This was most likely laid out by goddamn Moore in his human trafficking schemes. Katsuki hadn't realized how far they had gone into the forest on the island, but apparently it was far out enough Moore and his associates felt comfortable to lay traps to kidnap people.

"I forgot for a second this place could have been rigged like Yanbaru," Izuku said, tiredly. "I should have been more careful."

"Even in death that bastard is a pain in the ass." Katsuki scowled. He picked several twigs and leaves out of Izuku's messy curls. He tried his best to rub the dirt off of the freckled face. "We should call someone to come. It won't mess up our alibi."

They did just that—but when they tried their cell phones there was no signal.

Of course, Katsuki thought sourly. The fucking booby trap would fall right out of cell-phone bounds.

"I guess we're stuck here until someone shows up," Katsuki said wearily. "How's your leg?"

"It hurts so much," Izuku said, voice riddled with pain. "I don't think I've ever broken my ankle like this."

"I think it's shattered in a couple of places," Katsuki said while examining it. "You're not going to be able to walk on it for at least a couple of months."

Izuku made a disgruntled sound like that was very bad news. Katsuki could feel him stiffen and it hurt his goddamn chest to think about what was causing Izuku fear. He held him tighter for more than one reason.

They didn't speak for a long stretch.

Time passed by enough to make Katsuki feel the bitterness of his regrets. This put all his interactions with Izuku in a new, horrifying light. Broken bones. Busted lips. The abandonment. The failed plan to run away. That last bit was the worst. It made his guilt multiply to the point he swore he would be crushed under its weight.

"I should've come back," Katsuki's voice broke in two as Izuku held on to him. His eyes shed tears he could no longer hold back. He needed a way to rectify this, but he just didn't know how. "I wish I fucking came back for you."

Izuku didn't say anything, he was too focused on his breathing. Blistering pain was budding all over his body.

"Do you have to go back?" Katsuki asked, his face twisted with desperation.

There was a plea of 'don't go' hanging in the air.

"I do." Izuku shook his head, exhausted. "Someone will notice if I'm missing quickly. There's not really another alternative, and it's alright. I've accepted this, Katsuki. Anything you think of in the next ten minutes, I have already thought of in the last twenty-five years of my life. It's all the same path in the end."

It wasn't right.

It wasn't fucking right.

Katsuki clenched his teeth to prevent from cursing and throwing a fit.

It was sickening to think that Izuku was surrounded all his life by blood, not by choice. Izuku took care of him as a kid, hell, even now, Izuku still somehow worried over him while they were at each other's throats. Izuku always did little things to prove he was inherently kind. But knowing Izuku was raised to have that kindness plucked from him like some rotten tooth was upsetting.

Katsuki didn't know what to do. But he knew he couldn't accept it.

"Was your surname ever Mamushi?" Katsuki questioned, horribly piecing it all together.

"Legally, that is my surname. Originally, it wasn't," Izuku answered tiredly. His eyes were closed, and his face was twisted in pain. "I found out my…my real surname was Midoriya. But Midoriya Izuku drowned in the Shinano river when he was two according to the records."

There was a small pause.

"I—I don't know why I'm telling you this," Izuku whispered. "I'm not supposed to be. If my handler found out I was acting like this I would be killed."

"Why killed?"

Katsuki swallowed and held Izuku tighter.

This was getting worse and worse as Izuku talked.

"Because I'm defective," Izuku said quietly. "My program is efficient for weeding out weak emotions that could cause problems later down the line. We are not supposed to feel like this, having a panic attack. Or worse—caring about someone who isn't one of our own."

Katsuki wondered how the latter was worse than the former. But he held his tongue as Izuku continued to spiral.

"We've been conditioned to be desensitized and detached from the outside world. Brutally. Over and over to the point I'm sure most of my brothers and sisters only find joy in bringing pain to other people. If it somehow got out that I have been showing emotions for someone outside my circles, especially since I was a kid—"

Izuku's face doubled in pain. He shifted in Katsuki's arms and shook his head.

Upon hearing those words, Katsuki considered Izuku's kindness. Specifically, he thought about the little things. How Izuku helped him with the romance issue. How Izuku woke him up from a nightmare on the first night. How Izuku gave him his pineapple on his drink when he saw that Katsuki enjoyed the fruit. His eyes softened as he reflected on his, because Izuku wasn't the picture he was painting.

"I've tried to get out before when I was younger," Izuku admitted. "Don't think I haven't. When I realized what was going on, I did try. But i-it's complicated now. I don't know anything else, and I can't leave my family behind. This is just my fate."

Fate.

Katsuki's heart hummed low. "Do you even want to do this job?"

"There's—There's not much else for me to do," Izuku said reluctantly. "Think about Hiryu. He got out and he could only find work at another place still killing. Why would I leave now? I know it's hard to understand, but the people I grew up with are my family, and I'm comfortable with them now. It's complicated but we do all care for each other in a twisted way and I-I'm not miserable. We have good moments together, and I'm taken care of really well by my big brother despite everything."

Big brother.

Katsuki had to resist scowling.

Now he could deduce Izuku's 'big brother' was another trafficking victim he was close with. Like Izuku said, it was twisted—but it was his life.

"How did that type of program go under the noses of the police in Tokyo?" Katsuki asked as he held Izuku closer. "Some law enforcement had to know. Fucking someone had to realize what they were doing to kids."

"The city of Tokyo is aware." Izuku laughed brittlely. "Specifically, the governor of Tokyo. My class was his special investment so he could have personal trained assassins. He's not in direct contact anymore since he's chosen who he wants. He bought them a long time ago off the Academy, but he still keeps a close eye on the operations."

It all clicked together when he thought about the information in his red folder.

Government officials—the fucking governor. That was his company's client.

He cursed loudly and threw his head back against the dirt wall behind him. He screwed his eyes closed when it all made so much fucking sense. The shady government officials put a hit on Moore because of a poor deal. Izuku's handler put a hit on Moore because of the same reason—they were hired to kill him on the two separate sides of the same coin.

Izuku whimpered in pain again when he shifted.

Katsuki hesitantly lifted a hand to stroke Izuku's hair. He did this over and over to calm Izuku, but to also ease himself. Eventually, Izuku fell asleep from the painkillers and exhaustion.

In contrast, Katsuki was staring blankly at the other side of the pit, struggling to absorb the information.

His heart was hammering painfully fast.

Eventually, the police raid occurred. It was perfectly timed really.

After the Special Assault Team infiltrated the warehouse, they found a bloodied scene that puzzled them. After closer investigation, and interrogating the victims inside, it was chalked up to a trafficking deal gone wrong. A sudden coup to take the White Dove business in a fit of passion and jealousy by Minoru Koizumi.

Katsuki stayed awake while they were stuck in the pit together. He placed a hand over Izuku's rapidly beating heart. The smaller man was in and out of sleep, struggling not to further irritate his injuries. The distinct sirens of the Special Assault Team inched closer and Katsuki immediately began screaming from help at the top of his lungs, playing the role of the distraught husband.

But it wasn't much of a facade anymore, was it? As he screamed for help, he was slammed with the fact that this emotion was very real. He was desperately worried over Izuku for more reasons than his broken ankle, and the man was his husband legally.

Footsteps and the sounds of dogs rushing towards them was the biggest relief to Katsuki. A flashlight shone down on them, and he squinted. Izuku roused awake, covering his eyes and looking up to their saviors.

"Bakugous?" Shouto yelled down, clearly horrified. "Hang tight! We're going to get you out of there!"

He rushed off before either him or Izuku could answer.

More people came, and they were retrieved from the pit easily. Izuku's whole body was taut with pain and Katsuki didn't doubt that he had whiplash himself. His neck was horribly stiff as they finally made it above the surface again. The morning air was sweet and refreshing in comparison to the damp, suffocating feeling of the pit.

The first people he saw were Shouto and Inasa. They were calm, collected and surgically professional in their tones now. There were no pink and purple vacation shirts or flip flops. Instead, all the resort gear was replaced with navy-blue detective's uniforms and shining badges hanging around their necks.

"Follow me," Shouto said, sounding panicked. He looked wearily at Izuku's damaged body and winced at the swollenness of his ankle. "There's emergency medical attention at the bottom of the mountain, let's get you there quick."

Katsuki carefully hoisted Izuku in his arms, and Izuku wrapped his arms around his neck and leaned into him. There was a great sadness in his motion as he stayed quiet, soaking up their last moments together.

Shouto gestured for him to follow him out of the density of the forest. As they walked, Shouto awkwardly smiled at them both.

“Weird way to tell you guys, but I’ve actually been undercover,” Shouto confessed and Katsuki had to act surprised. “I was here to investigate an underground trafficking scheme called the White Dove. It’s run by a very shady family, and they’ve been slipping authority grasp for a long time. We had finally narrowed in on them this week after getting inside intel.”

“Wow, that’s awful,” Katsuki said in a fake tone. “Did you catch the guys?”

“Well, they seemed to have been killed,” Shouto said seriously. “Ironically, a lovers’ quarrel it seems like. That is what the witnesses who were rescued are saying.”

Katsuki nodded, relieved that their presence was undetected. He knew it would be. If he was anything, it was thorough, but it was reassuring to hear the confirmation.

As Katsuki looked around, he could see so many different departments of crime scene investigation patrolling all over. Police dogs were sniffing up and down the forest as chaos ensued. More booby-traps were uncovered, and secret passageways that tied back to the warehouse were revealed. Some other people were even rescued from ditches. A crying woman and man had blankets tossed over their shoulders as they held their arms closely on themselves.

As they walked down the hiking trail, the sun trickled in more and more.

“Are you two alright?” Shouto asked.

“We’re okay as we can be,” Katsuki answered. “We went for a morning hike since it’s our last day before we checked out. Next thing I know, we were falling into a fucking ditch.”

“I’m so sorry that happened,” Shouto said. “I know, uh, how much you two like your forest activities. This was not a good way to end your vacation together. Definitely a little traumatizing.”

If only Shouto knew how right he was.

Shouto looked at Izuku’s dirt covered, tear-stained face. Izuku was utterly out of it, eyes distant and unfocused. He was trying to cope with his physical and mental pain that was coursing through him. Katsuki could feel his dirt covered finger pads digging into his neck. To him, it felt like Izuku was trying to communicate that he didn’t want to be separated either without voicing it. And it tugged hard on his heart.

They reached the bottom of the mountain and there was a swarm of people buzzing like a hive.

Paramedics, police and health care workers were working overtime shouting codes that he didn’t understand. All of the people who were trapped in the warehouse were free now, sobbing and having their wounds tended. Their hair was dirty, caked with dry blood and their eyes were nearly swollen shut from crying so much. Some victims had raw fingertips, likely from clawing at the cages or their skin. Others were eerily silent as their ankle bracelets were cut off of them to reveal vile lesions from the rust.

As they passed, two of the people in ankle bracelets squinted at Katsuki in vague familiarity. They focused on his eyes and there was a silent 'thank you' that was translated. However, Katsuki couldn't meet their gaze. His emotions were too out of whack that he had to close his eyes when they walked past them.

He gripped the smaller body in his arm close to his chest as Shouto led them to an unoccupied paramedic's station.

"Okay, you can get medical attention here," Shouto said. "Don't talk to anyone you see; we're investigating the crime scene."

Katsuki nodded like he didn't know what was happening. "Of course."

Izuku stayed quiet, not even acknowledging Shouto's presence. The detective noticed the distant, depressive expression and wearily looked between them.

"Is he okay?" Shouto whispered.

"He's just—" Katsuki stopped. He didn't quite know what to describe what had occurred. "He's just in pain."

"I'm fine," Izuku finally spoke up. He snapped out of his daze, and turned to Shouto with a plastic, apologetic smile. "Sorry for being so quiet, my ankle is throbbing and it's hard to focus."

"No need to apologize for being hurt," Shouto said with a kind smile.

The paramedic came up to them, gesturing with his hand to others in the background. They pointed to Izuku's ankle, and a white stretcher was brought. Katsuki felt his heart begin to pound and anxiety flushed through his veins.

The stretcher was laid out perfectly for Izuku, and Katsuki realized that when he put Izuku down—that would be it. Izuku would go back to Tokyo, they would get that divorce, and everything would continue on. Just like the way he wanted it to a week ago. However, his head was pounding in violent rejection of that as he stared around at all the victims. He kept seeing young Izuku and the number 22:22 flash on a little yellow watch in all too clear memories.

"Um, Taro?" Shouto asked.

He turned his head back to see Izuku, Shouto, and the two paramedics all staring at him like he had been asked a question. He hadn't heard it and he could barely hear anything now. The quick, pounding sound of his heart flooded his ears as he let the new facts about Izuku sink in.

“You have to put me down on the stretcher now,” Izuku said quietly, as if understanding. His hand gently caressed Katsuki’s shoulder as he looked up at him. “You have to let me go.”

Katsuki had a visceral reaction.

“No.”

Everyone stared at him, baffled.

Had he said that? Of course he fucking did. His lips moved before he could make the decision. He clutched Izuku tighter and realized fuck that. Fuck this. He looked around at everyone who was staring at him like he had said something puzzling.

“No?” One paramedic said. Her face deeply frowned and looked between the two men. “Sir, he needs medical attention right now—”

“—I mean, fuck, just hold on a damn minute,” Katsuki hissed. “I need to speak to my husband privately.”

He turned on his heel before any questions could be asked. Izuku was whipping his head between Katsuki and the medical tent, disgruntled. Katsuki walked far out of ear shot of Shouto and everyone else around them. They were now on the edge of the chaos, still trapped in the crime scene tape. Katsuki stopped and then looked down at the baffled, fuming man in his arms.

“Katsuki?” Izuku hissed in a low whisper. “What are you doing? I’m in pain—”

“—Come back with me,” Katsuki said quickly before he could change his mind.

Shock, surprise, then finally sadness set in Izuku’s face. He averted his gaze.

“I-I can’t do that.”

“Do you really think you can fucking work on assignments with as many broken bones you have right now?” Katsuki retorted. He was being pushy, holding onto Izuku uncomfortably tight like he might fade away. “What are you going to do about this, hah? Is your handler going to make you work through a broken ankle or some shit?”

“I do have sick leave believe it or not,” Izuku said with an edge. “I’m not treated like a slave. Injuries are frowned upon, but as long as I can prove I’m incapacitated, I’m allowed to have time to recover. I will just rest up before I get my next tasks.”

“Do you live alone?”

“Kind of, but what does that have to do with anything?”

“Is anyone going to help you while you recover?”

“Ye—” Izuku started and stopped. A look of realization hit him, there was a trickle of fear before he curled into himself slightly. “I-I’ll be fine. It’s not the first time I’ve broken a bone."

"I can help," Katsuki pressed and Izuku assessed him wearily. "Only until your ankle heals. I'm sure you'll fuck it up worse if you have to do shit by yourself because you're clumsy like that. I can take out the trash, clean, and all that junk." Izuku tried to object but Katsuki spoke over him. "You need someone there to help you. You're going to be on crutches, or in a wheelchair. You can't just go fucking live alone for four months."

Katsuki wet his dry lips and held Izuku closer. "Please."

He never begged.

Fixing his damn mouth to beg was foreign to him since he only ever made others plead for their lives. But he fucking had to try. He couldn't fucking let Izuku go back—not right now. He wanted more time—no. He needed more time. Maybe this was indulgent in the worst damn way, but after all of this, he couldn't let Izuku go.

He just couldn't do it.

Katsuki could see Izuku teeter on a decision. He decided to push the balancing scales by laying himself entirely vulnerable. His eyes softened in a way only Izuku could provoke.

"Let me return the favor and take care of you until your ankle is better," Katsuki whispered. "Then we can go our separate ways. I promise."

Those little words seemed to do the trick. Izuku's eyes went from weary, to wearily hopeful. There was a sparkle of longing as Izuku glanced around like he couldn't believe what he was about to say.

"I-It would be risky for me to disappear that long," Izuku muttered. "Especially with someone. Th-They can't know about us. I could get in a lot of trouble for inappropriate copulation." His brows deeply furrowed, skeptical. But Katsuki could work with skepticism.

"How risky would it be?" Katsuki asked.

"If they see me being friendly with someone I risk termination."

"I promise where we're going would be isolated. You will be safe, no one will recognize you. It'll just be me, you, and this plot of land with a garden and shit. It's private."

"It's still pretty risky," Izuku said. He considered a thought and tilted his head. "B-But—I do have a favor I could call in, I suppose. One of my brothers owes me from a long time ago when I covered for him going out of range. He could cover for me going out of range this time."

"Do it," Katsuki said.

Their eyes met and Katsuki could feel the bad decisions against his skin. He thought about what Izuku said about getting in trouble for inappropriate copulation. Ironically, that mirrored what Aizawa would say if he could see the scene in front of him now. Yeah. This was a big risk for both of them if he was being honest with himself.

“Okay,” Izuku said. He nodded his head, unsure but gradually smiled. “I’ll come back with you.”

Both men’s hearts hammered at the highest tempo possible.

Katsuki never in a million years would have guessed life would take him down this path. If someone had prophesied this scenario to him a mere eight days ago, he probably would’ve shot them in the mouth for just suggesting such a damn thing.

But here he was, walking with the very same green menace he said he would kill on sight down the streets of Tokyo. Holding his bag on top of it. They trotted down the crowded sidewalks with Izuku hopping on crutches, his ankle was casted up along with one of his wrists that the medic diagnosed as fractured.

The crowded streets of Tokyo were exactly how he recalled them. Bright, bustling, and overwhelming. The Megatron screen shined down neon colors on them in the night scene as roaring engines from cars whizzed by. There were too many bodies pressed together and no one paid them any mind. They blended in with the lively sea of people who were going about their days in the late summer heat.

As they neared where Izuku lived, the other hitman stopped short. Izuku cautiously turned to him, green eyes full of warning.

“Put on your face mask and baseball cap,” Izuku said sternly. “You said you worked for gangsters sometimes, right? You don’t want anyone seeing your face here.”

Katsuki frowned but did like he was told. He put on his black mask and baseball cap. Izuku reached up with his good hand and snapped the rim low, shielding his eyes in the shadow.

Then Izuku led him to possibly the sketchiest part of Tokyo.

It was like entering the Bermuda triangle, a place of myth that didn’t exist in the real world. He had always heard stories of this area: Hadesu.

It was a street nickname, given by the people who had lived to witness it. But no one entered and exited here the same, or so he was told.

It was larger than he thought, like an underground city veiled away from the public eye. There were people in the street playing dice, gambling, and the sweet scent of market food wafted in the air to mix with nicotine. Loud music blasted from several windows like they were in the middle of a dark club as the streets became narrower and narrower. Bright neon signs flashed with promises of pleasure and wealth.

As they walked down the dense, sketchy street, several gruff people eyed Izuku with familiarity and scrutinized Katsuki. One man with a missing eye and the meanest frown he had ever seen smiled sweetly at Izuku, who waved back. Then that one-eyed gaze sized Katsuki up, assessing if he was going to be a future problem. It felt like a million glares were digging into his skin as they walked down the cracked sidewalk.

We sure as hell aren't in Paradise anymore, Katsuki privately thought as he watched a gangster gleaming in gold walk out of some underground shop.

This was a place Aizawa and several of his colleagues had always warned him about. This is where murders and gangsters roamed free, staking their claim. It was made possible by the fact it was invisibly run by the underground Yakuza, drug lords, and gangsters who operated with politicians. None of the organized crime leaders disrupted the flow of the city, keeping all the atrocities they committed well hidden in the dark. And in return they were given this large section of the metropolis.

The pair of hitmen cut down one particular street that had several people dressed in fine diamonds and gold crawling up and down it. Their eyes were shielded by dark shades and on their hands were brass knuckles with fresh blood on it.

"Here we are," Izuku said suddenly.

They stopped in front of a high skyscraper made of reflective one-sided glass. Katsuki recognized it instantly. It was the exact building Moore and the governor stood in front of in that picture, shaking hands and cutting a red ribbon. The bastard had hung it up so proudly in his lounge like it was a lifetime achievement.

The building itself looked like an expensive apartment complex. The glass was one-sided, showing no hint of whatever was on the inside. The back of it branched out what looked like smaller buildings, and it formed the shape of a V with how long it reached. On the silver sliding doors in the front was the sigil that was stamped on Izuku's red folder: two snakes intertwining on a V.

The Viper Academy.

Izuku turned to him with a kind smile and then glanced around.

"You can't come in," Izuku said apologetically. "Go sit around the way out of sight. There's a small coffee shop, no one will bother you if you don't look at them the wrong way so keep your head down. Don't speak to anyone either. I mean anyone. There's a lot of, uh, odd operations around here and I wouldn't want you to accidentally be on someone's radar. I'm going to go pack my things for the next few months and ring in that favor."

"Sure thing," Katsuki said.

He reluctantly let Izuku take his suitcase. The smaller man struggled to maneuver his body with the large bag and his crutch. But Izuku managed. Katsuki sadly watched as Izuku limped into the shiny building, and the automatic sliding doors swallowed him whole.

Katsuki did as he was told and found that coffee shop.

It appeared like a normal cafe. Cute, aesthetic and had a good decent menu accompanied with outside seating. He ordered a medium coffee, black like his favorite color and sat down at one of the tables outside on the street. As he waited, he watched and observed the people passing by. Everyone here had to be involved in shady shit, Katsuki deduced.

It was a marvel that Izuku somehow still held on to his kindness if this is where he grew up since he was a child.

While sipping on his coffee, Katsuki sent Aizawa an update of the assignment from his laptop. He gave his standardized report of the assignment without the large, glaring detail about Izuku. He also left out the fact he was now a married man—which he would have to confront sooner or later.

He explained he had a sudden emergency to take care of at his property in Hokkaidō, which was partially true. Katsuki typed about how he would have to check in for retirement later. Aizawa would probably groan at that, but Katsuki wanted to get Izuku settled into his estate first before he came back down here. Plus, he wasn't too keen on Aizawa possibly seeing Izuku.

The kill order might not have had a folder, but his boss did not give those types of orders out lightly.

When Aizawa said kill, Aizawa meant butcher.

Right as Katsuki pressed send on his report, the loud sound of vicious dogs barking rippled into the air.

Everyone in the vicinity stiffened and jerked their heads at the sound. Some people even quickly walked in doors and others turned around from where they came. Katsuki frowned at those reactions. The fact there was fear on some of the most frightening looking peoples' faces here made him uneasy.

He inconspicuously turned his head toward the sound of the growling. Then from around the corner appeared a tall figure that oozed power in its most raw form.

His eyes were a deep red, cold like blood that had been left to cake on the ground. His hair was a unique white, tinged blue and cut sharply at shoulder length. The thick hair was pulled back into a half bun, half down to reveal his dangerously high cheekbones on his face.

Pierced eyebrows. Pierced ears. Pierced bottom lip with silver snake bites. Accompanying all of that was an endless sea of horned vipers were inked on his neck, arm and hands. The man flexed his large hands and the ripples of his skin made the river of inked snakes covering his hands and arms dance. Across his battered knuckles were the words "VIPER" and "SNAKE" in big, bold lettering.

The man's skin was so pale his veins were visible, branching all over like blue serpents underneath his skin. But what was most unsettling were the strange cracks in his face, like he had shattered and got glued back together.

Yet, despite this broken attribute, he seemed anything but.

There was something about his face that was handsome but worn. He was regal in the same manner that cracked oil paintings of forgotten emperors were. He was dressed in all black expensive clothing, silver chains that rattled, and a long black trench coat that nearly swept the dirty ground.

He leashed along three black Doberman hounds by metal chains in both of his entirely tattooed hands. On his fingers were obsidian colored snake tattoos that wrapped around each digit like rope. On his neck was similar ink work. Endless horned vipers that crawled up his pale body with their fangs bared, mimicking a necklace. His whole throat was covered in them, wrapping around his veiny skin.

People parted for him like they were in the Red Sea and he was their shadow Moses.

He walked by coolly with his head in the air like he was royalty. Eyes lifeless like a corpse and uncaring about the people around him. But it seemed like everyone else knew who he was because no one dared to breathe.

Then some drunken man stumbled out in the street and bumped right into him.

Everyone froze.

The sculpted pale face barely showed a drop of emotion. His upper lip curled, cracks moving with his porcelain skin. He lifted a snake covered hand, dropped the leash on one of his dogs, and gave a simple two-toned whistle.

Katsuki flinched and looked away from the scene when the dog attacked. Bloodied screams erupted and deep growling echoed into the night. Everyone in the vicinity turned away from the gruesome view without a word. Katsuki didn't have to watch to know the dog viciously tore through the man's flesh, the metallic smell of blood was evident. He could have sworn he even heard a bone snap in two.

Any other day Katsuki would've jumped in and stopped this. Clearly this was an extremely unbalanced punishment for fucking bumping into someone.

But he kept quiet when he glanced towards the shining building Izuku was inside of. He had his priorities, and this man wasn't worth the risk of fucking up and not getting Izuku to the countryside with him.

Then the mysterious pale man spoke in a daunting, raspy voice.

"That's enough, Atropos. Kneel."

The dog instantly obeyed, and all the disturbing ripping sounds ceased.

Katsuki dared to drag his eyes back to the scene.

The nameless white-haired man bent down and used a black hand cloth to clean the spots of blood off his shoes. He nonchalantly flicked the dirtied rag over the man's open wound like he was a trash can. It unnerved Katsuki how he didn't bother glancing down at the man he had mutilated as he grabbed his dog's leash again. Katsuki watched, unsettled, as the man lifted his black dress shoes and stepped over the pool of blood.

The drunk, mutilated man was pleading for help. But no one bothered to aid him, and Katsuki could tell that was out of fear. Whatever power this man held, it was petrifying enough to act like daggers and pin everyone in place where they stood. All eyes watched the helpless man lay on the street and bleed out—but no one dared make a move or lift their head.

When the mysterious pale man passed Katsuki by, time slowed.

That glacial gaze turned on him. A surge of lethality stabbed into Katsuki like a million needles sinking into his throat. There was something so utterly empty about this man's eyes Katsuki had never seen. Endless red voids were bottomless with absolutely nothing. The cold gaze bored into him carefully, but not long enough to truly assess him.

Katsuki somehow felt degraded simply by making eye contact.

The dangerous eyes peeled away from Katsuki like he was dirt under the man's shoe not worthy of his presence. The white-haired man passed Katsuki by without stopping his stride and turned the corner. In his wake he left a cacophony of murmurs, whispers and people checking to make sure he was truly gone.

An unwanted shiver latched onto Katsuki's skin. He concluded whoever that was, truly was really bad fucking news.

After about an hour, the bleeding man finally got someone's attention. He was dragged away to get medical help and shortly after Izuku came to the coffee shop, completely unaware of what had happened. His freckled face held a cheerful smile as he tugged along a large suitcase packed to the brim.

When he approached, Izuku glanced down at the blood-soaked concrete but didn't bat an eye. Like it was a daily occurrence. There was a twitch of embarrassment on his face as he turned back to Katsuki. He quickly buried it, not wanting to dwell on asking what happened.

"No one bothered you, did they?" Izuku asked carefully.

Katsuki stood up, eager to get the hell out of this place and finally somewhere to relax.

"Nope. I minded my business like a pro," he said. "Let's go though. I bought some last-minute train tickets, so we need to hurry to the station."

Katsuki took Izuku's suitcase for him and the two of them headed out, leaving behind the dark segment of the city. As they were walking, Izuku's mood was elevated. Green eyes were shining wide, but also making sure to look over his shoulder—as if being careful not to run into someone. When they finally exited Hadeus, Izuku looked up at him with his darling doll face.

"So, where are we going exactly?"

Katsuki exhaled and thought about a place he hadn’t stepped foot in for years.

“My mother’s home.”

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below! Questions, comments, screams, theories are all welcome! 💜 I hope you enjoyed this chapter. It is pretty much the full shift of the story into the next arcs. I'm really excited for it!

Comment from Beta Luna: I'm so happy Moore is dead. I feel like that one tiktok audio. I can't wait to go to his funeral, knowing we could have changed that outcome.

Thanks so much for reading!

Chapter 11 — Interlude II

When Katsuki was thirteen, he tried not to blame his mom.

Really, he tried his best.

He tried his best when he got on that train and left the nook. Inquisitive eyes from other civilians were crawling up and down him, staring at his tear-stained face and he clutched the tiny white note in his hands. He read that line over and over again: I love you, Kacchan. Please come back. He wished he could hear those words in reality and not read them on this dusty, forgotten piece of paper.

He tried not to blame her as he thought about the boy with green eyes he would never see again.

It wasn't her fault. Right? It wasn't.

His mom needed him, and he needed to help her. He repeated this to himself until he believed it and the simmering flame of resentment under his skin subsided.

He tried not to blame her when the food ran thin in the house and so did he. He held his emotions back from peaking dangerously. All he wanted to do was break something. Destroy the most fragile thing he could find simply because he could. It was one of the few things he did have control over: breaking things. Kicking things. Slamming the ceramic mugs against the floor. When the stinging in his eyes became too great from looking in the mirror, Katsuki broke it too.

He tried not to blame her when he could see her leave with strange men, reeking of whiskey. Her face would be pretty and flush. Her smile would be beaming. He told himself she deserved to be fucking happy for once—even if that meant he felt like he was drowning.

He tried not to blame her when his shoes started to become tattered. The holes at the bottom of his soles were evident and other places of the rubber were so thin he could feel every rock and uneven surface. He had memorized the pattern of the cracked sidewalk as he walked home by himself every day.

He tried not to blame her when he found her crying over how hard her job was. He wanted to tell to suck it up and get the fuck over it. But he knew he shouldn't. He had no clue what it was like to walk in her shoes, and he did not press it. She reassured him the bills were being paid, and that's all he could really ask for. Even if there wasn't much food—he couldn't blame her for doing her best.

But it was getting hard.

Specifically, he found it hard not to blame her on one particular day.

Katsuki had taken up doing his dumb classmates' assignments for them in exchange for money. It wasn't a lot, but it was enough to make sure he had some substance in his stomach from day to day. It helped rid himself of the lightheaded feeling he was continually plagued with.

When he announced he was doing assignment for money, most of everyone who he knew to be mediocre came to flocking to him. They had never spoken to him before. Nearly a couple days ago, he was sure he heard one girl mention he stunk. But Katsuki didn't mind or care—he needed all the money he could get. So, he did them all, sometimes even at the expense of his own schoolwork if it meant there would be food in his belly.

But on this one day, he found himself tracking down some goddamn extra who decided not to pay him what they agreed upon.

The boy had run his mouth all over school. He boasted as he spread it around that he wasn't going to pay Katsuki because he didn't believe in paying 'trash'. He even said that Katsuki was a lost cause that would die in the gutter where he bellowed with the rest of the city rats.

By the time Katsuki caught wind of the bullshit that was said, he was already planning the other boy's funeral.

The moment classes let out, the dumb fucker really thought he could outrun Katsuki. But the joke was on him—Katsuki always tracked down anyone who he needed to make pay. Katsuki had cornered the shaking boy several blocks from the school. The smaller boy was trembling, back peddling fast. But Katsuki didn't give a single rat's ass. He forcefully dragged the crying boy in an alleyway, and kicked him in the skull hard enough to make his dead ancestors feel it.

It felt good. Cathartic.

That simmering feeling in his veins erupted in that moment. He could hear that voice tell him to break the boy. Beat him until he was covered in red and never would fucking speak again. Upon analyzing these thoughts, Katsuki didn't realize how angry he had been. He got a grasp however when the full force of his swinging foot connected with solid bone.

The sickening crack was as satisfying as the broken mugs in the house.

A sharp yell violently echoed into the air as the boy's lip was split wide open, signaling he was in deep pain. This was a sign for him to stop. The boy had learned his lesson, but Katsuki wanted was to do it again and again and again—and again. When Katsuki felt that scorching anger boil sharply, he balled up his fist.

However, before he could give a full punch, the other boy screamed for him to stop and threw the money at his feet. Katsuki immediately halted and looked at the loose money on the grey pavement.

“Please! Don’t hurt me anymore! I’m sorry,” the pitiful boy sobbed. “I’m sorry. I’m so sorry.”

Katsuki’s face twisted in distaste.

But he struggled to understand the low, blue like emotion settled into him when he lowered his fist.

He felt disappointed—but he wasn’t quite sure why.

The silence swelled between them as Katsuki wrestled with the tugging emotions inside of him. One half told him to take the money and walk away. Spit on him maybe for good measure. However, there was another part of him that whispered to him to swing his fist. It spoke and said, who the fuck cared that this asshole gave him the money? Give him that black eye he deserved.

But Katsuki stayed still, shocked at the cruel nature that was itching in the back of his head.

He looked between his balled-up fist and the dirty money on the ground.

Then the loud sound of footsteps approaching snapped him out of it. He quickly picked up the yen that was ungracefully tossed at his feet, ignoring the droplets of dark red blood on the tips of his tattered shoes.

Katsuki counted the money patiently.

It was way more than they agreed upon. The poor dumbass probably just handed over whatever was in his pocket. Katsuki turned his sharp glare on the bleeding boy on the ground, grabbed him by the hem of his shirt and leered down into his face.

“You call me fuckin’ trash ever again and I’ll beat you so badly you’ll never walk after I’m finished,” Katsuki hissed menacingly. “Don’t ever ask me to write you goddamn paper for you either. Have fun fucking failing.”

Katsuki turned on his heels to walk away in the dark. He pocketed the money, went to the grocery store and bought enough food for the next two days for him and his mom.

On his walk home, Katsuki hated how this was familiar. This was beginning to feel like routine, Katsuki learned after a couple months of telling himself he needed to step up and be better for his mom.

She smiled every time he brought home some level of food, and it pleased a very specific side of him. Eventually she started leaning on him to bring in dinner after school. She questioned where he was suddenly getting the money, and he was honest with her. She gave him a sad look, and he could tell she wanted to say more but didn’t. Instead, she patted him on the head and called him a smart brat.

As he made his way home with two full bags of food, Katsuki observed all the kids his age. He tried to push back the envy he held for them. But it was difficult.

He strolled into the sterile, nearly barren apartment and it was quiet.

There was barely a sound echoing inside, and it made Katsuki frown the second he walked through the doors. Usually there would be the upbeat tune of whatever game show on the TV playing, or the sound of his mother's laughter on the phone with whatever man was up next.

But there was none. The darkness was suffocating the apartment like a thick blanket.

Katsuki put down all his bags carefully and flicked on the light switch.

However, nothing happened.

He frowned deeply and flicked the switch again. But once again, he was given the same result. A wave of panic washed over him as he stared into the darkness at the light switch.

No. He thought to himself. No, there's no way. He dove into his denial headfirst.

Katsuki attempted to walk calmly over to the next light switch, stumbling in the dark slightly. He felt it out on the smooth wall and flipped it too—but no light came. Katsuki gritted his teeth as he started erratically flipping the switch on and off. On and off, on and off, on and off, on and off, on and off, on and off—

"Fuck!" Katsuki yelled and slammed his fist next to the light switch, leaving a small dent.

He gazed around the darkness, and slowly his eyes adjusted to the blackness to see everything like dark television static surrounding him. There, he finally laid his eyes on his mother laying sadly on the living room ground. She was hunched over, leaning against their couch. Her head was tucked into her arms, and she was sobbing nearly mutely. As he grew closer, Katsuki could hear tiny little sobs. Sitting in his lap and scattered all around the living room rug were white envelopes.

Endless papers with red stamps and dollar signs.

Katsuki's heart sank when all the pieces fell into place.

He bent down slowly, face twisted in pure horror as he picked up one sheet. With shaky hands he clutched on to it. He read it, then clenched it so tightly his fingers tore through the page.

"Mom," Katsuki whispered. His voice was rocky. He tried to make it steady—but he couldn't. "I thought you said you were paying the bills?"

"I am," Mitsuki replied. "Th-The lights are just off for a little while because of building construction, sweetie. It's nothing you have to worry about! They'll be back soon. Why don't we go do your homework in the library tonight?"

Katsuki stared at her sideways and pain distorted his face. "Don't. Don't do that—don't fucking lie to me. I'm not a little kid anymore."

She lifted her head towards him, slightly dazed and he continued.

“I’ll ask again. Did you pay the bills, mom?” He repeated, a lot more forceful. He took a step forward and held up the crumpled piece of paper. “Tell me you’ve been paying the bills.”

“I have,” she murmured. Then her eyes averted. “I—I just may not have been paying all of them.”

“Mom, what the fuck—” Katsuki jeered, voice cracking on the end when his throat swelled with despair.

His eyes instantly became watery upon hearing those dreadful words. He clenched his jaw tight enough his mouth throbbed, attempting to hold in the clawing scream that was trapped in his throat. He held it in with all his will. Katsuki starred in denial as his mother who was weeping, spilling out endless apologies. Her tear-filled face was full of raw regret and hopelessness that hurt Katsuki to even look at.

All the questions he wanted to yell slammed against his closed mouth:

How could you be goddamn so irresponsible? How could you do this when you have a child? Was he not worth tending to? Was he not worth feeding and having a proper home? Why wasn’t he enough for her to love properly?

His young mind struggled to understand how she could let it get this bad.

But quickly, he buried all the blame that was burning in his body for her. He remembered his father’s last whisper once more and straightened out his back. Katsuki swallowed those heavy, unspoken questions. He let them sink to the bottom of his being like he was the dark sea, hoping to drown them out.

But he wasn’t aware at the time thoughts like those didn’t drown. They festered.

Young Katsuki took a look at his mother’s face. All he could see was grief. Her usually radiant features were darkened with the weight of living so much that he barely recognized her. He wondered if he ever felt grief like she was experiencing. Then he wondered, has he ever been given the opportunity to? But he didn’t have time to dwell on those thoughts now. He pushed back the stinging tears, refused to acknowledge his turmoil and sat down calmly.

“Let’s get this straightened out,” Katsuki whispered to himself.

One by one, he went through the endless sea of white letters.

He sorted them out with shaky hands. He organized out the ones that were coming up soon and the ones that were past due. He methodically structured it for himself and did the mental math. It was manageable. He could do this. He could get these paid. He just—

His hopes were crushed when he came across a particularly high bill. He swallowed when those stupid tears came rushing forward again. It was the rent bill and attached to it was a notice of eviction if failure to pay the full amount. Unbridled fear climbed into his body as he thought about the blistering winter against his skin. That one year of abandonment still haunted him.

He wearily glanced down to his tattered shoes. He studied the tiny blood droplets sprinkled on them.

Katsuki knew there would be no boy with green eyes this time.

“I can fix this,” Katsuki whispered. He gripped the piece of paper with deep determination. “We’ll catch up on the rent first. We can go without lights or electricity for a while, since we need the apartment to live in. But I need you to help mom, I need you to make sure to pay this if we can get the money. Alright?”

Tangible guilt rolled off his mother in tidal waves. There was internal blame clouding her eyes. She shook her head.

“Katsuki, this is nothing you should concern yourself with.”

“You’re right, it’s not,” Katsuki agreed sadly. He was too tired to be angry anymore. “But it’s something I have to concern myself with. You can’t do this by yourself. I’m old enough to see that.”

Mitsuki stayed silent for a long time. Katsuki observed in the dark room how all the emotions crashed like vicious surges across her face: guilt, sadness, and grief. He could even see longing and it was no question she was thinking of his father. Shame was the last emotion and her eyes shifted down to the floor.

“Okay,” Mitsuki whispered.

Katsuki’s fate was sealed that night, even if he didn’t know it.

The following few days, Katsuki didn’t go to class. Instead, he wandered around their town begging for some sort of job, anything really. Fucking anything.

But there was only so much a thirteen-year-old could be qualified for. He begged the elder man who owned the grocery store to let him be a clerk. But the owner told him he needed to keep his head in the books on some bullshit wise-man advice. Katsuki gritted his teeth at that. He wouldn’t be able to even go to school if they were homeless again.

He tried to explain this to everyone he talked to—but thought he was trying to trick them. They gave the bullshit excuse that they had no job for someone as young as him. Kept saying his school would be a hindrance to their daily work schedules. But Katsuki persisted.

He looked for jobs in the sun. He looked for jobs in the rain. He did every single extras’ paper he got, even if it meant he didn’t turn in his own homework for a week. He sold his entire classical music collection, and his mother was surprisingly good about saving up money at work. She even sold some of her jewelry to help make ends meet.

Maybe the pressure of guilt was good for her, Katsuki decided.

Despite working in tandem to gather as much money as possible, they barely spoke. Maybe they both were too crunched, or maybe Katsuki couldn't stand the sight of her. He didn't want to grow to resent her. So, he averted his gaze for the benefit of their relationship. Katsuki promptly ignored the crying he could hear coming from the closed door at night. In return, his mother ignored his growling stomach when he left in the morning.

After a couple of weeks, the stress in his body had strung tightly like a violin chord. He was likely to snap at any moment.

Then it all peaked the day when it came time to pay the rent.

He had woken up, not knowing that this day would be different.

He put on his wrinkled school uniform, not bothering to put on a tie as he got dressed in the dark. The sun hadn't risen yet as he headed out to walk to school. He counted the stack of essays he stayed up all night writing, making sure he had all his orders in line. They would be able to pay the rent once he gathered the money today from his peers. It was barely scraping it, but he wouldn't have to worry about being homeless for at least a couple of months.

He gathered the money at school, and he despised the way all his peers' eyes looked through him. He could tell they all looked down at him with useless pity. Some of these kids were smart enough not to need their damn papers done, but word had spread through their school about how poor he was. He gritted his teeth when the top student of his class gave him money.

When Katsuki got home that day, he had to hold back tears once more.

He was fucking angry. He was so goddamn angry and frustrated with his whole life. But he didn't know what to do because he was powerless. He was trapped here—and part of him wished he had just run away with the boy with green eyes.

As Katsuki was fantasizing about that year in Tokyo, he walked up to the apartment. Out of reflex, he pulled out the shiny silver key to unlock the door but stopped when he saw it already cracked open. The darkness seeped out like spilled ink and no noise from inside could be heard.

He furrowed his brow, confused and alerted because his mother never left the door cracked open.

She was far too paranoid for that.

A shock of goosebumps crept up his spine to the nape of his neck.

He instantly took defense. He slotted his silver key between his fingers and tightened his hand into a fist. Katsuki's heart rate began to erratically speed up. He pushed open the door, peeking inside carefully. The hallway was dark but that wasn't out of the ordinary since they had been living without lights for so long.

But as he crept inside all the way, his stomach dropped out of his body. Standing there was a strange man in a full black suit with a neat, red tie and a gun.

The barrel was pressed directly against his mother's skull as he thumbed through all their hard-earned money.

Money they needed.

His mother had her arms up, shaking in deep fear that was more potent than he had ever seen radiating off her.

Mitsuki shook her head frantically. "Please, don't do this—"

"—A mark's a mark, ma'am." The stranger's voice was even and polite as he finished counting the money. "Not personal at all. The orders were either retrieve the cash from you or have the debt repaid in taking your life. This isn't nearly enough to even put a dent in the amount that was in the folder."

"P-Please. I have a son," his mother begged. "He's only thirteen, and he doesn't have any other family besides me. I can't leave him—I c-can't leave him by himself."

"You should have thought about that before you fled without repaying what you owed."

There was no emotion in the man's eyes. He shrugged as though he had seen a mother begging for her life frequently. He pocketed all their money for himself, cocked his gun and his eyes hardened with resolve.

In that split moment, Mitsuki's and Katsuki's gazes met. She wore a ghostly look of anticipating death. Pale. Uncertain. Desperate. This was an expression Katsuki would become familiar with in the years to come.

Within the second, Katsuki's body was triggered in flight or fight.

He chose to fight.

He charged forward, swinging his heavy backpack at the man the second before the trigger was pulled. The bullet redirected into the couch instead of his mother's skull with a sharp zing. Mitsuki flinched from the metal whizzing too close and covered her head with her arms.

The weight of the hard textbooks slammed against the man's skull with enough force to make him lose his balance. The man yelled in surprise, not sensing Katsuki's presence. He turned his gun quickly on Katsuki, but Katsuki's whole body dove into overdrive. With the sole thought of getting the money back, Katsuki kicked behind the man's knees, forcing him to buckle and tackled him.

It was a blur of grunts, his mother's cries, and the sharp whirring of stray bullets as they rolled around. Mitsuki's screeches in the background could be heard as Katsuki grappled for the gun. It wasn't until Katsuki had pinned the man down on the ground did silence grace them. The man and Katsuki were in a gridlock of strength, attempting to gain control of the gun they both had a death grip on.

Young Katsuki's thoughts were frantic, erratic and pulsing with the desperate need to survive.

He needed his mother to live.

He needed to live.

They needed that money.

Katsuki's arms shook with adrenaline when the barrel of the gun started to be forced on him. Fear kicked up high and swallowed him. It was him or this man. Him and his mom or this man—

Within the next second, frightened Katsuki dug down deep inside his core.

He tapped into a searing anger that had been accumulating for years. It was molten hot. It pulsed with a litany of unforgiving whispers that demanded to make the world pay for how fucked up his life was. It wasn't fair. None of this was fucking fair. His sights locked on the man and the whispers shifted to screams telling him to make this man pay for what he was about to do.

Controlled by the deadly combination of anger and fear, Katsuki fully gripped on to this dark part of his mind. It gripped him back tenfold. The darkness gave a sharp, wicked grin that was hungry for pain and gifted him extra strength he had no idea he possessed.

Both the man and Mitsuki's eyes went wide when Katsuki let out a desperate yell. Within milliseconds, he started winning the test of strength. Mitsuki was screaming for him to stop, but Katsuki couldn't hear her. Before anyone could blink, Katsuki overpowered the man and turned the barrel on the man's forehead.

The man tried to crawl away, but Katsuki pulled the trigger.

The gunshot was quiet.

The silent bullet was the loudest thing Katsuki ever witnessed as it lodged between the man's eyes. Red blood splattered, painting across Katsuki's face. The large body went limp under him.

It didn't settle in right away.

The world stopped revolving as he took in all the small details. The metal gun in his hand was cold. The blood on his face was warm. His chest was heaving. His mother's yelling had stopped. The man's eyes were lifeless as he stared wide at the ceiling above them. Red liquid oozed out sluggishly onto their beige rug.

"Ka-Katsuki," Mitsuki whispered wearily. "Katsuki. You killed him."

Katsuki tore his eyes away from the man and glanced towards his mother.

In her hand was her phone and it was ready to dial the police. Her face was ghost pale in the dark, sunken with the weight of reality. She was trembling with fear with her hand over her mouth to stop the crying from leaking out. Her startled eyes darted between Katsuki, the gun, and the man on the ground. Katsuki followed her path of sight and the feeling of the gun in his hand suddenly was heavier than it truly was.

He looked down at the dead body underneath him and slowly shook his head in denial.

He killed someone.

He scrambled off the man, still in shock. He dropped the gun and swallowed.

When the body didn't move, what had happened settled in like a lump of scolding hot coals into his stomach.

That dark part of his core was rumbling in the shadows. Its malevolent grin was painted in scarlet as it filled his veins with satisfaction. He shook his head more, whispering to himself to snap out of it. As the adrenaline left his body, that depraved part of him faded away. It vanished back into the darkest part of his soul with a knowing smirk.

Katsuki was terrified to his bones. But he wasn't sure if he was horrified at how good he felt or horrified at the dead body. He knew the answer though, and the answer terrified him most.

He wondered if he should say sorry. Was he sorry? He searched his mind a while for this answer and found that he had no regrets.

"I-I was just trying to protect you," Katsuki reasoned.

That didn't make him a bad person, right? This man was hurting them. He was going to kill his mother and take her away from him—he couldn't have that happen again.

"You killed him," Mitsuki repeated in shock, as if trying to fully grasp the weight of what happened. She hadn't moved from her spot in the living room. "Katsuki—You killed him."

"But he was going to kill you," Katsuki hissed. He violently denied any guilt that tried to force its way in. He gestured wildly to the body on the ground. "Was I supposed to let him murder you?"

That snapped his mother out of her daze. She quickly hushed him and frantically ran to the door.

She appeared lost as she peered around, checking if anyone was nearby. There was terror etched into her face, aging her in appearance. She skittishly searched around the barren, empty hall. Katsuki knew she would find no one. Any neighbor they had was still at work. She locked the door tight and leaned against it and began to violently shake.

"I—I couldn't lose you too," Katsuki confessed. His face twisted in pain as he glanced between his mother's scared expression and the red blood seeping into their rug. Was she afraid of him? “I couldn’t lose you and dad. I-I fucking can’t do it.”

He really thought he was going to cry at that moment. The tears felt like they were there, like a dull knife uselessly cutting through a solid surface. But they never came. His mother walked back towards him in the dark, and her shoulders squared out as she regarded the man on the ground.

“We…We have to hide the body tonight,” Mitsuki whispered after a long stretch of silence. “There’s woods several hours away.”

Katsuki was dumbfounded into speechlessness.

He didn’t know what he was expecting her to say but that wasn’t it.

“Hide the body?” He parroted to be sure. “We’re going to bury it?”

She gave him a gravely serious stare. Pointed, sharp.

“Yes, Katsuki. We’re going to bury it extremely deep,” Mitsuki whispered. The edge in her voice was unfamiliar but it seemed as though she had navigated this type of darkness in a previous life. “You can go to jail for murder, it doesn’t matter if you’re a minor. You would go away for a minimum five years and I—” Her eyes softened. “I-I can’t lose you either. So, we have to pretend this never happened. We’re packing tonight and getting out of here immediately.”

Katsuki nodded slowly, realizing that yes, he had committed an extreme crime.

His mother straightened out her back and took in a deep breath. Her face was shrewd, serious like he had never seen. She nearly felt mechanical, like she had done this before as she moved through the motions. She hurried and rushed into the bathroom, leaving Katsuki alone with the bloody body on the ground.

He stared at it, studying the man’s slightly aged face for the first time.

It was then that Katsuki felt a trickle of guilt. The man suddenly seemed more human than threat now. He concluded the man was in his late thirties, like his father was right before he died. The nameless man’s skin was even pale with chocolate brunette hair the same as his father’s. The comparison made Katsuki ponder if this man had kids at home that would be fatherless just like he was.

Suddenly, the reach of a single human life was apparent to Katsuki.

He realized that this man might have friends and family that would miss him. People who loved him dearly and probably looked forward to spending time with him. He wondered what his laugh sounded like or what his favorite dish to cook was. He wondered if he brought his partner flowers on the weekend and if they did romantic dinner nights together.

But now, Katsuki had made sure none of that would ever occur again.

When his mother came back to the living room, in her arms was an array of cleaning supplies. She snapped on purple, rubber gloves with a fierce determined expression and tossed Katsuki a pair.

“Follow my lead, Katsuki. We’re scrubbing this place clean.”

Katsuki put the gloves on and listened carefully to his mother’s instructions.

Later that evening in the darkest of night, he and his mother spent quality time together for the first time in years.

He hated how he appreciated it. It was one of the few instances her eyes looked at him without underlying shame. And it was the first time he looked at her without feeling a simmering anger. They were united in bloodshed now, and Katsuki could feel that burden carve its way into his skin.

The mother and son dug a hole six feet in the ground side by side. They stole shovels from some family’s backyard on the drive up. No words were exchanged as they dug into the cold ground. The moon was the only witness to their act. Every sling of the shovel made reality dig its sharp claws in further. By the end, he was covered in dirt and the tiny area under his fingernails were caked with soil and dried blood.

When they lifted the body, it had been bleeding a bit still. It leaked all over him, covering him in a reminder that he spilled this blood and that this was his doing.

The smell of iron shook him a bit, and he stood still looking down at the lifeless face of the man. Staring back at him were phantoms of his imagination that he thought might be this man’s mother, daughter, or son. He could see them crying over this. He wondered if they would feel the same empty void Katsuki felt when his father died.

When he failed to move, his mother harshly whispered his name. She snapped her dirt covered fingers in his face and ordered him to quickly get a move on. They swung the body into the deep hole and began to fill it back up. The heavy load of dirt strained his arms, reminding him exactly the weight of his foul deed. He tried to make it look as inconspicuous as possible, caking the dirt on top with leaves. Then his mother blurred the edges of the hole to make it seem like that land hadn’t been disturbed.

He wondered how she knew to do that.

“C’mon,” Mitsuki said while grabbing the shovels. She jutted her head towards their car urgently. “The sun is coming up and we need to go now.”

Katsuki nodded, but as she walked away he stood there for a moment.

He looked down at his hands.

They were coated with deep, scarlet for the first time.

He wondered if he should feel regret.

This was the part where he should be overcome with guilt, worry and paranoia he assumed. They had buried a man without so much as a real tear shed. He should have felt something—but his emotions were entirely blank. He knew this was because he thought the scummy man deserved it. The stranger had nearly separated him from his mom and after what he went through, he would kill anyone who tried to even fucking think about that.

He wondered what was going through his mom's head though.

She was chewing on the inside of her cheek, clearly worried. However, she was calmer than someone who had witnessed their son murdering in cold blood should be. In fact, she barely showed any remorse about it.

It almost was as if she was reliving a past life.

The car ride after they buried the man was quiet and filled with static radio. The pop song that played in the speakers of their run-down car was coated with white noise as he looked at his mother's wedding ring. The once shiny diamond was caked with dirt and blood. It seemed so wrong to have such a precious remembrance of his father's love covered in filth.

But then his eyes glanced up towards the shiny pearls around her slender neck. He frowned when a gnawing apprehension settled in his gut. He glanced at their back seat full of suitcases and trash bags. All the bags had been frantically packed to the brim with their things. Which wasn't exactly a lot, but he curiously stared at those pearls once more.

"That man said you owed money," Katsuki spoke over the static noise. "Why do you owe money to someone?"

Mitsuki stiffened. Tension wrapped around her shoulders and her grip tightened on the wheel.

"Because I fucked up," Mitsuki admitted, tiredly. "I owe it to you to be truthful from here on out. I gambled with the wrong crowd for a while, Katsuki. I thought they had forgotten about me because it's been years, but—I was clearly wrong."

He should be more surprised. But as he thought about the strange people his mother always had in and out growing up, he wasn't. In fact, he was numb to his core. He stared at her blankly, and all his mind could focus on was the future and keeping them safe—like he always was.

"So, what does this mean for us?" Katsuki asked.

Mitsuki's eyes hardened. "It means we keep it moving,"

True to his mother's word, they did.

It felt silly, all that work he did to make sure they didn't get evicted and they had left the apartment anyways. They had enough funds to live out of various nicotine smelling hotel rooms for a while. During this time, they sorted out their lives. His mother was carefully considering where to go next, mentioning all the places she had gambled.

When he tried to ask who would want to have her murdered for debts, she seemed unsure. That alone made Katsuki weary.

How the fuck did she not know?

"It should be simple," Katsuki hissed. "Who the hell did you gamble with so much that they want you killed for not paying them back?" This was fucking ridiculous.

"Look, I made a lot of fucking mistakes up before I had you," Mitsuki muttered, rolling her eyes. "I gambled a lot. Drank more than I do. I even dated a lot of not-so-great people before I met your father. It could be anyone and I didn't exactly keep a goddamn notebook of all the shit I owed, alright?"

She lit a cigarette nonchalantly. Her fingers trembled with stress and her face was tugged into a deep frown. The fire of the lighter danced enchantingly, but it was haunting in the same breath. Katsuki had never seen her smoke before, yet it was fitting like a missing jigsaw piece.

As they bounced from hotel to hotel, he found out who his mother really was.

She had always been sweet to him, but after the murder that demeanor faded like a memory of the past. She was still herself at her core, but she treated him a lot less like a child now—which meant she cursed more, did a lot more vulgar things and stopped regarding him like her soft naive boy.

Now, she regarded him like a man who was capable of murder.

She didn't bother filtering herself. She cursed like a sailor, and he found out she was hiding her abrasiveness from him up until now.

One time, they had gone to the grocery store and Katsuki mentioned he wanted a specific snack. The store was sold out, but when they were in line to check out the person in front of them had several bags of the chips. His mother lifted them from the man's cart. This proceeded to make a scene and ignited a huge argument which he found his mother won. She had made the random man cry, lied about him coming on to her to security and then commented on the poor man's weight and his balding pattern.

Katsuki felt icky when he was handed the chips in their tiny hotel room. But when he showed that bit of disgust by her actions, she called him a punk and complained that he shouldn't have whined about wanting them then. After that, he ate them in bitter silence.

By the time they found somewhere new to settle more permanently, it was far away from the countryside.

Osaka.

It was bright, lively, and full of life that was absent from the slow pace of their previous home. They were back in the city, blending in with the large crowds. It reminded young Katsuki of Tokyo in a painful way.

He sometimes thought he saw the ghost of the boy with green eyes in the streets. Phantom memories of those big, doe eyes followed him as they walked through the sea of people. This caused him to whirl around frantically, eyes darting to check all the unfamiliar faces. He desperately searched for that single hint of green.

But it was all in his imagination.

It hurt him deeply every time this happened—like an illusion shattering over and over until the jagged pieces were nothing but tiny speckles on the ground. When the edges were too painful to piece together again, he decided again to bury it and stop.

No more green eyes. No more saviors.

He was his own savior, and he had to be his mother's.

A year passed by with no occurrences and for once in Katsuki's life, it seemed like things were mildly okay again. Hell, maybe they would remain this way?

The murder was swept under the metaphoric rug like broke pieces of a vase he had smashed. His mother treated it that way too, like a simple childish mistake that she could ignore by pushing it as far out of sight as possible. They barely spoke of it, and the man's gun was locked away in their new safe.

But sometimes she carried it around with her in the house for 'protection' or whatever.

He was enrolled in school again, and the city kids were a lot different. They barely paid him the time of day. No one bothered to make fun of him, or even tried. Instead, they kept with their friends and paid attention to their studies. Some people greeted him but mostly, he was just another face in the crowd—no one really worth remembering.

He was okay with that after what he had done.

His mother was getting her act together again. But Katsuki squinted at this a bit, hesitant to believe her change of pace after what occurred last time. She found a new job working at a fancy office building downtown and was making significantly more money. She seemed more stable now, happier. She was openly her vulgar self, giving him the office gossip without filtering herself every night during dinner.

What was strange though was that his mother stayed in the apartment most of the time now.

Their new home wasn't special.

In fact, it was cramped and a little too tight for two people. But it was cozier than the last place, and his mother gave some effort to make it a home. More food. More furniture and decor around the small space. They even had spent a night abstract painting on two canvases together. Katsuki had liked this day, and they hung up their paintings on the wall side by side. Everything was given to him with a smile and a pat on the head. Then every night, she sat on the couch smoking through a pack of cigarettes watching TV.

She never bothered to talk to strange men anymore and properly paid the bills. She tried to tell Katsuki he didn't have to worry anymore about money, but he did. He was fourteen now and Katsuki couldn't tell if this was because she was attempting to straighten out again or if she was afraid someone might recognize her if she went out.

But no matter what the real answer to that question was, Katsuki found out the latter to be true.

When he came back from school one evening, it was quiet just like it had been that fateful day of his first murder. The hallway lights were flickering, and he had been so distracted. He wondered if it would have changed anything to notice the man cloaked in black trailing behind him. Looking back on it, Katsuki knew it was a useless thought.

Especially when he got to their apartment door and the feeling of cold steel pressed against the back of his skull. His blood ran cold as winter, filling him with dread all the way down to his bones.

"Open the door quietly and I won't shoot," a smooth, even voice demanded. "Scream and I'll blow your brains out, kid."

Katsuki did as he was told, gritting his teeth. He tried to harden his nerves and breathe calmly, but he couldn't. His intakes were sharp, forced, and his hands were unsteady as he unlocked the door. He walked in and the loud sound of a vacuum covered up him and the mysterious man's entrance.

His mom was playing one of his old vinyl records, smoking, and humming loudly over the sound of the vacuum. Katsuki wanted to try to warn her of danger, but he knew that would set the man off. So, he did the next best thing.

"Hey mom, I had a great day at school."

His mother stopped in her tracks, took her cigarette out of her mouth and frowned.

"Hah? Why the fuck do you sound so polite suddenly? You hate school—"

Her words ran dry when she turned and saw the sight of Katsuki being held at gunpoint.

Her reaction was quicker than he thought it would be. His mother quickly drew the stolen gun from a pocket in her frilly apron and aimed it very precisely at the man and her face twisted in a scowl.

"Let him go or I'll blow your goddamn ear off," Mitsuki threatened.

The man shifted the barrel of the gun into Katsuki's temple and Katsuki's breath hitched in fear.

"Shoot and I kill your son, Bakugou Mitsuki." His voice was level, and unafraid. In fact, he nearly sounded fucking tired like he was on a bad vacation. "I know who you are, and I know exactly who you're in debt with."

That seemed to waiver his mother a bit, but only a bit.

"Not until you take the gun of my fucking son's head," Mitsuki demanded. "You lay a finger on him and I'm killing both you and me. I don't give a shit."

The man let out a long sigh and shook his head. "We both know that's not how this works. Put your gun down and we can talk further, Mitsuki. I'm not here to hurt you. I want to negotiate with you."

Consideration trickled into his mother's features while fear trickled into Katsuki. He worried it was a damn lie, to lure her into putting her guard down—and she did. She lowered the gun when she glanced at Katsuki's terrified eyes.

"Fine," Mitsuki said reluctantly. She pointed the gun to the floor with sadness in her eyes. "Now let my son go. Leave him out of this, please."

The begging nature of her voice was sad.

He didn't want her to fucking beg.

The adult man grunted as a response then pushed him forward like he was a sack of fucking nothing. Katsuki fell to his knees harshly and he glared up at the man angrily.

But upon laying his sights on him, he stumbled a bit, caught off guard. The man's appearance was not what he was expecting. He was dressed in a similar black suit as the first man who had barged into their life. But instead of a red tie the man wore a shimmering black one that was laced with silver designs.

His face looked perpetually tired, the dark circles under his eyes resembled murky windows to the horrors in the world he had seen. His hair was silky, pitch black and it fell gracefully to his shoulders, slightly grazing his blazer's pads.

The man observed Katsuki carefully, and his finger was fiddling with the trigger of his gun. What was most curious though, he didn't turn his weapon on Mitsuki. Maybe the man was smart—the last person to aim a gun at his mother wound up six feet underground.

"We haven't met before, my name is Aizawa," the man said, surprising Katsuki. He bowed at the waist. "I'm sure you know exactly why I am here, Mitsuki."

"To collect money for some unknown gangster I can't remember?" Mitsuki sneered. "Can you please leave me alone? I swear I don't recall who I owed the money to. Can I set up some sort of payment plan and move on with my life?"

“Actually, the debt is only part of the reason I’m here,” Aizawa admitted. “Part because of the debt collection, the other part because it seems like the person I had sent originally is missing—and you have his gun I am noticing.”

They both froze.

Katsuki could feel the consequences of his actions running full speed to catch up with him. Aizawa glanced between Mitsuki and Katsuki before continuing. His eyes turned icy, and goosebumps ran up Katsuki’s arms.

“I’m afraid this is no longer simply a matter of money,” Aizawa said a lot less kindly. His eyes hardened and he frowned in disgust. “You murdered one of my men and I don’t take kindly to that a single bit. I believe in blood for blood when it comes to that, the money be damned.”

The tone shift was so startlingly drastic it threw everyone off. The man named Aizawa lifted his gun, ready to fire but Katsuki yelled before he could pull the trigger.

“I killed him you fucking bastard!” Katsuki screamed.

Both adults froze and turned their sights onto the shaking teen.

This was the first time Katsuki had said it out loud. He curled his fists so tightly until pain sparked from his nails digging into his palms.

“I killed him,” Katsuki whispered a lot softer. His heart pulsed rapidly, and his body strung tight with self-hatred. But he told himself he didn’t regret it. “If you’re going to repay the blood anywhere, do it with me.”

Aizawa, if that was even his real name, seemed too stunned to speak.

The man’s sharp, dangerous eyes cut to Mitsuki who was staring at Katsuki in shock, harshly whispering for him to shut up and not say another word.

“You killed him?” Aizawa repeated in disbelief. “But you’re just a kid.”

“I’m not a damn kid,” Katsuki shot back. He stood up, aware of his height for the first time in a while. He hadn’t realized he had gotten bigger a bit, but now the growing pains were evident deep in his quaking bones. “I killed him and I’ll fucking do it again. I’ll kill you too if you so much as lay a finger on her.”

He leered maliciously, ready to commit that foul act once more. He started plotting ways to grab the man’s gun, bash his head in and paint him fucking red in the same manner he had done the other suited bastard.

That dark part of him reared a tiny bit, rumbling at the prospect of bloodshed.

“Relax,” Aizawa mumbled. He cracked his neck tiredly and——walked straight past Katsuki?

Katsuki frowned, puzzled and whipped his head around to follow the man's movements. Aizawa's walk was lethargic, and he carded his hand through his silky hair tiredly. As he passed Mitsuki, his mother lifted her gun as well, ready to pull it at any slight ill intent—but Aizawa simply patted her shoulder like a friend and sat down on their couch.

Aizawa loosened his tie from around his neck and let out a loud, exasperated exhale. A million thoughts were running in his head no doubt. Just when Aizawa looked like he was at peak stress, his eyes sparked with life at the sight of the tea set on the table. He placed his gun down with a clunk and began pouring himself a cup of tea.

Katsuki and Mitsuki exchanged confused glances.

"Well, this changes things a lot." Aizawa sighed and took a long sip of the hot liquid in the tiny cup. He scratched at his chin stubble in contemplation. "This is much more complicated than I expected."

"Are you drinking my goddamn tea?" Mitsuki muttered, baffled.

"Yes I am. I have a headache right now, ma'am," Aizawa cut down sharply. His blood shot eyes bored into Mitsuki unfazed. "There's a lot going on in my life right now. Work is killing me, I just got diagnosed with sciatica, and I found a bundle of gray hair yesterday. To make matters somehow worse, you, your brat, and my dead colleague are an extra headache on top of everything. So, a nice cup of tea is helpful because I don't exactly know where my head is at."

"You just had a gun on me a second ago ready to blow my head off. That very much seemed like you knew where your head was at."

"Yeah, well, I thought you had killed my friend," Aizawa quipped. "I have a policy that if a man of mine dies on the job, I kill whoever did it. Debts or not. But—" He gave a low, exhausted groan and scratched his chin again. He cut his gaze to Katsuki. "I also have a moral code of not killing kids. All that shit about children being our future and their potential."

Katsuki bristled. "I said I'm not a—"

"—Just shut up," Aizawa jeered. He pinched the bridge of his nose and shook his head. "Please. Shut up. You're clearly no older than sixteen."

"I'm fourteen," Katsuki corrected.

Aizawa made a disgruntled face, gawking at Katsuki even more distressed. "That's worse."

Aizawa groaned loudly and ran his hands down his face. He started mumbling under his breath, tiny bits of words Katsuki could only partially catch. Then suddenly, he straightened his back and looked like he had come up with a brilliant plan that was bound to make him the most exhausted man in the world.

“Okay, I’ll be blunt with you, Mitsuki,” Aizawa said. He folded his hands and pressed his lips into an unimpressed, thin line. “You owe 11,499,850 yen to Imasuji Goto aka Muscular aka one of the biggest gambling gangsters from Sapporo. Ring a bell?”

“N-No,” Mitsuki whispered. Katsuki frowned at the stutter as his mother’s eyes glanced everywhere but him. “I’ve never heard of that man before.”

“Well, he’s heard of you,” Aizawa shot back. He took another long sip of tea. “He says you’ve been owing him for about—”

He looked Katsuki up and down. He studied his blond hair carefully and his face. Aizawa squinted his eyes and raised an eyebrow.

“…Fifteen years now,” Aizawa said suspiciously. “But it seems like you’re very slippery. Always moving around. Got married, your last name changed, and you disappeared until last year when someone mentioned you in the underground gambling scene in the countryside.”

Mitsuki didn’t say a word.

Katsuki frowned deeply hearing this—but he told himself his mother had been honest. She said she had been involved with shady people. At least now they knew who was hunting her down.

Aizawa sipped his tea and then turned to Mitsuki again. “Long story short, he put a hit out on you.”

Mitsuki’s eyes went wide, and she staggered backwards. “W-What, a hit? As in, kill me?!”

“Kill you and bring back a piece of your body as the evidence,” Aizawa amended. Katsuki felt like he was going to be sick. “Muscular takes his work very seriously, I’m sure you know. But that’s where I come in, and the man you killed. Whose name is Asahi by the way—if you care. He has a daughter who has been crying for her missing father for a year now.”

“I don’t care,” Katsuki cut in. “She can keep fucking crying. And I’ll bury you next to your goddamn sorry ass friend if you try to kill my mother.”

He looked at Aizawa nastily, keeping a close eye pinned to the gun on the table. Aizawa frowned at Katsuki’s sudden answer, clearly finding it concerning. He cocked his head at the young boy and sipped his tea slowly.

“…Noted,” Aizawa drawled. “But, I’m here because I’m from the company hired to kill you. It’s nothing personal, it’s just my job. The assignment was to either get you to pay the debt in full or have your head brought to him.”

The silence prickled at Katsuki’s skin. His heart slowed with sadness when he realized there was no end to this.

That gangster would keep coming after his mother over and over again until they had the money or if she was dead. It would be a never-ending cycle and they would have to keep moving and moving and moving and moving—

“I…I can’t pay that,” Mitsuki whispered. Her eyes were watery, and her shoulders were shaking. “Can—Can you work up a payment plan or something with him?”

“I’m sorry, but he doesn’t have payment plans. You know this,” Aizawa said. He looked at Katsuki with pity. “But, I can make an exception and try to find a way to help you out of this situation. For your son’s sake.”

Mitsuki’s eyes sparked with life. “Th-Thank you! Thank you so much! What do I have to do?”

“Have your son work off the debts with me. Since he killed my colleague, I’ll call it even if he does. He can work and get enough money to pay off Muscular in about a couple of months. I’ll tell Muscular I couldn’t find you and when I did, you had the money. All this will be erased.”

“What?!” Mitsuki hissed, jerking away. She shook her head harshly and her lip curled in disgust. “He’s not going to kill people for you.”

“He’s already killed someone,” Aizawa pointed out. “And he seems more than ready to do it again if I make the wrong move right now. But it’ll be mostly body guarding and assisting with tasks.”

“No, I fucking refuse. I’ll find a way to work for the money—”

“—I’ll do it,” Katsuki interrupted.

Both adults’ eyes whirled towards him. Aizawa was curious, his mother was stunned.

Katsuki had been standing there, listening carefully. His face was blankly staring at the delicate design of the porcelain teacups on the table.

He weighed out all his options and he knew deep down this was the best route. This man might’ve been a bastard, but he was a bastard who was willing to help them out. And what was the fucking alternative? His mother would never save up that much money, she was too irresponsible. They would have to keep moving and moving repeatedly until maybe one day someone cut off her head.

Then he would truly be alone.

“Katsuki, no,” Mitsuki quickly rejected. She walked up to him and grabbed his shoulders. “This isn’t for you. You’re a good kid.”

“It’s temporary,” Katsuki reasoned. He refused to meet her gaze, unsure if he could stomach the look of worry on her face. He shouldn’t be doing this, but he had to. He fucking had to suck it up if he wanted any lick of stability in his life because his mother was unable to give it to him. “We’ll pay off the money and then things will be normal afterwards.”

His mother’s face twisted with uncertainty. Words were teetering on her tongue and shadows of her unknown past danced in her eyes.

“Fine,” Mitsuki eventually conceded, shamefully. She turned away from Katsuki and glared at Aizawa who was pouring himself a second cup of tea. “But he doesn’t go near Imasuji Goto. That man can’t know what he looks like. You hear me? I’ll kill you if you let that man near him.”

Katsuki wanted to ask why but Aizawa seemed to take whatever hint his mother dropped.

“I’ll make sure of it, don’t worry,” Aizawa said seriously. “He’s in safe hands with me.”

“So, when do I start?” Katsuki muttered.

Aizawa stood up, quickly downed his second cup of tea and tucked his gun in his holster. He looked at Katsuki very seriously.

“Today.”

Working for Aizawa was a fucking experience.

Katsuki was being run ragged by this man, but the worst part is that he treated him like a fucking kid. But he wasn’t a goddamn kid and he wished this snarky, weirdly tired bastard understood that. Every chance Aizawa got, he reminded Katsuki of his age, like it was on purpose.

“Hey, kid. Go grab me a cup of coffee.”

“Watch your mouth, kid. I’m more than twice your age and I have killed more people than how old you are.”

“I remember when I was your age. I was a lot less of a headache—but I remember. Good times.”

It drove Katsuki up a goddamn wall.

But, deep down he was thankful for the opportunity to work off his mother’s debts. This meant they could have a normal life soon.

After this he could go on like nothing happened and they could stay in Osaka. He could have his forever home that he dreamed of and always wanted with his mother. The kind of home he saw people have an attachment to in movies. While the small apartment wasn’t exactly a shining property with a back yard and pretty fence, it was probably the closest to it he’d ever come.

Katsuki desperately wanted that glimmering hope of a future.

As the months went on, Katsuki realized Aizawa truly didn’t even make him work that much. Or at least in Katsuki’s opinion. He was witness to some terrible shit, but really he felt like he was just there as an accessory or a favor. The tired hitman man really just had him follow him around to these vague, weird places with seedy men. He gave Katsuki a gun and shooting lessons.

“If someone seems suspicious while I’m making out deals, shoot them in their kneecaps,” Aizawa instructed on the first day on the job. “Don’t hesitate. Trust your gut.”

He taught Katsuki everything he needed to know. Specifically, about how to take someone down and make them feel just enough pain to regret stepping out of line. But he never taught him how to kill.

Which made that small, inkling of darkness inside of Katsuki restless. That side of him flickered around the new danger. It whispered to him that he wanted to taste and grasp the curious act of killing.

That side of him grew louder every day when he quickly learned Aizawa murdered for a living. Specifically, Aizawa took requests on who he was to kill for large sums of money for some secretive company. Aizawa made Katsuki stand like a watchdog behind him in his dusty office as he did these deals in Osaka. But it was mostly pointless. Aizawa could handle himself far more well than Katsuki could ever really help. That man was somehow always fucking tired but deadly like one of the most trained killers alive.

He was given an example of this fully when some shady man tried to pull one over on him, lying about the job at hand. Aizawa lazily strummed his fingers on his expensive mahogany table and then grabbed the shotgun that was sitting discreetly under his desk.

“Get out of my office,” Aizawa had said without any tone inflection. He cocked the weapon and pointed it directly between the man’s eyes. “I’m going to count to three, and you better be out of the building when I finish. One—”

Katsuki had never seen someone move so fast.

A part of Katsuki bitterly admired the old man. He was actually…really fucking cool.

Every day he paid Katsuki for his ‘bodyguard’ services which was a hell of a lot more yen than he ever expected. He even treated him out for dinners and lunches and started telling him how to properly fix his hair. While spending all this time with Aizawa, Katsuki even learned how to properly do his school tie. Katsuki didn’t realize he never actually knew how to do it until that day his crooked, lopsided tie was pointed out. Sometimes Aizawa even asked him about his day at school, or if he had any friends. Those questions caught him off guard the most. No one in Katsuki’s life asked about him.

It was a type of attention Katsuki hadn’t received in years. It was close to feeling like how Katsuki imagined family to be at a certain point.

Every day, Katsuki wanted to run home to his mom and gloat about how much cash he was able to get—it was all the money he always dreamed and cried over. But sometimes when he came home that wind of joy was snatched from his lungs.

His mom was slipping again.

It was subtle, but he could see that familiar look of instability in her worn-down eyes. She chain smoked and the smell of nicotine was now clinging to his clothes. The food in the fridge was thinning again, and she stopped asking to help him with his homework. She began to grow lethargic, and he noted some days she didn't go to work. The phone would ring and ring, but she couldn't answer it.

She looked skittish ever since the mention of that gangster, Imasuji Goto. Sometimes Katsuki caught her staring at him, studying his face underneath their pale kitchen lights. Then some days, his mother couldn't look at him. She would keep her eyes averted to the ground when they conversed and part of that really fucking hurt.

Katsuki concluded whoever that man was, the mere mention of his name triggered something terrible in his mother.

Out of fear that she might mess this glimmer of a future up, Katsuki decided to tell Aizawa to keep the money on himself. The elder man seemed a little shocked by this, but he did as Katsuki requested.

Katsuki wearily started realizing that while he loved his mother, she was never going to be capable of being someone to lean on. His heart had broken one day when she had promised to take him to the carnival, and she was too drunk to even get out of the house. He concluded that maybe it was him, he wasn't good enough to be her son and there would always be that barrier between them.

After all, she had witnessed him murder someone.

There was something in her eyes after that day, something she wasn't telling him.

But she sometimes looked at him with fear.

One day after months of obscure jobs, skipping school, and trying his best to comfort his mother, Aizawa asked him to come with him to Yokohama for a month. At first his mother objected, clearly not a fan of the idea of Katsuki away, but Aizawa reassured that this was the last leg of his work haul.

Yokohama was beautiful, Katsuki thought upon arrival. It was a pretty city that had shining glass skyscrapers that climbed up to the sky like deities watching over the crowd of citizens. It warmed him in a strange way as the summer wind caressed him welcomingly.

Aizawa paid for him to be in a nice hotel near the secretive office that was conveniently placed downtown. The hotel was the nicest place Katsuki had ever stayed. It had multiple rooms, a fully functioning kitchen and a stainless-steel fridge.

But what caused him the most shock was the fact Aizawa had filled the fridge up. Endless piles of food were stacked inside and most of it was his favorites.

Has that old man realized what foods he liked these last five months?

After unpacking, Katsuki plopped down on the leather couch and kicked his legs up. As he stared over the lavish cityscape, Katsuki realized he could get used to this. He ate his favorite snack on the comfy couch and turned on the large flat screen TV.

It hurt a bit, that this would probably be the only chance he could afford to live this type of lifestyle until he was old enough to get a real job. But even after that—would he be able to? He furrowed his brows. Who's to say his mother would dig them in another ditch? Would he even be able to leave her alone to go to college? Quickly, the future felt short sighted. When he thought of his mother, his options for life were far more limited because of what a wild card she was.

Hell, when Katsuki even considered it, he wasn't actually sure what he wanted to do anymore.

When he was younger he wanted to compose classical music like those fancy people. But… could he do that? Didn't that require money? School? He had looked it up and most people who succeeded in music took lessons young. Katsuki was already fourteen and he didn't even know how to read sheet music. He looked it up on his phone, and suddenly he was overwhelmed by the different kinds of notes.

That looney old man had never shown him how to read music. Just taught him fancy phrases like crescendo—but what was a crescendo in terms of sheet music? The black symbols on his phone screen might as well been a foreign language.

He had never thought about his future this much in depth.

Up until recently, his mind was like a barren, dark road. He couldn't see part down his path or even see what lied at the end. He could only see as far as the first few streetlights reached. But now, with money and Aizawa, more streetlights had flickered on. He could see a bit further—but he still didn't know what was at the end.

A small seed of confusion planted inside of him.

At the end of the time in Yokohama, Aizawa took him to his headquarters.

They walked up to a super fancy looking building but instead of walking through the front, they entered through a side door. It made Katsuki flat out baffled because it was a regular store. No better place than to hide in plain sight, Katsuki figured.

He quickly learned the building was a disguise. The store they walked into was labeled 'Cleaning Services', ironically. Even had a stupid little kawaii washing machine icon that was blushing. Katsuki made a face of disgust at the cuteness and when they walked in it seemed like a normal, everyday laundry mat.

People were washing their clothes, but when Katsuki looked closer, those clothes had blood stains.

Aizawa walked straight to the back door and gave five, very rhythm specific knocks.

Some woman dressed in a stylish, white pants suit with long platinum blonde hair answered the door. She had pretty pecan colored skin and sharp carmine eyes. She tilted her head unimpressed at Aizawa upon their arrival and glared at Katsuki up and down. Suddenly, Katsuki was a little self-conscious of his shabby throw away clothes. He stared down at his shotty button up shirt that was wrinkled and the odd stain that was on it. Heat rushed to his face when he realized how nicely Aizawa and this woman were dressed.

“Is this the punk who killed Asahi?” The woman asked sourly. She tilted her head when she looked at Katsuki’s face closely. “Wait. He looks like—”

“—Yeah, this is the headache,” Aizawa cut off quickly. He lazily waved a hand between them. “Katsuki, this is Miruko. Miruko, this is Katsuki. He’s the special case I had mentioned over the phone. Remember?”

The woman now identified as Miruko blinked then scoffed. She rolled her eyes and stepped aside for them to walk into the hidden door. “Come on in, kid.”

Upon entry, Katsuki couldn’t stop the low whistle that slipped out of him.

“Holy shit,” he muttered, wide eyed.

This place was first class rich. These motherfuckers had more money than he ever could comprehend and all of it came from what—fucking murder?

As they walked through the building, Katsuki couldn’t help but gawk. It was a luxe office space that smelled like crisp perfumes and subtle rich colognes. The floors were gray marble, and the walls were painted black with silver trimming. There were people bustling all about in suits and fancy business clothes. They were laughing with folders in their hands. Some green. Some red. Some yellow and curiously some colored black, but those were few.

Other individuals walked by dressed in all black with ski masks and loaded guns. One woman even walked by casually on the phone as she sharpened a set of knives.

They walked past a lobby that had a giant ‘C’ embossed into the black wall. Miruko led them to a hallway full of shining silver elevators and swiped an ID card that was hanging around her neck. The two adults chatted casually, and Katsuki could tell they were good friends.

They rode the elevator up, and Katsuki liked how fancy it all was. By the time they reached the top floor, they came to Aizawa’s real office, he learned. This time, the room was way larger and the open window view over Yokohama was stunning. Aizawa walked over to his endless black file cabinets and unlocked a specific drawer. As he did this, Katsuki sauntered up to the wall that was nothing but glass and peered down. He felt tall up here, bigger and like he was someone important for once.

As Katsuki turned around, he caught the sight of Aizawa’s desk. Sitting on top of it was an old photo in a golden frame that seemed like it was recently polished. The photo was old, worn and cracked in places to show the white of the material through the happy photo. There was a tear right down the middle between Aizawa and someone who was a young teen who looked incredibly like him.

Being the nosy person he was, Katsuki picked up the frame.

“Who is this?” Katsuki asked. “He’s got your weird ass nose.”

Aizawa stopped rummaging through the cabinets a bit to turn to him. He only spared a split-second glance before turning around. His shoulders grew tense as he thumbed through files.

“That’s my son,” Aizawa said distantly. “His name was Koji.”

Katsuki froze. “Was?”

“He died. About seven years ago.”

Scarlet eyes studied the photograph and the man in the room with him a bit closer upon hearing this information. The father-son duo appeared happy in the snippet of the past. But there was a large burning curiosity in Katsuki that wanted to ask what had happened. But he bit his tongue when he could feel the sullen aura droop off of the usually unbothered man.

Aizawa took out a folder after his long search, signed a couple of dotted lines and handed it over to him.

Katsuki looked down at the flimsy piece of paper curiously and Aizawa smiled at him for the first time ever.

“You’re officially debt free, kid. Or at least your mother is.” There was a twinge of distaste in that statement. “I delivered the money to Muscular yesterday, and the slate is wiped clean.”

Katsuki stood there, stunned a bit. Six months had passed by so quickly he hadn’t even noticed—especially this last month while he was living in the nice hotel. Somewhere down the line, he stopped tallying the money as he got to know Aizawa better. Gradually, Katsuki placed down the photograph. Looking between Koji and Aizawa carefully.

“Right,” Katsuki said. He cleared his throat. “Uh, thank you. For making an exception for me and my mother.”

The hint of humor in the sentence made Katsuki laugh slightly, he was going to miss the strange sarcastic nature of this man.

“Of course. I will never talk about this ever again.”

Truthfully, Katsuki didn’t know how to behave. For once, he felt awkward in his own skin. He stared down at the contract that was a signed copy of his release from debt. It felt odd, all his troubles and turmoil boiled down to this simple white paper with black ink and some numbers.

He reached for it and tried to grab it, but when he tugged, Aizawa didn't let go.

Katsuki frowned and glared at Aizawa.

"What are you doing, old man?" Katsuki muttered.

"Can I give you some advice, kid?" Aizawa pressed. His voice was no longer warm, but sharp and full of edge.

Katsuki didn't respond, only glared at him impatiently.

"It's better to jump off a ship that is heading to crash and take your chances with the sea," Aizawa said seriously. His dark eyes bore into Katsuki. "With the sea you have a choice to sink or swim but staying on a doomed ship will only guarantee your death."

Katsuki's frown deepened, and chills crawled up his spine.

"What is that supposed to mean?" Katsuki whispered.

"It means you need to start thinking of yourself," Aizawa said very seriously. He let go of the paper and Katsuki stumbled back, not realizing how hard he had a grip on it. "Remember that, stay out of trouble and please, no more killing my goddamn men."

Katsuki stared at him, letting the meaning of the words settle into him. It was clear Aizawa was referring to his mother—but a defensive part of Katsuki didn't like it at all. He pressed his lips in a thin line as he thought about this and then decided to quickly end this strange relationship between them.

"Sure thing. See you, old man."

There was a flicker of sadness in Aizawa's eyes that he quickly snuffed out.

Katsuki glanced down at the wrinkled piece of paper and slowly started to make his way towards the door.

As he did this, he read the paper and it was pretty much proof of the assignment being completed. His mother's name was on it, while he was nowhere in sight. It was stamped 'Copy 1 of 3' and Katsuki could only assume that the other two copies were for The Company, and Imasuji Goto.

Katsuki reached the door and stopped as he looked at the large sum of money he had worked off in merely six months. He thought about the nice hotel room, the freedom he had this last month, and finally the control he felt for the first time in a year. His chest became restless when he considered going back to Osaka empty handed. He didn't know what was waiting there for him, the ground underneath his feet suddenly felt rocky.

It was only when Katsuki touched the cold doorknob, did he realize these last six months were the most stable he had ever been.

Because he had money. Because he had been in nice hotel rooms. Because he had food. Aizawa always made sure he was given proper attention. But ultimately, for once Katsuki didn't feel like he had to lean on his mother.

He thought about how sad his mother looked before he left. She was slipping. It would only be a matter of time before Katsuki would have to go back to writing endless papers and feeding himself and her.

Fuck it. Katsuki steeled his nerves and turned around. He marched straight up to Aizawa and slammed his hands flat on the surface of the wooden desk.

"Let me work here," Katsuki demanded solidly.

Aizawa blanched. "Have you lost your mind? Get out of my office—"

"—I can be good at this," Katsuki rushed. "Now hear me out—"

"—Absolutely not. Don't make me get my gun."

"I don't give a shit, you can shoot me if you want," Katsuki snapped. "Even if you shoot me I'm going to keep talking so you might as will just fucking listen."

Aizawa's face dropped in disbelief and his hand stopped moving under his desk. Probably was getting his shot gun ready for him, no doubt. The tired adult regarded Katsuki like he had grown a third eye in the last five seconds.

"I-I really fucking hate school but I'm smart," Katsuki blurted out. "I'm really positive I'm going to drop out soon anyways to go find a job the second I turn fifteen. I need money and I need a lot of it. My mom needs someone to take care of her and she can't do it herself. She—She's not able to. She tries, she does. But it's not enough. And before we left Osaka, I saw her slipping again and I have to find ways to take care of us before that happens."

Aizawa looked as though he was going to protest, but he couldn't find the proper words.

Katsuki continued, desperate as he pushed. "I have to take care of both of us, but no one will fucking hire me."

"There's good reasons for that. One fact being you're a child," Aizawa hissed. "Do you not comprehend that? My job is killing people or killing people when needed. This is no place for someone your age. You should be focused on other stuff—"

"—I should be," Katsuki agreed. He pleaded heavily with his eyes. "You're right, I should be. But I fucking can't, my life isn't set up that way. The only thing I can focus on is my next meal and making sure I have a place to sleep. I need money. I need a job—this job. I can be good at it. I'm a great learner and you know damn well I have no issues with death."

Aizawa looked like he pitied him.

Katsuki shrugged it off as he continued. "If you can change the course of the ship, wouldn't you? You don't always have to fucking jump overboard. Sometimes you just need to get down and fucking dirty, roll up your sleeves and take the wheel. This is me taking the wheel."

"And what will you do if I tell you to fuck off?"

"I will go find someone else in the same business as you," Katsuki said coldly. "If it's not this company, it will be somewhere else. I highly doubt that this is the only place in all of Japan that has hitmen for hire."

At that, Aizawa seemed to give in.

He sighed deeply, looked up towards the ceiling and pinched the bridge of his nose.

"Kami fucking help me," Aizawa muttered. "A whole fucking migraine."

Katsuki chewed his lip as a long stretch of silence moved in the office space.

"Fine," Aizawa muttered. "Fucking fine. But you're not getting any red folder jobs any time soon. I'm going to need to train you and you'll have to live in range of headquarters a bit closer. I'm going to keep an extremely close eye on you. You're going to go to school and I'm going to require you to maintain a specific grade point average."

Katsuki yelled out in excitement and clapped his hands. He couldn't control the happy grin that spread across his face and Aizawa looked like he was a doomed man. The elder man placed his head in his palms as Katsuki pumped his fists.

"I promise you won't regret this, old man," Katsuki cheered, attempting to reassure him.

Aizawa looked more stressed out. "I'm already regretting this."

"Well—you won't regret it more. Nowhere to go but up from here, right?"

"Shut up." Aizawa groaned.

"I do have one question though," Katsuki paused. Aizawa's bloodshot eyes looked at him expectantly. "What's a red folder job?"

Aizawa sighed and shook his head. "You have a lot to learn."

The next few years flew by with cash raining down and filling his pockets. Katsuki kept true to his word, and he stayed enrolled in school and kept his grades up. With income from both him and his mother, he didn't have to beg other students to do their work for them and could focus on his own grades.

But the best part about the double income, they could move to a large place. Aizawa helped them house shop around Yokohama, and it was like living out of one of the weirdly fancy catalogs. It almost felt too good to be true and Katsuki had to pinch himself to be sure.

They settled on a lavish condo that was well within range of The Company and he fucking loved it. So did his mother, who looked brand new walking about the fancy marble floored kitchen. Her smile was so bright, and her eyes were filled with a light he hadn't seen since his father passed. Originally, his mother rejected the idea, but after being shown how much money Katsuki would be getting, she quietly resigned.

"This would make you happy?" Mitsuki said as she stared at his contract.

"Yes, it would make me really happy. You too."

"But this is saying that you'll be tied to them for ten years. That's a really long time, Katsuki. Those are your good years."

"Ten years is nothing in the grand scheme of things," Katsuki said. He shrugged off her worry. "I'll be fucking twenty-five, money stacked up as high as Mount Fuji and we'll be living good, mom."

She eventually gave in.

To celebrate, she actually bought him a knife. It was sharp, stainless steel and it had his name engraved on it in gold on the hilt. Katsuki was surprised, stunned really. He had known she wouldn't exactly object, but this was something entirely different. She smiled at him as she handed it over, an edge of weariness in her eyes.

"I'm just happy you're happy," she said in a whisper and hugged him. "I'll be better from now on. I promise."

As the years progressed, Aizawa taught him how to dress properly. Katsuki found he actually had good taste despite being deprived of luxury goods for so long. He learned very quickly he liked black a lot. Black watch. Black Shoes. Black turtlenecks and pants. He grinned wide at the look of himself in his first tux with a black tie. Aizawa seemed happy too, pointing out how he had a good eye for these types of things.

The jobs he took from fourteen to seventeen were vanilla he would learn after he turned eighteen.

Aizawa strictly kept him off red folder assignments, which he learned very quickly were hits that ended in the death of the mark. Green was for safeguarding the mark and killing others if needed. Yellow was a wild card. Katsuki's assignments were filled with green, green, and more green. When he wasn't doing assignments, Aizawa was skillfully training him in combat, languages and computer coding. He told Katsuki every day The Company's motto so his empathy could be hammered down to the bottom of his sinking spirit.

"A mark is a mark," Aizawa said coldly every day after rigorous training. "Now say it."

"A mark is a mark," Katsuki repeated.

Those were words tattooed deeply on his brain. They rang loud every time he was on an assignment, ready to cut down anymore who came too close to his mark.

During this time, he was partnered up with a strange older man named Rin Hiryu. Hiryu had a mysterious numbered tattoo and aura leaking off of him and he was about as quiet as a ghost. The man moved in silence all the time and according to the office gossip, he had a dark past. Or at least, everyone thought he did based on the strange scars on his body and the numbered tattoo on his finger.

Katsuki learned Hiryu requested that he work purely on green assignments. The ghost like man never wanted to touch a yellow or red folder.

When Katsuki asked him why, he was given a simple answer:

“I want to spend the last part of my life protecting,” Hiryu said, entirely disengaged. His dark eyes were glazed over as he said this. It was clear he was trapped in his head. “It’s a personal goal of mine.”

“Half of our clients are drug lords,” Katsuki pointed out.

“Better to protect life than to take life greedily.”

Katsuki decided to leave it alone and just worked the assignment with Hiryu. Dude was weird and spoke like he was some wise poetic master, so it was whatever.

Despite Hiryu’s strange need to only want to work on green folders, Katsuki in contrast did not feel like this. In the entirely opposite sentiment, there was an ominous itch in Katsuki’s stomach when he wondered what it would be like to finally have that red folder for the first time. That darkness in his core gnawed at the mere prospect of it. It was eager and whispering in excitement for that fateful day that he might once again paint his hands in scarlet.

By the time Katsuki turned sixteen, he was worried about that blood thirsty nagging feeling in his core.

It was getting louder day by day and he wondered if he was truly a monster to want to attempt murder again. That wasn’t normal, right? He should be disgusted, feel like he was being forced but the fact was, he didn’t. He felt far from it, honestly. He was happy to be chosen for this and he was happy to be in training.

But when Katsuki was seventeen, a tiny sliver of information was revealed that flipped his world on its head. As he was walking to the kitchen area at The Company, he heard the office gossip whispering to someone. But this time it was about him.

“Why the hell is Aizawa letting that blond menace run around here?” Someone bitterly sneered. “I thought he had a policy against corrupting children or whatever he calls it.”

“You didn’t hear this from me but, look up Imasuji Goto.” the office gossip said with a smug tone. “That should tell you why.”

Katsuki had frozen in place.

Imasuji Goto. There was that fucking name again.

Eeriness scratched at the back of his skull, pestering him. He thought about his mother's strange reaction towards that name. He shouldn't give a shit about a man who wanted his mother's head decapitated and brought to him like he was some fucking emperor in the ancient days—

—but.

He couldn't help but be curious. He thought about what the office gossip said.

What was the connection between them and Imasuji Goto?

Later that night, Katsuki was sent on a two weeklong assignment with Hiryu to some random small town. They packed their bags immediately and he told his mom. She hugged him goodbye and told him to be safe as if he wasn't the one who was about to inflict damage and enjoy it.

The assignment was simple: they were hired by some shop owner to protect against the neighborhood thugs. The gang had been bothering the shop owners, stealing products from them and intimidating them with guns and knives. Hiryu and Katsuki had to scare them off and wipe them out if absolutely needed.

The small-town citizens had pooled their money to try to solve the vermin issue.

On the second night of the assignment, Katsuki had been scrolling the web, looking up the gangster Imasuji Goto. It only took a couple minutes for Katsuki to discover the man was as foul as they came. He was involved with drugs, arson, battery, several assault charges, and he had various murder convictions under his belt. The most absurd one was suspected under suspicions of cannibalism and tied to human trafficking.

Katsuki's stomach turned with every file and news article about the man he read. He was currently out of prison due to his strange, lucid connections. Like many gangsters and terrifying humans who possessed power. The law couldn't contain real monsters, the true demons were able to evade and terrorize the world. Many of Imasuji Goto's crimes were so fucking horrifying. He gained the nickname 'Muscular' due to camera footage catching him ripping a man's arm clean off then staring straight into the lens.

Against his better judgment, Katsuki watched the clip.

But the carnage wasn't the most unsettling thing.

It was the man's fair skin and spiky blond hair. Even in the dark, static camera footage, it was clear. His sharp eyes, deep frown and angular features. The way his chin rounded out in the same way as Katsuki's and squared out at his jaw line. They had the same eye shape and same type of frown.

Everything in Katsuki's world slowed down like he had been transported to his worst nightmare that he never considered. The longer he looked at that blurry footage, the more Katsuki realized he needed to get back home. He replayed it. Over and over, watching the bloody butchery and studying the enigmatic gangster.

After the fourth repeat of the footage, Katsuki decided he had to speak with his mother right now.

The job was finished in a week's time with Katsuki's new frantic mindset.

A piece of him was deeply shaken by what he had unearthed. He hoped that tiny intuition in the back of his mind was fucking lying to him because his father was his father. Right? Fucking right? His mother wouldn't keep that type of thing from him—his father wouldn't have kept that type of thing from him?

With shaky hands, Katsuki printed out the mugshot of Imasuji Goto. He folded it neatly and put it in his suit's pants pocket that night. He boarded the plane back to Yokohama with the vicious blood covered smile of Muscular imprinted on his mind.

The man smirked in the same way the darkest part of him did.

When Katsuki came home, the stench of cigarettes and alcohol was stronger than he had ever smelled it before. The acrid aroma burned his nostrils harshly and made him nearly gag. His cheeks burned with disgust as he walked through the house, sniffing the subtle tinge of rotting fruit and a neglected garbage.

He picked up his foot as he stepped over pieces of thrown away clothes and random discarded pieces of plastic he couldn't identify. When he stepped into the living room, it was full of people smoking, gambling and chatting it up like some goddamn party.

Sitting in the center on the couch, was his mother. She was grinning wide with a hand full of poker cards and money stacked in bands in front of her. The seedy crowd surrounding her was cheering, and he watched. He fucking watched her offer up a large sum of cash and he watched her lose it all. But all she did was smile and laugh.

Katsuki immediately fucking lost his temper at the sight.

"Everyone get the fuck out," Katsuki demanded in a low voice.

His anger simmered under his skin as he glared at all the strange men and women sitting in the living room. They all gawked at him in surprise and his mother gasped. She sprung up from her seat on the couch and quickly straightened out her pencil skirt.

Mitsuki quickly rushed over to him, fixing her pearls as the people in the background watched them carefully.

"Katsuki, you're home early—"

"I said, everyone get the fuck out!" Katsuki yelled again, not giving her the time of day. He was pissed off beyond belief. His eyes stung with pure, unchecked rage.

When no one moved he whipped back his blazer to grab the loaded gun on his hip holster. He cocked it threateningly and it earned a sharp gasp from several people in the room when he pointed it at the first person he saw.

This time everyone scattered like ants. Cards were tossed carelessly like confetti to the ground, people were grabbing colorful chips and shoving wads of cash into their pockets. Some people were elbowing each other unkindly, trying to get to the exit quickly. The mass of gamblers scattered out of the apartment and the door slammed behind them.

The silence cut raw.

Katsuki leered at the alcohol, needles, and cards that were sloppily around the apartment. The apartment he was fucking paying for. This was supposed to be their new home, a nice place for them and yet—once again—his mother let in the very thing that was the cause of the many times they were in trouble. Over and over and fucking over again.

"Mom, what the fuck is this?" Katsuki snapped immediately. "I thought you said you were going to be better?! You said no more fucking gambling—is this what you do when I'm away?! Hah!? What is wrong with you!?"

"Katsuki, it wasn't a real game of poker, it was a fake one," Mitsuki lied poorly.

"I'm not goddamn stupid," Katsuki groaned. He picked up one of the half-drunk bottles of vodka and angrily stormed over to the sink to pour it out. He watched the liquid fall down the drain and his chest felt like it was going to crack under pressure. This was too much. This was all too fucking much.

"This—this has gone on far too long," Katsuki said. "You have to stop. You can't keep doing this. I thought you were going to be better than this, Mom."

"I am better, Katsuki," Mitsuki said. She sounded hurt. "Those needles aren't mine and I didn't touch the liquor. I was just playing a little game of clean poker. I am better, really."

"No, you're fucking not!" Katsuki screamed. He gestured wildly to the torn-up apartment. "Look at this place! This is disgusting!"

Mitsuki frowned. "So what? You think I am a bad mother?"

Katsuki groaned viciously and angrily tossed down the glass bottle in the sink. It shattered harshly, jagged broken pieces of glass flew everywhere, adding to the mess. His mother didn't flinch, used to his outbursts by now.

"You know damn well that's not what I fucking meant—"

"—No, it's okay, Katsuki," Mitsuki spat back sarcastically. She dug in the words, and they got under his skin even though he tried not to let them. "You can fucking say it. I bet you've been thinking that forever. I'm probably the worst goddamn mother in the world to you!"

"Now you're being fucking dramatic—"

“—It’s not dramatic, I can see it in your eyes!” Mitsuki yelled, clutching her shirt. “I-It fucking hurts to see you look at me the way you do! I can see how disappointed you are, and I realized that there hasn’t been a moment since Tokyo where you haven’t looked at me like you were disappointed.”

Her face crumpled like paper as she looked down to the marble floor.

“But there’s a lot about me you don’t know, Katsuki. I’m sorry that my life fell apart the way it did. I truly am, I never intended for it to…and I wish my best could be better for you but it’s not. But I am giving my best, is that not worth something?”

Katsuki pursed his lips as he looked away from her.

He knew what this game was. She was trying to make him pity her and it was fucking working. It always fucking worked, and he hated how goddamn heavy his heart suddenly felt.

“I just want you to know that I have always had your best intentions in mind, Katsuki. There’s not a decision in my life that doesn’t revolve around what would be best for you.”

At that, Katsuki scoffed sarcastically. “Really? Leaving me fucking homeless in the streets in the middle of fucking winter was the best decision for me?”

“They were trying to take you from me, Katsuki,” Mitsuki said harshly. “I have always gone the extra mile to make sure you stay with me. Would you rather I let you be shipped off to some orphanage and put in the system? Do you know how goddamn low the adoption rate for kids over five is?”

Katsuki then thought about the photograph burning in his pocket.

“What about that man?” Katsuki said a question that had been looming on his mind like a dark cloud. “Imasuji Goto.”

At the name drop, his mother flinched like she had been slapped. Her sharp eyes became dangerous knives that carved into him, and she bared her teeth like a vicious animal.

“Don’t you dare fucking mention that name.”

“And why the hell not?” Katsuki pushed. His emotions were tipping on the edge and was unable to catch them as he toppled straight over the edge. “You know that whole fucking thing was strange. The money you owed him, the fucking timing. But you know what was more strange? Someone who works with Aizawa said that I looked like him.”

“Katsuki. You don’t want to go down this path,” his mother warned dangerously.

“Why not?” Katsuki pressed on cruelly. His heart hammered until it was pulsing in his throat. “Why the hell shouldn’t I go down it? What is at the end of it?”

Silence bubbled as Mitsuki gripped the edge of the garnet countertop.

“Y’know, I dug around and I found a picture of him,” Katsuki confessed. He flared his nose and dug into his suit pockets. He angrily tossed the blurry photograph of the gangster on the tabletop towards his mother. She averted her eyes without a moment’s hesitation. “Fucking tell me. Why. do. I. Look. Like him?”

Mitsuki’s face fell slightly but she expertly steeled her serious expression. She flipped the photo face down.

“Mom. This goes beyond hair color. I physically resemble him—”

“—No. You’re not doing this to me. Masaru is your damn father,” Mitsuki shut him down. She gave him the most vicious stare he ever saw her muster, defensive and on edge. “You’re not going to shit all over your father’s memory with this bullshit because you stuck your nose in something you know damn well you shouldn’t have.”

She angrily grabbed the photo and ripped it to shreds with all her rage.

Out of spite, she threw the pieces up in the air and Katsuki glared at her harshly as the tiny pieces fell all around him. Her reaction was enough of an answer. He didn’t need to ask any further questions as the paper pieces of the photograph landed in his hair.

“Believe it or not Katsuki, I have made very big decisions to make sure you were safe,” Mitsuki hissed, stepping into his space. “I’ve seen parents give up their kids to some evil fucking people. Hell, I was even asked to when it was apparent I was struggling. I’ve seen people treat kids like fucking merchandise—I just wanted to make sure you always stayed with me.”

Katsuki was about to ask her what the fuck did that even mean, but he was cut off as she continued on her rant.

“Erasing that evil man was the very first decision I made to ensure you had a good future.” She swallowed and Katsuki could feel the truth prickling in the air. “Your father is Masaru and he always has been and always will be. I did what I had to do to make sure you had a good example because I know damn well it wasn’t ever going to be me. Trust me—I know I’m not a good example.”

Katsuki felt his spirit wallow hearing this.

He knew what the answer was. He did. But hearing his mother say it made it all more real.

“Then Masaru died,” Mitsuki whispered, eyes glossing over. “He loved us just as much as we loved him. Masaru was supposed to be your role model, Katsuki. I made sure of that. I didn’t owe that bastard money; I stole it so I could get away from him when I found out I was pregnant. You were supposed to be like Masaru, good and pure. Not like me. The last thing I wanted you to be was like me or that goddamn gangster.”

Her tears spilled down her face and Katsuki felt his already broken heart shatter further.

“Mom. Stop—”

“—I’m sorry.” Mitsuki whispered. Her voice cracked and all her composure went out of the window. “I’m really sorry, Katsuki. I-I tried to give you the best father and the best role model because there are so many monsters in the world. I’m one of them and so is Imasuji. You deserved to have an angel as your father, because I wanted you to be an angel too. S-So please. Leave this buried where it’s at. There’s so much about this world that you don’t understand.”

Katsuki stared around at the disaster in their condo. His heart squeezed until he couldn’t breathe as he tried to absorb this.

Dirty clothes. Poker cards. Rotten fruit and dirty dishes.

Now this.

This whole time his father was—

Katsuki swallowed. This wasn’t what his new home was supposed to be. It was supposed to be fucking warm, full of laughter and nothing but good goddamn times. He did all the grimy shit at work so he could come back to see his mother smile and live his goddamn life normally. This wasn’t what he had envisioned at all. He started wondering if his home would ever actually be with his mother.

He stared at the tiny pieces of the photograph all around, scattering the truth of his life. It suddenly all made a clear, scary amount of sense. He didn’t know how to feel as his chest expanded with searing emotions that were far too bitter for him to swallow.

It was then he realized he was finally taller than his mother.

He towered over her now, no longer looking up to her, but looked down at the brittle mess she was. She always was so fragile, strung together by nothing but doing her best and unfulfilled promises. She was smaller than he remembered, always inflated by the illusion of childhood heroes and love. Now he could see her for what she was, but he didn’t know if he liked it.

He didn’t know what her past life was—and Katsuki didn’t want to know.

“I—I need space,” Katsuki whispered, finally solidifying his decision. He could hear Aizawa’s advice from when he was fourteen burned into his head: Put yourself first.

Mitsuki wiped her tears and waved her hand, shrugging it off like she always did. This was a cycle. Katsuki could see it now.

“Go take a walk like you always do, Katsuki. You’ll be fine—”

“No,” Katsuki cut off. He shook his head, and his body was juddering. Were the tremors from exhaustion or rage? He couldn’t exactly identify. “Not that type of space. I don’t think I can keep living with you.”

Mitsuki froze.

The leaky faucet creaked between them. Drip by drip it creeped and counted the endless passing seconds. With every moment that lacked words, Katsuki found his skin crawling. He needed to get out. He needed room to fucking breathe, and his mother was stealing all his air.

“I’ll still come to visit but I can’t keep doing this. I need my own space.”

She turned her gaze away from him sadly and nodded her head. “Okay. I get it.”

“I’m going to take a walk. Don’t bother waiting up for me,” Katsuki muttered under his breath, still averting his gaze.

Neither mother nor son could look at each other.

After the painful reveal, Katsuki took a slow walk around the block. He strolled in the cold night with nothing but a leather jacket as his eyes burned with tears. The tears were banging against his eyes, begging to be let out and allow himself to feel. But he just fucking shoved it down. He shoved it down to the deepest, darkest part of him and that depraved side of him consumed it whole.

It smiled at him and suddenly he hated what he was. He wanted to scratch at his skin, dig his nails into his flesh and veins and claw out the evil that was lurking all around inside of him.

Katsuki had always wondered what kind of monster he was. He pondered if he was a product of his environment or truly born violent with no real hope. He wondered this question night and day.

Why had he not felt remorse killing that man so long ago?

Why had he wanted to kill again?

Why did he beg Aizawa for a job that entailed killing people?

He thought maybe he was a forged monster—a necessary evil given his shitty life circumstance. But really maybe his destiny was never his. He was the product of a monster and a disaster. Maybe it was in his blood to be the vicious, violent person he was. Even if he was given another set of cards for life, would he have turned out to be the same scarlet painted person?

Did he fool himself into thinking he have ever been fucking normal?

As Katsuki was walking down the jagged sidewalk, his work phone rang.

The ringtone he set for Aizawa chimed on and he took in a deep breath. He pushed down all those pondering thoughts and decided to accept he wasn’t normal now that he knew his true bloodline. He answered the phone with a tired, low voice.

“What do you need, old man?”

“I got a new assignment for you,” Aizawa said coolly. “Have you ever been to Vienna?”

Chapter End Notes

Let me know your thoughts! Sorry about any spelling mistake you found. I was really beat from work and Luna is sick :< I hope you still enjoyed this! Let me know your thoughts below.

Next chapter is Interlude III, and it's 17-25 year old Katsuki :) Specifically, its gonna be the fun stuff of the 8 years of run-ins with Izuku. I originally wanted all of the Katsuki background one chapter but there's a lot to unpack here lol so it'll be in doses!

Thanks so much for reading! 💜

Chapter 12: Interlude III

Chapter Summary

Katsuki earns the title of The Scarlet Eyed Killer

Chapter Notes

Hello everyone!! I hope you had a wonderful day!

First up, big thank you to Luna for betaing! She says thank you all for the get well wishes and everything ^^ she is feeling much better now and loves you all.

Secondly, I hope you enjoy this chapter! Originally, this was going to be a monster chapter of like 30k lol but i decided to cut it in two and leave it at where I think is a good resting spot so let all the events digest well! I'm really excited to be progressing through these flashback chapters as we unravel Katsuki's complexity. Thank you all so much for sticking around 200k+ words into this story. It means alot!

Now that's over, buckle up! :)

Warnings: Homocide, violent sexual tension

Deku. Deku, Deku, Deku, fucking Deku.

That was the name Katsuki had decided on for that green haired bastard. He repeated this name obsessively as the two lead bullets in his flesh tore him apart.

That night in Vienna was one of the worst instances of Katsuki's life. He had felt so foolish laying on that cold rooftop, but above all he felt helpless. He hadn't felt this out of control since he was fourteen as he struggled on the ground. His limbs were running cold, all the warmth in his body left out along with the blood that he needed. He defenselessly groaned, struggling to stay conscious.

He witnessed the life seep out of Hiryu's brown eyes. The saturated, cinnamon color desaturated to a stale darkness that was burned into Katsuki's mind. Alongside that memory, his hatred for the man who was Hiryu's murderer grew exponentially out of control. Katsuki gritted his teeth as he crawled on the dirty concrete away from the blood that was inching closer to him.

He pushed past the agonizing pain pulsing in his muscles to dig into his pocket. He dialed the emergency number for the third member of their Vienna mission. The phone rang three times, and slowly Katsuki's vision started to vignette black with the more blood he lost.

"Hello? Bakugou?" The other hitman said on the opposite line. "What's up? Did you guys secure the roof?"

Katsuki answered in his head, "Help—" but no word was actually formed by his tongue. His mouth felt numb and heavy. He made a muffled cry for help.

"Bakugou, what's wrong? What's going on?"

But Katsuki couldn't answer.

Instead, he dropped the phone when his body went limp from the loss of blood. As he closed his eyes, all he could see was the vision of Rin's dead body and the swirling color of green that had turned his life upside down.

When he looked back on it, Katsuki would be bitter to admit that the mysterious assailant did him a favor.

Eventually Katsuki woke up, the beeping of hospital monitors blared through him. He blinked his eyes open slowly and his mind was foggy. The weight of his eye lids were something he was unfamiliar with, as he tried to gain a bearing on what the fuck was going on.

"Ah, you're finally awake. You sure did take your time coming back to the land of the living."

Katsuki didn't need to be fully conscious to know that tired ass voice was Aizawa's.

The young hitman groaned as he rolled his neck to the side.

Katsuki set his heavy eyes on Aizawa who was reading the newspaper casually. When he glanced at the big, bold headline he saw it was in German, as was all the other text. He concluded he was still in Vienna, at least.

Then unexpectedly, the ghostly memory of Rin Hiryu's lifeless eyes boring into him struck Katsuki's nerves.

Katsuki bolted up, heart pounding.

“Hiryu. He’s—”

“—Dead. Yes.” Aizawa didn’t flinch. He thumbed to the next page of the newspaper and Katsuki didn’t realize the old man could read German. “Several gunshots. Same for you, only you’re alive.” Aizawa lowered down the flimsy paper to finally show his exhausted face. “Should we talk about this now or do you want to wait until we get back to Japan?”

“We—We can talk about it now,” Katsuki whispered.

His vision swarmed a bit, lightheaded.

Aizawa apparently saw him sway because he stood up quickly. His supervisor walked over and poured him a cup of water from a glass pitcher by his bedside. He handed it to Katsuki in silence and waited patiently for him to gulp it down. There was a clear ticking in the background, reminding Katsuki of time as he did this.

When he put the cup down, his hand was shaking.

“Are you okay now?” Aizawa asked, a little bit of concern in his voice. Katsuki nodded and felt his throat. “Good. Now, I need you to tell me everything—I mean everything. Losing a man on an assignment is an extremely serious matter.”

“There was some fucking assassin,” Katsuki rasped out. He now suddenly was aware of the dull pain creeping up his arms from the gunshot wounds. “He had stupid ass green hair and green eyes. He posed as a waiter inside of the restaurant we were in. He took my order. Not Hiryu’s though, which I guess now that I say this out loud, was suspicious. Hiryu didn’t see him.”

Aizawa frowned deeper than he had ever seen. “He got that close to you?”

“Yes,” Katsuki said, slightly ashamed. “He didn’t look like a threat, really. I honestly couldn’t tell. He looked like a normal teenager. Then when Hiryu and I went to the roof to cover the exit of the diplomat—that guy just fucking snuck up on us. He killed Hiryu and shot me and left me there to bleed out.”

“Describe him.”

“I just told you he had green hair and eyes.”

“I need more than his hair color and eyes, Bakugou,” Aizawa said tiredly.

“He, uh.” Katsuki paused, struggling to find the right words in his foggy brain.

He hated how when he remembered that killer all he could see was that sweet looking doll face. He still perfectly remembered the cute dimples, stunning eyes, and how the silk shirt complemented him so fucking well. Katsuki wished his damn brain would hurry up and twist the memory to something darker, something more deserving of a cold-blooded killer—but it didn’t.

Instead, the freckled man stayed painted in the soft tint of the first impression that he gave.

“He had freckles,” Katsuki settled for, feeling disgusted with himself. “A lot of goddamn stupid freckles, curly hair, lean frame. Short. He looked about my age, maybe younger—I don’t fucking know.”

He was feeling defensive. His dumb heart was tugging and weighing down like there was an anchor hooked into it. Then that chilling detached stare from those same sweet green eyes clouded his mind. He was so cold. He didn’t even blink. Abruptly, Katsuki remembered the few words exchanged.

“Wait. He said something in Korean to Hiryu before he shot him. Then told me Hiryu was his mark before he left me to bleed to death.”

“His mark? So Hiryu had a hit on him.” Aizawa scratched his chin. “What did he say to Hiryu?”

“I don’t know, I can’t speak Korean,” Katsuki grumbled.

“Just give me your best impression of what he said phonetically,” Aizawa encouraged. “Hiryu spoke twelve languages and I know some Korean. Maybe what was said might give us a clue of if this was a personal issue or if it’s a company issue. If it’s something to do with The Company, I need to be more worried about it.”

Katsuki repeated what the stranger had said in choppy, off pitch tones.

Aizawa winced a bit and struggled to even understand what he said. Katsuki tried his best to make his parched tongue twist until the unfamiliar language seemed to click in Aizawa’s head.

“Hyung?” Aizawa repeated, sounding baffled. “He called him his brother?”

“Is that what that means?” Katsuki muttered.

“Sort of. It can mean older brother or it can mean older males you are close to. I’m unsure what the first half means. So either that was his brother or someone he knew very closely.”

“I didn’t realize Hiryu had fucking family,” Katsuki muttered. Now he felt bitter. “He always said he didn’t have any family whenever I asked him.”

Aizawa’s lips pressed together in thin lines, the bags underneath his eyes somehow appearing darker. He pulled up a chair by the bedside and he took in a deep inhale, shoulders sagging.

“I run background checks on everyone I hire but Hiryu was virtually invisible,” Aizawa confessed. “I almost didn’t let him contract with us because of this, but he seemed so… anxious. There was something broken inside of him when he came to me. He was desperate for a job, and he said he needed the help to make him and his girlfriend invisible.”

“And you let him?” Katsuki asked, surprised.

“I have a weak spot for stray mutts with sob stories,” Aizawa said pointedly. “I’m sure he gave me a fake last name—but even when I cross ran all the possible leads he had no legal siblings or family on record. Further unfortunate news, Hiryu’s girlfriend was found dead in their apartment when I sent Miruko over to tell her about Hiryu. It seems like this was a job to snuff them both out. I think this is a fair lesson in the fact that the past doesn’t always stay dead, no matter how far you run from it.”

There was nothing else Katsuki could say.

He tried to search himself for other feelings, but inside of him only two emotions were present. First, the coiling hatred for the killer and lastly sympathy for Hiryu and his lover. He hoped that maybe that assassin was simply twisted in the head to call Hiryu his older brother. What type of person would kill their sibling in cold blood like that?

The bastard went so far to track him down in an entirely different country.

As Katsuki laid stiffly in the bed, all he could really see were flashes of Hiryu’s face. He recalled the way the man would smile at him like a wise mentor and always speak in riddles. Then he realized all those small instances were now gone. Forever.

“I’m sorry you had to see Hiryu die so brutally, Bakugou,” Aizawa quietly said. Sympathy translated through Aizawa’s brown eyes, and it made Katsuki unbearably uncomfortable. “That’s not an easy thing to witness. Are you alright?”

Katsuki deflected. “I’ve seen people die before. In case you forgot, my father is dead.”

“Yes, I know. But you’ve never seen someone you knew personally get murdered,” Aizawa pointed out. “That’s very different than watching a stranger get murdered. Or seeing your father die of sickness gradually at a young age. So, I repeat, are you alright?”

A pause of silence.

The memory of Hiryu dying seeped vividly into Katsuki’s mind like a bloodstain spreading across fresh linen.

“…Yeah,” Katsuki forced himself to say. “I’ll be fine.”

Both Aizawa and Katsuki knew this wasn’t the full truth.

Sure, he would eventually be okay but right now he wasn’t. He felt stuck, like his feet were caught in a slew of quicksand dragging him down. Katsuki was unsure how to process the loss of an associate. Should he cry? Curse? Hunt down the man who did it and kill him to avenge Hiryu? He really didn’t fucking know. Katsuki tried to recall how he processed his own father’s death—then he realized he hadn’t.

He had never been given the moment to truly let such a thing settle in.

The dark, hungry part of him had been birthed instead. It consumed and consumed until he no longer felt the hurt of grief.

“Okay,” Aizawa said. He awkwardly rocked on his feet, not good at the whole comforting thing. The elder hitman patted Katsuki’s shoulder which earned him a disdained frown. “Er. Well, your mother is here.”

Katsuki whipped his head hard enough to double his neck pain.

“Hah? What the hell is she doing here?”

“You’ve been out for three days,” Aizawa clarified. Katsuki’s eyebrows shot up. “I notified her when they found your body on the rooftop and she demanded to come see you. She seemed rather distressed. She hadn’t left your side until this morning when I told her she should go out for fresh air. She should be coming back soon.”

“I don’t fucking want her here,” Katsuki snapped. “Tell her to get back on that damn plane and I’ll see her when I go get my things to move out.”

Aizawa grew quiet, clearly stunned by this. “What do you mean by that?”

“It means I don’t want to see her.”

The elder hitman opened and closed his mouth, as if wanting to say more. He cleared his throat and then frowned deeply. “Kid. I’m not sure what happened between you two, but I talked to her about some things that might help you both out—”

As if on cue, his mother waltzed in with a bouquet of flowers.

He frowned at the tears in her eyes and how fancy she was dressed. She had on her signature soft lavender cardigan, black pencil skirt and white blouse. Her neck was decorated in those shiny white pearls she never let go of and the wedding ring on her widowed hand was shined perfectly new.

“Ah! Katsuki, you’re awake,” she said very happily. “Fuck. I’m so glad. I was worried.”

She rushed over, placed the flowers on his lap and gave him a tight hug. She squeezed him warmly, but Katsuki let his arms hang limply at his side, not returning the gesture. Aizawa raised a brow.

Katsuki’s chest reverberated with resentment.

He recalled the last time he spoke to his mother before boarding the flight to Vienna. He thought about his dad—er, dads? Katsuki furrowed his brow, still digesting the information that was dropped he had ignored very bluntly.

“I’m so glad you’re okay,” Mitsuki whispered. She withdrew back, ignoring how Katsuki didn’t seem too ecstatic to see her.

Katsuki’s eyes evaded hers and landed blankly on the television. He didn’t let any emotion show in his face. “You didn’t have to come all the way out here.”

“Sure I did, brat,” Mitsuki teased as if they were fucking fine. “You’re my only kid. What kind of mother would I be to get the call that my son was nearly killed then not come out to the hospital?”

Katsuki bit his tongue. He decided against telling her it would fit her track record.

“Well, I’m okay,” Katsuki mumbled under his breath. “I’m always okay.”

“I’m going to go talk to some of the other agents to gather more details about Hiryu’s mysterious bother slash killer,” Aizawa quickly announced when the tension prickled his skin. “I’ll see you guys a little later.”

Mother and son waved goodbye to him as he stood up and exited the room swiftly. Katsuki was both relieved and irritated to be left alone with his mother. He was glad Aizawa didn’t have to see the embarrassment of their strained interaction. However, Katsuki was unhappy he had to face her now.

She walked around the bedside, holding her designer leather bag on her shoulder and sat where Aizawa was just at. Her eyes were soft and genuinely caring as she reached to hold his hand.

Katsuki shifted out of her touch.

Hurt danced across Mitsuki’s face. She retracted her hand and toyed with her fingers in her lap.

“I knew this job would be dangerous for you, Katsuki,” Mitsuki muttered. “But today it sunk in that you have been risking your life to do things like pay my rent. Pay my electric bill. Pay for things I should be paying for you. You’re only seventeen and you’ve already had one brush with death.”

Katsuki clicked his tongue. “Two.”

“Two?” Mitsuki questioned. She seemed genuinely confused.

“I nearly had hypothermia in Tokyo. When you left me there in the winter by myself without proper clothes.”

He knew he was being cruel to remind her of that. She actively avoided discussing it, but Katsuki felt fed up. He was goddamn sick of this dizzying circle they were always trapped in. The ticking clock strummed on as his mother didn’t utter another word and Katsuki stared at the wall.

“I’m going to get better. For real this time,” Mitsuki whispered, barely audible.

Katsuki exhaled deeply and shook his head. “You don’t have to keep making promises you can’t keep. It’s starting to get really fucking annoying.”

“No, I mean it this time. No more gambling. Getting that call felt like when I got the call for Masaru.” She paused and looked down at her wedding ring. “Seeing you unconscious in this hospital bed just like him made me realize that I was close to losing you too. If I don't get better then I'm going to lose time with you. Even though it's late. Maybe you could even quit this job and get out of that contract."

"I signed a binding contract, I can't quit," Katsuki said curtly. "Besides, I would rather keep working and risk my life this way than the other way. At least I'm in control of how I am in danger."

He knew he was cruel for that one too. He should stop pushing her failures directly in her face, but he wanted her to grasp all the damage she inflicted.

Mitsuki sucked on her teeth as if tasting her words before speaking. "Well. I will still try to be better. I promise. I'm going to go get help as soon as we get back to Japan."

He nodded, tired. He was ready to move on from this pointless shit.

He noticed she hadn't inquired how he was doing like Aizawa had. He thought about the strangled, helpless sound Hiryu had made before the bullet sank into his skull.

His mother hugged him, then began talking about how she walked around Vienna the last few days. Mitsuki discussed how she had never been out of the country and how beautiful the city was. As she did this, Katsuki quietly relived the moment he witnessed his friend die in his head.

He looked down at the flowers she had laid on the bed and noticed they were her favorite. Not his.

Pink carnations.

Katsuki didn't take his mother's promise of getting better seriously.

He always wanted to believe her, like a naive child. He always thought the older someone was the wiser they should be. But as he looked at his mother, he didn't believe that anymore. He was unsure if he really ever could because all he saw was a fragile, struggling human who happened to give birth to him.

Because of this, when they got back to Japan, Katsuki promptly moved out.

His mother tried to stop him, thinking they would move past the spat they had. But Katsuki remained unmoving like a mountain in his decision. The truth about his biological father solidified that he was sick of the life he was living and needed space to figure out things on his own.

The apartment he bought was luxe and directly in downtown Yokohama. It was everything he always imagined himself living in: expensive wooden floors, high ceilings. Big ass bedrooms and a fridge stacked to the brim with his favorite foods. All the appliances inside were made of shiny, metallic crap he could barely pronounce. He even had a master bedroom along with an at home ‘office’ space that was really just his room for sorting through his files. It made him feel more important than he was.

But the atmosphere of the apartment was wrong. Every time he walked in discomfort tugged at his bones. The whole space was hollow, and the prickling sense of superficialities stung against his skin.

“What is missing?” Katsuki had grumbled to himself.

He glared at the expensive abstract green and orange art he placed on the wall. Fancy shit like this was supposed to make him feel good. Right? What the hell was the point of all this if he still felt like he was homeless?

He thought back to how warm the house had been with his father. Masaru’s laughter would be like wind chimes and the three of them always hung out. They used to spend so much time together and Katsuki missed that type of attention. Even though he was no longer that kid, he was still searching for a place that felt similar.

Then he thought about the nook in Tokyo.

The warmth of the boy from the city had comforted him so much he hadn’t minded living in an abandoned building for nearly a year. Then he realized it was because it felt like a home. That shotty little shit hole made him feel welcomed, and excited.

He failed to put his finger on it, but what was the anatomy of a home? What made its spine and forged its bones?

Katsuki couldn’t figure it out as he sat in this carcass of an apartment that felt painfully empty.

As the months went on without him and his mother living together, something clicked in Mitsuki. Surprisingly, for the first time in Katsuki’s life his mother actually tried to get better in a different manner.

Usually when she made her empty promises, she would straighten out her wardrobe and clean the apartment. She would hide all the liquor at the top of the cabinets as though that would really keep her from it. She would throw out her poker cards and put the chips in a shoe box underneath her bed. These were all half efforts to really get better. Performative even. Katsuki could tell she was keeping her vices within reach if she ever wanted them again.

But this time was different. Instead of making a lackluster attempt, she went to the doctor.

“I had talked to someone,” his mother said on the day she came back from seeing the physician. “He—I mean they suggested that I should go talk to a doctor. I’m going to start seeing a therapist and I’m going to start on some medication.”

“What kind of medication?” Katsuki had asked. “Anti-depressant or something?”

His mother pursed her lips. “Nothing you have to concern yourself with. Alright?”

Katsuki scoffed. What a stupid thing to say. “I always have to concern myself with you in case something goes wrong. Just tell me.”

“No. It’s private,” Mitsuki pushed back. “Only thing you have to know is that I’m taking steps to be more functional. That’s all a kid like you should be concerning yourself with.”

A kid. Katsuki glowered. He was immediately rubbed wrong because that sounded straight out of Aizawa’s damn mouth.

“I pick up a gun every day to pay your bills,” Katsuki jeered. “Any notion of being a kid was buried a long time ago when I buried that body for you, so just tell me. Why the hell are you being so defensive?”

That was apparently the wrong thing to say. His mother grimaced so deeply, the muscles on her face looked like they were twitching.

“If I say it’s none of your concern, it’s none of your goddamn concern.”

“But—”

“—No!” She nearly screamed. Tears clung to the edge of her eyes now, ready to spill down as she yelled at him. “Leave it alone and worry about your damn self, Katsuki!”

“Oh. That’s fucking rich,” Katsuki barked maliciously. “If I had to only worry about myself I wouldn’t have signed that goddamn contract with Aizawa. Stop acting like you’re on some weird fucking high horse suddenly unless you’re not really taking medicine. You’re probably just fucking lying again, aren’t you?”

His mother snapped on him after that.

He wanted to tell her to calm down and simply tell him what medication, but she chewed him out. When he pressed on it further, she raised her voice to an ear shattering tone, tantrum in full swing. Out of rage, he raised his voice back until they were like clashing storms. Without fail, they got into a big blow out and this time when Katsuki waltzed out the apartment, he didn’t look back. He slammed the door hard enough to shake the walls and he could hear her crying from inside.

His mother was angry at someone.

Whether that someone was herself or him he wasn’t sure. But he felt an irreversible shift between them.

He was bitter about being shielded from whatever she was doing—or taking. He was partly concerned it wasn’t actually medication, but Katsuki had to remind himself not to give a shit if she got better or not. She wasn’t going to. Years of empty promises had left nothing but sore spots littered all over his heart.

When he went to bed that night, part of his sympathy for her died.

He sent her the money for her bills every month and they barely spoke afterwards.

In the months following, silence was the only tie between mother and son.

Aizawa noticed this, especially when Katsuki's high school graduation rolled around, and his mother had simply given him a halfway hug. No presents. No 'I'm proud of you'. Nothing but a cheap smile and a small clap. The elder hitman had asked Katsuki what happened, but the young blond deflected. He mumbled under his breath and said it was nothing.

Aizawa obviously didn't believe him. But Katsuki couldn't bear to explain to the same man who told him to jump ship, that he wish he fucking had.

At the dinner that consisted of Aizawa, his mother and Miruko, the three adults chatted. Katsuki could tell his mother was different during these sparse moments of interaction. She seemed more present. His mother didn't seem intimidated like she usually did. Normally she would attempt to play up her life to cover her insecurities.

She actually seemed better, and it soured Katsuki.

Maybe the distance was good. Maybe they were better off and this whole time they were each other's destructive tendencies.

"I haven't gambled in months," she told him privately once Miruko and Aizawa left the fancy restaurant. She smiled at him softly. "I, uh, have been going to therapy. I also started going to a pottery class."

"That's good," Katsuki had replied. He gave her a strained, cautious smile. "Glad you're happy."

"What universities were you thinking of?" She asked, trying to push along the small talk.

"I wasn't planning on going to university. I don't really see the point since I make so much money per assignment."

Mitsuki frowned. "But what about after you finish with this job, what will you do?"

The idea of musical composition popped into Katsuki's mind. But he wasn't sure if he felt comfortable enough to tell her about that side of him ever again.

"I'll figure it out."

His icy demeanor chilled the air. He felt guilty to an extent, but he didn't feel like he trusted her anymore. He was waiting to see if she slipped once again and then finally he can be confirmed in his beliefs about her. She was in an unnerving vicious cycle, and she was going to drag Katsuki down with her if he stuck too closely.

She smiled sadly at him and paid for the meal.

They parted ways and didn't speak much again for several months.

When Katsuki turned eighteen she sent him a basket of pink carnations and inside was a bunch of random stuff. All Might themed shit he had forgotten about. The basket was stuffed to the brim with the latest comics and it felt like a knife to the heart looking at these things now.

Unwillingly, the comics reminded him of Tokyo. More so, they reminded him of the kind boy who had helped him out that he left behind.

As he stared at these comics Katsuki frowned.

His memory was hazier as he tried to reach back to that year after a decade now. He could recall the distant sound of laughter, but the face of the boy was blurry now.

When did that happen?

He didn't even realize he had forgotten what he looked like. Time had slipped past him so much he could barely touch it and it felt like a distant daydream. As he searched his mind, he found it was now a tangled-up maze. Lurking in every corner was a dead body, or the dark side of him with the gruesome smile. He even saw his father and Hiryu laying there, stacked on top of each other. Their eyes were lifeless and dull.

Then finally he saw Imasuji Goto covered in blood. The vicious vision of the gangster chuckled in his mind.

"The apple never falls too far from the tree," he heard Imasuji Goto's static like voice speak to him in his mind. "Like father, like son. Right?"

Katsuki decided to stop reaching for his memory when that visual graced him. He put the comics down and shoved them underneath his bed.

When he returned to The Company on his eighteenth birthday, everything changed.

"Welcome to the real show, kid." Aizawa said as he handed him a neat leather briefcase and ID card.

It had a green lanyard and his photo ID on it. Katsuki blinked at how official it looked. Damn. Had he really been playing the low part of the field this whole time? Katsuki pondered this as Aizawa led them to an entirely different part of the shiny building.

There were more doors and secret codes used. Hell, even Aizawa's eyeball and thumbprint were scanned. When they reached the new lobby, it was much more sterile. Instead of black colored walls it was a glaring, bright white color scheme and far quieter.

“This is Sector H. The part of The Company that deals with high profile requests, hence the H,” Aizawa said. “I run part of this along with half of Sector A, which is where we take more of the questionable requests. This part of the company is saved for a clientele that’s far more elite than specific standards. They tend to come with a stickier legal team.”

“Damn,” Katsuki said. He was fucking impressed. “And I’m part of Sector H now?”

“Yup. Under my supervision and recommendation. I’m putting you on M-Unit.”

Aizawa jutted his head towards a very large conference room made of glass with white table and chairs. Inside were several people waiting. Katsuki squinted his eyes and noticed there were four figures sitting inside chatting casually and goofing around. Right before they opened the clear door to the room, Katsuki had to ask a question.

“What does the M stand for?”

Aizawa stopped, turned to him, and looked him dead in the eye. “Migraine Unit.”

Katsuki’s mouth hung open. “Hey, what the fuck is that supposed to mean?”

Aizawa didn’t entertain him with a further explanation. He whipped open the door and immediately the four figures sitting inside stood up and put their hands behind their backs. Katsuki was still stuck on the fucking fact this was The Migraine Unit as he looked at the other people in the room and noticed they were all his age.

“Bakugou, I would like for you to meet your new team,” Aizawa said flatly. “Everyone, meet Bakugou Katsuki. He’s going to be joining your squadron for the complex assignments that require multiple people.”

Standing in front of him was the most peculiar bunch Katsuki had ever seen. One canary blond teen with pearly whites and a black streak in his hair waved at him enthusiastically. He had large lightning-colored headphones hanging around his neck while his golden eyes were sparkling with joy.

“First up we have Kaminari Denki,” Aizawa said as he pointed to the canary blond.

“Ayo!” Denki said happily. His voice curled enthusiastically on the ends, and he stared at Katsuki like they were going to be best friends. “Nice to meet you! So glad to have another migraine on the team!”

Aizawa’s eyebrow twitched. “He is unfortunately the lead of electronics and technology of Sector D.”

“How did that happen?” Katsuki mumbled. He tilted his head at the high energy teen in front of him who definitely did not strike Katsuki as ‘computer genius’.

“Oh! This is my favorite story to tell!” Denki chimed. His bright face split into an even more radiant grin as he raised his hand like he was in class. Aizawa actually pointed towards him, letting him take the wheel. “You know those goose viruses? The ones that pop up on your screen and steal your files and then sink your computer afterwards?”

Katsuki cocked his head. “…Yeah?”

“He hacked me,” Aizawa said, irritated. He gritted his teeth. “I was in the middle of sorting through very sensitive case files when suddenly a tiny goose appeared on my screen. Next thing I know, the entire Company’s firewall is dropped, and the lights go out.”

“No fucking way.” Katsuki chuckled slightly. “You got hacked by a digital goose?”

“That information doesn’t leave this room,” Aizawa snapped quickly. His dark eyes narrowed into thin slits dangerously at Katsuki and Denki. “I immediately hunted down the source thinking it would be a rival agency. But instead, I found Kaminari in his dirty room covered in pizza stains and hentai magazines on the floor with questionable piles of tissue.”

Katsuki scrunched his nose. “That’s disgusting.”

“Very.” Aizawa nodded.

“I hacked them for fun one day.” Denki snickered. “I was trying to prove that they were real! People didn’t believe me when I kept saying there was some secret underground hitman company! It was so cool when Aizawa came into my dorm room yelling—”

“—Basically, I was stuck between hiring him or killing him,” Aizawa said tiredly. “No one had ever hacked our systems successfully before, so. I hired him. Better to have that type of intelligence on your side than for it to go to waste.”

“A mistake in many ways,” someone else cut in.

Katsuki cut his eyes towards the person who spoke, and it was a platinum blond with a bored look in his periwinkle eyes. He was dressed in an all-black suit with a baby blue tie with polka dots. A little tacky in Katsuki’s books, but the air of confidence surrounding the other blond was tangible.

“You should have shot Hacker Pikachu in his sleep, Aizawa,” the teen continued. He flipped a coin and grinned cockily. “Solved all our problems.”

“If he shot me, Monoma, you wouldn’t have your guy in the chair,” Denki said proudly. He wiggled his eyebrows and grinned wide. “You and Shinsou would’ve failed half the assignments you take without me getting you through security.”

At this, the platinum blond teen now identified as Monoma huffed and rolled his eyes.

“These two are Monoma Neito and Shinsou Hitoshi,” Aizawa said. He gestured to the platinum blond teen and the quiet purple haired teen standing off in the corner. The quieter of the two had a white scarf covering his nose and mouth mysteriously with deep lilac eyes. “The Phantom Killer and The Puppet Master, respectively.”

Katsuki furrowed his brow when the names rang a bell. “Those sounds familiar.”

“They’re nicknames they’ve been given through news outlets,” Aizawa explained. “I tracked these two down through their aliases and got them out of a very sticky situation.”

It clicked.

He had heard those names on the news a couple of times over the years. A duo of murderers who hunted people, usually scummy people, and were incredibly hard to find. Specifically, The Phantom Killer was the one the news was most interested in. The Puppet Master was more so a theory, a shadow that lurked behind The Phantom Killer because the police suspected it needed to be two people to pull off the murders that were committed.

A trail of goosebumps ignited on Katsuki's skin slightly.

"They're serial killers," Katsuki murmured.

"That's only how it's been framed through the media," Monoma cut down. He leaned against the white table and cocked his head. "Hitoshi and I were orphans who grew up together. The orphanage we were at wasn't the best…I decided we needed to get out. We got recruited by a different hitman company very young because we were tired of the abuse. We never kill for fun or maliciousness like typical serial killers. But we were trained there to immolate famous dead serial killers to throw off the tracks. So, it looks as though phantoms or puppet masters are committing the crimes."

"Journalists go crazy about those types of things," Shinsou said without much emotion on his face. He pulled up his phone and opened a small article to show Katsuki. "Headline 'Ghosts Can Kill: Who is Pulling the Strings?' for the fourth time this month."

Katsuki blinked.

Interesting. They were like him; they did this to survive too.

"Why did you leave your other company?" Katsuki asked.

"We killed our old supervisor," Monoma explained with a tight smile. "We found out he was abusing children. After that, I decided he had to go. Shinsou agreed with me."

"Neither of us are fans of abusers, especially people who hurt children," Shinsou said plainly and shrugged. "Plus, the pay here is better."

Katsuki couldn't argue with that. He nodded in a subtle approval and probed his tongue into his cheek. He then turned to the last person in the room. It was a tall, lanky guy with deep black hair similar to Aizawa's. He had a giant grin with a couple of crooked teeth and kind brown eyes.

"And I'm Sero!" The dark-haired teen said, joyfully. "Nice to meet you, Bakugou!"

Aizawa tilted his head. "Sero is my nephew for full disclosure."

"You hired a family member?" Katsuki exclaimed in surprise.

"Yes. He's a bit of a loner," Aizawa said. His voice was laced with some level of pity. "He never really had friends growing up due to his…morbid interests and I'm his favorite family member. Unfortunately, that means he likes to hang out with me. We wound up here in a series of annoying events."

"I blackmailed him into hiring me," Sero clarified. His face split into a grin and he gave two thumbs up. "I wanted to go over and hang out with him after a bad day at school. But when I got to his house, some dudes busted in like some James Bond movie! My uncle here killed them easily and I helped him hide the evidence with my rad knowledge of how to get rid of bodies."

Katsuki stared at Sero's grinning face in pure bafflement. "…You just knew how to get rid of bodies?"

"I know over a thousand ways to dispose of a body," Sero said proudly. Katsuki grew uncomfortable when Sero leaned in a little too eagerly to him and whispered, "the most fun way is with acid."

Katsuki frowned so hard he was sure he gave himself permanent wrinkles.

"Like I said, he has morbid interests," Aizawa said tiredly. "Denki is our hacker. Sero is body clean up. You, Monoma and Shinsou are going to be the main men on the ground. Combined, you five should be a perfect squad for executing perfectly complicated assignments."

"What's his deal though?" Monoma interjected. He inspected Katsuki up and down and raised an unimpressed brow. "How did you take pity on blondie number three to wind up here in your guilt trip unit?"

Aizawa didn't answer, he turned towards Katsuki to speak.

The look he was giving Katsuki was as soft as Aizawa could muster. It translated 'only speak if you want to'. Katsuki took the hint and he found himself feeling a little guarded about himself. He had never had to open up before to anyone, much less a homicidal group of teens.

Katsuki settled for the most concise version of his story. "I killed one of Aizawa's men when I was fourteen. Instead of killing me, he hired me in place of him to pay off the debt. I actually like the job, so I stuck around."

Aizawa raised a brow at the thinly stretched truth.

Denki, Shinsou and Sero seemed to take the reasoning and nodded.

However, Monoma was giving Katsuki a scrutinizing stare. His eyes dug into Katsuki in a way that contradicted the softness of his eye color. They locked eyes for a moment and Katsuki could have sworn he saw a familiar dark look on Monoma's face. He realized at that moment that Monoma was the most similar to him.

Monsters recognized monsters, Katsuki supposed.

"Neat!" Denki said happily. "So we got three killers on the team! I'm okay with this. I somehow feel a lot safer now."

“Why would you feel safer with more killers on the team?” Shinsou questioned slowly.

Before Denki could give his, no doubt, long winded answer, Aizawa cleared his throat. He held up five green folders in his hand and it drew everyone’s attention.

“As much as I would love to hear the explanation behind that, I have an assignment for you five,” Aizawa said sarcastically. He started to distribute the folders accordingly and each one was stamped with each teen’s respective name. “There’s a client abroad who needs some level of protection, but he also needs some people taken out while he’s in town.”

As Aizawa handed out the folders, Katsuki noted his new ‘team’. But more specifically, he noted the color of the lanyards around their necks that held their ID cards. Sero and Denki’s were yellow. Shinsou and Monoma’s were red. Katsuki glanced down at his own lanyard and noted it was green. Each of the folders they were given matched their lanyard colors.

“Denki and Sero, you’re going for technical support,” Aizawa explained as everyone cracked open their folders. “Shinsou and Monoma, you’re going to take out the individuals listed and Bakugou, you’re on bodyguard duty for the mark who requested the hit.”

“Why am I always on bodyguard duty?” Katsuki questioned.

Everyone turned to him, surprised he had spoken up.

“I make my calls accordingly,” Aizawa said. His tone was short, giving no room for argument as he continued to explain the assignment. “Now, back to what I was saying.”

Katsuki bit his tongue. He attempted to ignore that part of himself that was jealous of the red lanyards around Monoma’s and Shinsou’s necks. He fucking knew green wasn’t bad but he felt like he wasn’t being taken serious. As they all sat down at the table, Aizawa explained the intricacies of the assignment. Katsuki couldn’t stop glaring at the paper in front of him. He counted the 0s attached to the payment number happily, but he hated how his folder was green.

He pushed down the bitter, dark part of him and decided to focus on the good.

This assignment was in Taiwan.

He had never been there before, maybe this could be fun.

Taiwan was beautiful. The air was clean, fresh and filled his lungs with a feeling he wished he could take back home with him. The five of them had landed in the new country with their suits and guns ready to go.

Their client this time was a young adult by the name of Chih-wei Tang. He had a bright, charming smile and a shining personality to match.

Chih-wei was fluent in Japanese and knew how to really lay on the charm, and he didn’t actually seem that bad. The issue with this assignment though, despite how nice the man was, he had a past history of drug smuggling for notorious, less nice people. Chih-wei acted like a port to get contraband in and out of China, Japan, and surrounding countries and Asia without being on the radar too much since he wasn't a big name.

However, in recent years, many of his old clientele were realizing he had mixed their drug of choice with filler substance and kept the real half for himself. In short, he was stealing from dangerous men.

After years of setting up his own drug ring, Chih-wei had a large beach house in Taiwan where he hosted big parties. He was the talk of the town and if you got an invite from Chih-wei, then you were as good as gold.

But, if Katsuki was able to give his opinion, he'd say this man was stupid.

Who the hell would invite people into their house when there were drug lords who were looking to chop his head off? But he guessed that's what they were there for. Guarding some man who had to have a mansion full of people drinking and laughing.

When the night of the assignment came, the party that was thrown was the most lavish thing Katsuki had ever witnessed. Part of him was intrigued, the other half was revolted. This was wasteful as shit. Drunk men and women were running all over, jumping in the pool, and flirting. All of the service people were dressed in skimpy, knockoff playboy bunny outfits with fishnets. The service folks were all outrageously attractive, serving everyone green drinks and wine bottles with dazzling sparklers in them.

"This isn't exactly the scene I would have guessed for our first assignment together," Shinsou commented when they walked in.

The five of them stood there, clearly sore thumbs in the crowd. Silver and gold confetti rained down on them as pop music played in the background. Unlike all the half nude party goers, they were all dressed in black suits. Katsuki muttered unhappily as he shrugged off his blazer and threw it over his broad shoulders. He ran a hand through his hair and pushed back his bangs a bit.

Fucking body heat. The mansion was too stuffy for Aizawa's 'hitman dress code' bullshit. As they stood there awkwardly, several drunk people caught sight of Katsuki and winked at him with curled fingers.

Katsuki blanched. "I hate this place already."

"Think of it like team bonding!" Denki suggested. He propped his designer sunglasses on his head with a big grin. His eyes crawled over the mansion like he was in heaven. "Whoa, this place is amazing. I swear this is the exact bunny waiter outfit I've seen in a lot of my adult online games."

Katsuki scoffed at Denki and shook his head.

"Please don't say that to anyone," Monoma groaned. "I know you have a porn addiction, pikachu, so don't say anything weird to the servers tonight or I'm shooting you on sight."

He was dressed the exact opposite of the hitmen with a half-unbuttoned leopard print silk blouse and gold chain. He coupled this with crisp white pants and pointed gator shoes that were far more fashionable than Katsuki ever would have guessed.

“Thank you so much for coming,” Chih-wei said with a cool air. “I really appreciate you all being here tonight so I can enjoy the alignment of the stars to the fullest! I want to always make sure to respect the constellations.”

“You’re throwing a raging party because of astrology?” Shinsou clarified. He raised a thin brow and crossed his arms. “Seems a bit wasteful.”

“Fate is nothing to take lightly.” Chih-wei laughed and playfully hit Shinsou’s shoulder. “I read in the astrology books today that this is the day we will run into our fate. It could be a person, money, or even death. But fate is gracing us this afternoon. So what better way to celebrate it than with an amazing party! Come! I have saved seats for you in my VIP section.”

Chih-wei laughed and talked with them all the way to the part of his house that was even more packed.

It was a large, open area with an indoor pool and maroon velvet couches stacked all around. One section was heavily guarded with men in black with earpieces and their guns were very much visible on their sides. When they finally sat down in the VIP section with Chih-wei, the man served them nothing but the finest of party foods and liquor.

They sat there all night chatting with him, discussing his private jet and all his adventures. Denki and Sero were the most interested while Shinsou and Monoma were slightly standoffish about it.

Katsuki however, had tuned it out.

He had a certain disdain for the ultra-wealthy, and all he could see around him was bill money being wasted. He glanced at all the people and wondered if this is how Chih-wei lived every day. However, as he was trying to figure out where the confetti was falling from, Katsuki’s sights caught on one particular bunny server whose back was turned towards him.

His eyebrows shot up and a blush rose on his face.

Well, damn.

Standing on the other side of the large pool serving drinks was a male server who was slightly bent over. His back was perfectly arched with the sexiest ass and legs Katsuki had ever seen. His muscular legs were cladded in tight fishnets and the taut, skimpy outfit gave a little bit of an outline of his manhood. Katsuki struggled to tear his eyes away when the waiter bent over more. The waiter had straight, light blue hair that tapered at his nape. Katsuki couldn’t see how he looked, but he knew an ass like that had to have a cute face to match.

A foreign, hot feeling raced down Katsuki's core when he considered what the sound of ripping fishnets would be like.

"There's a lot of sexy people here," Sero pointed out when Chih-wei's attention was drawn elsewhere.

Monoma didn't bother looking around. "Sure."

"What? You don't think anyone here is cute?" Denki asked.

"I have a girlfriend," Monoma said. He shrugged, not interested in all the tempting people who were packed around them. He turned his sights on Bakugou, who was still staring at the guy across the way. "How about you, Bakugou? Do you have a girlfriend or boyfriend? Or are you single as a Pringle?"

"Judging by the way his eyes keep viciously eye fucking that male waiter, I assume he's single," Shinsou quipped as he sipped his drink. "Or at least I hope he is."

"Yeah, I am," Katsuki answered.

He cleared his throat to bring himself back to reality. He eyed that poor waiter's backside a little too hard. But he was just so goddamn perfect. He had never seen an ass that perky before without clothes.

Well. He thought back to Vienna and was horribly reminded Deku had a cute ass like that.

The bunny waiter bent over to give full fucking view of his manhood area cladded in the leather leotard for the world to see. It stirred a feeling in Katsuki's core he never bothered to touch. But all Katsuki could think about now was running his hands down the smooth, toned skinned man on the other side of the room.

"This is a real *ass*ignment, am I right?" Denki gave a cocksure grin as he ogled the perky backside of the waiter who Katsuki couldn't take his sights off.

"Definitely," Katsuki whispered, dazed. "Emphasis on the ass."

Shinsou shook his head at him in disapproval. "You both are being disrespectful. If you're done eye fucking that guy, you should go up and ask for his name. Like a gentleman."

"Gentle probably isn't in Bakugou's vocabulary," Monoma pointed out casually.

He swirled his green drink and cut his eye towards Katsuki. Katsuki cut his eye back.

"What the hell was that supposed to mean?"

"What? Am I wrong?"

"You're not wrong but you're not right either," Katsuki grumbled, deflecting from the discomfort he felt in his chest. Monoma smirked slightly, satisfied with the answer. "I've just never had to be a gentleman or whatever. Shoot me for thinking the waiter was cute enough to stare at for a while."

"Being a gentleman comes with practice," Shinsou lectured. He smirked at Katsuki and gestured towards the server who was now walking the other direction. "Go ahead, talk to him if you really want to. You're a looker if you haven't noticed, half the people in here turned their heads when you walked by. I'm sure he'll be just as star-stuck. Monoma and I will be here to cover anything that happens and ensure the mark is safe."

"Yeah! Go flirt, Bakugou!" Denki encouraged. "We got everything covered over here."

Katsuki looked unsure, he had never pursued something like this.

Technically he was still a goddamn virgin but he wasn't about to let these dunces on his team be aware of that. The young blond threw his head back and took a full shot of vodka down his throat to give him extra confidence. He smoothed out his blond spikes and rid himself fully of his blazer. Sero snickered and undid the first three buttons on his white shirt and Shinsou gave him an encouraging pat on the shoulders.

Katsuki slowly walked over and trailed behind the waiter, practicing what to say in his head. A loud pop song played overhead and he very bluntly ignored the people who tried to grab his attention along the way.

When he finally was directly behind that beautiful ass, Katsuki grinned wide and tapped the guy on the shoulder.

"Hey there," Katsuki greeted in choppy mandarin. He wasn't fluent but he knew enough to try to see if he could get the conversation going. He smirked at the cute blue hair of the waiter who had bunny ears perched on his head. "I know this is weird, but I think you're really damn cute. I wanted to, er, see if you would like to go somewhere a little more private?"

The waiter stiffened at the sound of his voice.

Then like a bad nightmare, the waiter turned around and it was Deku in a fucking wig.

"You?!" Both Katsuki and Deku exclaimed in Japanese.

All hell broke loose as several things happened at once: Katsuki angrily grappled at Deku, but unfortunately grabbed the blue wig in the process. Deku swiftly snatched himself out of Katsuki's grasp and stumbled back in the heels he was in, revealing his real hair color. Green. Green fucking curls were now visible for everyone to see. Then in a heartbeat Deku reached down in his leotard and pulled out several little knives and flung them at Katsuki.

Katsuki swiftly dodged the sharp objects as they whistled in the air and tried to stop Deku. But Katsuki ended up punching the other man in the throat instead. Deku made a choking sound and everyone in the surrounding area started screaming and scattered when the deadly little knives plunged into the paintings of Chih-wei on the wall versus into Chih-wei.

Deku swiftly recovered and dropped Katsuki on his back with a full kick, knocking the air out of his lungs.

“What are you doing here!?” Deku demanded, sounding just as shocked as he was.

Katsuki yelled loudly, tripping up Deku and bringing him down to his level. “I should be asking you that, you worthless little—”

He didn’t get to finish that sentence when Deku started trying to stab him with a fang shaped dagger. The other assassin was attempting to go for his jugular, but his movements weren’t as concise as Vienna. Or maybe Katsuki was angrier and more prepared. Whichever it was, they were in a stalemate of dodging punches and knives. Deku was sloppier, and a lot more frantic than before as though he was upset at the sight of Katsuki.

After tussling, Deku clearly gave up. He grunted loudly in frustration and ran off into the quickly dispersing crowd. Katsuki cursed under his breath when he realized this little fucker was probably here to kill his mark.

Katsuki stood up as well when Deku started going at high speed into the room with the VIP section. Katsuki followed hot on his heels, screaming for his colleagues to get to their designated safe zone. He waved his hands frantically to signal trouble, and Shinsou and Monoma pulled out their guns. Sero and Denki quickly rushed Chih-wei out of the VIP section and they all formed a wall of protection around their mark.

Katsuki pushed the lavish party goers out of his way as he chased behind Deku, landing many of them into the indoor pool. It was then Katsuki realized Deku was trying to lose him in some rabid goose chase. The shorter man was running at full speed in fucking heels towards his mark. Katsuki cursed when he realized the little fucker was probably trying to find a way to get to Chih-wei now that he had been exposed.

“Get fucking back here!” Katsuki screamed as Deku started running up a flight of stairs.

“Leave me alone!” Deku screamed back, angrily glaring over his shoulders. “I told you to stay out of my way!” Deku moved like goddamn liquid in the crowd, like a ballet dancer who was fluid on his toes. He ran up the stairs to where Chih-wei had been escorted but Katsuki wasn’t about to have it.

When Deku was up the stairs, Katsuki took a chance and aimed his gun at Deku. He rapidly fired off two shots, making bystanders nearby scream in horror. Deku ducked and quickly used some unsuspecting party goer as a human shield to make Katsuki stop his fire. The blond hitman cursed loudly when he saw the trembling face of the woman who was clearly scared for her life.

Katsuki started to run up the stairs, closing in on the other hitman, but the moment he got close he was swiftly hit upside the head with a heel. Before he had the chance to process, Deku had thrown his goddamn shoes at him, Katsuki was hit again, but this time square in the fucking eye. He had no clue the point of a goddamn heel could hurt so badly.

Katsuki cursed loudly when suddenly he was kicked in the head and forced backwards.

Deku tackled him, and everyone in the room cleared out when the tiny assassin pulled out even more knives. Deku looked ready to kill, but Katsuki checkmated him and quickly grabbed his wrists. Everything after that was a struggle that Katsuki would soon find familiar. Deku punched him. Katsuki kicked him. Deku bit him. Katsuki slammed him against the wall. Deku tried to slice his throat and Katsuki tried to choke him to death.

They went back and forth, knocking over all the glass vases and expensive items in the house. Eventually, Katsuki gained the upper hand and he slammed Deku's head against the pretty white marble until the other assassin looked dizzy. Green eyes were wide, and the man looked like he was going to be seasick.

He looked just like Hiryu did against the floor, and that one memory caused Katsuki to wrap both his hands around Deku's throat and squeeze. The other hitman grunted in surprise and looked up at him as he began to squirm.

"I'm going to kill you for what you did to Hiryu," Katsuki promised with a sneer.

Anger swelled in his chest until it was about to explode. It was hot, scathing with rage. He could see the haunting visual of Hiryu bleeding out on the rooftop in Vienna. It fueled his passionate hate for the green menace underneath him. His monsters oozed out of him like thick, dark liquid as he forced his way between Deku's legs and tightened his grip around his slender throat.

Deku whimpered slightly and scratched at his hands as he was pinned down.

Katsuki put his whole weight on the small man, trying to force him to stop squirming. He wanted him dead for what he had done. But the pressure only made Deku squirm more. The smaller body under him was bucking, trying to throw him off and the feeling of the leather leotard against his pants created an unwanted, new friction Katsuki hadn't felt before. The bucking made him feel hot, and hotter until he found himself bucking back. He pulled a soft gasp from Deku's pretty pink lips.

Katsuki's nerves started to tingle the more he met Deku's bucking. He thought the hot feeling was hatred—but it was different. It felt more addictive and…good?

Katsuki snapped his eyes down.

Deku's fishnet cladded thighs spread out under him looked far different than he thought it would.

Then Deku struggled once more, letting out a gasping sound that was a little too pleasant to his ears. The smaller man grunted desperately as he reached down for something. Then directly followed was the sound of ripping fishnets and it gripped Katsuki at the bottom of his stomach.

Without warning, the vision of Deku's pretty doll face gasping underneath him made all the blood in Katsuki rush downwards.

He froze.

His grip loosened just enough for Deku to gasp for air. They stared at each other for a moment and the heat in his belly coiled tightly, ready to snap.

Then like a switch, Deku's blushing doll face twisted into a venomous snarl, and he lurched forward. Katsuki yelled in pain when Deku head butted him with all his damn strength. The young blond grabbed at his head when he felt a rush of dizziness and the small man scrambled from underneath him. Deku then swiftly kicked him in the head, knocking him against the wall and ran off out of the house.

Katsuki groaned from the blow and curled on the ground.

Deku. Fucking Deku again. How the hell was this possible?

His dizzy vision blended together Hiryu and the green little shit stain in his brain and frowned. He tried to get up and go chase him to avenge his friend—but his stomach felt queasy.

He was going to fucking hurl from the incoming storm of a headache.

"Bakugou!" Shinsou's voice said from behind him. Katsuki struggled to turn his head, but when he did he could see Shinsou and Denki armed with their handguns glancing around. "Did you get the guy? Where did he go?"

"He fucking got away," Katsuki grumbled. He struggled to stand up, wobbly as he clutched his head. He was angry with himself and downright pissed off that Deku once again got away. "He went the direction of the back yard; we can still chase him if there's time—"

"—Whoa," Denki whispered, chuckling. "Dude. Holy shit."

"What?" Katsuki snapped. "Why are you still standing there and fucking laughing? Go chase him!"

Shinsou pinched the bridge of his nose and turned away from Katsuki like he accidentally saw something he wasn't supposed to. The purple haired teen lowered his gun and shook his head and Denki started to laugh like a maniac. Katsuki leaned against the wall, trying to steady himself from his spinning vision. When his world stopped tilting, Katsuki glanced down and realized what was wrong.

He had a full-blown fucking erection.

"Explain this to me again slowly. The assassin you saw in Vienna was now in Taiwan dressed in a playboy bunny outfit?" Aizawa asked like Katsuki was stupid. "Surely, you're joking."

The flustered blond teen wanted to pull his hair out.

They were back in Japan in their headquarters and all Katsuki wanted to do was track down the goddamn green pest. He could still hear and feel Deku's goddamn body against his, and he didn't understand why.

“I’m not joking!” Katsuki exclaimed. He gestured wildly to the other teens in the room who were holding in snickers about the situation. “He was there, and he was trying to kill our mark, but I stopped him.”

Denki’s snicker burst out into a hearty laugh. “Yeah, with your large boner. I don’t think I’ve ever seen someone with a dick outline that big you probably scared him off with that thing __”

Katsuki shoved Denki out of his chair before he could finish that sentence. Denki yelped as he went toppling over and Aizawa pinched the bridge of his nose to prevent an oncoming headache.

“Back to the topic,” Aizawa grumbled. “If this is the same agent from Vienna, then we might have a problem. Can any of you draw out what he looked like on the board?”

“Sure thing,” Shinsou agreed.

The lavender hair teen stood up and walked over to the front of the conference room. He picked up one of the old, scratchy dry erase markers and drew one of the worst portraits Katsuki had ever seen. His colleague made Deku’s face way too fucking square and he didn’t bother to capture his big ass eyes. Then he only put like eight dots on his face.

“He had more freckles than that,” Katsuki grumbled, slightly flustered.

Everyone’s head turned towards him.

Aizawa opened his mouth, then shut it. Monoma and Sero chuckled under their breath and said some sly shit Katsuki couldn’t hear. He glared at them all for making fun of him. But what was worse was how his hammering heart was consistently speeding up as he stared at the stupidly drawn picture of Deku on the board.

Aizawa shook his head like he didn’t get paid enough for this. “Well. The assignment was completed is all that matters. You all can go, except you, Bakugou. You stay behind, I have something to speak to you about.”

Sero patted him on the shoulder. “Don’t get too turned on by the sexy picture Shinsou drew while you’re talking to the boss.”

“I’ll fucking skin you alive,” Katsuki said from his gritted teeth. His face was burning in embarrassment.

His four colleagues laughed in unison, winking at him and whispering crude jokes. Aizawa didn’t react, pointedly ignoring all the sexual innuendos the teens were making about what had transpired on their first assignment together. When the door clicked shut, Aizawa reached from the bottom of the large stack of papers he had on the glass table.

He pulled out a red folder.

Katsuki raised an eyebrow.

Aizawa fiddled with it for a little while.

“You’ve been doing green folder assignments for a couple of years,” Aizawa muttered slowly. “I wanted to see how you would perform on a green folder assignment that required a bit more intent to kill if needed with the Taiwan assignment.”

“And how did I do?” Katsuki asked, trying to mask his eagerness.

“You did good,” Aizawa said. Katsuki resisted grinning like a fool. “Outside of the whole mystery assassin issue, you did a good job at thinking with your head. I was half expecting you to try to murder the guy, but you didn’t. Which I can respect because it shows restraint. So. I think you’re ready for a red folder assignment now.”

Katsuki wanted to correct him. He did in fact, want to murder Deku. Only reason he hadn’t was because the damn guy was just as skilled if not more skilled than he was. And, er, his situation prevented him from doing any heavy chasing.

But he took the small win.

Aizawa handed him the scarlet envelope with a look of approval.

Katsuki reached for it, and it was heavy in his hands. His heart raced at the prospect of the thrill. It was odd. Finally holding the very thing he’d seen others with for the last four years and now it was finally in his hands. The hungry side of him was rumbling in anticipation as Katsuki opened the folder slowly.

Inside he saw a photo of a man he didn’t know or recognize. He looked like a normal guy to be honest. Katsuki tilted his head because he had been anticipating someone a little gruffer seeming. He looked over the details and there was nothing exactly incriminating either. A simple kill order by a private client.

“What did he do?” Katsuki couldn’t help but ask.

“Nothing that we know,” Aizawa replied, utterly detached. “A mark is a mark. That’s all.”

Concise as always.

Katsuki never considered that the red folder assignments would be like this. Just a name, a photo, and little details. Far less personal than green folders where you had to get to know the person you were protecting. On top of the man’s photograph was the amount Katsuki would be getting paid after The Company took their share. It was a larger amount than any green or yellow assignment. The amount of commas in the numbers appealed to Katsuki as he thought about all the things he could buy for him and his mother.

Er—for him. Not for him and his mother.

Katsuki furrowed his brows. What a bad fucking reflex.

“When do I need to be on the ground?” Katsuki asked.

“We have a forty-eight-hour window to complete the hit,” Aizawa explained easily. “After you finish it off, I’ll transfer you the money once the negotiations are fully complete. Remember to kill from a place of necessity and not passion. Passionate killing is never good. We need to be surgical.”

Katsuki thought this might feel different, but it didn't.

It felt like a regular Wednesday night, and he wasn’t sure if he liked that. Currently, he was stationed on some dusty roof top in all black with a sniper gun. He had a gaiter mask concealing half of his face as his spikes blew in the wind. It was dark outside, cloaking him in further camouflage in this random neighborhood he had never stepped foot in.

The summer breeze was annoyingly refreshing. It gave him some relief from the feeling of suffocating in his all-black attire. He was waiting patiently for his mark to come home from work. Despite being told not to, Katsuki had done snooping and looked up where the man worked. He was an engineer for some tech company and spent his whole life working in HTML and JAVA script code. Katsuki tried to create fake scenarios in his head as to why this man was wanted dead.

But the worst realization was when Katsuki understood there didn’t have to be a reason. This could be as simple as a grudge. Or an ex-spouse. Or even something like ‘I didn’t like the way that guy looked at me this one time’.

There didn’t always have to be reasoning behind killing—Katsuki just had to do as he was asked.

A mark was a mark.

He stayed there, and he never tore his eyes away from the dark window apartment.

Then the moment arrived.

The lights clicked on and all the adrenaline in Katsuki’s body surged.

He calmly grabbed his sniper rifle and looked through the glass. He could see the magnified image of his mark with the red target sitting on top of him. Katsuki took a moment to study the man, and guess what his life was like. The mark was a middle-aged man who looked like he had just gotten off of work. He was dressed in a white button up and blue tie with round glasses that were taped in the middle. His pants still had the tag on them, and he scratched an odd rash on his neck.

Katsuki frowned a bit the longer he studied this stranger.

He was ordinary. Plain. A regular man who seemed tired from the labors of capitalism on his body.

Katsuki fiddled a bit with the trigger, waiting for a sense of glee to come. But it never did. Instead, he remained completely empty like a ship casted off to sea with no passengers. When his mark raked his hand through his dark colored hair, Katsuki realized he was thinking about this too hard. He sucked in a deep breath and refocused.

A mark is a mark.

When the man loosened his tie slightly, Katsuki pulled the trigger.

The bullet was swift.

It cut through the glass, shattering it and leaving a pattern like spiderwebs on the window. It flew true and plunged into one of the man's temples and exited through the other.

The body dropped to the ground immediately and red was splattered on the white wall.

A clean kill. Virtually painless from what Katsuki had researched.

Katsuki removed his eyes from the looking glass and refocused on the window. It seemed so far away now. Then suddenly a scratching feeling knocked against the back of his brain. His burning curiosity wanted to make sure the man was dead, or at least that's what he told himself.

When he viewed through the looking glass again, he saw a small child standing over the man's body. It was a tiny boy, looking confused as he poked at the lifeless body on the ground. Katsuki's face and heart dropped. He quickly snatched his vision away from peering inside the window.

A father.

The man was a father.

A strange feeling gnawed at the inside of Katsuki's gut. The trigger under his finger suddenly felt cold.

"So. How did you feel about it?" Aizawa asked curiously.

Katsuki was currently sitting in his supervisor's office looking at the picture of Koji on his desk. The blond teen was silent. He didn't exactly know how to answer that question. His mind replayed that visual of the small child standing over their father's dead body. He kept visualizing himself inside of the apartment, or as the bullet itself. He only had viewed it through the window—but what if the kid had seen his father drop dead?

"I felt…" Katsuki started. He was unsure what he was experiencing. He was numb, analyzing every little detail until the repetition made it feel meaningless. "…Indifferent? Or. I don't know. I don't feel bad, but I don't feel great either."

Aizawa nodded in approval. "Good. That's the sweet spot."

“What do you mean?” Katsuki asked. He stared at Aizawa strangely.

“Detachment is what you’re feeling,” Aizawa clarified. “It’s good for this job. You shouldn’t be excited to kill or feel any gratification when you put a bullet in a man who seemed utterly innocent. But you also shouldn’t be riddled with guilt because I need you to be on top of your game.”

“Oh.” Katsuki hadn’t thought of it like that. “Detached I guess is the right word.”

“Yes.” Aizawa leaned back in his chair as he flipped through some files. Katsuki counted the number of red versus green folders. There were about twelve reds. Which meant it could be twelve fathers. “This is the exact news you want to get. It means you’re not a psychopathic serial killer but you’re also not dead weight to me.”

“What happens now?” Katsuki asked.

“You start living the way you want to live.” Aizawa gave him a small smile. “Red assignments pay well. I have a couple more red requests that were put on my desk today. I’ll shuffle through them and give you however many you think you can stomach for the week. If there’s something that I think requires the M-Unit I will make sure to call you all here together, but otherwise go get some rest and rebound, Bakugou.”

“Sure.” Katsuki nodded numbly. “Will do.”

He stood up from the desk and did exactly as he was told.

He went home to his empty, lavish apartment. As he flipped through the TV he landed on some random show he had never heard of. It was a show with a family. A loving father and mother and their three children.

Katsuki sat and watched it that night, chest hollowed out.

The next day after his first red folder assignment, Katsuki told Aizawa he needed a breather. He didn’t know why he had asked for it, the assignment itself was anticlimactic in an impossible way. But he still felt like he needed it. Aizawa easily agreed, as if expecting him to call in.

Katsuki found himself wandering like a ghost around the city.

He had barely ever walked around or took the time out to observe. People of all sorts walked by him. Mothers. Fathers. People who were possibly aunts and uncles. There were many people his age, clustered up together in groups that glowed with social butterfly energy. They looked like university students, and Katsuki pictured another version of himself in uni with these groups of friends.

Soon, his feet started to lead him to his mother’s apartment. He knew he should have called or even announced that he was coming to visit her after such a long stretch of silence between them. But he didn’t bother.

On the way there, a tiny flower shop caught his eye.

In the window were beautiful, pink carnations.

Katsuki nervously knocked on his mother's apartment door. He stared down at the flowers in his hands, restless a little bit. It took a minute for any sort of sound to rustle from behind the door. The pessimistic part of Katsuki was experiencing preemptive disgust. His mother was probably inside drinking or gambling. Probably throwing away all the goddamn money he was sending her. The other part of Katsuki was foolishly hopeful and reminded him he loved his mother.

When the door opened, Katsuki realized he wasn't sure what he was doing here.

Mitsuki looked equally as stunned.

Mother and son stared at each other for a moment. Katsuki cleared his throat and scratched behind his head. He peered around her curiously and was surprised to find an empty apartment. Freshly cleaned too with the smell of Pine-Sol wafting in the air.

"Well, someone finally decided to come check on their mother," Mitsuki said sarcastically. She raised a brow at her son and leaned her weight onto one hip. "I've been leaving you all sorts of voicemails and texts. I was starting to think you changed your number."

"Sorry, I was just busy with work," Katsuki deflected. He shrugged, deciding not to feel guilty about neglecting her and her chaos. "I, uh, brought you flowers. I noticed you liked this kind."

Mitsuki reached forward and smiled forcefully. "Pink carnations, yeah. They're my favorite."

She took the flowers in her hand and they both exchanged strained smiles. Mitsuki waited for Katsuki to leave and half of Katsuki waited for it as well. But his feet were glued in place when he thought about the child from last night standing over their dead father.

"Can I come in?" Katsuki quickly asked.

Mitsuki's eyes lit up slightly and she stepped to the side. "Of course."

Katsuki walked inside her apartment for the first time since he moved out. It was exactly how he left it but instead of the mess he was subjected to every day, it was clean. Polished. Shit was put together well. He churned slightly with bitterness and didn't even want to know if the fridge actually had food in it.

As he passed by inside the living room, he noticed a single overdue bill sitting on the countertop.

But instead of being upset, he was indifferent. Just like he had been when he pulled that trigger. He turned towards his mother who had caught sight of him assessing the late bill on the countertop. She smiled at him and quickly moved it out of sight as he walked around the open space. Neither of them mentioned that tiny elephant in the room as she began to put the flowers into a vase.

“How come pink carnations are your favorite?” Katsuki asked as he sat down at the dining table casually.

“My mother used to grow them in our garden,” Mitsuki answered. She smiled fondly at the flowers. “She would always keep a fresh vase in the room for me.”

Katsuki perked up a bit at that.

His mother usually never discussed her family. It was always off limits with a quick ‘you’re too young to ever understand’ to deflect from his question. But he curiously studied how his mother’s gaze had potent adoration when she looked at the flowers.

“Do…Do we have other family members?” Katsuki asked.

“No,” Mitsuki answered a bit too quickly. “No one that I am aware of anyways.”

“Ah.”

Katsuki tried his best to hide his disappointment.

Mitsuki glanced over her shoulder at him with a soft smile. She walked over to him at the kitchen table with the glass vase in her hands. She gently placed it down on the dining room table he had purchased for them a long time ago and she fluffed the flowers.

“If you really want to know, my parents and I lost touch before you were born,” Mitsuki said. She tilted her head at Katsuki with an apologetic smile. “When I tried to reach back out, I couldn’t find them. Masaru and I assumed they must’ve passed away because I can’t figure out where they went. Or anyone who might know. If they were alive I’m sure they would have loved the chance to meet you.”

Katsuki nodded, accepting that explanation.

A part of him melted in his chilling defenses, and Mitsuki could tell. Katsuki couldn’t deny he missed his mother; he had needed the breather, but he didn’t know until now he just needed to know who he was. Where he came from. Who exactly was he related to? His mother talked a lot about herself but never her background.

Mitsuki gently touched the pink carnations, thumbing the petals softly.

“I’m sorry I never told you who your real biological father was, Katsuki,” Mitsuki muttered. Pain struck across her face. “You deserved to know who it was. I shouldn’t have kept that from you.”

“It’s alright,” Katsuki muttered. He looked away from her. “I know you were just trying to protect me.”

“I was but in the process I hurt you and pushed you away.” Mitsuki hung her head. “I miss you, Katsuki. I’m sorry.”

Those two words hit him in a place Katsuki thought didn’t exist: his heart.

He crumbled under the weight of the simple phrases: I miss you. I’m sorry. So small yet so powerful and more than he realized he needed to hear. Katsuki nodded and tried to push back the feeling of tears in his eyes.

“I missed you too, mom,” Katsuki said. He felt like a child here with her in the worst way.

“Let’s not go that long without talking again, okay? It’s only us in this world together. We don’t have anyone else. We shouldn’t be angry at each other,” Mitsuki whispered. “I never want to hurt you, Katsuki. That’s never my intention. I-I’ve been getting better—really this time. I feel better. I do things timelier. I even quit gambling for good. But I recognize I haven’t been entirely fair to you. If there’s any questions you have, I’ll answer them.”

He smiled gently at his mother, feeling slightly mended. He nodded and decided to ask a question that had been burning in his mind before Vienna.

“Did you love Imasuji Goto?” Katsuki wearily asked.

“Of course,” Mitsuki answered easily. She laughed lightheartedly and smiled. “I loved that bastard very much. We dated for years after I moved out from the countryside and into the city. I really loved how exciting the city life was.”

“Then why did you date him when he was some known gangster?”

Mitsuki shrugged. “When I met him, I didn’t realize who he was, and he didn’t exactly announce that he was an underground crime lord. Sure, I had heard of some gangster by the alias of Muscular, but I didn’t make the connection he was Muscular, y’know? I just saw a handsome man who was chasing me.”

Katsuki pursed his lips. “You never found out?”

“I did,” Mitsuki confessed softly. “But by that point, I loved him. It’s hard to let go of things you love. I started…embracing his lifestyle, or at least bits of it. He introduced me to drinking, gambling, and some level of fun contraband use. I’m not going to lie and say I didn’t have fun, because I partied like there was no damn tomorrow. But I suppose that was the problem. I barely went home to see my parents after that. Then one day—I found out I was pregnant.”

Katsuki felt a pang of unwanted guilt.

“I had never considered being a mom before, but I really liked the idea when I thought of it,” Mitsuki said. She looked at Katsuki with love and pinched his cheek. “A little mini me, running around. It would be so cute. I asked him what he would think about us being parents but of course, he laughed in my face.” Now his mother made a disgusted expression. “The bastard wasn't interested in being a father and he very bluntly told me I would make a terrible mother."

"What an asshole," Katsuki muttered flippantly.

He expected his mother to laugh or make a joke—but she hadn't. She smiled at him sadly.

"I suppose he was right in the end though, huh," Mitsuki murmured. "I have been a terrible mother."

Immediately Katsuki rebounded. "No, you're not. You're trying your best."

"Sometimes best isn't always enough, Katsuki."

They stared at each other. The sound of the leaky faucet from the kitchen trickled in. Katsuki broke eye contact and pulled at his pants.

"What happened after that?" Katsuki muttered.

He didn't lift his eyes from his lap and instead focused on a single loose thread in his pants. He plucked at it to relieve some tension in his hands as his mother grew silent. He expected some regular answer, one that involved him being born and Muscular not wanting to be involved. However, instead he was greeted with an answer that he didn't know how to accept.

"I told him I was pregnant, and he attempted to beat me into having a miscarriage."

Katsuki whipped his head up. "What?"

"He didn't want to be a father," Mitsuki explained bitterly. A dark cloud overshadowed her eyes and she scowled deeply at whatever memory was burning hot inside of her. "I tried to get help, but I couldn't. My parents were too—they were too busy, and they were strict. I just wanted to live my life happily with my baby. So, I ran away. I met Masaru shortly after and he was the love of my life. I wish you got to know him better than you did because he really was a walking angel."

His mother kept going.

She kept talking but Katsuki was stuck on the goddamn fact his mother had been beaten.

By fucking Muscular, nonetheless.

His mom kept talking, speeding past that horrifying tidbit of information like it was a small disagreement. Katsuki masked his concern the best he could, but it was hard. Every time the faucet dripped in the background he could see that blurry footage of Muscular appear in his mind. He could see his scarlet painted smile and visually see the villain of his mother's story.

His depraved shadow rumbled. It whispered and furiously demanded retribution as it reared its ugly head to him. That's when it clicked: why his first red folder assignment was so anticlimactic. It was because the man hadn't been scum. Katsuki enjoyed ridding the earth of scum—but that man in the window wasn't such a person.

Imasuji Goto, however, was.

Months went by and slowly Mitsuki and Katsuki's relationship mended.

They felt like mother and son again with the tiny things like going out to the movies. Some days his mother invited him over for dinner and they laughed and talked like Katsuki wasn't a certified killer. Every Friday he gave her money to pay her bills and he tried to tell himself it was up to her to make sure she actually paid it.

But sometimes, Katsuki could see a late bill poorly hidden around her apartment.

She was acting more stable, like she used to sometimes. He was worried she would slip again, and the concept of late bills was hard for him to accept. He started to take it upon himself to make sure her bills were paid himself. She seemed thankful for this and would be happy for him to take charge of her finances.

During this, Katsuki received red folder after red folder.

Each time he pulled the trigger, he felt close to nothing and Aizawa praised him for it. Detachment was key and the money stacked higher than he could ever imagine. He was beginning to feel well established for once in his life as he started buying himself finer things.

He splurged on suits, and he loved the look of himself in the color black. Every morning he went to work at The Company in his best clothes and leather jacket he had grown attached to. He could see some people check him out as he grew into his frame more. He would smirk cockily at the people he could catch looking at him. It was fun to send experimental flirtatious winks and it went straight to his head whenever he was able to make some cute girl or guy blush.

Katsuki loved the way they fucking swooned.

Maybe it was the self-centered part of him that enjoyed the attention for once.

He continued this routine for six months. Then the cycle was broken one day in Aizawa's office.

Katsuki had his legs kicked up, spreading all over Aizawa's couch while his supervisor glared at him. The arrogant young blond was biting into an apple and chewing it loudly as Aizawa was assigning out the folders for the red assignments. Monoma was in the room with him as well, disgusted with the way Katsuki was devouring the apple.

"Do you have to eat like a pig while we wait?" Monoma snapped.

Katsuki smirked and gave another big crunch into the fruit. "Being a little agitating is just in my nature."

Monoma inhaled deeply and counted to ten under his breath. The other blond crossed his arms and rolled his eyes. Aizawa stood up at that moment with two folders in hand and then walked over to both of them. His shoulders were slouched forward as he distributed the folders.

“Here are your assignments for the week,” Aizawa said tiredly. “Both of these are time sensitive and also require an insane amount of discretion. Nothing to draw attention. Snipe from a building and call it a day. Make sure no one sees you.”

Katsuki and Monoma both opened their folders.

Katsuki looked over his assignment. Some rando again. He didn’t give it too much of a second glance after deciding the pay was enough for him. He gave Aizawa a thumbs up and looked towards Monoma whose face was painted in surprise. His periwinkle eyes blinked rapidly and glanced up to Katsuki before quickly looking away. He closed his folder shut and cleared his throat.

“Will do,” Monoma said firmly.

Aizawa gave them both nods of approval and dismissed them.

As they were walking out of Aizawa’s office with gleaming red folders, Katsuki couldn’t help but think Monoma’s reaction was odd.

“So. Who was in your folder?” Katsuki pried.

“Are you seriously asking me that?” Monoma cut his eyes at him. He didn’t slow his stride as they walked down the busy hallway of men and women in black and white suits. “You know we’re not supposed to discuss that with each other. Folders are classified.”

“Don’t act so uptight all the time,” Katsuki said coolly. “C’mon, I’m curious. I’m sure you’re curious as to who I got too.”

Monoma pursed his lips. Katsuki had to resist smiling because he knew exactly what to say to get Monoma’s nosy ass on board with anything he said. The other young blond looked over their shoulder and then jutted his head in the direction somewhere more discreet. They both walked over to a less active part of The Company where people who slacked off went. Currently, it was just them two. Both of them opened their folders on the count of three, smiling like it was an innocent game.

However, the smile on Katsuki’s face was wiped off when he saw the picture inside of Monoma’s folder.

It was Imasuji Goto.

Katsuki furrowed his brow. He cut his eye at Monoma who was studying his facial expression carefully. They both grew quiet and Katsuki straightened out his back.

“Ah. You do know him,” Monoma pointed out. “I thought so. You two look nearly identical. Is this a family member of yours or something?”

Katsuki didn't answer that.

He prodded his tongue in the side of his cheek, unhappy.

He wondered if it was just a stroke of luck. Aizawa didn't know about the connection between him and Imasuji Goto as far as he knew. But the fact the man had a hit on him was curious. It was even more curious how it somehow didn't land in his hands.

As Katsuki stared at the picture in the red folder, he could hear his mother's words rattle loud in his head. The degenerate side of him started recounting his mother's story to him so loud it drowned out all his rational thoughts. All he could picture was Imasuji Goto dead on the floor. Covered in vibrant, scarlet blood.

A person with a rap like Muscular didn't merit a swift, tranquil death. No, that was too easy.

"Switch folders with me," Katsuki demanded suddenly.

"Excuse me?" Monoma exclaimed. He recoiled like Katsuki had bit him. "Are you insane? I already let you look at the folder. I'm not switching with you. Are you trying to get us fired?"

"I'll give you half of the payment I'm going to receive."

Monoma stiffened at the offer. He stole a glance at the red folder in his hand and then back at Katsuki. Another emotion slowly crept in Monoma's face. Judgmental and stale. Like a switch, he straightened out his back and tilted his head and his eyes became stone cold.

"First you tell me what he is to you," Monoma said. "Then I'll consider it."

Katsuki clenched his jaw, picking his words carefully.

"He's my biological father." This was the first time Katsuki said it out loud and it felt wrong. "I want to be the one to do it, he's hurt my mother in the past. He's scum so I'm sure you understand a painless bullet isn't what he deserves."

His colleague didn't say anything further and he didn't have to. The judgment flowing out of Monoma's eyes was all that needed to be exchanged. Disbelief, slight repulsion and also curiosity translated from blue eyes to red.

Monoma gave him the folder. He handed it to him like it was a test. Katsuki gripped on tight to the folder and his demons ferociously smirked with all their sharp teeth.

"Have fun," Monoma said with a sinister smile.

Monsters recognized monsters.

"In shocking news, the death of one of the most notorious crime lords in Japan has occurred," the news anchor said with a gripping voice. "Imasuji Goto's body was found this morning in an abandoned warehouse. All over the scene was his blood, like he had been purposefully drained. And his body sustained multiple bullet wounds, stab wounds and mutilations I can't say on public television."

Her eyes were shocked, amazed and terrified all at once. Beside her on the screen flashed blurry images of Imasuji Goto's butchered body. He had been maimed beyond recognition in the dead of night then crucified with rusty nails to the walls in the same warehouse where he committed most of his crimes.

Above him in blood was painted the words 'Filth'.

Then finally the news showed one last photo: a very blurry shot of Katsuki in the dark. He was dressed in all black with blood stains across the small sliver of his eyes.

In the deep darkness, his blazing illuminating red eyes were the only thing visible.

"The public has nicknamed this murderer the Scarlet Eyed Killer. News of the incident has swept the nation and has been deemed one of the most brutal murders of the century—"

Aizawa angrily clicked off the television in his office.

Katsuki dared at that moment to look to his right. Sitting next to him was Monoma, head down in shame with him. They both were sporting vicious red marks on their cheek from the earlier events. When the news broke, Aizawa had come storming out of his office radiating nothing but pure fucking rage. Their supervisor slapped them both with all his strength, stunning everyone and then dragged them into his office none too kindly.

Now they were here, and The Scarlet Eyed killer was the most talked about thing on all news channels.

But what was worse, the blurry image of his deadly eyes was circulating like poison in the body.

"I cannot fucking believe you two," Aizawa snapped. His face was twisted in disgust, and he was downright livid. The veins in his neck and forehead were popping forward as he grinded his teeth. "What the hell is wrong with you two? Hah!? If I give out an assignment to one of you it is against direct fucking orders to switch! You both know this!"

Katsuki had never heard Aizawa's voice boom so loudly. It rivaled roaring thunder, quaking through him like an avalanche. Katsuki was stunned into silence, because he hadn't thought about the consequences of what they had done.

"Fucking say something you two dumbasses or I'm firing both of you," Aizawa yelled. "Contracts be fucking damned I will let you both starve for this. I do not tolerate this kind of shit on my watch."

"I'm sorry," Monoma whispered first. His fists were shaking. "But it's not my fault. I didn't know Bakugou would go off the rails like that—"

"—I knew!" Aizawa cut him off with an unnerving boom. He marched up to both of them looming like a storm cloud. "It's not your goddamn job to know, it's mine. This is why I give you very specific assignments. I don't give them out fucking randomly. I knew Bakugou would act like a goddamn psychopath and that's why I didn't give him that assignment! It was too close to his goddamn emotions and not well enough removed from his logic!"

Monoma frowned like he disagreed but didn't say anything. He cut his eyes angrily at Katsuki to speak up, but Katsuki stayed silent.

Aizawa cut his eyes too and his nostrils flared when he saw Katsuki hanging his head away.

"And you," Aizawa nearly growled in a low voice. The tiny red veins in his eyes were deeper in color than usual and his gaze pulsed with disdain. "What you did was disgusting."

Katsuki worked his jaw.

He should be feeling regret right now, but he really fucking didn't.

His stinging cheek from where he had been slapped was throbbing and probably was as red as Aizawa's face. But he didn't give a single fuck. Katsuki cut his eyes up to Aizawa in a silent challenge without saying a word. The two stared at each other, frowning in distaste for the other without words being changed.

Without taking his sights off Katsuki, Aizawa said very carefully, "Monoma. Get the hell out of my office. I don't want to see your face for the rest of the week."

Monoma didn't need to be told twice. He sprung up from the chair and rushed out of the door. He shut it behind him.

Aizawa's livid expression didn't waiver a single bit. "Do you even regret what you did?"

"Why would I regret it?" Katsuki quipped.

"You butchered him," Aizawa emphasized. "You nearly put this fucking company at risk after I fucking told you that this assignment needed to be discreet. Now a photograph of your goddamn eyes is circulating all over Japan and probably halfway across the world. You fucked up all because you let your goddamn emotions get the best of you! What did I tell you about acting from a place of calm and not fucking passion—"

"—He deserved it," Katsuki retorted. "I don't regret it and I'm never going to regret killing that bastard the way I did because it felt good."

Aizawa searched his face like he was viewing him for the first time.

He stepped back, offset by what Katsuki had said. Aizawa let out a long, shaky sigh and pinched the bridge of his nose. He turned away from Katsuki finally and stared at the wall as if searching for an answer.

"I'm so disappointed in you," Aizawa whispered tiredly.

The words were soft, had no bite and were barely audible. But no matter how delicate they were, they pierced through Katsuki like daggers. Katsuki didn't anticipate that at all, it was sobering to look at Aizawa shunning him.

His heart stopped hammering and feelings of conflict rattled in his chest.

Disappointed?

“You’re off all red folder assignments until further notice,” Aizawa muttered. “I’m not trying to enable serial killer habits, Bakugou. I’m trying to train effective hitmen who will understand that using their goddamn head is more important than a family grudge.”

Aizawa kept his back towards him, and Katsuki painfully wanted him to actually turn around. He wanted him to look at him like he was fucking proud because what he did was good. Right? It was fucking needed—

“Get out of my office,” Aizawa muttered.

Katsuki lifted up from his place in the chair slowly. All his feelings of rage were dismantled now, washed away with that simple word. Disappointed. He stared at Aizawa’s stiff back and the way he was hunched over his desk like he had failed at something miserably. Katsuki stayed stuck for a while, feet unmoving. He walked up carefully to his supervisor, reaching out a hand. But the moment he was about to touch Aizawa’s back the man snapped at him.

“I said get the fuck out of my office, Bakugou. I don’t want to see you.”

Katsuki retracted his hand like he had been stung. The hurt in Aizawa’s voice pained him more than his throbbing cheek. Katsuki wearily glanced around at all the pictures on the wall of him. This was the first time he had really looked at them, but he saw pictures of Sero, Denki, Monoma, Shinsou and him scattered around. They were hung up and placed above any photos with politicians Aizawa had on the wall.

He looked at the photo of Koji on Aizawa’s desk.

Katsuki huffed angrily, upset with not understanding Aizawa or his emotions.

He stormed out of the office in a blur.

As Katsuki passed by in the office halls, everyone kept referring to him as one thing. The whispers were loud, taunting and they stabbed tiny holes in his skin, deflating his ego. They kept repeating the same thing over and over: he’s a real murderer. They all looked at him differently—like he wasn’t one of them. The mutters were loud and Katsuki heard every single sentence.

He had been branded a monster and no one would view him any differently now.

The Scarlet Eyed Killer had left his mark.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below! 💜

Big thank you to Minty who told me about the goose virus and Monet who nicknamed the Migraine Unit 🤣💕

Sorry for catching up on comments so late. I am feeling much better now after some rest and finally getting around to replying to the Ch. 10 comments ^^ I will be replying to them steadily because I really do appreciate you all! All the comments you leave I read every single one and smile. It makes me really happy that we have one more interlude chapter, which will be a lot of the final pieces to the puzzle.

Every chapter as like a very specific domino needed for the progression of the climax and I'm sooooo excited we reached like midway in this story. It feels surreal finally arrive here after day dreaming about this fic for about a year :)

Thanks so much for reading ^^ 💚💚💚

Chapter 13 — Interlude IV

After the news of the Scarlet Eyed Killer spread through Japan, everyone started to look at Katsuki differently.

The people at The Company parted ways for him, as if afraid of his touch. Aizawa took time to rebound to treat him the same ever again. His team members on the M-Unit started to tilt their heads at him a bit, all save the exception of Monoma and Shinsou. They seemed to understand him. They felt like the blood he spilled was rightfully reaped.

But most surprising, was how his mother looked at him.

He remembers how her face was shocked, yet blank watching the news of Muscular's murder. She wasn't stupid either, she knew. There was a look of knowing when the blurry photograph of his blood lust eyes flashed on the screen.

She had turned her head to him and spoke. "Katsuki. Was that you?"

Katsuki didn't see a point in lying. "It was."

She nodded, as if in approval. She continued to do what she was doing and after that, she was kinder to him. She called him more, she seemed more upbeat. She started exchanging more stories about how she met his father when she was pregnant. It seemed like a weight off her chest had been lifted by seeing that news story.

Ultimately, his mother gave him the approval for the blood he shed unlike Aizawa. And that made the dark part of Katsuki feel validated. In contrast to his mother, Aizawa stayed true to his word. His boss kept him on strictly green folder missions with no goddamn leeway.

Katsuki wouldn't usually give a damn, but it seemed like with green folders came a certain green haired pest. Deku. Of course, who the hell else would it be? It was beginning to drive Katsuki up the goddamn wall.

He first encountered Deku again at some random high-end hotel. Katsuki had been guarding his mark, some wealthy bastard with too many gold rings Katsuki didn't care too much for. After that, Katsuki quickly started to see a pattern that Deku was good at blending in to get closer to the mark to kill them.

The wealthy bastard had been horny after his business deal, and he was being picky about who he wanted to fuck. He mentioned to Katsuki that he found some cute man with a bubble butt that he was going to take to his chambers and ravish. Katsuki held in his eye roll about it and decided to go along with the assignment.

However, when he walked the man into his suite, there was Deku in another goddamn wig waiting for him in barely any clothes. The other assassin was posing as some minx trying to seduce the mark so he could slit his throat in bed probably.

Like Taiwan, when Katsuki and Deku locked eyes, uncontrollable wrath was unleashed. It wound up with another shoot out that resulted in Katsuki having a bloody gunshot wound. Deku, fucking Deku, put a goddamn bullet in his foot then escaped out of the window. The smaller assassin swiftly jumped out of the window in a blur of green and landed on a lower balcony, far out of Katsuki's reach. Deku successfully made his escape but not before glaring at Katsuki from the lower level. The little bastard gave him the finger.

The next few assignments after that didn't have Deku. But as the year progressed, he saw Deku every couple of months.

He saw Deku at the shady night clubs.

He saw Deku at the fancy banquet halls.

He saw Deku during the dead of night as drug lords exchanged contraband.

It was beginning to be exhausting. How the fuck did one tiny man work his ass all around Japan? Every assignment ended the same and it was beginning to be an inside joke amongst his unit. Denki thought it would be funny to leave little broccolis all over his desk and Monoma would always be sure to tell him good luck every time he got a green folder with a shit eating smirk.

Katsuki was able to always stop Deku from killing his mark. Which was starting to result in Deku's actions becoming slightly desperate.

Then one mission, something particular happened.

The green folder Katsuki received, it was a pretty heavily detailed assignment.

His mark this time was an elder man who was the most tranquil person he ever met. His name was Soto Genkei and he had a syrupy warm smile. His fair skin was wrinkled with wisdom and his hair was streaked with white and silver. He spent most of his days baking and making dango for his guests and family. He was probably one of the kindest people Katsuki ever met in person.

However, while Genkai was a peaceful man currently, his past was bloodier than Katsuki's.

The man used to be known as the Midnight Butcher in Tokyo in his prime.

Before forensics were really a thing, he spent a lot of his youth killing for men and women far more powerful than him. He did it with a butcher ax and he did it with glee. Sometimes he even did it unprovoked on unsuspecting civilians to 'practice' his art form. After he gained so much money, he decided to retire, but one doesn't get involved in sticky business like theirs without some grudge being formed.

Genkei received an anonymous letter spelled with magazine cut outs in the mail one day. Underneath the words 'Midnight butcher' were old, black and white photographs of his victims and in sloppy lettering 'retribution will come' at the bottom.

Genkei was scared his past would catch him because he had a family now. A wife, three kids and a granddaughter and grandson. He wished to live happily and swore that he atoned for his past crimes. Viewing him now, Katsuki could argue that to be true. The Genkei in front of him wouldn't harm a fly, but seeing that letter spoke to the side of Katsuki that believed in vengeance. This man used to kill for practice. No grayness about it.

Over dinner that night in the man's house, Katsuki couldn't help but pose a question once everyone else had gone to bed.

"Why did you do all those murders?" Katsuki asked. He looked at the ripples in his tea in the porcelain cup carefully. "With an ax nonetheless."

"I was paid," Genkei said with a tranquil smile.

Katsuki shook his head. "No. I mean the ones for practice, the twenty people you had killed who didn't have to die."

Genkei froze. His eyes softened with wisdom beyond Katsuki's years. Wrinkled hands smoothed over the fabric of his yukata. "I couldn't tell you what the inner workings of my past self is like. I can only advocate for the one that is sitting in front of you, and I am a changed man."

"You murdered over twenty people, and you can't tell me?" Katsuki questioned, unsure.

The corners of Genkei's mouth tugged down slightly. His peace-loving aura tainted with defensiveness and his grip on the teapot grew so tight a small crack could be heard.

"I can't," Genkei muttered.

Their eyes locked in a strange challenge and plea. Katsuki tilted his head at him. Then from down the hall Genkei's grandson called his name. The elder man rose from the floor and gave Katsuki a tight smile.

"Have a good rest of your night," Genkei said with a bow. "The guest room is ready for you. I will let you know when you may leave until it feels like I am safe."

Katsuki didn't continue the conversation further. He went to the guest room in his pajamas and looked at the black and white photos of the victims. He researched on his phone all of the twenty victims and read their stories. Many had families still looking for the murderer, and others had given up.

Later that night, of course, there was an intruder.

Katsuki had been the only person to hear the picking of the lock on the window in the house. He sprung forward from the sleeping mat and grabbed for his gun. He loaded it up and crept quietly. He followed his plan and locked the bedroom doors on all of Genkei and his family members so whoever couldn't kill them. When Katsuki poised himself around the corner, he could hear someone tip toeing forward.

When the person turned the corner, vibrant viridian eyes shone in the moonlit hallway, and they locked eyes with their guns pointed at each other.

The first thing Katsuki noticed was the black eye.

The second thing he noticed was the foreign despair in Deku's eyes. The mystery assassin was quiet, and he didn't pull his trigger right away like all the other times. He looked—hurt. Really fucking hurt, and his eyes were blood shot mimicking fire with how dark and inflamed they were.

What happened that night Katsuki never told anyone.

An odd plea on Deku's face triggered something inside of Katsuki. Tumbling forward, all the victim's grainy photographs flashed through his mind. He saw their smiles, their frowns, and recalled their families and their stories. They were so painfully real to him in that moment, like shadows looming behind him. He could feel twenty ghost hands on top of his own that were pushing down.

Katsuki lowered his gun under the weight of the phantom limbs and Deku relaxed in shock.

Katsuki pursed his lips and looked down to the ground. He quietly walked over to Genkei's bedroom where he was sleeping and unlocked it.

Katsuki turned his back and Deku never pulled the trigger.

Deku walked into that room and quietly did something to Genkei. Katsuki didn't know what he did, but there was no knife or gunshot. Genkei stopped breathing and his face turned blue. Then slowly Deku walked out of the house, but not before looking over his shoulder at Katsuki.

"Thank you," Deku whispered quietly.

Before he got the chance to reply, Deku disappeared into the night.

Katsuki went to bed in the guest room and closed his eyes. When he woke up the next morning, Genkei's family was distraught and crying.

The medical examiners came and determined it was a heart attack in his sleep. Katsuki insisted that the family get a refund since it was a 'natural' tragedy and Aizawa didn't really question it. He gave the money back and it was enough to cover the funeral expenses. Katsuki thought he might feel worse about it, but he didn't.

He felt like it was justified as he thought about all the innocent faces on that letter.

When Katsuki was nineteen he started to notice the other people in The Company pairing off.

He had never, er, given romance another thought after Tokyo and the cringe issue of his pretend marriage. Besides, when would he between all the shit he had to take care of? He didn't understand that and last time he attempted to flirt with someone, it ended up being shitty ass Deku. Twice.

But he was reluctantly curious about dating at this age when he could see his unit start to indulge in these things.

Denki started having pretty casual sex with men and women. Shinsou very much made it clear he was not interested in romance or sex. Katsuki considered maybe he was like Shinsou, but after examining himself closely, he realized he wasn't. Then there was Sero, who was secretly pining for Denki. Katsuki could've shot Sero for the number of times he sobbed whenever Denki went home with someone.

But the most confusing one was Monoma.

He always knew Monoma had a girlfriend, but when they met her he didn't understand how the fuck did it work with his colleague's shitty personality. Her name was Kendo Itsuka, and she loved Monoma more than Katsuki could really understand. She was bubbly, pretty, and had a soft shade of ginger hair.

It didn't make any damn sense. He thought for sure this was some type of fake dating shit. But when they all went out as a group to karaoke, Katsuki watched the pair of them closely.

They were in love, and it twisted terrible curiosity at the bottom of Katsuki's core to see that up close after so long. The lonely part of him yearned for that type of affection. Hand touching. Smiling. Even with Monoma's shitty ass singing she looked at him as if he was giving a serenade.

Katsuki had never experienced that before.

Hell, when was the last time he even had a hug?

He thought of the boy from Tokyo and wished his face wasn't blurry.

Thoughts of dating were on the forefront of Katsuki's mind after seeing Monoma and Itsuka together.

Currently, he was nervously tapping his foot in his mother's apartment. He was thinking about stupid romance more than he would like. Several questions were booming in his head: if he dated someone how would they look? Act? Speak? Would he prefer men or women? The answer to that last one came unfortunately easy when he thought of a certain green haired assassin.

"What's on your mind?" Mitsuki asked while making dinner. She chopped the carrot in her hand with sharp precision and smiled at him across the kitchen island. "You look like you're a little bit stressed. Hard day at work?"

"I think I'm gay," Katsuki blurted out.

Mitsuki stopped chopping. Katsuki pursed his lips and fiddled with his fingers.

"Oh," Mitsuki said. She blinked a couple of times like she never anticipated having this conversation. Then she nodded and smiled brightly. "That's good! I'm happy for you."

Katsuki was a little hesitant. He looked at her carefully and how relaxed she seemed. "You're alright with it?"

"Of course, why wouldn't I be, brat? I'm your mother," Mitsuki said with a soft smile. She leaned over and pinched his cheek lovingly. "I'm always going to support you no matter what you do. Especially after everything we've been through, Katsuki. But this is a bit random. Did you see some cute guy you liked?"

Katsuki willed away the image of fucking freckles that appeared in his head.

"No. I don't have anyone in mind," he forcefully said. "I was just giving it some thought. Some of my friends are dating."

"Do you want to date too?" She started chopping the carrot again and Katsuki was surprised how simple that was.

"Maybe?" Katsuki glanced around and his eye landed on an overdue bill. A hint of sourness twisted his stomach at the sight. He pretended like he didn't see it. "But I'm not sure. I don't know if I'll have the time."

“Nonsense!” Mitsuki exclaimed loudly. She clasped her hands together and pointed at him with the knife. “You’re a handsome young man and you got my damn good looks. I see the way people check you out when we’re in public. Frankly, I thought you just didn’t like anyone enough to date but if that’s what you want, we can get you started.”

Katsuki tilted his head. “Started? How?”

“I can introduce you to my coworker’s son,” Mitsuki suggested. “I’m pretty sure my coworker mentioned her son being bisexual. He’s a nice boy and he’s studying to be a lawyer.”

“I don’t know if I want to mingle with anyone you work with considering…” He let the sentence trail off and his mother took the hint. She nodded and took a deep breath.

“…Right,” Mitsuki muttered. “Okay. There’s other ways. Some of my coworkers mentioned this thing called tender? Timber? I’m not sure but it’s an app for dating. That’s what people your age mainly use, right?”

“I don’t know.”

“How do you not know? You’re nineteen.”

“I don’t know. I never gave this stuff any thought, alright? Cut me some damn slack.”

“Okay, if you want, we can do this the old way and you go out and find someone. That’s how I met your father. Oh! That can be really fun. I can set you up looking cool and suave in a bookstore! Or the grocery market. I see a lot of handsome young men at the local market down the street.”

“…Let’s try the app thing,” Katsuki muttered.

He shied away from her a bit when he suddenly realized maybe this was too much for him to grasp. He was good at his job. He was good at being financially responsible. He could pay bills and slit throats—but this? He didn’t quite know how to be datable or if he was even likable.

“Tember it is!” Mitsuki exclaimed excitedly.

She seemed extremely giddy and delighted as she started looking up dating apps on her phone. She came across several and over dinner the two of them watched YouTube videos on ‘how to make the perfect dating profile’ together.

His mom gave her own input and advice on how to compliment people, how to make eye contact and how to always make sure he made the person he was dating feel special. She pulled this all from her experience with his father and it made Katsuki smile softly to himself. When they finished dinner Mitsuki and Katsuki dressed him up in his best clothes and took pictures for his profile.

They sat on the bed and crafted his bio and Katsuki for the first time really felt normal.

Over the next week, he had swiped and fucking swiped endlessly.

Absolutely no one fit into his tastes for a partner. It was annoying. This guy liked playing the fiddle. This other one wasn't looking for anything serious. Another said his favorite goddamn color was periwinkle—how goddamn pretentious.

"You're being way too damn harsh," Mitsuki pointed out. She lit the cigarette in her mouth and shook her head at him. "Cast a wider net and I'm sure you'll find someone. Don't be such a picky brat."

"Fine," Katsuki grumbled and swiped left three more times. "I'll try to be less picky."

But the truth was, he couldn't.

Every time his eyes landed on some guy he kept seeing goddamn Deku. He had been so ready to ask Deku out—fucking twice. What was it about those instances that were so far different then now? Deku, despite being fucking annoying, he learned really was his type. Doll face, sweet looking, cute freckles and he had a gentle voice. In another lifetime, he could find himself on a date with Deku had he not tried to kill him on several occasions now.

At the end of the week, he did as his mother asked. He started swiping right a bit more graciously and began going on dates.

And it was fucking awful. He had jack shit in common with anyone and the worst part is he felt like people could see through him. Katsuki internally cringed when he could see the various men withdraw away from him when his answers to their valid questions were subpar.

"So, what do you like to do for fun?" One guy he thought he liked asked over dinner.

"I sometimes like to listen to classical music," Katsuki said.

"Oh! Neat. Anything else?"

"No."

A grimace.

All the rest of the dates went like this too and it was beginning to chip away at Katsuki's ego. He apparently had the looks to get him through the door but absolutely nothing else to make people stay.

Next he tried hitting on guys at The Company. He would be discreet and attempt to flirt but everyone would give him weary smiles and shuffle away. He didn't fucking get it. What was the problem? Did his breath fucking stink? Everyone else at The Company was pairing off and running around with a goddamn relationship. They were all getting lo—affection. Why couldn't he?

Those cruel whispers from his childhood came back to him, full force.

“The problem is you,” his self doubt murmured. “You’re just not a good enough person for anyone to like.”

“Even if someone did like you they’re going to leave you,” his anxiety muttered. “One day you’ll wake up and be by yourself again.”

“You’re unlovable,” his self-hatred stated cruelly. “Who could ever love a monster like you?”

These whispers grew louder and louder every single failed date.

After about two months in a lull of assignments, Katsuki had to put all his inquiring about dating on pause. Aizawa called with another assignment for him. Katsuki was slightly relieved because he was beginning to spiral.

However, when he arrived at The Company, waiting for him in the common area were his friends and they were all laughing on their phones.

Katsuki walked in, ready to go about his day, but frowned when his four teammates were laughing and looking at him a little too hard.

He scowled and turned around. “What’s so damn funny?”

“I don’t know,” Monoma said pleasantly. “Why don’t you tell us, Bakugou Katsuki who likes classical music and long walks on the beach. Since when did you ever walk on the beach? We don’t even live near one.”

Monoma turned to him with a shit eating annoying smirk and lifted up his phone. Sitting there on the screen was a photograph of Katsuki in his ripped jeans, leather jacket and all black attire winking at the screen. Denki and Sero burst out in laughter and everyone in the vicinity started staring at them.

Embarrassment raced hot in Katsuki until the tips of his ears burned red. “Wh—How the hell did you find my fucking profile?!”

“Dude, I use Tinder too,” Denki explained with a grin. “Imagine my surprise when your grouchy face popped up on my screen with these dorky photos. It looks like your mom took these for you.”

Katsuki fumed quietly and his face grew redder.

Shinsou raised an eyebrow at Katsuki’s silence. “…Did she?”

“And what if she did?” Katsuki bit out, hiding his blush.

“Oh my fucking god,” Sero howled. He doubled over holding his stomach. “She did! This is rich!”

“Fuck off, all of you,” Katsuki hissed. “I can date around if I want to.”

Monoma smirked at him. “Have you found anyone you like?”

“No,” Katsuki grumbled. “Everyone I meet just wants to try to get into my pants. Which I guess is a compliment, but no one wants to go on a second date or go further.”

“Basically, you’re having trouble making them stick?” Shinsou clarified.

“…Yeah,” Katsuki resentfully admitted. He glanced down at his boots, sourly recalling the 15th failed date he had gone on. The cute guy said he would call back but instead he fucking ghosted him. “I don’t know what the hell I’m doing wrong. I’m hot, right? I should be already fucking cozied up with a cute boyfriend by now.”

“It’s probably because your personality is shit,” Monoma said bluntly. Katsuki stiffened and cut his eye up at his colleague. “You really think someone is going to want to seriously date you with how brash you are? Any sane person would run for the hills.”

“I would pay to be a fly on the wall for one of your dates, man,” Sero laughed. “I bet Bakugou thinks flirting is insulting someone.”

“I can see it now, he definitely told someone they didn’t look awful.” Denki chuckled.

His friends laughed and jeered at him a bit more. It was all in humor and good fun, but it fucked with a specific part of Katsuki.

Those looming whispers in the back of his head were getting loud with each joke made at his expense. The dark spirit inside of him wasn’t smiling, it was weeping and begging to see if what was said was true. He could be loved. He could be. He repeated this thought until the unrelenting whispers quieted down.

When the conversation in the group shifted off of him, Katsuki zoned out. He sat in the common area for Aizawa to come get him with a distant stare.

Then out of the corner of his eye someone caught his attention with a small wave.

Katsuki turned at the gesture, and he recognized the person as another worker at The Company. He was a cute guy with curly, black hair and an athletic build. He was muscular in all the right places Katsuki liked and he had a sweet smile. He had seen the guy around a couple of times, he was one of the people that would bite his lip at Katsuki when he would walk by. They had exchanged a couple of words and he knew he was about their age, but he never really knew who he was.

Katsuki wondered how much of that conversation the other teen heard when a wink was sent his way.

Quickly, Katsuki found out the mystery teen’s name was Mako.

Mako was in a different sector and took a lot of red assignments. The cute guy seemed to like him a lot, or at least Katsuki thought he did.

The other teen made a very blunt pass at Katsuki after the common area, and Katsuki in all his terrible curiosity decided to roll with it. This was the closest to real damn intimacy he ever had with someone.

Over the course of six months, they got to know each other well. At the first week mark, after what Katsuki thought were dates, they slept together and he found out he did in fact, like sex a whole fucking lot. Especially when he fucked Mako from the back, choking him in the dark. The other teen's deep colored curls bounced enchantingly as he gasped for air. That alone fed Katsuki a very specific image he would never say out loud.

Mako often commented on how rough he was—which Katsuki didn't exactly understand because he was just doing what felt good. He tried to fuck Mako softer but found out he wasn't sure he knew how. His thrusts were always choppy and off beat and his kisses were awkward when he attempted to mimic what the fuck being 'soft' was.

Mako would roll his eyes and tell him it was alright. The other teen gave up and instructed Katsuki to do what felt right. So, Katsuki did. He could do rough. He could do hard. He could choke and fuck and make Mako cum hard enough to see stars.

Katsuki was positive that this arrangement would eventually end with them being steady. They worked together. They slept together. Hell, Mako even came over to his apartment to stay the night sometimes. It was the perfect damn set up.

Then the rug was pulled from under him one day while making out in the back of Mako's luxury car.

They were devouring each other, smirking into kisses and Katsuki was a single item of clothing away from being nude. He looked down at Mako under him, blushing deeply and spread out like a good boy as he pumped his cock in his hand. As Mako expertly stroked him, Katsuki groaned deeply. He ran his thumb along Mako's plump lip in deep thought.

"Hey," Katsuki rasped out. "Would you ever want to get serious with me?"

"Wh-What?" Mako stopped his movements. His pretty purple eyes went wide, and he visibly recoiled. "Where is this coming from?"

Katsuki immediately sensed that apparently that was the wrong thing to say. Mako was looking at him like he had gone mad and it worried Katsuki. Katsuki cleared his throat and ran his hand through Mako's hair gently.

"Hypothetically of course," Katsuki covered up. "Do you think I'm…serious boyfriend material? I'm curious."

Mako began blinking and quickly sucked in his lips to suppress a tiny snicker.

The corners of Katsuki's mouth tugged down. "Why are you laughing?"

"I'm sorry but I didn't think you would be the type to want a relationship," Mako said nonchalantly. "We've been fucking for what? Six months? I thought you weren't like that at all. It's kind of why I…went after you."

Katsuki frowned harder and retracted his hand from Mako. "Huh?"

"You're The Scarlet Eyed Killer," Mako said like it was obvious. "You're very handsome and rough in bed, but, um, those aren't exactly boyfriend or husband qualities. After what happened on the news, I know there's a couple people who are very much avoiding you…it's why no one at work wants to date you."

Katsuki's face slowly fell.

People were afraid of him.

Suddenly all the avoidance at work and the stares were no longer passive. They cut deep into him, and he could feel the judgment crawling up and down his skin like vicious hawk eyes.

"Hey. I didn't mean that in a bad way," Mako spoke softly. "I meant it in a good way. You're, Bakugou. You carry yourself like you don't have feelings or care about that type of stuff. I thought you wouldn't ever want a relationship. I didn't actually hurt your feelings, did I?"

"What feelings?" Katsuki said bitterly. He shoved down all his emotions and pressed his lips in a thin line. "I was just asking a dumb question. Of course, I don't want to date seriously, it would just get in the way of what I'm best at."

"Fucking?" Mako said half-heartedly with humor. Katsuki didn't laugh. The other teen shifted awkwardly under Katsuki and patted his cheek with false affection. "C'mon, no more silly questions. Let's get back to having fun like we've been having."

Katsuki resisted scowling as the tornado inside of him swirled until he felt beyond angry. His fury twisted into uncontrollable hurt and then those whispers in the back of his head sneered, "I told you so."

Katsuki fucked Mako that night out of pure spite and never spoke to the other teen again.

By the time Katsuki was twenty, he accepted he was not crafted for love.

He hardened his shell to the point he never thought of romance ever again—and it was fucking fantastic. He woke up every morning knowing he only had to take care of two people in this world: him and his mother.

That was enough for him, and he silenced that tiny voice in his head that yammered about useless crap. It kept trying to speak to him and whispered that he wasn't worthy of love or whatever bullshit that was. Katsuki decided to give it no more power.

If he wasn't good enough to be loved then fine. He didn't want it.

Katsuki was comfortable with sex and moving on with his life after getting his fill. Or at least that's what he told himself.

His days were routine: hanging out with his friends, going to work and listening to Denki rant about his rock collection. Find the latest fuck which was easy with his looks and go no further with anyone. His heart stung deeply when he saw couples at The Company, and all he wanted to do was shove in their face how fucking meaningless their romance was.

After he got off of work, he would go to the small flower shop on the way to his mother's apartment and pick up a bundle of pink carnations. She would smile and tell him how much of an amazing son he was. Katsuki grinned every time this happened.

Despite everything failing on the romance front when he was nineteen, his mom was finally better and that's all he could ask for. The last year with her had been perfect, and he felt like he finally had the mother he wanted as a child the last two years.

Then the first domino in a long string of events was set off without his knowledge.

Aizawa had called up M-Unit to his office this one particular Tuesday. He didn't give too many details, just a curt text that read: "Have a big assignment. Let's all discuss it at 07:00."

None of them questioned it, Aizawa was always cryptic. When 07:00 rolled around, it was bright and early and for some damn reason—Aizawa's office was locked. Shinsou thought this was curious and jiggled the handle a bit and then Katsuki pressed his ear to the door.

He could pick up on the muffled sounds of voices coming from inside. Eventually 07:00 turned to 07:42 which transformed into 08:25. They had been waiting for fucking ever. Ultimately they all took a seat outside of Aizawa's office until that damned door opened.

Katsuki was bored out of his mind as he played some dumb games on his phone. Monoma and Shinsou were quietly sitting next to him on the couch. They were discussing something random like the news and missing children. On the other side of the tiny space, Sero was poorly flirting with the obvious dunce head Denki. The sight made Katsuki's lip curl in disgust because that was a match he did not see coming. Hell, Denki didn't even see it to be fair.

When Katsuki's watch read 09:02, the door to Aizawa's office creaked open.

Katsuki usually paid no mind to the type of people that walked out of his supervisor's office. But this instance was different when he was hit with the smell of sharp, rich cologne. It gripped his senses and pulled his eyes up to the party of men exiting out of Aizawa's office.

It was a group of seven, tall men. Six had disease masks and jet-black hair. The only one who didn't was in the center and Katsuki didn't need to ask if he was the leader.

He was a tall man with reddish brown hair and eyes as gold as all the riches in the world. He carried himself like he was a descendant of a family worthwhile, with a sharp regal air coating him. He was dressed in an all-black suit with delicate golden trimming and his coat that had black, fur lining around the collar. He reminded Katsuki of a crow with how sharp the edges of his eyes were.

Aizawa walked behind the group with his head down. Katsuki frowned at that sight. Aizawa rarely held his head down. But this was different. There was a specific, disquieted aura coating Aizawa. Katsuki caught his supervisor's eye and the elder man gestured for him to turn his head away.

But it was too late when the crow-like man turned his golden gaze on Katsuki.

The feeling of crawling serpents under his skin ignited. The eerie feeling slithered up the hills of his spine and settled at the base of his neck with a chill.

"You look familiar," The crow-like man said carefully. His words were concise and carefully chosen. All the flare guns shot off in Katsuki's head at the way golden eyes pierced into him. "…Extremely familiar actually."

Katsuki didn't exactly know what to say. His intuition was telling him to run, but he couldn't. Instead, all he could do was work his jaw as he fought against his instincts towards danger. He sucked his breath in when he realized that statement could mean a number of things. That could be related to his resemblance with Muscular. A very dangerous crime lord with endless connections—or that could also be related to the fact his eyes were circulating all over the news right now.

Both of which meant trouble.

"What's your name?" The man asked curiously.

"My apologies, Mr. Chisaki," Aizawa quickly cut in. He stepped forward swiftly and plastered his face with a tight, polite smile. "I'm afraid names are strictly off limits here. I don't allow for my men's identity to be revealed unless they want them to."

"But you didn't ask if he wanted to," the man now identified as Mr. Chisaki replied in a heartbeat. He looked Katsuki up and down carefully. "Do you want to tell me your name?"

"Um," Katsuki stumbled on his words, unsure what the fuck was happening. He darted his eyes between Aizawa and the strange man. Something was off. Aizawa gave a discreet shake of the head and that was all Katsuki needed. "No, sorry. I prefer my identity to be concealed."

Mr. Chisaki cut his sharp eyes to Aizawa. He raised a thin eyebrow carefully rather than responding. It was anomalous and Katsuki struggled to read Chisaki's emotions. Chisaki's features were utterly too perfect, impeccable even. He was hiding something malicious underneath his guise of civility.

Then in a split second, the cold demeanor thawed, and Mr. Chisaki bowed politely to Katsuki.

"My apologies," Mr. Chisaki said humbly. "You remind me of an old friend I haven't seen in a while." He then turned to Aizawa and bowed. "I will be keeping in touch about any future assignments I may need handled. I appreciate you setting aside the time today to talk."

"It's an honor. It's a pleasure doing business with you, Mr. Chisaki," Aizawa said.

The group of stale faced men began to exit, but not before Mr. Chisaki set his golden gaze on Katsuki one last time. There was an underlying notion in that gesture Katsuki never understood. It was odd, and a little too personal. Like he was looking straight through him.

When the men were gone and out of ear shot, Aizawa released a long breath.

“I hate working with the Yakuza,” Aizawa grumbled and worked out a crick in his neck.

“The Yakuza?!” Denki exclaimed in surprise. His eyes widened by several fractions and all of their mouths gaped open. “That was the fucking Yakuza—”

“—Yes,” Aizawa hissed. He shot a very pointed glare at Denki to be quiet. “Keep your voice down. That was the Yakuza heir, Chisaki Kai. He’s the leader of the Shie Hassaikai and they have a very violent grip on Tokyo and some surrounding lands.”

Katsuki ignored the chill on his neck when goosebumps rose up.

The Shie Hassaikai were notoriously venomous and had blackmail on the most influential political leaders in the country. If that was the heir, Katsuki decided he didn’t want to ever cross paths with them again.

“They’re not to be messed with, you hear me?” Aizawa said firmly. “Remember these are strictly clients who do shady business. Never give your name or address out to them, ever. They usually don’t go looking for trouble, but you never know if they need a pawn in their games. I’ve seen them set up innocent people all the time.”

All of them nodded.

Aizawa always gave good advice, and this was a large reality check for Katsuki. He was always surrounded by people he should be weary of. Yakuza. Crime Lords. Drug smugglers. Shady Politicians. Even though they were hitmen, they were all of these crooked people’s guns operating in the shadows. Just because they did business with these folks, didn’t mean they were allies in crime.

“I see you have folders in your hand,” Monoma said.

“Yes. You all have a new assignment,” Aizawa said. “This is why I called you all here, I didn’t expect that meeting with Chisaki to go over like that. But, The Company was hired to help a crime lord out in Osaka. After reading over the details, it seems like M-Unit is the best fit for the case.”

“Who’s the crime lord this time?” Sero asked. Aizawa handed them all their folders. Monoma, Shinsou and Katsuki were all handed green while Sero and Denki were given support folders with mission details.

“The client’s name is Akaguro Chizome.”

Later that day they were all flown out to Osaka on Aizawa’s private jet.

The beautiful city sights were something they couldn't give much appreciation because they were shuffled into Chizome's headquarters to meet with the crime lord in his office.

The entirety of Chizome's boardroom was painted in a dull, gray color and sitting in his office was a single black rose in a vase full of water. On the walls were pinned up dead roses and tally marks like someone had engraved the marks with their bare fingernails. But what gave Katsuki the creeps the most was the man's chair was spiked in the back with metal rods and his necklace was made of human molars.

Sitting in that chair like a king was Chizome.

He was somehow both poised and rotten in the same breath like a beautiful still life of food that had been decaying for a year. His ink black hair was slicked back into a long, high ponytail and his deadly eyes felt like bullseyes whenever they landed on someone. The crime lord kept himself freshly draped in deep, red suits with shiny rings on each finger.

He smiled at all of them like they were flies.

As they discussed the assignment in the boardroom, Chizome interrupted Monoma and pulled out five, shiny black briefcases.

"To ensure the mission gets carried out well, I'm offering to pay you all more cash up front," Chizome said. "This cash is off record by the way. I know your company takes a commission for your service, which I think isn't right."

Sero frowned and Monoma and Shinsou exchanged glances. Denki stiffened beside him and Katsuki cocked his head curiously. Chizome smirked wider and snapped his fingers. All the bodyguards surrounding him each took a suitcase and walked around the wide, circle table. They placed a briefcase in each of their hands. Katsuki swallowed at how heavy it was—which meant there was a lot of fucking money inside.

Aizawa would kill them for something like this.

"We're not supposed to accept separate payments," Sero finally spoke. He pushed the briefcase across the well-polished table and crossed his arms. "All cash transactions have to go through our supervisor."

"I know," Chizome said. He plucked a piece of dust off his clean red suit. "Think of it as a nice gesture. I appreciate you all coming out to complete this assignment for me, I want to make sure you're paid handsomely."

All of them exchanged unsure glances. Sero was quietly shaking his head, cutting his eye at the crime lord. Denki seemed to side with what Sero was hinting at, however Shinsou had clicked open the briefcase and was counting the cash. Monoma followed the lead of his best friend.

Katsuki was stuck in the middle, tugged by conflicting emotions. All he could see were those unpaid bills on his mother's table and the possibility of her slipping up again.

Shinsou gave Sero an apologetic stare. “I have bills, Sero.”

“We don’t get paid that much,” Monoma said sourly. “Look, it’s a one time thing. I’ve seen plenty of other agents take extra cash on the side. Doesn’t mean it’s anything bad. It’s basically a hallmark that we’re officially killers for hire, alright? Go buy yourself some new clothes or something with it.”

Sero looked at Shinsou and Monoma in disbelief. He turned towards Denki and Katsuki with pleading eyes. However, Denki caved once he clicked open the briefcase. Even though the yen wasn’t gold, it glittered just like it did. With a shaky hand, Denki reached forward and ran his fingers across the cash inside.

Denki turned towards Sero with a sad expression. Katsuki had never seen him sad.

“You know my mom is sick,” Denki whispered to Sero. He glanced down to the cash in his lap. “I was saving up for the operation, but this would cover it.”

Sero chewed on his bottom lip, clearly not okay with any of this.

Katsuki stared at the money in his lap.

Everyone was right to some degree.

Should they accept money from Chizome? Probably not. Aizawa made it a point even to tell them before they left not to trust the people they worked for. However, like Monoma said, everyone took extra cash on the side and bad things rarely happened from it. There was nothing the higher ups could do about it because what they were doing was illegal. And exactly like Denki pointed out, they all had loved ones to think about.

Katsuki prodded his tongue into his cheek as he considered his mother’s housing issue. If he could pay off her apartment in full, then she wouldn’t need to worry about bills. That would take a lot of stress off him, and he wouldn’t have to constantly check up on her and babysit.

“Is it clean?” Katsuki asked.

Chizome chuckled and nodded politely. “Of course. I have done all the work already to make sure you all can understand my gratitude for your services.”

“Alright. Then I’m going to keep the money,” Katsuki decided.

Katsuki clicked his briefcase shut.

Everyone whipped their heads towards him and Chizome’s smirk grew wider. The crime lord leaned against the table and folded his hands happily as he watched all the dominos fall into place.

“Me too,” Monoma said. “And keep your mouth shut, Sero.”

“Me as well,” Shinsou added.

Denki didn’t chime in with their choir but mouthed ‘sorry’ to Sero. He clicked the brief case closed and then placed it down at his side. Denki shamefully folded his hands in his lap quietly and hung his head.

Sero gawked at all of them, not believing what was occurring. He tried to plead one last time but none of them glanced in his direction, silently shutting him down.

When all of them were set in their stances, Sero still didn’t budge on his own. Disgust trickled into his eyes and he shook his head at all his teammates before letting out a disgruntled huff.

“I won’t be keeping the money,” Sero said firmly. “But I won’t tell Aizawa. Whatever shit you all get into, it’s your own damn fault. I won’t say I told you so.”

Monoma rolled his eyes and made some smart-ass quips. Shinsou told Sero to loosen up and Denki stayed as silent as Katsuki.

In retrospect, Katsuki wishes he had listened to Sero at that time. He was always the voice of reason in their chaotic group, but Katsuki had been too caught up in the idea that money could solve all his problems.

Katsuki looked across the table at the smug grin Chizome was wearing.

When their crew got back to their lavish hotel room, everyone was quiet except Monoma and Shinsou. The pair didn’t seem to care about the way Sero was side eyeing them in disapproval. Denki was curling away from Sero, clearly ashamed of himself.

Katsuki carried himself indifferently. He wasn’t going to be as arrogant about taking extra money like Monoma and Shinsou per se, but he wasn’t fucking feeling guilty about it like Denki. Sero could glare at him all he wanted to but the fact stood that out of the five of them, Sero had the most normal fucking life. He had no right to judge any of them.

Before Katsuki went to bed that night, he deposited the money at the bank and sent his mother a text.

[You]: Here’s the money to pay off your car and apartment.

[Mom]: Thank you

He stared at those simple words on the screen for a while.

He didn’t understand why he felt hollow looking at them. The next notification on his phone was a bank withdrawal.

When the next morning came, they met up at the shady warehouse in the woods where Chizome said to come. It was the dead of fucking winter and Katsuki was admittedly a little chilly as he stood there outside waiting.

He checked his watch a couple of times, curious as to where the hell Chizome was. This was a green folder assignment which meant they had to protect the bastard. Couldn't exactly protect someone who wasn't here.

"Chizome said to meet at this location, right?" Monoma asked curiously. He glanced around at the barren place oddly. "This doesn't seem correct."

"This is the spot according to the assignment details," Shinsou muttered. He glanced around, unsure as well. "I vote we dip if he doesn't come after an hour."

"We can't just abandon an assignment," Sero chastised.

"You're such a fucking uncles' boy," Monoma huffed. "I'm with Shinsou on this one. I'm not staying here in the middle of the night in winter, freezing my ass off because Chizome was late or gave the wrong coordinates."

"In case you forgot, all four of you accepted extra money from the man," Sero hissed. He glared deeply at Monoma. "He could fucking say we stole from him or something if we leave without notice—"

"—Who are you?!" A threatening voice suddenly cut into the chilly air in Korean.

All five of them froze.

Katsuki whirled around and his stomach dropped when he could see ten, unfamiliar men standing there with assault rifles locked and loaded. Their faces were angry, confused and on edge. Katsuki slowly put his hands up along with everyone else when his gut twisted.

"Uh, yo, do any of you speak Korean?" Denki whispered wearily when the man repeated his question again.

"Tell me who are you? How did you find this place?" The man said a lot more ferociously in the language they didn't understand. When none of them answered the ten men cocked their guns. "Did filthy Chizome send you?"

"Well, that name I fucking understood," Katsuki muttered quietly. "This is a set up."

"So Chizome sent you! You're all little cockroaches!" The man screamed. "I'll kill you for trespassing. That'll send the message to Chizome that we are done with him. I would say tell your boss, but you will be sliced up into tiny pieces today."

All the other men started muttering in the language Katsuki couldn't understand. Katsuki's anxiety and adrenaline spiked all at once. He tried to calm his breathing, but when the brittle winter cut through his flesh and the sight of blood lust glares encircled them, he knew they were fucked.

“Guys, we need to get out of here. Now,” Denki whispered, shaking slightly.

Then suddenly the sound of footsteps rushing from behind them occurred and all hell broke loose. Denki started screaming, Monoma drew his guns and Shinsou took out his rifle. Katsuki whipped his head to see who was charging at him, but before he could he was hit sharply on the temple with a blunt metal object.

His vision immediately shifted too black.

The cold air slammed into his lungs when the sound of bullets, screams, and the feeling of his body being dragged against the snow woke him back up.

Katsuki tried to open his eyes, struggling to gain control of his limbs again. His whole world was spinning, and he felt like he was ready to puke. He winced when he could feel several gunshot wounds in his arms, legs and chest. It took him a moment to recognize he was being dragged and rushed out of a building he didn’t fucking remember entering.

The world underneath his feet was unstable and all he could hear was Denki’s screams in the background. Shinsou was trying to slap him back awake, and his usually cool demeanor was tossed to the side.

“Bakugou!” Shinsou screamed above the gunshots. “Bakugou! Get the fuck up!”

The desperation in his comrade’s voice was enough to violently pull Katsuki back to the land of the living. He jolted up at the same time Shinsou was hit by a flying bullet. Shinsou screamed as it lodged itself deep in his shoulder and he fell back into the snow.

Katsuki grabbed him, and quickly held him up in his arms. Katsuki yelled out in agony as he tried to work against the searing hot fresh wounds in his body. He had to get them somewhere safe. He had to he had to he had to—

All the thoughts in his head were compressed down to a single word: survive. Katsuki maneuvered swiftly, carrying Shinsou somewhere safe deep into the woods. The sound of rushing footsteps approached upon them as way more men than expected poured out of the warehouse.

“Shit,” Katsuki screamed and tried his best to reload his gun.

His fingers were trembling as he cocked his weapon and then concisely shot two men down. He aimed his weapon directly between their eyes and fired off, killing them instantly. Shinsou eventually rebounded and began to do the same. They worked quickly, killing one, two, three, four, five—ten men. However, more kept coming, and they were coming out fully loaded.

When they found a tree to take cover behind, Katsuki was losing count of the number of people flooding out of the scene. This wasn’t supposed to happen. What the fuck?

“I thought this was a green folder assignment,” Shinsou groaned. “Where the hell is the mark we’re supposed to be protecting?”

“Hell if I know,” Katsuki grunted. “We need to get out of here or kill everyone.”

Katsuki shot another man down who came too close to them.

“I hate gangsters,” Shinsou hissed as he applied more pressure to his wound.

From across the way, Katsuki could see Monoma and Sero sniping men from afar, and Denki trying to call for backup who might be in the area.

By the time someone from The Company arrived, the five of them had cleared out the scene. Dead, bloody bodies full of lead laid in the once clean snow soaking it all the way red. Katsuki had never seen such a sight. It was close to a massacre, all the lifeless figures stretched out. One man had gotten away, but none of them were well enough to chase after him.

Their backup from The Company was stunned by the scene. None of the five of them moved. Simply stayed kneeling in the scarlet-soaked snow. All their wounds were throbbing and Katsuki’s labored breathing was loud. He was kneeled over clutching his chest. Sero was trying to keep Denki awake after he had been hit upside the head. Monoma was clutching against a tree. Shinsou attempted to walk over to him but fell to his knees.

Slowly but surely, Katsuki lost consciousness.

As his face hit the cold snow, his memory transported him back to the safety of Tokyo. He could see the weeping angel covered in snow and feel the small hands that kept him warm. He wanted safety, and as his tortured body ached for it, the thought of the blurry faced boy comforted him.

“Chizome. I’m going to fucking kill you,” Aizawa promised.

They were all standing at the HQ in Osaka and Aizawa had a shotgun in his hands ready to fire. The tensions in the room were thicker than anything Katsuki ever witnessed. On one half of the room was Chizome and his men, smirking happily and on the other half was The Company. Aizawa was standing in front of the five of them livid enough that his heated glare made Katsuki scared.

“You put my best unit of agents’ lives at risk because you lied about what the assignment was,” Aizawa seethed. “If they had been killed I would have shot you where you stand right now.”

“If they were killed they would have paid their debts to the universe,” Chizome said nonchalantly in some goddamn riddle. There wasn’t a drop of remorse in his eyes as he rolled the stem of a black rose between his fingers. “Killers'' lives have no real meaning.”

He looked over the five of them who were thoroughly beat up and bandaged nearly everywhere. All five of them stayed silent, unsure of what was going to happen.

“So, you did this to kill them?” Aizawa asked, hatred spilling into his words.

“No, I did this to put them to use. They’re all useless pawns at your company so I figured I would give their skills a spin.”

“Why not just pay for a goddamn red assignment?” Aizawa asked. “They were unprepared to handle that many men all at once.”

“I saw the price of red,” Chizome said slowly. He looked towards them and sneered. “Not a single one of them is worth that much. They didn’t even kill the main guy I was hoping they would. They let him scurry away like a goddamn roach.”

“Don’t ever contact me or The Company again,” Aizawa said in finality. “I returned your money and all future contracts with us are nullified per the damn clauses. Go fuck yourself.”

Katsuki swallowed at the mention of money. All of them cut their eyes at each other, realizing they had in fact fucked up. Monoma pressed his lips in a thin line. Shinsou held his breath and Denki looked like he was about to cry. Sero was glancing at Aizawa’s face then to Chizome’s—and Chizome’s all too perfectly painted face was grinning wide.

Katsuki started chants in his head that he would make it home without any conflict. They all turned around slowly, not saying a word about the money that was dealt under the table.

But as soon as Aizawa’s hand touched the door, Chizome’s deep chuckle stopped them.

“What about the money I paid these men privately?” Chizome announced.

Shinsou cursed under his breath and the ground underneath all their feet felt like it gave out. Katsuki sucked in his lips and closed his eyes begging for some black hole to swallow him up.

Aizawa stiffened and looked over his shoulder. “What are you talking about?”

“I paid those four extra.” Chizome pointed his long, boney finger at him, Denki, Monoma and Shinsou. “I thought we had an understanding that I paid them extra money to do an extra task for me. Or at least that’s what we agreed upon.”

“He’s lying,” Monoma objected immediately. He shook his head quickly when Aizawa looked at all of them like they had committed a grave deed. “We never agreed to kill a warehouse of people like that—”

“—Sure you did,” Chizome said. “That’s why you took my money. You knew what this assignment really was, I don’t know why you’re lying now.”

Katsuki was speechless. He felt so fucking dumb. Of course, it was a goddamn trap. This whole assignment was a fucking trap.

“Is that true?” Aizawa muttered. He looked at all of them with deep disappointment. “Did you take his money?”

“Y-Yes,” Denki admitted and Aizawa’s grip on the door handle tightened dangerously. “B-But he said it was just a nice thank you! I would not have gone anywhere thinking I had to kill someone, much less a building full of people!”

“Well, I had specified I only needed one person killed.” Chizome held up his pointer finger. “But that one person seems to have gotten away. So, this counts as a failed mission. I’ll be taking my money back now because this wasn’t part of our agreement.”

Monoma’s nostrils flared. “There was no goddamn agreement—”

“—Give him back his money.” Aizawa didn’t look at any of them. “You all should know better than to take money under the table. This is exactly why. Give him back his money and we’re cutting off all ties with this shit show before someone loses their life.”

Denki, Shinsou and Monoma all did as Aizawa said. They took off their large, black backpacks that were strapped to their person and started taking out the wads of cash. Cash that Katsuki already had deposited and fucking spent. As his colleagues handed over all the money and Chizome’s men counted it up, bile stuck to the back of Katsuki’s throat.

All eyes were on him.

Katsuki flexed his hands when he started to realized he fucked up greater than he ever thought he would.

“Bakugou, you too,” Aizawa said tiredly. “Give Chizome his money so we can leave.”

“I—” Katsuki licked his lips. Everyone glanced at him and Chizome seemed so satisfied by his floundering. “I don’t have the money.”

The corners of Aizawa’s mouth pulled all the way down. “What do you mean you don’t have the money?” Aizawa hissed. “He gave it to you yesterday, right? Where is it?”

“I sent it to my mom,” Katsuki whispered. “She texted me that she already spent it all.”

“Bakugou,” Aizawa said his name like he was already in the grave. All the blood drained from his face and left him visibly pale. “You need to get that money back.”

“I can’t,” Katsuki hissed. “I already used up all my funds this month for grocery, bills, the condo, the apartment and two car payments. The month left me with a tight budget.”

“Tsk. What an irresponsible little boy,” Chizome reprimanded. He looked beyond pleased. “Clearly someone needs some time to grow up and learn how to better juggle his finances. Did no one teach you never to blow your entire bank account all at once?”

No.

No one had taught him that. That fact cut Katsuki to have it shoved in his face.

Chizome rolled that black rose between his fingers again. The crime lord tilted his head at him with a sick grin.

“I want my money, Bakugou,” Chizome insisted. “If I don’t have it by the end of the day I’m going to assume you’re meaning to cross me like the sniveling child you are.”

That single word of ‘child’ triggered something deep in Katsuki. He gritted his teeth.

“How the hell have I crossed you?” Katsuki barked before he could stop himself. He whirled on Chizome, angry. He stepped forward to go get in that bastard’s fucking face but quickly Monoma grabbed his arm and held him back. “I should wipe that stupid grin off your face for this. You have no idea who the fuck I am.”

“I actually have a couple theories,” Chizome said amusingly. He lowered the black rose and gently placed it on his desk. “You could be some plain, poor boy from the countryside with a bad temper. But maybe you’re the bastard son of one of the most murderous men in history. Or possibly, you’re The Scarlet Eyed Killer.”

Everyone in the room froze.

Aizawa cursed under his breath and Katsuki’s bones rattled. Katsuki reeled back a bit, confused but it all suddenly clicked into place.

“You knew who I was this whole time,” Katsuki whispered. “What exactly is this?”

“An offer,” Chizome explained. “After the way you killed your poor father, the police aren’t the only people looking for you, I hope you know. A lot of powerful people want you on their side yet you’re wasting your time being trained by this wash out. Rage like yours needs the chance to flourish.”

Chizome cut his eyes towards Aizawa who was eerily silent. He was poised with his shotgun, watching everyone in the room carefully.

“You have two choices,” Chizome continued. He leaned back in his chair and studied the dead roses he had pinned on the wall. “Come work for me on an assignment and pay off the money you’ve spent or give me the money back in a day.” Chizome’s wolfish grin spread wider. “We can arrange something, and you can go hunt down the insect you let get away. Who knows, maybe you’ll find you enjoy working for someone who rewards your rage versus tries to suffocate it. I’m a great mentor.”

“You can kiss my ass,” Katsuki jeered, and he spat on the ground. “I’m not paying you shit and I’m not going to work for you. I would rather kill you than ever have you mentor me you sick fucker.”

Chizome glowered. He looked down at the wad of spit on the ground in disgust. “You’re more disrespectful than I anticipated.”

“I haven’t even begun to disrespect you,” Katsuki jabbed. “I’ll put a knife in your throat before I let you tell me what to do.”

Chizome raised an eyebrow. “Big promises.”

“Bakugou. We need to leave,” Aizawa warned slowly.

Quietness washed over the scene. Everyone stayed still, surveying each other’s trigger fingers. In the tension, Katsuki could have sworn he heard Denki’s heartbeat. Without another word they all backed up, and it looked as though Chizome was truly about to let them go.

When they finally walked through the door, Chizome uttered one last warning Katsuki would never forget.

“Whether debts are fair or not, they are debts,” Chizome said slowly. “They have to be paid one way or another. Sometimes they are paid in regret. Debts are debts.”

Katsuki would come to find out those words were true.

Months went by with no word from Chizome.

During this time, Aizawa had tried to urge him to give back whatever amount of money he had been given like Shinsou, Monoma, and Denki had. But Katsuki was prideful and thick headed. He didn’t like the way Chizome approached him, calling him a goddamn child. Then the bastard tried to trap him like some animal on a leash to do his dirty work. He would teach the man a lesson this way, and if someone came up to him, Katsuki was confident he would devour them.

But it was fucking strange that nothing happened.

It kept Katsuki on high alert. Every corner he turned he was on his toes, gun secretly loaded in his leather jacket. He forced himself to be sharper on assignments. So much so that Aizawa and Monoma noticed his paranoid shift—but nothing ever came.

Katsuki tried to make sense of it, because that sleazy bastard was always known for getting what he wanted. Katsuki reasoned after a while of silence, maybe the man was scared of him. He was the notorious Scarlet Eyed Killer who brutally murdered Muscular in cold blood.

It probably was no secret either amongst the underground crowd the man was his father.

Katsuki foolishly thought he was untouchable for months of silence. Six months of nothing occurred to the point it lulled him into a false deception of security.

During this time, he visited his mother. He brought her pink carnations every time he dropped by because he enjoyed the cheerful look on her face. She would call him thoughtful and then tell him about her day. He did his assignments, hung out with his friends. He went on his spree of ‘dates’ and soon it felt like Chizome was all talk—

—Until he wasn’t.

This summer afternoon had been blazing. The temperatures were record high and Katsuki fanned the hem of his black shirt to catch some breeze. He had his sunglasses pulled down on his eyes, blocking out the sun and preventing anyone who might recognize him from his eyes alone.

He had been walking back from purchasing another bundle of pink carnations from the flower shop when he got a call from Sero. He answered easily, not thinking too much about anything, unknowing to the shadow of the grim reaper hanging on his shoulder.

“What’s up, Sero?” Katsuki asked as he strolled along. The crowds of the city were packed with their usual density and wide varieties of colorfully decorated people.

“What are you doing right now?” Sero asked, some mischief hanging in his voice. “Want to get into some trouble with your fellow migraines?”

“I’m about to go to my mom’s,” Katsuki explained. “You know I go to visit her on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.”

“Oh, boo. You goddamn mama’s boy,” Sero said unhappily. “Do you think you can skip today? Denki found this pretty sick underground club scene. It has a bunch of really cool drinks, and I heard the guys who come there are really cute—”

“—Pass,” Katsuki said. “If you’re trying to sway me with cute guys, it’s not going to work. I had my daily fuck already. I have no desire to talk to any cute guys.”

“I forgot how crude you are,” Sero grumbled. “Why do you spend so much time with your mom, dude? Not knocking you or whatever. I wish my mom gave me that type of attention. But like, we’re all just kind of curious.”

Katsuki pushed his tongue into the side of his cheek. He thought about his response honestly and carefully. “I feel like I’m playing catch up to be honest for all the time my mom and I missed when I was growing up.”

“…What do you mean?”

“I dunno, this is gonna sound really fucking corny, but.” Katsuki paused to lick his lips. “She wasn’t the best parent when I was a kid. She did the best she could but it wasn’t enough for someone my age, y’know? It’s weirdly nice that she’s finally mentally here. I just want to try to play catch up. I’ve gotten her as a good mom for two years so far. I can’t remember when I was younger. All I can remember was when she started being not so great.”

“Damn,” Sero whispered. He whistled low. “I didn’t expect such a deep answer from you. I didn’t know things were like that for you growing up, man. Sorry to hear that but nice to hear it’s gotten better.”

“Thanks, Sero. Yeah, it’s gotten a lot better,” Katsuki whispered. He smiled a bit, happy to finally say the word ‘better’ with weight behind it. “I promise when I feel like things with my mom are fully okay again, I’ll come out to hang with you all.”

As they had this convo, Katsuki walked to his mother's place. He entered the building, took the elevator up and watched the numbers light up. He felt content as the slow rise of the metal machine reeled him upwards. When the elevator dinged, Katsuki exited through the chunky metal doors with Sero still yammering in his ear.

"I'm holding you to that man! No offense, but Monoma scares away everyone," Sero groaned. "Him and Shinsou are so socially awkward."

"God, you're so fucking right." Katsuki chuckled. He dug out his keys from his pants pockets and pushed it in the lock with a cocky grin. "I swear it's like someone took a stick, broke it in two and stuck it up each of their asses—"

He swung open the door and all the words died in his throat.

Katsuki's eyes locked on to the cold, dead body in the room.

His heart dropped down to the floor and his stomach squeezed in nausea as he tried to comprehend what he was seeing. Red eyes. Red eyes the same as his were lifeless and dull staring back at him. The fragile, petite body was unmoving and had a gaping mouth. Blonde hair was caked with red speckles. His mother's body was laid out on the ground, ashen gray and pooled by her own blood that was leaking from the bullet hole in her skull.

Katsuki dropped the phone when his world spun into motion. He ran towards her with the bouquet of carnations in his hand. His voice splintered and he started screaming out 'mom' in an ear shattering tone as pink petals trailed in his steps. He sank harshly to his knees beside her stale body. His mind rapidly raced with thoughts too quick to catch as he stared at what was in front of him.

There was so much red.

"Bakugou?" Sero's voice from the forgotten phone could be heard. The once bubbly tone used was now on high alert and concerned. "Bakugou, are you okay?"

Katsuki's voice was stolen from him as he stared at the lifeless body of his mother.

The thick blood pooled from her body onto his pants as he sat there trying to wrap his mind around what he was seeing. He nudged her body with his trembling hands like she was simply asleep, but she didn't move. She didn't blink. She didn't breathe. She was dead. She was dead. She was dead. She was killed—

"Hey Bakugou, answer me. Is everything okay?"

Sero's voice was nothing but white noise piercing through Katsuki's mind. He couldn't comprehend anything as long as his eyes were locked on the ghastly visual in front of him.

Katsuki choked back a sob. Those stinging tears that always threatened to fall appeared once more, but like always, those tears never fell. His eyes were wild as they darted around the lavish apartment. He searched for an intruder, calling out angrily to whatever ghost it was but found no one but the phantoms of his own mind. He studied the way her body had fallen, mangled and unnatural right in front of the open window.

“Okay, Bakugou. I’m going to call Aizawa and we’re coming over there now. You’re scaring me.”

Katsuki wanted to scream, he wanted to yell and respond to Sero but he found himself trapped in time. His eyes refused to peel away from the bullet hole in his mother’s skull. He could see the ghost visual of Chizome laughing at his misery and giving him that sickly grin.

By the time Aizawa and Sero arrived, Katsuki was still kneeled in the middle of the living room, curled over Mitsuki’s dead body. The blood had soaked through his pants, shirt, and jacket, staining him in deep red that he would never be able to rub off as he sobbed over her. Between their bodies, Katsuki was clutching the pink carnations so tight to his chest that they suffocated in his grip.

Aizawa made the first move, walking on the ground like it was ready to shatter. He kneeled down carefully and touched Katsuki’s shoulder without saying a word.

“She’s dead.” Katsuki didn’t recognize his own voice.

Aizawa had tried talking to him afterwards, but Katsuki couldn’t hear anything. Every word spoken was noisy static. It went in one ear and out the other.

Katsuki sat there, unsure of what to do with himself as he waded in his mother’s apartment. Investigators from The Company were moving all about, taking her stuff, and Aizawa was trying his best to take charge for him. The elder man steeled his emotions and tried to act like a leader in the situation, but his distress was clear as day. The bags underneath Aizawa’s eyes were darker. Heavier. Even he was feeling the weight of Mitsuki’s sudden murder.

When the last of his mother’s things were picked up and no trace of any killer could be found, Katsuki’s heart broke even more.

“I’m sorry, Bakugou,” Aizawa said. His voice was mournful, and he clenched his fists, keeping in his rage. “There’s no trace of any evidence. There was just a single bullet, and we can’t figure out how to trace it.”

Katsuki held back from screaming.

He looked at the terrible blood stain that was soaked into the wood.

Who did this?

As he stared at the way the blood was caked in the cracks of the floorboards, a flower delivery boy awkwardly cleared his throat at the doorway.

“Hello? Is there a Bakugou Katsuki here?” The delivery boy asked.

Katsuki tore his eyes away from the floor and Aizawa peered around the busy people bustling in and out. Some curious eyes looked as well. The boy standing there was dressed in a blue and white uniform, and nearly looked dorky with his hat on. His eyes were weary though, and an anxious aura surrounded him as he glanced around at all the strange, suspicious looking employees from The Company.

“I’m Bakugou Katsuki,” Katsuki answered loudly. His voice was hoarse from using it infrequently.

The boy nodded, a little skittish as he stared down at the strange flowers in his hands. He stepped into the apartment and everyone inside froze as the petite man walked inside. A feeling like spiders nestling under his skin occurred when Katsuki caught sight of the flowers. It was a large bundle of wilted, black roses with red paint splattered across them.

“These are a delivery for you,” the boy said in a hush whisper, terror in his eye.

Aizawa’s face became disquieted as Katsuki was handed the flowers that had a scarlet ribbon tied around them. Aizawa peered from over Katsuki’s shoulder to see exactly what he was seeing. Sitting neatly tied to the flowers was a tiny card. Katsuki flipped the white card around to see a neat cursive message. Both him and Aizawa read the message, and when they did, all the pieces clicked in place.

Debts are Debts.

— Chizome .

Katsuki crushed the card in his hands and gritted his teeth together.

His fists clutched painfully tight as pure fury boiled inside of him. His nostrils flared with anger as the dark spirited in him howled loudly from deep inside of his core. Katsuki’s face twisted into a deadly scowl as the mocking laughter of Chizome played in the back of his head.

“I’ll kill him,” Katsuki promised with a broken voice. He didn’t notice that his nails had broken through the skin on his palms had drew blood. “I’m going to fucking kill him.”

His mother’s funeral was something Katsuki had never given thought.

He always assumed it would be something he’d approach far in the future when they both had lived their lives. By that time she’d have silver hair, healed from his father’s death, and recovered fully into a functional person. But now, that was robbed from both of them. Cut short like most things in Katsuki’s life were.

There was a specific irony in the fact this was Katsuki’s first funeral.

He had painted himself red many times, stealing life away from so many people daily. But he never had to dress in black like all the families he caused to have missing links. He wondered if this is how any of them felt at the funerals for their loved ones. How many times over had he inflicted this same type of pain on someone? He had never thought about it until now. One person dies and the ripples of their absence stretched out further in time than anyone could ever calculate.

Katsuki dressed accordingly with Aizawa's guidance. His suit was a crisp black with a black tie and a black button up. He had black pants and black socks and shoes. In his hands he held the pink carnations his mother always loved. A part of him was foolish feeling like this was another opportunity to make her smile, one last time. He could imagine her hugging him and telling him he was such a good son like always.

But he was rudely awakened that she would never smile again during the service.

Her unmoving body laid in that white, satin lined coffin. Her skin was blankly gray. Her eyes were closed and her hands were delicately crossed over her chest. She looked so peaceful for the first time. Not distressed. Not drunk. Not paranoid. She looked like she was finally resting after running from her problems for so long.

When she was lowered into the ground, all of Katsuki's visions of the future being better followed.

After the service concluded, Katsuki sat on a wooden bench outside of the cemetery. He still held the pink carnations in his hand. He didn't have the will power to actually put them in the ground with her. He plucked the petals from the flowers one by one.

His thoughts were heavy.

She was getting better. Finally, she had finally been getting fucking better and Chizome fucking robbed him of it.

He didn't know how long he had sat there mutilating the carnations in his hands. By the time Aizawa found him, half of the bouquet was tweaked of its petals. Aizawa had a grim look etched into his face. The elder man didn't say anything, simply sat next to him in his all black outfit as well. Katsuki's thoughts were full of Chizome. He couldn't get rid of the vision of that rotting smile even if he fucking wanted to.

"Whatever happened to Asashi's daughter after I killed him?" Katsuki asked quietly.

Aizawa cut his eye towards him. He looked at the flower petals that fell to the ground steadily. "Are you sure that's a question you want to ask right now?"

"Yes," Katsuki said. "What happened to her?"

"She went on to be a doctor." Aizawa let out a deep sigh. "She's finding her peace and keeping other people's loved ones alive. She made it part of her life mission to help save people's lives since she never was able to figure out what happened to her father."

Noble.

Katsuki nodded his head in approval. "That's good. I was half expecting maybe she would try to avenge her father one day."

“No. Camie isn’t like that,” Aizawa said. He shrugged and scratched behind his head. “What makes you ask that question today?”

“Because I’m going to kill Chizome,” Katsuki announced, eyes unfocused. He angrily plucked more petals, not slowing his steady stream of destruction. “I wanted to know if there were any loose ends that might prevent me from doing so.”

Aizawa gave him a pitiful expression. “Bakugou…”

“He killed my goddamn mom, Aizawa,” Katsuki hissed. His words were lathered in loathing. “I want to make sure it’s even.”

“Revenge doesn’t help anything, Katsuki,” Aizawa warned. He worked his jaw and shook his head with conflict swirling in his eyes. “Trust me, kid. I know. I have been down this path before. The path of revenge isn’t pretty. It’s a mistake and you’ll wind up hurting people close to you.”

Katsuki scoffed.

“People close to me?” Katsuki mocked slightly with a sneer. “And who exactly would that be? I have no one. My mother was the only fucking person I had. My father is dead. I murdered my biological father. I don’t have anyone else. I can’t hurt people who aren’t there.”

Aizawa shifted and let the silence pan out.

“Katsuki. You’re hurting,” Aizawa eventually said and turned his body towards him. “I know you are deeply hurting, and I know how horrible loss can feel. But killing Chizome isn’t going to make you hurt less. You can’t solve loss with more loss. Killing Chizome is not going to heal you.”

Katsuki shook his head. “You’re misunderstanding me, old man. I’m not trying to heal. I’m trying to make someone bleed.”

Aizawa made a pained face. “…I thought I raised you better than that.”

“Raised me?” Katsuki parroted. He turned to Aizawa with bloodshot eyes, clouded with rage and hurt.

“I meant taught,” Aizawa quickly corrected. “I thought I taught you better than that.”

“No. You meant raise me.” Katsuki sarcastically sneered. “Is that what you think? Do you think you fucking raised me?”

Katsuki glared sharp, unforgiving daggers deep into the elder man’s skin when he got no reply. Katsuki chuckled ironically and twisted his words like knives.

“Let me be clear. No one has ever fucking raised me, because if they had, I wouldn’t be a goddam hitman for hire,” Katsuki hissed. “You did not raise me. Not then, not now, and I’m too goddamn old to be raised ever in the future. You’re not my fucking parent. All my parents are dead. The last one was lowered into the ground today. Don't you ever say some shit like that to me again."

"I didn't mean it like that," Aizawa said quietly.

"Then what did you mean?"

No answer came but the howling wind.

Katsuki shook his head in disgust and stood up from the bench. He tossed the carnations down to the ground with disdain and walked away.

He left Aizawa on the bench by himself with his mistake. Hurt danced across the elder man's face, and a heavy part of his bruised heart wilted for Katsuki. He wanted to jump up and chase him down, but he didn't. He stopped himself, unsure of what had transpired.

When Aizawa looked down to the once beautiful bundle of pink carnations, they had been plucked clean.

The weeks following his mother's death felt foreign.

He had always lived to make sure they were safe. But now, without her, Katsuki didn't exactly know what he was living for. He realized that all his efforts were for her. Never him. He would have never killed that man if not for her. He would have never taken this job if not for her. Everything was always about her and always had been.

All the bright colors from his life were drained into nothing. Every carnation he glanced at felt like it wilted to match him. He sagged his shoulders more, was quieter, standoffish and had a dangerously short temper. He ended up snapping on Monoma one day, purely because the other blond had walked a little bit too close to him once in the office.

After that, Aizawa put him on bereavement leave.

Well, he forced him.

"I don't need a fucking break. I need to find that bastard and slit his goddamn throat," Katsuki grumbled firmly when Aizawa told him to go home.

"For those sentences alone, I am going to make you take an extra two weeks," Aizawa said. The elder man shook his head and barely looked at him. "Come back when you're feeling less homicidal. I need you at your best and your best isn't when you're focused on violence alone. You lost your last living parent. You need to take some time to do self-care and recalibrate."

"What the fuck is self-care?" Katsuki asked.

Aizawa had opened his mouth and closed it. The elder man shook his head. "Go home, Bakugou. Get some rest. I'll see you in a month."

He was promptly escorted out of The Company and locked out. The guards took his ID and keys to get inside of the building and left him in the cold. Katsuki stood there, baffled as he gawked at the doors. He tried to ignore the part of him that was angry and slightly betrayed by Aizawa. His supervisor could barely fucking look at him, and he worried that it was because of pity.

Katsuki went to his apartment that night and was faced with the realization that he didn't know what the fuck he was doing.

He had far more money than he needed now that he only had his own bills to pay. He didn't make trips to the grocery store anymore for two people. He didn't stop by the flower shop anymore. He didn't view everything as him and his mother. He was forced to view everything as just him—and he had never done that before.

It was terrifying because Katsuki didn't know how to live for himself, and he was twenty years old.

He had a hard time getting out of bed, and that hungry spirit inside of him was the only thing keeping him going. With its jagged tooth smile, it told him every day to wake up, get dressed and track down Chizome. The vicious rumbling of revenge pulsed through his veins as he focused solely on making the score card even. He would make sure to plant a bullet in Chizome's forehead just like the man had done to his mother.

It didn't take long to find himself utterly consumed in his obsession.

The vision of his dead mother wouldn't leave him. The vision of Chizome promising to make him feel pain wouldn't leave him either. It wasn't before long, that those two memories blended together cruelly until he could see Chizome being the one to pull the trigger.

His grief filled in the gaps in his memory like glue, piecing all the missing images together. When Katsuki was alone at night, too weighed down by his hurt to get out of bed, he could envision it all. He could picture Chizome or one of his goons climbing in through his mother's window and swiftly landed a bullet in her skull right as she screamed.

Those morbid thoughts alone were enough fuel for Katsuki to keep moving. He was running on pure spite, but he needed it. The only thing that could save him was his anger—like it always had.

Katsuki eventually began to stalk the gangster's movements. He figured out where the man's HQ was, but he found out quickly the bastard never traveled without his deadly possie. The ones he kept in his inner circle were brutes. They killed without blinking and had sharp shooting skills that rivaled Katsuki's.

On one particular night, Katsuki stalked Chizome a little too closely. He was stationed out of where he learned to be the abandoned building he did his work in. As the gangster exited the doors, Chizome had stopped walking with his crew. He slowly creeped his eyes upwards in the dark to set sights on Katsuki camouflaged in all black with his gun pointed.

They locked eyes and the energy in the atmosphere surged like electricity. Several guns drew in the blink of an eye and his face was covered with tiny red dots. With a rush of adrenaline, Katsuki quickly ducked away, laying low on the ground. He squeezed his eyes shut, expecting a rainstorm of bullets.

However, he was met with nothing.

Confusion gripped him when the silence was a little too crisp. Why wasn't he made into a perfect opportunity for target practice?

When he peaked back over the ledge of the roof, Chizome and his inner circle had vanished. Katsuki pointed his gun in the darkness, looking for where they went but they had dispersed, leaving him alone on the roof by himself.

When Katsuki arrived home that evening, he ripped his ski mask off his exhausted face and placed his sniper gun on his expensive glass table. He was preparing to go lay down, but before he could relax a loud pounding on his door occurred.

Katsuki frowned, wondering who it could be. Maybe it was Chizome, here to finish off his fucking bloodline. Katsuki grabbed his rifle again and peaked out of the peep hole in the door —only to see Aizawa glaring at him through the fish-eyed lens. Judging by the pissed off expression he was wearing, Katsuki knew this was going to be tiresome.

He opened the door, and he was right. Aizawa barged in, slamming the door hard enough to probably shake the whole building and locked it tight. He whirled on Katsuki with the rage of a thousand storms.

“What the fuck is this I am hearing about you stalking Chizome?” Aizawa demanded.

Katsuki shrugged his shoulders and glared at his supervisor. He put his gun back down on the table and turned around.

“I don’t know what you’re talking about, old man—”

“—Cut the bullshit with me!” Aizawa snapped loudly, anger in full swing. He slammed his fist on the wall and it shook violently under his strength. “I have gotten a goddamn threat on your behalf because you crept too goddamn close to him. Have you learned nothing?!”

“I’ve learned that that bastard deserves far more than a bullet in his skull,” Katsuki muttered nonchalantly, not fazed by Aizawa’s seething. “Sure, I crept too close to him, but the fact is I got close. I can get closer if I try harder. And when I do, I’m going to give him the same treatment I gave Muscular.”

“Stop this,” Aizawa begged. His voice cracked desperately as he tried to cut through Katsuki’s hurt to speak some sense into him. “Chizome is no one to be casually messing around with. He already killed Mitsuki, but if you fuck around he has no issue picking apart everything until you fall apart. He’s going to make this personal even further if you keep fucking around.”

Katsuki flicked his hand at him and turned away. “I don’t care.”

“Bakugou—”

“—I said I don’t fucking care.”

Aizawa let out a tired exhale and screamed, “Do you have a death wish?!”

“And what if I do?!” Katsuki yelled back, whirling around with tears clutching his eyes.

Aizawa’s eyes grew wider by several fractions.

Katsuki’s chest heaved with realization of what he admitted. It flowed out easily, tipping off his tongue like a terrible prophecy. His chest splintered in uncountable fractures, damaged by his racing mixed emotions. Rage. Hurt. Desperation. Self-loathing. All these emotions pulled on him until he felt himself buckle under their weight.

“What if I do want to die?” Katsuki said slowly. His anger faded away into despair. “What if that’s what I think is best?”

Aizawa’s expression softened, and he carefully stepped towards the wilting young soul.

“Katsuki…”

“I—I don’t know how to fucking function,” Katsuki admitted shamefully. He gestured wildly around to all the shiny, beautiful things in his apartment. “I’m sitting here in this goddamn place going crazy because the fucking person I always had to make sure lived is dead because of me. Me. Not because of some dumb shit she did—it was me in the end. I was supposed to be the responsible one and I got her killed being so goddamn stupid. I-I should’ve given the money back like you said. You warned me and I didn’t fucking listen and I got her killed.”

Aizawa looked down to the ground and his eyes skirted off to the side.

“Maybe I should go get myself killed by Chizome,” Katsuki chuckled sadly. “At least then it’ll be even. The right fucking person will be in the grave.”

He walked away from Aizawa, suddenly too tired to keep standing.

Katsuki walked over to the couch and hunched over. The feeling of the leather underneath him felt pointless. He kept thinking about what would have happened to them if he never took this job—would she still be alive?

“Your mother wouldn’t want you to think like this,” Aizawa muttered slowly. He sat down next to Katsuki on the couch. He folded his hands pensively and exhaled loudly. “She wanted what was best for you, Katsuki. Which means, living your life and not throwing it away.”

“I think I already have thrown it away,” Katsuki said sadly. “I…I don’t know what to do with myself anymore. I’m useless.”

“You’re not useless.”

“I am,” Katsuki insisted. “I can’t fucking do anything besides kill. It’s all I was made for.” He looked down at his hands and saw the invisible blood caked up to the sky. “If that’s all I’m good for, then the fucking least I can do is kill Chizome. My mother was a spiteful ass woman, she would want me to slit his throat. She believed in evening the scales, not turning the other cheek.”

“Yes, Mitsuki was spiteful,” Aizawa said tiredly. “But she shouldn’t be your guide. You’re sounding a little too much like me right now.”

“You?” Katsuki scoffed, not believing it. “You treat death too surgically. I doubt you would understand what I’m feeling right now.”

Aizawa scratched lazily at his chin and shrugged. His eyes became slightly unfocused as he looked up at the ceiling fan.

“My son, Koji, found out what I do for a living one day,” Aizawa said suddenly.

Katsuki froze on the spot, not expecting the conversation to turn there. Aizawa always kept his past shielded and no one at The Company spoke about his son. People who were around when it happened were long gone by now, and Aizawa never offered up the information anymore. Katsuki made sure to keep quiet as Aizawa continued.

Aizawa smiled bittersweetly. “He was disgusted with me. He couldn’t even look in my direction without seeming like he was going to throw up. His mother at the time had looked at me the same way when I eventually told her what I did.”

Katsuki glanced curiously towards his supervisor, like he was finally seeing him for the first time.

“They both moved away and told me to only contact when absolutely needed. They thought I was a monster.” Aizawa opened his hands and stared at the scars wrapping around his palms. “Then unfortunately, I had a deal gone wrong as well one day too. I wasn’t firm enough with the gangster we were dealing with. He took it upon himself to get back at me and he did it by killing my son and his mother. Then he left their bodies for me to find in my house because he thought we were close.”

Katsuki was stunned.

He never could have considered that was what happened.

“They died hating me,” Aizawa whispered, pain deep in his voice. “I hated myself so much in that moment too, and I told myself if I could go after that gangster it would feel better. I ended up finding him too.”

“…Did you kill him?”

“I did,” Aizawa answered simply. “I shot him seventy-four times.”

Katsuki tried to picture Aizawa killing in passion, but he was stunted and could only imagine a blank vision. Aizawa was a lot of things, but passionate about killing was not one. He committed murder surgically, like it was purely an obligation and he always made sure to do it in the most precise way possible. Shooting someone that many times went against everything he was as a person.

“But I felt nothing. With each bullet, I felt not a single damn thing,” Aizawa said plainly. His eyes glazed over, and his brows pinched together. “I kept pulling the trigger and reloading because I was sure that sense of satisfaction would kick in at some point. I thought I would feel better—but I never did. Seventy-four bullets and not a single glimmer of happiness about it.”

Katsuki frowned.

As tragic as that story was, he struggled to believe that part about no satisfaction was fucking true. Aizawa could just be leveraging this story to try to draw Katsuki out of his fit of spite. If Katsuki had the opportunity, he would be more than gleeful to put that much lead into Chizome’s body. He’d pull the trigger with a twisted smirk and relish in the bloodlust.

Maybe Aizawa wasn’t cut out to be a killer in the same way he was.

“When I try to tell you to act from a place of protection and not rage, it’s not because I think it’s easier,” Aizawa whispered. “It’s because it’s what’s best. The path of anger is always worse. I lost so many friends, and the few people who did love me, I pushed them away in the process. I was so obsessed with finding that gangster I couldn’t see my life fall apart all around me. When I did realize it—it was too late. I couldn’t take back what I had done or said from trying to seek out revenge.”

Katsuki didn’t say much more and decided not to press further.

He knew in his mind that one day he would get his revenge on Chizome and even it out for his mother—but maybe that day wasn’t today. Or tomorrow. Or any time soon when he considered how heavy his heart was feeling. Aizawa wasn’t going to let him follow in his footsteps of spite, he saw himself in him too much.

“If you want to come back to work, I’m going to give you green folders,” Aizawa muttered after a while. He didn’t look at Katsuki as he said this. “I’ll reinstate you in red folders when I think you’re ready and you stop acting like such a goddamn idiot.”

“Fine.” There was no point in arguing.

Aizawa and Katsuki awkwardly stayed there on the couch side by side for a while. Katsuki half expected his supervisor to walk out now that the lecture was finished. Aizawa looked exhausted, dragged down by the mayhem Katsuki had caused.

“I heard the new All Might movie was decent,” Katsuki grumbled after a while. He didn’t look at Aizawa when he said this. He reached for the remote and turned on his flat screen television. “Do you want to watch it?”

“Sure,” Aizawa grumbled back.

They watched the movie together side by side in silence.

When Katsuki proved he was stable again, Aizawa started to give him yellow folders to ease him back into his usual flow once more. The blood lust for Chizome had died off slowly, not because he had forgotten but because he was so distracted by that green goddamn menace.

Deku continued to be everywhere.

Absolutely everywhere.

How the hell could one tiny ass man manage to be such a goddamn pain in his side? Everywhere he turned he saw that freckled face like a nightmare.

“You’re getting a bit slow now,” Deku teased one night when Katsuki missed landing a bullet in his skull. “Off your game?”

But, as much as he hated to admit it—and truly, Katsuki fucking hated to admit it—Deku pulled him out of his spiral of vengeance long enough not to get his ass fired. He had been so consumed in the thoughts of painting Chizome red that he lost sight of himself. Seeing Deku forced him to think of himself and how there were other people in the world other than his mother.

When his mood began to stabilize, Katsuki realized every time he pulled the trigger, he was not motivated to do this any longer.

His mother was dead. He did this whole thing for her. And now that she was gone, he didn’t have to anymore. Which meant he could move on.

He could picture a soft sunset on a horizon that he never could envision before. The thought of it was warm, enlightening and it came to him clearer and clearer with every passing day. It was the first time he could think about the future without having to worry about the present. It was a sad realization how much she always weighed him down.

Beyond the horizon he could see visions of himself somewhere else in life. Possibly a place less red and not full of death. In the back was the sound of a soft violin and he could crisply hear ‘The Dance of The Love Birds’ for the first time in years. He thought about the boy from Tokyo for the first time in a long while and wished he had a way to contact him or even remember what he looked like.

As time passed, the green folders started to turn yellow then eventually they bled into red once more.

The growing need for red folder hitmen was rising quickly. The Company was getting more clients who were politicians and, ironically enough, politicians needed more people killed than they needed protection.

When Katsuki made the shift back over to red folders, he was twenty-one.

His world shifted from green to red. The unnamed green-eyed man was once more just a small annoyance in the background of his life until his next green assignment. But after the death of his mother, Katsuki began hanging out with the migraine unit more. He found that he actually did get along with them more than he thought, and they became close enough to be considered best friends.

Sero and Denki started dating at some point when he was twenty-two. Katsuki remembered how hard he had frowned at that in disgust. He still fucking hated romance—it was so pointless to him.

“You’re really never going to date someone?” Monoma asked with a sarcastic smile. “What? Is dating above The Scarlet Eyed Killer?”

Katsuki fiddled with his ring finger, toying with an invisible fabric ring that was lost with the rest of his childhood.

“It’s stupid to me,” Katsuki had answered with a handsome smirk. He hid the discomfort in his chest at the mention of romance when the blurry faced boy snuck in his head again. “I’ll stick to being the whore of the group to make you extras look better. I don’t have any interest in being a braindead lovesick fool.”

Everyone around him had laughed. They all tacked on with jokes, adding to the punchline.

“Of course, Bakugou isn’t interested in romance, he’s one of Japan’s most wanted,” Sero had said harmlessly.

“Yeah, plus, I can’t even imagine him being soft,” Denki snickered. “He probably would stab himself before ever trying to be gentle with someone.”

“I don’t even think he can be gentle,” Shinsou stated like it was a compliment. “Have you seen how he carries himself? He fucking shoved the guy in the club last week for just coming too close to him. Besides, Bakugou has always taken pride in being rough around the edges. Who are we to say he has to change?”

“Cheers to that,” Monoma laughed. “Bakugou, forever The Scarlet Eyed Killer. Fuck romance.”

Katsuki laughed along with them, agreeing to all the statements. “Yeah, fuck romance.”

He’d never mention how each of those comments stuck to him. And he’d never talk about how those few simple words were all the confirmation Katsuki needed to never try to find love. He was a killer, not a lover. But more importantly, he would always remain a loner.

Later that night, he distantly wondered how the blurry faced boy was doing.

The next year went by with no issues. Running into Deku became routine on green folder assignments and red folder assignments were just technical work to him. By the time Katsuki was twenty-three he was counting down the days for his retirement. He hadn't told Aizawa just yet—but he figured he would cross that bridge when he got there.

However, when the phone rang one dusk colored evening, it changed everything Katsuki would know to be true.

He could probably vividly recall this fateful evening until the day he died. He remembered laying on his couch, searching classical music classes to distract himself. The loss of his mother hung over his head like a dark storm cloud that followed him around.

The phone had run thrice. The first time, he ignored it. He was confused by the unknown number on his screen. He frowned and rejected it, not in the mood to talk to some stranger and tell them they had the wrong number. The second time it rang his confusion grew along with his irritation. He didn't fucking know what this person wanted but he wasn't in the goddamn mood.

So, he rejected the call again.

However, on the third try, Katsuki finally answered. He huffed and angrily pushed the blinking green button.

"What the fuck do you want?" Katsuki snapped unkindly.

The voice on the other end of the line was unbothered. "Is this Bakugou Katsuki?"

"Yes. Who the hell is asking and messing up my weekend?"

"My name is Fukuhara Yori, I'm a property manager in Biei, Hokkaidō," the gentle voice said. There was a welcoming melody carrying that usually prefaced good news. "I'm calling to discuss the estate recently handed down to you by order of inheritance from your family."

Katsuki heard that and didn't even entertain the thought. "I think there's some sort of mix up. I don't have any family that would hand me down any property, much less an estate."

"Your mother was Bakugou Mitsuki, correct?" Yori asked for clarification.

"Yeah, but she didn't own any property." Katsuki casually picked at his nails as he held the phone between his shoulder and ear. "You need to double check your records or something 'cause there's clearly been a mix up."

"Uh, I'm afraid this is not a mistake, Mr. Bakugou," Yori said once more. He could hear the perplexed stare in her voice. "Your mother's maiden name was Sakamoto, correct?"

"Yes. But I'm serious, she never owned a house or anything like that, I would know. I'm her son."

This had to be a mix up. They bounced around so much that there was no damn way his mom magically had a house somewhere—but—as he thought about who his mother was, he understood quickly there was a lot about her he really didn't know.

He had no clue what her life was like before him or even what she left behind.

“Your grandparents, Ren and Hina Sakamoto mentioned your name in their will in the instance that their daughter, Mitsuki, happened to have been deceased,” Yori said slowly. “They passed about six months ago. We tracked down your mother, and records show she died three years ago. Which means you’ve rightfully inherited their home.”

The words were almost spoken in a language he didn’t understand.

Grandparents? Ren and Hina?

There was no fucking way this was correct.

Katsuki’s breathing became shallow as he attempted to wrap his head around the concept. He stared around the high ceilings of his apartment. He looked up at the dazzling expensive lights he bought in an attempt to make his condo feel more welcoming. This lady had to be wrong somewhere down the line because his mother did not have a home to go to this whole time.

He had been homeless for a year. They had struggled so much—

“Mr. Bakugou, are you still there?” The kind woman asked him. “Are you not interested in the estate? If you want to sell it, you can. I can get you in touch with a real estate agent—”

“—No,” Katsuki quickly rejected. He sat up slowly, the world tilting with his vision. His reality turned on its side as he tried to stop his hand from fucking shaking. “Can I see the estate?”

“Of course you can, Mr. Bakugou, it’s your property now!” Yori said cheerfully. “We can get you settled up!”

Katsuki grunted in response, not trusting his own voice. He thought about what the fuck it meant to own an estate and how he never in his wildest dreams every thought of getting that far. But as his memory pressed on that locked volt of his mother’s death—Katsuki wanted to know more.

He decided he needed to see it to believe it.

When Katsuki arrived in the beautiful countryside of Biei, he didn’t think such a place could exist in his reality.

It felt wrong for someone like him to gaze upon such a serene view. Farmers and smiling people leisurely passed by in their traditional clothing. In front of him were long stretches of green fields that appeared endless and right in his view was the most breathtaking sight flowers.

The flower fields were neatly sectioned off in color coded rows that welcomed any passerby. Red, orange, blue, and purple blended together like a soft rainbow. It promised nothing but peaceful days and quiet nights.

What caught Katsuki's eye most was the row of pink flowers.

Carnations.

Beautiful, pink carnations that were lush, plenty and all around him.

Katsuki held back the strange sense that was overpowering him. He tried to ignore it but it loomed over him, following him as he walked down the dirt path. He gripped the tiny piece of paper in his hand that held the address of this so-called estate.

As he walked, he passed by many people. Some were old, some were young. Some smiled at him, and others paid him no mind.

In these people's faces he saw versions of what he thought Ren and Hina might look like. Were they blond too? Or did they have different colored hair that faded to wiry gray in their old age. He could recall asking his mother about possible family, but he had always been shot down. She was short in her responses, anxious even. They had no family. It was just them and it was important for Katsuki to always remember that they were alone in the world.

His mother emphasized this again and again to the point extended family never even crossed Katsuki's mind. He had been so focused on making sure they were secure he never even fucking fathom they possibly had support elsewhere.

When he arrived at the address on the paper, Katsuki could feel that unnamed feeling multiply. Sitting there was a breathtaking image. Large stone surrounded the estate with a metal gate that had golden encrusted floral designs. Standing there was a woman with kind dark brown eyes and dark hair. It was neatly pulled up into a bun and she was dressed in a gray business casual suit. Her large eyes landed on Katsuki, and her face softened into a gentle smile.

"Hello," She said. "I'm Yori, the property agent. We spoke on the phone. Are you Mr. Bakugou?"

Katsuki could only nod.

"Perfect!" Yori said with a tight-lipped smile. "I just need to see your ID and proof of a utility bill or something to confirm you are in fact the rightful inheritance to the estate. We can do all the paperwork inside."

She was polite enough to ignore his clear unease about what was happening. Katsuki fumbled a bit but took out the paperwork he was asked to bring. He handed over his ID and stared at the photo of himself strangely.

It was odd, seeing his own face and name at that moment.

She took the documents from him and double checked everything. She confirmed he was Bakugou Katsuki, and then turned on her heels to the large gates. She delicately pulled out a set of keys from her pocket. The metallic items jingled and Katsuki wondered how many doors were inside that needed that many keys.

“I’ll let you in the property and you can take a look around,” Yori said. “If you want to keep it we can do the paperwork for it to be passed on to you. If you decide you don’t want it, we can get you set up to sell it.”

Katsuki once again could only nod.

Yori pushed open the creaky gates. They let out a rusted sound that indicated they had not moved in a while.

Once Katsuki and Yori stepped foot inside, the first thing Katsuki could see was a koi pond in the center of a garden. The beautiful fishes circled each other in the clear water and on top sat large lily pads with pink flowers. Off to the side of the koi pond was a patch of pink carnations and a delicate stone path that led to a wooden bench.

Katsuki sucked in a breath. Encasing the garden was the two floored estate, in a perfect box shape.

It was huge.

He crumbled up the paper with the address in his fingers. He was shaking—why was he shaking? He couldn’t catch his thoughts as they raced all around. He wanted to scream, yelled, say fucking something—but instead all he could feel was the heavy weight feeling of grief.

“I’ll sign the documents to keep it,” Katsuki said in a mutter.

Yori blinked. “Are you sure? You haven’t looked around.”

Katsuki shook his head slightly. “I’ll look around after I sign the paperwork.”

Yori didn’t protest. She pulled out the documents for him to sign and Katsuki glanced over the names Ren and Hina on the paper. As he signed it, he realized how odd it was to see his name in alignment with theirs. It felt disjointed almost, how connected he was to these people he never met. When he signed on the last dotted line, he asked a question he wished he never did.

“Did they know about me this whole time?” Katsuki whispered.

Yori’s face flashed with some sympathy. She sighed and tilted her head at him, and some level of candidness slipped into her.

“From what I know from just being nosy at work, yes,” Yori confirmed. “They knew you when you were a baby. They didn’t know what happened to either you or your mother, and they couldn’t locate you due to your mother secretly changing her last name. It’s why it took so long to find you to give this property.”

Katsuki didn't answer right away. When he did, he nodded like he was just hearing some stale piece of information.

"And I was found now, because?"

"Stroke of luck," Yori said with a shrug. She gave him a look of pity. "Our company finally got a lead on where your mother went. We were able to find the marriage certificate and confirm it was her. She had gotten married very secretly, and it was legally off a lot of records. Her marriage to Bakugou Masaru is, uh, slightly up for debate in legality."

Katsuki would have asked the details on that further had he not been so exhausted.

He nodded numbly and he gave her back her pen. She took it and muttered her goodbyes with a polite bow. Before she left, she gave him the set of endless silver keys. There were so many and Katsuki couldn't wrap his mind around how many rooms were possibly inside of this estate. He stood there frozen in time as Yori exited. She closed the gates softly and Katsuki couldn't take his eyes off the keys.

When he did, he turned his eyes to the koi fish that were circling round and round in the water. They spun like they were trapped in a time loop that kept repeating.

Katsuki exhaled a shaky breath and decided to take a look around. He pinched himself twice before reaching one of the doors. He kept having to reaffirm that this was in fact a real thing occurring and not some fucked up lucid dream of his.

As he opened the door his throat swell with the sight. It was cozy. He assumed he walked into what was the den and living area. Off to the corner was a well-used rocking chair with an unfinished knitted blanket. The knitting needles were still inside. Next to that chair was another wooden rocking chair that had a blanket and an old newspaper.

On the walls were picture frames. Inside the picture frames were people who looked like him.

They were all smiling in memories that he never witnessed or heard of. One photograph was of a large family gathering with many people who had blond hair and many people who did not. Some people were brunette, others had soft inky black hair. One person even had ginger hair.

He walked up closely to the picture, and it felt like looking through a window in time.

There, he could see his mother standing with the rest of her family. She was cradling a baby in red blankets in her hands. His mother's familiar eyes stared back at him, but at the same time she felt like a stranger. She wasn't smiling and it looked as though she was almost in a sorrowful pain as she cradled what he presumed to be him.

Katsuki walked deeper into the estate, and he stumbled across a great hall filled with photographs. It was so grand and polished that it felt like he was walking in a museum of memories that didn't belong to him. Memories of places, people, and things that occurred but he was never a witness to. Every picture radiated joy as he stared at them in these entrapped glass cases.

He tried to deduce who Ren was and who Hina was.

As he walked, he could progressively see the recurring image of an elder man and woman with his mother. They smiled happily and posed for photos like they lived a fabulous life. Who he decided was Hina always had a red scarf around her neck. She had beautiful blonde hair and kind gold eyes. She smiled lovingly at his mother in all the photos. Who he decided was Ren had a hard, serious look on his face. The corners of his mouth were pulled down into a scowl often in photos and he had dark black hair with blazing red eyes.

He could see pictures of his mother young. When she was a kid she was joyful and happy, collecting pink carnations. But as she grew older, a certain light in her eyes died. She grew stiffer, and meeker in the photos which was opposite of what he knew to be his mother.

Then suddenly, she disappeared from photos.

When Katsuki made it to the next room full of cozy, homey items, he struggled to believe any of this was real. He blinked rapidly, pushing back tears as he struggled to absorb it all. All the memories on the wall clearly happened, there was fucking proof. But staring at them like an outsider was all too painful.

When he turned the corner down another long hallway, Katsuki suddenly saw the life that could have been theirs.

He saw him and his mother living with Ren and Hina. He saw them walking these halls with them at festivals, birthdays and celebrations that he usually never bothered with. He saw the security and warmth he begged his mother for, and he saw their potential to be happy there all together. He even saw his mother dropping him off here that year instead of leaving him stranded in Tokyo. He could even dream of getting to know his grandparents, but that's all it was. A dream.

That unnamed looming sensation bloomed when Katsuki walked into an abandoned nursery.

It was small, but carefully sectioned off and across from one of the many bedrooms he had counted on his journey. It was full of toys, blankets, and there was a window that was veiled with pretty white curtains that swayed in the wind. When a breeze blew in, the curtain delicately lifted to reveal a forgotten vase full of wilted, dried-up pink carnations on the windowsill.

On one white wall was the name 'Katsuki' in neat, scarlet lettering.

He stared at the crib that looked as old as he was. The only thing in the room that wasn't coated in dust was a photograph he had never seen of him and his mother. She was holding him in a hospital bed, smiling happily. She gazed at him like he was the apple of her eye, precious and wanted.

He had never seen her look at him like that before.

Katsuki walked over to where his name was painted on the wall and stared up at it. Sitting beneath it was a white plaster of baby feet. His baby feet. The fossil of his life beginning and official proof of his existence in this house.

Then that looming feeling grew stronger and stronger until it clicked. All the puzzle pieces snapped painfully into place as Katsuki came to a conclusion that scarred his soul for years to come.

He never had to live the way he did.

They had a home—they had a fucking home. This whole goddamn time.

Katsuki's body began to shake as he looked at the fossil of his past life he couldn't remember. He vibrated with sheer unchecked bitter rage. He gritted his teeth to stop himself from seething at the thought of his mother. All the memories of struggle, hunger, and painful cold were mocking him. The plaster of his baby feet seeped from white to red in his mind as he thought about how all of this could have been his.

He didn't have to be a killer. He didn't have to be a criminal. He didn't have to bury bodies. He didn't have to starve. He didn't have to be sad. He didn't have to sleep in that abandoned church. He didn't have to be so fucked up.

He didn't he didn't he didn't he fucking didn't—

He stared all around at the happy memories that were lined up like an exhibit of the life he never got to be a part of.

Katsuki snapped.

He angrily snatched the pure white plaster of his baby feet off the wall. He despised how it represented a clean slate of life while his hands were covered with so much red. Katsuki screamed out a violent curse as he reeled back and smashed it against the ground with all his force. He then picked up the big piece that didn't shatter enough for his satisfaction and smashed it. He did this over and over again, purposefully picking up the biggest piece and breaking it into tiny bits.

He smashed the mold until it was as broken as he was.

He made sure it reflected how unnecessarily broken he was: shattered into countless pieces that had nothing but jagged edges that threatened to cut anyone who dared touch it. Small white pieces were scattered around the nursery, decorating the ground in dangerous sharp edges that would cut through flesh. Just like him.

He breathed heavily through his gritted teeth and his chest heaved in anger.

Then gradually, his heaving chest melted to nothing but pain. He started sobbing, throat swelling with the feeling of being choked by the life he was never given the chance to experience.

He leaned against the wall and dryly sobbed into his closed fists. Slowly, he fluidly sank to the ground amongst the broken pieces. He pushed at his eyes, begging the tears to come but they never did. They stayed stuck just like he was stuck in this cruel museum of potential memories that could have been his.

Katsuki’s shoulders shook as he rasped out the question that always haunted him.

“Why was I never given the chance to be fucking loved?”

Chapter 14 — Pianissimo

Katsuki sucked in a deep breath as he stood in front of the estate. It was the dead of night, the air was heavy, and the silence was filled with anticipation. The metal gates felt taller, wider, and far more intimidating than the last time he saw them. It nearly felt like standing in front of a tombstone large enough to house all his grief.

Next to him was Izuku, leaning on his crutches. The other man was quietly inspecting the large piece of land. He was clearly surprised, not foreseeing this to be where Katsuki was taking him. The crickets in the background were a soft melody as Katsuki unlocked the creaky gates.

They both stepped foot inside without a word. Once in, it felt like they officially crossed into dangerous territory.

“This place is beautiful,” Izuku muttered.

Katsuki wondered if Izuku was being polite. This place was hideous.

The pond in the middle of the garden was clouded with debris. Ugly moss was growing all along the surface and it was obvious that it had not been taken care of for years. Off to the side and all around, weeds and long blades of overgrown grass overpowered everything. The trees were drooping. The flowers were dead. The gates they had walked through were spotted brown with rust.

Not a single thing about this place looked beautiful anymore, and that was his own fault.

Shame rattled inside of Katsuki.

“This way,” Katsuki mumbled tiredly. “Let’s get to bed.”

They walked on the gravel pathway all the way up to the front doors. Katsuki pulled them open, and a loud scrape of the rustic hinges echoed into the night. Instantly, the smell of dust reached his nose, and he could see Izuku scrunch his face slightly. A coat of grime was on the floors, reflecting the full three years of neglect. Some spider webs were nestled into the corner and the welcome rug was deeply dirty.

Izuku was nice enough not to say anything.

Katsuki led them into the part of the estate with the bedrooms. Rows of locked doors greeted them, and it was then Katsuki realized they were faced with a tad bit of awkwardness. There was no longer one bed, or one room. They didn’t have to sleep together anymore and that caused a very blunt realization to hit Katsuki: he wanted to.

Izuku slightly shifted on his feet, cutting his eye up at Katsuki.

Katsuki walked forward and unlocked the guest bedroom and the primary bedroom. Inside the guest bedroom was plain décor. Faded pink wallpaper with purple floral print. The bed was small enough for one person to be comfortable and there was a singular wooden dresser.

The primary bedroom had a lot more to offer. Inside was a king-sized bedframe with a lace canopy falling from the top. It had a large TV inside, two wooden rocking chairs, long, full length mirror and even a nice, attached bathroom. But more importantly, it was clearly built for two.

“Uh, which one do you want?” Katsuki uncomfortably asked.

Izuku didn’t answer right away. He kept darting his eyes between Katsuki and the two choices in front of him.

“I can take the guest bedroom,” Izuku said quietly.

“Okay.” Katsuki nodded. “I’ll be next door if you need something.”

Izuku bit his lip slightly. “Alright. I’ll come knocking if I need anything.”

Katsuki didn’t address the nagging intuition of ‘this is wrong’ that was scratching against his skin. He set Izuku’s things down for him inside the guest bedroom and gathered the dust riddled sheets off the beds. The smell of the old linens tickled his nose as he bundled all the cloths in his arms.

“I’m going to go wash these so you can have some fresh sheets,” Katsuki said.

Izuku gave him a tiny smile. “Thank you. I’ll come with you.”

Katsuki nodded back and he quickly gathered the sheets in the main bedroom too. They walked down the winding hallways to the washing room. The windows on the edge of the wall lit the way in tiny squares of moonlight as they walked to their destination. Katsuki kept his eyes straight ahead into the darkness of the hallway while Izuku had his head turned inwards to the wall next to him.

Where the pictures once were, now were a row of small sun-bleached rectangles. These spots littered the wallpaper up and down the vast hallway. Izuku curiously ran his finger across one, studying the texture of the surface.

Izuku cocked his head. “Were there pictures here?”

“Mhm. I took them down,” Katsuki murmured.

“What were they pictures of?”

“Nothing relevant.” Katsuki didn’t turn to look at the empty reminders of his past’s ghosts. “Got any more questions for me, nosy?” He asked a little sarcastically.

“One more,” Izuku said. He stopped walking and curiously tapped one of the sun-bleached spots on the wall. “You said this was your mother’s home. Did…Did you grow up here?”

Katsuki resisted glowering.

“No. This place is my family’s—” the last word tasted like acid on his tongue, and he grimaced. “Or people who were my family by blood. I never knew them. I inherited this property after they all passed away, but I didn’t grow up here. My mother grew up here when she was young, I guess.”

“…But you never knew your family?”

“No. Wasn’t given the chance.”

Izuku studied him. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s fine, let’s not mention it. Alright?” Katsuki muttered. “It’s only me living here now and that’s probably all it’s ever going to be.”

Katsuki ignored the way Izuku gazed at him. Green eyes were too soft at that moment, all too caring and Katsuki wasn’t sure if he could stomach it. Lucky for him, Izuku was apparently good at picking up on social cues and dropped the subject.

They continued to walk down the moonlit hallways until they stumbled across the laundry room. They put the sheets in the old washer and Izuku helped him the whole time with a gentleness he quietly enjoyed.

While the sheets were going, they walked around the estate. Izuku’s doe eyes were adoring the neglected building like it was a palace while Katsuki’s were scrutinizing it. Despite being on crunches, Izuku moved swiftly like it wasn’t his first time with a broken ankle.

“What’s this room?” Izuku asked enthusiastically while pointing his crutch to a door.

“Sunroom,” Katsuki answered easily.

A warm part of his heart fluttered when Izuku hobbled to the next part of the estate and did the same thing with another room.

“And this one?”

“Pottery room.”

“What about this one?”

“Bathroom.”

“I see,” Izuku said, like it was fascinating.

Katsuki had to hold in a snicker at the bright look in Izuku’s green eyes. They walked around the corner to the next area and all the glee inside of Katsuki’s body drained. He looked at a very specific door that he hadn’t had the strength to clean out. To his horror, Izuku wobbled towards it and pointed happily at it.

“And what about this room?” Izuku asked with a grin.

The nursery. Katsuki worked his jaw, attempting to fix his tongue to say those cursed words. But every time he tried his mouth dried up and any logical explanation went away.

"…Off limits," Katsuki grumbled.

"Huh?" Izuku's smile dropped. His brows pinched together, and he wearily glanced between Katsuki and the door. "Off limits why?"

"You ask too many damn questions," Katsuki snapped a bit too harshly.

He could see Izuku recoil at the brutish tone and caught himself. It wasn't Izuku's fault, he was just always so curious like a goddamn puppy and that was more than likely due to his upbringing.

Katsuki softened his face and he shoved aside his emotions. "Off limits as in don't ever step foot in there. I mean it. I need to take that room apart and I would prefer to do it privately when I'm ready."

"…Okay. Sorry for asking," Izuku muttered. He eyed the closed door suspiciously before wobbling back up to Katsuki. "I'm sorry. I didn't mean to pry."

"No need to be sorry," Katsuki muttered. He hooked his arm around Izuku's shoulders and led him away from the nursery door. "But leave that door shut. C'mon, let's fix up your room and handicap the house for you until the bedding is finished."

Izuku nodded in understanding, but as they rounded the corner he stole one last glance behind him at the door covered in cobwebs.

When they were finished getting ready for bed, they stood in the hallway between their bedrooms.

The sheets were cleaned, and everything was set to go for them to part their separate ways for the night. However, an invisible rope felt like it held Katsuki in place as he stared at Izuku next to him. Izuku was in front of his bedroom door and his hand on the handle was deathly still.

Izuku meekly turned to him and tilted his head.

"Can…Can I sleep with you?" Izuku asked nervously. "B-But only if you're okay with it. Otherwise, I don't mind sleeping in the guest room. Heh, you're probably tired of me hogging the covers."

Katsuki shook his head a little too eagerly. "No, it's fine. I was hoping you'd ask."

Izuku perked up.

Katsuki gave a nervous, lopsided smirk as his heart pounded hard against his rib cage. Without speaking another word, Izuku hobbled towards him and Katsuki opened the door to the bedroom more than willing to let him inside. Izuku happily smiled at him as they both got under the covers in the bed. Izuku quietly thanked him and Katsuki tried his best not to let it be known how goddamn happy he was.

Izuku's warmth next to him was starting to feel routine.

Katsuki turned off the lights and they laid side by side for a long time in the dark. Izuku snuggled in closer to him, and it was then Katsuki was aware of the lack of barrier this time. He could feel Izuku's soft skin brush against him. He could feel all the tiny hills of the scars and the callouses. But most of all Katsuki could feel all the words they needed to say laying against his chest.

Before he could speak, Izuku's soft fingers intertwined with his on top of the covers.

Their matching rings gleamed in the moonlight.

They both stared at the rings, and the very real marriage hanging over their heads felt potent. He supposed they could go ahead with the divorce now since they didn't have to part ways currently.

"Can we cross that bridge when we get there?" Izuku whispered as if he could read his mind. His eyes never left their rings. "We'll discuss…the marriage but not right now. I have something else on my mind."

Avoidance. Katsuki knew this tactic well—but he was willing to avoid it too. He nodded slowly and sighed deeply. "That's fine. We can talk about it tomorrow."

Izuku smiled sadly and cusped his hand tighter.

"…I…I like you, Katsuki," Izuku whispered delicately.

Katsuki's heart stopped.

That was a sentence he never thought he would hear, and it was damn bizarre to perceive someone liked him. When Katsuki turned his head towards Izuku, brilliant emerald eyes were staring into him. Izuku's brows were furrowed together, and he was searching Katsuki's face for a sliver of rejection.

"Do—Do you like me too?" Izuku asked cautiously. "I-It's okay if you don't. I get it. You said you don't do all that type of stuff—"

"—I like you too," Katsuki blurted out roughly.

His chest felt instantly lighter. He breathed out easier, and he was surprised how simple it was to admit that. He liked Izuku. He liked him a lot if he was being honest with himself.

Izuku then let out a tiny breath of relief and smiled sadly at him.

"Th-That makes me happy to hear," Izuku chuckled. "I thought for a second you were, uh, going to say you liked me but not like that."

“You think it’d ask you to come live with me for a couple of months if I didn’t like you in that way?” Katsuki smirked. “Yeah, I wanted to make sure you’re taken care of and healed, but I’ll admit there’s…other motives. Selfish ones.” He gripped Izuku’s hand back tightly. “Is that bad?”

“No. I was selfish for coming here too.” Izuku’s eyes skirted off to the side. “I-I wanted more time with you and this feels—good. I’m not decent at talking about myself or my feelings, but I feel like I’m supposed to be here with you.”

Katsuki’s mind cruelly prompted him about Izuku’s past.

“You—” Katsuki licked his lips. “I feel like you’re supposed to be here too.”

The sadness in Izuku’s eyes grew bluer. Katsuki worked his jaw as he thought about Tokyo, Moore, and how he had left Izuku there.

Izuku hesitantly smiled at him when the tenseness in Katsuki grew. “You know, I had a crush on you when we were kids.” A change of subject that Katsuki decided to take.

He let out a sharp laugh. “Hah. I figured.”

“What gave it away?” Izuku laughed lightly too.

“Possibly the dumb fake marriage and giving each other kisses every day.”

“To be fair, the fake marriage was your idea.” Izuku smiled radiantly and rested his chin against Katsuki’s chest. “Does this mean you had a crush on me too?”

“I didn’t realize it, but yeah, I liked you a lot,” Katsuki whispered. He traced a finger up and down Izuku’s spine as the other man laid on top of him comfortably. “I couldn’t stop thinking about you even if I tried. Then unfortunately I think I was crushing on you as Deku too over the years.”

“I was, uh, crushing on you too—over the years,” Izuku shyly confessed. “I looked forward to seeing the cranky guy with bad aim sometimes.”

Katsuki scoffed. “Bad aim? I have excellent fucking aim.”

“Sure you do.” Izuku chuckled. “But, I would secretly hope to run into you, even though it would mean I missed my mark.”

Katsuki raised a brow. “Really?”

“I thought it was obvious,” Izuku said. “I let you go every single time.”

Maybe he was more oblivious than he thought.

As they laid side by side, smiling at each other, Katsuki wondered if what he was feeling was normal when someone liked another person. He felt warm, and strangely pliant under the weight of Izuku. He could feel his heart hammer in rhythm with Izuku’s and for once he felt lulled into a peace. While Izuku talked about all the things they could do together, Katsuki let the notion of liking Izuku plant in his heart.

When Izuku brushed his hair behind his ear, he wanted him to touch him again. When Izuku scrunched his nose while laughing, he wanted to make him giggle more. When Izuku snuggled into his side, Katsuki held him back as soft as he could imitate to make him feel safe.

Katsuki drifted off to sleep that night listening to the sound of Izuku's voice telling him some story.

The following morning Katsuki's whole body felt like it had finally shifted out of his survival instincts. His limbs felt heavier, his mind was calm and all around he could hear the chirps of the birds from outside the window.

He sat up that morning with a light yawn and an arm slung around his waist. Katsuki turned his eyes to see Izuku snoring lightly, head tucked into his side, fully asleep. His dark curls were messy, all over the place and his body was plastered against his.

Warm was Katsuki's first thought. The second was how peaceful Izuku seemed laying there. His last thought was acknowledging the painful rumble in his stomach that fully woke him up. His mind wandered to food then he was hit with the revelation that they didn't have any food.

Judging by how deep Izuku was sleeping, Katsuki figured he could sneak out and maybe have breakfast ready by the time the nerd woke up.

Katsuki attempted to carefully lift Izuku's arm but in return he earned a groggy protest. Izuku slightly pouted and he latched on harder with a sleepy mumble.

"No," Izuku muttered in his sleep. "Kacchan, go back to sleep."

Kacchan.

Katsuki's heart skipped at the nickname, it touched him like a warm caress in an unsuspecting way.

He thought Okinawa would be the last place he'd hear that, and before that Tokyo. But now he supposed he was going to hear it more frequently. Izuku really was here with him, and he still felt like this was all some surreal dream.

Katsuki hesitantly laid back down, suddenly feeling like he was in unfamiliar territory. Izuku cuddled in closer to him and Katsuki cradled his arms around Izuku as well. He buried his nose into the top of soft green hair and closed his eyes again.

He experimentally ran his hand through Izuku's curls. Izuku hummed happily.

When they finally decided to get up, Katsuki felt refreshed.

The air entering his lungs was crisp, clean in a way only the countryside could be. The smell of grass and flowers filled the room naturally and his body felt like it had been released of some looming spirit gripping his bones. The extra gravity of anxiety that kept him on edge had dissipated into nothing.

They leisurely got out of bed, showered, and Katsuki helped Izuku get dressed into his clothes with extra care. Because of his wrist and ankle, Izuku still struggled a bit with handling things. During the entire routine to get out of the bedroom, Izuku shyly looked towards him in a silent plea for help.

Katsuki took the hint and helped Izuku out of his pajamas and into his day clothes. This was the first time Izuku wasn't in his ugly pink shirts. Instead, he was sporting a green plaid button down and blue jean shorts.

The other man was blushing the entire time he was undressed, and Katsuki tried his best not to smirk at Izuku's shyness. It was undeniably cute. He drank in the sight of Izuku lifting his hips, and he adored the cutesy panties Izuku had. He noted happily that it seemed to be all the underwear Izuku packed. Part of Katsuki wanted to tease Izuku further when he could sense some level of sexual tension.

However, when he bumped Izuku's ankle by accident his face dropped at the sound of the other man hissing in discomfort. Katsuki quickly backed off and told himself and his dick to calm down until Izuku wasn't in goddamn pain.

After that, Katsuki dressed in his usual black shirt and long black pants. Izuku poked some comment about his outfits still always being darkly colored, but Katsuki simply shrugged.

With breakfast on the mind, the pair walked into the kitchen with Izuku on his crutches and Katsuki holding his waist. When he helped Izuku over to the open window across the way, Katsuki decided to check at his phone—and he wished he hadn't.

Ten missed calls from Aizawa.

"Shit," Katsuki mumbled while scratching at the back of his head. "I need to make a call."

"Go ahead," Izuku said offhandedly. "I'll admire your garden in the meantime."

Izuku graced him with a smile that diminished any anxiety inside of him. Katsuki smiled back and his eyes darted between Izuku and the name on his phone.

If only his mother could see him now—or worse, fucking Aizawa. He could practically hear the lecture: "What the fuck do you mean you're helping heal the green menace?"

How did he even begin to explain what Izuku was to him? Lost childhood friend? Accidental husband? Which could be a better fucking description? Aizawa probably wouldn't even care. He'd take one look at Izuku and probably slap the shit out of Katsuki—again.

This was definitely something Aizawa could never find out about.

Because Katsuki couldn't kill Izuku now. Not even if he wanted to.

Katsuki walked backwards and around the corner a bit, out of ear shot so Izuku couldn't hear him. He reluctantly pressed dial on Aizawa's number and immediately the man picked up.

"Bakugou, I've been trying to call you all morning," Aizawa tiredly said on the other line. "You still need to close out and give me your company property. You said you would reconnect with me when you're settled in."

"I know, I know," Katsuki mumbled.

He peaked around the corner to see Izuku leaning against the windowsill. The other man was curiously touching the fabric of the white curtains like it was surreal to him. Izuku smiled handsomely in the sunlight.

"I'm—" Katsuki licked his lips. "I'm still getting stuff set up here before I come to close out, alright? I'll be down there once everything is settled in."

He watched as Izuku opened the window and leaned out of it slightly. The wind blew through his hair, and he closed his eyes as the breeze swept across his face.

Elegant, Katsuki thought.

"…Okay," Aizawa eventually said, having a contemplative moment of silence. "I do have to ask, is everything alright? I saw the news report of Okinawa and it seemed….like a lot. Way more than what was intended for this assignment. Nothing out of the ordinary happened, did it?"

"No," Katsuki quickly lied. "I had a bit of difficulty getting close to Moore is all. Shit got bloody."

"You sure?" Aizawa pushed. "Moore's headquarters was more than bloody to say the least. It's not exactly your style of execution. Well. That's not true—how do I say this? You haven't had any extra casualties like that since you were twenty, Bakugou. You usually get in and out ever since Mitsuki passed. Are you feeling okay, emotionally? The slit throat for Koizumi and knife to the heart for Moore felt a bit personal."

Izuku turned at that moment and caught his eye from across the way. He waved at Katsuki bashfully with a timid smile. Fuck. He was really cute.

"Yeah, I'm fine, old man," Katsuki brushed off, entirely distracted. "My emotions are in check. I'll talk to you later and see you soon. Don't stress about me."

"Alright, if you say so. If you don't come soon I'm going to have to send someone to come check in on you."

"Yeah. Whatever. Bye." Katsuki mumbled and clicked the phone off.

He couldn't give two shits about what Aizawa was saying about his emotions when there was finally a cute guy who liked him in his fucking house. He then noticed how hard his heart was hammering just from Izuku waving at him.

He readily walked over to Izuku who was using the ledge of the dusty window for support. He watched, slightly mesmerized by how the wind touched Izuku. His face was flush, and his curls were sweeping with the breeze like some elegant work of breathing, living art. It all made Katsuki want to be closer to him.

So, he shuffled in, trying to play it as casual as possible.

Katsuki leaned against the windowsill, brushing their shoulders subtly on purpose. Izuku's cheeks colored a pretty pink and it made Katsuki smirk. He leaned in closer to Izuku, snaking his arm around his waist and pulled him in closely. They smiled shyly at each other while they soaked up the warm sun.

Katsuki returned his gaze forward, and he studied the garden outside. He resisted frowning as he noted all the various overgrown plants. He would have to straighten all this up and get it sorted out if he was going to live here seriously.

As Katsuki started imagining all the different ways he could rearrange the yard, he missed Izuku studying the way the sun fell on his face. The other man beamed at him fondly.

"What was that call about?" Izuku questioned.

"Nothing important, just my supervisor," Katsuki said nonchalantly. "I have to close out with him soon and get my official retirement settled up. I'll do that soon when we're all good up here."

"That sounds nice." Izuku smiled at Katsuki. "You're officially retired then."

"I am." Katsuki nodded.

The trees in his yard swayed with the strong winds like they were made of flimsy material. The pond rippled with tiny folds to some unheard metronome in his mind. Even the overgrown blades of grass looked like they had a story to tell. To Katsuki, it all felt so soft and serene. He hoped he could fit in.

Katsuki exhaled roughly and slouched a bit.

"Are you okay?" Izuku asked, eying him up and down. He turned his body inwards to him.

"Yeah," Katsuki muttered. He gripped Izuku's waist a little tighter. "I think the concept of retirement is weird. That's all."

"How come?"

Katsuki shrugged, unsure he wanted to elaborate.

Izuku tilted his head to the side. "…You're not used to resting. Are you?"

"No, I guess I'm not." Katsuki pressed his lips in a thin line.

Izuku gradually inched his hand towards Katsuki's that was perched on the windowsill. Carefully, Izuku laid his hand on top of Katsuki's. Warmth spread from the tip of his fingers down to his spine. Katsuki glanced at where they were touching, wondering if that type of feeling was normal. But he didn't have time to consider the sensation of comfort as Izuku's fingers intertwined with his.

He once again looked at the wedding ring on Izuku's finger glimmering so brightly.

"Let's get you used to resting," Izuku said above a whisper. "You deserve to rest. What's the first thing you want to do in your retirement?"

"Probably grocery shop so we don't starve," Katsuki said. "Can't relax if we've got empty stomachs."

Izuku laughed lightly and leaned into him all the way. He gripped Katsuki's hand harder as he grinned wide.

"Good point! Let's do that first then. Kacc—Katsuki."

Katsuki's heart skipped a beat, and he could tell Izuku's did too.

They stared at each other for a moment before they both broke out in candy-colored blushes. Izuku's face deepened to a dark red and his grip on Katsuki loosened a bit. He was about to pull away, but Katsuki quickly caught it and gripped his hand back and leaned in.

"You can call me Kacchan if you want," Katsuki said fluidly.

His heart hammered as he got close to Izuku's face. He could see all those different colored freckles, and this time he adored them a little differently. Izuku's pretty green eyes were unsure, but hopeful.

"Really?" Izuku asked softly, breath brushing against his lips. "You said you hated pet names a while ago."

"Well." Katsuki cleared his throat as he blushed. "Kacchan is fine. It's different."

"Okay." Izuku smiled. "Kacchan it is."

He looked down at that wedding ring once more, and so did Izuku. Neither of them spoke a word but the awkwardness trickled in like slow poison. He knew they should talk about it. Izuku knew they should talk about it. But neither of them mentioned it.

Katsuki decided to simply appreciate how Izuku's hand fit in his. That was enough for him at the moment, and it seemed like it was enough for Izuku too. They had until Izuku's ankle healed to work all that out, and like Izuku said: they would cross that bridge when they got there.

When they arrived at the grocery store, Katsuki noted Izuku's slight fatigue. The other man hadn't complained at all about his crutches, and he was skilled on them, but the way he hobbled still gave Katsuki pause.

"Are you tired?" Katsuki asked when Izuku made a pained face.

"Huh?" Izuku said. He perked up a bit, and quickly covered up that tiny bit of lethargy he was showing. "Oh, no! I'm alright."

Katsuki raised a brow. "It's alright if you're not. I thought we were resting, remember?"

Izuku then looked like he got caught red handed. He sheepishly smiled. "You got me. I guess you're not the only one who is bad at resting."

"Hold still for a second."

Katsuki stepped forward and wrapped his arm around Izuku's waist and pulled him close. He ignored the soft protest Izuku gave and the way the other man blushed at the close contact. Swiftly, Katsuki gathered up the crutches and placed them down on the ground and lifted Izuku in his arms. He walked over to where the carts were and gently placed Izuku inside of one, mindful of his leg. He returned to gather the crutches and placed them on the bottom of the cart.

Izuku was redder than a tomato.

"Th-This doesn't look ridiculous?" Izuku whispered, embarrassed. He eyed the people who were passing by, surveying them with strange glances.

"Who gives a damn?" Katsuki shot back. He grinned cockily and started pushing the cart. "As long as you're comfortable that's all that matters. If someone says something to us, I'll cuss them out."

Izuku laughed shyly. He meekly fiddled with the wedding band on his finger while glancing at Katsuki.

Grocery shopping with Izuku was surprisingly relaxing.

Normally he did this by himself, playing a guessing game of what food would give him maximum output of health so he could operate well enough. But it was strangely nice to have someone do it with him, and also he wasn't shopping just because he needed fuel to kill.

Katsuki pushed the cart along, putting food in the cart either around or on top of Izuku, who was more than happy to hold on to some stuff. The other man was grinning wide, pointing at different foods he wanted to try and Katsuki was far more eager to buy them for Izuku than he wanted to admit.

When they made it to the fresh vegetables, Katsuki scanned over everything in the aisle. He scrutinized which one would be better as he picked up a stock of greens and inspected it closely. He didn't want to accidentally get some bad pick of the lot and unintentionally make Izuku sick. He eyed Izuku who was happily swinging his good leg over the lip of the cart as he hummed lightly to himself.

His stomach twisted a bit seeing such a simple sight.

Izuku waved at him and tilted his head.

Blush unwillingly rushed to Katsuki's face. Fuck. This was going to be a thing now, he realized, and he was goddamn mortified. All Izuku had to do was act cute and his heart was a mess. He snapped his head away, trying to calm his heart down.

All he did was look at you. Stop acting so goddamn sprung, Katsuki reprimanded himself. He returned his attention back to the food in his hands. He turned it over carefully, seeing no rot or odd brownish spots and nodded in approval. When Katsuki bagged the stock of greens he placed them over in the cart on Izuku's lap who had a smile on his lips.

Katsuki did this over and over again, making sure to pick the best food. He knocked on the watermelon in a way Aizawa had shown him when he was younger, and then made sure to carefully inspect each egg for zero cracks.

They went through the store, picking up various juices and cuts of meat. About halfway through the adventure, Izuku was stacked up to his chest happily with food in the cart. He was smiling happily at Katsuki the whole time with an amused grin and asked Izuku what foods he would prefer and Izuku, like some kid in a candy store, eagerly said all the bad shit.

"Izuku, you can't just fucking eat junk food," Katsuki muttered when Izuku pointed to the nth goddamn bag of skittles. "You already have Hershey Kisses, Snickers, and Cheeto Puffs. Pick something else."

"But I've never had Junk Food before," Izuku said quietly while holding the copious amount of candy against his chest. "Please, Kacchan?"

Izuku looked up at him, big green doe eyes in full force.

Damnit.

Katsuki scowled and snatched the skittles off the shelf. He tossed them in the cart on top of Izuku and resisted smiling at the tiny 'yay' Izuku exclaimed. Katsuki shook his head and ruffled Izuku's hair playfully.

"When you get a million cavities, remember you only have yourself to blame," Katsuki lectured, but smirked as he said it.

Izuku leaned his head back against the end of the cart to look up at him. "I'll take full responsibility!"

Katsuki started pushing the cart through the store again, leaning down as he did it. He wondered how they looked to the other people who were eyeing them. They were probably a sight: two grown men with a cart full of healthy food and way more junk food, snickering to themselves as they talked about the random combinations of cuisine they could make.

When they were waiting in line to check out, Izuku remained peeking up at him from below. Katsuki looked down at him once, flexing his brows in acknowledgement but as they stayed in line, Izuku's eyes barely moved. He was gazing at him softly like he was some rare vision.

"And what are you looking at, nerd?" Katsuki teased with a smirk.

"Just you," Izuku answered simply.

Katsuki chuckled and leaned down. He pushed Izuku's bangs back and placed a small kiss on his forehead.

They arrived back at the estate and Katsuki put all the groceries away as Izuku watched.

He made breakfast quietly, listening to the radio and heard some reports about the slaughter in Okinawa. He only caught a few bits and pieces through the wavering static. Most of it was about witness reports and the uncovering of the human trafficking that was taking place. Moore's crimes were officially getting aired out and it was pulling strings in places that were in shadows.

After Katsuki finished cooking two full plates of delicious food, he turned off the radio. He decided to ignore reality for a moment when the station started describing exactly how the human cages looked. Izuku appeared thankful for the gesture and Katsuki smiled at him as he sat down at the table.

They ate while chatting casually. Izuku was eager to ask him questions about all the things he wanted to do in his retirement.

"What type of things were you hoping to do, Kacchan?" Izuku asked once he finished his breakfast.

"I guess normal people shit, like landscaping," Katsuki said flatly. He poked a bit at the vegetables on his plate with a shrug. "I want to fix up the garden outside to look decent and get some home-grown food going in the back since I have enough land for it."

"That sounds perfect," Izuku happily replied. "What else?"

Katsuki froze. What else? He searched the vastness of his mind, only for it to come up empty. He could only see tiny visions of pink carnations littered in the corners of his void. What he once thought would be his future hasn't been there in five years—and he hadn't stayed still long enough to consider what else.

"I…I guess that's all I got," Katsuki admitted sadly. "Maybe get some type of small job to keep me from getting lazy."

Izuku's happy face slowly fell. "That's it? Get a job?"

“I guess?” Katsuki grimaced. “What else is there to do?”

“What about stuff you always wanted to do?” Izuku curiously asked. “Like learning how to play guitar, or some other instrument. Something like a bucket list! Don’t you have one?”

“No,” Katsuki scoffed. “When would I have time to make a bucket list? Do you have one?”

Izuku shyly averted his eyes. “Yeah. I-I have it written in the back of the book I always carry.”

Katsuki raised an eyebrow at that. “Really?”

“Yeah, but this isn’t about me—”

Katsuki didn’t wait too long before standing up with a knowing smirk. “It’s about you now.”

“Wh-What? No!” Izuku’s eyes went wide with embarrassment, and he tried to get up to stop Katsuki.

However, Katsuki was quicker and sadistic. Without thinking twice, Katsuki snatched the crutches out of Izuku’s reach before he could hobble up and stop him. Green eyes stretched wide and Izuku’s mouth dropped down in disbelief.

Katsuki walked into the bedroom and dug into Izuku’s suitcase, ignoring the yelling of several profane protests in the background. He moved aside Izuku’s colorful underwear collection, sweaters and clothes to find that tiny, tattered book.

He opened it, reading that first line once again.

“We are not the ugly parts of ourselves.”

It struck a chord just like last time.

Katsuki stared at it for a moment, as though the words were floating off the page.

The sentiment rang differently knowing all he knew about Izuku now—especially all those tally marks that were inside of the first page. He ran his fingers along them, feeling the indents on some of the tally marks and the lack of indents on others. The way Izuku probably dug his pen into the page on a couple of these first ones told a story he didn’t dare to ask. The potent pain these were written with leapt through time.

It was then that Katsuki noted the fresh tally marks with clean ink. Eleven. He tilted his head to the side.

Moore’s headquarters. Izuku was counting.

Katsuki wondered if Izuku always counted when he killed. Then Katsuki wondered what his own number would be if he ever bothered to do such a thing. Suddenly, knowing Izuku’s bucket list for life being in the same book as his sins made the tiny object feel a lot heavier than what it was. Katsuki carefully stood back up and strolled back into the kitchen. He thumbed through all the pages, noting some underlined words before flipping all the way to the back.

He stopped short in front of the pouting Izuku. The other man was narrowing his eyes at him.

“Glaring isn’t going to help anything,” Katsuki announced casually as he skimmed over the list. “I find you sexy when you’re annoyed, so you’re accomplishing nothing besides turning me on a little.”

Izuku’s blush deepened, and he shyly toyed with his wedding ring.

“Have a picnic?” Katsuki read curiously. He looked between Izuku and the words that were written in sloppy penmanship. “Pottery. Have a birthday party. Baking. Dance to the titanic song.” The latter two were crossed off and Katsuki’s heart flipped. “Go to a festival. Make flower crowns. Play violin for an audience. Learn more violin music. Take a walk in the park. Hiking. Spend time at a mall?”

Katsuki’s stomach turned. These were such simple things—but one stood out like it was written in red to him.

Have a birthday party.

He recalled Tokyo and remembered how young Izuku always said he never celebrated his birthday.

Izuku stammered and hung his head. “I-I know it’s a silly list, Kacchan. I-I wrote it one day when I learned what b-bucket lists are from someone. Y-You don’t have to make fun of me —”

“—Let’s do these.”

Izuku snapped his head up in surprise. “Wh-What?”

“I’ve never given myself too much thought to be honest, Izuku,” Katsuki admitted earnestly. “I had no real clue what I was going to do in retirement. I only knew I was going to come to this godforsaken estate, fix it up, and I was going to play it by ear. But—let’s do this list of yours. I think it can be fun.”

Let me make up for lost time, Katsuki privately thought.

The light caught Izuku’s eye in an enchanting way. The hope inside of them now was bright, radiant even.

“Really, Kacchan?” Izuku whispered and it pulled directly on his heart.

“Yeah.” Katsuki smirked as his heart hammered heavily. “We can do anything you want.”

Izuku smiled at him like he never thought he would hear those words.

The next two weeks were spent doing tiny things, like cleaning up the estate in the morning and playing movies at night.

During the night, they always watched old black and white movies on the television. Katsuki liked the way the actors were over-expressive and the monologues they did. It was corny, but enjoyable. A lot of romance aspects were always intertwined with these movies, which Izuku ate up like he was in heaven. Every single touch, longing look, or romantic quip on screen caused Izuku to suck in a breath or clutch the bed sheets slightly tighter.

He really did love this stuff, Katsuki realized.

Katsuki made a note to always watch romantic movies with Izuku because it usually resulted in cuddles sessions as they watched it together. They fell asleep like that every night, wrapped in each other's arms and embraced tightly.

During the mornings after that, Katsuki focused all his energy on cleaning.

He was determined to get rid of the dust, fix up the tattered appliances, and finally make the garden into something worth viewing. As he did this, Izuku was always nearby, reading his worn-down book with a giddy smile and blush on his face. Katsuki was beginning to get curious about what the fuck the nerd was actually reading whenever Izuku would grow quiet and squirm slightly.

Periodically, Izuku would look over at him and they would make eye contact. That beautiful, freckled face would gaze at him with a smile.

Soft. Delicate. Pretty. These words came to mind when Katsuki saw Izuku stretched out on the wooden porch in his green jinbei. He seemed so different now that he was away from bloodshed and violence. This was the same man who admitted to poisoning himself in small doses so he could be immune—yet here he was: looking so unsuspectingly sweet.

Was this who Izuku was once all that was stripped away? Just a pretty, adorable nerd.

There were unspoken words with the way Izuku regarded him these two weeks. Neither one of them discussed the divorce, and neither one of them took off those damned rings. They simply ignored it. Katsuki considered bringing up the divorce, but every time he tried he would catch Izuku privately gazing at the ruby gem on his finger.

That deep look of longing stunted Katsuki.

Then that same look would be given to him. He even couldn't take off his ring if he wanted to. Not when Izuku's eyes were on him like that. Katsuki could've sworn that his life was worth something for once whenever Izuku's eyes lit up like the emerald gem on his finger.

Slowly but surely, the estate felt like it was more of a home.

The dust was swept away. Music played from speakers. Izuku's tiny chuckles could always be heard around the various corners of the home. Even the garden outside was pruned until it was presentable. The lush trees were growing with reddish leaves and the lily pads had tiny pink blossoms on top of them in the pond. The estate finally felt like it was alive and breathing and not a left over corpse.

When Katsuki finished cleaning the living room, he stopped vacuuming for a moment to admire the way it looked. It was spotless, the fireplace was going, and the furniture was rearranged with the help of Izuku telling him what might look better.

Overall, it was cozier and warmer. But Katsuki was unsure if that was because of the work that he had done.

"This is much better, isn't it?" Izuku asked happily.

Izuku was stretched out on the couch that day with a fuzzy blanket, smiling at him without a care in the world. If Katsuki didn't know any better, he looked as if he had lived here for years. Katsuki leaned against the vacuum for a moment. He study the way Izuku's messy curls looked nice against the light color of the couch.

"Yeah, much better," Katsuki said with a lopsided smirk. "Officially evicted all the spiders so we finally get some real privacy."

Katsuki wished he would have taken a video of the way Izuku laughed.

Shortly after that moment, Katsuki found himself purchasing a digital camera and taking all the videos and photos of Izuku he could. He took photos of Izuku in the garden. Photos of him on the porch. Videos of him leaning against the window and smiling over his shoulder at him. There were even photos of him while he was reading his book, eyes not even bothering looking at him.

Those were Katsuki's favorite.

Katsuki would sometimes stare at those videos and photos in moments of silence.

He filled the stillness in his life with trying to make sure Izuku was real, and that someone as seemingly nice as Izuku was here with him—smiling at him. Liking him. There was such a pureness in his eyes that Katsuki always saw other people stare at their loved ones with. He had never seen such a gaze on him. Not even from his own mother and he was now too old to remember if his father ever gazed at him like that.

As they finished cleaning the estate, it came down to the final room: the nursery.

Katsuki had tried to open it but found himself frozen whenever he touched the door handle. It felt icy underneath his touch. He flat out started avoiding it. Hell, he even pretended like it didn't exist when it felt like stones were settling in the bottom of his body from the thought of confronting what that room represented.

He cleaned everywhere but the nursery, and it didn't take too long for Izuku to apparently see that.

One day, Katsuki thought he was about to have a heart attack. He watched Izuku ignorantly hobble over to that damn door and point to it with an unknowing happy smile.

"Oh, Kacchan!" Izuku called. "You missed cleaning this room—"

"—No." Katsuki quickly snapped. His tone was harsher than he intended for it to be, and he could see Izuku's smile drop within the second. Katsuki cleared his throat and shook his head. "I'll get to it eventually."

"But you're already in the moment, you should clean it with the rest of the house."

"I said no, Izuku," Katsuki hissed sternly. "I mean it. Don't go in there and stop asking questions about it."

He narrowed his eyes to give emphasis and this time Izuku coiled away from the room.

They continued about their days and Katsuki buried the thought of the nursery.

However, while he did that, he missed the weary, yet curious stare Izuku gave to the door.

After the entire house was spotless, it suddenly felt closer to the home Katsuki wanted it to be. Everything was polished to the brim and the garden was finally flourishing. The smell of food was always in the air and the bedroom was finally feeling more like a bedroom he would own.

Izuku was with him every step of the way, and it was a type of peaceful companionship Katsuki never exactly experienced. Izuku didn't want anything from him. Didn't expect anything from him. Nor did he ever truly ask for much. The other man stuck by his side with a bright grin and was always curious about his life and him.

"If you could travel anywhere in the world, where would you go, Kacchan?"

"I think I would just travel Japan all around," Katsuki said honestly. "I feel like I've traveled a lot around Japan, but not for the right reason. So, I want to see what our home country has to offer without being guided by some sort of assignment."

"That's a lovely idea actually," Izuku muttered. He tapped his finger against his lip. "I think we should plan for a mini trip then. Have you ever been to Nara?"

"The place with the deer? No, but I always wanted to."

"Let's do it!"

Izuku grinned wide and it was then that Katsuki noticed Izuku had one slightly crooked tooth. Cute.

Katsuki tilted his head at the other man who eagerly wrote down ‘Visit Nara, Japan’ in the back of his book. His tongue stuck out unknowingly and as he did this. It made Katsuki subconsciously smile.

“There.” Izuku announced. He held up the list for Katsuki to see. “Something else for us to do for you.”

The corners of Katsuki’s mouth twitched upwards into a smirk. “Perfect.”

For the first time in a while, he felt heard.

They began doing the things on Izuku’s list shortly after that day.

The first activity they did was a walk in the park.

It wasn’t so much a walk however due to Izuku’s crutches. Katsuki found an easy way to improvise though when he insisted Izuku climb on his back, and they did a piggyback ride around the area of the countryside. Izuku’s body was warm and flushed against his, giggling the entire time in his ear. Izuku’s arms stayed wrapped around his shoulders as they went up and down the vast fields of Biei.

“Thank you for carrying me,” Izuku whispered directly into his ear. His breath was warm and tickled him slightly. Katsuki could feel the heat trickle down his nape as he hooked Izuku’s legs around him tighter.

But he knew he was unsuccessful in hiding the pinkness of his face when Izuku giggled again and laid a soft kiss on his nape. Then Izuku curled into him tighter and buried his face directly into the side of his neck.

“I love the way you smell,” Izuku mumbled against his skin. “Have I ever told you that?”

“No,” Katsuki chuckled as they walked past a lake. He looked at the way the sun speckles danced across the blue waves. “What do I smell like?”

“Like fresh cinnamon,” Izuku said.

Katsuki hummed at that thought. He never thought about how he smelled before.

Next was the pottery session.

It was fucking messier than Katsuki would have liked, and he should have known a little shit like Izuku would be someone to throw clay at him. They stayed inside for a couple of days on and off making pottery. Izuku was beyond delighted to do it and the little nerd made a tiny heart with their initials inside of it.

Katsuki on the other hand made a vase in the shape of Izuku's ass.

Izuku's mouth dropped open when he realized what it was and attempted to destroy it. But Katsuki was quicker, and he wasn't the one on crutches.

He chuckled defiantly as he placed it on the tallest shelf he knew Izuku could never reach. He allowed it to dry and eventually used it as a centerpiece in the living room. He put a load of flowers inside of it and it was the most beautiful vase Katsuki had ever seen.

He gave it a happy slap every morning before breakfast after that. Izuku's face turned beet red in embarrassment every single time. But Katsuki kissed Izuku on the cheek in victory to smooth it out.

They hung Izuku's heart with their initials above their bed.

The next week, Katsuki insisted they finally have a picnic.

In the movie they watched the previous night, the couple did the same thing. Like some romantic getaway shit. But despite the lovey dovey aspect of it, he secretly enjoyed the way the movie couple looked: relaxed out in the open in the field of flowers. He could easily envision himself with Izuku in that same way.

When they made it out into the large field, Katsuki never had thought about what a picnic would be like, but it was relaxing. Or maybe spending time with Izuku away from everything was relaxing. He couldn't exactly tell which one it was, but he was alright with it being the latter when Izuku gave him a fond smile.

They had found a spot under some tree with a soft blanket and pillows and set up for the day. Izuku insisted they do the flower crowns this day too. Katsuki thought it would be a good idea, and they spent the afternoon with their picnic food trying to intertwine flowers together.

"How do you make these dumb crowns?" Katsuki muttered as he picked up another flower from the pile he had plucked.

He tried to twist the stems together and realized they were failing. Both of them.

"Just try to read the instructions again," Izuku urged. His tongue stuck out slightly in concentration.

The nerd was approaching this very differently than he was. Izuku had printed out some instructions on paper from the old, obsolete printer that was in the office space at the estate. The ink was splotchy and slightly faded but it got the job done.

Katsuki on the other hand, figured he would wing it. He found some twigs, purple flowers and dandelions and figured he could put something together. Eventually, they both figured it out and it didn't take long for Izuku to make a crown of vibrant yellow dandelions for him.

Katsuki ventured out to find more flowers for Izuku's crown and plucked various colors of blue, green, purple, and pink to weave into Izuku's. He placed it softly on Izuku's head of silky curls.

Katsuki smiled at the way the flowers complimented Izuku's freckles. He was so elegant like this, even more so than he was back at the headquarters. This Izuku was gentle and caring. Soft spoken and lovely in every sense of the word. Katsuki decided he liked all the sides of Izuku: the dangerous side and the gentle one. He especially liked how Izuku's pretty eyes shyly gazed down to their checkered blanket. But he liked it even more when Izuku tucked a tiny stray curl of hair behind his ear. So fucking cute.

"Does it look okay on me?" Izuku asked quietly.

"More than okay. You look beautiful," Katsuki said quietly.

Izuku blushed with the widest grin. "You look nice too."

Katsuki could feel his face heat up slightly. He chuckled quietly and rubbed his burning nape. "Thanks, nerd."

The afternoon carried on with them finishing the rest of the picnic and watching the clouds above.

They laid down side by side on the soft blanket and Katsuki worked up the courage to take Izuku's hand in his. He handled it with both of his own, cusping it and gently tracing the hills of his knuckles. The wind blew in and made the sky above them a makeshift story. They pointed out different shapes they saw in the large, fluffy clouds. Izuku saw a lot of animals: elephants, rabbits, and puppies. Katsuki laughed as Izuku described it looked like a deer running from a duck in the sky.

Katsuki on the other hand could see two boys playing tag. He wondered if holding Izuku's hand was influencing him, but he told Izuku what he saw. When he studied it closer, he could see them happy and holding hands throughout the story line and his heart felt lighter as he stared up at the sky.

Izuku's thumb softly traced circles along his skin.

Then one cloud came along, and to Katsuki it looked like a violin.

He nervously licked his lips, wondering how to be vulnerable. He felt safe here, in the open field with Izuku under the clouds and sun.

"I…I always wanted to make classical music," Katsuki confessed while looking up at the clouds. Izuku shifted to stare at him curiously, but Katsuki kept his eyes trained up towards the bright blue sky. "It's always something I kept pushing to the side all my life for more important things. But I've always had an interest in composing."

"Is it because of that old violinist we knew?" Izuku asked curiously.

Katsuki nodded. "I'm going to take a wild guess that's why you like to play violin as well."

“We’re two nerds cut from the same cloth I think.” Izuku laughed, as light as air. “Have you looked into classical music lessons? That could be a good step into your new life.”

Katsuki shrugged, not thinking much about it. “Ah, no. I suppose I could. I never thought about it.”

They enjoyed the rest of the evening and when the sky turned from calming blue to dusk orange, Katsuki got up and started gathering their things. He neatly tucked away their blanket and left over food with care. When they were all set he bent down and gave Izuku a piggy back ride. They walked together, talking about the different kinds of flowers they saw along the way all the way back to the estate.

When they got settled in bed for the night, Izuku was casually on his phone searching for something. Katsuki paid no mind to it, for once actually into the black and white movie that was on television. It was called Casablanca or something close to that. It was really fucking good, and he was enjoying the banter and subtle plot that was showing through.

Then Izuku made a delighted hum and showed his phone screen to him.

“Look,” Izuku exclaimed happily. “Here’s some classical music composition classes for you.”

Katsuki blinked once. Then he blinked again. He slowly took the phone, and just like Izuku said there it was. It was only about a twenty-minute walk away and affordable. Katsuki snapped his eyes back at Izuku who was grinning wide at him and the screen.

“This can be your second life, Kacchan,” Izuku said. “You should sign up tonight and we can go to the classes that start next month together. I’ll just sit in the corner but I would love to see you do this. I can picture you as a composer already. You’d be so awesome at it.”

“You really think so?” Katsuki asked, unsure if that could ever be true.

Izuku nodded in confidence. “I would bet my life on it. You’d be amazing at anything you put your mind to, Kacchan. You already have a great ear for classical music, I bet you’re an amazing musical composer waiting to happen.”

Katsuki’s heart fluttered higher than he ever felt it before.

A couple weeks after the picnic, Katsuki decided to prompt Izuku to play violin for him.

Izuku rejected the idea at first, too shy. He was stammering and fidgeting with his ring. But Katsuki was not about to let the nerd back out of something he wrote on his damn list. Being the persistent menace he was, Katsuki insisted he was an audience of one, and Izuku could finally stretch his legs to practice violin all he wanted while his ankle healed.

Izuku seemed nervous for an unspoken reason but agreed eventually.

On the evening Izuku decided to play, it was raining.

The lighting in the living room was dim and slightly moody with only the yellowish tint from the fireplace to illuminate the whole space. But despite the slight strain on his eyes, Izuku's face held the vague golden light well. The various yellow shades brought out his green eyes, round face, and the gentle expression that was somehow always there.

Katsuki plopped down on the red rug he placed in the living room. He laid back on his arms, waiting patiently.

Izuku sat down with his violin in the wooden rocking chair.

For some reason, the freckled man was jittering with nerves as he inspected the instrument like there was invisible writing etched into it. Izuku was clearly staring at something Katsuki couldn't see—or maybe he was lost in a memory. His eyes were glazed over, and he only snapped out of it when Katsuki gently called his name.

Green eyes kept darting back and forth between Katsuki, the fireplace and the white violin in his hands.

"This feels…" Izuku trailed off.

"…Like a long time coming?" Katsuki supplied.

Izuku slowly nodded his head with a sad smile. He then took in a deep breath and started playing the violin.

And he played as beautifully as Katsuki remembers.

Izuku's eyes fluttered closed on natural instinct and Katsuki found himself lost in the same trance. He watched, studying the way Izuku's body swayed. He studied the way he arched. He studied how fucking passionate he was as he began playing that song that tied them together.

The Dance of The Love Birds.

The highs and lows of the song blended like a flowing river with the sound of the rain outside the window. Katsuki sat up slightly, heart rate beginning to be erratic, as Izuku started playing more vigorously. His face seeped into a raw emotion and his brows pinched together as he tossed his head with the chords.

Katsuki sat up all the way now, far more attentive as Izuku lost himself in his craft. His heart felt like a painful string was tugging on it until it was about to rip straight through him as Izuku continued. The haunting melody was the same but felt infinitely dissimilar now. It seemed like it had transformed along with them, grown and withered in all the same ways. The innocence that was once wrapped up in the notes was now gone, leaving behind only evidence of raw, agonizing emotion.

All those feelings the old violinist wanted to capture were a lot more real and excruciating: The pain. The longing. The hurt and separation.

Every note hit was like a different dagger that melted upon impact into Katsuki's flesh. It hurt. It healed. It tore him open and sewed him back together. He could feel the same happen for Izuku as the other man's chest heaved slightly while he played. His nostrils flared at the high flow and his hands tensed as his playing became like he was being puppeteered by all the lost years.

When the song ended, silence fell all around them.

Katsuki stared at Izuku and Izuku stared at him right back.

There was a small cluster of tears hugging Izuku's eyes and quickly he wiped them away.

"S-Sorry," Izuku whispered as he hurried to hide the emotions he let spill out. "I don't know what that was."

Katsuki slowly rose from the rug. He walked over to where Izuku was sitting and cradled his face in his hands. Without warning, Izuku's tears flowed down more, touching his hands and Izuku's chest convulsed slightly.

"I always wanted to play for you," Izuku whispered. "I used to dream of it all the time when I was younger. It's…It's why I started playing violin. I used to think if I played in the plaza, you would come back to me one day if you recognized the song. Even if you didn't recognize me."

Red and green eyes searched each other for a long time until Izuku reached out to touch his cheek. The smaller hand ran along his face so softly like he was a ghost who might disappear. Katsuki stroked Izuku's tears away with his thumb and mustered up all the sincerity inside of his heart.

"You played beautifully, darling," Katsuki said.

When they went to sleep that night, something was different.

Izuku clung to him much tighter, and Katsuki clung to Izuku much tighter as well. The ticking clock in the background was loud, and this time they didn't play any movie. The silence forced Katsuki to face how much time had slipped away from them yet again. It had been nearly four weeks and soon it'd be a full month.

He hadn't even realized between the trips to the store, the cleaning, the picnics. It all felt like blending moments in a river that flowed downstream without notice.

But it felt like once again their time was escaping them. Just like when they were kids. Just like at the hotel. He viewed Izuku's cast that night differently. It was no longer broken fragments of bone, but rather broken fragments of time that Katsuki knew they both were desperately clutching on to.

As he fell asleep that night, he dreamed he was falling backwards out of darkness.

It was the opposite of what his dreams normally were: falling into darkness. Usually, he fell and fell until he was pushed into his memory with younger Izuku and the snow.

Now he started off with present day Izuku, in the summer air in a vast field of pink carnation petals. The freckled man was laughing in a soft light and slowly his flower crown shifted into being constructed of pink carnations. The natural perfume of the flowers wafted into Katsuki and made him reach out towards Izuku.

But as he did, abruptly, he was cut short.

Suddenly the field of petals stained from bright pink to dark as a black hole. All the light in the field was swallowed by an overflow of black roses with blood staining their petals. Both of them looked around confused when the black roses increased more and more, threatening to consume them in their tide of darkness. Katsuki tried to reach out again, to save Izuku, but invisible hands on his shoulders violently pulled him upwards and away from the other man.

Katsuki screamed and he tried to struggle against the invisible force carrying him away, and slowly dream Izuku's face fell. He mouthed 'Kacchan?' to him in a broken voice and tried to reach out for him too.

But slowly Izuku faded into the darkness below him, engulfed entirely. Gone. Katsuki struggled harder to swim down, but he only drifted further and further away from Izuku, stretching his hand to him.

Katsuki gasped awake in a sharp startle. He sat up on the bed full force, and all the energy in his bones drained like someone had cut a vein. Katsuki groaned and grabbed at his head.

What the hell?

He seriously needed to figure out why he always had dreams as fucked up as that. And why they were always about fucking Izuku. Maybe he should give Momo a call in the future since he has free time now. He could finally get that damn therapy session he apparently needed.

The moonlight rested against his face, drawing his eyes slightly open. Out of instinct, or possibly habit, he reached out for the body that was usually beside him.

But his heart dropped when he felt nothing.

Katsuki was now fully awake. He turned his head sharply, and his stomach dropped to see an empty bedside.

"Izuku?" Katsuki called out.

He furrowed his brows and scanned the room. The door to the bedroom was open, and Izuku's crutches were gone. A spark of urgency surged through Katsuki, and he immediately sprung out of bed. He grabbed the nearest set of sweatpants and wandered into the dark hallway.

He called out Izuku's name again, much louder. However, the only answer he got in return was the howling wind blowing through one of the open windows.

His anxiety crept up like crawling insects. What if Izuku left?

No. Izuku couldn't have abandoned him like that, right?

Izuku wouldn't. No, he couldn't. Not with his leg all fucked up and they still had to discuss that goddamn divorce.

Katsuki's heart rate increased a bit, and he started his search. He wearily called out Izuku's name throughout the empty hallways. He waited for a moment, hoping silence wouldn't be his only companion but he was wrong. He never got an answer in return, only the wooden floorboards creaking underneath his weight as he walked around.

He checked the bathroom first, thinking maybe he was overreacting. Izuku could be peeing but when Katsuki flung open the door, the entire bathroom was empty.

Next, he checked the kitchen. Empty. The living room, empty. The dining room, empty. He checked every space he could think of, and as he did his gut twisted tighter and tighter until it felt like it was going to blow like a geyser.

His paranoia kicked in, and the eyes from the photographs he had taken down were watching his every move. He could feel all the family members he never knew scrutinizing him somehow. They were studying his every move, and for the first time in a month, Katsuki felt like a stranger in these hallways.

He could feel those insistent whispers telling him he was alone again, and that this interim peace with Izuku was short lived.

When he checked every room he could think of, there was one left he hadn't dared touch.

The nursery.

Then when he rounded the corner, it was propped open with a soft light spilling out of it into the darkness. Quiet shuffling could be heard from inside and Katsuki felt his whole stomach turn inside out.

He rushed forward, slamming open the door harshly. He gazed around at the well-lit room and the baby blue lamp with small ducks on it. The cursed thing was shedding light all over with a freshly changed bulb. Katsuki's raging eyes snapped downwards to find Izuku on the floor in his blue pajamas, picking up pieces of the shattered plaster.

Izuku's mouth hung open in shock and all color drained from his flush face. "Ka-Katsuki. Wait—"

"—What the fuck Izuku?" Katsuki seethed. He looked around and tried his best not to stare at his name written in scarlet on the wall. Shocks of pain ripped into him the longer he stood there in this damned room. "What the actual fuck?! I said not to come in here!"

Izuku held one of his hands up while the other curled around pieces of the shattered plaster. “I-I know but I wanted to see—”

“—No!” Katsuki cut off unkindly, raising his voice. “If I say not to come in here, don’t fucking do it! This is my house. I don’t even want to be in here right now—”

He caught sight of the crib across the room and his throat slammed shut.

The walls started to bend inwards as his eyes darted around. The taunting tune of the baby mobile struck inside of his head like stinging knives and the air flowing inside of him became constricted. Shallow. Short.

Katsuki shook his head when he realized he was spiraling.

Fuck. Get a grip. Get a grip. Get a goddamn grip.

He stepped backwards and cursed when he cut his heel on a small, jagged piece of porcelain. He looked down and saw the crude smear of bright red blood on the floor. There was so much of it. It was seeping out, slithering between the floorboards and making its mark. Suddenly the combination of seeing blood in this particular room forced the visual of his mother’s dead body to the forefront of his brain.

Izuku’s face grew increasingly concerned when he saw Katsuki’s chest convulse.

Quickly, Izuku tried to stand up with the help of the dresser when he realized his mistake. He held the broken pieces close to his chest as he called out Katsuki’s name. When his voice couldn’t break past the barrier of panic that was induced, Izuku hobbled forward and tried to reach out his hand.

“Kacchan. I’m sorry—” Izuku lightly touched Katsuki’s shoulder.

It happened in an instant.

Out of reflex, Katsuki shoved Izuku’s hand away. He shoved hard with his natural strength, feeling too overwhelmed to be touched in that moment. By the time he registered he wasn’t shoving away some invisible entity suffocating him, it was too late.

Katsuki’s heart dropped when Izuku toppled backwards, losing grip on the shelf.

The other man cried out as he hit the ground hard, and a pain filled gasp could be heard when Izuku’s head cracked on the wooden floor. The pieces of the broken plaster rolled across the ground and Katsuki’s chest dropped hard enough to make him sick.

“Shit. Shit,” Katsuki whispered in a daze. He dropped down to his knees and reached out to steady Izuku. “Iz-Izuku I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay,” Izuku muttered. He lifted himself up on his forearms, wincing. “You didn’t mean it. It was a reflex.”

“No. It’s not okay. I’m sorry. I’m so fucking sorry,” Katsuki insisted. He quickly gathered Izuku up in his arms and inspected his wrapped wrist and ankle. Stupid. How could he be so goddamn stupid— “I didn’t mean to make you fall like that. I would never hurt you on purpose, fuck. I’m so goddamn sorry.”

“You didn’t hurt me, Kacchan. It was an accident. I fell.” Izuku smiled at him and sat up fully and glanced down at his lap. “I shouldn’t have come in here anyways. I get so curious sometimes...I can’t help it but I didn’t realize this room was…yours.”

Katsuki wearily glanced around at the dust covered shelves and the scattered broken pieces on the floor. His heart slowly calmed with Izuku in his arms, and he clung slightly to the other man. He hung his head down bitterly.

“It…It’s not mine,” Katsuki bit out after a stretch of silence.

It took all his strength to glance up. He forced himself to finally stare at his name written in red on the wall.

It was old, chipped away and parts of the wallpaper were folding forward. It looked like it was weeping, trying to reach towards him. He wanted to reach back and touch it for the first time, but the pain in his chest stopped him. It all felt like too much in that moment as he looked up at it.

As he was staring at his name, trying to decode it like his own portrait was on the wall, Izuku’s hand slid over his own. He gripped back on instinct and held on tightly as if Izuku was his lifeline. And maybe he was after all these years.

“I don’t like coming in here, Izuku,” Katsuki confessed with pain etched into his sharp features. “I tried. So many fucking times. But I can’t stand being in here.”

“I’m really sorry,” Izuku said honestly. “I didn’t mean to upset you. Let’s get back to bed.”

“It’s okay now,” Katsuki said. He looked around bitterly. “I guess this helped rip the bandaid off. I have to do something with this room eventually, I can’t leave it as an open wound. I nearly had a fucking panic attack just stepping foot in here. I guess I’m more fucked up than I realize.”

“You’re not fucked up,” Izuku rejected gently.

“I am,” Katsuki scoffed. “Don’t even try to make me feel better. I’m fucked up but the worst part is I’m unnecessarily fucked up.”

“What do you mean?” Izuku questioned. He pinched his brows together trying to piece together the jigsaw of Katsuki.

“This room is proof my mother lied to me. All my goddamn life,” Katsuki explained. He didn’t know why he said it, but the tenderness of Izuku coaxed it out of him. “I don’t want to be mad at her because she’s dead, so I avoid things that make me realize she screwed up being a mother.”

Izuku didn't say anything, he let Katsuki continue to speak as he also glanced up at the writing on the wall.

"It's why I didn't remember you right away. I chose to forget Tokyo for a long time because it made it easier to do what I needed to do. Then I avoided this estate because it makes me so goddamn angry to know I could've been here all this time, living a goddamn normal life…I used to justify that I was a monster because I had to be. But this—" He gestured angrily to his name on the wall. "—Rejects that."

"A monster?" Izuku softly interjected.

"Yes. A fucking monster. But worst of all I feel like no one understands what I feel like," Katsuki murmured. "I have colleagues who had really fucked up lives with no way around it. No path or outcome would change them from being the serial killers they are today. But there's something so goddamn excruciating about knowing I didn't have to be this fucking monster this whole time. I could have been normal…there was a way for me to be normal, but I didn't have a fucking say in the decision."

Izuku gripped the hem of his shirt. "…I get it."

Katsuki made a confused face. "Izuku—"

"—No, really. I get where you're coming from," Izuku insisted. He licked his lips hesitantly. "I went out and found my birth mother one day when I was thirteen."

Katsuki stayed quiet, shocked.

"I thought that if I found her, she would take me in." Izuku looked down at his hands and slowly traced an old scar that was slashed across his palm. "I spent so much time building her up in my head, deluding myself that I was kidnapped and not sold. But when I found her, she was with her new family, and had a new baby. She—She made it very clear she didn't want anything to do with me when I revealed I was her son."

Katsuki sucked in a breath, trying to imagine young Izuku standing there getting told such a thing. He could see Izuku's large doe eyes filled with tears. He couldn't even fucking imagine what it would be like to have an illusion shattered like that.

"It hurt more than anything I could think of," Izuku whispered. His eyes glossed over, and tears started gathering inside of them. "She was living her new life with a new son. To this day I wonder what it would be like if I wasn't given away. I…I keep track of them and she's a good mom to him."

Katsuki curled his fists tightly.

"I realized then I could've grown up normal too if I something about me was slightly different," Izuku said bitterly. He closed his fingers on the scar and his nostrils flared. "I could've had that life, but it wasn't my decision—and neither was yours. So, we're the same," Izuku concluded. "But be glad you made it through and now you get a shot at a normal life. Better late than never, right?"

He looked up at Katsuki from underneath his long lashes with a deeply broken stare.

“I’m sorry you had to go through all of that, Izuku,” Katsuki said in a soft rasp. He held on tighter to Izuku and the gears in his head started turning. He didn’t want Izuku to go back to the place he was fucking sold to. “You didn’t deserve any of that. I wish I could fucking fix it for you. You’re much more than her decision.”

“And you’re more than your mother’s choices too I’m sure,” Izuku said. “B-But what I’m saying is we’re the same. I understand you, and out of anyone, I get it. We were both one decision away from not being…monsters. She hurt you by keeping this from you.”

Katsuki’s shoulders sagged forward, and Izuku carefully ran his hand through his hair. The simple realization of him being hurt by his mother were words he could never admit.

She had hurt him.

His mom had hurt him so fucking much.

Izuku scooted in to hug him and Katsuki slowly hugged him back. They both silently looked around the nursery. Then they tiredly leaned against the wall underneath his painted name.

Katsuki saw the ghost figures of his mother and grandparents and he wondered how warm his first welcome into this house was. He could envision all the loving embraces and feel the gentle radiant glow of the care he always longed for. Then slowly the phantoms faded, and he was left with nothing but chills grappling at his bones.

The self-deprecating whispers were in his head, and they were coming in full force. He clung tighter to Izuku who picked up on his distress and hugged him tightly.

“Are you okay?” Izuku asked carefully.

Upon hearing that simple question, Katsuki’s well-built wall collapsed upon itself.

“No,” Katsuki’s voice cracked. “I’m not.”

He clung harder to Izuku and as he did so, the warmth of Izuku’s beating heart was a catalyst for all the words to pump out of him.

He retold everything he went through from start to finish and didn’t bother leaving out any details.

He could feel Izuku’s grasp on him tighten at certain points in his story. Izuku clung tighter when he told him about the missed meals. Living with the lights off. Skipping homework and getting bad grades in order to help pay for his mother’s bills. Then finally Izuku cursed out loud when he retold about the man he killed when he was thirteen.

Retelling it all felt like swallowing hot coals. Each detail scarred him as he stomached it in full, unfiltered detail. It was viscous like bitter honey. This was his first time telling it back and Katsuki realized how much it was for his short lifespan. He was so influenced by his mother, and even now continued to be affected by her influence beyond the grave to the point he could barely walk into a room.

When he finished telling how he found this estate, his grip on Izuku grew unnaturally tight.

He feared this was it, Izuku would definitely leave him now. He would walk right out this house and go back to Tokyo after realizing what a fucking monster he was. He would realize he was unstable and not savable, just like everyone else in his life realized he was.

Neither of them said anything for several long moments.

Katsuki slowly peeled himself from Izuku's hold and it was then he realized he had been silently crying the entire time. He touched his face in surprise, confused as to why he didn't register it.

He wearily glanced at Izuku's face, and it was an expression he had never seen before: understanding.

It was warm, delicate like freshly picked flowers and clear as day. Pure understanding shined through Izuku's glossy eyes, making the vibrant greenness of his iris more intense. Izuku slowly shook his head sadly and cradled Katsuki's face in his warm palms. Katsuki leaned into the touch wordlessly, wrapping his hands around Izuku's wrists in a gentle hold.

"Katsuki…" Izuku spoke his name with a broken voice. Tears started to pour from Izuku's eyes. "I don't think you're the monster you think you are."

"Yes, I am," Katsuki said. He averted his gaze shamefully. "How can you say that after hearing what I've done? Especially to my own biological father?"

"To me it sounds like you did it all in the name of protecting her." Izuku forced his head up to look into his eyes and caressed his cheeks with affection. "You did everything out of love."

Katsuki wished he could believe that when felt that dark side of him thirst for Chizome's blood.

He was unsure but gradually, the remains of the stone wall surrounding his heart caved the longer Izuku's beautiful viridian eyes melted into him. The softest, kindest smile he has ever seen was graced upon him as Izuku tilted his head.

"You're so loving, Katsuki," Izuku whispered. "I think you're the fiercest, most protective person I've ever met. You deserve everything you want and more and it's okay to want it. Despite what you've done—Chizome should be dead for what he did to you and your mother."

Katsuki let out a shaky sigh. "You're the only one who seems to think that."

"I think your supervisor thinks it too," Izuku muttered. "But he is protecting you because he cares about you. Maybe you shouldn't kill Chizome yourself—but that man deserves his karma. And there are other ways."

Katsuki held onto Izuku's wrists tighter upon hearing that.

"Do…Do you care about me?"

"I more than care about you," Izuku whispered vulnerably. His eyes softened with an unnamed emotion. "I-I've cared about you since we were kids and I don't think I could ever stop. Even in the years apart, I cared about you as the guy I met in Vienna. I will probably care about you even when my ankle heals and we go our separate ways."

Slowly, Izuku leaned in and placed a delicate, light kiss on his forehead. "You're not a monster. You're human."

"But I can't even be soft," Katsuki muttered. The wound of his insecurities were pulsing in the open as he curled more into Izuku, their legs tangled together. "No matter how hard I try I always hurt everyone I touch."

"You're soft with me," Izuku said with a smile.

Katsuki furrowed his brow.

"I-I may not have spent a lot of time with you like others, but you're so soft with me." Izuku grinned affectionately and joy radiated through his smile. "You were soft when we were kids. You were soft at the hotel when you tried to pretend to be my husband. You were soft on the boat. On the beach. While hiking." Izuku's face blushed slightly and his voice dropped into a quieter tone. "…Even in bed, you took care of me so nicely even though I was nervous. And even in the last month, you've been very soft with me."

All the moments played in his head like a small flip book. He could vividly see himself being tender with Izuku. It was pouring through his memories, and he hadn't even noticed it.

"You can be soft, Katsuki," Izuku concluded with a gentle smile.

Katsuki tears slowly stopped as something dawned on him. He looked at Izuku, his own hands and the way they were cradled against each other in the room amongst the broken pieces of his past.

Gradually, the golden light of sunrise leaked into the window at that moment, haloing Izuku's dark curls with a rim of light. Katsuki's heart rate tripled as he viewed Izuku in an entirely different lens than before.

He reached out to hold Izuku's face too.

They searched each other's eyes for a long moment, heart rates increasing.

It clicked together like forgotten memories that Katsuki would only dream of holding. All the whispers in his head that told him he wasn't deserving of love went silent and all he could hear or see was Izuku. Beautiful, kind Izuku. An unspoken warmth pulled in his chest.

Katsuki slowly leaned in, fluttering his eyes closed. Izuku closed his eyes too and held on to him like he was a lifeline in the vast sea.

Their lips met together in a gentle, passionate kiss.

Katsuki’s heart soared to a height it had never been. He deepened the kiss delicately and pulled Izuku into him. He caressed Izuku’s scarred hands and poured all his soul out at that moment. He realized Izuku brought out the softness in him that others never could.

Maybe Izuku was his missing piece.

Chapter End Notes

Please let me know what you think!!

Next chapter is gonna be plot and horny times LOL. I didn't thin it would be terribly appropriate for a lot of smut in this chapter since it was trying to show their non-smut intimacy. But next chapter is gonna be...fun :D

Thanks so much for reading 💜

Chapter 15 - Dolce

Katsuki thought he knew every bit of himself through and through. He was sure of it. Every nook and cranny of his mind he was familiar with, even the part that housed that sinister darkness.

However, after Izuku's lips locked with his own in the nursery, an entity inside of him reared its head. It wasn't new, or a spark that had ignited. It had been there, and it was awakening like rusted gears put to use for the first time in years—but Katsuki had no idea what it was.

When they broke from the kiss, all Katsuki could see were beautiful green eyes.

The feeling of Izuku's skin underneath his fingertips was warm. The caress of his breath against his lips was tender. The sleepy, yet adoring expression swimming in Izuku's eyes was passionate. All this combined stirred that rusted sensation inside of Katsuki faster and faster until his heart was hammering in his chest.

Alarmed slightly by this unnamed feeling, Katsuki pulled away.

Katsuki straightened his back and glanced around at all the broken pieces of porcelain scattered on the ground. Beside them were tiny blood speckles that made a trail to him, stemming from the small cut on his own foot.

Izuku followed his line of vision and grimaced. “Sorry for making such a mess in here.”

“It was already a mess,” Katsuki mumbled. He leaned his body over to the broken pieces on the ground and slowly began to gather them up one by one. “But it’s time to clean it up—like all messes, I guess.”

Izuku shifted alongside him. He crawled on his knees on the ground and began picking up the broken pieces of porcelain like they were treasure. Together they collected the fragments in silence, basking in the golden luminescence of the early sun.

When the morning breeze came through the window, it touched Katsuki differently. It danced along his arms and up his shoulders to whisk away the weight of how he felt about his mother. Finally admitting that she had hurt him allowed Katsuki to let go of her a bit more.

They finished gathering all the broken pieces of porcelain and Izuku placed them inside of a small napkin. Katsuki wiped up the spilled blood and applied a Band-Aid to the wound on his foot.

He took one last pitiful glance around the nursery.

It didn’t seem haunted with demons in the same way it had been mere minutes ago. Shamefully, Katsuki felt so damn dramatic for his small episode. He glanced down to Izuku who was patiently waiting on the ground, gazing up at him, studying his every move.

Katsuki bent down to help him up. Izuku wrapped his arms around him without dropping the napkin full of the jagged pieces.

“Let’s get to bed,” Katsuki murmured into Izuku’s curls.

As they laid down to go back to bed, Katsuki knew something was different.

He could sense Izuku knew it as well. They cuddled into each other more, molding together as if they needed the other. Katsuki studied his hands holding Izuku. He regarded every ugly scar, callous, and mark on them as he held the warm body firmly against him.

“I could kill Chizome for you,” Izuku whispered into his neck without moving.

Katsuki went still.

He drew back from Izuku so he could see his face. Izuku’s expression was gentle yet furious. Deep green eyes then slowly inched up to stare at him from underneath thick lashes.

Izuku's grip on him grew tighter. "Once my ankle heals, it could be the first thing I do. I think your supervisor was correct that you shouldn't do it, for your own benefit. But that doesn't mean someone else can't."

The burning passion for Chizome's death in Izuku's eyes matched his own.

Katsuki stared curiously at Izuku, taken back by the offer in a strangely good way.

"You would do that for me?"

"I would do anything for you."

Katsuki's chest hummed with both blood lust, satisfaction and astonishment. He hugged Izuku again and tried to assess the complex emotions boiling inside of his chest when that unnamed feeling smiled at the thought of Izuku killing Chizome.

The following day was leisure and Katsuki finally decided to clean out the nursery.

He decided to push thoughts of Chizome aside for now and would revisit them later. He wanted to first get his life here set up, and then he would potentially take Izuku up on that offer.

Currently, the man in question sat outside the door of the nursery on the ground as he went to work. The little nerd was tinkering with something. He had gotten into the pottery room and limped out with a basket stuffed to the brim with supplies.

However, every time Katsuki tried to take a peek at what Izuku was doing, he was met with a glare. Izuku scrambled and hunched his body over whatever it was to hide it from view.

"No looking!" Izuku chastised. "Focus on cleaning, Kacchan. I'll show you when I'm done."

"And why should I listen to you, Deku darling?" Katsuki teased. He bent down to Izuku's level and grinned with all his teeth. "C'mon, show me what you're doing."

"I will after you finish clearing out the nursery. Think of it like a reward."

"A reward?" Katsuki questioned, unconvinced. "Just show me."

"I said no. You have to wait."

"Seriously?"

"Seriously."

Katsuki frowned. "Whatever, you lil' weirdo. I can't believe you're hiding shit from me in my own damn home."

Katsuki stood up straight and shot Izuku a glare. The other man in return stuck his tongue out at him. Katsuki scoffed at the sheer childish nature of the gesture and shook his head. He resumed cleaning out the nursery with vigor. He worked a little bit faster than he normally would've, reluctantly egged on by the idea of getting whatever Izuku considered a reward.

It took a handful of hours, but Katsuki was able to finally clear out the room.

He threw out all the furniture along with his pain that was attached to it. He and Izuku talked casually and played music in the background as he deep cleaned down to the very last cobweb. By the time it was finished, the only thing left in the room was his name painted on the wall.

He wiped his brow of sweat and stared up at the red letters.

"What should I even use this room for?" Katsuki questioned.

He crossed his arms and stared around at the tiny room. It was big enough for basically a baby—nothing else.

"We can make it your music room," Izuku happily suggested. "You're starting your classical music composing class soon. You deserve a space of your own dedicated to it."

Katsuki's eyebrows shot up. "Ah. That's a great idea—"

He turned his head towards Izuku, ready to say more but the words stopped on the edge of his tongue. Izuku was grinning up at him and pointing down to an item on the ground.

Laying there on a tiny piece of tarp was the broken plaster of his baby feet. It was perfectly put back together with gold shimmering in the cracks.

Katsuki's heart stopped.

He walked towards the recovered piece from his past and halted directly in front of it. He curiously aligned his large foot with the tiny feet.

"You put it back together," Katsuki whispered. His face pinched in pain. "Why?"

"I was originally going to throw it out like you said to," Izuku started. He traced his finger along the golden lines. "But, when I started to piece it together, I realized what it was." Izuku's eyes watered and blinked rapidly. "I-I don't th-think you should get rid of this. Its… Its proof people loved you as a child."

If eyes really were the window to the soul, then Izuku left his eyes wide open for Katsuki to walk into at that moment. It was easy to tell this wasn't all about Katsuki.

Possibly Izuku was hoping there was a plaster with his baby feet out there as well. Or maybe he was hoping his mother regretted her decision despite what she had said to him. Those were Katsuki's best guesses. But they were just that, guesses.

Katsuki squatted to Izuku's level. He glanced at the plaster and took Izuku's hand in his. He intertwined their fingers like weaving ribbons.

"I'll keep it because you worked so hard on it." Katsuki decided that this fucked up part of his past was valuable now that Izuku had taken a liking to it. "When I finish redecorating this room, I'll hang it up, okay?"

Izuku's eyes sparkled. "Okay."

He stole a cliché kiss from Izuku and smiled. "Thank you for this. You're very thoughtful."

Katsuki adored the way Izuku blushed.

For the redesigns Katsuki went with a deep wine color. The new red paint swallowed up the old like fresh blood bleeding over wounds from the past.

When enough layers were applied, any remains of what the room used to look like were gone. In place of the crib now was a small mahogany desk. On top it were endless blank music sheets and fountain pens. Where the dresser for his unused baby clothes was now a shelf for where he would put his record collection—whenever he rebuilt it.

Lastly, where it used to say 'Katsuki' was a blank slate and underneath it was a lone music stand.

There was only one touch missing, and he was currently hanging it up. He swung the iron hammer with purpose as Izuku cheered in the background. The nail drove into the old wood with a sharp crack, and more glee erupted from Izuku.

Katsuki picked up the plaster of his baby feet. The glue was all dried and the golden powder had set into the cracks. He carefully hung it up on the door, and then slowly took a step back. From this distance, he joined Izuku in admiring it. The man beside him hummed happily, leaning on his crutches with a satisfied grin.

"Perfect," Izuku whispered. "Your very own music study. I can't wait for you to use this."

Katsuki crossed his arms and stared at Izuku. That unnamed emotion in his chest occurred once more.

"Yeah, it's starting to feel like home."

The next two weeks passed and Katsuki was suddenly nervous. All the anxiety in his body jittered around like someone was shaking him harshly in a glass jar.

He tapped his foot anxiously in the small room he was in. It had several windows and a white board in front that was full of music stanzas and notes.

Off to the side was a sleek, black grand piano and several music stands. Spread around in a disorderly fashion were chattering people he had never met before. Normally, this wouldn't be a threat to him. But right now, his instincts were treating this the same as an assignment where he once had to slaughter five men twice his size.

"Kacchan. Are you okay?" Izuku's distant voice suddenly sliced through all his thoughts.

Katsuki blinked rapidly, coming out of his daze.

Izuku stared at him with intense worry. His head was tilted, and his small hand was perched on Katsuki's shoulder.

"I'm fine," Katsuki automatically replied. He shook himself out of his own mind to focus on Izuku. "Why do you ask?"

"Well. You've been muttering for five minutes now," Izuku whispered. He glanced around at the other people, who were staring at them wearily. "Er, a little bit loud. You were mapping out an escape plan…and sizing people up in case you needed to take them down."

"Shit. Sorry about that." Katsuki winced. "Force of habit."

"I figured." Izuku ran a hand through Katsuki's hair and cupped his cheek. "Try not to scare everyone off on the first day."

"I can't make any promises," Katsuki replied snidely. He stared to his right at the young woman who scooted over a seat to get further away from him. He pursed his lips and turned to Izuku with a stare drenched with worry. "Are you sure this isn't…dumb?"

Izuku cocked his head. "Why would this be dumb?"

"Because it feels fuckin' dumb," Katsuki said sourly. He picked at the music sheets in his lap. "I missed my chance to follow music. I should just focus on landscaping and crap to fucking atone or something."

"Kacchan. Just give it a shot." Izuku touched his hand. "I-I can't explain it well, but I think you should do this. It'll give you something to focus on besides landscaping."

Katsuki squeezed Izuku's hand back. "Alright."

Izuku touched their foreheads together.

When the instructor came into the room, he was a man who looked as if he had lived life well. He had a happy, rounded face with rosy cheeks. He smelled of freshly peeled oranges with hair as white as lilies. In his hands was a brown leather suitcase that had tiny corners of sheet music peeking through the cracks and his bright grin reflected the glow from the sun.

"Good morning everyone!" The man's voice boomed through the room. "I'll be your teacher for the Classical Music Composition class. I'm Mr. Nakano and it's such a delight to get to know everyone."

Katsuki smiled slightly. He leaned back in his chair and relaxed as the instructor began to write the first lesson plan on the white board. He had neat handwriting, Katsuki thought to himself privately.

He was about to take notes and make a comment about the man's ridiculously long beard to Izuku—but when he turned his head he saw Izuku with his nose already stuck up in his book.

Well, Katsuki thought. I suppose he had no interest in music composition.

Katsuki returned his attention back to the teacher.

The class carried on and Katsuki absorbed every lick of information happily. Even though this was only the beginning stages, Katsuki could remember faint little pieces of the past from the looney violinist coming back to him. All the fancy terms he never had real meaning for now were clicking into place. Staccato. Dissonance. Descendo. It all was familiar now, in the best possible way.

However, something curious gripped Katsuki's attention throughout the hour-long lecture.

Every time he took a small break from taking notes, he glanced over at Izuku next to him.

His accidental husband was holding back a smile, biting at his bottom lip. He leaned down in his chair with his book all the way up to his face—as if trying to hide his blush. But what was strangest was how Izuku kept fucking squirming.

Katsuki frowned when Izuku squeezed his thighs together and his blush deepened. Sharp, well trained hitman eyes narrowed in on the way the book was parted and it was beginning to look familiar.

Katsuki turned his attention back to the instructor. But a small question played in the back of his mind: Why the hell did Izuku always act giddy at that part of the book?

"Did you have fun?" Izuku asked as he wobbled into the living room. He plopped down on the couch with a large smile and set down his crutches. "You seemed really into it the whole time!"

"Oh hell yeah," Katsuki replied. He sat down next to Izuku with an excited grin. "Most fun I had in a while."

"What did you like most about it?"

"Everything. It was damn cool to finally see all that shit make sense. I never really thought about different types of scales in music or all that crap until today. Or more so, I didn't realize it had names until now. Like who would have thought there was only a handful but there's so many combinations to make all these sounds. I wonder if Bach or—"

Katsuki caught himself when Izuku's eyes widened with delight.

He cursed under his breath. “I’m rambling.”

“Please, continue on,” Izuku snickered. He leaned forward into Katsuki’s space teasingly. “I haven’t heard you speak this passionately since planning to take down Moore.”

“No, I’m stopping myself,” Katsuki mumbled. He shoved Izuku back and shook his head. “All that fucking muttering you do to yourself in the bathroom is officially rubbing off on me.”

“I know!” Izuku chuckled, clasping his hands together. “It’s great!”

“I’m going to go make dinner to help forget that I’m picking up your god-awful habit,” Katsuki quipped. He rose from the couch and sauntered over to the kitchen area across the way. He ignored Izuku’s playful calling of his pet name as he started to take out all the pots and pans.

Eventually Izuku turned his attention to his book once more.

Katsuki stayed occupied with the food, attempting not to fucking mutter. He would be damned if, out of all the fucking habits in the world, he would pick that up from Izuku.

He focused on testing out a new recipe that he had seen online, and he thought Izuku may like it too. When he peeked back at the other man, he saw Izuku stretched out on his back on the couch. He was holding the book up with both of his arms and a giggle danced across his plump lips.

Katsuki narrowed in on the way the book was split. It was opened again in that same spot—slightly at the end but not far enough. The spine looked the most worn in that position on top of it.

He carefully placed the seasoned chicken in the oven and set his timer. He walked over to Izuku silently, trying his best not to trip his senses.

Usually when Izuku read whatever shit was on that page, he was far gone. All his goddamn assassin training was out the window when his big ass eyes were glued to those sentences. Which made it extremely easy for Katsuki to sneak around the back of the couch and crouch down.

Using all the stealth he had in his body, Katsuki crawled without making any noise. Then he sprung up with a mischievous grin and Izuku startled immediately. The smaller man scrambled the best he could with his wounded ankle and Katsuki sprung over the couch.

“Kacchan!” Izuku yelped, trying to hide his laughter. “Wh-What are you doing?!”

“Top secret mission—” Katsuki announced, chuckling as well. “Obtain your dorky book and read whatever it is you keep smiling at.”

He pinned Izuku down by his chest to the couch with his knee. With all the agility of an angel Katsuki snatched the tattered book and Izuku’s smile dropped immediately.

“N-No!” Izuku protested loudly. “Th-That’s private! You can’t read that part of the book!” He thrashed around, attempting to roll Katsuki over but Katsuki sat on him in return, earning a groan. Izuku fruitlessly shoved Katsuki until he was red in the face. “Ka-Kacchan, I’m serious! You can’t read it!”

“Hah? So you can force me to read the beginning of this book when the fucking man gets lost in the goddamn desert for one hundred pages, but I can’t read what’s clearly your favorite part?” Katsuki laughed as he ignored Izuku’s frantically growing struggles. “I bet it’s some sappy shit like a poem. My money is on him climbing a tower and she lets her hair down—whoa, wait. What the fuck?”

“Kacchan,” Izuku mumbled mournfully. He slowly hid his face in his arms. “Please…don’t read it.”

Katsuki didn’t listen and his mouth dropped in disbelief.

“This is fucking porn.”

His eyes widened as he reread the sentence that very metaphorically described a blow job. A very wet and sloppy one—but it didn’t stop there. Soon the whole paragraph was leading into another which led to another which led to straight out fucking.

“Holy shit,” Katsuki uttered. He blinked rapidly in surprise, ignoring the tiny groans of agony beneath him. “This is just as bad as the websites I’m subscribed to.”

“Wait.” Izuku halted for a moment. His face twisted with mild jealousy. “What websites are you subscribed to?”

Ignoring Izuku’s question, Katsuki flipped the page to find more sex being described. “I can’t believe what the hell I’m seeing. All this time you’ve been reading literary porn right in front of me.”

“It’s not porn,” Izuku countered. He gritted his teeth as he covered his face with his hands. “It-It’s romantic intimacy! They had been building up to this moment for most of the book and it’s a hallmark of their relationship and trust after being apart for so long—”

“—I would believe that if this book didn’t just use the phrase ‘fluttering hole’.”

Izuku whined loudly.

“Wait,” Katsuki said slowly. He sat up a bit. “You’ve been reading this since we got to the hotel. Is that why you were always squirming and smiling at this damn book at night? You were reading the same passage of someone getting railed over and over.”

Izuku hid in his hands further. “Katsuki.”

“And you had the audacity to call me the pervert.”

“Okay! Yes! I like that part a lot, alright!” Izuku huffed. He snapped his hands down and glared his furious green eyes at Katsuki. His skin was flushed pink all the way down to his collarbone and his shirt dropped off his shoulder ever so slightly. “Are you happy? Can you stop teasing me now?”

“Not a chance in hell.”

Katsuki grinned wide and shifted. He moved his legs on either side of Izuku, caging him in. He leaned over the smaller man with a purpose. Izuku’s eyes widened, and his blush deepened to the perfect shade of red.

“Are you horny, Izuku?” Katsuki asked in his lowest voice. “Is that why you keep reading this part over and over again? Does my darling husband want to be ravished?”

He meant it as a joke. He wanted to poke fun at the fact that the main characters in the book were married, but when he said the word ‘husband’ his stomach tightened, and he could feel Izuku stiffen.

“Please don’t say it like that,” Izuku mumbled, screwing his eyes shut.

Katsuki studied the words on the page then looked at Izuku’s tell-all: thighs squeezing together. Katsuki leaned down until his body was nearly laying directly on top of Izuku’s. He could feel the other man’s heart pound.

“And why not?” Katsuki questioned. “It seems to get you going. Which did you like—ravished or husband?” He waited for a beat and a small shiver went down Izuku’s body at the last word. “Ah. Husband. Makes sense that you’d have a hidden spousal kink.”

Izuku’s whole body erupted in flames—and then his assassin instincts kicked in.

Katsuki’s vision was tilted backwards as Izuku sprung his whole body forward and caught him in a headlock. Scarlet eyes widened with surprise, and Izuku flipped their positions while keeping his ankle protected. Katsuki made a disgruntled sound at the sudden choke hold and within the blink of an eye, the book was snatched out of his grasp.

When he obtained his bearings again, he was belly down and Izuku was crawling on his hands and knees with the book towards his crutches.

“Aw, darling, I didn’t mean any harm by it,” Katsuki teased with a smirk. He leaned up on his elbows and grinned. “I’m only curious what you’re into. If you have some dirty fantasies in that virginal noggin of yours, I’m more than happy to act them out with you.”

“Stop teasing me and I’m not a virgin anymore!” Izuku hissed angrily, nape redder than a tomato. “I-I’m hiding this from you! If you touch it I’m going to stab you!”

“You can try. Nothing can stay hidden from me.”

Izuku huffed and crawled away.

Izuku didn't hide the book well—or maybe he did, and Katsuki was just good at finding things.

Tracking and hunting has always been his specialty and that even went for that tiny, worn-down book. In the depths of night, Katsuki found it tucked away in some dark cloth on the back of the pottery shelf in a large vase. It was perfectly disguised and out of sight, but Izuku underestimated his visual memory. Katsuki had seen the vase moved ever so slightly out of place and he knew immediately to go for it.

He acquired the book like he won a prize and opened up to the exact page number he committed to memory. He sat in the living room while Izuku was knocked out asleep in their bedroom. There was a small lamp giving way to yellowish tinted light on the page.

Katsuki thought maybe this would be a fun way to see what type of filthy shit his innocent Izuku was into—but it wasn't exactly as dirty as he thought it would be.

Rose petals. Longing. Deep thrusts. Peppered kisses. Catering to each other's every whim.

This was soft.

Katsuki put the book down in his lap and stared blankly at the ground.

Well. That was anticlimactic and nowhere near as filthy as he would have hoped. He drew the conclusion that this made sense, Izuku was a hopeless romantic. Of course, the nerd would be interested in gentle sex—but. Katsuki's mind wandered back to Okinawa and how what they did was the exact opposite of what this book entailed.

Was this how Izuku imagined his first time?

A trickle of guilt fell over Katsuki.

Then, a small sound similar to a screw dropping echoed. It sounded as if it came from the bedroom.

Katsuki perked up, more alert.

He slid his hand in-between the sofa cushions to pull out a concealed tactical knife. He had placed a couple around the estate, just for good measure. He usually wasn't a paranoid person—but there was never such a thing as 'too careful' after all the horrors he had witnessed and brought about in this lifetime.

The metal of the knife caught the gleam from the lamp as he clutched it. Katsuki slowly closed the book, careful not to make a sound. He wielded the weapon, ready to launch as he heard another noise from the main corridor. Katsuki crept on his toes all the way to the bedroom only to find Izuku sleeping soundly.

He checked around the bedroom and up and down the hallways but found nothing.

All he could hear was the soft snoring of Izuku. Katsuki concluded it was possibly the estate breathing, this place was older than he was. Old homes made weird sounds; it was normal.

Katsuki's guard dropped a little when everything checked out.

He refocused on the sight of Izuku's messy curls. The moonlight spilled into the large bed and kissed Izuku's olive skin delicately. Katsuki tucked the weapon into his pants' hem and hesitantly reached out a hand to caress Izuku's cheek. The sleeping man snuggled into the touch and a small smile pulled on his lips. Izuku's freckles seemed painted on—and it caused Katsuki to stop and wonder.

"You can be soft, Katsuki."

Maybe he could try to give Izuku the story book fantasy he always wanted.

Katsuki stayed up all night reading that damned book and taking notes.

Had someone told him that he would be studying on how to fuck soft two months ago he would've shot them in the mouth. Had they told him that he would be doing it for the green menace that plagued his life—he would have tortured them for the hell of it.

But life was unpredictable, and so was he and so was Izuku. Therefore, all of this madness somehow made sense if it was the two of them.

"Where are you going?" Izuku questioned the next day. They had finished eating breakfast and Katsuki was putting on his coat for the drop in weather. "Your next music lesson is tomorrow, not today."

"I'm going to run out to the store for some things," Katsuki answered casually. He tried to act natural and not give away his plans. "Will you be okay alone for a couple of hours?"

Izuku nodded cutely. "I think I'll be fine. But can I have a goodbye kiss to hold me over until you get back?"

"Of course, darling." Katsuki leaned down and stole a tiny kiss from Izuku's lips.

They leaned away for a moment before breaking out in smiles. They kissed once more. Then twice. Then thrice and a fourth time until they felt satisfied.

"Okay, last kiss," Katsuki said. "Otherwise, I can keep going all day."

"That doesn't seem like a bad option," Izuku suggested playfully.

Katsuki laughed and shook his head. They exchanged one more kiss and a goodbye before Katsuki finally leaned upright.

As he was walking towards the door, he glanced back at Izuku. He had just wanted to steal a glance at the handsome man once more before he left, but he caught sight of an action that broke the bubble of ignorance they were in.

Izuku took out a small, glass vile in his pocket. He watched Izuku uncap it and tap a small droplet into his smoothie.

Katsuki's happiness faltered and he didn't move.

Neither of them spoke a word on Izuku's steady poisoning of himself. He did it every morning to keep up his immunity with a rotation of various toxins. It was an ugly underlying reminder that Izuku potentially had a very bleak future if he didn't come up with a plan to get him out.

He tightened his grip on the handle of the door when that unnamed emotion inside of him churned unhappily. It pushed against him like nails against a dry chalk board forcing him to clench his jaw and cringe.

Cross that bridge when it arrives, Katsuki reminded himself.

Or burn it so he can never go back, the darker half of himself suggested.

He left out the door and pushed back thoughts of their rings, Izuku's poison, and the number 217 into the recesses of his mind.

The sun was setting by the time he finished gathering all he needed. Katsuki muttered to himself as he double checked his list.

Rose petals, pink and red.

Cherry scented candles and bath bombs.

Cushions, pillows and very soft blankets that would be good at resisting any type of friction.

Everything was easy to gather, but the entire time in the shopping district Katsuki couldn't shake the odd feeling of eyes following him.

He looked around different corners, but always found no one suspicious. It was always a simple, happy family standing there with some kids. Or some couple or normal singletons that had their headphones in. No one was paying him any mind, and Katsuki was beginning to wonder if extensive paranoia was a side effect of working for The Company for so long.

He shook off the strange sensation as he stopped in the very last store he needed: a sex store.

Originally, he only meant to buy items that would hold him and Izuku over for a while so he wouldn't have to leave as it got cold. Such as lube and candy g-strings. Especially the candy g-strings. However, as he poked around he couldn't help but think Izuku might like this, or that, or many, many things. Any man that drinks poison for breakfast is bound to be a deranged level of kinky deep down.

Then he saw it.

Katsuki pushed up his sunglasses and tilted his head at it. He read the label over and over again to make sure he wasn't seeing things.

Doughnut flavored lube?

He didn't even know Krispy Kreme made lube.

A giddy sensation pulsed in his chest. Izuku would fucking die of embarrassment if they used this—it was perfect.

Katsuki glanced over his shoulder and pushed his sunglasses back down over his eyes. He quickly threw it in his basket with a smirk.

It was night outside when he finished and by that time, Katsuki missed Izuku.

That unidentified piece inside of him was blaring loudly, screaming at him to get back to the cute nerd that was waiting on him. Katsuki looked down at the variety of shopping bags hanging off his arms like ornaments. He was feeling tired but still very much determined to make this shit happen.

He hopped off the train to his final destination, back to the small town of Biei. As he walked to the estate, his body dragged. Then he quickly remembered there was a small coffee shop not too far away and detoured momentarily.

The coffee shop was quiet and full with a handful of local people. The baristas were bubbly and smiling the entire time as the welcoming smell of roasted coffee beans crowded the air. Katsuki put in his order and gave his name and credit card to the young woman at the counter.

He stood off to the side with his arms crossed, casually checking his phone. He had a number of texts and calls he still hadn't answered from his colleagues or Aizawa. He pursed his lips reading one particularly erratic text from Denki, but once again chose to ignore it.

"Medium macchiato," the barista called over the loud music blasting.

She signaled with her hand that the drink was his. She pushed the cup across the counter and turned back around to take another order. Katsuki walked over to pick it up.

However, another hand reached it before he could.

The hand was petite, pale and had long, coffin shaped nails. The color of the nails was a deep red as if they were dipped into a fresh bucket of blood and stained.

Katsuki frowned as the hand picked up his order. He followed the line of the slender arm all the way up to find a young woman with a delicate bone structure. Her blonde hair was pinned up in two messy buns, her lips were coated in a bright cherry stain and her eyes were a captivating gold. But her sights were locked straight on the writing on the cup.

“Excuse me,” Katsuki said pointedly. “That one is mine.”

Her piercing eyes snapped towards him.

He had expected a sense of embarrassment from her but saw nothing staring back at him like a void. Then slowly she smiled, and her expression didn’t reach her eyes.

“Ah! I’m so sorry,” she said quickly. She fake laughed and handed the drink over to him. She covered her mouth as if scandalized. “I must’ve misheard. I thought this was my drink.”

He grabbed the cup from the woman and surveyed her discreetly. She looked about his age, and for the most part appeared benign. She was dressed in a dark, crimson dress and black leather jacket with matching combat boots. As he inconspicuously studied her, she peeked inside his shopping bags.

“Ooh, scented candles and pretty pillows,” she exclaimed in a sing-song voice. She cocked her head like she was witnessing something intriguing. “Along with a bag of rose petals. Do you have a romantic night planned with someone special?”

“Potentially.” Katsuki didn’t give any room for conversation. “Have a good rest of your night.”

It was a harmless question, but paranoia was crawling into his veins again and he fucking hated small talk. Katsuki decided then it was time to take his leave. The odd sensation he was picking up was overpowering enough to make him uncomfortable.

He turned around and didn’t look back.

“You have a good rest of your night too, Katsuki,” the mysterious woman called out.

Katsuki turned his head to see her smiling at him from over her shoulder.

His eyes glanced down at her feet, and it was then that he saw a snake tattooed on either one of her calves. The twin vipers crawled directly up from her heel to the midpoint of the back of her leg, baring their fangs and forked tongues. He glanced up at her face, and she was turned away, paying him no mind.

Katsuki walked out of the coffee shop regretting his pitstop. He looked down at his cup of coffee and frowned. He glared at his name written on the cup in red marker right above the contents of his order.

“Damn my fucking paranoia,” Katsuki grumbled angrily.

He knew he was being ridiculous—but he poured the coffee into the river on his way back and put the cup in the next trash can he saw. He never drank out of a cup he didn’t touch first, and he wasn’t about to start now.

Harmless mix up or not.

“You’re back!” Izuku exclaimed. His doe eyes sparkled against the artificial light in the kitchen. “What took you so long—oh wow. That’s a lot of bags! What’s inside of them?”

Izuku hobbled up to him at the door, and Katsuki bit his tongue. He grinned wide and held up the bags out of Izuku’s line of vision.

“It’s a surprise,” Katsuki replied with a hint of humor. Izuku frowned in the cutesy way he always did. “I got something planned out for us that I think you’ll fucking geek over.”

Immediately Izuku’s frown was chased off. Curiosity blossomed like a field of flowers in his eyes as he stared at the bags. A wide grin split across his face, showing his dimples.

“Sounds fun!” Izuku exclaimed. “I’m excited for whatever you have planned.”

Katsuki grinned, heart pumping loudly in his ears. He was nervous. He really hoped he could pull this off how he imagined the scene in Izuku’s head. But even more so, he hoped Izuku liked it and didn’t find it weird.

Katsuki muttered lightly to himself as he lit the third scented candle. The whole bathroom smelled of roses and he was beginning to like the scent of flowers after being immersed in the aroma for so long.

He had the lights turned down halfway, elevating the atmosphere to be more sensual and romantic. He had spent an absurd amount of time mixing whatever fucking bath mix correctly to be the right ratio of ingredients that would be healthy for Izuku’s skin. Then he sprinkled some rose petals on top of the water for visual effect.

This was the exact scene in that damned book Izuku was so attached to. One lover had run a bath for the other to relax fully and used rose petals, candles, and herbs to help set the mood. Katsuki wondered If Izuku would recognize the shoddy recreation as he placed another candle on the sink.

“A bath?” Izuku questioned as he hobbled to the doorway of the bathroom.

Katsuki glanced up from his seat on the floor, trying his best to play it cool. “Yup. A bath. Do you like it?”

Izuku stared at the scene. A flash of recognition snuck on his face, but it was quickly killed, as if questioning himself.

“This looks very pretty but I’m not sure the bathtub is big enough for two people,” Izuku pointed out.

“I’m not getting in,” Katsuki corrected as he checked the temperature of the water. “I already took a shower earlier. I put this together for you.” He smiled as Izuku’s eyes stretched wider with every passing second. “Do you like it?”

'Does it look familiar?' is what Katsuki really wanted to ask.

Izuku stammered and a candy pink blush settled on his cheeks. "I do. This is—" he paused and stared around at the calming, romantic setting. "Th-This is really nice. What's the special occasion?"

"We haven't tried to kill each other in nearly two months," Katsuki answered sarcastically.

Izuku chuckled and sheepishly smiled. "I didn't even realize it had nearly been two months since the beginning of the Okinawa assignment."

"Mhm," Katsuki hummed. He pondered the thought for a while as he took in Izuku. "Time flew by really fast."

"They say time flies by with the right person."

He eyed Izuku's dimples, and his heart skipped a beat. The unnamed emotion sparked to life again and Katsuki quickly stood up and cleared his throat.

"Well, here you go," Katsuki said in a rush. "Take as long as you need, then come out to the living room after you're done, by the fireplace. Put on the robe before you come out."

Izuku nodded and hobbled up to him to capture him in a surprise hug.

The warmth between their bodies tripled with their heart rates as Izuku snuggled into his chest. He squeezed Katsuki affectionately. Stunned by the sudden contact, Katsuki stood still for a moment. He was unfamiliar with how this felt he realized. He stared at the wall in shock for a split second before he felt like he was melting.

He relaxed all the way and hugged Izuku back.

If Katsuki thought he reached the peak of ridiculousness at any other moment of his life, this scene currently beat out anything before that.

He had laid out three layers of plush blankets on the ground in front of the fireplace and formed a small line of soft pillows and cushions on the outer edges. Each pillow and blanket was soft to the touch and pure white with tiny gold embroidered designs. The snap and crackle of the fire next to the set up echoed into the dark living room as Katsuki poured two glasses of wine.

"He better fucking like this," Katsuki grumbled under his breath as he placed down one wine glass. He readjusted the sash on his black, silk robe carefully.

All of his nerves were through the roof now as he stared down at the skimpy robe he was in. This was as close to book accuracy he could get. A path of rose petals led from the bathroom to the living room. Even more petals were laid down within the blankets and two glasses of red wine were ready to go. The only thing missing was him laying down with a flower in his mouth.

Katsuki groaned as he lifted up the single white rose.

He looked at its thornless stem as if it was berating him. Swallowing the last of his pride, Katsuki bit the stem and held it in his mouth. He adjusted himself to be poised and ready for Izuku whenever he came out of the bathroom, slightly opening his legs to tease what was underneath.

This is so fucking cheesy, Katsuki mentally complained. But the nerd is fucking obsessed with this—

"Kacchan?" Izuku called loudly.

He hopped on his crutches down the pathway of rose petals to the dimly lit living room. His eyes were large as saucers, and his mouth hung open, slightly agape. He was wearing the white silk robe Katsuki had left for him and his curls were damp.

Katsuki perked up and carded his hands through his hair. He tried his best to act natural but found it very hard with the rose in his mouth.

"Wh-What is all this?" Izuku asked as he finally drew near. The light danced across his face, making his freckles more pronounced. "This…This is exactly—this is the same as—"

"—Yes, it's the same as your book," Katsuki mumbled. He took the rose out of his mouth and twirled it around, catching Izuku's attention with the small motion. "It's the scene after the mountain passage when they finally make it home. I read it all. Twice." Katsuki's smirk widened. "I can see why you enjoy that part so much."

Izuku didn't say anything. He stood there, taking in the whole scene in front of him like he was in a dream. He slowly descended from his crutches down to Katsuki's level. Izuku touched a rose petal as if it was made of glass. He picked it up and stared at it.

Katsuki's stomach knotted at the lack of words.

"Do you like it?" Katsuki asked wearily. "If you don't I can put this all away, and we can go to bed—"

"—No, I really love this," Izuku whispered. His voice cracked on the ends, and his eyes were glossy. "Th-This is exactly how I pictured the scene. Everything is perfect, I-I can't believe you did this."

"I'm glad you like it," Katsuki said quietly. He licked his lips and reminded himself: soft. Be soft. He leaned in and placed a hand on Izuku's exposed thigh. He caressed the smooth skin with his thumb. "I…I would do this again if…it meant…seeing you smile."

Izuku's eyes softened.

"I thought you hated anything to do with romance?"

“I guess it’s different when it comes to you.”

Katsuki handed Izuku the white rose.

Izuku reached out for it, his ring glimmering in the dim light. He took it in his hands and gazed down at it. Izuku’s smile was so fragile.

“Thank you so much,” Izuku whispered. “This is the nicest thing anyone has done for me.”

Katsuki didn’t want to think about how that potentially made him sad.

He picked up the two wine glasses instead and handed one to Izuku. The other man chuckled and took the drink from him with a glint in his eyes. They sipped on it slowly, maintaining eye contact. The liquid moved down Katsuki’s throat easily and Izuku choked.

“What’s wrong?” Katsuki asked after swallowing.

Izuku wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. He started laughing and swirled the wine in the glass. “I don’t like the taste of red wine. I thought I would get used to it—but I guess I never have.”

Katsuki laughed from his stomach. Their chuckles mixed in a chorus of joy and Katsuki shook his head. He took a couple big gulps of his drink before taking Izuku’s in his hand. He set them aside and smirked.

“Let’s cut to the main part then,” Katsuki said with a hint of playfulness. “Not everything has to be done by the book.”

His accidental husband gripped the white rose tightly. Katsuki decided then to shift on the blankets and gripped Izuku’s waist. He drew him in closer and the heat in the room grew thicker.

“This is where the lovers intertwine,” Katsuki whispered as he pulled at the sash on Izuku’s waist, undoing it to fall open. “They lose their virginity to the other, and they take it really slow and become forever bonded.” Katsuki kissed the tattoo on Izuku’s collar. “In sickness.” Another small kiss. “And in health.” A caress of the skin. “Until death do they part.”

Izuku’s breathing quickened.

“Are you nervous again?” Katsuki muttered directly against Izuku’s lips. He smiled mischievously. “I promise I’ll make sure I’m gentle. I know how delicate virgins can be.”

“I’m not a virgin anymore,” Izuku quipped. “And I’m not delicate.”

“I know. But c’mon, let me enjoy this.” Katsuki chuckled lightly and stole another kiss. “Still can’t get over my handsome virginal husband who waited until marriage for me all these damn years.”

Izuku laughed lightly and reddened. “Katsuki. You’re making me feel embarrassed calling me your husband.”

“Do you not like being called that? Husband suits you.” He dropped his voice several octaves on purpose to make Izuku squirm. He looked down and could see Izuku’s breathing hitch and his erection prop to life ever so slightly. Katsuki grinned wide. “You really fuckin’ seem like you’re enjoying it.”

“I-I am,” Izuku whispered like he was teetering on the edge of a forbidden line. Their eyes met and a burning intensity interlocked between them. “But, you don’t think it’s odd considering we are legally married by accident? It feels taboo to use it like this.”

“We’re alone, who will judge us?” Katsuki questioned. He snaked a hand underneath Izuku’s robe to teasingly rub the inside of the soft, freckled thigh.

“No one,” Izuku said breathlessly.

“Exactly.” Katsuki’s fingers snuck in closer to Izuku’s erection and he could feel the tension build between them like wildfire. He leaned in and softly nipped Izuku’s neck. “If you like it, I can call you my husband in bed.” He brushed their noses together. “This is between us, it’s private and intimate. You’re my darling husband right now and I’m yours.”

Izuku nodded hesitantly and closed his eyes.

His body loosened all the way as he fell into Katsuki’s temptation. He dropped the rose off to the side and wrapped his arms around Katsuki’s neck. They kissed deeply, tongues sliding across each other sweetly.

“Try saying it,” Katsuki said into the kiss. “Call me your husband.”

“Y-You’re my husband,” Izuku whispered back.

“And I’m going to take such good fucking care of you tonight,” Katsuki rasped hungrily. “Bakugou Izuku.”

Katsuki thought they were simply playing this out by the book, giving into a small sexual fantasy that Izuku had. However, the blurred line between reality and pretend between them was breached by acknowledging their title: Husbands.

He kissed Izuku harder as he thought about this—trying to will away the creeping thoughts. Katsuki could feel his chest expand, filling up with all the essence of whatever always sparked between them.

It was heavy, powerful, and called to him to keep pressing closer and closer. Izuku’s tongue slid against his as they drew in more, arms locked around each other. Katsuki took a hand and slowly slid it underneath the elegant fabric of Izuku’s robe.

He trailed his kisses down Izuku’s neck as he kneaded the soft skin under his fingertips. Izuku bared his neck, allowing small nips and kisses to be planted delicately on his skin. Katsuki tried his best to remember how soft the book described the intimacy and smiled when Izuku’s breath caught.

Fingernails dug into his shoulders as he grazed a perked nipple.

Katsuki pulled back and smirked. He pushed down the robe off Izuku's shoulders and exposed his heaving chest.

"You look so gorgeous right now," Katsuki said with a subtle rasp.

Izuku was sitting perfectly awaiting him, green eyes heavy and hazy. Katsuki licked two of his fingers and coated them well with his mouth. He reached back to the nipple and tweaked it slightly. Izuku bit his lip and fluttered his eyes. Katsuki pulled him in again, kissing him tenderly as he toyed with the nub in his hand.

Izuku's lips were softer than normal, he thought privately.

He gripped his fingers into Izuku's skin and slowly laid him down. He placed Izuku's head on one of the pillows that was decorated with endless patterns of gold and rose petals.

Big, green eyes stared up at him and he slowly raked his hand down Izuku's body. Katsuki planted one kiss, two kiss, three kisses along Izuku's jaw line as he parted the white robe, exposing his body.

Izuku's delicate hands moved up as well and pushed the black robe off Katsuki's shoulders. The fabric slid off his skin like sweet water and Izuku undid the sash from around his waist. The rope fell open and Katsuki grinned. He shrugged off the rest of it, embracing the warmth of the fire radiating on his bare skin.

Katsuki leaned in and laid kisses down Izuku's torso, massaging his sides as he dipped his head lower and lower. He stopped right above Izuku's cock and sucked lightly on the tip as he reached for the lube off to the side. Tiny gasp of pleasure fell out of Izuku's mouth with the new sensation.

Katsuki snapped his eyes up, curious to watch Izuku come undone.

The other man's eyes were screwed shut, and his hands were clawing at his stomach like he was trying to push out the sensation from his core. His mouth looked so cute, hung open as so many tiny moans spilled out of them. Katsuki took more of Izuku into his mouth, loving the way his husband lifted his hips to push into his mouth.

Katsuki uncapped the lube quietly and sucked harder, making Izuku groan deeply.

Small shudders and tremors quaked through Izuku as the fire snapped in the background. Intricate shadows danced across the planes of freckled skin and Katsuki coated his fingers with the thick lubricant.

He drew his head up, a long trail of silva bridged from his lips to the tip of Izuku's cock.

Pretty pink blush blended with the orange light on Izuku's skin and Katsuki wished he could burn this visual of the enchanting man into the back of his mind. Gorgeous, half lidded green eyes were entirely dilated. Izuku was laid bare with everything on display—scars, wounds, and freckles all mixing together like a painting.

The heated stare Izuku was giving him was loaded with so many unspoken words. Shyly, Izuku opened his legs. He parted all the way for Katsuki and lifted his hips. He reached down and pulled apart his cheeks to give the perfect fucking view of his pretty hole.

Katsuki slid one finger in and Izuku's breath caught.

Katsuki licked his lips, arousal ignited as his finger was hugged tightly. Izuku held his grip on his cheeks as the finger slid in more and more until his knuckle was hit.

Egged on to get more reaction, Katsuki searched straight for Izuku's sweet spot, making the other man tremble. Katsuki pushed at it again, sliding another finger in. Izuku's legs quaked, and Katsuki bit his lip when the deep need inside of his core was telling him to make Izuku come undone even further.

Katsuki's free hand began pumping Izuku's cock in tandem with the jolts against his prostate. Izuku gasped in shock at the double intrusion of pleasure, hands slipping to grapple at the blankets below them and grasping rose petals too.

A satisfied grin spread across Katsuki's sharp features when he could see the euphoria take Izuku.

He fucked his two fingers in and out gently, watching how Izuku's chest rose and fell with every beat of pleasure he was given. Beads of sweat gathered on both of their brow lines, as the temperature in the room spiked to new heights.

"I should've taken you from the front last time," Katsuki said huskily. He added a third finger and squeezed the base of Izuku's cock. Ripples of pleasure gathered at the bottom of his core from seeing Izuku's doll face be overcome with rapture. "Your expressions are so damn gorgeous."

He stroked Izuku quicker and added a fourth finger. Izuku rocked with his motions, heels digging into the plush blankets. His back arched with every push and pull of ecstasy. Katsuki's breath caught higher and higher in response to Izuku's. He was fully mesmerized as Izuku's moans transformed into cries of pleasure as he fingered his husband harder and jerked his cock in sync.

Izuku didn't give any warning, voice breaking down to pure syllables of his lover's name.

The way Izuku came this time was art in motion.

His mouth dropped, sweat rolled down his face and chest. His legs gave underneath the powerful electricity that rocked his nerves and his hole clamped down on the wet fingers stuffing him. He shuddered vehemently and rose petals stuck to his dampened skin. His cum sprayed across both of them, and Katsuki's heartbeat quickened when a droplet caught on his chin.

He slid his fingers out and then leaned down and gave a gentle kiss to the inside of Izuku's thigh.

The other man jolted slightly, laughing in surprise. Katsuki raised a brow.

“Ah, wait, that tickles,” Izuku said. His chest was rising and falling quickly, and his toes were curled from the leftover waves of his orgasm.

“Really?” Katsuki smiled against the area and kissed it again. He toyed with it a bit, lightly touching it with his hand. Izuku began giggling under the touch and squirming. “Holy fuck. I think I found a spot on you.”

“A spot?”

“Mhm,” Katsuki hummed, delighted. “An area that’s more sensitive than others. Only a couple people have them.” He tickled the area a bit more, and Izuku laughed again. “You’re so cute.”

When he could sense Izuku relax all the way he slid his hand upwards and added more lube to Izuku’s stretched out backside.

He pushed in lightly, and Izuku’s laughter faded into a soft gasping. He played around with Izuku a bit, drawing out all the tiny groans and teasing him back up. Izuku’s cock twitched back to life slowly as Katsuki took his time to work him into pleasure once more. When the tiny gasps were now whines accompanied by withering, Katsuki sat back on his hunches.

He stroked himself well, slicking his cock up while keeping his eyes trained on Izuku.

At his core, the unnamed feeling had its mouth wide open, feeding on every moment that was occurring. Every glance, touch, smile and even the smell of roses was direct fuel in the pit in his heart.

Katsuki leaned over and gripped Izuku’s hips firmly.

They locked eyes and butterflies tickled in his stomach all the way up his ribcage. He spread his legs as he pulled Izuku into his lap. He picked him up, and they came face to face and heart to heart. The pounding in both of their chests vibrated through the other.

Suddenly, all Katsuki wanted was to be closer.

They never took their eyes off the other as Katsuki aligned his cock with Izuku’s wet entrance.

Slowly, Katsuki lowered Izuku down on him, stretching his hole with every inch deeper and deeper. They breathed out together as they melted into one. Izuku gripped onto his shoulders until his knuckles turned white.

Katsuki groaned and bit his lip as he was wrapped in Izuku’s wet, velvety hole. It sucked him in and he buried his face into the crook of Izuku’s neck. He hugged Izuku closely, holding him in his lap. The heat from the fire, their bodies, and the fog in his mind melded together.

He moved slowly once he buried himself to the hilt.

Izuku gasped and they began to rock together as steady as a gentle ocean.

The push and pull they created was nothing like Katsuki had felt before.

All around him was Izuku as he moved: his dewy skin was softer than the flower petals scattered across the floor and his breathing was beautifully rhythmic to their motions. Their movements became more sensual, and Katsuki pushed against Izuku's prostate with purpose. Izuku groaned deep in the back of his throat as he ground down.

"Do you like it soft like this?" Katsuki asked.

"I do," Izuku replied. "Do you like it too?"

Katsuki smiled into Izuku's neck and breathed him in. "I like it a whole lot. Am I doing this right?"

"Y-Yeah, please—keep going."

Katsuki's heart swelled with validation.

They kept going like this, indulging in each other with soft whispers of encouragement and affection. The pleasure gained momentum as they continued, drowning the other in intimacy that they didn't think was possible. Katsuki stared up at Izuku, trying to think when he ever fucking felt this intense while being inside of someone.

He searched for an answer and was met with the blunt fact: Only Izuku made him feel like this.

For the first time Katsuki really did believe he could be soft—for as long as Izuku was around.

"You're so beautiful," Katsuki whispered. "I could do this with you all damn night."

Izuku stroked a shaky hand down the hills of Katsuki's arm and gripped tight. "Me too."

Katsuki sweetly kissed Izuku's skin, counting every freckle with each deep thrust. Then a shower of kisses rained onto his face as Izuku began moaning desperately. Every soft touch was more loaded than any rough motion he was used to. Katsuki groaned as his eyes closed at the tender flutter of kisses and his body heat coiled tightly.

For the first time, Katsuki felt wanted.

Katsuki hugged Izuku closer and rocked harder, pushing out more sharp cries.

He started moving deeper, grinding up and soaking himself in pleasure. He stared up at Izuku's blissed out face the whole time, watching those wonderful expressions as his cock was squeezed. Wet, squelching sounds breached his ears with Izuku's whimpering. He grinned through his panting and fucked upwards harder, bouncing Izuku in his lap.

Izuku whined as Katsuki quickened the motions. He wantonly rolled his hips and Katsuki nearly lost his mind.

“Kacchan, I feel so cl-close again—aah—I’m n-not going to last.”

Powerful ecstasy pulsed in his cock. Katsuki didn’t want this feeling of belonging to end.

Katsuki reached between them to grip the base of Izuku’s dripping cock. A sharp cry dribbled out from Izuku’s mouth as Katsuki snapped his hips upwards in a powerful motion, bouncing the smaller man. Katsuki’s thumb smeared the droplets of pre-cum oozing out from Izuku’s slit.

“Have I ever told you how pretty you are?” Katsuki asked breathlessly. “These freckles.” Thrust. “Those eyes.” Thrust. “Your voice.” He ground his hips to punctuate his sentence. “My darling husband is breathtaking.”

He squeezed the throbbing length in his hand as he bounced Izuku on his cock. Izuku’s head bobbed furiously as he gripped on tightly for balance.

“Do you feel how much I want you?” Katsuki asked with hunger in his voice.

“Yes, aah, I feel it, I feel you—I want you too. I want you so much too.”

“Ye-Yeah,” Katsuki panted. His eyes dilated fully in the dim light. The chord inside of his belly tightened more with every deep thrust. His mind clouded as his orgasm built. He glanced down at the green gem on his ring finger and back up to the shining eyes that matched it in color. “Y-You’re mine, right?”

“Mhmm,” Izuku moaned. His eyes fluttered closed, and his body began to seize up.

Katsuki was unsatisfied with that answer. He squeezed the base of Izuku’s cock. “Be more specific, darling, if you want to cum.”

Izuku’s brows pinched together, giving an outcry of pleasure. “I-I—ah. Fu-fuck.”

“Say it.” Katsuki sneered. “Are you mine?”

He needed to hear it. Fuck. He needed to hear it so damn bad—

“I’m yours,” Izuku answered in a single breath. “I’m your husband—”

Katsuki groaned deeply as he started thrusting harder. Every jolt added a hot sensation into his core as he breathed in Izuku’s cries. Their motion drew out combinations of emotions Katsuki didn’t even know were possible. Affection blended with pleasure. Adoration mixed with need. Absolute desolation blurred with want.

Izuku cried out his name in a broken moan and arched like a perfect bow. He came harshly into Katsuki’s fist, causing the liquid to seep through Katsuki’s fingers.

Katsuki's vision pulsed, and his hips thrusted once, then twice until he seized up. His orgasm ripped through him with enough force for him to bite into Izuku's freckled shoulder. He came deep inside of the other man, filling Izuku to the brim with everything he had.

Katsuki's chest heaved as he kept Izuku trapped in his arms.

Izuku's breath was steadying as they allowed time to be still around them. Eventually, Izuku ran a hand through Katsuki's hair, drawing his attention.

Katsuki looked at the smaller man in his lap, wordlessly. Tiny rose petals were sticking to both of their skin and for once—Katsuki thought it was romantic in a nice way.

"That was so amazing," Izuku mumbled.

Izuku's hands intertwined with Katsuki's, not letting go. He laid a simple kiss on top of Katsuki's wedding band.

Emotions thumped around Katsuki's chest cavity at the sight. Everything was heightened to the extreme and all he could think about was Izuku. Izuku. Izuku.

He was a little too stunned to speak right away. Instead, he nodded dumbly as his high carried through his limbs. The come down gave him enough clarity to understand that he's never felt that intensity before. He had no clue that going soft and deep in that way elicited the burning in his chest. It scratched at him, begging for more.

What the hell was Izuku doing to him?

"Did you like it soft like that?" Katsuki eventually asked. "I tried my best to make sure I was gentle."

"I did, that was different in a good way," Izuku said happily.

"I can keep doing that for you, if you enjoy it more than me being rough." Katsuki smiled and drew tiny hearts on Izuku's skin. "I should've done this for your first time and made you feel all special and shit."

"I liked it the way we did it before too," Izuku clarified. He squeezed Katsuki's hand in his reassuringly. "I wouldn't have changed how I had my first experience because I had it with you. That's all I really wanted, Kacchan. I don't mind either way as long as your lips are on mine."

Katsuki's heart skipped a beat. "Really?"

"Mhm." Izuku grinned. "I especially like it when your hands are on me—" Izuku paused and guided Katsuki's hand up to his throat. He assisted in clasping the large fingers tightly around his throat until it was a near perfect necklace. "—like this. I have more than one type of fantasy but they're all involving you."

Katsuki's cock twitched a bit knowing that. The selfish side of him was happy. He was the only one to ever experience this side of Izuku, and even better he was who Izuku fantasized about. He wondered how long Izuku had seen him in this light and even more so he wondered if Izuku had ever touched himself to the thought of him.

“What else have you been interested in?” Katsuki asked carefully, not removing his hand.

Izuku bit his lip shyly, clearly embarrassed about what he was about to say next. “…Have you ever heard of edging?”

A dark, sharp chuckle escaped from Katsuki. He gave a depraved smile and happily choked Izuku lightly, pulling him by his neck to draw his lips close.

“We’re about to have a lot of fucking fun. Aren’t we?”

Izuku nodded and raked his nails down Katsuki’s back. They shared another heated kiss as Katsuki clasped his hand firmer while moving their lips together. He could feel the pulse of Izuku’s heart under his fingertips as their kiss deepened.

He laid Izuku down on his back in the sea of rose petals and they were lost to each other the rest of the night.

Two full weeks passed after the moment they shared in front of the fireplace, and Katsuki had never felt more gratified.

Izuku didn’t have a preference for soft or rough—his only preference was Katsuki. Which did something to Katsuki’s brain chemistry, he was damn sure of it. Knowing that Izuku liked him wholly as he was with no changes was an experience he never encountered.

Izuku really did like him for him.

But little did either of them know, that single moment was the turning point for a floodgate of intense craving to be opened. Katsuki assumed that it was sexual need at the root of it, but he knew it was a lot more than carnal desire that made him so hungry for Izuku.

“I’m yours.”

Those two words stuck to his brain and grew deep roots. After that, it was damn near impossible to keep his hands off Izuku. They had sex in the bedroom, in the hallway and in the bathroom. It didn’t stop there, however. Soon they were fucking in the living room. Next, the pottery room and the brand-new music room after his lessons.

Hell, some days they even went at it in the kitchen.

“My tea is really hot,” Izuku said one day. His hand was under the table creeping straight towards Katsuki’s belt buckle. “Maybe we should…wait for it to cool down?”

What a poor fucking excuse—and Katsuki took it.

“Wouldn’t want you to burn your pretty tongue,” Katsuki answered cheekily. “I really would like to keep that part of you in good shape.” His eyes danced to Izuku’s plump lips. “Have you ever sucked cock before, darling?” Izuku shook his head and his eyes dilated. “Well. That’s a damn shame. I guess it’s time to learn.”

He unbuckled his belt and guided Izuku down onto his knees.

After that nothing really could stop them. There was even one day they found themselves on the porch just fucking raw out in the open. That was one of Katsuki’s favorite times, the smell of after rain mixed with Izuku’s natural scent was like a goddamn drug.

Izuku’s moans were soon his favorite song. But most of all, Katsuki was beginning to be addicted to the new pet name kink they unlocked.

“Katsuki,” Izuku’s breathy voice would groan as he was taken from the back. “M-Make me scream, I wanna cum for my husband.”

So. Fucking. Perfect.

Katsuki couldn’t get enough of Izuku, and it was very well reciprocated. Their newly reached intimacy fed into that unnamed emotion of his to the point it was growing more and more hungry with every passing day. It was insatiable.

Every single bit of Izuku Katsuki wanted until he could consume him whole.

It worried him a bit, how much he wanted to keep tasting Izuku. They had said they would part ways after Izuku’s ankle healed—but could he really let Izuku go again when the time came?

Katsuki was beginning to doubt himself because every time he heard ‘husband, please’ in that sensual voice, his logic was left at the door. His eyes wandered to their matching rings, and this made the unnamed feeling inside of Katsuki feel like it was rotting. He considered this to be because of something Sero told him.

Once upon a time, his worry wart colleague preached that sex was something intimate.

He remembered how Sero went on for an hour about how he and Denki were potentially putting their fucking souls at risk by making so many bonds with random strangers. Sero warned him that one day he would screw around and make a bond that would cause him to be distressed and Katsuki thought he was full of bullshit.

Well, he thought that until right now—because like Izuku said, maybe all it took was the right person.

Potentially, a person who was currently on his back for him, whimpering.

“Ha-Harder!” Izuku cried out for the nth time. “Please, Ka-Kacchan! Deeper! Deeper!”

Beads of sweat were rolling down Katsuki’s back and forehead as he tried to keep up the impossible pace they set. He was driving into Izuku on their bed, rocking the frail piece of furniture into the wall without mercy. He snapped his hips into the smaller man, who was trembling under him. Izuku's wrists were pinned against the mattress as he spread his legs wide.

Katsuki gripped Izuku's wrists tighter when the pleasure built like a firecracker. He gritted his teeth as ripples of overpowering ecstasy stretched through him.

"I-I'm going to cum—" Izuku's words were swallowed by a cry and a gasp.

Fuck. Izuku's moans were so goddamn addictive.

Izuku's body seized up, arching all the way into Katsuki. Ribbons of white cum spilled between them and tiny bits reached Katsuki's lips. He licked the sweet cum up eagerly as he gave several deep rolls of his hips, forcing Izuku to shiver with pleasure once more. The wetness surrounding his cock squeezed him deliciously, drawing his own orgasm out of him.

Katsuki groaned loudly as he buried himself all the way to the hilt and came deep inside of Izuku. He rushed to capture Izuku's lips and he pushed his tongue inside Izuku's mouth, tasting all the bits and pieces of him as he moaned loudly.

They broke apart, panting heavy and still connected in more ways than one.

Twin grins broke across both their faces, and Katsuki could have sworn he was fucking drunk on endorphins.

They laid there, cooling down and Katsuki hadn't moved a bit. He knew he should let Izuku's wrists go, but Izuku seemed perfectly content being captured. But the second the sun caught on the ruby gem on Izuku's finger, Katsuki exhaled roughly.

He let go of his husband's slender wrists and slid out of him to lay beside him. Izuku automatically turned inwards like a magnet being pulled to curl into him. Katsuki wrapped his arms around him and they closed their eyes.

"You've been cooped up here for a while," Katsuki muttered in a groggy voice. He caressed Izuku's curls. "Aren't you getting restless?"

"I'm happy here," Izuku whispered back in a gentle tone without opening his eyes. "We go to your music lessons and the estate is very large. I don't feel cooped up at all."

Katsuki pursed his lips. "What if we go somewhere?"

"Where?"

"Anywhere."

"Kacchan, you have to be a little more specific."

"I don't have anywhere in mind," said Katsuki with a shrug. "But don't you think it would be fun to go to a nice restaurant? We could dress up really fancy and shit. Make it a night out and everything."

Izuku smiled against his skin. “That sounds nice. But your definition of dressing fancy is wearing deeper shades of black.”

Katsuki laughed. “You’re right but it’s a very nice shade of black. You’re underestimating it.”

“Possibly. I think you would look nice in orange though,” Izuku said sleepily. His words dragged slightly as his breathing evened out. “It would pop the color of your eyes. You have really vibrant, red eyes that lean towards orangish. But it’s very subtle…you would miss it if you’re not looking closely.”

“Sounds like you enjoy staring into my eyes, darling.”

“Always.”

A soft snore followed that single word. Katsuki opened his eyes to see Izuku drifting off to sleep while holding on to him. Katsuki’s chest was coated with warmth, and he smiled fully content. He twirled a lock of Izuku’s hair around his finger while studying the various pretty freckles up close.

Orange, huh?

The next day the two of them went to the mall together.

Katsuki didn’t tell Izuku it was because he wanted to try out new clothes, so instead he let it be a surprise. Despite every fucking fiber of his fashion taste telling him to go straight for the dark colored sweaters, Katsuki reached for the oranges and reds. He brought the clothes into the dressing room and tried on one particular orange sweater that hugged his arms nicely.

When he emerged from the dressing room, Izuku’s eyes bulged so wide he thought they were going to pop out. His jaw dropped and he sat all the way up. Katsuki tried his best not to feel ridiculously self-conscious.

“So, what do you think?” Katsuki asked with a knowing grin. He did a full circle turn with his hands up. He shot Izuku a handsome grin and was more than happy to see Izuku flustered and blushing. “I’m guessing you like it.”

“I-It looks great on you,” Izuku complimented in his daze. His eyes refused to leave Katsuki. “You look amazing in orange. You should try out reds too, I think those would look great on you.”

Katsuki’s heart sped up like he was running a marathon at the approval.

He let Izuku pick out a handful of clothes after that.

Soon, he didn’t mind wearing reds and oranges as the weeks passed.

With each passing day, they found something new to do when he didn't have his music class.

The days didn't feel like days anymore. Hours were nothing but laughter. Minutes were crunched down to tiny glances and small kisses. Even the seconds were cradled down to tiny specks in time that were filled with a type of bliss Katsuki never truly imagined was possible.

He had finally felt fulfilled for once in his life, and if he couldn't break the hands on Fate's clock, then he would ignore them and fill the space with as many moments as he could.

The first thing they decided on was going out to a string of nice restaurants. Each day of the week they tried a different genre of food: Seafood. Pasta. Traditional. Vegetarian.

They tasted as many dishes as they could together over candle lit dinners. The romantic lighting made Izuku appear so sweet. His green curls were bouncy, and his doll-like face was so perfectly framed by his hair. Somehow, Izuku appeared to be an entirely different person, or maybe it was just the setting.

Katsuki was having a hard time really telling what the difference was, but damn. Something was different. Izuku's smile was shier recently too and he always wanted to hold his hand, not that Katsuki minded. He held it back just as eagerly and rarely was inclined to let it go.

After that, they settled for touring a couple of the neighboring towns.

By this time, Izuku's ankle was healing properly. They had reached the two month and a half mark, and Izuku was able to put a bit of weight on the injury. Seeing Izuku nearly walk that day in the park under the autumn leaves gave Katsuki a sense of joy, but also anxiety. He wearily stared at their wedding rings as Izuku tested out how much weight he could lean on that leg.

Katsuki's stomach tightened at the sight. He wasn't entirely sure that he liked Izuku healing.

Then another moment they shared was the day they traveled down to Nara.

Katsuki particularly enjoyed this day. He caught a cute photo of Izuku feeding a deer at the same time a small butterfly landed on his nose. It was adorable beyond belief—and it was his new phone background. He did it privately, but he enjoyed the gleeful twinkle in Izuku's face every time he looked at his phone.

Katsuki found himself smiling at his phone a lot, still ignoring all texts and calls.

Three months had passed and the leaves on the trees were the same shade of orange as the dusk sky.

These were now his and Izuku's favorite moments.

They would sit on the porch together and watch the entire landscape slowly become painted in hundreds of shades of orange. The leaves. The sun. The sky. Anything the light touched was basked in the golden radiance, including them. Katsuki would lay his head on Izuku's lap during these still mornings. Tiny hands stroked through his hair as his face slowly warmed up.

He closed his eyes as this happened, enjoying the gradual comfort against his skin.

When he cracked open his eyes, usually he only saw the canopy of trees. However, this day, he opened his eyes and saw Izuku's doll face eclipsing the sun. Behind him were leaves ranging from golden yellow, orange, and bright red. The gentle breeze blew in, sending a perfect chill down both of their bodies.

Emotion filled viridian eyes were gazing down at him, pouring out unspoken affection.

Izuku was mesmerizing, was all Katsuki could really think.

This was truly a sight he could get used to.

"Enjoying your retirement so far?" Izuku asked tenderly.

"More than you could imagine," Katsuki muttered. "This is the most relaxed I've been, ever."

"Good. You deserve it."

How sweet. Katsuki smiled up at Izuku and tilted his head.

He hadn't considered that this potentially was what the rest of his life would be like.

When he gave it some thought, he really did think he could get used to this, if the last three months were any indication of his future. Waking up every day to a damn cute face, listening to Izuku's humming and hearing him giggle over his books. All the kisses and hugs. He could even see himself filling his new room with music sheets as Izuku played his song on the violin in the background—

—Then reality slammed into him.

It was as brutal as a fist to the face and it punched the grin right off his lips.

Izuku's smile faltered briefly, and the wind blew his shirt to show his '217' tattoo. Izuku leaned down and kissed Katsuki's forehead. Then he averted his gaze off to where the sun was slowly pulling itself into the blue sky.

But Katsuki couldn't look away from the tattoo even if he tried.

He attempted to picture his retirement without Izuku—but his mind drew a blank. A very large Izuku shaped blank because he wasn't used to retirement, he was used to Izuku.

That unnamed emotion churning inside of him yelled until white noise filled his ears.

Then it clicked at what it might be—and the thought terrified Katsuki more than any man or monster he ever encountered.

The next day, Katsuki could tell Izuku was slightly anxious.

After drinking his poison, Izuku tested out how well his foot could hold up his weight and he was adjusting his cast every couple of minutes. Katsuki felt frustrated with their circumstances, but most of all he was frustrated with himself. It turned out, ignoring the world didn't stop time no matter how much one begged and pleaded.

He hadn't thought of a plan to keep Izuku here, and he had no idea how to even begin to propose that. But he was officially almost out of borrowed time.

Izuku's ankle was nearly healed, and Katsuki was considering breaking it again.

Katsuki had gone to sleep that night wondering, what were they going to do once the cast was off?

He had never liked anyone before and had them like him back. He was plagued by thoughts regarding what Koizumi had revealed before he slit his throat. There was not a chance in hell Katsuki could let Izuku go back to whatever fucking academy he was raised in.

Izuku was trafficked. Fucking trafficked and forced into this type of goddamn life—just like Katsuki in a sense. They both had normal lives robbed from them in different ways, and he felt weirdly connected with Izuku—more than he already did—because of it. Izuku was just like him. He wasn't supposed to be dripping in red either, yet here they were, both with enough unspeakable sins to fill a graveyard.

As he watched Izuku drift peacefully off to sleep that night, Katsuki decided that he needed to figure something out.

He didn't know what yet, but he would figure it out.

The following day Izuku was patiently watching the TV as he waited for Katsuki to round the corner. He had been told to sit still and wait for a surprise that Katsuki put together, and in the back of the estate Katsuki bustled around, trying his best to ignore everything until he possibly could.

"Kacchan?" Izuku called out impatiently. "What are you doing back there?"

"Just sit tight will ya," Katsuki grumbled. "I'll be out in a minute!"

Katsuki huffed and fixed his burnt orange turtleneck. He leaned over the cake that was in front of him. He double checked it again, making sure it was the exact order he asked the bakery for. It was a three-tier vanilla cake with strawberries and chocolate drizzled along the sides. The various layers had different types of cookie crumbles spread across the tops.

It all appeared really fucking delicious, but Katsuki's favorite part was the frosting writing that read 'Happy birthday, Izuku!'. Katsuki grinned and picked up the cake. He walked into the kitchen extremely slowly, balancing the heavy pastry with expert agility.

“Happy birthday, you fucking nerd,” Katsuki announced with a lopsided smirk.

Izuku whipped his head around and a small, baffled grunt caught in his throat. Katsuki held up the cake and Izuku nearly fell out of his chair from confusion.

“B-Birthday?” Izuku parroted. His nose scrunched and his hands curled into himself. “Kacchan, it’s November. My birthday is in July.”

Katsuki chuckled, amused and ignored the comment. He sat down the cake carefully in front of the bewildered man. Then he quickly reached behind him and exposed the bright green sash that read ‘Happy Birth!’ in big, white lettering.

“Yeah, yeah, I know when your damn birthday is,” Katsuki quipped. “In case you forgot, we have celebrated it before, and I have a decent memory sometimes.” He pulled the sash over Izuku’s head, watching how the other man fidgeted in the chair. “Now we get to have a second celebration together.”

Big, green eyes kept darting between him, the cake, and the sash.

“B-But why?” Izuku questioned, unsure. He stared at the cake like it shouldn’t be meant for him. “I don’t really understand why you’re—wh-why you’re doing all of this suddenly.”

Because I want to make you smile while I have time.

Because I want you to enjoy your rest here.

Because maybe I want you to stay.

“Because on your bucket list you wrote ‘have a birthday party’,” Katsuki reminded him, ignoring the way his heart was constricting. He took out a single candle from his pocket and a lighter. He lifted up the two items before sticking the candle on top of the cake. “I know it’s not the right day, but I figured this is the least I can do to make up for Tokyo. It was the last thing on your bucket list. We officially completed it.”

Katsuki lit the candle.

He turned to Izuku, and his grin was wiped off his face. Glassy green eyes stared at him, with tears threatening to fall.

“What are you crying for?” Katsuki asked as gently as he could. He sat down quickly, worried that he had pushed this too far. “Is this too much?”

“Sorry,” Izuku sobbed slightly. He pressed his palms into his eyes and shook his head. “I-I’m sorry I didn’t mean to cry. I-I love everything.” Izuku removed his hands and stared at Katsuki once more. Emotion overcame him as he saw everything he ever wanted laying in front of him. “You got the cake I like, the sash, a-and—” Izuku hiccuped lightly. He wiped away more tears furiously. “You got me everything I-I put on my dumb list.”

Katsuki reached and grabbed Izuku's hands. "Of course I did. Now, blow out your candle and make a wish—that is, if you have one. Do you have something to wish for this time around?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku's smile was fragile again, threatening to fall and shatter. "I do have a wish this time."

Izuku breathed in and blew out the candle with an unreadable expression.

Katsuki hoped Izuku's wish was to stay.

Katsuki smiled and clapped lightly, and cheered, making Izuku laugh with a blush on his face. They cut the cake together, and Katsuki made sure to give Izuku the biggest piece he could possibly eat in one sitting. Music played in the background and two tiny birds chirped from the windowsill.

The day was running smoothly so far, and it perfectly led into Katsuki's phase two of the birthday party: presents.

He wandered into the bedroom and pulled out a box decorated in royal blue wrapping paper. There was a large red bow on it and a small tag that read 'For: Bakugou Izuku' in marker. He retrieved it from their shared closet on his side.

When he brought it out into the kitchen, excitement was visibly tingling all over Izuku's body. The other man clasped his hands together patiently and smiled with all his pearly white teeth.

Katsuki handed the box to Izuku, and the birthday man ripped it open.

"Books?" Izuku gasped. "Oh! Romance books!"

"Yup. By the same author of that really old one you carry around," Katsuki pointed out. He proudly leaned back as Izuku's eyes sparked to life. "Turns out they have a lot of new series out. I figured you've been too busy to ever look into the newer stories, but I got you all the recent ones so you can have a big ol' nerdy field day."

"This is exactly what I wanted." Izuku cried more, but this time he was smiling. "Thank you so much, Kacchan. Ah, I can't wait to read these. I-Is it okay if I look through a couple of them now? Just too skim!" The excitement in his voice was palpable.

"Go crazy, darling," Katsuki encouraged.

Izuku squealed slightly and began thumbing through all the fresh pages.

Katsuki watched him as he did this, and the rest of the morning was spent listening to Izuku geek out. Katsuki propped his chin on his fist as he observed Izuku in his natural habitat.

The way Izuku's eyes were full of nothing but joy was something to behold. Protect, even. Katsuki hung on to his every word as Izuku explained the intricacies of the older book's plot that he really couldn't exactly follow without reading himself, but Izuku was having fun explaining it to him.

But as he watched Izuku be, well, Izuku, Katsuki's chest hurt once more. That unnamed feeling he feared he finally identified returned tenfold. It made him worry. Katsuki glanced outside at the window at the autumn leaves and sucked in a deep breath.

"Izuku," Katsuki interrupted. Izuku perked up, nose out of one of the novels. "In your romance books, how did the characters know they were in love?"

"Ah, it happens gradually," Izuku answered easily. He drew invisible circles on the table as he smiled. "There's never a moment where the character declares they start loving the other person. They slowly start to realize little things or cues as they fall progressively in love."

Katsuki's leg jittered. "Tell me. What are the cues?"

"How come?" Izuku questioned innocently. "Are you interested in the books now too?"

"Something like that," Katsuki murmured. He leaned in close to Izuku and gave him his full attention. "Maybe I was wrong about romance being bullshit and all. The bit of the book I did read was really great and we had a lot of fun afterward, hm? Maybe I need to be more open minded."

Izuku grinned wide, and his eyes filled with admiration. He held up the new set of books in his hands like he was a professor ready to give a speech in class.

"Well, usually the first sign is their heart speeds up around the other person."

Check.

"Then they look at the person in a new light. Almost like viewing them for the first time and how they can fit in their life in ways they didn't consider before."

Double check.

"And when they touch, they don't want to let go of them."

Triple check.

"Then finally, they can't imagine their life without them."

And that was the final confirmation Katsuki needed to realize what he feared: he was undeniably in love with Izuku.

Katsuki nodded, forcing his smile to remain taut on his face. "Thank you. That was helpful."

"Of course!" Izuku giggled. He hugged one of his books in a way that helped none of the hurting in Katsuki's chest. "If you want to talk more about the books, let me know. Maybe we can even read them together. You have a great read out loud voice."

"I might take you up on that offer, darling."

Katsuki smiled and so did Izuku.

Izuku eventually went back to his books, beginning to read the start of one. They moved from the kitchen area to the den. Izuku laid comfortably in his lap and Katsuki held him close the whole time. They draped a fluffy blanket over their bodies to counter the autumn chill in the air.

Katsuki tried to casually watch TV as Izuku read in his arms, but his mind couldn't budge. It was stuck on a single fact:

He was in love with Izuku.

His heart and head hammered in sync, finally on the same page with something. With a deep look of sorrowful longing, Katsuki watched how Izuku flipped through page after page. The nerd was far too deep in geeking out to notice Katsuki's inner turmoil that was burning like coals against his core.

It always has been Izuku, hasn't it? Katsuki thought curiously.

As kids, it was him. In Vienna, it was him. In Taiwan, it was him. As rivals, it was him. After his mother's death, it was him who distracted him well enough to live on. Somehow in Okinawa, it was him teaching him how to be soft. Even now, here in the small town of Biei—it was him who Katsuki wanted to spend all his time with.

All roads led to Izuku.

Ask him to stay, his reasoning suggested. He likes it here. He should stay where he's happy.

Katsuki nervously toyed with his ring. He cleared his throat and reached to take one of Izuku's hands. He noted how much smaller it was than his but still scarred the same.

Izuku stopped reading and glanced up at him. Katsuki searched Izuku's eyes and then his own heart for how to say what he needed to say.

However, before he could speak a word, abrupt violent banging on his door occurred.

Both Izuku and Katsuki's heads whipped at the sudden sound and the banging grew louder and louder until it nearly sounded like the door cracked under pressure.

Chapter 16 — Grave

"Bakugou!" The last voice he thought he would fucking hear shouted through the door. "Bakugou, I saw your stupid ass hair's silhouette in the window. Open up, otherwise we're kicking this door down!"

"Shit," Katsuki hissed. "Shit. Shit. Shit."

He scrambled upright and Izuku did too.

Izuku stared at him confused, searching for an answer to what was happening.

"I know you hear me!" Monoma yelled again, a lot angrier. "You're going to open up on the count of ten and I am dragging you back to HQ if it's the last thing I do. I am tired of cleaning up your mess!"

"Who is that?" Izuku harshly whispered.

Damnit. This was not an intrusion Katsuki planned upon.

He stared around at the scene in front of him and it was a mess. He tried his best to focus through the horrible banging that was in tandem with his drumming headache. Then the force Monoma was using grew more violent and Izuku clutched his book against his chest.

Shit.

Izuku.

“One,” Monoma started off. “Two—”

Katsuki shot up, grabbed Izuku and hoisted him in his arms. He didn’t listen to the small protest that was given to him when Izuku dropped his book.

“What are you doing?!” Izuku yelped.

“Hiding you,” Katsuki answered hastily.

His anxiety grew with every passing second Monoma counted. Katsuki quickly ran for the bedroom, and he went straight for the closet.

“Hiding me? Why are you hiding me?” Izuku questioned. His eyes were wide with bewilderment.

Katsuki swiftly opened the closet with his foot and dropped Izuku inside on the ground.

“Because—”

“—Five!” Monoma yelled impatiently. “Six!”

“Fuck,” Katsuki groaned. He scattered and grabbed two fist full of clothes off their hangers. He rapidly tossed them on top of Izuku in a poor attempt to conceal him. “I’ll explain later once I get them to go away. Stay here and don’t let them see you under any circumstance, okay?”

Izuku had a sock on top of his head, staring at him like he was crazy. “I can’t meet your coworkers?”

“—Eight!” Monoma called again. “You’re about to have to replace your door, Bakugou!”

Katsuki made a pained face. “No, you can’t meet this one. He isn’t exactly friendly.”

“Nine!” Monoma’s voice was close to shrill.

Izuku nodded quickly and fell in line. He grabbed a bunch of sweaters off their hangers and began piling them on himself until he was fully invisible to the untrained eye.

Once Izuku was simply a pile of sloppily organized clothes, Katsuki hauled off and ran towards the door. He cursed under his breath when he heard the sound of wood cracking.

“Ten!” Monoma screamed.

Katsuki opened the door in the nick of time and Monoma swung his leg into nothing.

The sheer force Monoma used cut through the air and created the sound of a whistle. Katsuki swiftly dodged the hit, thankful as all hell he did because the other blond’s strength really was his best quality as a hitman.

Slowly, Monoma recoiled and gritted his teeth and stood still.

Standing there waiting for him were Shinsou and Monoma, wearing polar opposite expressions. Both were dressed in normal attire, wrapped in scarves and early fall clothing. Monoma folded his arms and Shinsou gave a friendly wave.

“Well,” Katsuki said first, ignoring the heated glare being thrown at him. “Long time no see.”

“Keep your smart-ass remarks to yourself,” Monoma snapped. He pushed past Katsuki and marched into his home, bumping his shoulder along the way. “I’m so sick of you.”

Katsuki held back the insult he wanted to blurt out. The other blond walked into the open space of the living room and connected kitchen. He looked around suspiciously.

“Nice to see you’re well, Bakugou,” Shinsou greeted with a smirk. He walked in as well with relaxed posture and kindly patted Katsuki’s shoulder on the way in. “Glad to know you’re in one piece and not missing.”

“Yes, I’m perfectly fine,” Katsuki said a little testily. “How did you get my address?”

“You gave Aizawa the address to the estate after you inherited this place,” Shinsou reminded him. “He sent us to check on you while he’s busy managing.”

“We don’t want to be here either, trust me,” Monoma grumbled. He whirled on Katsuki with heated periwinkle eyes that might as well have been set on fire. “But you decided you don’t need to answer calls and now Aizawa is worried sick about you—which means he’s been worrying us sick. I could throw up looking at you right now.”

Katsuki scoffed at the melodrama and rolled his eyes.

“What Monoma is trying to say is you really left us all hanging,” Shinsou smoothed over. “It’s been three and half months since anyone has heard from you, and you never came back to wrap up. Y’know, to actually go into retirement you need to, oh…I dunno, retire?”

“I said I would do it once I’m set up,” Katsuki deflected.

“You look very well set up,” Monoma huffed. “What are you stalling for?”

“…Comfortability,” Katsuki half lied. “The estate needed time to get put together.”

Shinsou cocked his head and Monoma didn't seem like he believed a damn word. The other blond turned to survey the room and Katsuki spiked with nerves. He checked around and mentally cursed at the mess that was everywhere. It could pass as him living here alone but it could also pass as two people.

Then Monoma's eyes zoomed in on Izuku's book that was dropped on the ground.

"A book?" Monoma questioned. He picked up the novel by its corner and held it like it was infected with disease. "When have you ever read a book?"

"It's a new habit I'm picking up to stay literate," Katsuki shot back. He stalked up to Monoma and snatched the item from his coworker's grubby hands. "Look, you two can leave. Let the old man know I'm fucking fine. The Okinawa assignment took a lot out of me, and I wanted some time to myself."

"Trust me, I would love to do that, but Aizawa has his foot down our throats," Monoma explained. He flicked his wrist and kicked the blanket out of the way. "Where's your bathroom? I've been holding it in for hours trying to get to this town. It's a nice location, very far out of the way."

Katsuki ignored the sarcasm and pointed behind him. "Bathroom is the second door."

Monoma grunted and waddled off, unbuckling his belt as he went. When he rounded the corner, Shinsou was still standing near the doorway. He interrogatively glanced around as if he was trying to commit every detail to memory.

When Shinsou drew a little too close to the couch, Katsuki peeked his eyes downwards. He was happy he did because he saw a lone pair of frilly underwear discarded on the ground. He quickly kicked the garments under the couch before his colleague could notice.

Shinsou's eyes snapped towards him at the motion, and Katsuki played it off by stretching out his leg.

"Sorry," Katsuki awkwardly muttered. He stretched out the other leg in the same fashion. "Haven't moved around much all day. Need to get the joints greased up."

Shinsou's sharp eyes stared at him, giving no indication of emotions. Instead of entertaining Katsuki's strangeness, Shinsou jutted his chin at the dining table.

"Cake?" Shinsou questioned. "Since when did you have a sweet tooth?"

"I recently developed one," Katsuki fluidly answered.

"Interesting," Shinsou said slowly. He walked around the table and looked at the dirty dishes in the sink. He picked up one plate, and then cut his eye towards Katsuki. "Did you also recently develop a liking for the color orange too? I thought you only owned black."

"It's a good fall color. I wanted to try something new."

Shinsou put down the plate. "You're not here alone. Are you?"

Katsuki stiffened. He crossed his arms and pulled the corners of his mouth down into an intimidating scowl in an attempt to hide the truth. “Why do you think that?”

Shinsou raised a brow and tapped the side of his own neck.

Katsuki was confused until he mirrored the motion. When he touched his neck he realized that part of his skin was tender. He froze underneath the smirk that was slowly blooming on his colleague’s face.

Fuck. Izuku had left a hickey along his jaw last night.

Katsuki’s face grew redder by the passing second, and he pulled his turtleneck higher.

Shinsou’s smirk became smugger at every moment Katsuki floundered. He approached Katsuki with a stride that was arrogant like he had cracked some sort of difficult code. But despite his teasing nature, there was a subtle, unspoken kinship in his dark purple eyes.

“I get where you’re coming from if you want some…down time,” Shinsou said knowingly. “But it would be nice to come back to HQ and let everyone see you, don’t you think? One last goodbye. Aizawa won’t say it out loud, but he misses you. Put the old man out of his misery.”

“You’re right,” Katsuki said with a defeated sigh. “I guess I’ll come and close out as soon as possible.”

“Preferably today. Aizawa was convinced someone harmed you.”

“Who would harm me?” Katsuki’s face twisted in confusion.

“Oh, you know how he is,” Shinsou said nonchalantly. “He thought it might be Chizome, or even that mystery assassin you kept running into, the one you nicknamed ‘Deku.’ Aizawa showed everyone on the squad his picture by the way. He doesn’t look at all like I was expecting him to with how you described him.”

All the color drained from Katsuki’s face. “He showed a picture of Deku to M-Unit…?”

“Yeah, he wanted everyone to be aware. Mainly because you’re retiring, he even gave official kill orders to the rest of the unit.”

Katsuki swallowed. “Is a kill order really necessary since I’m not working anymore?”

Shinsou gave a hearty laugh. “Good one, Bakugou. It’s for the best, overall. He’s extremely dangerous from what Aizawa says and we don’t need some mystery assassin potentially up ending our assignments anymore. Plus, who is to say he doesn’t have kill orders on you too?”

Katsuki’s fists tightened while he restrained his face from showing any emotion. “Did Aizawa figure out his name?”

“No. Aizawa can’t locate his name, only a photo and some vague details but, that’s enough talk about him.” Shinsou’s grin spread wide. “Who’s the lucky guy you’ve been cozied up with here? I can smell the honeymoon phase all over you—”

A loud crash interrupted their conversation and several gunshots.

Pumped full of immediate adrenaline, both Katsuki and Shinsou whipped their heads towards the violent disruption. Which erupted directly from the hallway with the bathroom and bedroom. Katsuki’s stomach dropped into a pit of despair within mere seconds. Then his worst nightmare came true when Izuku and Monoma stumbled out, viciously fighting each other.

Before anyone could make a move, Monoma whirled Izuku and hurled the smaller man to the ground with all his strength. Izuku winced, ankle cracking upon impact and he bit his lip as pain snapped through his body. Wasting no moment though, he scrambled to dodge two bullets that were shot at him.

Several things then happened at once.

Shinsou drew his gun, pointing it at Izuku. Izuku scrambled backwards on the floor, leg clearly damaged again and throbbing. Monoma reloaded and took aim once more—and placed his gun directly on Izuku’s forehead.

Then Katsuki bum rushed Monoma and brutally elbowed him in the face.

Shinsou’s eyes widened, and he was stunned into paralysis.

The bullets meant for Izuku’s skull whizzed past him and sank into the couch instead. Monoma groaned in pain as his head was snapped backwards by the inordinate force used. Blood splattered, but that didn’t stop Katsuki as he promptly disarmed Monoma and kicked him backwards on the ground. He finished reloading the gun and pointed it directly at Shinsou as he stood between Izuku and Shinsou’s line of fire.

Monoma and Shinsou both stared at Katsuki in horror.

“What are you doing, Bakugou?!” Monoma yelled furiously. He cupped his now broken nose, attempting to halt the profuse bleeding. “I found him hiding in your closet—”

“—And what were you doing in my goddamn bedroom?” Katsuki snapped. He walked back, stationing his body directly in front of Izuku on the ground. He didn’t take his sight off Shinsou who never lowered his gun away from Izuku. “You said you needed to use the bathroom.”

“I heard someone try to suppress a sneeze,” Monoma hissed and staggered upright. “And it turned out to be him! He’s trying to kill you—”

“—He’s not.” Katsuki cocked the gun. “He’s harmless.”

The tension in the room prickled like needles. Each stab punctured the four hitmen, and the pressure was suffocating as everyone surveyed each other. Monoma and Shinsou stood side by side in disbelief as Izuku slowly sat up on his hunches, entirely protected by Katsuki.

“Harmless?” Shinsou parroted cynically. “This is the same guy you said you would gladly torture if you got the chance. You even detailed how you would skin him alive and tear off his fingernails. Move aside so we can get this over with.”

“No. Back off.” Katsuki gritted his teeth and toyed with the trigger. “Point that gun elsewhere. Now. I’ll explain once you calm down.”

“You can’t be serious.” Shinsou tried to reason, not budging an inch. “Listen to me. This is clearly some type of ploy to kill you—”

“I said point the gun elsewhere,” Katsuki venomously warned.

“And I’ll dance right fucking over it in the next second if you don’t put your gun down.”

Silence stunned the room.

All eyes, including Izuku’s, were staring wide at Katsuki. But only one set of eyes was perceiving Katsuki with terrible realization.

Monoma’s gaze flickered from Katsuki to Izuku then back and forth again. Then slowly he narrowed in on the bruise along Katsuki’s jaw line, and the several on Izuku’s. He surveyed the living room, the fluffy blanket and the two cups on the coffee table. Then he glanced at the kitchen behind him towards the cake and the two dirty plates in the sink.

It came together quickly, and Monoma’s shoulders sagged. He sighed and grabbed the barrel of Shinsou’s gun. He slowly lowered it for his friend, who was now giving him a perplexed stare.

“They’re fucking,” Monoma said. He turned to Katsuki and looked him dead in the eye. “Aren’t you?”

Izuku wearily stared up at Katsuki and Katsuki wearily stared down at Izuku. Neither of them spoke, but their eyes translated a thousand sentences.

“Oh. You’ve got to be kidding me,” Monoma exasperated when he saw the lovesick stares Izuku and Katsuki were giving each other. He groaned and threw his head back. “You’re more than fucking. Of course. Nothing is ever simple with you.”

Shinsou was mortified. “Bakugou. Is that true?”

Katsuki lowered his gun and quietly helped Izuku off the floor. Izuku whimpered a little, lifting his ankle off the ground and leaned all the way into Katsuki. The pair exchanged long stares and Katsuki knew they screwed up on more than one count. But he was too far in to turn back now.

He wrapped his arm around Izuku’s midriff to balance him and turned back to his colleagues.

“We’re involved, yes.”

Monoma flew a hand up and turned around. Shinsou stared at him like he had grown a second head.

“This is debauched,” Shinsou accused. “You’re seriously trusting your dick to the guy who has tried to kill you for eight years?”

I married him, technically. Katsuki thought sarcastically. “He never tried to really kill me, and we’re officially done with all of that. Things between us are…complicated.”

“Cursed,” Monoma corrected. “Things between you are cursed.” He walked into the kitchen and shoved paper towels up his nostrils to collect the blood. “And what about Aizawa? Did you even stop and consider what would happen if he found out about this match made in hell? He’s going to beat your ass.”

It isn’t any of Aizawa’s damn business, is what Katsuki wanted to say. He was only alive right now because of Izuku’s kindness so long ago, and he would never hurt Izuku now that he knew who he was.

“This is why I haven’t called to check in,” Katsuki explained. “Him and I have figured out some stuff between us. It’s a lot to explain but Aizawa will understand once I tell it all.”

“No, Bakugou. He won’t.” This time Shinsou spoke. The look of eerie caution in his eyes was ignited high. “Aizawa understands a lot of things, but this—” He angrily waved his hand at Izuku. “—Will not be one of them. You weren’t there when he gave out the kill orders. Aizawa wants this pest dead for some other reason that he said he can’t disclose. This is no longer an issue between the two of you, it’s a company issue. Plus, he killed Rin Hiryu. How could you forgive him for that?”

Izuku stiffened. His defenses were through the roof. He was poised in a way that was partially behind Katsuki and his hand was curled into a fist, ready to strike.

“I’ll make him understand,” Katsuki said a bit too desperately. He held on to Izuku harder. “Once I explain it to him—”

“—If you explain anything to Aizawa, he will kill your homicidal boyfriend,” Monoma quipped. He wasn’t looking at any of them as he leaned over the sink. His shoulders crept up to his neck and he gripped the counter until his hands were white. “…Are you happy, Bakugou?”

No one expected the question.

Katsuki recoiled, and Shinsou turned his head towards Monoma at the strangeness. Izuku was wearily looking at Katsuki. Underneath the curious stare of those green eyes, Katsuki decided to let the answer roll off his tongue—consequences be damned.

“Yes. The happiest I’ve ever been.”

Monoma nodded silently. He strummed his fingers.

“Then you will keep this a secret,” Monoma forced himself to say. He turned around with an expression Katsuki had never seen woven on his features: understanding. However, he cut his eyes towards Izuku with intense distrust. “And we will keep this to ourselves too. If this shit runs into the ground then so be it, that’s your mess to clean up. But otherwise, this whole fiasco between the four of us never occurred.”

“What?” Shinsou hissed. He whirled on his companion, face twisting in anger. “Have you lost your goddamn mind? We’re not keeping this a secret from Aizawa—”

“Yes. We are.” Monoma shot a challenging glare.

The two best friends were matched in a grid lock.

Katsuki stared on in wonder because he hadn’t expected it to be fucking Monoma that would somehow take his side in this. But there it was, Monoma glaring down Shinsou in a silent promise of violence if he spoke a word about what they knew.

Monsters recognized monsters—but maybe monsters also pitied each other?

Monoma walked up to Shinsou with his shoulders squared out. There, Katsuki could see the years of trust between them shake like a mountain that was supposed to be unmovable. Then quietly, Monoma’s face gave a raw expression Katsuki had also never seen.

“Let him be happy,” Monoma murmured, nearly inaudible.

It was almost a plea—but not quite. It was said to be as close to begging as Monoma could get and was tinted with some disgust. Whatever the tone, Katsuki was grateful as all hell for it. He didn’t even realize his heart was hammering until that second, and he could feel Izuku’s vibrating pulse on him as well.

Gradually, Shinsou gave in. But only barely.

It was easy to tell that Shinsou had his doubts but above all unease when he stared at Izuku.

“Fine,” Shinsou agreed without looking at anyone. He pushed his gun back in his holster and folded his arms, fuming. “If this goes wrong—which it will—don’t fucking come to us about it, Bakugou. We can keep this a secret between us on one condition: you’re coming back with us tonight to HQ. You’re going to close out immediately.”

“Okay. I’ll come with you,” Katsuki agreed.

“We’ll be waiting on the porch,” Monoma said. He began to push Shinsou by the shoulder towards the door. “Take all the time you need.”

The two left, leaving Izuku and Katsuki alone.

Izuku relaxed, finally uncurling his fist. Katsuki sagged his shoulders and shook his head. He stared down at Izuku’s ankle. Fuck. The injury was clearly throbbing underneath the aggravation of being violently tossed. Izuku was staring at it as well.

“C’mon, let’s get that fixed up before I go,” Katsuki whispered. He lifted Izuku in his arms with regret heavy on his mind. “Sorry he threw you like that.”

Izuku didn’t reply. His eyes were glazed over and turned down and away from him.

This was a bigger mess than Katsuki ever thought it might be.

Katsuki quietly packed a backpack with all the things he needed for an overnight trip. Cellphone. Keys. Extra pair of clothes. His knife and personal handgun. He neatly organized his company’s given suitcase and briefcase with all the borrowed equipment. When he clicked it shut it was odd: all these years, finally coming to an end.

He took off his ring for good measure and placed it on the dresser. Katsuki nearly laughed at the small indent on his skin. Who knew he would keep that thing on for this long?

He glanced up at Izuku across the bed. His accidental husband was sitting neatly on top of the covers, still wearing his birthday sash and fiddling nervously with his own wedding band.

“Will you be okay by yourself?” Katsuki asked as he put on his leather jacket.

“I will,” Izuku said with the saddest smile. He was staring at Katsuki with a type of sorrow that made him worry. He glanced at the emerald ring on the dresser and bit his lip. “I didn’t know I caused you so much trouble. I’m sorry.”

“Don’t worry about it,” Katsuki reassured. He walked around the bed to sit next to Izuku. He placed his hand on top of Izuku’s and squeezed it. “Those assholes will get over it and what my supervisor doesn’t know won’t hurt him. I’ll get the kill order stuff sorted out too.”

Izuku’s face faltered. He pinned up a forced smile in the next moment.

“Okay, Kacchan.”

Katsuki boarded the next train with Monoma and Shinsou. He was unsure about leaving Izuku alone for some reason, but he departed with high hopes that all would be fine.

The three colleagues sat together on the train. Shinsou was trying to meditate his headache away as he texted Aizawa they were on the way back. Katsuki had his arms folded in mild annoyance. Monoma was still attending to his throbbing nose.

“Do you two think you could possibly get Aizawa to lighten up on the kill orders?” Katsuki asked quietly. “If possible, ask him to somehow get rid of them without being suspicious.”

Monoma exhaled roughly through his injured nose.

Shinsou pretended like he didn’t hear him.

“I’ll get something sorted out,” Monoma said tiredly. “I’ll figure out a way to convince Aizawa for you, but I can’t promise it will be instantaneous. So, in the meantime keep an eye on that boyfriend of yours so that he doesn’t get shot while I’m trying to get the order called off.”

“Thank you,” Katsuki said. He nodded gratefully towards the other blond. “That means a lot and sorry about busting your nose. What are you going to tell Aizawa about that by the way?”

“Easy. I’ll tell him you hit me,” Monoma muttered. “I’ll explain how you lost your temper after I said you’re ugly in orange and you slapped me in the face.”

Katsuki frowned. He looked down to his orange turtleneck. “I do not look ugly in orange.”

“And who told you that?”

“I think you know who,” Katsuki grumbled. “As long as he thinks I look nice I don’t need anyone else’s approval.”

“Shut up, Bakugou,” Shinsou rolled his eyes and pressed his forehead further into the window’s glass. “Please. Shut up for the remainder of this train ride. I’m trying very, very hard right now not to haul off and shoot you in the dick for thinking with it.”

Monoma cracked an amused smirk. “Does this mean these last few years have been foreplay for the big event?”

Katsuki did a ‘so-so’ motion with his hands. “Very close.”

When they arrived back at headquarters it was exactly how Katsuki remembered it to be. It nearly felt like a lifetime ago with how much had happened.

Shinsou and Monoma dragged him inside and directly towards their section of HQ. He was expecting this to be quick and could practically feel Aizawa snatching The Company property right out of his hands and telling him to leave.

However, when they arrived Katsuki was taken off guard. They stopped in front of the biggest conference room on the floor, and it was eerily quiet. Not a soul was in sight, and it was pitch black.

“Are you two setting me up?” Katsuki accused. “Where the fuck is Aizawa?”

Shinsou, clearly down to his last drop of patience, walked into the conference room and flicked on the lights.

“Surprise!” A chorus of voices yelled at maximum volume.

The jump scare nearly made Katsuki have a heart attack. He stumbled back and his eyes took forever to adjust to the blinding fucking lights that flooded everywhere. He blinked rapidly, attempting to shade his vision with his hands.

When his eyes finally refocused he saw everyone who he worked with closely standing around. They had big, goofy grins painted on their faces. The entire room was overly decorated with red, yellow and blue streamers and balloons. On the white board was "Goodbye and Good luck, Bakugou!" in Denki's sloppy penmanship. Next to that was a long table with various types of foods and drinks stationed around.

M-Unit was front and center with Aizawa and Miruko, jumping up and down. In the back were a couple other people he passed the time with smiling and waving at him.

Katsuki scratched at the back of his head, slightly flustered. He walked in slowly with Monoma by his side, who was giving his signature shit eating smirk.

"Surprise, you bastard," Monoma laughed. He knocked him in the shoulder and went straight for the alcohol. Monoma pointed his finger at Aizawa accompanied with a sharp glare. "You owe me six weeks' vacation for dragging this lunatic all the way back here."

Confetti was then tossed on Katsuki by Miruko and Denki who were shouting eagerly.

Aizawa, with a stale face, blew into a party blower that made an obnoxiously loud sound. "Hurray. You're done."

Katsuki was dumbfounded. "You all threw me a surprise party?"

"Yes." Sero laughed as he joined in throwing more confetti with Denki and Miruko. "One that we have been planning for you for almost four months now! I didn't think it would take sending scary serial killers one and two over here to drag your ass back to us. But I'm glad it worked."

"Are you wearing orange?" Miruko gasped.

Katsuki's face grew hot when everyone gasped. He cleared his throat and smoothed out his turtleneck. "Yes. I'm…I'm trying out new colors. Does it look nice?"

"You look like a grumpy tangerine," Denki chuckled.

Katsuki blushed and scowled. "Fuck off, Pikachu."

"Missed you too, cranky," Denki teased.

Everyone gestured for him to get food and slowly the night blended away.

Throughout the whole party Katsuki talked to people he knew and some he didn't. He had never suspected he had impacted this many individuals for them to show up for him, but there they were.

Aizawa and him officially closed out. His supervisor brought all the paperwork to the party with a fresh, crisp scarlet pen. Everyone watched and cheered as Katsuki signed the last of his contract. It wasn't really much to consent on. Simply stating he understood that if he ever spoke a word about what occurred in the last decade, he would be granted death.

Katsuki grinned, feeling very lucky at that moment. He signed his name happily on the dotted line.

Riotous roars and party favors were jeered, creating the loudest sound to declare he was done. Katsuki grinned until his face felt numb and he sipped on his drink more.

All the commotion died down, and people began to talk amongst themselves.

Katsuki watched silently as he observed the life he officially was done with. Miruko was chatting it up with Denki and a couple people from her own unit. Shinsou was stationed off to the side, effectively becoming a wallflower but giving him a quiet, unimpressed stare. Monoma was chatting with his girlfriend who was tempting Sero to come join her in karaoke after hours.

And Aizawa was standing off to the side, swirling his glass of liquor. His now ex-supervisor was dressed in his crisp black and white suit with no tie. He came off as tired, with shoulders heavier than gravity. He pushed back a single gray strand of hair, and somehow he seemed older than he was.

Katsuki glanced over his shoulder before walking over towards Aizawa.

"Hey, can I talk to you about something?" Katsuki whispered once he was close enough.

Aizawa lifted his tired eyes to him. "Sure, what is it?"

"Hypothetically, let's say someone who is in our profession needs to disappear permanently."

He probably should've worded that better because immediately Aizawa was disgruntled. His ex-boss sighed heavily, stood up straight, and downed the whole of his drink in one swig.

"Let me start over," Katsuki said quickly before Aizawa could interject. "I know that hitmen need to go underground after shit hits the fan sometimes. Once, I saw you help a woman, and you gave her some type of black folder with instructions. I want to know how to get a hold of this information."

"Are you trying to disappear?" Aizawa whispered wearily. He glanced around and pulled Katsuki further into the corner. "Is this about Chizome? Did something happen?"

"No, this is definitely not about that bastard," Katsuki snapped, irritated. His unbridled anger boiled a bit, and nearly escaped him. He willed his rage back down and tried to refocus. "This is something different. If someone who has a very bloody, complicated past needed to get away without a trace, how would that happen?"

"They would need to locate someone who is very good at doing that."

“And who is that someone?”

“My old black folders have all the information,” Aizawa said quietly. He tilted his head and glared at Katsuki. “Enough with the weird code speak. Is this pertaining to the Okinawa assignment because I thought that ended strangely. Do you need assistance in something? Because I won’t mind helping if this is the last thing to get you done.”

Aizawa’s face grew stale. “You don’t have any other friends besides the questionable morons in this room.”

Katsuki bristled at how that wasn’t exactly false. “Could you get the information? Please?”

“I can get it for you,” Aizawa said suspiciously. “I will admit, it has been a while since anyone from The Company needed to disappear and the information I have might be outdated. But it can give you a good starting point and I think you can figure out where to go after tracking some patterns. I’ll need to go back to my office and grab a few things. Finding a copy of those black folders might take a while, so don’t wait up. If you need to leave for the train I will have it delivered to your address.”

Katsuki nodded happily. This was good.

This was Izuku’s out.

“What are you two doing over here whispering in the corner?” Miruko poked at them. She walked up to both of them with a beaming grin and shoulder bumped Aizawa. “I can see the rain clouds over both of your heads, come back out to society and lighten up.”

Katsuki laughed and Aizawa dryly chuckled.

They returned to the party, and everyone began taking Company photos and telling stories of Katsuki’s time there. In the midst of everyone’s celebration, Katsuki turned to look at Aizawa. He caught his ex-supervisor staring at the message on the white board.

There was a sadness in his eyes as he read the word 'Goodbye’.

After the going away party, Katsuki felt extremely light. He also felt sorrowful in an unjustified manner.

It was surreal. No more Sero pining for Denki. No more Shinsou and Monoma being the creepy duo together. No more Aizawa getting irritated at them. No more watching people get scolded by Aizawa and Miruko. No more everyone blending together as one.

He was actually finished with his side of his life.

Katsuki kicked a balloon as he walked around the empty conference room. He took out his favorite blade and it felt lighter and looked different in the lighting of his new life. Katsuki turned over the handle to stare at where he had etched his mother's name.

A dullness raked through him at the sight of the letters.

"You're still here?" Aizawa's voice suddenly came through. "It's almost midnight. You'll miss the last train out."

Katsuki glanced towards the door, surprised to find his ex-supervisor there. The elder man was leaning against the doorframe with a black envelope in his hands. He stared at the party streamers that were still perched on the wall and the discarded confetti laying scattered on the floor.

"Hah. Yeah." Katsuki shrugged off. "I, uh, am taking my time to leave, that's all."

Aizawa nodded in silence. He walked into the room and stared around too like he was going to miss it.

"Is everything okay?" Aizawa asked when Katsuki still hadn't moved an inch.

"I'm fine, old man," Katsuki grumbled. He leaned against the table and turned over the blade in his hand. "Relax and have another glass of wine before you start to annoy me."

"I worry over you, is that a crime?" Aizawa grumbled back. He walked over to where Katsuki was and leaned against the table next to him. "I think it's officially a habit."

"Why do you worry so much about me?" Katsuki asked.

"Maybe it has something to do with discovering one of my best men was killed by a thirteen-year-old boy," Aizawa said sarcastically, shooting him an unimpressed stare. "Then finding out that same boy was a hair away from passing out from starvation but was wild with the will to survive."

Katsuki dryly chuckled. "Well, I'm not that boy anymore. So why do you keep worrying?"

"I guess, what I'm saying is, you have extremely volatile emotions, Bakugou," Aizawa explained in a concerned murmur. "I've always recognized that. Especially whenever it pertained to your mother, you become a loose cannon within a split second. But I also understand why you're like that because I used to be like that too."

"And how am I like?" Katsuki questioned, bored. He knew this was about to be another lecture as he fiddled with his knife.

"You were never given space to process emotions that take time: grief, sadness, and anger," Aizawa pointed out, catching Katsuki's attention. "You always had to keep it moving and bottle every emotion in because there wasn't time to grieve, or cry, or be reasonably upset. But as a result, eventually those emotions build up and—" Aizawa gestured wide with his hands. "—Explode."

It was a doomsday warning.

The mood shifted and Katsuki paused enough to lower his blade.

“You think I’m going to explode one day?” Katsuki wearily whispered.

“You already have exploded once,” Aizawa muttered with a shrug. “You unleashed all your pent-up emotions onto Muscular and that was before Mitsuki died. I don’t want you to do that again, even more so on someone you may not want to. You had a target last time, Muscular was easily pinned for your issues in life, but next time it may not be like that. I know you have unprocessed grief pertaining to Mitsuki—so. I worry.”

Katsuki internally surveyed himself for a second.

He had never considered that his emotions were that dangerous.

“If I can give you one last lecture, the moral is to take time for your emotions,” Aizawa suggested. “Since you’ll be retired, remember it’s okay to feel at that moment. You don’t have to bottle it in anymore.”

“Thanks, old man,” Katsuki whispered. “I’ll remember that.”

“Oh, by the way.” Aizawa handed over the black folder. “Here’s the information you asked for. The connection hasn’t been heard from in several years because she moves around a lot. She also has a lot of various aliases but it’s for the better. Since the law isn’t particularly kind to murderers like us, a lot of underground strings must be pulled. But I’m sure, you’ll be able to easily trace where to go with your tracking skills.”

Katsuki stared at the envelope like it was a daydream.

This was the key to getting Izuku out and potentially the kids he mentioned as well. He swallowed. The direness of the whole situation was quickly coming to light.

“And this is a sure-fire thing?” Katsuki asked. “It won’t backfire at all?”

“It’s extremely bulletproof.” Aizawa hummed. “It might take some digging to find the starting point since my information is years old, but that’s simply how this whole thing works. So, if you’re going to disappear, then take care, Bakugou. It was really nice getting to know you and I’m glad you’re finally going to find some peace.”

Aizawa wore his emotional mask well. That was something Katsuki always admired about the elder man. Stiff. Straight face and always damn professional. But right now, that mask slipped a little to reveal a subtle sadness.

Aizawa and him exchange one last set of goodbyes, a dry handshake and then the elder man headed towards the door with a heaviness on his shoulders. Right before he could leave, Katsuki blurted out something he wanted to say for so long, but his pride always prevented him from doing so.

“I’m sorry, for what I said at my mother’s funeral,” Katsuki said.

Aizawa stopped cold in his tracks.

The elder man turned around like he misheard, and his emotionless mask was wiped clean off.

Katsuki shifted uncomfortably, still unfamiliar with this level of vulnerability.

“Um.” Katsuki rubbed at his nape. “You’re right, I get—angry—about anything pertaining to her and I react poorly. I lashed out on you that day and I didn’t mean what I said. I never properly apologized for that. So. I’m sorry.”

“You weren’t wrong.” Aizawa put his hands in his pants’ pockets. “I’m not your parent and I shouldn’t have acted like I was when I have made poor choices pertaining to you too. I’m not exactly a golden role model for hiring a teenager at this operation. I should have turned you away when you asked for a job more vigorously, but I didn’t.”

“But you’re the closest thing to a parent I have,” Katsuki finally admitted out loud. “Thank you, for watching over me all these years when no one else did.”

Katsuki walked up to Aizawa and hesitantly embraced him in a hug.

They knocked together awkwardly, and it was stiff. From the outside view it would be cringe to see, Katsuki assumed. The sudden onset of unnamed emotions made Katsuki realize, Aizawa was right. He did have shit bottled up so tightly that he was liable to explode at the smallest thing if he wasn’t careful.

When they separated Aizawa was giving him a fond look of pride.

“Keep in touch if you can, kid,” Aizawa whispered with tears in his throat.

Katsuki did a two-finger salute and smirked. “You know I will.”

When Aizawa was gone, Katsuki decided to open up the folder.

Inside was a map, a set of old addresses, and a photograph of a woman with sleek black hair. Her eyes were pretty, round, and a deep shade of brown that was warm like cinnamon. Attached to the information was the name Shimura Nana.

Katsuki missed the last train out, just like Aizawa had warned he would. He couldn’t stop himself from lingering around the building and eventually shacked up in a small motel for the night.

He realized then he didn’t have Izuku’s number to tell him he was alright. He also realized then he didn’t actually know much about Izuku’s background or life besides what was unwillingly revealed. But with that black folder brought new hopes and soon Izuku’s past wouldn’t even matter.

He could perfectly envision it:

First he would tell Izuku about Shimura Nana and how bulletproof this type of disappearance program was. The beautiful man would be shocked, afraid, but willing. They would escape to go find her hand in hand. Izuku would finally be cut free from the grasp of whatever fucking ugly web he was trapped in. Katsuki didn't care if it meant they had to relocate to a new country or a remote part of Japan.

He would even pre-sell the estate if that's what it entailed. It would be perfect because they could use the money to build a new somewhere else.

Anything would be good to pay for the price of Izuku's freedom being returned.

When he arrived back at the estate, Katsuki was gripping the black folder with clammy palms.

He was excited as he unlocked the door, but when he walked inside, he was met with a quiet house.

"Izuku?" Katsuki called.

No answer.

He wearily saw Izuku's crutches laying off to the side by the TV. He searched around, and he found all of Izuku's books, his clothes, and his suitcase. As he wandered around calling Izuku's name, he passed by the back area of the estate and heard faint crying.

Katsuki glanced through a window to the large chunk of land in the back. The field was lush today, overflowing with red, higanbana flowers bending with the breeze. He could faintly see a pop of green—Izuku. He was sitting in the field crying. His head was down as his shoulders shook vehemently.

Katsuki ran out into the field immediately in fear that Izuku was hurt.

"Izuku!" Katsuki called his name when he came into ear shot.

Izuku violently flinched and snapped his head up.

His eyes were bloodshot, tiny red vessels nearly overflowing the whites of his eyes. All the delicate skin around his face was puffy as if he had been crying for hours on end. He was dressed in his olive colored samue and it was wrinkled like there had been a tussle. Izuku scrambled to wipe his tears.

Katsuki immediately kneeled down and inspected Izuku all over. "What happened? Why are you out here crying?"

Izuku sniffled, still wiping his eyes. He stared at Katsuki as if he had seen a ghost, or worse, a demon. There was potent fear in his eyes that Katsuki had never witnessed in all his years of knowing him. This was new. Izuku stared down at Katsuki's bare wedding finger.

"You would never hurt me…would you?" Izuku asked, barely above a whisper.

Katsuki was taken back. His whole body halted movement and he searched Izuku's face. All he could see was a thick cloud of anxiety.

"Of course, I wouldn't," Katsuki said. He took a closer look at Izuku's ankle, but his hand was stopped. The smaller hand gripped him tightly—nearly desperate. "Where is this coming from?"

"I'm—I'm only wondering," Izuku's voice wavered. "The time we spent here meant something for you?"

"It means everything."

"A-And no matter what, you wouldn't—no, couldn't—kill me?" Izuku sobbed.

Katsuki was rendered speechless.

Did Izuku really have doubts about that, even after the last few months? Immediately, Katsuki blamed his two fucking frightening ass ex-coworkers, Shinsou and Monoma. Maybe he should've been more forceful with them when they were calling Izuku names and mentioning all the past things he had said about him.

Katsuki interlaced their fingers and his heart clutched at how hard Izuku was trembling.

"I would never try to kill you," Katsuki promised.

Izuku didn't seem convinced. "B-But what about the kill orders you have on me?"

Ah. There it is.

"Those were only because you butchered Rin Hiyru and kept messing with assignments. That shouldn't be surprising. All that is in the past now, I told you I would get the kill order shit straightened up. My ex-colleague is working on clearing it soon when he can."

"How long did you have the orders?" Izuku continued, ignoring pretty much all he said.

Katsuki pursed his lips to the side, trying to have patience. "I was ordered to kill you the second I saw you after Madrid."

"But you never did."

"Because I wasn't trying to blow my goddamn cover with Moore looking at us as hard as he was."

"So would you have killed me if Moore didn't get involved?"

Katsuki opened his mouth, then he closed it. He caressed Izuku's shoulders lightly. "Izuku, where is this coming from? You're worrying me. You never answered why you were out here crying in the first place."

"Please, answer the question," Izuku said, voice splintering entirely.

Katsuki took a deep breath. The next words made him feel sticky with regret. “Yes. If we hadn’t run into Moore, I would have attempted to kill you. But that’s irrelevant because I had been trying to kill you for years. That shouldn’t be surprising or a testament to anything.”

Izuku nodded in understanding, but not happily. His hand recoiled to himself, and his crying eased up.

Katsuki ‘tsk’d under his breath and shuffled in closely to Izuku to hold him with one arm.

“C’mon, Izuku. This is stupid. That’s the past and we’ve always been at odds until recently. But everything is different now and that’s good. So, what if we had crossed some issues in our line of work? I had no clue who you were before.”

“I could never kill you, even when I didn’t know,” Izuku said, barely audible. “I-I th-thought it might be the same.”

Katsuki rubbed Izuku’s shoulders and hugged him. Damn. He felt guilty. Izuku was shaken up more by that stupid intrusion more than he thought. He probably was triggered, and Katsuki fucking left him here alone to spiral in his thoughts.

“I’m sorry,” Katsuki whispered and kissed Izuku’s forehead. “I’m really sorry that I can’t say I felt the same when you were only Deku to me—but I can say that now and that’s all that matters. You’re the only person I’ve ever felt this…close to. Shit happens, feelings change. I would never try to kill you again if that’s what you’re worried about. Nothing could change that.”

“Nothing?”

“Nothing.”

Izuku hugged him back.

Katsuki was confused as all hell, but he did his best to calm Izuku down. He ran a hand through Izuku’s messy curls and held him tightly. When he did this, something caught his eye. He noticed stray leaves and lone higanbana flower petals stuck in Izuku’s thick curls. Even dirt was caked in his hair at to the roots.

Katsuki frowned unhappily and began plucking Izuku’s hair clean.

“Now that your irrational fears are settled, why were you out here in the middle of the field crying?” Katsuki asked once more. “A little fucking concerning, don’t you think?”

“It’s nothing to worry about,” Izuku explained. “I tried seeing if I could walk on my own. Looks like I can’t yet.”

Izuku pulled back and smiled at him a little, but not all the way.

Something was tethering him and keeping him from being entirely happy.

Katsuki recognized it as fear.

Katsuki couldn't shake that conversation out of his head.

It was unsettling and it reeked of Izuku being rattled by an unknown deterrent.

Katsuki worried that the run-in with Monoma and Shinsou impacted Izuku far more than he assumed. He drew this conclusion because over the next two days, Izuku was quieter than usual and mildly withdrawn. He was looking out of the windows, smiling sparingly and only sometimes joked around.

It felt like Izuku was pulling further away on purpose.

Which brought him to now, currently in the kitchen. Katsuki had placed his wedding band back on his finger and he was at the stove making chicken curry in a pot. Izuku was sitting at the table staring down at his lap in deep thought. His book was untouched, which worried Katsuki. Usually, Izuku read while he cooked.

The static radio was playing in the background. Originally it was nothing worthwhile, then a subject piqued his attention.

"We are interviewing a survivor from the Okinawa human trafficking tragedy. She is speaking out," the voice of a news reporter announced. Both Izuku and Katsuki sharply cut their eyes towards the tiny device. "Now tell us, what did you see again? This seems to conflict with the original police reports."

"There was a man in all black with blood-colored eyes," the wobbly voice of the witness whispered. "His eyes nearly glowed in the dark—and he moved so fluidly through all the rooms. He saved us from those monsters, like an angel of death reaping all of their souls."

Katsuki pressed his lips in a thin line. Did they seriously call me an angel of death?

"Do you think this could potentially be the work of the mysterious Scarlet Eyed Killer?" The reporter probed. "The description of his eyes combined with the amount of blood shed matches—"

Katsuki quickly turned the radio off.

"Sorry," Katsuki grumbled and went back to cooking. "I don't exactly feel like reliving that. I still get fucking hives thinking about the cages and red rooms. Plus, I don't really want to hear if I have another goddamn nickname. First The Scarlet Eyed Killer, now The Angel of Death? It's too much."

He didn't get a response.

Katsuki peeked over his shoulder.

Instead of answering him, Izuku was staring down at his hand, tracing a particular scar.

When Katsuki inspected closer, he recognized it as a scar that he inflicted from one of their many scuffles over the years. He had taken his blade edged with his mother's name and slashed it at Izuku. The other man barely had time to dodge, and in defense put his hand up—and the edge of the blade cut right through his palm.

Back then, Katsuki was happy to see pain inflicted on Izuku. But watching Izuku study that scar after their conversation in the garden made him feel uneasy. The look in his eyes was distant, and his lips were pressed in a contemplative line.

"Katsuki," Izuku whispered without glancing up. "We should get the divorce this week."

Katsuki's heart stopped. Then he continued stirring the curry in the pot and gritted his teeth.

Several beats of silence passed.

Izuku frowned and finally lifted his gaze. "Katsuki. Did you hear me?"

"I heard you."

"…And?"

Katsuki sucked in a deep breath. He clicked off the stove and turned around with a determined stare.

"And I don't want a divorce."

Izuku looked at him sideways. "Wh-What? We can't stay married—"

"Why not? We like each other. A lot. We get along fucking splendidly or whatever the hell it's called. Why would we get divorced?"

Izuku stared at him unimpressed now and folded his arms. "So, what's your plan? We secretly date in between my assignments and build up to justifying being legally married?"

"My plan is you don't have any more assignments," Katsuki answered.

This time, Izuku really did stare at him like he had gone mad. However, there was longing in his eyes too. Katsuki was compelled by the emotions dripping from Izuku and walked over to him. He pulled out the chair and sat down to eye level with the other man.

"Izuku. I want you to stay here with me."

Familiarity settled inside of him.

When he grasped Izuku's hands, it felt the same as when they were kids in that cramped nook. He had begged Izuku to marry him in hopes of the other boy being with him forever. And now, Katsuki was pleading for the same thing years later. He was scared for Izuku's safety all over again along with his own fear of being alone gnawing at him.

Izuku had said yes back then, and he could say it again.

However, the spark of childhood was nowhere to be found in Izuku's eyes. Instead, the ropes of reality were anchoring him to his next words: "I have to leave, Katsuki. I can't stay with you."

A piece of him shattered.

"But you shouldn't go back to that place," Katsuki tried to reason. His grip on Izuku's hands grew tighter, the same way they had that day in the nook. "Don't you like it here with me?"

"Of course I like it here but you're not making sense."

"No. You're not making sense," Katsuki snapped. Patience had never been his strong suit and his emotions were biting and churning in their cage. "You have an out, Izuku. Why go back to a place where you're fucking abused? You could stay here, and we could figure out a way to keep you away from people who would track you down. Look. I asked my supervisor about disappearance help—"

"—I don't get to disappear, Katsuki," Izuku cut off, annoyed. He pulled his hands out of Katsuki's and shook his head. "My life isn't simple like that and going through some disappearance program won't work for me."

"Well, we can make it fucking work. How do you know if you don't try? Hah? At least give it a shot."

"No. Katsuki, stop. That isn't realistic—"

"—Realistic?" Katsuki huffed, frustrated. He leaned away from Izuku in disbelief. "Staying somewhere where you're free versus a place you were fucking sold to isn't realistic?"

Izuku glared at him and gritted his teeth. "No. It's not."

"Y'know what—if we're going to rip the reality Band-Aid off, let's."

Katsuki leaned menacingly into Izuku's face, and they locked in unmoving glares. He curled his upper lip as he spat his next words.

"I'm not allowing you to go back to somewhere that forces you to kill." Katsuki glowered. "I will triple deadbolt all these doors and break your limbs before I allow you to go back to somewhere like that, Izuku. And I fucking mean it. Especially when you should have been with me. You should've—"

His anger dissipated an inch when he could envision young Izuku with a bandaged eye, smiling at him in the winter.

"You should've been with me all this time." Katsuki's eyes and voice softened. "Me leaving Tokyo was a mistake and we can correct it now. Why else would we have come across each other again all these years? It's—"

Fate.

Katsuki swallowed that word again.

Izuku's eyes lowered and the anger inside of them went with them. Now Izuku was only distant and sullen as he spoke next.

"But you did leave Tokyo, and I didn't. That's reality," Izuku whispered. He looked down at his hands and traced that scar on his palm again. "We can't correct how we branched into different paths. No matter how much I wish we could, we can't and I'm pushing my limit, Katsuki. My time is basically up. I borrowed all the favors I could to stay here for as long as I can, but I can't stay any longer and we can't stay married."

Izuku's voice was pained beyond his years.

Katsuki shook his head in denial.

This wasn't how he imagined this conversation going. Izuku was supposed to say yes. Izuku was supposed to get set free and they could be together finally. Izuku was supposed to stay. He was supposed to stay. He was supposed to—

"Who the fuck do I have to kill if you need to get out?" Katsuki begged viciously. "That big brother? Your supervisor? The fucking Governor? I don't give a damn how many throats I have to slit if it means you don't go back to the place that you were trafficked to. Do you hear how insane that sounds?! You want to stay here, don't you?"

Izuku flinched at something and turned his head away from Katsuki. "Nothing in my life is about what I want."

"But if it was—you would want to stay here with me, wouldn't you?"

"Of course, I would."

"Exactly. You like it here. You want this type of life as badly as I do, and we fit together so fucking well."

Katsuki gently took Izuku's chin and turned his face so they could see each other. Izuku's wall was crumbling, and his emotions were beginning to be laid bare. Katsuki's heart squeezed and squeezed until vulnerable words spilled out.

"You're more than a passing moment in my life and you know I'm more than that to you," Katsuki whispered and gently stroked Izuku's chin with his thumb. "These last few months were proof of how our lives should be—we should be together; we always should've been, and I don't want to let you go."

Love birds aren't meant to be separated, Katsuki could hear the warning of the old violinist. They always come back to each other and find one another.

He cusped Izuku's face with both hands and held eye contact. He searched in the eyes he loved so much for any hint that Izuku agreed. And he found an abundance of it. Izuku's words didn't match his eyes and Katsuki could see how much Izuku was fighting against his own will.

“Please, Izuku. Stay with me this time.”

Izuku’s beautiful face crumbled. He sobbed and lifted his trembling hands up to Katsuki’s. He grasped Katsuki’s wrists and slowly lowered their hands down onto his lap.

“I can’t stay because there are kids.”

Time stopped.

“…What?” Katsuki whispered.

But he knew the answer when he considered a grim fact he never thought of before. He stared at the number 217 on Izuku’s skin like it was a mark of death. It made him sick to his stomach as his perspective was widened.

“A-At my home, in Tokyo—there’re kids.” Izuku tried to stop his tears and clenched his jaw. “I can’t leave them there alone, Katsuki. I can’t. I have one I’m supposed to watch over. I’m his big brother like my big brother is to me. His name is Katsuma and he’s so soft. I can’t leave him there to be broken and hurt. Or worse, killed.”

“Have you been trying to get them out?” Katsuki asked, suddenly very sober on reality.

“Of course I have,” Izuku muttered. “I could never forgive myself if I let them do what they did to me to them. I can’t fix what occurred, but I can prevent it from happening again.”

“Then let me help,” Katsuki easily offered. He sat up like it was a sure-fire idea. “I have the information of someone named Nana who might be able to get us a lead on what to do. I can go back with you to Tokyo, and we can do it together and then we can—”

“No!” Izuku snapped angrily and tore himself away from Katsuki. “Just fucking stop!”

Katsuki slammed his fist on the table. “Are you serious?! Why are you so damn insistent on us being separated again?!”

“Because you’re out!” Izuku’s voice boomed on all the walls.

Katsuki was stunned speechless at the sheer volume that erupted from Izuku.

“You’re finally out, why would I drag you back in with my own mess?!” Izuku continued, heated glare in full intensity. “Don’t you get it? This is why I have been trying to help you get set up. You’re done! You’re free! You can start all the way over! You deserve to be normal—at least that way one of us can be!”

Izuku’s chest heaved as he caught his breath. His lips pulled back as he curled his fists like something was eating him from the inside out.

“I’ll never be normal,” Izuku admitted gravely. “There is no contract or number of years for me to be released. This is who I am and between the two of us, only one of us is a real sinner and it’s not you. I have done t-terrible things, Katsuki. Shit I can’t undo no matter how much

I wish I could and because of that, I cannot stay here. I want to do right for you, Katsuki and I'm not right for you."

"You can't decide what's right for me—"

"—Believe me on this one," Izuku whispered. "We're not meant to be together."

Katsuki would never say out loud how much that hurt him.

He curled his fists and his frown hardened to stop the tears that pushed at his eyes. He never cried easily—but hearing that forced him to keep in the tears for once in his life. The kettle on the stove top went off, reminding him that he had food going. It whistled shrilly in their uncomfortable silence.

When Izuku's hard expression wavered ever so slightly, Katsuki decided he didn't believe a fucking word the man was saying. Izuku was doing this on purpose to push him away because that's who Izuku was: annoyingly selfless. He would be the goddamn type to lie in hopes of making shit easier. Katsuki wasn't about to give into that crap a single bit.

"You don't mean that," Katsuki hissed defensively. "And you're not fucking going back alone if I can help it. If you leave out of here without me, I am going to be right behind you whether you like it or not." He stood up angrily and went back over to the stove to prepare two plates. "This conversation is done and we're not getting a divorce."

Izuku didn't utter another word as he wiped his tears away.

Katsuki walked back over to the dining table and unceremoniously shoved Izuku his plate of curry and took his seat again.

They ate in silence and barely looked at each other.

After their fight, they didn't bring up the topic of the divorce or leaving again.

Izuku was wearing a weary face that only pissed Katsuki off and all their problems stayed suspended in the air. Izuku didn't want to go—that much Katsuki could see but the stubborn asshole was acting as though he had to go. Which hurt Katsuki even more.

He tried his best to push down those whispers in the back of his mind, but it was hard. They came back again, full force.

"The problem is you," his self-doubt murmured. "You're not a good enough person for him to stay."

"Even if he does like you, he's going to leave you," his anxiety muttered. "One day you'll wake up and be by yourself again."

"You're unlovable," his self-hatred stated cruelly. "How could he ever love a monster like you? You chose to be a killer. Izuku didn't."

These whispers grew louder and louder every single passing moment.

It wasn't before long Katsuki's desperation grew. He could see Izuku begin to distance himself, but he knew he had a small chance at making Izuku stay. It was apparent in Izuku's eyes.

When Izuku didn't think he was looking, green eyes stared longingly at anything in sight. The kitchen. The couch. The fall leaves on the trees. But most of all, Izuku stared longingly at him sometimes. Then Katsuki heard a whisper that would solidify his resolve.

Izuku had locked himself in the bathroom in the middle of the night once. His accidental husband had been tossing and turning, unable to relax. He had climbed out of the bed, assuming Katsuki was asleep. But he wasn't. He was awake and he crept up slowly and pressed his ear against the shut door.

"Wh-Why did it have to be this way?" Izuku sobbed angrily. His voice was so quiet and muffled. His crying was heartbreaking and frustrating. "I don't understand. I don't want it to be like th-this."

Katsuki didn't want it to be like this either.

Which is why he knew if he kept pushing it—then maybe he could convince Izuku to stay willingly. Then they could have a chance at the happiness they both deserved.

There was only one thing left to do in Katsuki's mind.

It terrified him—but he knew there was a chance for them if he laid himself bare for Izuku to see.

"Where are we going?" Izuku asked.

He was using his crutches again, a minor setback after the encounter with Monoma. He stared curiously at Katsuki who was tying his boot up into a neat bow.

"You'll see when we get there," Katsuki explained. He mumbled a little under his breath because his heart was pounding furiously. He smiled at Izuku who was patiently waiting for him. "Are you ready to get going?"

Izuku nodded and began to hop on his crutches towards the door. Katsuki stopped him, and gently placed the crutches on the ground. He squatted low for Izuku to ride on his back. There was hesitation but Izuku climbed on. Katsuki swallowed his nerves when they spiked because he hoped this would be able to help Izuku understand how he felt.

They walked through the field together, admiring the distant landscapes. It was still dark outside and before sunrise. Everything was silent in the gentle darkness as they traveled through the field of higanbanas in the back of the estate. They walked towards the density of the trees that were awaiting them.

Izuku was quiet and Katsuki was too. The howling wind blew through their hair when they breached the threshold for the dense forest. Their figures were shaded by vibrant orange and red trees.

Katsuki took a path that he sometimes wished to forget existed. He had stricken it from his memory, like so many things he did when they pained him too much. Similar to the same fate Izuku fell to as the blurry faced boy in his dreams.

Izuku's attention was caught when they found a stone pathway in the forest. They followed it all the way to a bridge that passed over a tiny stream. The echoing of the morning birds and running water were the only sound as they trekked deeper in the scarlet forestry.

"What is this place?" Izuku asked.

"It's…better to show you."

The pathway turned to an unkept, white marble path that looked as if it hadn't been tended to in years. The crunch of Katsuki's feet on the leaves under his boot pierced the silence.

When they arrived at the clearing, it was exactly the same as Katsuki remembered it. Haunting. Beautiful. Full of death. The only place here at the estate that might truly be filled with ghosts.

Several rows and rows of tombstones were neatly aligned with green moss overrunning them. Higanbana flowers naturally grew, making the dirt floor of the forest seem like it was painted red. In the back were the older tombs, reaching towards the sky as if they were alive and pointing to the deities in the questionable heavens. Those had the most moss covering them, swallowing whoever's name was written.

Then gradually as the rows pushed further and further to the front, newer tombs could be easily distinguished. They were a deep gray. Spots of stone peaked from underneath the thick green and on the tombs were names that faded away from the harshness of nature through the years.

In the utmost front row were three tombs. The newest ones.

Katsuki took a deep breath to steady himself. The wind cut through him again, and he glanced above to stare at the strangely enchanting sight of the thick vines hanging down from the treetops. The vines spread all around like veins, reaching and connecting every tomb limb to limb through their blood.

His blood.

Katsuki walked up to one and grew quiet.

The subtle etching of the name 'Mitsuki' was faintly visible.

Izuku's eyes went wide. "This—This is…" The words trailed off, but he didn't need to finish.

“Yes. It. I…I moved her here when I found this place,” Katsuki admitted. “It felt right to reunite them after they had spent a lifetime apart. Maybe they are finally making amends on the other side, or at least that’s what I tell myself to feel better. Who knows if this was the right thing to do?”

Izuku’s arms that were wrapped around him grew tight.

Carefully, Katsuki let Izuku down. They both sat on the thick forest floor as the red leaves swayed above them. Katsuki worried that this was possibly a weird thing to do when Izuku didn’t speak—then he turned to Katsuki and smiled sadly.

“You did the right thing,” Izuku said quietly. “You have a good heart, Kacchan.”

“I hope I do,” Katsuki muttered, unsure. “This is the only place I didn’t have the real strength to come back to, more than the nursery. I feel guilty sometimes, living in that house and not paying my respects to the people who left it here for me.”

He turned his eyes to the other two tombstones. The names ‘Ren’ and ‘Hina’ were fainter than ‘Mitsuki’.

“Do you ever wonder what they were like?” Izuku asked.

“All the time.” Katsuki smiled a little. “I try to pick out which parts of my mother’s personality belonged to who and it—it makes her feel complete.”

“…What was she like?”

“She was a hurricane,” Katsuki grumbled fondly. “Funny. Risk taker. Energetic. Secretive. Loud. Irresponsible. Caring in her own way.”

“She sounds like she was nice.” Izuku whispered. “I can tell you loved her a lot.”

“I did, but I also resented her too,” Katsuki admitted. “You know that type of resentment you feel guilty for, but it sits inside of you anyways. I used to ignore it all the time because I never want to hate her but…I think I’m finally accepting that two truths can exist at once. I loved her fiercely. But I resented her quietly.”

The wind blew between them, shaking the leaves and swaying the vines above their heads.

“I…I brought you here because this is the last part of me, Izuku.”

Katsuki turned inwards towards him and there was a subtle sadness pooling out of Izuku. Maybe it was a pity. Or maybe the words they tossed around the other day still stung like wasps. Whichever it was, Katsuki took Izuku’s hand in his and gripped it tightly as he continued speaking.

“There’s nothing more I think I can show you or tell you. You have all of me and this is the most vulnerable I’ve ever been with anyone. I know you don’t like to talk about yourself a lot—and I can respect that because it is easy to see, certain things hurt you to think about. But I want you to see all of me because I trust you—entirely.”

Izuku smiled as if Katsuki's words were made of glass. He fixed his posture and then leaned in. Izuku embraced him and buried his face into his neck.

"Thank you for trusting me enough to bring me here," Izuku whispered. "I trust you too."

The Bakugous who wandered here before them had made the family grave site something beautiful, Katsuki thought. Despite the morbidness, the scene was deathly beautiful like phantoms who had siren-like voices.

A small lake was found the further into the grave site they went, and there was an all-white gazebo poised like a lone soldier who had survived years of grief by itself. It was overrun with vines and dusted with red leaves. It was perfectly stationed next to the lake, giving a sanctuary to rest.

Katsuki wandered near it, and they sat inside. Wordlessly, the two of them watched the sunrise together. It wasn't the first sunrise they witnessed with the other, but this one was different. The rosy dusk bled up from the ground and into the water. It spread all over like harmless fire, covering everything in its warmth.

Both of them stared quietly.

Izuku's eyes were distant as he stared at their reflections in the water. He stared and stared as if they would shape shift into two people who might have a shot of being together.

"I thought…I thought that this would be easier, somehow," Izuku broke the silence. He didn't turn to Katsuki, only stared at him through their reflections in the lake. "I thought I could come here, spend all the time I could with you, then we could go our separate ways easily. I thought, maybe, seeing you set up and happy here, would make it easier for me to leave. Because I knew this time, you were safe. But leaving you never will be easy. Will it?"

Katsuki's heart clutched. He turned towards the other man whose expression was steadily growing detached. "Izuku. We could find a way to get the kids out and run away. Just don't go back."

"Maybe I shouldn't." Izuku shrugged distantly. "Wouldn't that be crazy if I actually decided to do something…for myself. For once."

"It wouldn't be crazy, it would be good," Katsuki said softly. "We'll figure something out. After we get the kids to safety, it'll be smooth sailing. We'll have our whole lives ahead of us after that and then who knows what type of life we'll get this round."

Izuku's brows pinched together. "Type of life?"

"The disappearance program, it gives you a new life," Katsuki explained. He picked up a broken twig and casually tossed it into the lake, creating new ripples. "It'll help give you a fresh start. You'll be a whole new person without worrying about your past catching up to you."

“Would we be able to choose what type of life?” Izuku asked quietly.

“I dunno.” Katsuki sat up right a little more, elated to sense a hint of curiosity from Izuku. “But if you could, what would you choose?”

“I don’t know,” Izuku whispered. “I never thought about what I would do if I gave up this life.”

“Think about it now. Take your time.”

Izuku hummed and he stared at the ripples in the water. Then he turned his eyes up to the scarlet leaves that were encasing them. He smiled with a faraway gaze. “I would…be a violin player.”

“Good choice,” Katsuki whispered.

“What about you, Kacchan? What would you choose?”

Izuku turned towards Katsuki and there was a sliver of hope shining through his eyes. Katsuki grinned with all his teeth and leaned in to brush their shoulders together.

“Easy. I would be a music composer.”

“But if we don’t get that, what else would you be?”

“I suppose, in another life, I would only want to be with you.” The words flowed easily off Katsuki’s tongue and Izuku’s eyes filled with affection. “It wouldn’t matter what we are or what we were doing. We could be normal, everyday people with regular jobs.”

“Maybe you’d be a good handyman.” Izuku smiled tenderly. “Or a detective.”

Katsuki made a disgusted face. “In no fucking life would I ever be a cop.”

“Fair,” Izuku chuckled, mood finally lifting. “I think then you would be a great photographer. Or, if we were choosing anything, you’d be a wonderful pro fighter. You would be the number one champion. Maybe even a misunderstood pirate who hunts for treasure like in one of my books.”

Katsuki smiled at that. “You’d be a great baker.”

“I burn every ounce of food I touch.” Izuku shook his head. “I have never cooked before Okinawa.”

“Okay fine.” Katsuki laughed. “What about a gardener? You could have a backyard full of roses that you sell.”

“I also have a terrible green thumb.” Izuku smiled a little bit more. He playfully pulled at a springy curl on his head. “The only thing green about me is my eyes and hair.”

“And I love that,” Katsuki grinned wider when Izuku blushed pink. “I can picture it now: we start our new life, and we open up a flower shop together. It’s quiet and no one knows who we are. We’re simply known as the nice married couple who sells half dead roses.”

Izuku laughed loudly, nose scrunching with the thought. “And people would come in confused, but they still buy a bouquet because of your threatening stare.”

“Or they would buy it because they’re charmed by your sweetness,” Katsuki countered. “We would have great sales every day if you smiled at everyone and spoke to them in that gentle voice you use on me sometimes.”

“Hm, I can see that.” Izuku beamed. “Then after we made all these sales, we’d go home and laugh about it.”

“I would cook dinner and you would prepare for the next day.”

“After that we would go to the couch and snuggle,”

“With a big fuzzy blanket. I would watch TV while you read a book.”

“And after a while, I would fall asleep in your arms.”

“Then we’d do it all over again the next day.”

Izuku began laughing fully, voice in tune with the bright light around them.

It was a beautiful sight. Izuku seemed carefree thinking about a future that was worth reaching out for. Katsuki willed that Izuku was truly cracking and moving on his stance. Then slowly, the harmonious laughs bled into tiny, sharp breaths. Then the breaths gradually became soft cries and Izuku’s face was bruised with raw intensity, like his illusion was broken.

“Th-That would be nice,” Izuku said in a broken voice. “W-Wouldn’t it?”

Katsuki turned his body towards Izuku, and he took his hand.

He looked at their wedding bands and slowly it all came together. It fit like shattered stones that still had gaps but against all odds fit together in many ways. And he liked that because Katsuki always considered himself broken too. He was bred in a broken home. Raised by broken parents. Took on a broken fucking sense of a job.

His idea of love was even broken.

Everything he touched bled because he was a sharp, shattered man that was not able to fit together with anyone. However, with Izuku, his broken jagged edges never were a problem. Izuku was equally as broken and because of that, they somehow fit together. No matter the lifetime.

“I love you, Izuku,” Katsuki confessed.

Izuku's eyes softened, and his tears poured like that was the final weight to break him.

"I love you too, Katsuki," Izuku confessed back.

Katsuki's heart soared higher than it ever did. He touched the clouds at the same moment Izuku touched him. Scarred hands cupped his cheeks and pulled him in for a kiss. Izuku was hesitant for valid reasons, but his love shone through. Warmth entrapped them as he kissed Izuku back tender yet fiercely in an attempt to devour. He wanted to communicate that this was it for him.

Izuku was his and he was Izuku's.

They were back to normal after they exchanged 'I love you's.

Katsuki could've been fooled. It was almost like that weird week didn't happen. There was no more talk about divorces or leaving. Izuku was enjoying their time together and Katsuki enjoyed it as well. This gave Katsuki hope that Izuku was potentially considering their options.

In the quiet nights while Izuku was passed out, Katsuki shifted through that black folder. Aizawa was right, this information was old. Many of the phone numbers that were listed inside were cut off, or dead ends. It made Katsuki frustrated, because he could feel himself pressed for time, but he worked relentlessly on figuring out how to find Nana.

Izuku didn't mention leaving again, however.

His quietness washed over the last few days, and they went back to their normal, happy routine. Every day they exchanged kisses, playfully teased each other, and enjoyed romantic dinners.

The first week after their confession, they traveled around like they used to.

He happily gave Izuku piggyback rides and they stole tiny kisses all throughout the day. They finished completing the list of restaurants Katsuki wanted to taste test and Izuku circled a couple that were his favorite.

"You should come back to these," Izuku said happily. "They're so good!"

Katsuki taped the list to the fridge the next day.

The second week after their confessions, Katsuki gave composing a song a try.

He had been in classes for a while now, and he wanted to give it a shot. He wrote something inspired by Izuku. It was soft, yet sharp. Mysterious yet vulnerable. He felt like this encompassed both sides of his husband, and how he always had so many intriguing aspects about him. He wrote it for a violin solo.

Izuku played it happily in the music room. He moved his bow across that old, white violin with an unnamed passion. His eyes were closed most of the time, but when they were open, he maintained enchanting eye contact with Katsuki.

“You’re going to make the most beautiful songs,” Izuku said like he was deeply in love. “I can’t wait to hear what you create.”

After that, Katsuki constructed a series of violin solos dedicated to Izuku.

They were songs that encompassed how he felt about Izuku at different stages of his life.

The first was a tender song, dedicated to their time in Tokyo. It was filled with childhood naivety and wonder. The next songs were a fury of sharp notes and an underlying sensation of lust for their rivalry years. The following set was for their time in Okinawa, relaxing and encompassing their epiphany after being separated for so long.

Then the final songs were reflective of their time here, at the estate. Slow, vulnerable. He tried his best to capture what falling in love sounded like to him.

Izuku played each one, and Katsuki pinned the music sheets up on the wall. He realized Izuku somehow became his muse amongst the many other labels he had in their web of connection. His savior. His childhood friend. His inspiration. His past rival. His husband.

In this lifetime, Izuku seemed to be his everything.

All roads led to Izuku.

The third week after their confessions, they watched a string of Izuku’s favorite romance movies.

They snuggled up on the couch every night and Izuku showed him all the reasons why these particular films he adored more than others. He analyzed the movies down to the very last montage, saying that nothing was done at random.

Katsuki didn’t feel any disgust for romance while watching.

He smiled at it the whole time, happy that he finally found what he was looking for.

The fourth week after their confessions, Izuku helped him plant a bundle of pink carnations in the backyard.

They put it next to the garden, but still far away enough from the house that it wasn’t always such a painful reminder. For this Katsuki was grateful, and Izuku’s thoughtfulness was always a quality that he loved about him.

All the sweet moments lulled him enough to refocus on enjoying Izuku's time here. While he did that though, he was tirelessly figuring out where the hell Shimura Nana was located.

Currently, Katsuki was flipping through the black folder in bed.

He had set up several pins in a map of all the places that Nana was last. He was piecing together her new location that was deeply coded. It wasn't straight forward, which Katsuki gave Nana props for. In case this fell into the wrong hands, she wouldn't be an easy find.

He concluded that she didn't stay around in the same city for long, and whenever she potentially made people disappear, she did as well. Her previous alias was Float and now he was attempting to figure out the new alias that was needed to specify before talking to her.

So far he decoded two words: One. All.

He was close to figuring out the third. Once he pieced together all the combinations—he would go to Nana and tell her about Izuku.

Speaking of Izuku, the other man wasn't with him. His husband had said he wanted to read on the patio to amplify his reading experience. Sounded like a nerdy thing to do, and Katsuki smiled at the thought. Izuku gave him a quick kiss on the lips and ran off with his book, giddy like always.

When their usual bedtime arrived, Izuku wandered back into their bedroom, stretching lightly and yawned.

Katsuki couldn't help but note how he was walking now.

No cast. No limp.

But still no mention of leaving.

"Did you enjoy reading your book?" Katsuki asked.

He put the black folder on the nightstand to give Izuku all his attention. Green eyes flickered to the black folder and then back to Katsuki with a loving smile.

Izuku nodded sweetly. "I did. The rain really made me feel like I was in the atmosphere. Only thing that would have made it better was if you read it to me, Kacchan."

"I can read a chapter to you tonight, if you really want." Katsuki smiled back at him. "I'm happy you're enjoying all those novels. They were super hard to find, turns out you're not the only nerd fighting to read those sappy books."

Izuku climbed in the bed and snuggled closely to him. "Thank you again for finding those for me."

Katsuki snaked an arm around Izuku's waist. "Of course. Anything for you, darling."

Izuku's eyes flashed with something at the mention of 'darling'. He smiled gentler and his eyes became shinier in the dim, bedroom light. His hand pushed forward, touching Katsuki's cheek bone. He grazed it so lightly Katsuki questioned if he really touched him. The simple motion stole his breath away in a way only Izuku could.

Katsuki turned his body inwards to him and smiled lovingly with half hooded eyes. Izuku then cupped his cheek and leaned their foreheads together.

"I love you so much," Izuku whispered.

"I love you too, darling," Katsuki muttered back.

He pulled Izuku tightly to him and both of their eyes naturally closed. These were some of Katsuki's favorite moments, the tenderness they shared at night. Their limbs tangled and the light touch of Izuku's eyelashes could be felt on his cheek.

Katsuki kissed Izuku softly.

Izuku kissed him back slowly.

Katsuki opened his mouth and tilted Izuku's head when he tasted a hint of sweetness. Izuku pushed into the kiss, as if he needed to be a part of him. His hands gripped Katsuki's shirt and Katsuki was swept under the feeling of Izuku's tongue swiping against his. Katsuki bit at Izuku's bottom lip when he could taste that hidden saccharine once more. He smiled. Izuku's sweet tooth was always a small benefit for moments like this.

They broke apart and Izuku was smiling sadly at him.

Katsuki's head felt slightly light.

He tried to think through the mild sway of his vision, but any logic was drowned when Izuku kissed him again, several times deeper. It was as if they were melting into it. Then Katsuki's cheeks felt rosy and warm. When he tried to open his eyes again, his eyelids were heavy—and this time the room did blur.

His vision swarmed. Izuku's lovely freckles were unclear.

"Iz—" Katsuki's eyes widened when his tongue was heavy. He grasped urgently at Izuku's shirt; fist tight. "Iz-Izuku—"

Izuku held his hand.

Tears now poured out his beautiful green eyes and they dropped directly onto him. Izuku broke down and all Katsuki wanted to say was "don't cry", but he was unable to form the words. His mouth was numb. His hands were numb. His legs were too. His grip on Izuku's shirt went slack and his arm dropped hard onto the mattress like it was lifeless.

Katsuki tried to shake his head when it became clear what was happening. He laid there, trapped in his unmovable body staring up at Izuku who was breaking down, face crumbled up like all their dreams of a future together.

“My time is up,” Izuku’s voice cracked. “I’m sorry, Kacchan. I love you so much.”

A lone tear escaped out of Katsuki’s eye as his vision was engulfed in darkness.

When Katsuki awoke, all his worst fears came true.

Izuku was gone.

“The problem was you,” his self-doubt murmured. “You were not a good enough person for him to stay.”

“Even if he does love you, he left,” his anxiety muttered. “You woke up alone.”

“You’re unlovable,” his self-hatred stated cruelly. “He could never love a monster like you.”

He called out for Izuku’s name, stumbling upright in their room—or what was their room.

When his feet hit the floor, his world shifted, and he immediately became nauseated. His knees buckled easier than they should have as he went tumbling down. He heaved, clutching at his stomach and then finally he was pulled by pain to lay flat on the ground. Lightheadedness overtook him and it was difficult to think straight.

He had been poisoned.

He touched his lips in disbelief.

It must’ve been a toxin harmless enough to knock him out for several hours and paralyze him.

It was a smart choice because if Katsuki’s motor functions were at his full capabilities, he would’ve chased after Izuku. He would get his tracking gear and begin to hunt that fucking man down and stop him before he got back to Tokyo. He would prevent him from disappearing into the binding grip of the shadows.

But instead, Katsuki cried on the floor as his limbs felt heavy like lead.

He clawed at the hard surface in defeat and sobbed ugly sounds he never knew he could make.

“Izuku,” Katsuki gasped. His voice was groggy, and all the syllables of his lover’s name were broken like his heart. “…Izuku.”

He cried harder than he had ever before because he was truly alone.

The memories of their time together were the only thing cradling him. He called out Izuku’s name. He called out Deku. He even sobbed out Darling in hopes that this was all a bad dream. How had he squandered all their borrowed time? He dragged himself with his forearms, trying to will the function to return to his body.

All he could see now was his beautiful Izuku shackled and chained to the goddamn academy, and Katsuki's heart was pained beyond words. He had to find him. He had to. He fucking had to—but he couldn't right now with the poison still coursing through his veins.

He cried for hours, from what he could tell.

He wondered if he could cry out the poison through his tear drops that fell solemnly to the ground. After what felt like eternity, the feeling in his limbs returned to him. They loosened as if he was growing wings, and when he stood up the weight in his ribcage was the heaviest stone inside of him.

He dragged himself towards the door, unsure why.

Maybe Izuku was there, waiting paralyzed like he had been.

However, when he reached the front area, he found nothing.

Nothing. Nothing. Nothing.

He was going to let his tears come again and fall deep into the pit that was opening up at the bottom of him.

However, before he could do that, he turned his head. He frowned when there was a red folder sitting there on his wooden table. It was neatly placed and stationed directly out in the open. Katsuki whirled around, confused. He stumbled as he checked for someone else, potentially an agent from The Company—but he was as alone as he feared he would be.

He looked back at the folder again, curious to how it got there.

Then when he studied it closer, it wasn't a red folder from The Company. It possessed a Viper seal—exactly the same as the red folder Izuku had showed him so long ago in Okinawa.

Katsuki walked towards it, compelled by an unknown force.

His tears halted momentarily in his confusion as he arrived in front of it.

With steady hands, he picked the folder up. It was torn open like someone rushed to see what was inside, beating him to it. The wax viper seal was cracked down the middle and a collection of dried tear stains were sitting on top.

He flipped it open and went rigid.

Awaiting inside was a text document and stapled to it was exactly three photos.

The first photo was of a man Katsuki had met only once.

He had frigid golden eyes, and reddish-brown hair. He was dressed in a perfectly spotless black suit and his pale face was pristine in a way only well-preserved art could be. It was the Yakuza heir, Mr. Chisaki, that had been walking out of Aizawa's office—right before the Chizome incident.

The next photo was of Izuku.

His green eyes were glazed over, showing nothing inside like two bottomless pits. His hair was longer, curlier and wilder. He stared into the camera like he was seeing through a ghost as he wore a metal mask over the lower half of his face.

And the last photo was of his mother.

She was happily walking around—a photograph captured from far away. And from the looks of it, this was taken from around the same year she was killed. In her hands was a large bouquet of pink carnations, possibly directly after Katsuki had given them to her. She was smiling at the flowers like there wasn't a care in the world.

But it wasn't the pictures that haunted Katsuki. It was the words that tied them all together.

The words painted a picture more agonizing than anything he ever encountered.

He read them over and over again as the truth soaked in.

Mark: Bakugou Mitsuki

Requester: Chisaki Kai

Assassin: The Viridian Viper

Requestor Details: Mark fled Tokyo several years ago with dramatic debt. She stole money and jewelry after staying underneath the shelter of the Yakuza for a full year. In all attempts to track her down or get her to repay, she fled or was unable to be found. Due to this, Yakuza Heir, Chisaki Kai, no longer wishes to collect her debt, but rather close the loose end.

Assignment details: Mark was home alone cleaning in an apartment with an open window. Viper stationed himself across the way on another rooftop with a sniper gun and fully concealed. Task was completed with no casualties or witnesses with a single bullet.

Katsuki's heart drummed faster and faster until it broke in half.

He had never had a broken heart before, and it rocked his being like nothing he ever experienced. His world was torn and burning at the edges, slowly consuming him until there was nothing left. White noise cut through his ears and into his skin. Everything was all too much to process because it stung.

It fucking hurt and his heart squeezed until he couldn't breathe. Choppy breaths escaped him and all the shattered pieces of himself demolished further. He wilted in disbelief as visions of Izuku smiling at him rampaged his memory.

Did he know this whole time?

Katsuki's mind went blank with searing hot pain. It was as if he was being hit with their memories over and over again until all his nerve endings swelled with a numbing sensation. Every smile, kiss, and promise felt like a lash of agony as it beat against his heart.

He choked back sobs as he stared at that void on Izuku's face, the loving expression on his mother's, and then finally the fucking disgustingly smug expression of Chisaki's.

Within mere seconds, Katsuki was transported back to her apartment on that day years ago.

He was soaked in her blood again and he could feel the wetness seeping through his clothes. He was weeping over her body that had a bullet hole pouring out red. However, this time, he could see Izuku standing in front of him. His husband was holding the smoking gun with that bottomless pit of nothingness in his beautiful eyes.

The dormant darkness inside of Katsuki viciously snarled and snapped its sharp teeth. The entity melted with the part of him that loved Izuku so deeply. Clashing emotions melded into one, truly testing the thin line between love and hate until his darkness became a gigantic beast too overwhelming for him to contain.

Katsuki gripped the folder until his fingers tore through it and his nails pierced his skin.

His palms bled all over the photos, dark red pooled over Izuku's face. Drip by drip his thick blood soaked the photo, and it gave him pause. He studied how Izuku's face was drowned in red. The same way his mother's had been.

All roads led to Izuku.

As Katsuki stared at the photograph, his darkness and the part of him that loved Izuku agreed on one thing: devour him.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below! hides slightly I was very eager to get to this part of the story and the first of many pivot points ^^

Thank you so much for reading! This is officially a wrap for Katsuki's POV (for now) :) next up is Izuku's side of the coin!! Thank's so much for sticking around this much in the story. I didn't anticipate it to be this long but I am really enjoying the world building and storylines that intersect.

Chapter 17: Entr'acte I

12 years before incident

Izuku had to hurry.

His vision was blurry as he pushed past the tall adults in the crowded streets of Tokyo. He wiped a trickle of blood off his chin that dripped down from his split lip. The winter winds nipped at his face, making his skin rosy as he ran directly for the carnival.

In his head, he recalled the very reason why he was late: his big brother.

Tomura had turned thirteen and gotten taken somewhere. When he returned, there was blood caked on his face and his eyes were strangely wide. Uneasy quietness emitted from his hunched figure as he muttered. It worried Izuku how still and silent he was being. So Izuku reached his hand out, only wanting to pull his brother back to focus—but Tomura flinched and punched him.

Izuku went tumbling backwards, caught off guard by the sudden attack. Then right as he put his arms up to protect himself, the dresser drawers when flying everywhere. Their mirror was bashed against the wall. But Tomura's fit of rage wasn't towards him—it was directed elsewhere.

Izuku cowardly stood in the corner as the red light in their room started flashing. Tomura's laughs and cries mixed together in an unsettling rotation that made Izuku unsure exactly what was going on. Izuku cried and kept banging the button for their caretakers to come.

When the caretakers arrived, Izuku was too terrified to move. He watched as Tomura was dragged off, still crying and laughing in a strange harmony. Izuku couldn't leave as he was questioned for hours and assessed for any damage. He had what the adults called a fractured nose.

He was instructed by his floor's parents to go to the infirmary after their nightly check in. She led him down to the basement level and then left to tend to Tomura. When she was out of sight, Izuku left the waiting lobby and ran straight for his exit.

Which is how he came to be three hours late meeting Kacchan.

By the time he arrived, Izuku was out of breath and a sinking feeling was overpowering him. Every light at the carnival was turned off. The crowds were gone. The lights were dim. No joyous laughter or fun songs surrounded him like it should've.

His eyes widely searched around in the nothingness, afraid that he might've hurt Kacchan's feelings.

Kacchan didn't like to be alone. It always made him cry.

“Kacchan?” Izuku called. “Kacchan, where are you? ‘m sorry about being late!”

He wandered a bit, tiny boots crunching the snow. However, as he walked around no one was there. The carnival was closed and the only thing greeting him were steel bars wrapped around the entire perimeter.

Izuku sadly looked down at his watch and saw the time. 22:23.

Kacchan would’ve gone back to the nook by now. Izuku knew he needed to go see him and explain why he was late so Kacchan’s feelings wouldn’t be too hurt.

Izuku turned on his heels and took off.

Along the way he held his glove up to his nose, soaking up all the dripping blood that fell out. Some droplets hit the fresh, white snow leaving a stark scarlet trail where he walked. He trudged along, willingly ignoring that it was past 22:22 for once in his life.

When he arrived at the abandoned church, he stared at it with hope. He crawled through the small hole off the side like it was second nature and hurried past the cracks and cobwebs. He sprinted straight for the nook and swung open the door.

Izuku stopped.

The small boy whirled around, confused. He stared at the heap of blankets as if the tattered sheets might move and reveal his best friend. He then turned his eyes on the unpacked clothes and the discarded comics lying around. Izuku scooted in further, wondering maybe he was misunderstanding what he was seeing. He felt out the pillows and lifted under the blanket calling out his friend’s name. But it was no use.

Kacchan wasn’t there.

ᔓᔓᔓ

“Okay, ’s no worries,” Izuku muttered to himself as he began walking home. His heart was pounding out of sync. “H-He probably is still walking ‘round. I’ll see ‘im tomorrow and then we will leave for the sunny place.”

Izuku spent a while trying to convince himself that everything was fine.

He reasoned that Kacchan’s boots, hat, gloves and coat were gone. This had to mean he can’t be far. Maybe Kacchan was upset that he was late, and they hadn’t been able to go to the carnival together like they promised. He probably was storming around the city with his frown and big pout.

The young Izuku thought this all to himself as he turned into the dark alley. He thought this as he went straight for the back of a building that no longer was used for anything. Right there was his passage home, a small manhole with the design of a flower encrusted in the metal.

Izuku hooked his fingers inside and lifted with effort. He huffed and planted his small feet firm in the snow as he moved the heavy lid to the side. He was happy his big brother made him do extra lifts during moments like this.

He climbed down into the deafening darkness as all the sounds and lights from Tokyo were engulfed by the passage. He pulled the lid, gritting his teeth as it dragged against the concrete until it shut tight over him. Izuku continued to make his way down into the hole, his only light now being his yellow watch.

The number 23:10 was staring back at him.

He grunted as he hopped down onto the barren concrete underneath. There were no souls or sounds down here. He sometimes swore he heard the fluttering of moths hover too close to his ears as he walked.

Izuku's eyes adjusted to the darkness, and he could see the dimly lit underground.

All around were tall, mythical like pillars that supported the massive structure. He thought them to be similar to the figures he heard of in books, maybe the ones deserving of praise because they were so large and impossible. It was like a temple underground and it reminded Izuku just how small he was every time he passed through here.

This used to be a part of the underground Tokyo flood system, Izuku learned once in their lessons about the city.

It was abandoned during construction because this section was nine layers deep versus the five the architects decided to settle on. It reached too far and was ultimately barred off from the main flood system and public. Now it served as a pointless layer underneath Tokyo. An endless labyrinth of large tunnels that twisted upon themselves into a maze.

Izuku had been pulled by his curiosity so much that he decided to go seek it out. He had only wanted to explore it, amazed by how vast the underground flood system was in his home city. He was unsure of where this road would take him but luckily for him—one day it led him to Kacchan.

Izuku easily navigated the pathway home in the dark.

A couple of twists and turns then he was placed beneath his home. He climbed through a tiny tunnel that put him out to the basement of The Academy. It was a small vent that led out into the underground.

Whoever placed this building here didn't think about setting it on top of this forgotten system, luckily for him. Extra lucky for him, the gateway was underneath the tiles and hidden away. He had stumbled across it on a stroke of good fortune when he picked up on the hollowed sound beneath his feet once.

Izuku quietly peeled back the loose tile and peeked his head up from the ground. No one was around. Izuku quickly crawled out, squeezing his body through the square shaped hole in the floor. He gingerly placed the loose tile back over his passageway and smiled when it fit like a glove.

He looked at the time again. 23:40.

He hurried and took off his winter boots and coat. He reached for where he had stowed away his yellow backpack and shoved the articles of clothing inside sloppily. He was left only dressed in his regular all black school uniform and switched out his boots for his school issued leather shoes.

Izuku took a deep breath and made his way out of the compact room. He glanced around the dark hallways that were entirely empty save for the sound of strange sobbing through the vents. He ignored it, like he always did and snuck his way to the staircase.

He climbed up all the endless flights of metallic stairs with his pulse racing.

He stopped when he arrived at the level that read ‘10’ in dark green paint. Izuku shimmied the lock a bit, then pulled out a small, pointed knife to jam into the lock carefully. The moment the lock popped he pulled the door open and peeked around.

The shiny, sterile hallways were devoid of any presence. All the lights were off, and the countless rows of doors were shut. Izuku crept slowly, being careful not to make a sound as he walked. He reached the door that read two name plates: ‘117’ on a golden plaque and ‘Izuku’ on a silver one.

Izuku tapped his little yellow watch against a green censor to open the door.

The large room was cleaned up, as if nothing had happened. The glass from the broken mirror was gone. His bed was made up. Tomura was even inside of his own bed across the way, neatly tucked in and turned away from him. Izuku walked in quietly, placing his coat and shoes up at the front of their room.

He tiptoed in, careful as he passed Tomura who was unbearably still. His brother’s short hair showed the base of his neck and his mark ‘117’. Izuku changed into his pajamas without a sound, and then got underneath the covers.

“It took them that long to tend to your nose?” Tomura asked, jolting Izuku.

“I thought you were ‘sleep,” Izuku muttered in the dark. His heart began pounding in his chest and he clutched the edge of his comforter.

“I couldn’t sleep until I knew you were coming back.” Tomura didn’t face him. There was a sadness in his voice that clutched Izuku. “Is your nose alright?”

Izuku shifted quietly. “It’s fine.”

“Good.” A pause. “Sorry for…what happened.”

Izuku didn’t know how to reply. Tomura was a lot of things: smart, quick, and frightening—but sorry was never one.

“My nose will be ‘kay,” Izuku settled on.

An irritated huff left Tomura. “We need to hurry up and fix that lisp of yours before it becomes a problem with Ms. Nagant.”

Izuku nodded in the dark and Tomura didn’t give him anything more.

Silence followed them and Izuku turned over in the large bed. He looked out the window that was next to him sadly, gazing upon the lights.

From up here, the city looked like a bundle of neon stars. All the blending shades of blue and violet were sparkling like a fairy tale. Izuku stared down at the winding roads and twisting sidewalks, searching if he could see a blond head of hair from far up here. He always wondered what it might be like to live amongst the crowds below, but tonight he only wondered if Kacchan was down there as well.

Izuku gazed down at his watch to see the numbers 00:00.

When Izuku awoke it was 06:00 sharp, like always.

The two alarm clocks in the room buzzed loudly at the same time the sun hit his face. When he arose from his bed, Tomura was already up like usual. His big brother never bothered with combing his hair and his smooth skin was always perfect and ready to go in the morning. He was fixing up the golden buttons on their uniforms and sliding on his shoes.

Izuku stared around their room, slightly still asleep. At night he could barely see much but with the sun, their sanctuary was vibrant.

Both of them had large queen-sized beds with tall canopies that surrounded them. There were matching wooden desks, closets and dressers. The ceiling was high with rows of lights, but only next to Izuku’s bed were large windows giving a perfect view of Tokyo. The dark green curtains were always pulled back by golden ropes and the wooden floorboards were covered up with a large black rug.

“Get out of bed, Izuku,” Tomura muttered without looking at him. “You’ve been sitting there dazed for a minute now.”

Izuku rubbed the sleep out of his eye and hopped up. He showered. Brushed his teeth. Combed his hair so he wouldn’t be made fun of for it. He got dressed and Tomura rolled the sleeves on his uniform for him to make it look less big.

“You’re smaller than you should be,” Tomura noted unhappily. “When I was your age I filled this out fine. You really are the runt of the pack.”

Izuku felt ashamed.

He looked down at his tiny hand and he knew his brother was right. But Izuku didn't stay too sad about himself for long. On the front of his mind was Kacchan and he tried to hide the knots in his stomach. Izuku told himself not to worry, they were married, and married people always found each other.

At 06:30 he and Tomura were gathered by their floor's parent, Tsutsumi Kaina as usual. She always insisted she be called Ms. Nagant though. Izuku never understood why, but he did it.

"117. Izuku. Are you ready?" She called through the door.

They were, of course. Tomura made sure they were standing by the door ready to go at 06:28 sharp.

They stepped out in their matching uniforms and dark green backpacks. Above their hearts were words Izuku didn't really understand. On Tomura's it said, 'Phase Three' and on Izuku's it said 'Phase One'. Beneath the lettering was an embroidered symbol of a snake with sharp fangs prepared to attack.

"Good morning Ms. Nagant," both Izuku and Tomura said in unison.

Ms. Nagant was perfectly dressed in her all-white uniform. She didn't smile at them, which was no surprise. Izuku could count on one hand how many times she had smiled. It had been once, when she watched a man trip on the sidewalk from her office window. Besides that, small blip of joy, her dark eyes never showed a gateway to any positive emotions.

She reached a hand out and grabbed Izuku's jaw. He didn't say a word as she tilted it from side to side, staring hard at his swollen nose.

Izuku stared at her face as she did this, curious. Below her left eye was her mark: 21.

She sharply cut her eyes to Tomura, who was staring down at the floor.

"You're not going to have another outburst, are you?" Ms. Nagant asked slowly. "We don't need you accidentally killing him. That would be a big headache for everyone."

"I'm under control," Tomura muttered.

Izuku glanced his eyes down to Tomura's curled fists behind his back.

"Good," Ms. Nagant said, with authority deep in her voice. "If you have another meltdown like that, we're going to have to take you downstairs to the testing facilities to assess you for defects."

Tomura nodded stiffly.

"And you," Ms. Nagant hissed, gripping Izuku's jaw tighter until he winced. She glowered. "Cowering in the corner until someone arrived was disgusting. Next time, fight back. I'm marking you down for this."

Izuku stiffly nodded in her grasp. "Y-Yes, Ms. Nagant."

Her frown deepened at his stuttering.

“Glad you’re both in check,” she said as kindly as she could. “Now get to the back of the line.”

Tomura and Izuku did as she said, filing in neatly with the several rows of other kids in pairs.

As they went to the back of the line, he could hear several snickers from the other kids. Izuku tried his best not to shy away.

They walked through the beautiful hallways of their home, and this was the only moment of peace Izuku really knew in the daylight.

Everything was a sterile white, contrasting their black uniforms. Pretty, green plants aligned the marble hallways. On the walls were beautiful paintings of various types of snakes reflecting the fluorescent light. Izuku would play a game in his mind as he tried to name the different types as they walked. Copperhead. Cottonmouth. Rattlesnakes. Horned. He didn’t know all of them, but he knew some.

He wondered if he would miss doing this when he left Tokyo soon.

Along the way they passed glass study rooms that showed other siblings from different floors. In one box two kids were fencing. In another a girl with long green hair was solemnly practicing her fighting stances. In another, one sibling was knife throwing at targets. All their usual activities.

When they arrived at the cafeteria at 07:00, they ate quickly.

There was never room to dabble or chat. They were given their golden trays full of food and vitamins. If Izuku was caught daydreaming, Tomura would flick him in the cheek and point down to his smoothie.

“Make sure you drink every last drop of that,” Tomura would scold. “It’s the most important part of the meal.”

Because of Tomura’s warnings, Izuku always made sure to drink his green smoothie, no matter how much it made his stomachache some days.

After that, they walked down just as neatly to the classrooms for the 07:30 lessons to begin.

From here, they were neatly sectioned off like various assortments of coins.

The older kids, like Tomura, were placed in a different room. Izuku noticed how all of them had their marks already. 101. 116. 128. 119. He wondered if sadness came with these marks, because after all the big brothers and sisters got them—they seemed different.

The younger kids, like himself, were kept in various classrooms. The classrooms were large and full of white desks, white boards, white chairs. The windows were blocked out with sheer white curtains so they wouldn't get distracted by looking out the window. On the walls were posts with various equations and characters from the different languages they were learning.

Izuku walked into the classroom slowly, with his head down. He heard some snickering immediately and didn't need to lift up his eyes to know who was laughing at him.

"The runt lives to see another day," the voice of Sen said. "I heard a rumor that Tomura might have smashed your head in. I was hoping it would be true."

Izuku turned his head unwillingly when a chorus of snickers arose.

Sen was sitting with his legs kicked up on the desk and an arrogant smirk on his face. His chocolate brown hair was a mess, and his deep brown eyes were burning into him. Next to him was Himiko, with her blonde hair and bright gleaming golden eyes. She was grinning as sharp as knives with other students as they eyed Izuku up and down.

Izuku got that knot in his tummy he always did when they would stare at him like that.

He quickly turned his eyes forward and walked swiftly to his seat. He took his station in the front today, not wanting to deal with the kids who would turn around and shoot him weird faces. They did it in hopes of distracting him and getting him in trouble with the teacher, Sako Atsuhiro. Or as he liked to be called, Mr. Compress.

"Everyone take your seats," Mr. Compress called out in his usual friendly tone. He was one of their warmer parents, Izuku enjoyed his funny walk with his cane. "We'll begin with our Viper pledge. Now all repeat after me: I am useless."

"I am useless," the class echoed dutifully.

"I have no purpose," Mr. Compress continued and every word he spoke was given back to him. "I am lucky and grateful that I have been found by a family to take me in and give me purpose. I will not be weak. I will not be soft. I will not be kind because these are things that could hurt the family."

Everyone repeated what he said, believing the full sentient.

"Perfect!" Mr. Compress said happily. "We'll start today's lesson now! We'll be going over the geography of Tokyo and then dive into our Mandarin, Korean and English lessons."

All the students pulled out their textbooks and pencils.

As Mr. Compress started lecturing, Izuku stared a bit too hard at his neck. Imprinted on his skin in black ink like the other caretakers was the mark—his was 45.

Marks were a symbol of belonging, according to Mr. Compress.

They had a big event for getting them: The Cull.

Every year, everyone who turned ten got to participate in it. If any of them got the mark they were officially a part of the Mamushi family. If they failed to get it, then that person would be kicked out of their paradise to live a terrible life in the cruel outside world.

The outside world was terrible and the people in it lived horribly. There were no meals every day. No shelter and warm beds. There weren't any language lessons and fighting lessons. Because of this people on the outside lied, tricked others, and were often violently jealous of one another. It was a vicious cycle that bred endless tragedy in the world.

However, their sanctuary kept them away from all of that.

Here they had food, water, warm beds and school. Everything they needed was here according to all their caretakers, but they would have to prove if they were worthy of it once they turned ten.

Izuku didn’t believe that the outside was all that terrible until he saw how Kacchan lived. The people in that alley seemed so unhappy, cold, and miserable.

But most days Izuku felt like that too. He cried often, bled just as much. He was lonely and he was terrified of Tomura, Himiko and Sen. He used to want to do well at The Cull in order for everyone to stop picking on him.

But now he wasn’t sure after he met Kacchan. Kacchan liked him without the mark, so why did he need it? Because of this, Izuku didn’t think bringing Kacchan here was still the best choice. All he could see was Himiko, Sen or Jin trying to beat up Kacchan until he bled like they did frequently to him.

But once they were on that train, marks wouldn’t matter. Family wouldn’t matter. Fitting in wouldn’t matter. He was going to leave with Kacchan, the best person in the world, and he wouldn’t need to be accepted.

Him and Kacchan were going to take care of each other, and they would live happily ever after like those romance people.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the midday break came, it was exactly 12:00.

All the classrooms let out and they always were allowed to choose how they spent the next hour. Many Bigs gathered their Littles during this time and took them for more lessons and food. Others talked amongst themselves and joked.

For Izuku, well. He usually was alone.

It wasn’t that Tomura disliked him. It was the opposite actually. Tomura cared for him a lot—but Tomura needed his alone time ever since he turned ten to help manage his stress. If he didn’t get alone time, then he would be prone to vicious outbursts like the one that broke Izuku’s nose. Or the moment where Tomura was stressed that Izuku missed check in and lashed out terribly enough to break his arm. Or the time Tomura almost poked out his eye with the knives.

Tomura was always halfway himself during these times. When he settled back into his mind, he would tell Izuku he needed to get tougher so he could defend himself.

Izuku would nod but never really try to be tougher. He had no real need to train anymore since he was leaving with Kacchan. Izuku smiled a bit to himself at the memory of Kacchan kissing his cheek.

In place of spending time with his big brother, Izuku would go grab his favorite fruit and sit out in the courtyard during their breaks.

The courtyard was in the center of their home. The shape of their home was a hollowed-out triangle, with a large courtyard in the vacant area. It was filled with tall trees, pretty flowers, garden bushes and various athletic activities for all of them to enjoy. Izuku's favorite part is that it was big enough that he felt like he wasn't always crammed inside.

However, when he looked on all three sides, the tall building was towering over him large enough to be a wall. He supposed this was almost like freedom—not quite but close. He looked up towards the sky, and the glass roof over their head was protecting them from the snow and outside weather.

He hoped Kacchan was staying warm. Maybe they should pack an extra blanket.

Izuku ate his food on a bench far off in the corner. This was his favorite spot because it was secluded and he had the perfect view of one of their big brothers, Hiryu.

Hiryu was fifteen years old, strong, and he moved as graceful as a dancer whenever he practiced his martial arts. His long black hair flowed like beautiful, spilled ink in the wind and his body made so many interesting shapes as he kicked, punched and moved around the training grounds.

Next to Hiryu on a meditation mat was Tomura, reading up on one of their toxicology books.

As Izuku was appreciating a very intricate combo Hiryu performed, a wall of smaller bodies blocked his view. Izuku frowned deeply, swallowing the bit of banana he had bitten off.

"Hey, wittle 'zuku," Himiko mocked. She waved and tilted her head with false innocence. "How was your day?"

Izuku kept his head down. He took another bite of his banana to help him not tremble.

He wouldn't miss this once he and Kacchan were off to Okinawa.

"C'mon, you're not going to talk?" Sen asked, a lot less nice than Himiko. "It's rude."

"My day 's fine…" Izuku mumbled.

As expected, all the kids laughed at his lisp. Izuku held back tears as he clutched the fruit in his hand. He glanced up to see their twisted faces leering at him.

In the background both Hiryu and Tomura stopped what they were doing and glanced over.

“You’re right, Himiko. He does still sound like a baby,” Sen sneered. He jammed his finger into Izuku’s swollen nose, making him flinch harshly. “A weak little baby.”

“Leave me alone,” Izuku snapped.

He swatted Sen’s hand that reached out to jab at his nose again. Which unfortunately earned him being grabbed by the wrists by Sen. Izuku yelped when the larger boy shook him, making all his food fall into the grass.

“Or what, runt?” Sen jeered. He leaned all the way into Izuku’s space, and it made Izuku shy away. “My big brother says I can push around weak people all I want. It’s what we’re going to do for the rest of our lives so why not start with you? You’ll never get your mark.”

“Sen. Himiko.” A loud, booming voice stopped everyone.

All eyes turned to the larger figure approaching. With a frown meant to make everyone halt was Hiryu stalking up to them. Sen dropped Izuku’s wrists, Himiko straightened out and Izuku quickly scrambled to pick up his fruit. He stopped midway when crawling ants were now making their way on top of the open banana. Izuku pulled his hand back into his lap.

“That’s enough,” Hiryu commanded forcefully. He glared down at all the young kids. “If I catch you again troubling Izuku, I’m going to report you to Nine.”

Nine.

That name alone was enough to make everyone in the vicinity stop.

Tomura was now paying full attention to them.

Sen, Himiko and the couple other kids there were clustered startled at the name drop. They backed up, but not before Sen shot Izuku a heated glare and stuck his tongue out at him. They scattered, going off elsewhere in the large courtyard out of sight.

“Thank you Hiryu,” Izuku said. He looked down sadly at his lost piece of fruit. “Were you really going to snitch on them to Nine?”

“No,” Hiryu admitted with a smug smirk. “But it got them to run off didn’t it?”

Izuku was smiling fully now. “You’re the best.”

“Don’t mention it,” Hiryu laughed. He bent down and ruffled Izuku’s hair with a concerned stare. “You know, they will keep picking on you unless you fight back. You’re supposed to be mean to people who are mean towards you. Twist Sen’s left wrist counterclockwise next time. He fractured his radius last summer and it never healed properly.”

Izuku nodded. “I will try to be mean next time.”

“That’s what I like to hear.” Hiryu’s eyes caught the banana on the ground. It was swarmed with tiny red ants now. “Are you still hungry?” Izuku nodded, opting against speaking in shame of his lisp. “Okay. Let’s go get some food then get that nose of yours checked out. It doesn’t look like it’s been properly reset at all.”

Hiryu held out his hand for Izuku and Izuku eagerly took it.

In the background, Tomura could be seen shaking his head and returning back to reading. The disgust in his face made shame twist and pull inside of Izuku. He knew it was because his brother agreed with Sen and Himiko. Tomura cared for him, but Tomura thought he was weak.

Izuku decided he would only miss Hiryu when he left with Kacchan.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The rest of the day blew by as usual. They returned to the classrooms at 13:00 and continued on with their language lessons. They wrapped the day up with a physical lesson where they practiced balance and form for fighting. Once Mr. Compress gave everyone a nod of approval with their stances, they were free to go at 17:00.

Big Brothers and Sisters were waiting outside their respective classrooms for their Littles. This was the time that they would train with their Littles or give them extra lessons. Sometimes they would eat together.

Tomura wasn’t into doing much with him during this time.

They ate quietly and then went back to their room. Tomura gave him an unpleasant scowl and rolled his eyes once the door was shut.

“Hiryu won’t always be there to save you,” Tomura pointed out while not looking at him. “He needs to stop fucking babying you. It’s an act of violence to shelter you like that knowing softness is punishable.”

Had this been a year ago, Izuku would’ve been hurt by Tomura’s words. But right now, the sting of them went in one ear and out the other because in one day, he’d be on a train with Kacchan.

Izuku nodded to cover up how he wasn’t listening and stiffly took a seat at his desk. He pulled out his Mandarin textbook and began quietly practicing the characters.

“I’m going down to the training facilities,” Tomura announced. He changed swiftly into his training gear that was dark green sweats with a white snake on the back of the shirt. “Do you want to come?”

“No. I need to work on my pronunciation.”

Tomura nodded, agreeing. “Good choice. Okay. I’ll be back at 23:00 for the nightly check in with Ms. Nagant. Keep studying and try to work on your stuttering too. It’s getting annoying.”

Izuku nodded again.

Tomura left out like he always did and never looked back. Which filled Izuku with giddy excitement. He sprung up from his chair and looked down at his little yellow watch.

It was 17:40. Perfect.

Izuku smiled with his crooked teeth and quickly rushed to grab his coat and boots. He put them in his backpack so he could be discreet.

Getting out was always trickier than getting in. He put his green backpack over his shoulders and opened the door for their room. He peaked around the hallway and saw some pairs of siblings talking and laughing with each other. Izuku blended in well, he kept his head down.

He took the elevator today. He admired the crystal buttons and the shimmery aesthetic of their home. Then he pressed the down button with his tiny finger. The glass doors opened for him and Izuku shuffled inside. He glanced over his shoulder and from up here he could see all the various floors of people bustling about.

He never really knew what happened on the other floors with the other siblings, but the view as he was lowered down was always amazing to him.

An indoor garden was at the lobby level, and people with folders were shuffling in and out. From his top view they started off looking like little ants until they morphed into recognizable people once he got to the lower levels.

Once the shiny doors dinged open, Izuku shuffled out in the crowd. No one paid him any mind for some reason. Izuku thought maybe they potentially assumed he was on his way to train with a Big Brother or Sister. The caretakers walked around in their white suits and dresses with clipboards. Their eyes were always glued to their papers scribbling marks with their green pens.

Izuku supposed they thought they had nothing to worry about. There was only one entrance that everyone knew. Those same doors were the only exit. As far as any caretaker knew, no one was ever able to get in or out with their knowledge.

When Izuku passed through the lobby, he stared at the one set of doors. They were stationed at the top of the triangle shape. Tall, shiny and opaque.

On either side of the doors were large, golden statues of snakes. Their eyes were emeralds and Izuku could have sworn those gems were boring into their souls. Next to these statues were four guards in green suits with rifles in their hands. Their eyes were always distant and glazed over as they watched the doors.

Izuku walked to the other side of the building with his head down and then slipped into the stairwell discreetly.

He walked down to the remaining levels to a part of their home that was always off limits.

The basement was similar to upstairs only it was darker and there were no kids. Eerie sounds arose like ghosts down here and sometimes Izuku swore he heard begging—but he never saw any faces.

He crept quietly to the backroom, heart racing in anticipation of seeing his best friend.

Then Izuku's breath caught when he heard footsteps shuffling his way.

He froze immediately. He wildly darted his eyes around and spotted a small crate next to him. Izuku ducked rapidly behind the large object and scooted all the way into the corner filled with shadows.

The footsteps gradually grew louder and as did the voices.

"What do you want us to do with the defective boy?" The voice of a man asked.

"What was his name again?"

Izuku's nerve endings lit on fire—he knew that voice. It was Nine.

"Mirio. The thirteen year old with blue eyes, blond hair and large build."

"Ah. 111." Nine sounded deeply agitated. "He's still in good physical shape, I'm sure he'll make use elsewhere. Ship him to Moore for money. We have no use for the ones who have trouble pulling the trigger. But how was his empathy level not caught sooner?"

"It seems like he was masking his emotions well," the second voice explained.

"Tell the caretakers to double the intensity training next week," Nine said. "I don't want another repeat of this. He's the second Phase Two Viper to act out. The last thing we need is for this to work its way up to One."

"Yes, sir."

The footsteps and voices grew further and quieter.

Izuku peaked from the side of the crate. His heart was pounding at an insane speed because Nine was not someone any of them wanted to come across. While Ms. Nagant was never nice, Nine was worse. Nine was cold beyond Izuku's understanding.

Izuku hurried quicker to the back room now. He pulled open the black door and crept inside. It was a useless room no one ever came inside of for all he knew, but it was used to store clothes for them in case anyone needed an extra pair. He often borrowed from it, giving all he could to Kacchan without anyone noticing.

Eagerly, Izuku pulled out his winter gear.

He pulled the plush hat over his ears and zipped up his coat all the way to his chin. He placed his school shoes inside of the backpack and neatly tucked it away behind one of the many shelves.

The final touch was one Izuku loved the most.

He opened his pencil case and pulled out the string ring he always wore around Kacchan. Izuku nervously pushed it on the finger that Kacchan taught him to and grinned wide.

With a big huff, Izuku dug his fingers into the ground. He precisely tipped the tile on one end to up end the other and quietly shoved it to the side. He smiled as he lowered himself into the dark underground.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku pulled his hat down further on his ears when the winter winds blew. He happily ignored it though and made his way dutifully towards Kacchan. When he arrived at the plaza, the sounds of familiar violin music greeted him.

However, when he got closer his pace slowed down.

Kacchan wasn't on the bench like he normally was.

Izuku's stomach tightened.

He walked up towards the violinist and glanced around the barren plaza. There was no one else besides him, the violinist and the forgotten statue of the angel that was weeping. The elder man smiled at him through his shivering.

"Hey there, little one!" The old man greeted him with his crooked smile. "How are you this fine winter evening?"

"I'm 'kay," Izuku mumbled, distracted. He was still searching around for blond hair and red eyes. "D-Did Kacchan come see you today?"

The violinist stopped playing.

Now his brown eyes were slightly concerned, like Hiryu's were sometimes. The elder man scratched his forehead and looked around and then offered Izuku an apologetic stare. This was the first time Izuku had seen him not blissfully happy.

"No. Sorry, little one. I thought he would come with you."

Izuku bit his lip to hold back the tears.

He looked down at his watch. It was 18:00.

“Kacchan!” Izuku called out loudly as he stumbled into the abandoned church.

The glimmering lights from the stainless glass windows filled the space as he repeated the nickname over and over again. Any other time Izuku would have marveled at how painterly the scene was, but right now he didn’t. He was frantically searching for blond hair and red eyes.

“Kacchan! ‘m sorry! Please come out! I didn’t mean to be late!”

Izuku sobbed to himself when he saw the nook was empty again. All of Kacchan’s things were still here exactly like they were yesterday. Suddenly, it didn’t seem like his best friend was simply walking around.

Was Kacchan safe?

Izuku had no idea as he stared around through his bleary eyes. He searched the church up and down, thinking maybe this was an extreme game of hide and seek. Sometimes they played catch the Kacchan—maybe this was like that? Yeah. It had to be a game. Izuku told this to himself, it was a game to find the Kacchan.

His vision was full of tears as he tried his best not to have a meltdown. He walked around Tokyo looking for blond hair and red eyes. Every time he saw someone similar to Kacchan he snapped his neck to see, only to find out he was mistaken. He searched until he was nearly out of time and finally sat down on the snow-covered bench in front of the violinist.

Izuku cried into his gloves.

“Do you want to try playing my violin, little one?” The elder man asked quietly.

Izuku lifted his head to see the man smiling sadly at him.

He nodded slowly as he stared at the pretty instrument. “You really would let me?”

“Of course! I used to be an amazing instructor in my other lifetime. I am multi-talented!”

The violinist put on a goofy act, clearing his throat and introducing himself as if he was in front of a grand ball. It made Izuku laugh through his crying and cheered him up enough to ease his sadness. Izuku watched intensely as the man began instructing and breaking down how to play the delicate instrument.

Then like a daydream, the elder man handed the violin over to Izuku.

Izuku took his gloves off and held the violin closely. Warmth ignited in him and lit up his tiny heart as he smiled sadly.

“Thank you,” Izuku whispered. “This is so nice of you.”

“Not a problem at all, little one,” the elder man smiled. He then helped Izuku poise correctly and helped the placement of his chin on the violin. “First lesson starts today.”

Izuku lost himself to his very first violin lesson.

He never thought of what it would be like to learn something that wasn’t human anatomy, or the entire geography of Japan. He stared at his hands in amazement that they could do something besides shoot a gun and throw knives at targets. Then gradually, he smiled when the image of Kacchan appeared in his mind as he started poorly playing the violin.

He closed his eyes and saw them dancing in the clouds together.

Then Izuku opened his eyes and caught a glimpse of the wedding band on the violinist’s finger. His sullen eyes glanced down to the string ring on his tiny finger as he played. He played harder as he gripped on tightly to the hope it represented.

We’re married. It’s okay. Kacchan said that they wouldn’t be separated again. They were going to board that train together and start a new life.

Izuku told this to himself the rest of the night to keep himself from crying.

Then he told this to himself the next day.

And the following.

And the next day after that.

He told himself this every day following and soon winter bled into one continuous snowstorm of loneliness. Young Izuku found himself practicing the violin every night in hopes that the song would bring the other boy back to him. But no one ever came. It was only him and the old man who always taught him something new every evening.

But Izuku waited and played no matter what.

Because he needed Kacchan and Kacchan needed him.

ᔓᔓᔓ

11 years before the incident

It was winter again and Izuku was nine now. He knew that because Ms. Nagant told him he needed to stop crying so much for his age after Mr. Compress hit him for scoring low on the knife throwing exam. It was unbecoming.

Izuku was nine now. He knew that because often he heard Tomura and Hiryu harshly discussing what was going to become of him at the age of ten—which was only a year away. Tomura had locked him in their room when he said he was sick of looking at him after he saved a butterfly.

Izuku was nine now. He knew that because it had been exactly a year since he last saw Kacchan.

Out of all three things proving his new age, only one hurt the most.

Izuku still went to the plaza every day through the secret passage no one knew about. He missed Kacchan so much some days it felt like his chest was caving in like one of those black holes they were taught about. The pain was threatening to consume him from the inside out if nothing was done. But nothing could be done because Kacchan was nowhere to be found.

In his endless search for blond hair and red eyes, Izuku always made sure to return in time for Ms. Nagant's nightly check in and feedback.

Her cold eyes were hardening with each passing day, and it seemed like she was meaner now. If she caught someone crying, she sent them to an isolation room. If she found out someone received low marks, they were given several licks with a long switch and were forced to say the equations correctly. Worst of all if she heard anyone stutter she made them squat until she was satisfied.

Something had shifted in all of them.

The Big Brothers and Sisters were more serious now. Forcefully training their Littles in combat style techniques. Most students went to their rooms limping with bruises. Many nights Izuku sat in cold ice in his bathroom across the way from Tomura's.

The caretakers were stricter. It didn't take a genius to figure out if the caretakers looked at you while ticking something on their clipboard, it was bad. Especially bad if someone was caught having an outburst of crying too much. The students were immediately dragged off somewhere by the large security guards in all green. Sometimes they returned. Sometimes they didn't.

This was enough to make everyone weary of having an outburst or showing weakness in front of the caretakers.

It came to a point where fear was strangling them. Or only some of them.

Many were thriving such as Himiko, Sen, and Tomura.

The division was clear who sought pleasure in this. The ones who were the cruelest were awarded in front of everyone to see, which inspired more cruelty like a vicious cycle no one could truly escape.

Izuku was one of the few who didn't want to aspire to such meanness because he was still dead set on getting on that train and never coming back.

He was still holding onto his wish that Kacchan would come back to him.

Izuku could feel something inside of him hurting though. He wondered if it came with being older or if it came with the pain of not seeing blond hair and kind red eyes. Whatever it was, it hurt—and it felt like a part of him was breaking.

The seasons had fully cycled but in Izuku's heart it remained winter the entire time Kacchan was missing. He started wondering if maybe Kacchan left on purpose—maybe Izuku was too tiny and weak for anyone to like him.

His own siblings hated him so why would someone as wonderful as Kacchan love him?

But a small voice in the back of his head was whispering something else. Something far worse than losing the affection of the best person in the world. His other theory was that Kacchan could've been dead somewhere, eyes rolled in the back of his head and body half frozen in the city streets.

But Izuku hoped that would never be true.

He wished every night on all the stars he could find that Kacchan only stopped loving him and was not dead.

ᗰᗰᗰ

On a particular night, Izuku walked back to his home in the neon-lit city. He had spent the evening with the violinist learning a new chord but for an unspoken reason the music reminded him of Kacchan. It was strong, loud, and explosive even. Everything he loved about Kacchan.

Deep in his thoughts, Izuku casually passed by a bookstore. The loud sound of fake gunshots reached his ears and made his head turn out of instinct.

His crying slowed up as he stared at a scene that confused him.

He strolled up slowly to the large window in the crowd. As people passed him by, Izuku stayed glued to his spot. There, he saw on the small television screen a tall, blond man with blazing red eyes. Like Kacchan. The man's hair was straight as a pin and flowing with the breeze as he stood proudly holding a rose out in his hand. He was giving it to a woman in front of him who was beautiful beyond belief with chocolate brown hair and honey-colored eyes.

Young Izuku tilted his head when he noticed their wedding bands.

The woman on the screen splayed her arm across her head, swooned and fell into the man's arms, easily caught. Izuku stared on, as they kissed and then a subtle pink blush arose on his cheeks when he realized what was happening.

This is romance like Kacchan showed me Izuku thought to himself.

He started twisting his fingers together, feeling a tightness of want in his chest.

However, the longer he stared the more he fixated on the man's features.

Blond hair and red eyes.

Izuku smiled a bit to himself because he wondered if Kacchan would look like this when they were adults. He stepped closer and decided maybe not exactly like this man. Kacchan had sharper eyes. And he only smiled on special occasions. Kacchan also always did a thing with his face where he grinned with a lopsided confidence and his eyes were always full of fire as he talked.

Izuku watched the whole video as it played out dramatic, exciting scenes. One scene was of the man, shirtless, lost in the desert, searching for his love. Another scene was of the woman fighting off several guards and successfully escaping. Then all the tiny kisses and romantic moments between the two. Izuku softly giggled and blushed whenever it showed something romantic on the screen—then at the end it showed a terrible cliffhanger that caused Izuku to gasp.

He pressed his hands against the glass window, confused. Where's the rest?

"Want to continue the romantic adventures of Saishū kōkyōkyoku?" The disembodied voice on screen asked. Izuku nodded eagerly. "Then come buy the book here to join our hero and heroine and their epic, romantic adventure!"

The screen showed a book in glittering, lavender light.

Izuku's eyes sparkled.

He stared at the man with blond hair and red eyes once more before marching into the bookstore.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku crept into their room quietly that night with the book safely tucked in his backpack. The bookstore owner told him he was too young for it, but Izuku quietly stuck it in his bag when no one was looking and darted.

When he arrived in his room, per usual, he arrived before Tomura. His big brother always trained late, making sure his fighting skills were in top shape.

Izuku rolled back the black rug by his bed, exposing the wooden floorboards underneath. He carefully used his knife to unhinge one of the planks. He loosened it until he could tip it like the tile piece downstairs. He checked the size of it and smiled when his new book fit perfectly inside.

After Tomura came back and Ms. Nagant did her nightly assessment of them, Izuku waited until it was the deep hours of the night to slowly sink to the floor. He reached into the floorboard and grabbed his book and opened it up to the first page.

Immediately, the man with blond hair and red eyes appeared in his head.

Then gradually as he read, the image filled out to an older version of Kacchan. Izuku smiled, envisioning Kacchan as he read. He could perfectly see this as him and Kacchan holding hands and running away together like the couple in the book.

As he read for an hour, it became clear to Izuku he could get in a lot of trouble if this book was found.

Their caretakers made it a point to tell them they were only allowed to read from literature they selected. All of the books they could check out in their home's library centered around cruelty or exposed the crimes of mankind. It was stories that reinforced how horrible the outside world was.

But this book—this book gave Izuku some layer of hope that the outside world wasn't that terrible.

Romance seemed so nice.

Hand holding. Smiling. Caring for each other. All these things Izuku was punished for at home, but in this book the characters were free to be nice without consequences. It reminded Izuku of all the warmness Kacchan always gave him. Kacchan was the first person to show him people could be kind and not everyone was terrible and mean. He introduced romance to him, and for that, Izuku was more than thankful.

To keep the sadness at bay, Izuku read for an hour in the dark every night from that book. He didn't know what some of these strange words meant like 'cherish' or 'endearment' or 'devotion'. Whenever he tried to locate them in their Viper Academy dictionary, they were nowhere to be found. Other normal words he knew were there such as 'antagonize' and 'revolt' along with 'loathe'.

Izuku didn't even understand what some of these characters were doing. These types of actions were foreign to him, and he had never heard of some of the stuff they were doing. However, there were some phrases he knew in this book thanks to Kacchan.

Kissing. Marriage. I love you.

Izuku smiled at the very few parts he could understand. He decided to read those ones over and over.

"I love you, Kacchan," Izuku whispered in the dark as he read the confessions on the page. He wet his lips out of nerves and tasted the words on his tongue. He quietly smiled with a blush saying the words out loud. "I. Love. You."

Izuku was giddy a bit, suddenly full of hope that he could practice saying 'I love you' for when Kacchan finally came back to him.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The months passed on and Izuku was once again quietly sneaking out. How many times had he done this? He had no real clue anymore.

He wandered through the vast underground of Tokyo, admiring it as he went with images of romantic adventures in his head. He grazed his hand along the surface of the gigantic pillar, appreciating how sturdy it was. He giggled as he thought about showing Kacchan this underground and maybe they could act out scenes from that book together.

"This way, Izuku!" The voice of Kacchan said in his head. He could perfectly envision the bigger boy proudly leading the way with his beaming grin. "I'll protect you! We can make it to Okinawa this way!" Izuku smiled sadly at the daydream in his head.

He hummed a bit, walking around the corner to find his exit.

Then Izuku's heart dropped all the way into the cold ground.

Standing there stationed by the exit tunnel was Tomura. His arms were crossed, and an ugly scowl was pulling down on his face. Izuku's mouth gaped, and his eyes stretched wide. His limbs began shaking as he stepped backwards in disbelief.

How did he—

Then his brother's deadly eyes cut up to him.

The first instinct Izuku had was to run.

He bolted in the opposite direction and immediately Tomura chased after him. Izuku's breathing labored as he pushed his body further and further as fast as he could. He skidded, nearly toppling over when he switched directions in hopes of losing Tomura.

But his brother was quicker. Older. Better trained. He tackled Izuku to the rough, concrete ground in an instant.

The skin on Izuku's face shallowly tore open from the uneven surface grinding against his cheek as they collided. Izuku screamed loudly, and Tomura grunted in frustration. Izuku was roughly turned over and slammed on his back. His whole world spun in dizzying circles as his brother fisted the collar of his uniform and pinned him down to the ground.

Izuku tried to open his mouth to yell for Tomura to let him go but he was brutally backhanded before any words could come out.

"Are you out of your mind?!" Tomura screamed. His voice bounced all around the empty space, sounding as frightening as rolling thunder. "How long, Izuku?! How fucking long have you been sneaking out?!"

Izuku coughed violently. His mouth filled up with the taste of iron as his lip split open. He tried to cry, but Tomura gave him no room to do so. Strong fingers dug into his jaw and forced his mouth open.

"No goddamn crying. I'm sick of your pathetic ass crying! You better speak right now," Tomura demanded.

"T-Two years," Izuku gasped.

Instantly, his brother's grip on his jaw went entirely slack and Izuku lobbed his head to the side, sobbing.

Tomura sat up and stared at him in horrifying shock.

"So all those days you said you were studying…" Tomura trailed off. "…This is why you're so far behind in everything." He ran a shaky hand through his hair. "This is why you're so weak."

Izuku hung his head away in shame. "I'm sorry."

His brother pulled at his silver hair and groaned out loud. His eyes stared wide at the ground unfocused. Panic was eroding all over Tomura's features as he glanced around frantically.

"…This is my fault, isn't it?" Tomura whispered wearily.

Izuku kept his tongue still. He knew Tomura wasn't asking him.

"I should've kept a closer eye on you." Tomura punched the ground next to Izuku's head with a frustrated grunt. Izuku flinched and screwed his eyes shut. "Jin never lets Sen out of his sight. I should've forced you to come with me every day to the training facilities. All this time, I actually thought you were too soft and scared to leave our room. But you've been tricking me. You're a liar."

Then Tomura frowned and refocused his gaze on Izuku.

"And where have you been going, Izuku?"

Izuku thought of Kacchan and his heart stopped. His mind searched for any other reason and was quickly drawing a blank. "I-I…"

"Tell the truth. You can lie to anyone else but never lie to me again, Izuku."

Izuku's jaw trembled. "I…I found a funny man on the street who plays violin. I thought his music was pretty…I've been going to listen to it every day."

It was partially true.

The first time he met Kacchan, he was listening to the violinist for the first time too. He had wandered around the streets of Tokyo in amazement at all the lights after emerging from the underground. But Izuku's ear caught on the sound of a beautiful song and walked towards it like he was in a trance. He sat down on the old bench, captivated by the way the man was playing the violin.

Shortly after, the world brought him Kacchan.

"Mediocre violin music?" Tomura sneered. "That's what you've been risking your life over?"

"I figured if I was caught I would get a couple of hits, but it wouldn't be a big deal."

“Leaving is the biggest strike anyone could get. It results in death.”

Tomura rolled off of him and roughly yanked Izuku up from the cold ground. He grasped his shoulder harshly and pulled him in towards him until they were mere inches away.

“Listen to me, and listen to me carefully,” Tomura hissed. “Recently, I learned how well our goddamn Littles do is a mark of assessment for Big Brothers and Sisters. So don’t be selfish. When I am cruel to you, I am cruel for the sake of our future. I need you. You never step foot outside of our home again or we will both end up dead.”

Izuku’s thoughts stopped when something didn’t click together.

“Dead?” Izuku questioned in a whisper.

Tomura’s expression grew colder. “Dead.”

“W-Why dead? Who would kill us?”

“I’m not supposed to say,” Tomura admitted, his eyes averted down at the ground. Izuku’s stomach dropped further because that was a yes to his question. Someone was going to not only hurt them but kill them if he left. “It’s part of protocol we don’t tell you until the moment is right, and if it's found out I did—I can be killed. There’s more at stake here than grades and assessments.”

Izuku thought about all the punishments he endured already. “Why would they kill us for something so small?”

“Nothing we do is small. Our actions carry a heavier weight than all of us.”

Izuku wrung his hands as his tiny heart banged loudly.

The tears pushing against his eyes were for too many reasons for him to count. If he had boarded that train with Kacchan, Tomura would have been killed. How could he be so reckless?

Maybe he was stupid like Tomura always said.

There’s so much I don’t know—

“Izuku, I care about you, even if I cannot properly show it,” Tomura muttered suddenly. He looked down at his hands sadly as if disappointed in them. “When you turn ten, things are going to drastically change for everyone. When the last person ages—you’re going to go somewhere that will test your abilities and only some of you will make it back.”

“T-The Cull?” Izuku whispered. “But that’s a nice event.”

“The Cull is not nice.” Tomura’s frown turned sour. “After that you will learn the world out there is awful. Everything we were taught about it was true and it will be in your face. There’s nothing but horrible, evil people polluting this planet. You never want to be a part of the shitty world out there. Everyone is always lying, judging each other like hypocrites, or bullying. It's all so pointless."

Izuku made a face and rubbed his wrists. "Himiko and Sen do all of that already. They are just as bad as the people out there."

"Exactly." Tomura exclaimed harshly. "But they are at least tied to you. They have to be considerate to an extent. The people out there have no alliance towards you—Himiko and Sen however do. But more importantly, I do. I…I have come to realize in our life circumstances that there's only us."

Izuku recoiled back, confused. "Us?"

"Me and you," Tomura clarified.

His brother motioned between them and then gingerly squatted down to Izuku's height. The gesture took Izuku by surprise, this was the first act of softness his brother had ever given him. Izuku liked it a bit more than he thought he would as he finally looked Tomura eye to eye and not gazing up at him terrified.

Tomura cupped his face and Izuku almost cried from the touch.

"No one else besides us will ever be fully trustworthy," Tomura said in a low voice. "But that's why you need to listen to me, Izuku. I am the only person who will ever have your best interest at heart. I may hurt you, but I would never kill you. So, please do as I say. Do you understand?"

"Yes," Izuku whispered, terrified at what had been revealed. "I understand, Tomura."

Tomura nodded, happy with the response. "Good. Now let's get home before we get killed."

He stood up to full height and held out his hand for Izuku to take. But Izuku didn't right away, feeling all sorts of things inside of him he couldn't decode.

He kept imagining someone killing them. Nagant or Nine would be good guesses—he could believe that. Sen and Himiko too. And if people were as horrible as Mr. Compress made them out to be, then who was left besides Tomura?

However, Izuku's mind wandered to Kacchan and the violinist. He furrowed his brow—conflicted.

"C-Can I go out one more time?" Izuku dared to ask.

Tomura's face dropped, and a deadly leer spilled into his features. "You're not serious are you?"

"One more. I-I won't be long. Please let me go one more time."

"And why should I do that?"

“I-I want to say goodbye to the violin man,” Izuku muttered, oddly ashamed. “I promise. Nothing more.”

Izuku stared down at his red boots so that Tomura wouldn’t see he was lying.

“Fine.” Tomura huffed. “Let this prove how patient I am with you, Izuku. No one else would be this kind after you nearly got them killed. Every second we’re down here is putting our lives in danger. I hope you realize that.”

“Th-Thank you,” Izuku whispered. He bowed lightly and waited for his cue.

Tomura waved his hand and rolled his eyes. He took a seat on the ground and looked up at the high tunnel ceiling. Izuku rushed out one more thank you before taking off to the direction of the plaza.

ɯɯɯ

When Izuku arrived, he was weeping as much as the statue of the angel.

He looked up at her eyes, and for once finally understood the type of sorrow that was captured in her face. The cracks that spread all over the statue’s body felt the same as the splintering pain that rippled through him. This was going to be the last time.

Izuku looked down sadly at his little yellow watch.

He waited, one last time. The violinist played The Dance of The Love Birds, one last time.

Izuku quietly cried the entire performance, and the violinist didn’t utter a word. When the time drew near for Izuku to leave, the violinist walked over and sat on the bench next to Izuku. He put the violin down in his lap and stared at it. He turned to Izuku with a solemn gaze.

“You’re sadder than usual, little one. Did something happen?”

“Is…Is the world really that bad?” Izuku asked, confused and afraid. He tried to wipe away his tears before they froze. “Y-You seem so nice. I don’t understand what’s real or not.”

The violinist of course scrunched his face. “Whatever do you mean?”

“My big brother and caretakers tell me everyone in the world is corrupted and horrible,” Izuku explained. “That everyone is evil or would think our family are monsters, so no one is worth our time. B-But I really liked spending time with you. I loved spending time with Kacchan—and you two weren’t bad. I-I don’t understand what’s true or not.”

The violinist didn’t say a word.

He leaned back on the bench and stared up at the statue. Then like a rising sun, he smiled gradually and warmly.

“The world is cruel,” the violinist answered in the clearest voice Izuku ever heard. His brown eyes were shiny with tears from his memories as he studied the snow-covered angel. “Your family is right. The world is judgmental and can strip away at the tiniest piece of kindness it sees. Devour it even. But that’s the beauty of life is that you can choose to stand in the face of all those sharp teeth and still choose to be kind.”

Izuku sniffled slightly, tears slowing. “A-And you’re kind, yes? You’re not bad.”

“Well, that all depends on who you ask.” A chuckle. “I have many people who would say I am selfish for throwing my life away and others who would say I am a terrible person. B-But one person would say I am perfect.” He lifted his wrinkled, veiny hand to show his silver band and smiled distantly. “As long as there is one person who thinks you are good, that is all that you need. That’s why I think you and your friend Kacchan are fated.”

Izuku stared at the glimmering silver on the man’s pale finger.

He twisted his string ring through his glove with a sad hint of hope. “You really think so?”

“I know so,” the violinist chuckled. He grinned wide with all his teeth and clapped his hands. “I-I never told you this little one, but The Dance of The Love Birds song—I had been too heartbroken to ever play it again after my life fell apart. But then I played it for the first time in years and both of you came and helped me perfect it! If that’s not fate I don’t know what is.”

Izuku’s eyes watered again. “Th-That’s a good point.”

“Exactly! You’ll find each other again. Fate works funnily because I never could have perfected my music without either of you. The universe gave me enough hope to play my song that day and you two both wandered into my sad life.”

“Your life s’not sad, sir,” Izuku whispered.

The violinist only smiled at him.

Izuku felt pain in his chest as he looked down at his watch again. The minute number switched and with it brought a heavy reminder that his time was spreading thin. Izuku took off his backpack and swung it around. His limb felt as heavy as his heart as he reached down inside of it to pull out a clear plastic bag of disorganized yen.

He thrusted it to the elder man.

The man nearly dropped his whole violin to the ground and scrambled to catch it.

“Wh-What is this?” The violinist questioned. His eyes bugged wide, and his throat caught. “Little one, where did you get this much money and why are you carrying it around? That’s dangerous.”

“I-I was saving it for me and Kacchan to start a life in Okinawa,” Izuku whispered. “I’ve been taking a couple of yen every day from a room no one pays attention to in my home.

There's a lot of money in there, and they never noticed the handful of bills I take when I pick the lock."

Izuku nudged the bag closer to the man, but now all the initial surprise was gone.

The violinist didn't take the money. "…Then why are you giving it to me if it's for your new life?"

"Because Kacchan s'gone." Izuku's voice broke, and his face distorted in pain.

His throat swelled; it hurt to even speak the words out loud—as if every stutter and syllable he could barely pronounce was clawing its way up and out of his throbbing throat. Izuku cried until the pain alleviated and the elder man didn't interrupt him as he grieved.

"He's gone," Izuku nearly hissed as he wept. "And this is the last time I'm allowed to go outside otherwise something bad will happen to me and my brother." Izuku lolled his head down and let his tears hit the snow. "All I want to do is wait for Kacchan to come back so we can be happy—but I can't. I ca-can't wait. Pl-Please take the money. You can use it to buy a new violin and keep playing pretty songs."

A lot more forcefully, Izuku thrusted the money into the elder man's hands.

This time the violinist took it. He wrapped his fingers around the rotund bag but didn't smile. He carefully tucked it inside of his satchel and then picked up his violin.

"Here," the violinist whispered. He pushed the ivory instrument into Izuku's empty hands. "In exchange for the money, you take my violin."

Izuku's crying slowly eased up in confusion.

"Wh-Why are you giving me this? This is your favorite thing, sir. You told us your wife made this for you."

The violinist nodded. "She did. She was a woodworker, and this was her finest piece of work. Which is why I think you should have it. This way you can remember how much fun we had together these past two years, and you can always remember your Kacchan until he comes back to you."

Izuku wished that would be true, but his hope was wearing thin.

The elder man saw his downtrodden stare. He shifted and picked up the old violin from the bench. He slowly shuffled over to his messy belongings and dug out his violin case that had a few spare dollars inside. He neatly packed up the violin for Izuku on top of the change, and clicked it shut.

With his trembling hands, he placed the item in Izuku's lap before speaking words that stuck with Izuku for a lifetime.

"Nothing lasts forever, but memories sometimes do."

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku wandered back to the abandoned church after his goodbyes with the violinist. The entire walk, he hugged the giant case of the violin as if it was Kacchan. He lobbed his head on it as he dragged his feet, using the case to support his head as he wandered to the tilting building.

He crawled in the usual way and stopped in the center of the isle. He looked up with his bloodshot eyes to the beautiful stained-glass image in front of him. He never had taken the time to study it before. His eyes were always on Kacchan, but now without the other boy he sadly appreciated the beauty of the snake and apple in the window. The glittering specks of green, red, purple and blue reflected everywhere and across his face as he stared up sadly at it.

Izuku did one last walk around.

Usually, Izuku never saw how tattered this place was because it was where his happiest memories happened. No more laughter meant he could see the cobwebs and the rotting wood. He could see the mildew and the way the ceiling had several holes. He could see how neglected it was.

With a heavy heart, young Izuku checked the shower downstairs.

He checked underneath all the benches.

He checked the upstairs attic and around the back.

He searched everywhere for Kacchan one last time, and he couldn't find any trace of the other boy. All Izuku was left with was their unfulfilled dreams and the new ache inside of his chest to accompany their sweet memories.

His mind stayed blank as he wandered in the nook and sat down. He brushed off a tiny speck of dust from the shelf out of habit. He had kept it clean for Kacchan in case he ever wanted to come back to him. But he supposed he no longer had to keep it clean or safe for Kacchan because Kacchan wasn't here anymore. Izuku glanced up at the All Might poster through his tears.

"He said we would always come back to each other," Izuku whispered, disappointed. "Why hasn't he come back?"

He had no more energy to let his sadness wreck its way out of him. Instead, he curled his fist bitterly and leaned his head against the back wall of the nook. He cried until his eyes were sore whenever he blinked, and his heart felt like nothing but a void.

He looked down at his little yellow watch and saw the time.

22:22.

Izuku's time was up.

Izuku shifted upright in the nook and reached in his backpack. He pulled out a small piece of paper and a pencil and wrote the one thing he had been waiting to say to Kacchan, in case he never made his way back to him. Because that's what he had said—they would always find a way back to each other.

I love you, Kacchan. Please come back.

Maybe if Kacchan saw this, then he would finally return. One way or another.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku crawled back down into the underground, feeling incomplete. He knew he had left a piece of him behind with that note. He looked sadly at the violin case wondering how his brother would react to him even having this.

When he was expecting the worst, he was a little stunned to find Tomura standing up looking around at the tall underground tunnel. There was a curious glint in his eyes that Izuku had never seen—it was close to inspiration. His brother ran his hand along one of the pillars in marvel.

"Is this connected to the flood system?" Tomura questioned, ignoring the violin case Izuku was towing.

"Uh, no," Izuku whispered. "It was abandoned during construction when the city decided to go for a different design. It's entirely vacant."

Tomura hummed, as if impressed. He put his hands into his uniform pockets and nodded around. His deep red eyes then turned to Izuku and caught sight of the violin. There was a split-second look of disapproval, but ultimately tiredness won.

"Let me guess, he gave you the violin as a goodbye gift," Tomura said flatly.

Izuku nodded, embarrassed. He gripped onto it tightly, expecting his brother to snatch it out of his arms and smash it to pieces. But Tomura didn't say or do anything.

"You can keep it," Tomura said without any emotion in his voice. "Make sure to hide it well from Ms. Nagant at night."

Izuku perked up, surprised. "Really? You're letting me keep it?"

His brother put his hand on his nape, causing Izuku to flinch. "I am. On one condition."

"Wh-What is that?"

"From this day on, you're going to dedicate your time to training seriously." Tomura's fingers dug into his nape as if he was trying to rip out the kindness directly from his skin. "No more softness from here on out."

Izuku's heart hurt a bit. He thought about Kacchan and the violinist who had brought so much light to his tiny life. Then he hung his head when he realized that he needed to do as Tomura said if he wanted to stay alive and safe.

"Okay. I understand," Izuku whispered.

Over the next few months, Izuku's mind and body were pushed to their limits. Tomura didn't ease up on him one bit and forced him to train in their room sometimes. Izuku had many nights where he questioned if this was all worth it to be a part of this family, but at the end of the day he had nowhere else to go.

So, he trained. He bled. He struggled.

He did everything Tomura said because Tomura always reassured him that he knew what was best for him.

One day during dinner, Tomura switched their smoothies when no one was looking.

"Drink mine instead," Tomura whispered. "Trust me on this one."

Izuku was confused because he thought their drinks were all the same. However, whenever he drank Tomura's smoothie, later that night Izuku found himself puking and heaving over their toilet.

Tomura would rub his back while Izuku sobbed and clutched his stomach.

"I-It hurts," Izuku whined as he dropped his head. He never felt anything like this, it was like fangs were gnawing at him from the inside out. He gasped a bit and tried to steady his vision. "Wh-Why does it hurt so much? I don't want to drink your smoothie anymore."

"You'll thank me later," Tomura said tiredly. "We're upping your tolerance early."

"Tolerance to what?" Izuku groaned.

Tomura didn't answer him. He simply rubbed Izuku's back some more and patted him down with wet towels. Izuku tried to ask again but instead he unwillingly heaved, and he could have sworn he tasted blood in his mouth.

Eventually, drinking Tomura's smoothie didn't hurt. It only gave him a dull ache in his stomach, and he was questioning what exactly was in their smoothies after that.

He then started noticing that there were specific smoothies given to students depending on their age. Izuku found this strange, but he had no time to think about it as he tried his best to focus on training for The Cull. It seems like all the Big Sisters and Brothers were pushing their Littles harder.

Tomura wasn't alone in his strife.

After school in the training facilities, Izuku would glance around at the various pairings.

Particularly, he would stare at Sen and his big brother, Jin.

Jin was one of the eldest, around seventeen years old. He had a funny, goofy personality that was deceiving in a terrible way. It was as if there were two of him. Jin's smile was a double headed demon that evoked false kindness in one face only to have the other side of him devour the person while they were distracted by his smile. Izuku realized if Jin smiled at someone, he likely was going to harm them.

That was of course, unless they were Sen. Jin loved Sen, even Izuku could tell. Sen was his pride and joy, and they were inseparable.

Sen and Jin were nearly matched in hand and hand combat at this point.

Izuku gazed in fear and amazement when Sen perfectly took down Jin. The pair high-fived and Sen puffed his chest out proudly. Then his eyes cut to Izuku and his smile transformed into a vicious threat.

Sen dragged his thumb across his throat while locking eyes with Izuku.

"Izuku," Tomura hissed. He snapped his fingers, drawing Izuku's attention back to him. "Focus on me. Remember if you get too distracted by what's going on around you, you'll lessen your chance of winning a match in combat."

Izuku slumped his shoulders and glanced down. "I'm—I'm really far behind…aren't I? Sen is basically perfect."

"You are, but pay them no mind," Tomura muttered. "Sen is far from perfect. Jin is instilling arrogance into Sen and arrogance leads to cockiness, which is a weakness, not a strength. Now let's go again. We'll go down to the shooting range after this to sharpen your aim."

Izuku nodded, understanding what Tomura was saying.

He melted back into his fighting stance and furrowed his brow. Tomura struck first, making Izuku wince in pain as he barely had time to dodge. But he took every hit and kept on his feet the entire time. They went several more excruciating rounds like this, and Izuku kept his focus on Tomura and only Tomura.

Part of him wished his brother would ease up, but mercy was not something Tomura knew.

10 years before incident

Over the next year, Izuku watched everyone in his life grow colder as they all aged to ten. Less and less emotion was allowed to be shown and many kids were willingly crueler to each other. The Big Brothers and Big Sisters were shorter tempered, and their caretakers were somehow icier.

Their training sessions were significantly intense, leaving multiple students with broken bones and bruises. Izuku often left with black eyes whenever Tomura lost his temper and even Himiko cried herself into a meltdown. However, she only did this once.

It was soon implemented that students who were caught displaying negative traits such as crying, hesitation, or anything the caretakers deemed as weakness were taken away to the basement. The student would be locked away in the basement any time from one day to three.

When they returned, they seemed hollower, and they never cried again.

Izuku quickly learned how to mask his emotions because of this.

He had no clue what was in the basement, but if it was enough to rattle Himiko—then he had great fears about it. He found a way to focus his mind whenever he wanted to cry or break down. When he felt those emotions incoming, Izuku crawled to the part of his mind that was warm.

It was the side of his memory that held Kacchan.

He could perfectly envision blond hair and red eyes and feel the kisses his best friend used to lay on his cheek. Izuku would smile whenever he thought about this, and he didn't feel the urge to cry. Even while being punished in front of the class for his stutter, Izuku took every hit with the ruler from Mr. Compress without shedding a tear.

He filled his head with beautiful thoughts of blond hair, red eyes and romance the entire time to keep him tethered.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After his punishment from Mr. Compress, Izuku wandered into his room without a peep. He noted that Tomura was sitting there on the edge of his bed. His brother was blissfully zoned out, dressed in all black gear, weapons secured to his body and speckles of red were on his face.

Izuku stiffened at the sight of blood.

Blood meant a red folder from Ms. Nagant, more than likely.

She always gave Tomura a red folder once a week. When that red folder was seated in his palm, a flicker of interest would spark to life in Tomura's eyes. He would come back calmer, and more than likely have evidence of a fight taped to him.

"I heard you didn't cry while you got hit in front of the class today," Tomura said. He turned his face, revealing a splatter of red blood caked on his cheek. "Is that true?"

Izuku nodded, not moving from the doorway. “It’s true.”

Tomura hummed and rolled his shoulders. “Good boy. I’m impressed you went from sobbing to quiet so quickly.”

“Thank you,” Izuku muttered.

Tomura stood up and stalked over to his wardrobe. He dropped his dirtied ski mask into the hamper and Izuku noticed a couple of injuries on his arm, as if someone was swinging at him with a set of knives.

“What’s your trick?” Tomura asked as he unbuckled his chest holster.

“I…I focus on something that makes me calm,” Izuku confessed quietly. “It helps me a lot.”

“Interesting. I do the same.” Tomura turned on the safety on all his guns and neatly put them back in his trunk. “I guess we’re more alike than I thought.”

Izuku tilted his head at his brother, surprised that there was anything that could keep Tomura calm and collected.

“Really?” Izuku questioned. “What makes you calm?”

Tomura’s smile twisted with cruelty. He walked over to Izuku, and the sharp smell of iron breeched Izuku’s nose. He wanted to flinch but didn’t move as his brother leaned down to whisper into his ear.

“The thought of killing disgusting people,” Tomura confessed. “I imagine myself slitting all of their throats as I sit on a throne as dark as black sand.”

Izuku recoiled immediately. He was taken back by the answer, not expecting such a staggering response. He thought maybe it was a joke—However, when he caught sight of the rare smirk on his brother’s face he knew it was the truth.

Tomura wiped the blood off his face with the back of his hand. A smirk sat on his lips and bloodlust curled in his eyes.

Izuku studied Tomura, and he could see something there that wasn’t before. It was deep, and endless as though the last pieces of Tomura’s kindness had finally been plucked clean from his mind and left a large gap.

It was a hole as big as the city they lived in and Izuku wondered if this was how he would grow up to be like.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the night before The Cull came, everyone seemed tense.

Tomura allowed a rest day for them the day before the event. He made sure to feed Izuku and they relaxed in their room going over tiny last-minute things. They both laid in the dark, quiet enough that anything could be heard. Izuku didn't reach for his book that night, and there was no snoring from his brother, which meant he was awake.

"Tomura," Izuku whispered in the dark. "What does cull even mean?"

He had searched for it, but in all instances he couldn't find it in any Viper Dictionary dictionaries.

"Cull has two definitions," Tomura said. "The first means to select from a large group."

"…And the second?"

"To slaughter the weak from the group."

ᔓᔓᔓ

To slaughter.

Izuku repeated that to himself the next morning and suddenly everything Tomura had warned him about was clicking into place. He knew better than to ask what The Cull really was, it was a forbidden topic according to Tomura—but they had been raised to know it was exciting and fun.

However, Izuku didn't feel like that was true when the day came.

All Izuku could feel on his skin was a unique type of fear. It was stronger than the terror he felt when Himiko or Sen leered at him. Or the strange sense of warning whenever Ms. Nagant's eyes squinted at him. This fear was heavy like an expanding black ocean inside of him. It was growing bigger and bigger with every second that passed.

All the Littles said goodbye eagerly to their Bigs with tiny backpacks on them. Some hugged. Some didn't.

Izuku watched curiously as a Big sister, Ibara, didn't exactly hug her little all the way. There was something sad in Ibara's eyes, and she refused to meet any of their gazes. She swept her long green hair out of her face and turned away from them.

Izuku gazed around, sensing something was wrong.

Tomura squatted down to his height and snapped his fingers in his face.

"Izuku," Tomura whispered seriously. "Remember, survive. That's all you have to do."

"Survive," Izuku repeated slowly. "I only have to survive."

Tomura nodded in approval and ruffled his hair. "You're going to be fine."

Izuku bit the inside of his cheek. His brother never lied—but this felt like the first time he did.

They were escorted out of their home with many eyes from all the floors peering down at them. Izuku stared behind him at Tomura, who was staring after him. He seemed worried which worried Izuku even more. Izuku could feel a small push of tears against the back of his eyes as Tomura's figure grew smaller and smaller. He could barely indulge in how giddy everyone his age was.

Sen and Himiko were holding hands, skipping. Other kids were discussing how they were excited to finally be a part of the family. They walked through the front doors for the first time in their lives and everyone stared around in wonder.

Izuku had seen the outside before, so he didn't stare too hard like everyone else. But he did note how the area where they live looked so different from his window. He could see gruff people with scars on their eyes staring at them with sickened smiles.

"Another year, another mass sacrifice," one man whispered within earshot. A sharp string of chuckles from people nearby. "They produce those fuckers like they're machines nowadays."

Izuku turned his head slightly to see the man grinning at them with a cigarette hanging out of his mouth.

He did a two-finger salute to them as they were loaded onto a large, metallic gray bus.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The bus stopped and they were rounded up like cattle to get onto a large boat.

Izuku stayed silent the whole time while the other kids gasped in amazement. The boat was fancy with gold decorations inside with plush rooms and chandeliers all over.

Below deck, on the walls of the boats were oil painting portraits of people from their family tree they had studied. When everyone else was running around having fun, Izuku walked up and down the green carpeted hallway looking at the faces.

The first portrait was Nine. Izuku recognized him as the head father of their home.

The next were a sequence of several other people with marks labeled 1 through 10. They were all around Nine's age with stale emotionless expressions. These were the people who ran the other homes of their family. They were taught there were nine other homes around Japan and they were all watched over by the Divine Ten.

Sitting there with the biggest portrait of all was the Grand Father, One.

His curly hair was entirely silver like coins and the wrinkles on his face showed his age gracefully. His red eyes were about as empty as his heart, and he was staring down at the viewer as if he ruled over everyone. They were always taught to be thankful to One and the Divine Ten for allowing them to live a life full of purpose in their otherwise meaningless existence.

Izuku stared up at the portrait for a long time when he noticed something he hadn't before.

One had very faint freckles.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They arrived on an island with a large, all black building. It was an exact duplicate to their home from the outside.

This time, everyone was silent.

The original happiness that blanketed everyone faded slightly. Now, there was only confusion as they were shuffled around towards the building. Izuku swallowed slightly as they were brought inside.

Unlike their home, this place was empty and sterile. This was how Izuku imagined hospitals to be from what Mr. Compress would describe.

They were pointed to the side of a large room with a row of tiny cubicles and pale white lights. They waded in nothing as the caretakers left, and the next set of people to enter the room made everyone's mouth zip tightly.

Izuku's eyes widened a bit when he saw Nine walk in coolly with his hands behind his back. His long, silver hair was brushed into a low ponytail and his dark suit was spotless with his purple tie. Right above his heart was a symbol of twin vipers pinned.

"Welcome to The Cull," Nine announced in a forceful voice. Everyone's backs straightened. "I'll be overseeing your time here for the next few days along with Ms. Nagant, Mr. Compress, and a special guest. The Governor of Tokyo."

The three people in question strolled out next.

The Governor had a very distinctive face. Rosy cheeks, pointed nose and jet black hair. He smiled with his eyes just barely like he was hoarding secrets. His hands clasped together as he waved to them, and everyone waved back to him.

Right behind him, Ms. Nagant and Mr. Compress appeared. They looked entirely different. It was as if a switch was turned on inside of them and they didn't smile or wave to them.

"You all will be given a test," Ms. Nagant explained. She gestured to the cubicles next to them. "It's a simple examination. Please answer as if you were in those scenarios and when you are done, turn in your packet to either me or Mr. Compress."

"An exam?" Izuku could hear Himiko behind him whisper. "That's what the cull is? What has all that target practice been for then?" She sounded disappointed.

"I'll take an exam over throwing knives," another kid answered Himiko. "I never had good aim."

Rows of caretakers then appeared. One for each of them.

The caretakers looked different now. They were dressed in all white still, but they had long, intimidating rifles strapped to their backs. In their hands was a metal clipboard and on their face was a mask. The mask was made of porcelain, obstructing their faces and only allowing a small gateway to their lifeless eyes.

Izuku shivered. It was eerie.

Their designated caretaker escorted them to the tiny desk area and stood directly behind them. There were exactly two pencils and a thick packet. Izuku peered behind him, and his unknown caretaker stared down at him.

“Begin,” Nine commanded.

Izuku didn’t write right away, and he could hear the caretaker behind him make a mark on their clipboard. Quickly, Izuku shook himself out of his mind and opened up the packet. He skimmed through it and when he realized that this was all life situations he understood the gist.

They’re testing us for our emotions, Izuku thought quietly. They’re weeding out weakness.

He thought about all the times he had been disciplined for showing negative emotions like kindness and crying then began answering the questions carefully. As he read through the booklet, he kept seeing scenarios from his romance novel. What the people did in that book was entirely different than how he assumed his family would want him to act.

Izuku answered every question with the opposite of what he would do.

He even thought quietly about what Tomura would do—the meanest person he knew.

Many of his own answers made Izuku wince.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku handed his packet to Ms. Nagant and she stared down at him as if he wasn’t there. The caretaker who was assigned to him directed him to a small room off to the side with the other kids and they all waited. It took hours for them to grade their tests. When the door opened, Mr. Compress was standing there with a clipboard and blank expression.

“If I call your name, please come with me,” Mr. Compress announced. Everyone held their breath. Name after name was called and slowly the room began thinning out. Izuku gazed on, unsure why but dread sank further and further into his stomach the longer his own name wasn’t called.

Then when the last name was called, Izuku looked around.

About 2/3^{rds} of them were left. Izuku surveyed the ones left and found Himiko, Sen and several other people he recognized and many he didn’t.

Nine then stepped into the room with the Governor.

“Congratulations, to everyone in this room,” Nine said with a hint of satisfaction. “You all passed the examination well enough, and you will continue on to the next stage of The Cull.”

An eruption of excited whispers broke out.

“E-Excuse me,” one boy timidly chimed. He raised his hand. “I-I have a question.”

Izuku turned his head, wondering who would be dumb enough to speak directly to Nine. There he saw a shy seeming boy with stark blond hair and purple eyes. He was a little bit bigger than Izuku and was curled into himself as if unsure of what he was about to say.

“Yes?” Mr. Compress answered.

“Um,” The boy cleared his throat when all eyes were on him. He held his stomach like there was a bad ache. “Wh-What will happen to the others? My other b-brother was a part of the names called.”

“They didn’t make the cut to be apart of the Mamushi family,” Ms. Nagant cut in. Her eyes narrowed. “That was it.”

“A-Are they going back home?” The unnamed boy pressed. “I want to say goodbye to him.”

“I’m afraid that’s not possible,” Nine spoke up this time. “They will be going elsewhere. You will not be seeing them ever again.”

The boy clenched his jaw and held back tears.

“Are there any more questions?” Nine asked sternly. He crawled his eyes over everyone’s face and was met with silence. He nodded. “Glad that is out of the way. Now please follow the caretakers for where you’ll be sleeping for the night.”

Izuku followed the caretakers, but not before glancing over his shoulder at the boy.

He felt bad for him.

ᔓᔓᔓ

That night they were all given new clothes. Every single one of them was given gray sweats with the symbol of a snake on the back, much like their clothes at home for training. Afterwards they were shoved into an elevator and lowered into the ground. They were brought to a large room with rows and rows of tiny beds and told to pick one.

Izuku’s nature led him to automatically linger behind the boy who had asked the question about his missing brother. Izuku didn’t speak to him, but he surveyed the other curiously out of concern. The blond boy had his head hanging low and he walked over to the corner of the room with the bed furthest away from the crowd.

Izuku took the bed next to him quietly and laid his head against the pillow.

Across the way Sen and Himiko were bragging about how well they answered the questions in the exam. They had gathered a crowd of other children and Izuku watched on in silence.

“Do you know them?” The boy finally spoke beside him.

Izuku rolled over to see the blond boy sitting up in his bed, clutching the sheets nervously.

“I do,” Izuku said quietly. “We’re on the same floor.”

The boy nodded. “What floor are you from?”

“I’m from floor ten,” Izuku said. He rolled over with a smile. “How about you?”

“I’m from floor eight.” The boy smiled back at him and seemed to un-tense. “I’ve seen you around a couple of times recently, but I don’t think you’ve ever noticed me. I usually train in the back corner with my Big sometimes at night. You’re Tomura’s little brother right?”

Izuku nodded. “Yeah. My name is Izuku.”

The boy held his hand out and his purple eyes sparkled with kindness.

“Nice to meet you Izuku, I’m Aoyama.”

ɯɯɯ

The next morning, they were brought to a cafeteria. There weren’t many details given to them, but the caretakers were aligned in rows against the walls.

It made Izuku feel cramped and as if there were thousands of eyes dancing across his skin. He stuck side by side with Aoyama for the rest of the day as they took a seat in the corner away from the loudness of Sen and Himiko.

“Good morning everyone,” Mr. Compress announced loudly to the cafeteria. He was void of his signature grin. Next to him was the Governor and Nine. “Today we will be doing some physical activities and examining your training skills. Please be sure to eat up today to make sure you have enough energy to perform at your best.”

The caretakers then stepped forward and placed down golden trays of breakfast food in front of them. Izuku was curiously waiting for the daily green smoothie to be given, but it wasn’t. They were given water instead.

“Wow, the food looks great today,” Aoyama muttered beside him. “I guess they really want to make sure we do our best.”

Izuku nodded. “It looks like they gave us extra serving too!”

Both boys giggled and picked up their utensils to begin eating.

Izuku hummed in delight when he plopped a bit of egg in his mouth. He always loved food and enjoyed everything they were served. Both him and Aoyama ate every single last bit of food on their plates as did every kid in the room in preparation for the day.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they were brought to the physical testing area by the caretakers. It was spacious and exactly the same as the one at home but more intense. There were knife throwing stations. Shooting ranges were off to the very far side and there was an obstacle course set up perfectly with no cushions.

Mr. Compress told them their first task was to jog around for an hour. This would get them warmed up.

Izuku easily jogged beside Aoyama when the clock started. The two talked casually but then a pain filled groan filled the air. Izuku's eyes widened with fear when Aoyama clutched his stomach and staggered.

"Hey, are you okay?" Izuku whispered when his new companion stopped jogging entirely.

Aoyama tried to answer him but instead of words, pain filled grunts came out.

"I-I'm fine," Aoyama hissed eventually. His voice was breathless as he doubled over and fell to his knees. "G-Go. Keep jogging, Izuku. They're watching and you could get in trouble for helping me. You know helping is punishable."

Izuku hesitated.

Aoyama was right but Izuku didn't want to leave someone behind who was hurt.

Izuku peered around and it was then he saw one caretaker staring at him, taking notes. Izuku bit the inside of his cheek and then started jogging again, leaving the blond boy behind him.

But he couldn't entirely drown out the nagging voice in his head telling him he was a bad person for leaving a friend behind. Izuku peaked over his shoulder to see Aoyama attempting to steady his breathing as many other kids jogged around him.

Then something odd began happening.

Izuku eased his jogging as if everything was moving in slow motion.

One by one kids all around him began clutching their stomachs.

Some powered through it and continued to run. Others fell to their knees and curled into balls crying. Others started heaving and clawing at their skin and suddenly others vomited on the ground. All around him sickness filled the facility as everyone began dropping like flies, releasing a putrid smell of vomit into the air.

Izuku gasped, whirling in full rotation in horror and held his hand over his nose.

Everyone was becoming sick. Izuku started hyperventilating, waiting and waiting for it to hit him—but it never came. Izuku's eyes were full of fear as he looked for Sen and Himiko to see if they had succumbed to it as well. But they both still were jogging but holding their stomachs. Himiko's expression was pinched in pain and Sen looked nearly blue in the face.

Izuku picked up his pace, keeping his hand tightly enclosed around his nose. He sidestepped vomit and bodies on the ground. Kids were crying hysterically. Caretakers soon were out on the floor cleaning and carrying away kids who were too weak to go on.

Izuku turned his head, searching for Aoyama and found his new friend slowly jogging—but jogging.

After the hour—more than half of the kids were no longer there.

Izuku was the only one who ran perfectly undisturbed.

Many eyes were on him after that. Particularly, Nine was surveying him curiously.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later that evening, everyone who hadn't passed out during the run was tested on their normal activities.

Izuku scored perfectly in knife throwing and the shooting range. He even did the extra activity of using the double guns for extra points. Over the course of the hours, the kids who had stomach aches pushed through it to still perform which earned a nod of approval from Ms. Nagant who was watching them.

Then afterwards they were each separately asked to give speeches in Japanese, Korean, Mandarin, Thai, Spanish and English. Izuku's nerves made him push through his lisp and stutter while under the eyes of Nine.

When they all returned back to their beds, several were empty. Izuku stared around at the few remaining and here he could see there were only a handful of them. Many kids who had passed out had been taken away and others who didn't score adequately on the physical examination were also asked to leave the building.

Later that night, Izuku watched Himiko stick a finger in her mouth.

When she pulled it back, there was blood.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the next day came, they were given another serving of food for breakfast. Everyone was weary of it and picked at it with caution. Izuku poked at his eggs, and curiously nipped on them. After an hour, nothing happened, and no one was falling over with stomach aches. The kids ate up the whole meal, ready to get on with the next day of events.

After their breakfast, they were then escorted into another elevator. They were lowered deep into the ground, and Izuku watched how the numbers sank further and further. Goosebumps slowly arose on his skin when he saw how far they were going.

“What do you think will be next?” Aoyama whispered to Izuku.

“I’m not sure,” Izuku muttered.

Izuku turned his head in the crowded elevator. He glanced up at the caretakers and their faceless masks. The elevator dinged and the rustic doors opened up. Then they were shuffled out into a scene Izuku would have never anticipated.

They were deep underground in an abandoned subway track.

The atmosphere was grayish green, overran with dirt and debris. It was large enough to fit at least five trains, making the concrete around them feel spacious. But Izuku wasn’t sure what to think of that. The train tracks were rusted on every inch of the metal. Then the caretakers told them to move until they were standing in the middle of the tracks. Directly in front of them was a large wooden stand, entirely out of place.

The elevator dinged behind them again, and more kids were brought down.

Once they were all gathered, heavy footsteps caught their attention.

Standing tall like a king, was Nine. His hands were behind his back, and his eyes were scrutinizing every single one of them. Izuku’s spine stiffened, and Aoyama slightly hid behind him.

Everyone waited for him to speak, but nothing happened. Instead, the caretakers started distributing tiny, black backpacks to them. Izuku frowned deeply at this, but took the bag, nonetheless. Aoyama did too with caution and Himiko did it with eagerness.

Once the caretakers finished, they all lined up like objects on a shelf.

Izuku glanced at Nine who was looking directly at him.

Everyone else around him began whispering as they opened up the pouches they were given. Out came knives, Band-Aids, and different types of first aid supplies. Izuku’s heart plummeted straight into the ground when it was clear what this was.

“Survive,” Tomura’s warning rang clear in his head.

Izuku swallowed as he opened up his own pouch.

Six knives. Five Band-Aids. A flashlight.

This was a survival test—and it was going to be violent.

“Welcome to the final part of The Cull,” Nine welcomed. “Congratulations are in order for you all making it this far.”

Beside him the Governor, Ms. Nagant and Mr. Compress walked up dutifully. Everyone marveled at them, but Izuku didn’t. He stared them down as he looked at the shiny metal in the backpack. His pulse quickened as Nine continued his speech.

“In a very special year, fifty of you have made it to the final part of this exam. However, we can only take in thirty as official members of the Mamushi family. This means there will be twenty of you who will not make the cut and be sent away with the others who didn’t pass.”

Gasps. Shudders. Whispers.

Nine pointed down into the long tunnel of the train tracks. Darkness stared back at them as the tunnels went into the deepest part of the underground.

“The first thirty to make it to the end of these tracks will be in the family and obtain the marks,” Nine announced. “The twenty who do not make it will be sent away from our care to suffer for the rest of their lives. Due to how serious this is, we will allow free reign. Do whatever you must do to ensure your spot. There are no limits or rules.”

Sen raised his hand.

Izuku’s stomach felt sick.

“Yes, Sen?” Mr. Compress called upon him. “Did you have a question?”

“Can we hurt the others to make sure we make it?” Sen questioned.

Izuku cut his eye to the other boy and staring right back at him like a twisted reflection was Sen. He was grinning with all of his teeth, mirroring his Big Brother, Jin. Izuku’s gut twisted terribly because that’s exactly how Jin smiled right before severely hurting someone.

“Yes,” Nine confirmed. “You all may do what you must. All that matters is that you are the first thirty to make it across to the finish line. There are no rules.”

Murmurs of violent delights swept across the crowd.

Izuku stayed frozen, and he realized that this was the real cull. The slaughter of the weak who were not suited to be a Mamushi.

“On my mark you will begin,” Nine commanded.

Izuku looked to his right, and he could see Aoyama’s eyes stretched wide with both fear and desperate need for belonging. His new friend glanced at him only once and then he turned his head towards the darkness in front of them.

Izuku knew then their brief friendship had simmered down to nothing now that it was everyone for themselves.

“One.” Nine held up his hand and everyone secured the backpacks to their bodies. “Two.” Everyone took sprinting positions, and focused. “Three.” Not a single soul breathed. “Run.”

Forty-nine bodies took off into the darkness willingly. But one stayed behind.

Izuku stood there, in the cloud of dust that was kicked up. He watched in disbelief as all of his siblings were swallowed by the various pathways of darkness, not even bothering to look back. Izuku did however, and he stared straight up at the adults looking at him. They were studying him as though he was stupid. Except Nine. Nine was staring at him curiously.

“Izuku, was it?” Nine questioned. He tilted his head. “You’re 117’s little brother, correct?”

“Correct,” Izuku confirmed.

“I’m interested in seeing how you perform,” Nine drawled out in his deep voice. “You’ve already been outstanding. But I expect no less from the little brother of the top student at the Viper Academy.”

Izuku knew a threat when he heard one.

That was a harsh reminder that his success was not his alone—it was Tomura’s as well.

He slowly strapped the backpack to his person. Then Izuku took a deep breath and plunged himself forward into the darkness.

Immediately his eyes strained, and his nose scrunched. There was barely any light down here and it smelled of rotten mildew. The few spotlights that were in the ceiling flickered with a yellowish tint that helped nothing. Izuku could vaguely see the rats on the ground that were scurrying about. When Izuku reached the crossroads, the five separate tracks led into five separate tunnels.

He could hear the voices of his siblings deep inside already. Many kids were tussling, screaming, and shouting that they had gone the wrong direction. Glimmers of distant flashlights were all over, waving like people were in distress.

Izuku then took a step back and looked at the five separate pathways.

He took out his flashlight and surveyed the five pillars that separated the different tunnels. There was nothing special about these pillars, however when Izuku flickered his flashlight up to the top of the one in the corner—he found their sigil spray painted at the top. He furrowed his brow at how discreet it was and then shone his light down the other four tunnels.

He walked down the branded one.

This tunnel was emptier than the rest it seemed. Behind him were the panicked voices of other kids who figured out they had gone down the wrong way. Izuku then thought about Tomura and his heart pulled in fear that his Big Brother may be hurt if he failed.

Izuku began to jog lightly, desperate to get to the finish line.

He moved through the various tunnels, trying not to give away he figured out to look for a viper symbol. It helped guide him down the winding tunnels that wove into each other like needle and thread.

The tunnels rotated between long narrow pathways of long tracks to large spaces of abandoned train carts waiting in the open on multiple railways. It almost seemed like a graveyard. The forgotten contraptions of metal were stacked on top of each other in different orders, making a strange obstacle course to navigate.

Then when he came upon one tunnel, he could hear a sickening sound of squelching not too far away.

The ominous laughter of Sen and Himiko mixed together.

Izuku flicked off his flashlight and melted into the shadows against the wall.

From his position, he could see a gruesome image. Himiko was holding another kid by the arms and Sen drove a knife into his stomach. The other kid screamed, thrashing harshly trying to throw them off. He begged for his life but neither Sen or Himiko eased up. Sen pulled out his blade that was now dressed in blood and expertly slashed it across the boy's throat.

Red blood rained down on both of them.

They didn't flinch. Himiko even closed her eyes and relished it as though she had been waiting to do this forever.

"Killing does feel as good as Ms. Nagant says it does," Himiko rejoiced. Izuku had to put his hand over his mouth to prevent from gagging out loud. "We should kill Izuku next, Sen."

Sen smiled sinisterly. "You read my mind. I bet that runt hasn't made it this far yet. We should backtrack a bit to try to find him."

"But won't that put us at risk of not making the cut?"

Sen sharply laughed. "We can kill some others on the way to even it out."

Izuku held his breath as they walked towards him and he crouched low. He slid underneath one empty train cart, laid on his belly and watched in fear. Sen and Himiko started calling out his name like he was a lost puppy they wanted to come home.

Then another kid rounded the corner, unexpectedly running full speed. Sen gleefully slung his knife directly between the boy's eyes, and Himiko's grin widened.

The body dropped dead in an instant as blood poured down the face.

Sen and Himiko walked away holding hands, laughing about it.

Izuku clasped his hand over his mouth in horror. He frantically stared at the endless darkness engulfing him and at the tunnel road ahead. He crawled quickly and quietly from underneath the train cart and began jogging deeper into the cavern. As Izuku was walking, he heard the quiet sound of faint crying. His pace slowed, and he knew he should keep going—selfishness was needed.

But he couldn't.

A flash of Kacchan crying appeared in his mind.

Izuku stopped his pace entirely.

He searched around, pulled by a clutching in his heart that was triggered. Izuku took a chance and turned on his flashlight to quietly scan around for the source of the crying. When he squatted down low, he found the source and it was a blond-haired boy, underneath another train cart with his face in the dirt.

Izuku furrowed his brow, and he tried his best not to compare how similar this boy looked to how Kacchan did when he first found him. Whoever it was covered in dirt and his blond hair and clothes were dingy. Izuku's heart strung tightly. He moved his flashlight towards the weeping boy and immediately the boy flinched and lifted his head.

Terrified purple eyes stared back at Izuku.

Purple. Not red.

It was Aoyama.

"Please don't hurt me," Aoyama whispered. He held up his hand to shield his eyes from the blinding flashlight. "P-Please I promise I won't cross over."

"Aoyama, it's me. Izuku," Izuku reassured. He flicked off his flashlight. "C'mon, we have to go now before someone comes back."

The blond boy violently shook his head.

"Leave me here," Aoyama cried. "I-I'm not suited for this. I'm too weak. I'm not at all like the others. Y-You didn't see how they tore each other apart. So many of them started shoving each other, then punching and kicking. Then it turned to a full-on brawl. I-It's horrible."

"Then that's even more reason to get up," Izuku hissed. He glanced over his shoulder weary. "If you stay here you might die."

"I heard that if we're sent away we're dead too," Aoyama gravely retorted. He was rocking slightly, holding his head. "Th-There's no winning. We're trapped. Trapped like animals."

"We have no clue if that's true," Izuku shot back. "It's better to at least make it to the finish line and be sent away than die here for sure. Please. Get up. I don't want to leave you here."

Izuku held out his hand for Aoyama.

The other boy stared at him like he had gone crazy for offering up altruism. Izuku didn't flinch at his stare, he knew that they were taught not to do this, but a light inside of Izuku forced him to. He couldn't ignore it otherwise the guilt in his chest would always eat him alive.

Aoyama took his hand. Izuku pulled him out from underneath the cart and they began to run off into the darkness. They both kept their hands clasped together in fear and kinship. Both boys used their flashlights and began working together. Aoyama led Izuku and Izuku led him back in the correct directions and the two of them were able to inch closer and closer to the finish line.

They came to a fork in the road eventually.

Two tunnels, one with a blinking red light and one with a green light.

Automatically, Aoyama started towards the one with the green light, but Izuku stopped him. Izuku shook his head and pulled on their interlocked hands. He jutted his head towards the tunnel with the red light.

“The Viper symbols have been painted in red,” Izuku explained. “And I think it would be too obvious to walk towards the green light. I don’t think Nine would be that straightforward.”

Aoyama hummed in agreement, and they began walking towards the blinking red light together. As they walked, there was no one else. Behind them were the sounds of distant screaming, or kids crying and begging to be let out from the maze. But they walked calmly towards that flashing red symbol, and Izuku hoped with all his heart that this would be the end of their nightmare.

“Thank you for helping me back there,” Aoyama said as they walked through the tunnel. “You’re nicer than you should be.”

Izuku shrugged. “I don’t know how not to be.”

“I think that’s alright.” Aoyama smiled at him, and Izuku smiled back. They walked through a larger tunnel with several train carts stacked high in the darkness. “I appreciate you helping a lot. I was ready to give up. So, thank you. I owe you a favor sometime in the future if you ever want it.”

He was about to reject the other boy’s offer when suddenly the rushing of footsteps behind them could be heard.

Both boys whipped their heads at the sudden onset of screams. Kids were running full speed, being chased by Himiko and Sen with knives being slung at them. Izuku locked eyes with Sen, who then grinned like a monster.

“Himiko! There’s the runt!” Sen announced.

He pointed a finger directly at Izuku and Izuku’s heart plummeted.

“Run,” Izuku whispered.

Both Aoyama and Izuku took off into the darkness, flashlights waving around without purpose. Behind them Sen and Himiko followed in hot pursuit. The two others were taunting them, screaming out his name like demons hungry for flesh.

Izuku pushed his body fast and Aoyama did too, and their hands eventually broke apart as they took off as quickly as they could towards the red light.

Behind them, a full crowd of other children caught up—all running directly towards the red light.

Izuku yelped as a knife was flung close to his head. He looked behind him to see Himiko grinning with feral blood lust. She was slinging endless knives it seemed. She probably stole them from everyone they killed. When the next knife throw nearly hit Aoyama, Izuku took a risk.

“Go towards the finish line!” Izuku instructed.

Aoyama’s eyes widened in horror, but it didn’t take him long to decide to do exactly that.

Izuku broke apart from Aoyama for his safety and just like he suspected, Sen and Himiko were on his heels.

He ducked around train carts for safety as it hailed down deadly knives. Izuku struggled to catch his breath as he maneuvered as fast as he could in the dark. He flicked off his flashlight in hopes of losing them, but the echo of the twin laughs surrounded him.

Izuku gritted his teeth as he relied on his quick thinking to get him across the finish line. He looked up at the train cart he was hiding behind and an idea sprung into his head.

Izuku ran forward when he heard Sen and Himiko’s footsteps draw close.

He leaped for the nearest train cart and began climbing it.

“He’s going up there!” Himiko announced. Izuku looked behind him and he could see the two break apart to hunt him down. He climbed quicker when Sen went straight for him. Himiko began climbing a parallel train cart.

Izuku stumbled to the roof of the train cart and began running. He leaped from roof to roof and barreled right for the red light. In view he could see several handfuls of other kids begin to cross the finish line. His blood went cold with adrenaline as his anxiety peaked. Then he screamed as a sharp knife was plunged into his arm.

Izuku toppled forward, body dragging across the rustic metal. He yelled loudly as his face was scraped and immediately Sen was on him. Izuku struggled back and forth with the other boy, blocking punches and taking several hits to the face.

Sen was stronger than him and filled with so much bloodlust Izuku could taste it in his mouth. Without taking too long, Sen got the upper hand. The other boy was pinning him down on the ground face first. He hit Izuku’s head against the metal surface over and over again with a wicked laugh.

“Kill him, Sen! Kill him!” Himiko cheered on across the way.

Izuku nearly puked. He was dizzy—and he didn’t know how much longer he could hang on.

In his ears The Dance of The Love Birds rang out, comforting him with every blow to the head.

“Go across the finish line, Himiko!” Sen instructed. “I’ll meet you there. Secure your spot!”

Himiko sprung across the rooftops of the train carts as Izuku began bleeding out of his nose. He gasped when his mind fogged over, and he could see sweet Kacchan waiting for him. Maybe he could die here, and then he could search for Kacchan in the afterlife—if there was one. Maybe then Izuku could know peace.

But then a visual of Tomura sunk into his mind.

Sen chuckled deeply as he turned Izuku over. He drank in the battered face he had caused and smirked. Sen twirled his knife and Izuku could see his reflection staring back at it in the dim light.

“Goodbye, Izuku,” Sen taunted.

He thrusted his blade down, and Izuku acted as fast as he could. He grabbed Sen by his wrist the moment the tip of the blade scratched his jugular. They gridlocked in a test of strength in will. Izuku’s head and heart pounded in sync as he locked eyes with the boy above him.

“Survive,” the voice of Tomura whispered.

Izuku grew stronger.

“Survive,” the voice of Tomura harshly demanded.

Izuku furrowed his brow.

“Survive!” the voice of Tomura yelled.

Izuku screamed as he lunged forward.

He seized the knife from Sen and slashed at the other boy. Sen quickly dodged back, but not far enough as the blade ripped through his shirt and flesh across his chest. Blood leaked down onto Izuku but he didn’t take the time to assess it.

Before Sen could retaliate, Izuku head butted Sen straight on, breaking the other boy’s nose. He then grabbed Sen by the wrist and twisted it counterclockwise, exactly like Hiryu had told him to—and the sound of bone breaking reached his ear. Sen screamed, and tried to punch him, but Izuku caught his fist.

Izuku pushed through the agonizing pain in his body. He ignored the dots in his vision as he did a full roundhouse kick, slamming his heel into Sen’s temple.

It happened all so fast.

Izuku had only meant to defend himself, but the gasp from Sen as he toppled off the train cart was deafening. The other boy fell straight off, and his head hit the side of the train cart parallel. Down he went, cracking several bones until his body hit the ground with a hard thud.

Izuku was too nauseous to react right away. He lurched forward to his hands and knees to catch his breath. In the distance he heard kids running for the finish line. With his last bit of strength, Izuku glanced over the train cart.

His heart dropped.

Sen's body was lying on the ground, slowly being engulfed in a pool of blood.

Izuku walked towards the red light with his eyes wide. He was shaking with every step he took as the repeated sound of bone breaking happened over and over again in his head. Sen's distorted body flashed upon him unwillingly and the blood on his hands reminded him what occurred.

What have you done?! Izuku's conscience screamed at him.

He stumbled towards the red light and crossed over the finish line.

Izuku fell to his knees and put a hand over his pounding heart.

The walls in his vision grew tighter, and the whole world warped as though he was trapped with no air in a cellar. In front of him a handful of other kids were gathered, looking off behind him as a couple more people filtered in. Nine, Ms. Nagant, Mr. Compress and the Governor were there too. All the adults were gazing at him curiously.

It was then Izuku realized he had been covered in an obscene amount of blood.

Sen's blood.

Then one last kid ran across the white line.

"Thirty," A caretaker off to the side announced. The man put his hand up to signal to Nine. "That concludes the final test of The Cull."

Several more kids ran towards them, but they were stopped by strong armed caretakers. They broke down crying, pleading for another chance to stay. Nine didn't bother looking at them as they were taken away. Many other kids trickled in like a broken faucet leaking. Drip by drip the left-over boys and girls were escorted elsewhere.

"Where's Sen?" Himiko questioned.

She pushed towards the front of the crowd, and everyone began whispering. Her golden eyes flickered with confusion. Even Ms. Nagant's did. Izuku dared to glance up from his spot on the ground, and it was then Himiko finally noticed him covered in dirt and blood.

Her face grew pale.

"Where is Sen?" She asked a lot more forcefully.

She stalked up to Izuku and grabbed him by his collar when he didn't answer. Izuku shook his head and screwed his eyes closed, expecting a hit. But nothing came. His head spun as he aggressively shook, but all he could hear was white noise blending with the cracks in Himiko's vocal cords.

"Where is Sen, you stupid runt?!" Himiko cried. Her hands began shaking as she stared at him in horror. "He was going to kill you! He was supposed to kill you!"

The blood on his shirt told enough of a story that Izuku didn't think he needed to speak.

Everyone was glancing at them, eyes darting between Izuku and the darkness. When no more kids came to the finish line, Nine gave the order for the caretakers to find any bodies. He wanted a full headcount of the kids who didn't make it back. They all sat there in silence, Himiko desperately watching as the caretakers began to carry back limb children.

Izuku's stomach was sick when more than ten dead bodies were dragged into view.

Sen, being one of them.

The shrillness of Himiko's cry caused everyone to flinch.

She tried to push her way towards Sen's body but was stopped by a caretaker.

She clawed at them and swiped at their mask. The porcelain object shattered to the ground, revealing the face of the person underneath. Cold, heartless eyes burned into Himiko and she was slapped for her outburst. Everyone turned their heads as Himiko stumbled backwards from the sheer force. She crumbled to the hard ground of the dirt, crying with all of the emotions inside of her.

She didn't get back up, and Izuku could feel her pain from here.

She wept softly, knowing that she would be punished later. But she didn't care. All she could do was watch as Sen's lifeless body was laid next to the others.

When the blanket was pulled over his face, Nine appeared next to Izuku.

"Were you the one who killed Sen?" Nine asked in an inquisitive tone.

Izuku let out a shaky breath. All eyes were on him again, and his throat still too clammed up to speak. He stared down at his hands that were covered in Sen's blood.

"Y-Yes," Izuku croaked out. "I-I did it."

Nine tilted his head at him and nodded once in approval. "Good job."

Their head father walked away and towards the caretakers to give instructions.

Izuku glanced over his shoulder at the grieving girl. Himiko was gritting her teeth. Her bloody fists were clenched, and her hair was askew. One of her buns had come undone and the locks of hair had fallen down to her shoulder. The fire in her eyes blazed like a hundred infernos melting into one.

Run, was the first thought Izuku had underneath that glare of hers. But he couldn't move. He was paralyzed in place with goosebumps dancing along his limbs.

The caretakers then walked over to Himiko and forced her upright. They grabbed her arms to drag her away for the punishment of crying and assaulting the caretaker. She didn't struggle. She bit her lip to stop her crying and held her head up high, poised with a murderous grace. She allowed herself to be pulled away quietly and all her tears halted.

When they passed by Izuku, she muttered a threat that was as deadly as her.

"I'll kill you for this," Himiko promised.

They locked eyes as she passed. She was walked off into a different tunnel, consumed by darkness.

Izuku held his breath as guilt crashed down on his shoulders.

What have you done? Izuku's conscious whispered.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After the final round, they were all transported to a small classroom. Thirty of them made it when nearly a hundred of them started. Everyone was assessing each other as true members of their family now.

Some kids were still too shaken to speak. Others were happy and chatting.

They brought Himiko back out, and she had a large black eye. She was disheveled, but someone had fixed her hair for her.

Immediately when Himiko sat down, she cut her golden glare to Izuku and ice trickled down his spine.

"Congratulations to everyone here in this room, you're officially a part of the family!" Mr. Compress said happily. He clapped his hands together as they were all given warm blankets and food. "Wow. You all did amazing, I'm so proud of you!"

Mostly everyone cheered and glowed at the praise.

Izuku and Aoyama didn't, some of the few too shaken to speak. The pair exchanged discreet stares as they glanced around, still on high alert. Izuku's stomach was twisting from the sickening visuals of dead bodies and the smell of the blood that had gotten into his mind. Izuku couldn't eat the food given to him. He settled for moving around the peas on the plate with his fork to make it seem like he was.

Whenever he blinked, he could see Sen's broken body and Himiko's similarly broken expression.

He hung his head as his hands trembled out of control.

"As an official member of the Mamushi family, it's time you learn the special purpose our family has in this world," Mr. Compress said.

Special purpose? This piqued everyone's attention.

Suddenly, rows of caretakers in blank masks came out and Izuku's skin began to crawl.

"As you know, the world is full of terrible, cruel people," Mr. Compress lectured like always. "People who turn on each other, lie to each other, and deserve no sympathy or mercy. You are all here because these horrible people tossed you aside as babies. We have taken you in and saved you, given you life. Because of this, it is our family that has been blessed with the task of helping eliminate these kinds of awful people who scorned you."

"Eliminate?" Izuku questioned before he could stop himself.

Everyone turned to him. Mr. Compress smiled stiffly.

"Kill," Mr. Compress elaborated. "We are tasked to kill the horrible people in the world."

Izuku's whole body froze and dropped his fork at the same time everyone else cheered.

He whirled around, confused why everyone was cheering. Then it all began to click together. All the pieces aligned, and he gravely understood what was happening—or more importantly—what they were being asked to do.

Even Aoyama next to him didn't seem phased. He clapped softly too, nodding.

Izuku was the only one put off.

"You will begin your real training from here on out," Mr. Compress said. "Now. Let's give you all your marks."

Right before Izuku could speak up, suddenly he was stuck with something sharp in the base of his neck. Izuku screamed in unison with everyone else taken by surprise. He slumped forward as he could feel an unknown substance pushed under his skin. Izuku's throat slammed shut and his eyes bulged. He stared up at the caretaker who was faceless behind that porcelain mask.

Izuku panicked—and when he panicked, he tried to keep calm.

The last thing he thought of was blond hair and red eyes as his head hit the floor.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku awoke in a cold sweat.

He screamed as he sat forward and hugged his arms close to his body. He stared around, and realized he was in a small room with the others who had survived. Everyone looked disheveled, confused and all of their clothes were missing. In place they were in light blue hospital gowns.

Izuku twisted and immediately felt pain all over his body and on his collarbone.

He snapped his head down, still disoriented. He was bandaged in various places from where he was injured in the last round of The Cull. His arm was in a cast from where Sen had twisted it and he had several bandages on his arms and legs.

Izuku frowned. He pushed his finger into one he didn't recall receiving, right on his inner thigh.

He poked at it, and it stung deeply like he had been cut there. He wondered if maybe one of Himiko's knives had stuck in him and he hadn't fully registered it in his haze of panic.

Then Izuku's attention was grabbed fully by the mirror across the way. Many kids were gathered around, whispering and pointing to different places on their bodies. Izuku stood to his feet, slightly limping from the litany of pain sparking all over his body. He walked straight up through the crowd to the dingy mirror, and he could see black ink on everyone's skin that wasn't there before.

Izuku felt empty when he looked around and caught sight of everyone's mark.

Himiko's was 200 on her ankle.

Aoyama's was 215 on his wrist.

And Izuku's was 217 on his collar bone.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below! I'm very eagar for feedback, comments, and thoughts on this since this is the first Izuku POV and we're getting into it. Thanks so much for reading and commenting!

Chapter 18: Entr'acte II

Chapter Summary

Izuku earns his Viper title.

Chapter Notes

Helloooo! Welcome back to the choocoo of angst!! Big thank you to the LOML Luna for betaing like always!!

Also big thank you to everyone who commented and interacted on the previous chapter! I will respond to comments directly after posting this chapter :') I had a bit of a draining week and needed some down time to just stare at the ceiling but I still want to make sure I reply back to everyone like usual because I really do appreciate you all so much!! I'm so excited for Izuku's POV and digging into Viper Academy lore and set up.

Without further delay, I hope you enjoy reading!

Warnings: Heavy angst and graphic scene. Implied sexual assault, no description of it, but it is very subtly implied.

The boat ride to the mainland left Izuku feeling seasick. His whole world had turned upside down, and he was trapped inside a nightmare he never thought was possible. He had been so worried about trying to survive, but now—he wished he had been killed.

The sway of the bus into Tokyo creaked as hallow as his bones.

He barely blinked the entire time and next to him was Aoyama, who only seemed relieved to be alive. But how could Izuku be relived he was alive when he was only breathing to cause suffering? Izuku blankly stared at his subtle reflection in the window of the bus. The faint outline of himself was like a ghost staring back at him—and for a moment he saw Sen instead.

"Looks like you took my spot after all, runt," the ghost of Sen said from the glass.

Izuku jerked back when the sinister reflection smiled cruelly at him. Aoyama looked at him strangely and Izuku wanted to peel the number 217 off his skin. Instead, he kept his head down as whispers from the thirty official siblings sparked all around him.

He killed Sen, and no one expected it.

When they arrived back at their home, several Big Sisters and Brothers were waiting for them in the lobby. Eagerness was bouncing around their sterile white walls as everyone waited to see who made the cut.

Izuku looked in the crowd of familiar faces for Tomura—but he wasn't there.

He watched as Ibara stared in the crowd for her Little. Ibara kept a beautifully blank face when she found they weren't there, like she expected nothing less. Her shoulders sagged a bit, but not too much.

Next Izuku watched as Hiryu went around checking for his Little, who also didn't make it. He was the boy Sen had gutted open with the help of Himiko.

Slowly, disappointment bubbled inside of Izuku as he watched Himiko be reunited with her big, Kuin. Kuin was someone Izuku always forgot about, but she had an air about her like a Queen Bee. Her teeth had been sharpened with a chiseled knife and her eyepatch was always hidden under the flop of her brown bangs. The lone green eye she had was always quietly watching, distantly.

Usually Kuin usually never touched other people, but at that moment, she gave Himiko a small pat on the shoulder. Himiko glowed.

Izuku watched everyone be reunited or torn apart as he was left alone.

Hiryu caught sight of him and there was a small spark of surprise in his eyes. Izuku offered him a weak smile as Hiryu grinned at him. He gave Izuku a nod and thumbs up, but Izuku couldn't return the enthusiasm.

Had Hiryu known this whole time? Had all the Bigs?

Jin stepped into his view and that was the final push.

Guilt crashed down like a tidal wave and drowned him alive. Behind Jin, Izuku imagined the horrific, bloodied phantom of Sen. The dead boy's head was split open from where he hit the side of the train cart and his arm was twisted in an unnatural direction. Sen had the same, sick smile on his face even in death.

Jin marched around, unknowing to the shadow Izuku was hallucinating. One by one, Jin checked all the faces of the children who were in the lobby until he walked up to Himiko.

“Where’s Sen?” Jin asked quietly.

He was baffled. This was not an outcome Jin thought was possible, and Izuku didn’t blame him. He couldn’t believe it either. Himiko didn’t say anything right away, her eyes were red and puffy. There were dark circles under her eyes and several stray pieces of dirt in her perfectly blond hair.

“Himiko…what happened to Sen?” Jin pushed again.

Her sharp, hateful eyes turned to Izuku—as did everyone else’s.

Hiryu frowned in confusion.

Himiko pointed a finger without shame at Izuku and whispered inaudibly.

Izuku didn’t need to hear what she was saying, he knew it. His suspicions were confirmed when grief rippled across Jin’s face. Forbidden tears pushed at Jin’s eyes but didn’t fall. His pride and joy was now dead, and there was only one person responsible. Jin clutched his hands and his deadly gaze inched towards Izuku.

Jin then smiled at Izuku with all of his teeth.

Himiko’s spiteful, bloodshot eyes were on him too. No smile in sight.

The phantom of Sen laughed between them. He dragged his thumb across his throat and smiled with blood caked on his teeth.

“I’ll see you in death, runt,” Sen taunted.

Izuku could feel the knives Himiko and Jin wanted to sink into him. Or the acid they would probably force down his throat. He wondered if they would get a kick out of drowning him or go the simple route of snapping his neck in his sleep. Izuku pandered his eventual death at the hands of the two people who cared most for Sen.

But he didn’t want to stay around for any longer when the whispers felt like prickles at his skin.

Izuku hurried out of the lobby, hanging his head to escape the phantom looming after him.

Hiryu rushed towards him, reaching his hand outwards. “Izuku—”

But Izuku slipped out of his grasp, not wanting to hear what he had to say.

He went straight towards his room and blocked out the calling of his name behind him. But no matter how far he ran, he could feel the cold double target painted on his back in bright red.

The names plates on his and Tomura's bedroom no longer read '117' and 'Izuku'. Now it read '117' and '217'.

He had gained his mark and lost his name.

Everything was tainted with the reality of what they were expected to do raining down on him. His eyes were stretched wide as he stared around at the lavish items inside of his bedroom. All this meant nothing now, and he could see through the ploy of the luxury material to keep them pacified.

Tomura then came rushing out of the bathroom, half wet like he finished showering. He swung open the bathroom door with wide eyes, and relief washed over him at the sight of Izuku standing in the doorway.

"You survived," Tomura said in a deep exhale. "I didn't think you were going to make it. This is great." He ran his hand through his damp hair and walked up to Izuku, but Izuku took an immediate step back. Tomura froze. "Izuku?"

"We're being raised to kill people," Izuku whispered. His eyes were wide with fear and the tears inside of them were flowing freely now. "This whole time? That's all we've been learning, isn't it?"

Tomura's face fell and he pressed his lips into a thin line.

"Yes," Tomura confirmed. "That's our purpose in life."

Izuku's eyes squeezed shut.

The truth tasted like acid. Kill. Killing. They were killers—

He began to shake his head frantically and back away into the corner. He tried to calm himself down and began to think of violin music when his chest convulsed. However, his mind fractured like glass. In the reflection of the fragments, his warm memories of playing in the plaza with Kacchan and the cold, horrifying events of killing Sen stood out side by side.

"No," Izuku shakily whispered as his whole body began to tremble. He backed into the corner and slid down the wall. "No, no, no, no." He stared up at his older brother in hope for understanding from the only person he had. "T-Tomura, we have to get out. Th-This is bad. Killing is bad."

Tomura's eyes were empty. "Says who?"

"Says—"

Izuku stopped his words.

He realized he learned killing was bad from the book he wasn't supposed to have.

He swallowed what he was going to say, but it was too late. Tomura was already surveying him suspiciously. His big brother stepped forward menacingly and squatted down to Izuku's level. Izuku curled into himself more, trying to steady his breathing.

“Where exactly did you learn the notion that killing was bad?” Tomura asked again. “Because it wasn’t from Mr. Compress. Or Ms. Nagant. Or Nine. Or me.” His eyes narrowed venomously. “So where exactly did you hear that?”

Izuku held his breath.

“Was it from that violinist you used to see from when you used to sneak out?” Tomura answered for him.

Izuku’s silence was enough of a confirmation.

“Whatever that man told you was wrong.” Tomura grabbed him by his jaw and forced him to look at him. “Killing is perfectly fine. Hurting people is okay. Everyone is evil to an extent and killing someone is just lessening the evil in the world.”

Izuku’s chest heaved when he realized he wasn’t sure what was the truth.

Was killing bad? Was it not?

As if he could read the conflict in Izuku’s head, Tomura continued speaking.

“Izuku. Bury every notion that you might’ve learned outside of these walls right now,” Tomura warned, digging his nails into Izuku’s skin. “If you don’t, then you’re as good as dead like the kids who didn’t survive The Cull. The only goal in your pathetic life is to survive. And surviving means doing as you’re told. If you’re told to go kill some scummy man, then so be it. Now get it the fuck together.”

Izuku’s breathing began running ragged.

He tried to calm down and the only way he knew how was to think of Kacchan. All he could see was kind Kacchan. Blond hair. Red eyes. Violin music. Romantic scenes. Their string rings. Marriage.

“Izuku—do you understand me?” Tomura snapped, angrily.

“Ye-Yes,” Izuku muttered quickly.

The memories in Izuku’s head split further the longer he tried to remain calm. Then images of Sen’s mangled body kept flashing in his mind.

Tomura was watching him carefully, looking down at him. Then slowly he hooked a finger under Izuku’s shirt collar and pulled it back, revealing his mark.

Tomura scoffed in surprise. “217?” He questioned, raising a brow. “Funny. We somehow ended up matching, little brother. Looks like you really are fated to be my mini me.”

That night Izuku could barely breathe.

Every time he closed his eyes he saw Sen. He heard the snapping of his neck and his scream. He could feel the vibrations of Himiko's crying and her deep threat to even the score.

He was in danger.

Izuku tried to do everything he could to stay calm and sleep—but it was useless. He stayed inside of his memories for as long as he could until they were no longer enough. The distant vision of Kacchan wasn't powerful enough to override the terrifying image of Sen's mangled limbs. The song of the violinist was not loud enough in his head to drown out the sound of bones snapping out of place.

All Izuku could think was to get out. Out. Out. Out.

He awoke in the dead of night and crept out of bed quietly. He checked to make sure Tomura was asleep before he secretly packed a bag while holding in his tears.

He was going to find Kacchan. He had to find Kacchan now. There were no other options because he couldn't stay here.

Izuku opened the door with the expert stealth he accumulated over the years.

The hallways were empty and there were caretakers patrolling casually around with large guns. Izuku concealed himself in the corners of hallways and shadows of dim lights to make his way to the staircase. He worked his way all the way down to the basement.

He disregarded all warnings he was given from Tomura about leaving.

He picked the lock to the room and went straight for the tile.

But when he tried to tip it open—it was cemented shut.

"No," Izuku whispered, all color draining from his face.

He tried again and began knocking on all the tiles on the floor. Each time he pounded his fist against the ground his desperation grew. He slammed his hands harder and harder until he was banging on the concrete holding back a scream.

A loud creak caused him to stop.

Izuku whimpered as he curled his fists on the cold ground. All his nerves went numb as he inched his head to stare over his shoulder.

Tomura walked into the tiny room and shut the door. Izuku bit his lip and tasted iron on his tongue.

"I told them I found rats," Tomura explained. He placed his hand on Izuku's shoulder and it burned with a threat. "After that, they rodent proofed the whole place. But little did they know, it was to keep one big vermin from escaping out."

“Please,” Izuku begged, his tears free falling again. He dug his fingers into the concrete as if it would crumble at his touch. “I want out. I d-don’t want to kill people and I don’t want to die.”

“Unfortunately, it’s only one or the other, Izuku.”

Izuku sobbed harder than he ever had.

He cried and rocked slightly in place and Tomura let him. He doesn’t know how long they stayed there but it was long enough for Izuku to grieve his freedom and the thoughts of ever finding Kacchan again.

ɯɯɯ

Now that he wasn’t a kid anymore, he was in phase two according to the caretakers.

Phase two meant learning to kill.

No one else thought this was horrible, it was only Izuku because only Izuku had read material from outside their library.

Izuku decided he needed space, and the only thing that could give him that was walking around the academy aimlessly. Sometimes if he zoned out hard enough, the white walls all seemed the same. He could momentarily pretend as if he was walking through an endless large cloud.

One particular day right before the Phase Two meeting, Izuku wound up near Ms. Nagant’s office. Kids rarely came up here, which made Izuku even more confused to find Hiryu pressing his ear against the surface of Ms. Nagant’s wooden door.

“Hiryu?” Izuku called out. “What are you doing—”

Hiryu made a silent ‘hush’ motion by putting his finger to his lips.

Izuku stilled, understanding Hiryu was doing something he wasn’t supposed to be. Izuku looked over his shoulder and saw no one and walked quietly over too. Hiryu didn’t seem to care, too focused on eavesdropping.

Izuku crouched down and pressed his ear against the door too.

“Moore,” Ms. Nagant spoke the name in a professional tone. Her octave was even, but waiver on patience and homicide. “We have a standing contract to receive one hundred children every five years, and you are greatly overdue. Where are they?”

“I’m sorry Kaina, this is not possible anymore,” the deep voice of a man said. There was a stretch of silence and the pace of footsteps. “Due to current internal issues I’m dealing with, I need to break our little contract.”

“And you know that is not possible,” Ms. Nagant bit back. “Are you going to tell that to One and Nine and expect to keep your life?”

“Maybe if they weren’t so wasteful with the products I would reconsider,” the man snapped. “Do you know how hard it is to bribe over one hundred mothers into giving up their children? Even more so, do you know how hard it is to find people who are willing to pay for damaged goods after you send them back to me when you deem them unworthy for your academy?”

“I’m sure you can find someone who will buy damaged goods, they are still goods.”

“Who on earth would want a product that is so deeply traumatized it has nightmares? You all are costing me money at this rate and ruining my own reputation in the underground. I will get you the next shipment when I am able to. It will not be quick and there will not be as many. But you will take what you can get.”

A long sigh from Ms. Nagant.

“A hundred children. That is the agreement,” she spoke. She was unmoving in her stance. “One is gracious enough to give you until the youngest cohort is eighteen to get the next round.”

The man scoffed.

“Did you all finally realize children raising children was deranged?” The man asked sarcastically. “I still remember how you all handed a bunch of seven and eight year olds toddlers and told them they were responsible for them now.”

“Our methods worked,” Nagant defended. “But potentially we can find room for improvement waiting a bit longer this time. Which means, you’re lucky enough to have room to get your act together in the meantime.”

“How gracious of you.”

“Of course. It’s a pleasure doing business with you, Moore. Now, if you’ll excuse me, I need to get prepped for a training session with the new Phase Twos. I’ll have my men escort you to the front door. I hope the next time I see you it’s with a hundred children in tow.”

The footsteps came close to the door and Izuku scrambled backwards.

He glanced up at Hiryu and saw something that stunned him. Hiryu’s usually warm face was blank and cold. Something lethal was flipped in his mind but Izuku could barely understand it as Hiryu slipped away from the door. The older boy rounded the corner quickly, entirely out of sight. Izuku did the same, taking the hint they heard something they weren’t supposed to.

When the door to Ms. Nagant’s office opened, Izuku carefully peered around the corner.

Out walked a man dressed in an all-white suit. He had copper hair and light brown eyes. He was dripping in gold jewelry and had rosy cheeks. He adjusted his cufflinks briefly before walking away in the other direction, accompanied by two threatening looking men in black with guns.

When the man disappeared, Izuku focus in on what was said.

Children raising children.

He did the math: he was ten and Tomura was fifteen. Hiryu and Jin were sixteen. Ibara was fifteen. Himiko was ten. Sen had been ten.

It clicked to Izuku that this was a cycle, and it was going to continue. He was going to get a Little, and they would be purged through the same horrible cull as he was. Izuku didn't know if he could stomach that thought.

9 Years Until Incident

Izuku was instructed to shadow Tomura on his assignments in the outside world for the following year.

Izuku quickly learned that red folders meant killing—and that's all Tomura did was kill. He buried bodies, he framed people for murder, sometimes he even staged suicides. Every deed he did was atrocious—but he did it with an emotionless face.

Every day, Izuku watched Tomura kill person after person. He had a perfect kill record, not a single tarnish was on it unlike others in the academy who hit minor complications.

Tomura was effortless in his acts of cruelty.

For the most part, Izuku was only there to observe and help with disposal. Many times Tomura tried to encourage him to assist in killing someone before his first assignment, but Izuku shied away. He could wait.

But he also heard the gossip at home though, many other littles were helping their bigs murder. Izuku seemed to be the only one who wasn't.

Blood was a simple routine in his life now. He breathed it like air.

Over time, Tomura's ruthlessness quickly gained him the favor of Nine. Often, their head father would nod at Tomura. This was an unheard-of praise and that was enough for Izuku to fear and respect his big brother even more.

More eyes were on Izuku as a result since he was a direct reflection of Tomura. Everyone said it made sense now that Izuku killed Sen if someone as outstanding as Tomura was guiding him. Cruelty was something Izuku probably should have breathed by now.

However, it wasn't.

Izuku lacked the killer instinct his brother had but Tomura was determined to beat it into him.

The first massacre Izuku was exposed to up close was forever burned into his memory.

So far, all the previous marks had been from afar. All Tomura had to do was send bullets through a window, but now that his big brother was showing 'advanced' behaviors, according to Ms. Nagant, Tomura was officially being given more complicated tasks.

Ones that required someone to directly jam a knife into another person's throat.

They had to dress the part. Faces fully concealed so no one could identify them. Their all-black clothing was from head to toe and on their faces were black porcelain masks. Tomura resembled a deity to Izuku like this, poised with his silver hair half down, half up in a tight bun. The black steel machetes on his back were in an X formation and the gun in his hands were purely an extension of him.

The mark's name was Yato Tamotsu.

He was insanely rich according to the red folder. He had a smug air about him with deep connections to the Tokyo underground scene through drugs. He had stepped on the Yakuza Hier's toes, Chisaki Kai, though by poaching territory that wasn't his. From what Izuku overheard during the debriefing with Ms. Nagant, Chisaki Kai was someone the academy always did business with.

The Academy's roots in Tokyo helped the Yakuza keep their grip on the city. In exchange, the Yakuza made sure the Academy could do what they did peacefully without too many eyes on them. Sometimes the Yakuza even help police the Vipers if someone was to go rouge and escape.

It was a toxic, symbiotic relationship that helped keep the underground flowing.

Anyone that crossed Chisaki was likely to be put down by a Viper. It was well known in the whispers in the shadows.

Tomura and Izuku were dispatched to Yato's mansion where he was having a party. Flickering disco lights were shining everywhere as people ran around in their swimsuits but there was no pool. A regular Tuesday night for someone as rich in blood money as Yato.

The duo of Vipers barged into the mansion, and Tomura didn't hesitate to fire his rifle immediately.

Screams erupted and the whole scene was tossed into pure chaos. Dark crimson blood splattered like paint on the walls and decorated the lavish carpet. Tomura swiftly sunk a bullet in everyone's skull who attempted to flee while Izuku meekly covered for him near the exit in case anyone attempted to escape.

But he was barely useful, Tomura shot everyone down in record timing.

All the screams reminded Izuku of being trapped in the underworld. One by one, every cry was a soul Tomura collected with pride. Silence replaced the chaos, and a chill ran down Izuku's spine. He looked around, and no one had escaped. Izuku felt nauseous as he walked behind his brother into the bloodied room. He counted the bodies as he followed Tomura's lead.

One. Two. Four. Six.

It ended up being twelve.

Tomura had slain twelve people in under a minute.

Izuku watched carefully how Tomura stalked up to the mark cowering in the corner. He had somehow saved Yato Tamotsu for last, effectively making him witness the death of all his friends in a mere blink of an eye.

The poor man was sobbing and trembling.

"Pl-Please! Spare me!" The man gasped, jarred at the sight of all the bodies beneath Tomura's feet. Izuku's heart clutched. He had never heard anyone beg for their life before. "I-I have a family! I am a good man I swear!"

Tomura tilted his head, face concealed with the porcelain mask that now had blood splatters. "I doubt that."

"I-I also have a young daughter, who is struggling with leukemia, she needs me," the man continued.

Izuku sucked in a ragged breath when he painted a picture of Yato Tamotsu's family. He could envision the children grieving their father, and even see the young girl dying from lack of proper medical treatment.

"Please. Please. D-Don't kill me."

Izuku turned his head away when Tomura reached for one of his machetes off his back. He screwed his eyes shut when the begging became too much and covered his ears. He braced himself for Tomura's brutality—but nothing ever came.

Izuku's heart slowed down. He peaked his eye open and gazed at the two in front of him.

Yato Tamotsu was looking confused as well.

Tomura's head was turned towards him.

"Do you think I should spare him?" Tomura asked.

Izuku's eyes widened, and he glanced around, making sure that he was the only living person Tomura was speaking to. All he found around him were dead bodies, which baffled him even further.

“Wh-What? Are you asking me?” Izuku clarified.

“Yes.” Tomura lifted the porcelain mask off his face, revealing a tired expression. He cut his blood-colored eyes towards Izuku. “Do you think we should let him go?”

Izuku wearily glanced towards the cowering man on the floor. His eyes and heart softened as he thought about what he had said, and the image of the family in his mind.

“Y-Yes,” Izuku whispered. Yato Tamotsu’s shoulders tightened, and his eyes sparked with hope. “He has a family, right? We should let him live so he can perform his duty towards them.”

Tomura’s facial muscles didn’t move.

“Okay,” Tomura agreed. He stepped aside swiftly, surprising Izuku further. “Pick him up off the ground and we can transport him somewhere safe.”

“Really?”

“Really.” Tomura put his machete back into its holster and jutted his chin towards the mark. “Hurry before I change my mind. I’ll go stage it like he escaped.”

Izuku snapped his own mask off his face and nearly ran to the crying man. Yato Tamotsu was terrified but happy and Izuku’s chest swelled with joy too. Maybe Tomura wasn’t as cut off from his humanity like Izuku originally thought. Maybe Tomura was like him even—caring, deep inside for others so much it pained him.

Izuku picked up the crying man from the ground, and Yato Tamotsu leaned into him due to his gunshot injury. Tomura had shattered his kneecaps with two precise bullets but at least he still had his life.

“Thank you,” Tamotsu Yato whispered, he stared at Izuku thankful and gripped onto him tightly. “You don’t know how much this means to me—”

A deafening gunshot hit Izuku’s ears at the same time he witnessed, eyes wide, Tomura blow the man’s brains out at a blinding speed.

Izuku stopped breathing as his face was coated in blood.

Yato Tamotsu’s eyes popped and the heavy body dropped in an instant. Izuku was unwillingly dragged down too by the weight, falling directly on top of the mangled body.

Izuku was so stunned, he couldn’t process it right away. Blood seeped through his pants, into the cracks of his fingers and his lungs began tightening from not inhaling. He began shaking, playing over and over again the way the man’s head was blown open right in front of his eyes.

Izuku gasped for air when he needed oxygen, and his face was nearly purple.

“He didn’t have a family,” Tomura explained coldly while lowering his gun. “It was in the folder that he’s a pathological liar. If you’re going to speak to the marks, at least read the details all the way. Otherwise, you risk being manipulated, like you were here.”

Izuku couldn’t stop trembling.

He squeezed his eyes shut and let go of the dead body.

“You’re weak, Izuku,” Tomura hissed in disgust. “You’re lucky you have me as your Big and not someone else who would’ve killed you for the type of shit you just pulled. Now help me clean up this mess before you piss me off further.”

Tomura stormed off and began finishing their assignment.

When Izuku gained the strength to glance around, everything in the mansion was dressed in dark, scarlet blood—including himself. Tomura didn’t miss a beat while he staged it like a drug deal gone wrong. He planted evidence to lead the police in the wrong direction with a straight face and clear conscious.

Izuku stared down at the dead body of Yato Tamotsu. He studied the way the skull was blown up, dripping blood and felt numb to it. Maybe he was more desensitized to murder than he realized. Or maybe he felt a tiny bit of disgust and disappointment in himself.

The man had lied to try to save his life—and Izuku was stupid enough to believe him.

Izuku curled his fists, frustrated.

After the assignment, Izuku didn’t speak at all. He let Tomura lead him around when they made their way back to their home, he couldn’t wash away the feeling of being covered in blood.

“Nine picked out a code name for me by the way,” Tomura told him that night. He was sharpening his blade calmly, making sure it was deadly for their next assignment. “He’s never done that for anyone before. I guess that means I’m in his good graces so don’t mess this up for me.”

“What is the name?” Izuku asked blankly.

“Horned Viper.”

Immediately, the image his brother with horns like a demon filled his mind. He could see the horns curl, and they would probably be pitch black to match his heart.

Izuku nodded. “That suits you.”

8 Years Until Incident

When Izuku was twelve he learned what the words ‘adopted’ and ‘kidnaped’ meant.

He had found out through stealing a dictionary from the house of one-man Tomura killed. As Izuku was dissolving the body in an acid bath, he noticed the book on a tiny nightstand.

He tucked it in his backpack and brought it back home with him.

That night, when Tomura was asleep, Izuku cracked open his romance novel. He finally filled in all the gaps with the words he didn't know.

He went highlighted word by highlighted word and pieced everything together.

The world he was able to read now in the novel was so much more enriched. It was vibrant and lush. But worst of all, it was even nicer than he thought.

The family in this book was described to be something loving and warm. They embraced each other and were nice to one another. Izuku teared up as he comprehended the world written in this book for the first time because he pieced together what a kidnapping was.

The woman in the novel had been kidnapped, stolen away from her family by evil people. They forced her to do work that she didn't want to do. They even fully separated her from people who loved her. Her family and husband were in deep despair, and that's when her husband said he would go find her and he embarked on his epic journey to rescue his love.

It was that night when Izuku came to the only conclusion that made sense for his life too—he had to have been stolen. Somewhere out there was a family like this waiting on him, one where they hugged and kissed each other.

7 Years Until Incident

It was July 15th and Izuku had officially turned thirteen this morning.

He was feeling higher levels of bitterness coursing in his system when he awoke that day. All he could think about was how he wasn't meant to have this type of life. He should be having birthday parties like the ones in the book, or happy dinners with people who loved him. He shouldn't be here—and he was upset about it.

Unfortunately, this upset rolled over into Tomura's assignments.

Part of Izuku's job as phase two was to make sure the mark was dead. He never buried a body without double checking—but today he had simply put the man in the ground. Then that came back to bite them both in the ass, literally. The man somehow clawed his way out and tackled Tomura to the ground.

He had seized one of Tomura's machetes and gashed him directly from his lip to his eye, making him scream. Then in the next split second, Tomura shot the man in the throat. Blood sprayed everywhere and leaked down Tomura's once perfect face. Izuku winced when he saw the damage. Tomura's eye was in dire need of medical attention, and they had to go to the infirmary immediately when returning home.

Now, Tomura was pissed at him.

“What is with you lately?” Tomura snapped when they got into their room. “Do you need more punishment? Because I can go get a goddamn belt and beat the shit out of you if that’s what it takes to make you act right.”

“I’m fine,” Izuku said from his gritted teeth. He huffed in irritation as he took off his gear and sloppily tossed it to the side of the room. “I’m always fine.”

“Don’t give me that,” Tomura hissed. He marched up to Izuku and got directly in his face. Up close, Izuku could see the new wound on Tomura’s face throb. “I don’t need the fucking attitude from you after you nearly got my eye cut out. Now what’s with you?”

Izuku winced, feeling a tiny bit guilty for the gash across Tomura’s face. “Nothing is wrong.”

“You’re a terrible liar,” Tomura pointed out. He rolled his eyes and turned around. “When you’re done throwing your tantrum let me know. We have another assignment tomorrow that I need to debrief you on.”

“I’m not going,” Izuku whispered under his breath.

Tomura stopped walking and glared over his shoulder. “What did you say?”

“I said I’m not going,” Izuku repeated, a lot more forceful. “I’m not doing this anymore.”

“We’ve been over this, you have only two options—”

“—Kill or be killed. I know,” Izuku snapped. “That’s all you ever do is remind me how fast our lives can go away in the blink of an eye.”

“I remind you of that every day because you’re too stupid to absorb what I am saying,” Tomura growled. “With the way you act, I think I am the only one between the two of us who values your life.”

“…I don’t want to hurt people anymore.” Izuku lowered his head. “Please.”

“This shit again?” Tomura groaned tiredly. “You’re going to have your first assignment in a week, so you better learn to want to hurt people.”

“But not all people are bad!” Izuku finally fought back. “There’s good people in the world and I don’t want to accidentally hurt a good person! You can’t tell who is good or bad and that’s why killing is wrong. Wh-What if we went to the police and—”

“—Keep your voice down,” Tomura seethed. He grabbed Izuku by the arm and slammed him against the wall. “Do you really think people out there give a fuck about you?” Tomura’s eyes turned frigid and intensified. “You are the same as the rest of us, discarded into the goddamn trash. You should be kissing the ground Nine and One walk on for taking you in.”

“We were kidnapped,” Izuku hissed. He glared at Tomura, not hearing a word he was saying. “We don’t owe them shit for taking us away from our real families!”

The rage in Tomura's eyes slowly diminished. He cocked his head at Izuku.

"Kidnapped? Is that what you think happened to us?"

"Yes," Izuku responded sourly. "We had to be kidnapped. It all adds up that—th-that's the only answer. I bet all of our families are out there waiting for us to come back home while we're stuck here. That's why they don't let us go outside because they know someone is looking for us."

Tomura let out a sharp, dry chuckle. "You haven't been listening to a single thing Mr. Compress teaches us about human nature, have you?"

His brother took a large step back and let him go.

Tomura then walked over to his dresser that he always kept locked up.

The sudden switch in his brother's demeanor was like whiplash. Izuku stared on, confused as Tomura unlocked the dresser with a key on a necklace around his neck. He watched Tomura pull out a small file organizer. He thumbed through a bunch of beige folders before pulling out one and unclipping specific papers inside. He neatly placed it back where he got it from and locked his dresser tight.

His eyes turned on Izuku and walked up to him with the paper in hand.

"I may be cruel, but I do not lie to you," Tomura spat. "When I say that I am the only one who cares about you—that is not a lie. But despite what I have said, do you really think there's someone else out there who cares about you besides me?" Tomura asked carefully.

Izuku knew it was a trick question—but he was confident in his answer. "Of course. My real parents love me, and I know they are looking for me, just like yours are."

The paper was whipped in front of him with a picture.

"This is your birth mother," Tomura explained with no inflection. "Her name is Midoriya Inko. She lives right here in Tokyo, and she's been going by a new alias of Nakashima Yoko."

Izuku's heart skipped a beat.

He took the paper, like it was a long-lost treasure. He stared at it wondering if this was some sort of trick and turned it over but only saw the tiny bits of information. He looked at her photo and she seemed so kind. She was smiling. She had a dimple like him. Green hair like him. Even her eyes were green—like his. Izuku smiled a bit, realizing he looked identical to her. His mind filled in the blanks of having a normal life at his fingertips.

This was too good to be true.

"Wh-Why are you giving this to me?" Izuku muttered.

“Think of it as a birthday present.” Tomura waved his hand. “Go see her and tell her who you are, Midoriya Izuku.”

“And how am I supposed to go see her if I’m trapped in this place?”

“You have your mark now,” Tomura said flippantly. He picked the caked blood from under his nails and didn’t bother to look up at Izuku. “You have more free range than you did before, I forgot to tell you. You’re allowed to wander in the city as long as you’re back by check in.”

This time Izuku was baffled. “How come now?”

“Because it’s easier to find you.” Tomura tapped his collar bone to remind Izuku of his mark. “So, go to her. I’m sure she’ll take you in. Check out at the front door.”

Izuku stepped backwards with the paper in his hand.

He looked at the address on the sheet of paper and knew exactly where that was. His heart hammered over and over with various emotions.

“…You’re letting me leave?” Izuku whispered, confused.

“I am,” Tomura said. He curled his upper lip. “Be with your real family.”

Izuku stayed frozen as Tomura packed his backpack for him. His brother angrily shoved clothes, snacks, and water inside. He even packed tooth paste and other toiletries that Izuku might need if he was going to go away for a while. Sadness panged in Izuku’s chest at the sight of his brother practically shoving him out of the door.

Why did he feel so sad about this?

Before he could understand it, his brother shoved the backpack against his chest with an ugly scowl.

“Happy birthday, Izuku.”

Getting out was as easy as Tomura said it was.

He checked out at the front door, signed his name and put his number down. The secretary, Yui, smiled at him, and Izuku noticed her mark as well. The number 93 was behind her ear as she gave Izuku information on where he could and could not go.

“As a phase two, you have to stay within the red boundary,” Yui said softly.

She traced the map of Japan and showed him his limits. Izuku noted how Phase Three’s like Tomura and Jin were allowed to wander pretty much all over. Phase ones were restricted only to the compound. It was organized out with the more trust one gained through their family, the more freedom they earned.

“Have a fun off day!” Yui chimed.

Izuku took the map of Tokyo that was given to him and walked through the doors.

Then within a second, he hissed slightly when a tingle in his thigh hummed. It was subtle, and he assumed it to be a pinched nerve of sorts he hadn’t tended to correctly.

He shook it off and continued his walk around the busy city.

It was a lovely summer day, and his heart was pounding as he passed by the people in the busy streets of Tokyo. The flashing neon lights were terribly bright, and his large eyes were taking in everything. Every smile. Every laugh. It was all the things he had read about being so wonderful and he was on his way to meet someone who might gaze at him that way too.

Izuku clutched the paper to his beating heart, feeling conflicted.

He didn’t want to leave Tomura fully, but that guilt was overshadowed when his imagination filled up with scenarios from his romance novel. He could see himself being the one kidnapped and his parents crying over him. He knew they were reaching out for him and trying with all their power to find him.

Then as Izuku was walking through the streets of Tokyo, he saw soft blond hair in the corner of his eye in the crowd.

A chaotic hurricane of emotion was set off inside of him.

Izuku stopped walking and snapped his head to track the strangely familiar sight. He stared with wide eyes behind him to see a tall figure pushing through the crowd in the opposite direction as if upset. The texture of the hair was spiked, and it made Izuku’s heart skip a beat. It looked just like—

“Kacchan?” Izuku called, but he was too far away.

He walked forward, as if caught in a trance. He lightly jogged to the person, holding out his hand.

But too distracted, Izuku bumped directly into another man. He hissed and dropped the paper of his mother’s information on the ground. The man he had knocked over stumbled and fumbled his phone and glared at Izuku.

Izuku muttered a clumsy apology that wasn’t accepted. He winced at the choice words that were showered upon him as the unkind man shoved past him. Izuku quickly bent down and gathered up the paper of his mother’s information before someone stepped on it. In return, his finger was crushed by a businessman who was walking too quickly.

Izuku yelped, pulled his hand back, and glared up at the businessman who was already halfway gone.

By the time Izuku stood up again, the head of blond hair was nowhere to be found.

He gazed around, confused. Was that real?

The paper in his hand rustled with the summer wind. It caught his attention and reminded him of the very reason he was out and about.

Focus, Izuku.

Izuku took a deep breath and began walking the other direction.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku walked up slowly towards the woman who was humming happily in the garden. She was bent down, tending to a small bush in her yard. Her silky hair was pulled back into an elegant bun and she was dressed in comfortable summer clothes.

Izuku gazed at her in amazement and quietly walked up to the house.

“E-Excuse me?” Izuku spoke in a soft voice.

His mother turned towards him curiously, then froze upon seeing him. Her green eyes widened and then she slowly stood upright. She cocked her head at him like she had seen a phantom from the past.

“Are you Midoriya Inko?” Izuku asked with a welcoming smile.

“I don’t know who Midoriya Inko is,” his mother quickly said. “I’m sorry you have the wrong person. Now, please excuse me. I have dinner going in the oven.”

She turned around in haste and rushed towards the stairs of her home. She reached the handle of the door and Izuku panicked.

“M-My name is Izuku!” Izuku shouted. He imagined how it would go in his head, seeing her smile and rush towards him when she recognized who he was. “M-Midoriya Izuku. I was born on July 15th, thirteen years ago.”

Her ankles were gripped by his words.

Izuku’s heart hammered slowly when she turned around.

This time there was deep recognition in her eyes and Izuku awaited the hug that he thought he would receive. But he got nothing in exchange and his skin was left feeling cold. Inko turned around and her eyes were ten times more fearful while staring at him.

“I think you’re my mom,” Izuku whispered. He wrung his hands, feeling awkward.

Inko’s eyes skirted around. “How did you find me?”

“I—I was given your address and photo,” Izuku explained eagerly. He pulled out the folded paper with shaky hands and showed it to her. She took it from him and slowly her face became shadowed in a dark cloud upon seeing the information. “I am your biological son. I was hoping we could reconnect?”

“I—” Inko exhaled gently. She handed back the paper to him shamefully. “This is…This is. Ah. Why don’t you come in? I can make some tea for you.”

Izuku perked up, smiling with his heart hammering.

The inside of his mother’s house was gorgeous.

It was painted a welcoming yellow color on the walls, warm, and smelled of oranges. The TV was running the news, and the whole house was big enough for a family of four. Izuku studied the portraits on the walls closely as his mother walked into the kitchen to make tea.

It was silent between them, and he could feel her look at him several times within their quietness.

Izuku smiled at her and she wearily smiled back.

All around on the walls were family photos of his mother with a man with all black hair. They had a baby, from what it seemed. Next to these family pictures were photographs of the baby smiling and Izuku imagined himself in these portraits soon.

Inko brought out the tea and gestured Izuku over to the wooden table politely. Izuku sat down across from her. He stared at the pictures, particularly the man’s face.

“Is that your husband?” Izuku asked with a smile.

“Yes. I’m married.” Inko held up her hand to show the diamond ring on her finger. “He’s at work currently.”

Izuku smiled gingerly. He took a small sip of the tea to steady himself when his nerves rattled. He wanted to ask if that man was his father but didn’t exactly know how.

“Izuku,” Inko started. She cleared her throat and leaned forward. “How did you find that information? It was supposed to be under a very careful lock and key. No one should be able to know about my old identity.”

Izuku blinked a couple of times, knocked out of his daydreams.

“…I was given it as a birthday gift,” Izuku explained vaguely. He didn’t want to tell her fully he was being trained to be a murderer and was given the information in a fight between him and his also kidnapped brother. “I was told I could come find you.”

“I see.” Inko’s fingers tapped the table in deep thought. “Did Koizumi give it to you?”

Izuku wrinkled his nose. “Who is Koizumi?”

“He’s the man who promised me that I could start over,” Inko explained. She then fiddled with her thumbs. “He…He told me I could escape from the life I was trapped in if I…if I gave him you in exchange for money and a new identity.”

Izuku stopped drinking his tea.

He placed down the porcelain cup and the visions of family fractured slightly.

“You sold me?” Izuku clarified.

“I’m sorry,” Inko apologized in a soft tone. “Koizumi promised me you would be taken somewhere that would love you more than I could. He said something about families who wanted toddlers but didn’t want to go the route of adoption due to complications within the government. I thought that would be the best option for both of us. It was my only option at the time to ensure I could start over. I hope you can forgive me.”

Izuku tried to fend off the disgust that clung to his skin. It crawled like a thousand spiders, and nested into him—but he plucked it out before the venom could be injected. He delicately picked up his fragmented smile and pieced it back together. Then he leaned in, drenched in desperation.

Inko leaned backwards.

“I forgive you,” Izuku whispered, trying even to fool himself. “It clearly was a poor decision made at the time. You have your new life like you wanted, and I want to know you. I was hoping that…that maybe we could get to know each other?”

Izuku reached out, touched her hand and she yanked it away. It might as well have been a slap.

Inko furiously shook her head and clutched her hand to her chest. She was jittering like there was some sort of monster keeping her from receiving Izuku’s affection.

“No. You don’t understand,” Inko whispered. “Whether there was money or not I would have still given you up, Izuku. I-I can’t love you like you need me to.”

The temperature in the room dropped.

Izuku’s breathing slowed. “Wh-Why not?”

A broken gaze was his only answer at first. Everything in Inko’s eyes was swallowed in despair and she was shaking her head softly, as if begging Izuku to drop the subject. But Izuku couldn’t. He clung harder to those daydreams of a family he had painted inside of his mind and pressed forward.

“Please,” Izuku begged. “I-I need to know.”

“Don’t do this to yourself and don’t make me say it. This is cruel to both of us.”

Izuku’s face twisted. “Tell me.”

“Because you have his freckles,” Inko confessed through clenched teeth.

Izuku touched his face as if trying to understand. “Who?”

“Your biological father,” Inko continued. She hung her head and turned her eyes away from him. “You—You look like me, but you have that feature of his. He hurt me in one of the worst possible ways and you were a product of it. Seeing his freckles on your face that is so close to mine, hurts me too much and I could barely look at you when you were born.”

Inko wiped a single tear from her face.

“I-I tried taking care of you,” Inko confessed. “I did. I tried my best for two years. B-But I couldn’t do it. I was struggling and every day you grew more and more to resemble him. His freckles on your face got darker and multiplied. Then your hair curled in the same way as his —I felt sick looking at you and I hated myself for it. Even now, sitting across from you hurts me in the same way it did back then.”

Izuku’s hands were trembling as he touched his own cheek.

The sound of a baby crying from upstairs broke the moment.

Inko quickly stood up from her chair, head still turned away from him. She scrambled and picked up the baby monitor, leaving Izuku there alone at the table.

Izuku’s leg began jittering and his eyes stung.

Everything was wrong. This was wrong. Wrong. Wrong. Wrong.

Tears too big for his own heart swelled in his eyes. He resisted crying as he gazed around at the pictures on the wall of the perfect family that he thought he would be a part of. He marveled at how joyous his mother seemed. Everything inside the home was perfect and neat.

But every vision of the future Izuku had slowly burned in his head, leaving behind seared dreams.

When Inko came downstairs, she was cradling a crying child in her arms. The baby stared back at him with innocent eyes and straight, jet black hair. Izuku’s heart took a hit when he could see their resemblance ever so slightly. Green eyes and olive skin. Only difference was their hair, and his half-brother didn’t have freckles.

“Please,” Izuku pleaded. “P-Please. I-I’m sorry for looking like him b-but I need help getting away from where I’m at. I-I think I’m in danger and I need help.”

Inko shook her head mournfully. “I’m sorry, Izuku. But I can’t help you. I have a family that I love and need to make sure is safe, I can’t risk any trouble. Especially if you’re still tied to Koizumi. You’re on your own.”

Izuku tightened his jaw, trying to hold it together. He looked at the photographs on the wall and then back to the person he wanted to call mother.

“Then can you tell me who my father is?” Izuku tried. Maybe. Just maybe he had someone else—

“He’s not an option,” Inko whispered. “You’re better off not knowing who he is.”

Izuku’s heart stopped. Inko averted her eyes as the final blow was laid.

“Go home to wherever you’re from, Izuku. Please don’t come back here.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Broken.

Izuku had always known that word to apply to bones. Or things.

He knew it was something Tomura caused and a type of destruction that eventually could be fixed. But Izuku never knew that it could apply to something not visible to his eye. He had read in his book about a ‘broken heart’ and never grasped the concept.

Until now.

There was something in his chest that was hurting. Like a hand was squeezing his pounding heart unkindly every second. It restricted his breathing, his vision, his emotions and squeezed and squeezed and squeezed until he nearly collapsed on the sidewalk. There was a void in his chest that swallowed him whole when he walked out of his mother’s—

No. Not his mother.

Inko. She was only Inko.

There was a void in his chest that swallowed him whole when he walked out of Inko’s house.

Izuku quietly cried as he roamed the streets. People were staring at him, probably confused why such a young teen was sobbing by himself. Izuku had his head down, and hands clutching at his shirt, directly above his heart. Izuku bit his lip until it bled, trying to stop his emotions from pouring out but he couldn’t.

He couldn’t stop because she didn’t want him. She never did and she never would.

She abandoned him.

Izuku wept until he stumbled into an alley. He hiccupped as he placed his head on the wall. Why? Why, why, why was he cursed like this? He hit his fist against the brittle brick, and he crouched low to sob to himself.

He peered up angrily at the crowds that passed by the alley. They basked in the neon light while he hid in the shadows.

All the fantasies in his head incinerated into nothing. He would never be a part of such a life, would he? Just as the sourness in his heart spread to his mind, out the corner of his eye he saw a vague figure of a blond boy.

Izuku froze, tears stopping.

“Kacchan?” Izuku whispered, slightly dazed.

He scrambled upright, and desperation latched on to him tightly.

Kacchan would want him. They could still run away together.

Izuku tracked the head of blond spikes in the crowd that was quickly walking away. His breath caught as he pushed through the pain in his chest.

He ran.

He chased the blond spikes in front of him like it was his last rope of hope. An ugly sob wrecked its way through him as he shoved through the never-ending sea of people. Men and women alike yelled at him, confused and offended by his roughness. Izuku didn’t care though. When he reached the blond boy, he forcefully turned around the figure by their arm, and light brown eyes greeted him.

Brown. Not red.

Izuku’s face fell and the random boy stared at him in fear.

Suddenly, both a mother and father stepped out of the blur of faces. They roughly pushed Izuku backwards for touching their son.

“What’s wrong with you?!” The father criticized. “Did anyone teach you any manners, why are you scaring my son like this?”

Izuku couldn’t find any words.

The blond boy with brown eyes looked terrified of him. Izuku wearily stared down at his hands and his vision pulsed with an oncoming headache. He looked around and there were so many eyes judging him. They were looking upon the scene with their noses turned up. Even the family in front of him were yelling words Izuku couldn’t hear past the white noise blaring in his ears.

In the pulsing headache, Izuku could see a vision of Kacchan smiling at him inside of the old church.

A terrible feeling of hope clutched him again.

Izuku stumbled back and whispered a weak apology. He turned on his heels and ran to the last place he could think of for someone who might love him. He pushed through the crowds, running against time. Or something. Or even running away from himself—his heart was pounding with all its broken pieces as he ran.

He found his way to the plaza. Upon arrival, Izuku stopped in shock.

It had changed so much, and he hadn't even noticed being trapped inside his home. All around, it was clean and brand new. Commercialized to hell and back. There were no homeless people gathered and blinding neon lights were staring back at him.

The fountain in the center was working, overflowing with clean water. Random jewelry stores had been installed and pop music he never heard played overhead. Izuku staggered as he walked, trying to comprehend.

The cracked statue of the angel was gone—and so was the violinist.

Izuku forced his feet to move.

He walked down a pathway that seemed to be the only thing left untouched. It was cracked and broken and progressively grew more fractured the further he walked. At the very end he found the abandoned church, still leaning and withstanding the test of time.

Izuku hurried to their old entrance and his heart stopped.

It was broken open, like someone had kicked it.

Izuku fluidly eased inside. He stumbled in, and it was exactly how he remembered it. Izuku wiped his tears as he looked around the vast church. Some vines had grown inside, and more wood was rotting under the wear of age. Izuku followed his heart strings as they led him to the one place he felt comfort.

He didn't think anyone would be there. He expected it to be as untouched as it was the last time he came and left that note.

However, when he arrived it looked recently disturbed.

Izuku's eyes widened, and his heart squeezed so hard he nearly lost all his breath.

His note was gone, and so was Kacchan's favorite All Might Action figure. The pillow had been dusted off like someone had laid there, and there were handprints in the dust everywhere.

Izuku whirled around, wildly. He sprang into action, frantic to find his missing half.

"Kacchan? Kacchan!" Izuku screamed at the top of his lungs.

He called the nickname over and over inside of the abandoned building, chasing the visual of his childhood.

He cried with a convulsing chest as he could see the imagery of young him and Kacchan playing tag all over the dust covered church. He cried when he could see them in the shower area as he scrubbed him clean. He cried when he realized the building was in fact empty. All that remained were the broken memories inside of his head.

Izuku fell to his knees underneath the glittering reflections from the stained glass. He pushed his palms into his eyes trying to beg the tears to stop but they only kept coming.

When he put his hands in his lap, he saw the final visual that changed him.

He could see the memory of young Kacchan hugging him in front of the altar. His younger self hugged him back and their makeshift rings were tightly wrapped around their fingers.

“Why did you leave me too, Kacchan?” Izuku whispered, broken.

ᔓᔓᔓ

He had spent an hour staring around the church and wandering the city of Tokyo trying to figure out where to go. But every time he tried to take a step to run away, he felt the tether of awful words pounding into his consciousness. Each one was like a sledgehammer to his confidence and will.

You are weak.

You are useless.

You have no meaning.

Izuku gritted his teeth when it felt like the phrases were strangling him.

At 22:22, Izuku willingly walked back to his home. His face was swollen from crying, and his eyes were glazed over. He was depleted of everything inside of him besides the sting of bitterness. In the end, his romance book was wrong, and it was full of lies.

He signed his name back in, and Yui didn’t even seem phased by his disgruntled appearance. Izuku quietly walked back to his room holding the straps of his backpack. His head stayed down and he could feel the mark on his body like it was written on his bone. He swiped into his room and sitting there reading a book was Tomura.

His brother looked up at him with smugness.

“Did your real mommy turn out to love you?” Tomura asked, twisting the wound. “You have to tell me all about your amazing adventure with her.”

Izuku stared at him through his bloodshot eyes as it clicked together. His nostrils flared. For the first time in Izuku’s life, he felt rage. Pure, unbridle rage for all his broken dreams.

“You knew,” Izuku seethed. He dropped his backpack on the ground and calmly walked up to Tomura. “You knew this whole time and you still sent me there.”

“Of course I did.” Tomura tilted his head and his silver hair leaned with him. “I wanted you to see up close how unloved you are by the world, little brother.”

Izuku snapped.

All the built-up emotions in his chest clashed together and he lashed out on the one person who had shattered his reality.

Izuku screamed as he lunged forward, catching Tomura off guard.

His brother's eyes widened, and he caught Izuku's fist before it could connect with his face. But Izuku wanted Tomura to feel the same kind of pain he felt. He almost wanted him dead. Quickly, Izuku threw his other fist, connecting his knuckles into Tomura's cheekbones. It was then Tomura finally acted and slammed their heads together.

But no physical pain could match the throbbing hurt in Izuku's heart.

They tossed back and forth, and Izuku decided he was going for the kill. Tomura always hurt him so much. He took away everything and rubbed it in his face when he was supposed to love him too—but he never did.

In the midst of their fighting, they broke everything in their path. The mirror, the vase, and the lamp were all victims to their storm. Izuku finally used all his skills, not holding back. He grabbed the blade out of Tomura's back pocket after twisting around in an aerobic combo. His brother's eyes widened when Izuku threw off the cover from the weapon, metal singing with his motion.

Izuku went for Tomura's jugular.

He missed—by a fraction. He shallowly cut directly above his brother's pulse and was livid he didn't get it deeper.

Somehow, in the face of near death, Tomura grinned.

"There's that killer instinct—finally," Tomura bellowed, sounding beyond gratified.

His eerie chuckle bounced off all the walls as Izuku kept attacking him. Izuku moved impossibly quick and skilled, finally showing the full fruition of his upbringing. Tomura was just as skilled, if not more, however. He fluidly blocked every deadly blow that tried to sink into his skin with a shimmer of glee. They moved around gracefully, like the deadly vipers they were meant to be.

"That's it, Izuku," Tomura encouraged. "Harness all of that raw pain."

Izuku swung and missed. He cried and gritted his teeth as his emotions intensified.

"Faster," Tomura hissed.

Izuku sliced faster.

"More precise," Tomura lectured.

And Izuku aimed more precisely.

"C'mon. You're going to have to try a lot harder than that if you want to kill me."

"Shut up!" Izuku screamed. He jabbed the blade straight towards Tomura's throat. "Just shut up!"

The tip of the blade touched Tomura's Adam's apple—and then his wrists were seized. Izuku's vision flipped as his arm twisted behind his back quicker than he could comprehend. He was shoved, belly down, on the ground with a knee on his back.

Tomura's strong hands grabbed Izuku's elbows and yanked his arms backwards, forcing the younger boy to scream in pain. Izuku thrashed on the ground in resistance. Hurt, anger, and sadness danced inside of him in the worst synchronization as he tried to get up to put a stab wound in his brother. But the knee in his back pressed harder.

Tomura leaned all his weight on him until Izuku was struggling to even breathe.

"Do you understand what I have been saying about how awful humans are now?" Tomura jeered. "Do you finally get it?"

Izuku shook his head, attempting to stop his flow of tears.

Tomura twisted Izuku's arms, restraining him from moving as he spoke.

"Anyone on the street would never have known your mother sold her first born for a second shot at life," Tomura whispered the truth like poison dripping in his ear. "Someone would see her pushing that new baby carriage and think she's a normal goddamn citizen who is untainted. Same for my bastard father. Ibara's. Aoyama's. Hiryu's. Himiko's. Jin's. Even Sen's."

Izuku gritted his teeth, and his struggling became less.

"We don't know anything about anyone we're going to be tasked to kill," Tomura then spoke a bit softer. "But this proves everyone has skeletons in their closet. No matter how good they seem. Everyone is worthy of death to some degree therefore we don't have to know everything about every person we're asked to execute. We only have to be the bullet to the gun."

Izuku stopped struggling.

He went limp in his brother's hold and cried into the carpeted floor.

All of Izuku's dreams of love and family were officially shattered.

"…Sh-She never wanted me," Izuku rasped hoarsely. He tucked his head into the floor to hide his despair. "N-No one ever wanted me…this wh-whole time. Sh-She said she couldn't lo-love me, Tomura. She couldn't—because of how I looked. I-I can't even control that."

His brother let him cry.

There were no more lectures, and Izuku let out the last bit of his grief. The hands restraining him eased up as he sobbed and then something Izuku never expected to happen, did.

Tomura turned Izuku over on his back. Izuku kept his eyes screwed shut, too embarrassed and ashamed. Snot was running down his face and his mind was wrecked like someone had fully demolished all of his thoughts.

“No one cares about me,” Izuku cried.

Tomura exhaled roughly and sat back on his hunches. His empty eyes filled up with pity briefly. He pulled Izuku into his arms and gently hugged him.

Izuku clung back, without hesitation.

He cried into Tomura’s shirt and calloused fingers raked through his hair. The touch comforted him as his crying turned from sobbing to softly weeping.

“I care about you, Izuku,” Tomura muttered. “I’m the only one who does. Which is why I try so hard for you to understand what our purpose is. Do what you have to do to survive, nothing else.”

Izuku took those words to heart.

He only had to survive, and Tomura was the only person who cared about him.

They laid there, his brother giving him an inch of the mercy he somehow had left. Tomura let Izuku cry into his chest for however long he needed as they sat on the floor. Eventually, Tomura shifted them to a more comfortable position. He leaned against the side of the bed and motioned for Izuku to come sit next to him. Izuku eagerly took the opportunity, knowing this would probably be the last time he was afforded physical comfort.

Izuku hugged into Tomura’s side and his brother hugged him back.

After an hour, a knock on their door came before it was forced open. Izuku peaked up and he could see both Nine and Ms. Nagant there. Izuku flinched, trying to let go of his brother. Hugging was bad. Worth ten hits, exactly.

However, when Izuku tried to reel back, Tomura’s arms locked him in place. Izuku tried to see Tomura’s face but his brother quietly took his head and pushed it into the crook of his neck. Izuku was confused but went along with it.

“Is everything okay?” Nine asked wearily. “Someone walked by and heard fighting.”

“Yes, we’re fine,” Tomura said tiredly. He held Izuku in his arms tighter. “We had a training session.”

“Wait. Are you hugging and is he crying?” Ms. Nagant asked, revolted. Izuku stiffened. He pushed his face further into Tomura and clung harder. He didn’t want to let go of his brother because he knew what was coming next. “Give 217 to me. He needs to go down to the basement immediately and get punished.”

“No,” Tomura spoke strongly.

Everything halted.

Izuku’s eyes snapped open, and he held his breath.

“What do you mean no, 117?” Ms. Nagant hissed. “Crying is a minimum two-day offense in the basement. He needs to be corrected.”

“It was my fault. I pushed him too hard,” Tomura admitted. “I had given him an intense training session and I think it was too much for him at his level.”

A lie. Tomura lied fluently, Izuku realized.

“117.” Izuku didn’t need to look to know Ms. Nagant was unimpressed. “He needs to get the allocated punishment. He’s thirteen, he knows crying is unacceptable.”

“How about I punish him myself?” Tomura suggested. “He’s mostly my responsibility, correct? I think I need to be the one in charge of his punishments from now on. He’ll receive them better under me.”

Izuku furrowed his brow at what was being proposed.

“Are you sure?” Nine questioned, sounding intrigued. “Do you think you can handle that?”

Tomura nodded. “I’m sure. He responds better to me since I have raised him.”

A drop of silence. Then it gave.

“Fine. I’ll trust you on this one 117,” Nine said. “But only because you’re showing more advanced training than the other phase threes. We’ll meet about this tomorrow to discuss further, and I want a full reasoning why you think this is a good idea.”

“Of course. I will be prepared tomorrow. Thank you for your time,” Tomura said, utterly polite. “217. Say thank you to Nine and Ms. Nagant.”

“Thank you,” Izuku whispered into the room. He was confused but endlessly grateful that he didn’t have to go to the basement. “I won’t cry again. I promise.”

“Okay,” Ms. Nagant muttered. “And clean this room up before one of you cuts your foot on glass. I want this place spotless by the morning before your classes. Goodnight 117. Goodnight 217.”

“Good night,” Izuku and Tomura said in unison.

That was enough to suffice their caretakers and they left their room.

When the door clicked shut, Izuku leaned backwards and wiped his eyes. His brother wasn’t smiling, but his face was as soft as he could muster. The scar over his eye and lip was settling in now, and Izuku could feel himself tethered to his last anchor point: his brother.

“See? I won’t let anyone else hurt you anymore,” Tomura explained. He rubbed his back and Izuku calmed down all the way. “No more basement. You can trust me.”

Izuku nodded, fully seeing the truth now: Tomura knew best.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Izuku got handed his first red folder the following week, he forced himself to feel nothing.

There was no Kacchan.

He had no family.

There was no happy ending awaiting him.

The only person who cared about him was Tomura—his cruel, yet somehow equally broken brother. Fairytales were proving to be just that, tales that were meant to give comfort. But they were not realistic for him because love was not his fate.

Izuku didn't bother memorizing the face or name of the mark. He knew if he did he would empathize with whoever it was, so he avoided it. He allowed himself to be taken somewhere far away in his mind. His new source of comfort was a pitch black like separate dimension. A vast state of nothingness. He felt nothing. Wanted nothing. Even more so, he didn't care to.

He was given a location and a sniper gun from Ms. Nagant. She instructed him to station himself on the rooftop. He was accompanied by Tomura for supervision, but Izuku knew he didn't need it.

When the night fell, Izuku held up the large gun. He pointed it to the window in the dead of night with precision.

Izuku noted quietly that the mark he was given had black hair and square glasses. He was sitting in a room playing some sort of card game with a cigar hanging out of his mouth. Surrounding him were exactly three people who were laughing and lying stacks of cash on the table.

The mark smiled, and Izuku pulled the trigger.

No emotion surged through him. Izuku was simply a ghost residing in his own body. He wasn't the one pulling the trigger, he just observed the Viper side of himself doing so.

He watched the bullet fly true like a song reaching its peak. It was swift, entering through one temple and exiting out the other. The man dropped dead in the room of people, and his body laid there limp on the table. Silent screaming from the others in the room happened. Everyone began scrambling.

Many of them took the money. Izuku watched, appalled by the display of greed.

People really were just like he was taught.

Izuku lowered the gun and looked up at Tomura who was smirking at him.

"Congratulations, little brother," Tomura remarked. "You're officially a viper now."

Along the way home, Tomura stopped and bought him ice cream as a celebration. It made Izuku smile slightly. As he ate his chocolate chip ice cream cone, his emotions began flooding back into him, like a switch that was turned on again. He could feel the heaviness fully envelope him when the weight of what he had done set in.

But Izuku was sad more than anything.

When they got into their room, Tomura was staring at him curiously.

“You should be mindful of your expressions,” Tomura warned softly. “It’s written all over your face that you’re bothered by something. If anyone saw that after an assignment, they would deem you unfit and send you away.”

Izuku nodded. Tomura was right. One of their first lessons was to kill their emotions. Yet here he was, sad while eating ice cream.

Izuku sat down at his desk and stared blankly at himself in the mirror. The ski mask ruffled his thick hair and when he tried to run his hand through it, his fingers hit several snags. Izuku’s shoulders sagged, and he hung his head.

Then a hand was placed on his shoulder, drawing his attention.

Tomura quietly began brushing his hair for him. Izuku teared up slightly at the tenderness and he wanted to say thank you. But his emotions were wrangling his words making it too difficult to speak. Silently, they stayed there as Tomura brushed his hair all the way and kept him calm.

A tear fell down Izuku’s face.

“I can’t control my emotions fully,” Izuku admitted as he wiped away the proof of his weakness. “What should I do? This is dangerous.”

“I know,” Tomura answered. “I’ve got a solution for that, don't worry. I won’t let anyone else hurt you.”

He brushed Izuku’s hair softly and parted it out of his face for him. Izuku stared at the visual of them together through the vanity mirror. He didn’t recognize himself as he searched his face. All he could see staring back at him was the woman who didn’t want him and the freckles that doomed him.

Tomura was looming over him like a protective dark cloud. The gash healed up to be a loud scar on his brother’s face. Izuku felt guilty seeing the deep wound. He had been responsible for that, and Tomura was the only person who ever cared for him through the years.

Tomura put the brush down once Izuku’s hair was detangled.

He then bent down by the desk and pulled out something from a bag. In his hands was a small, silver mask.

Izuku almost flinched slightly at the sight of it. The mask seemed like it was created for a wild animal more than a human. But Izuku didn't move a muscle when Tomura unclasped it and delicately hooked it on his face for him.

If Izuku's body was a coffin, this was the final nail sealing his fate. He could feel it as he gazed at himself in the mirror. All he could see was his destiny that had been decided for him long before he knew it.

"Keep your eyes emotionless," Tomura instructed. "Look down if you have trouble even doing that and your bangs will hide your emotions, and this mask will hide any facial expressions well enough that you'll be able to get by."

Izuku nodded slowly. Tomura was always looking out for him.

"Thank you, big brother."

"Of course." Tomura hummed as he toyed a bit with Izuku's curls to detangle one last knot. "You know, you have to pick a code name eventually. I think Viridian Viper would suit you well."

Viridian.

"Do you like it?" Izuku asked. Because at the end of the day, it never mattered what he wanted.

"I do. I think Viridian would be nice for you."

"Okay. I like Viridian too."

Tomura almost smiled.

Izuku embraced the new identity after that day. The reflection of himself in the mirror with the mask on was an entirely different version of his body.

They went to bed afterwards and in the depths of the night, Izuku kept his secret routine.

He pulled out his romance novel from the floorboard and cracked it open. He didn't read a word however this time, too bitter to read about the life he would never have. He silently stared at the words, mourning all the dreams that drifted far off in his head. One by one they waltzed away and left him behind like everyone else in the world had.

Izuku flipped to the back of the cover page.

He carved two tally marks into the paper with a black pen. One for Sen. One for his first mark.

He shut the book.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you so much!! Please let me know what you think below :') Next chapter is gonna be /that/ chapter revealing the "Incident" as Izuku fully dives into his ranks at the Viper Academy. Super exciting!!

Thank you so so much for reading :D See you next time!

Chapter 19 — Entr'acte III

5 Years until The Incident

A shadow passed on Izuku's left. It was dark, blurry and moving quickly through the dimly lit tunnels. Underneath the pale light, the glimmer of some fancy watch caught Izuku's eye. He spun on his heels precisely, chasing the shadow deeper into the underground labyrinth.

Once Izuku was close enough, the shadow in front of him melted away to reveal a man. The man was stocky and built as if he could crush three men's skulls with his bare hands—and it was exactly who Izuku was searching for. It was one of his marks.

His target wove in and out of various hallways, clearly hoping to confuse Izuku. He juked one direction only to slip away in the opposite. This tactic may have worked on any ordinary person. But Izuku was not ordinary.

He was a viper.

“Viridian, there’s one target heading your direction from behind you,” Aoyama’s voice warned through their earpieces. “Be careful not to get ambushed. Blood. Obsidian—go for reinforcement.”

Izuku sucked in a deep breath through his metal mask.

Izuku’s sharp, green eyes honed in on his prey and he picked up the pace. The man in front of him tipped his head back slightly. Their eyes met for a brief moment, and there was unearned amusement in his target’s eyes. His mark smiled as if Izuku had fallen right into his trap but Izuku knew the mark had fallen into a Viper’s pit.

Within the next moment, Izuku could hear several footsteps in various directions. Three, to be exact. He knew two of those footsteps: one maniacally paced one and the other sounded like air, almost too light to hear.

Izuku came to a skidding halt when he breached the mouth of a large, empty room.

Izuku remained calm as he dodged a deadly knife attack. The target went straight for his throat. Typical, predictable and amateurish. Izuku spun quickly to see three other men in all black. A brief moment of assessment allowed Izuku to recognize these men as their prey and he dehumanized them to ants in the next second.

Each man attempted to take several more lethal swipes at him. But Izuku fluidly dodged all attempted kill shots without breaking a sweat. He surgically disarmed one man then successfully flung a blade from his waistband between the man’s eyes.

The pest fell to the floor with a heavy thud, dead.

“I told you not to get ambushed,” Aoyama sighed in the ear piece.

“I’m not,” Izuku said flatly as he disarmed the next target and then brutally head butted him to disorient the man. “You said one. There are three new targets here.”

“Good thing you’re never alone then.”

Izuku looked up when he heard the signature metal rattle of Himiko.

She dropped down from up above, revealing herself from the darkness. Her landing shook the ground, stunning the remaining three targets in the room. Her crazed eyes peered from underneath her curtain bangs like a wild animal and her malicious grin was on full display.

She was dressed in the same all black attire as Izuku but in her hands was a long metal chain that had blades welded to both ends.

Himiko gripped her weapon with homicidal delight.

Before the targets could react, she slung her weapon with pure violent volition. The blade pierced the heart of one man and his eyes bulged so far Izuku thought they might pop. The grin on her face split wider at the sight of the dripping blood.

She then moved like a spider as she slithered around the target. She wrapped the cold chain around his throat and tightened it until the man was choking and gasping.

“The sound of a dying man is my favorite melody,” Himiko hummed sweetly. “But the sight of blood is even more satisfying to me.”

She pulled and pulled the chain until the man’s face turned purple. Then with one final, violent tug, she broke his neck with no remorse.

The body slumped to the ground and the last two targets were frozen in fear.

After Himiko licked the man’s blood, Izuku took a relaxed stance. He watched as the rest of his unit revealed themselves, writhing out from various shadowy corners.

Across the large room, Jin quietly crawled out from underneath a vent. His bright, white smile gleamed as he cut one target’s Achilles’ heel in a single swipe. The target cried out and now all eyes were on Jin.

Jin’s eerie laughter filled the air as he smiled in a way that was purely him: unhinged and bellicose. The target he injured tried to shoot him but Jin swiftly dodged. Jin drew his own pistol and fired a sharp bullet into the man’s skull. The body slumped down to the ground.

Next to reveal themselves was Ibara. Her long graceful, emerald colored hair always felt out of place to Izuku. She was too ethereal to be here with them. But when she pulled out her thorned whip, Izuku was reminded why she was chosen for this unit.

“I pray your soul finds guidance in the next life,” she whispered too softly as she launched her whip to wrap tightly around the man’s throat.

The tiny, metal thorns on the whip sunk into the target’s flesh and bled him out immediately. A croak was heard and blood sprayed across Ibara’s jumpsuit. An instant kill. There was no enjoyment in the murder like there always was with Himiko or Jin. Her face stayed emotionless and stale much like Izuku’s.

Their eyes met for a brief moment then Izuku averted his gaze when he felt the hairs on the back of his neck stand up. Izuku whirled around to see three more targets enter the scene, blazing. They went straight for Izuku with reckless abandon.

Izuku moved out of the way and went on the attack immediately.

But before he could go hand to hand with the new targets, another Viper came into the room.

Hiryu slid into the midst of battle with all the grace of death.

His dark, obsidian colored eyes were deeply focused as he kept his eyes trained on their prey. Without exchanging a word, Izuku and Hiryu fell into a familiar pattern of partnered fighting. They blended with their knives and dodged against the three men without gaining a single scratch. The two fought back to back, and overpowered the two others.

It wasn't before long that Hiryu cut one man's throat and Izuku snapped the other's neck.

All Viper eyes locked on to the final target in the room.

"Five against one isn't good odds, Goro," Hiryu warned their mark. "It would be wise to come with us and give any information on where you're operating so we can end this now."

Hiryu stood up straight and lowered his black bandana off his face. His long ponytail swayed with the breeze that was flowing out from the vents.

Izuku glanced at Hiryu and then glanced at the target. Izuku could tell there was a look in Hiryu's eyes that reflected some level of restraint.

Quickly, the target held up a gun with shaky hands.

"You can all eat my shit," Goro spat. He cocked his gun and held it up with shaky arms. "Go to hell! You fucking snakes can't tell me what to do!"

Izuku tried to keep himself from growing annoyed. This was taking longer than it should have.

They were assigned to hunt down the man in front of them. His name was Goro and he was a fledging crime lord who had been encroaching on Yakuza territory. Despite his warning to back off from the Yakuza heir himself, Chisaki Kai, Goro kept on doing all the crap he was instructed not to.

Now here they all were in some dingy factory's basement.

Chisaki had given simple instructions: bring in the pest and exterminate all his wannabe lackeys.

"I would listen to our dear Obsidian Viper." Himiko laughed. She swung her chain around with a lopsided grin. "He's the reasonable one out of the lot of us."

Goro's upper lip curled and he whirled his gun towards Himiko. "I thought you were the Viper Seven? Where's the other two?"

"One is in our ear if you must know," Jin offered. He picked dried blood from underneath his nails without glancing up. "Sparkling Viper isn't much of a fighter, but he's good with electronics. Even if you manage to escape, he'll track down your location just like he did today."

That seemed to get underneath Goro's skin. The man bristled, and his eyes anxiously darted around at all of them.

"Vipers, we shouldn't provoke him," Ibara warned, offering some sage advice. "It'll make him skittish."

Ibara was correct, like always, but it was her words that set him off.

Goro started shaking so hard Izuku was worried he might implode—and he did. Goro screamed loudly, setting them all into defensive positions but he moved in a way that was too erratic for any of them to predict.

He randomly fired off his gun—and it struck Izuku right in the shoulder.

Izuku grunted as the bullet sunk into his skin. He went stumbling backwards from the impact and his legs quaked with adrenaline. Izuku absorbed the blow like he was trained and he steadied himself through sheer will.

White specks flickered across his vision and several things happened at once: Hiryu rushed over to him, helped steady him, and applied pressure on the wound. Ibara and Jin immediately restrained Goro, throwing him down with unnecessary force and Himiko started cackling maniacally. She threw her head back and wiped the blood off her lips.

“That was the wrong Viper to shoot,” Himiko teased. She tilted her head and tutted her finger. “You hurt the little one and you get the big one in return.”

A single footstep is all it took to change the mood of the room.

Izuku stiffened.

Hiryu grew agitated.

Ibara’s blank mask slipped to reveal weariness.

Jin’s lips pressed in a thin line and Himiko, even though she was amused, her chuckles immediately died. Slowly, a new threatening presence entered the scene. Izuku didn’t have to look behind him to know who it was.

The Horned Viper.

The long wound stretching over Tomura’s right eye had healed to leave a nasty scar. But he embraced it just as though he was born with it. He was dressed in all black like the rest of them, but he no longer bothered to wear a mask. On his back were his two sharpened machetes in the shape of an X.

Tomura had shot up in height, standing at a powerful 187cm and his muscles were taut in whatever he wore. His long silver hair was pulled up into a messy bun, revealing his mark ‘117’ at the base of his nape. Over the past two years, Tomura gained an interest in tattooing his body. An endless sea of horned vipers were inked on his neck, all baring their fangs towards his strong jawline.

He flexed his large hands and the ripples of his skin made the river of inked snakes covering his hands and arms dance. Across his battered knuckles were the words “VIPER” and “SNAKE” in big, bold lettering. Accompanying all of this were also sharp, terrifying piercings. Pierced eyebrows. Pierced ears. Pierced bottom lip with silver snake bites.

Tomura now looked as noxious as he was.

Hiryu peeled himself away from Izuku when Tomura sauntered towards them.

Izuku stood up straight as if he wasn't hurt. Tomura and Hiryu exchanged an unreadable passing pair of glances that held simmering rivalry. Then Tomura placed a hand a little too gently on Izuku's shoulder and inspected the wound.

Cold, crimson eyes stared down into Izuku.

"I'll deal with you later," Tomura whispered only for Izuku to hear.

Izuku's stomach knotted. He had messed up.

Tomura cut his eye towards their mark and with a simple hand gesture, motioned for Ibara and Jin to lift Goro. The two did as they were instructed and forced Goro onto his feet with his arms twisted behind his back. Goro's bottom lip was split open and his eyes were wild. He looked fearful of the six figures in front of him, eyeing him up and down.

"We were going to take you alive and unharmed originally," Tomura said through an exasperated sigh. He walked forward without haste and placed on a pair of leather gloves neatly. "But, I don't take too kindly to the injuries of my favorite brother." He rolled up his sleeves and placed himself directly in front of Goro. "I hope you understand."

Goro started squirming when Tomura lifted up his hands. Tomura positioned his thumbs directly over Goro's eyes and held tightly onto his skull.

"—What do you think you're doing?" Hiryu hissed. He stepped forward bravely and grabbed Tomura's arm. "We need him alive."

Silence.

Everyone's eyes were on Hiryu now.

"Do you think I am an idiot?" Tomura asked carefully. "I am blinding him, not killing him."

"But we need him to tell us where the rest of his organization is located," Hiryu tried to reason. He glared at Tomura. "This is not the time to get your sick kicks."

"Am I taking out his tongue?" Tomura quipped. "He will still be able to speak and he will give up the information. This is for injuring one of our own, I do not let that go so simply."

Hiryu and Tomura entered a staring contest for dominance and silence fell over their unit.

This had been happening more and more recently and Izuku couldn't figure out why.

In the middle of the glare off, Izuku shifted on his feet when he felt the burn of Jin and Himiko's eyes. They were scowling at him, probably blaming him for the tension in the air no doubt. They always regarded him as if he was a spoiled brat who wasn't supposed to be there.

Jin and Himiko never let go of their grudge about Sen after all these years. They thought Izuku was a part of their unit because he was riding the coattail of Tomura. They credited Izuku's extreme success in the academy to getting lucky that he was the Little Brother of Tomura, who seemed so fiercely protective of him.

However, Izuku knew why Tomura was really hurting this man.

It wasn't out of protectiveness but rather it was punishment for Izuku. Tomura was the only person who knew Izuku was defective with empathy. Every time Izuku messed up, Tomura made sure to inflict pain onto the person who did it as a punishment for Izuku: look what you made me do. It was a subtle reminder for Izuku of what Tomura was capable of.

When a minute passed, Hiryu lost the stare off.

Hiryu begrudgingly lowered his head, however disapproval was deeply etched into his face. Tomura scoffed and shrugged Hiryu off of him like he was a flea and returned his deadly gaze back onto Goro.

Goro was crying and begging for an ounce of mercy.

He could beg forever, Izuku thought sourly. Mercy was not something Tomura understood.

Izuku kept his eyes lowered to the ground as Tomura blinded the man with his thumbs. The screams mixed with the quenching sound and blood slowly pooled at Tomura's boots. There were a mush of words that fumbled out, and every location of his operations was listed into the air as a possible bargain for his sight—but Tomura kept all his promises.

When the act was finished, Ibara and Jin let go of Goro who crashed to the ground.

The failed gang leader sobbed and held his newly deformed face with anguish. Tomura stood above him with not a single thread of sympathy woven into his face. Izuku studied Tomura's bloodied hands and watched how they dropped to his side.

Izuku blinked once, and within that second Tomura whirled onto Hiryu—punching him in the nose so violently it jerked everyone into a surprise gasp.

Hiryu staggered and then another blow was laid on him. An upper cut as fast as lightning was the next hit and before Hiryu could fall, Tomura grabbed Hiryu by the jaw, smearing Goro's blood on his face in the process. Hiryu grunted in pain as he was gripped in a bruising hold.

Lethal hatred sunk into Tomura's face and he spoke his next words viciously.

"Know your place, Obsidian," Tomura threatened. "Nine made me the leader of this unit, not you. I don't give a shit if you are second in command. If you question me in front of our team again I'll cut your goddamn tongue out and make you swallow it."

Tomura shoved Hiryu backwards with so much force that Hiryu fell to the ground and hit his head.

“Everyone, move out,” Tomura commanded with an icy edge. “Obsidian. Viridian. Transport the target to Chisaki’s drop off.”

Tomura left the room and immediately Jin and Ibara followed suit. Himiko glanced at Izuku with a look of subtle disgust, shook her head, and followed the rest of the team.

Izuku waited until the footsteps were out of earshot before exhaling. He unclasped his metal mask and hooked it to his side. He looked down on the ground at the two men in very different positions. Goro was crawling around in agony mourning his sight and Hiryu was sitting cross legged on the floor nursing his sure to be broken nose.

Izuku walked over to Goro and unbuckled a blue syringe from his belt. He uncapped it, flicked the needle and used his foot to pin the disfigured man on the ground.

“Pl-Please, I’m sorry,” Goro tried to reason. “Tell Chisaki I will call off all operations—”

Izuku tuned him out as he pushed the needle into Goro’s neck.

A scream. A cry. Two things Izuku has become numb to. He injected the blue liquid into Goro’s veins without blinking and within two short breaths the man was out cold.

“Goro will be under for the next six hours,” Izuku muttered tiredly. “That gives us time to drop him off across town.”

Hiryu grunted in return.

Izuku turned to his older brother with a level of sympathy. He pulled out disinfectant from his small pack and handed it to Hiryu, who gladly took it.

Izuku removed his ear piece then turned it off just in case Aoyama was still listening in. Hiryu did the same, but was a lot more frustration. Izuku didn’t flinch as Hiryu flung the ear piece across the room with all his strength and it broke against the wall.

“Fuck Tomura,” Hiryu said in Korean. “Fuck him. I can’t stand him.”

“Why? Because Nine made him first in command over you?” Izuku switched to Korean as well because he valued his life.

Korean was the one language Tomura never bothered to learn.

Tomura insisted on learning Latin to try to make himself stand out and it worked like a charm. Nine thought it was a good idea since a lot of secret code in their world of assassins used dead languages.

When Nine approved Tomura to switch to learning Latin in place for Korean, like true followers, many other vipers followed suit. Everyone wanted to be as high achieving as Tomura so many got to choose between either Latin or Korean.

Now, because of that small drift, Izuku and Hiryu were the only two in The Viper Seven unit who were fluent in Korean. To Izuku, it was their personal language and whenever they were alone they naturally bled into it to feel secure.

“My issues with him aren’t about who is the goddamn leader. It’s—” Hiryu licked his lips and took in a shaky breath. “Never mind. You wouldn’t understand. Not anymore anyways.”

“No matter what is going on you shouldn’t test him like that, hyung,” Izuku warned and ignored the jab. “He’s starting to lose more and more patience recently.”

“Trust me, he’s not the only one,” Hiryu grumbled.

Izuku made a face at that statement—it was off.

However, Izuku was worn down after this assignment and wished to get it over with. He knew he had a lecture coming from Tomura for getting himself shot and his shoulder was throbbing. Sparing no more energy, Izuku turned his back on Hiryu to tie up Goro and address his own wound.

If Izuku had watched Hiryu closer he would have seen something on Hiryu’s face that had never been there before: sadness.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku embraced the feeling of nothingness that coursed through his veins.

Every day was routine at this point: find the targets, exterminate them, and make sure no loose ends were left behind. Izuku could do it with his eyes closed now, and sometimes he did.

After they delivered Goro to the Yakuza drop site, their unit returned back to The Academy together.

They walked into their building covered in blood and all at once everyone’s eyes turned to them. Some people regarded them with admiration. Others held back jealousy because they weren’t chosen to be a part of the unit: The Viper Seven.

Nine’s best of the best.

Jin: The Double Headed Viper. He was granted the codename for how quick his personality could flip. He went from happy to happy to murder in mere seconds, and he held no hesitation in making sure the assignment was done. His number was 110 and he had it tattooed on the palm of his hand. And as a small piece of sentiment, he got his other palm tattooed with 110 as an ode to Sen—to carry on his memory. On his biceps were tattooed vipers that leaked down to his elbows.

Next was Ibara: the Thorned Viper. Her number 199 was directly on her right shoulder blade, and she had a tattoo of a snake and thorny wire intertwining around the mark in a circle. She gained the name Thorned Viper for her use of weapons that always had spikes. At some point, she began praying before killing after she learned what religion was.

It was odd to Izuku how strongly she clung to the concept. When he had asked her why once, she simply said it was because it helped her embrace her destined role as executioner in this life. Everyone left it at that since it dealt with killing. Her resolve for being a murderer was so strong it caught Nine's attention.

Himiko became known as the Blood Viper. Less of a codename and more of a general statement due to her craze for blood. She proudly displayed her number 200 on her ankle and tattooed two twin vipers on the back of her legs. Her bloodlust made her unstoppable, and that type of excitement for homicide is exactly what landed her on their unit.

Aoyama was the biggest surprise of the people chosen by Nine. He was given the codename The Sparkling Viper because of his charm and how well he worked with shiny, pristine electronics. He never was much of a fighter on the field but his hacking and tracking skill set was unmatched. It must've been fateful foreshadowing that his number 215 was on his wrist since that was the part of his body he used the most.

Hiryu was an addition everyone expected as if he was a crowned prince in line for a throne. The Obsidian Viper aka 102. He was given the name for his jet black hair and inky eyes. In all their years at the academy, Hiryu was always neck and neck with Tomura for top of the pack. The only thing that differed between him and Tomura was their drive.

Tomura was driven by pleasure from cruelty and approval from Nine.

Hiryu—well.

Hiryu never let anyone know what he was driven by. Hiryu always touched his number 102 on his trigger finger often, staring at it with an unreadable expression.

And then there was Tomura: The Horned Viper aka 117. His code name was given to him directly by Nine for how well he represented the Academy's values. The Horned Viper was one of the most dangerous vipers, so everyone assumed that's why he was given that name. However, Izuku speculated Tomura was given Horned because it was closely related to the imagery of a demon.

Then lastly there was Izuku: The Viridian Viper. A perfect kill streak and unbeatable in sparring matches because of his speed.

The 'untouchable' Viper is what many of his siblings snidely referred to him as. He was untouchable to everyone but Tomura—a deal hashed out with Nine exactly two years ago. While everyone else was tortured in the basement for punishment, Izuku was dragged away by Tomura to their room for some mystery scolding no one else saw.

The favoritism bred tangible resentment because most other vipers assumed Tomura didn't do anything to him.

But the vipers in The Viper Seven knew better.

Everyone who was a part of their unit saw the bruises on Izuku's skin clear as day any time after he messed up on a mission. Himiko and Jin would smile at the pain inflicted. Ibara and Aoyama were indifferent.

Hiryu, however, had his opinions written across his whole face. His mouth would twist like he tasted something sour whenever he spotted the black eyes and busted lips on Izuku.

But Hiryu never said anything and Izuku never made it seem like Tomura's punishments hurt.

It was part of their dynamic to never discuss it.

Izuku was fifteen now, and he had proved his worth to Nine by following Tomura's instructions. In the process he was protected against any possible death sentencing.

Izuku was thankful for this because his emotional defect caused him to have significant issues when he was thirteen. Tomura never told anyone about how rough that year was. Izuku's outbursts, his crying spells, and the countless night terrors were hard to deal with for both of them.

But Tomura reported that Izuku was the perfect Viper until the day he finally was.

Now, Izuku's emotions were as dull as a forgotten blade.

He never tended to them any more. All the feelings of joy, sadness, anger, were long lost memories over the last two years. His highs and lows were locked away in a forgotten part of his mind and he preferred it like that. Izuku's kill streak was as perfect as Tomura's and he obeyed every command Tomura gave him.

He owed Tomura his life because without his brother, he surely would be dead by now.

Tomura was truly his one protector, and his brother made sure to remind him of that daily.

Like now, they were walking back up to their shared suite.

Everyone chosen for The Viper Seven had gotten living quarter upgrades on the highest floor of their skyscraper cluster of a home. A perk and obvious tactic of favoritism on Nine's behalf. He flaunted how lavish he treated their unit to everyone in The Academy to help inspire cruelty for personal gain—and it worked.

From what Izuku heard in the Tokyo underground grapevine, their Academy produced some of the most ruthless assassins.

Their old rooms were forgotten and now they lived in lush suites. Ibara, Jin, Himiko, Aoyama and Hiryu all had nice suites overlooking the twinkling city. Each were one bedroom apartments with living rooms, kitchens and anything they wanted. Ibara got a piano, and Himiko had a special room for her knife collection. Aoyama was given the finest technology in his room, and an office suite where he could work from if he wanted to.

Izuku originally was so excited for this new arrangement. The temptation of privacy and space was sort of appealing. But his half forged dreams were cut down immediately.

Nine informed him that Tomura requested they stay together—and what Tomura wanted would always override anything Izuku desired.

They had one large bedroom, big enough for two queen sized beds. Two bathrooms. One living room and one kitchen. They had a third room specifically for private training sessions, and Tomura was even given his own office room inside the suite to do the special paperwork Nine entrusted him with.

When Izuku asked Tomura why he requested they stay together, the answer was simple: "You're not ready to live on your own yet, you still need me."

Izuku didn't question him. It was probably true.

Which brought them to this moment, in their suite. When the door closed behind them, Izuku could feel the energy shift.

Tomura examined Izuku's gunshot wound with displeasure and clicked his tongue.

"You're unreasonably clumsy," Tomura chastised. With one hand he grabbed Izuku's shoulders gently and with the other he fixed his head of curls. "If Nine heard about this you would be forced to take on an extra month of evasive technique training—do you know how lucky you are to have me?"

Izuku hung his head. "Yes. Thank you for always looking after me."

"How did you let that untrained swine shoot you anyways?"

"He was swinging the gun around in a manner that was unpredictable. I'm sorry."

"Not a valid excuse," Tomura reprimanded coldly. Izuku winced visibly as Tomura took his thumb and dug it into the bullet wound. "Do better next time. Are we understood?"

"Ye-Yes," Izuku stammered as he felt his wound reopen and spill fresh blood. "I understand."

"You understand—what?"

"I understand, Big Brother," Izuku gritted out.

Izuku clenched his fists as numbing pain shot from his shoulder down to his finger tips. Tomura stared at him for a while, searching his face for any hints of agony but Izuku didn't let it slip.

This was a test: how well could he mask pain? Tomura never stopped testing him.

After a minute, Tomura removed his thumb from the wound and Izuku internally shuttered. Tomura's piercing eyes fastened onto him with unreadable emotion. Izuku stared back, mirroring the same blankness until Tomura finally spun on his heel.

"You're dismissed," Tomura muttered. "Go tend to your wound and if this happens again we're going to have one on one bullet dodging training."

Izuku nodded, and left their suite.

ᔓᔓᔓ

After patching himself up, Izuku needed to decompress. Whenever he needed some place to be himself unguarded, he really only had one person to turn to.

Izuku knocked on Hiryu's door.

At first there was no answer, but that's what he expected. He knocked again, and on cue, Hiryu's long grunt echoed on the other side. The door swung open up revealing an exhausted Hiryu with a bandaged bloody nose.

Izuku smiled shyly and held up the bucket in his hands.

"I brought you some ice for your nose, hyung," Izuku switched to Korean naturally with a slightly forced smile.

Unable to resist, Hiryu softly smiled back. He opened the door wide for Izuku to come in and they exchanged silent understanding glances at each others wounds. Izuku shut the door behind him and shuffled inside, stepping over the heap of dirty clothes that was always in the middle of the room.

Izuku offered an empathic smile as he took the towel he brought and carefully loaded it with cold ice.

Hiryu sat on the bed and winced as Izuku iced his wounds for him.

"Thanks," Hiryu muttered in Korean. He closed his eyes, allowing Izuku to take care of him.

Izuku hummed as he applied pressure on the broken nose bridge and inspected it. His eyes flickered across Hiryu's tightly tensed brow.

"You seem more irritable than usual," Izuku pointed out. They switched their conversation to Korean all the way.

"Because I am." Hiryu huffed and took the towel of ice from Izuku. "I'm sick of dealing with Tomura's superiority complex."

"If you just keep your head down, it'll be okay. Tomura is only ever violent with his own team if provoked."

"If provoked?" Hiryu scoffed and rolled his eyes. "That bastard really has you feeding out of his palm nowadays, doesn't he?"

"Tomura only wants what's best for us."

"Tomura wants what's best for Tomura," Hiryu corrected with hate laced in his voice. "You're too blinded by him to even see it. Have you ever wondered why he wants to be the one to punish you solely? Don't you find that odd?"

“I know why my punishments are private,” Izuku defended. “That’s between Tomura and I.”

“Exactly,” Hiryu sneered. “Between you two, which is weird. Look around at this place, Izuku. Nothing in this hell hole doesn’t go through Nine first. Nine knows when everyone fucking breathes, eats and shits yet somehow Tomura weaseled you out of Nine’s viewpoint.”

“Hiryu, you’re talking strange. You might need to lay down from the loss of blood—”

“Tell me: if Tomura told you a command opposite of Nine’s, who would you obey?”

Izuku instantly opened his mouth. He was ready to blurt out the obvious answer but froze.

A vision of Tomura’s threatening glare leaked into his consciousness and Izuku slowly closed his mouth.

“Think about why you hesitated on that answer, Izuku,” Hiryu said, voice heavy with caution. Hiryu was disappointed but not surprised. “I don’t say this to be spiteful, but be careful with Tomura. He’s playing a long game that I only recently think I noticed. Pay attention to the way he gazes at Nine when he thinks no one is watching, it’s frightening. I used to think he looked at Nine with admiration—but it’s really envy.”

Izuku shook his head. “That’s nonsense.”

“I’m not expecting you to believe me right now. Observe him around Nine next time and you’ll see what I mean.”

Izuku kept shaking his head until he rattled those words right out of his ears. Hiryu didn’t like Tomura, he never has and never will. It was an absurd thought that Tomura envied Nine, and besides, what would Tomura even envy Nine for?

Power, a voice deep in the back of Izuku’s mind answered. Control.

Izuku stilled at the taboo thought.

“What’s gotten into you lately?” Izuku muttered. He flopped down next to Hiryu on his bed with a light bounce. “All these hypotheticals you’ve been dwelling on aren’t like you. Usually we talk about ice cream flavors or some type of food you want to try on the next assignment. Let’s go back to talking about ramen.”

“I don’t want to talk about ramen.”

“Then what do you want to talk about that’s not Tomura?”

Hiryu locked eyes with Izuku and shifted on the bed.

“Can I tell you a secret, Izuku?”

“Of course, hyung.”

Hiryu grabbed Izuku’s hand tightly, startling Izuku.

“I mean it,” Hiryu whispered desperately. “I-I want to talk to you as Izuku. Not as The Viridian Viper. Not as Tomura’s Little Brother. Not even as a viper. I want to talk to the Izuku that used to exist two years ago who had a spark of life in his eyes.”

At those words, Izuku’s heart skipped a beat. Hearing himself described in a potential way that was not directly related to him being a Viper or Tomura’s little brother was odd. Just Izuku? Just be Izuku? The emotion of individualism rose inside of him for the first time in a while, sparking a small flicker of luminosity in his usually dead eyes.

“There he is,” Hiryu smiled proudly at the tiny light in Izuku’s eyes. “Some bit of you is alive in there.”

Izuku scrunched his face, utterly confused. “Hiryu, what’s going on with you—”

“—I’m in love with someone from the outside.”

Izuku’s stomach dropped straight to the floor.

“Wh-what?!” Izuku nearly screamed, sitting up on the bed.

“Shh, keep it down!” Hiryu hissed. He clasped a hand over Izuku’s mouth. When Izuku calmed down, Hiryu released him but Izuku was still panicking.

“S-Sorry,” Izuku whispered quietly. “I’m—I’m surprised—how—or who—o-or when?”

“Her name is Kanna,” Hiryu said so hush it was barely audible. “I met her on a solo assignment about a year ago in Tokyo. I had extra time and decided to walk around and found myself talking to her at a zoo. Next thing I know I am volunteering for all the missions here in Tokyo I can get my hands on just to see her. I even spend a lot of my free time after missions out with her on dates.”

Izuku was stunned to near silence. “Hiryu…th-this is dangerous.”

“I know.” Hiryu’s voice wobbled. He clenched his jaw. He laid back on the bed with Izuku and they both stared at each other knowing this was playing with fire. “B-But she’s worth it, Izuku. I’ve never felt anything like this before. I feel…I feel like we’re fated.”

A tiny bit of warmth bled into Izuku’s veins for the first time in two years. Fate wasn’t a word Izuku had heard since the old violinist said it to him. Hearing fate was enough to make Izuku’s emotions slowly thaw back to life.

But he didn’t know which emotion to let take control: the fear, the confusion, or the tiniest bit of joy underneath all the layers.

As he looked into Hiryu’s eyes, full of love, Izuku decided to choose joy.

“Tell me about her then.”

Hiryu talked about Kanna like she was made of fairytales. He spoke about her hair like it was crafted of silver and as if her eyes were gems carved especially made for gazing upon him.

He had never heard Hiryu speak about anyone this way before, and Izuku feared this infatuation would be Hiryu's damnation.

Izuku allowed his mind to wander back to the one person he forbade himself from ever thinking about.

Kacchan.

Izuku's eyes swelled with tears that didn't quite fall as he began imagining the missing boy from his childhood.

There had been times Izuku wished he could remember Kacchan's real name. He tried now, wondering what it really was—but the memory was too far out of reach now like a phantom in the wind. However, Izuku could still hear Kacchan's laugh and see his smile. Izuku could perfectly envision the dust blond hair and shiny red eyes that he was always fixated on.

He wondered what it would be like now, how handsome Kacchan probably was with those features.

As Hiryu talked about love, out of nowhere a floodgate of ignored emotions rocked Izuku. His thoughts on Kacchan came dangerously close to the surface.

Yearning barreled into his chest. Hurt clutched his eyes, and desperation for a soft touch stopped his breathing. Izuku blinked rapidly, and shut down the onset of mixed emotions that took him off guard. He buried it back down, underneath all the parts of him that he had to ignore.

"Izuku?" Hiryu asked wearily when Izuku's hand started to shake lightly. "Are you okay?"

"I-I'm fine," Izuku lied. He clutched his trembling fingers with his other hand and forced them to still. When the shaking subdued, Izuku pinned a forced smile on his lips. "Just happy for you, hyung,"

Izuku willed away the imagery of the missing blond boy and was relieved to feel his emotions finally subdue.

He made a mental note to be careful thinking about Kacchan, and he was unsure what exactly those emotions were.

Hiryu blinked rapidly, but was happily relieved to see Izuku emote in front of him for the first time in two years.

"Please, tell me more," Izuku said quickly. He needed to get his mind off the concept of Kacchan. "I want to hear everything you like about her."

The smile Hiryu gave was so bright.

Over the next several weeks, Hiryu and Izuku grew closer. A tiny, invisible barrier had been lifted between them as they bonded over their mutual, forbidden belief in romance.

The whole fiasco left Izuku internally quaking. It was as if he was reaching into a taboo cookie jar that poisoned him once before. He knew he shouldn't, but he was so tempted to give into his fascination about love and people on the outside now that Hiryu showed him that it was possible.

One night, Izuku felt brave enough to tell Hiryu about Kacchan in detail.

Hiryu was nearly speechless but thankful Izuku confided in him. For the first time in two years, Izuku experienced a hug, but this one was different from the one Tomura had given him when he was thirteen. Hiryu hugged him like he wanted to, Tomura had done it like he had to. This hug was warm, and protective. Tomura's was cold and possessive.

Izuku was stunned at the softness. His body was confused mostly. He had become so accustom to only being touched violently that he had forgotten what it was like to be held tenderly. He shakily wrapped his arms around Hiryu, treasuring the warmth as Hiryu stroked his hair.

"I'm so sorry, Izuku," Hiryu murmured.

Izuku didn't reply, just clung to his older brother harder.

After that night, Hiryu started to take pity on him. There was a dejected look in Hiryu's eye whenever he stared down at Izuku's tattoo on his collar bone. Izuku then noted this was the same stare Hiryu would always gaze at his own '102' tattoo with.

Hiryu began to offer Izuku to come with him on duo missions in Tokyo so he could help cover for him on dates.

Izuku nodded eagerly, and he cherished every moment.

When they would finish an assignment, Hiryu would quickly change into citizen clothing. Izuku would text Tomura saying that he and Hiryu were out late, grabbing food or watching a movie.

Tomura believed him, there was no reason not to.

Hiryu would then run off with his girlfriend and Izuku would watch over the date from the viewpoint of the closet rooftop with his binoculars.

During these starless nights, Izuku saw the unbelievable with his own two eyes: someone like him being loved and in love. It was like a bizarre daydream, seeing his lethal sibling walking hand in hand with a normal woman who blushed simply by looking at Hiryu.

But he questioned if it was truly real love often.

Tomura always painfully pointed out that if normal outsiders ever found out they were trained killers from birth, there would be witch hunts. The average person would cower away from them, and back away with fear in their eyes. The police will be signaled, chaos will ensue, and the Governor would leave them high and dry to cover the fact their program was funded by tax dollars. It was the whole reason fornication outside of their approved circles was banned.

But Izuku still wondered if Kanna would love Hiryu the same if she knew that he was a trained killer.

The realistic part of him was extremely doubtful.

The hopeless romantic side of him liked to think love would conquer all.

While observing Hiryu and his girlfriend one day in the park, Izuku's mind unwillingly wandered back to Kacchan. His heart twisted with the same, volatile mixed emotions.

A bubble of bitterness surfaced to tell him he was abandoned by Kacchan. But then a gust of hope told him Kacchan would come back for him. Even if he couldn't go with Kacchan—at least he would have the comfort that his childhood play-husband came back for him.

However, Izuku buried both of those thoughts for his own sanity.

Izuku forcefully concluded that his childhood friend was dead.

Even if Kacchan wasn't—the other boy was a past chapter in Izuku's life. To avoid his feelings consuming him, Izuku funneled all his broken dreams into Hiryu in the hopes they would come out whole on the other side.

Every night after assignment debriefs, Izuku and Hiryu snuck away to a private rooftop and talked about potential romantic things Hiryu could do with his girlfriend.

"Have you ever bought her flowers?" Izuku asked in Korean with a large grin. He leaned back on the concrete roof with his elbows and stared up at the cloudy sky above Tokyo.

"She's allergic," Hiryu answered with a laugh. He lit his cigarette with grace and Izuku welcomed the slight scent of nicotine that wafted into his nose. "I would feel like an asshole getting something that would just make her sneeze all day."

"What about a potted plant then? That would be a thoughtful gesture."

Hiryu snapped his fingers with a lopsided grin at Izuku. "Ah, that's a great idea! But what type of plant? I don't know much about what kind of houseplants are good gifts."

Izuku hummed and tilted his head. "I can help you pick out one when we get the chance!"

"Perfect. Thanks, Izuku." Hiryu softly smiled at Izuku before saying, "maybe one day I can introduce you to her. Y'know, have her meet my family. It would mean a lot."

A hopeful pang echoed in Izuku's chest, but soon the clutches of dread overshadowed it.

He could perfectly envision Tomura's angry, disapproving stare and hear his voice in his ears: "would you really throw away everything I've done to keep you alive? Is that how you would repay me?"

Izuku averted his eyes from Hiryu and hesitantly opened his mouth.

"I-I don't know about that Hiryu—"

Izuku's answer was cut off by the sound of their twin digital watches beeping. In sync, both Izuku and Hiryu read the message that flashed across their tiny digital screens. It was a notification from Tomura that The Viper Seven had a full week assignment starting tomorrow night.

The lightheartedness of the moment escaped and Izuku eyed Hiryu.

Hiryu took a long drag from his cigarette. He studied the number '102' on his trigger finger then side eye'd Izuku's '217'.

Izuku watched as the gray smoke floated upwards and blended with the night sky.

"What are you going to do in the long run, hyung?" Izuku whispered. "Have you even told Kanna what you are or what you do?"

"…No." Hiryu admitted. Pain danced across his face. "She thinks I work crazy hours in pharmaceuticals and I don't plan on telling her the truth about what we are."

Izuku pursed his lips. He felt like he knew that answer but pressed on. "Why not tell her?"

"Because I don't want her to look at me like I'm a monster," Hiryu grumbled under his breath. He took another long drag of his cigarette. "I don't think my heart could take it. She's too much of a humanitarian to ever understand what we've been through and telling her would only put her in danger."

"But if she loves you, she'll accept you for who you are. Right?"

"All love has limitations," Hiryu said sadly. "Besides, my biggest worry is The Academy finding out I'm this deeply defective. They would have my goddamn head if they found out I was in this deep with an outsider."

"They would," Izuku muttered. He took a moment to think about their home and their twisted family. "Have you noticed that there's been a halt in kids coming in?"

"Everyone has noticed." Hiryu shrugged. "There hasn't been a new class in years."

It was an unspoken elephant in their lives.

The rooms for the younger kids were barren like a desert these days. There was always an edge in Ms. Nagant's voice whenever she was asked about this. Izuku's class was the last one, and everyone was anticipating getting a Little soon—yet they never came.

“I’ve been eavesdropping on Ms. Nagant when she thinks everyone is gone,” Izuku admitted. “The supplier, Peter Moore, and The Academy are having some internal friction on the grounds of wastefulness…I don’t think there’s going to be a next cohort.”

Hiryu remained silent as he thumbed his tattoo of 102 thoughtfully.

“Good.”

The next day, they departed for their week-long mission, and in a short summary: it was a shit show.

There had been a tangible shift in both Hiryu and Tomura over the last several weeks. Tomura was growing more cold, and far less lenient on mistakes. In contrast, Hiryu was becoming compassionate and clearly pulling his punches. Kanna was melting his heart and replacing all the viciousness Hiryu had been trained for with kindness.

But unlike Izuku, Hiryu didn’t have any training on how to mask his defect.

The two leads of The Viper Seven clashed like titans together during this particular assignment. By day seven, they came to fist to fist blows over a small mistake Izuku had made. Izuku had accidentally been seen by an unmarked target that was hiding in the shadows. Izuku quickly neutralized the threat before any alarms were sounded.

But this wasn’t good enough for Tomura.

Tomura needed perfection.

By the end of the mission, it came as no surprise to Izuku that Tomura back handed him hard enough for Izuku to go flying to the ground. Izuku took the hit in stride and kept his eyes down on the ground where they belonged and apologized to Tomura like he should.

But then Hiryu returned a punch on Izuku’s behalf.

This punch set off a fuse in Tomura like he was made of dynamite.

Izuku had never seen such fury twist inside of Tomura’s eyes so fast. It was like Hiryu had unleashed a new unfound trigger inside of Tomura, and because of this Hiryu didn’t stand a chance. Hiryu was beaten to a bloodied pulp on the stone ground within a matter of minutes.

Punch after punch rained down on Hiryu until he was barely conscious.

The other four members of their team had turned away from the bloody scene, but Izuku could only take so much.

The hair on his skin rose tall in fear because this time was different. It wasn’t a quick slap or punch to show dominance—Tomura was going too far and only gaining speed. The sickening sound of bone crunching to tiny bits made Izuku nearly hurl.

Before Izuku could stop himself, he flung his small body between them, using himself as a shield.

Izuku had braced himself to take the next bloodied punch—but it never came.

He peered over his shoulder and five sets of eyes were staring wide at him. Four were staring in disbelief and one in pure, cold rage.

Tomura lowered his fist and gritted his teeth. “Izuku. Move.”

Hiryu groaned, coughing up blood.

“It’s my fault,” Izuku said sternly, not daring to look directly into Tomura’s eyes. “I was the one who was seen. I will take the punishment.”

“I was going to punish you anyways.” Tomura’s mouth pulled into a frown. “Hiryu needs to learn his place once and for all. I’m sick of his shit. Word is starting to get around that Hiryu refuses to follow my command and now Nine is questioning my leadership abilities.”

“Then let me take Hiryu’s punishment too.”

Aoyama gawked at him like he had grown a third eye, and Himiko slyly smirked at the thought of Izuku taking an extra beating. Jin sighed softly in sync with Ibara who shook her head at him. Hiryu weakly lifted himself off the ground. His face was swollen and his lip was split in several places.

Tomura eyed Hiryu like he was dirt and turned his deadly gaze back onto Izuku.

“If that’s what you want then fine,” Tomura agreed icily. “The moment we get back, be ready.”

Tomura walked away, signaling for the others to follow him and Izuku was left alone to gather Hiryu.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Tomura made good on his promise the second they were alone in their suite.

Izuku was so severely beaten he could barely breathe by the end. This punishment was harsher than usual and Izuku almost cried but he knew he couldn’t. Each hit with the sharp side of Tomura’s belt held so much force that Izuku couldn’t stop the small yelps that escaped from between his gritted teeth.

Tomura was getting stronger and he knew how to harness his new found power ruthlessly.

“You care too much about Hiryu,” Tomura spat distastefully at the end. “The only person you should care that much for is me, especially after all I’ve done for you. See what he made me do to you?”

Izuku nodded weakly.

“Do you really think Hiryu cares for you as much as me, Izuku?” Tomura asked.

Izuku shook his head. “No, I don’t think he cares for me as much as you.”

“Then show it.”

Tomura threw the bloodied belt down the laundry shoot and squatted to Izuku’s kneeled position on the ground. Izuku kept his eyes trained on the floor until Tomura’s fingers caught his chin and raised his head. Their eyes met and Izuku could feel the control radiating from his brother’s blood colored eyes.

“Listen to me carefully,” Tomura commanded strongly. “Hiryu is selfish. He jeopardizes this team. He jeopardizes you. He would abandon you in an instant if ever given the chance. I would never do that to you. From now on, you don’t need to take his punishments for him because he would never take them for you. Do you understand?”

Izuku didn’t think that was true, but he nodded to appease Tomura. Hiryu would never abandon him, they were family—he said so himself.

“Go sleep in Hiryu’s suite tonight,” Tomura instructed. “I want him to look at how badly he got you beat when it could have been a simple slap. Make sure to show him each and every single mark. I want him to know just how much it hurts.”

Izuku stumbled upright and his vision crossed.

The marks on his skin felt like a thousand burning fingernails clawing into him. Izuku used all his mental willpower to not faint from pain. Tediously, Izuku gathered a select few of his belongings and walked out of their room with his head down. The door shut loudly behind him with a bang and Izuku had to stand there in the hallways for a moment to catch his breath.

When he finally lifted his gaze, ice ran down his spine.

Himiko was leaning on the opposite side of the hall with a sick, twisted smirk.

“I think that’s the best beating I’ve heard you get,” Himiko hummed delightfully. “You were so close to crying like you used to. It makes me wonder what will actually get you crying again. Y’know I miss that sound so much.”

Her razor sharp grin made Izuku’s stomach turn. However, he knew she was the one person he could never show an inkling of weakness with.

He stared her deep in the eyes and bowed without breaking eye contact.

“Goodnight, Himiko.”

He walked away with his head high, forcing himself not to limp.

Izuku barreled into Hiryu's suite, furious. He didn't bother to knock and Hiryu glared at him out of the corner of his eye when Izuku threw down his bag next to the heap of dirty laundry.

"What is wrong with you?!" Izuku chastised in Korean.

Hiryu rolled his eyes. "You didn't need to take a beating for me—"

"And you didn't need to punch him for me!" Izuku harshly whispered. "I told you to keep your head down and go along with what he does! Do you want to die?!"

"I'm sorry we were not all trained to be Tomura's lap dog, Izuku," Hiryu jabbed sarcastically. "You may be alright with him treating you like property but I'm not."

"We are property." Izuku's nostrils flared. Izuku's hand shot out and grabbed Hiryu's trigger finger. He forced Hiryu to stare at the black ink that was permanently imprinted on his skin. "Look at it! This is our life and we can't change it! Property is what we are Hiryu and the sooner you accept that the better."

Hiryu stepped back as if the words burned.

"If you believe that then you're not who I thought you were." Hiryu brought his voice to a challenging low. "What about all the thoughts you have about love, Izuku? Hah? What about your Kacchan—"

"—He's dead, Hiryu!" Izuku's shot back. "But you're here and I can't lose you too to doing stupid antics like provoking Tomura. He will kill you—and so will Nine if he ever finds out about Kanna." Izuku's breath hitched as Hiryu's and Kacchan's faces blended in his mind. "I can't lose you too, hyung. Please."

Hiryu's eyes melted from disappointment to blankness.

"Please…Hiryu," Izuku begged. "Don't get yourself killed."

"…Fine," Hiryu muttered. "I'll try not to."

Izuku could tell it was a simple topic switch. This wasn't over, but the conversation was.

They settled down to sleep in silence, no more words exchanged. Izuku patched his own wounds and Hiryu carefully studied him the whole time. Pain twitched on Hiryu's brow as he looked at the layered bruises on Izuku's skin. Old ones were decorated with fresh new ones and on top of all of it were gashes from the belt Tomura used on Izuku's bare skin.

Hiryu laid down in his bed and Izuku took the floor with a spare pillow and blanket. He shuffled the tiny hill of dirty laundry out of his way and sighed. Hiryu was so messy in more than one way.

"Do you hate Tomura even a little for what he does to you?" Hiryu asked in the middle of the night.

It was the first time Hiryu verbally acknowledged Izuku's beatings.

“No,” Izuku answered honestly. “Tomura always has my best interest in mind, despite what you think. Tomura cares about me like you do. You two just show it differently.”

Hiryu grew silent once more.

He shifted in his bed and then he spoke again. “Izuku, can you do me a favor tomorrow after your solo assignment?”

“Of course,” Izuku agreed tiredly. “What is it?”

“Can you buy that potted plant for me? I want to give it to Kanna tomorrow.”

Izuku didn’t think twice about Hiryu’s request. It was a bit out of nowhere, but maybe it was Hiryu’s way of easing them back into an inkling of normalcy.

Izuku took his time after work picking out a nice plant. He chose a tiny green one with white rimmed leaves. The store owner told him it required a lot of care, and to be mindful to not place it directly in the sun. Izuku nodded, and thought it represented Kanna and Hiryu’s love for each other.

Pretty, but fragile.

He walked home in the busy streets of Tokyo with a red scarf wrapped around his neck. He shivered slightly and zipped up his yellow fleece. The winter winds had blown harshly this evening, bringing with them the change of the seasons. Izuku tried his best to protect the flimsy plant in his arms from being mangled too much as he traveled through the thick crowds.

When Izuku made it home that evening, he went straight for Hiryu’s suite.

He knocked once, knowing it would be ignored. Then he knocked again knowing Hiryu would finally get up with a swing of his legs and come to greet him.

However, nothing occurred.

Izuku furrowed his brow and knocked again. He was met with silence once more.

Izuku opened the door to reveal a dark suite.

“Hiryu?” Izuku called softly.

Silence.

He glanced over at the golden clock mounted on Hiryu’s living room wall. It was nearly 21:00.

Hiryu would have told him if he was going somewhere. And Hiryu would have definitely told him if he was potentially going to be out late with Kanna so Izuku could lie and say they were together.

Izuku checked his digital watch for any missed notifications about assignments. Dread sank to the bottom of his stomach like heavy lead as he scrolled and scrolled. He double clicked emails and texts to find nothing new.

Hiryu was assigned nothing for the day. It was his rest day.

Izuku walked into Hiryu's bedroom and put the tiny plant on the sleek black desk. He stared around at the space and recognized it was clean in an oddly empty way. Items on the dresser were missing and the king sized bed was made stiffly. The usual messiness was absent.

At the exact moment the wind rattled the windows, Izuku noticed the usual heap of dirty clothes in the middle of the floor wasn't there.

Izuku wearily glanced at Hiryu's closet and he opened it.

It was empty.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The night of Hiryu's disappearance Izuku didn't speak a word.

Izuku struggled to wrap his mind around the concept, yet it was true. Hiryu waltzed out of the academy without so much as a goodbye. Hell, he even sent Izuku on a fool's errand just so he wasn't there to stop him when he did.

Izuku's heart twisted. This stung him right in his open wound of abandonment.

Somehow, yet again, Tomura had been right.

Izuku didn't sleep an ounce. By the next morning, he had felt all the warmth leave his body once more and nothingness coursed through his veins like he was just a shell of a human. The sunrise that morning felt hallow. Such beautiful colors spilling into the room for a soon to be bleak day.

It didn't take too long for others to notice the emptied out room. When Hiryu failed to report to the debrief for their next assignment that morning, it took all but two minutes for Tomura to march straight into Hiryu's room only to find all his clothes gone.

Tomura immediately went to Nine.

ᔓᔓᔓ

That afternoon, the whispers between The Viper Seven were strong. They sat in a private debriefing room all around an oval table.

Nine had made it clear not to let Hiryu's disappearance be known to anyone else. It would show a weak spot in their institution and give an illusion of choice.

“When they find him they’re going to kill him.” Jin snickered quietly. “No one simply leaves. How absurd is that?”

“I think they’ll torture him first before they kill him,” Himiko mused. She lazily spun a knife in her hand. “I hope they take volunteers. I always wanted to try my hand at torturing one of our own.”

She shot Izuku a blood thirsty gaze and Izuku ignored her.

“I hope they let him repent,” Ibara said sadly for Hiryu. “He’s a good asset with a perfect kill streak. It would be such a waste to let so many years of money and training go down the drain for a little bit of defect. Maybe he was fussy about not being chosen as the leader of the unit.”

“I agree with Ibara,” Aoyama said. His head was in his hands, stressed. “Hiryu has been top of his class for so long I doubt they will kill him. If anything, they might re-train him to be the leader of another squad since this one isn’t working for him. Then maybe execute him if that doesn’t work out as well because it would show his defect goes deeper than we thought.”

Izuku and Tomura both stayed silent. The casual debate about Hiryu’s life was unsettling to Izuku. However, Tomura was calm like he knew a secret.

Izuku cut his eyes to his Big Brother.

Tomura cut his eye back at him in a split second.

Izuku could see sadistic glee brewing at the bottom of that frigid stare.

ᔓᔓᔓ

That night at exactly 00:07, Izuku was abruptly woken up by Ibara, Jin, Himiko and Aoyama. They had barged into his suite and shook him awake so harshly Izuku briefly mistook it for an earthquake in his half sleep daze.

“Izuku!” Aoyama harshly whispered. “Get up! Tomura found Hiryu!”

Izuku was wide awake in a second.

He rushed downstairs with his squad with Ibara leading the way. Izuku’s heart was beating faster than it ever had before. He was scared if they would be met with a warm body or a cold corpse.

Ibara turned to a small door that only a select few had access to. She held up her watch to the scanner and an approving chime echoed out. Izuku looked behind him to make sure no one else saw them because this back way was a secret. It was only for The Viper Seven, Nine and Ms. Nagant.

They descended down a long staircase until they reached an elevator that took them even deeper inside the belly of their compound. When the elevator doors slid open, Nine and Ms.

Nagant were already there waiting in front of a freshly painted black, metal door.

The door scraped open and in walked Tomura from the outside world.

He was dressed in all black with stealth gear, and his hair was loosely fallen from its bun. His scar looked extra agitated, and his eyes seemed satiated like a beast that had finally been fed. Blood was splattered across his face and clothes while being caked into his brass knuckles.

He looks like hell, Izuku thought surprised.

There were clearly gashes on the patches of skin that showed on Tomura's shins and his breathing was careful as if he had a bruised lung.

But in his triumphant right hand was a fist full of ink black hair—Hiryu.

Hiryu was half conscious, both eyes black and bruised. The rest of his body was limp as Tomura dragged him in by his hair. If Tomura looked badly beaten, Hiryu looked close to death. It was clear Hiryu fought tooth and nail not to come back, but Tomura was a demon that was unmatched in blood lust.

Izuku wondered if there was anyone else alive who could rival just how vicious Tomura was.

Tomura unceremoniously threw Hiryu into the middle of the circle of vipers.

Nine walked forward and stepped directly on Hiryu's face with his shiny, perfect leather shoe. Hiryu sobbed and tried to turn away but was pinned down forcefully by the full weight of Nine's body. The purple in Nine's eyes felt like it became more vibrant with hate as he spoke his next words.

"Basement," Nine spat. "Solitary confinement for one month with full punishment for ten hours a day."

Himiko flinched at that.

Jin helped Ibara gather a weeping Hiryu who weakly struggled against them. He screamed each second as he was forcefully dragged to the elevator that no doubt led to the depths of hell. Izuku kept his emotionless mask tight as he watched them enter through the steel doors.

When the doors shut, it felt like Hiryu was being transported to the deepest circle of hell.

How did they find him so fast? Izuku wondered.

It hadn't even been a full twenty four hours between now and when everyone else found out Hiryu was missing. Izuku carefully studied Nine then directed his gaze to Tomura who was already boring his eyes into Izuku's skull.

Ominousness foreboding slipped down Izuku's nerves as they held eye contact.

He understood then that they could never leave.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Hiryu was kept in the basement for two months, not one.

The word from Himiko was that they were torturing him beyond normal regulations. They were picking him a part trying to find out what triggered him to run away after he had been the perfect killing weapon.

But they were unable to.

Izuku knew not even six months of torture would cause Hiryu to give up Kanna's name and admit he had crossed their one, deeply forbidden rule. Hiryu loved Kanna too much, and because of that Hiryu would condemn himself to a lifetime of pain.

Eventually Nine concluded that Hiryu's running away was a momentary state of psychosis.

On the last day of punishment, Hiryu seemed like nothing more than a broken doll.

The two months in the basement were a sure, but slow descent into insanity. Hiryu's once sleek, perfect hair had lost its shine and filled with built up dandruff. The bags under his eyes were red with lack of sleep and his nose had been broken so much it took an entirely different shape. This wasn't the same Hiryu.

Hiryu didn't meet anyone's eyes or speak once he was returned.

Izuku was unsure of what to say or do.

But at the end of the day, Izuku was thankful Hiryu was alive.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later that night, Izuku snuck away from Tomura to go visit Hiryu in his suite. He walked down the empty halls in the dead of night and knocked quietly.

"Hiryu?" Izuku whispered.

He pushed open the door with care.

His eyes strained looking into the blackness of Hiryu's room.

Scratch. Scratch.

A string of sobs breached Izuku's ears as he crept forward into the darkness. Eeriness swallowed him whole as he walked in further, surprised by the crunch of glass underneath his shoes.

Izuku halted when he found a figure hunched over in the corner of the living room. It was Hiryu, with his back facing him in the darkest corner of the room. Hiryu's hair was wild and messy, spilling down his back—and Izuku audibly gasped when he saw what the flesh on Hiryu's spine looked like.

The marks on Hiryu's skin were so deep they could be mistaken for knife gashes. At first Izuku thought they were, but the closer he grew he could see they were self-inflicted fingernail marks. Hiryu had dug so deep into his skin he had drawn inordinate amounts of blood. Hiryu's body was convulsing as he kept scratching and scratching as if searching for something.

"Hyung—" Izuku changed over to their shared language. He reached a hand out. "Stop, you're hurting yourself—"

"Get out," Hiryu harshly snapped back in Japanese. He rejected the language switch and it stung like a slap.

Hiryu's bloodshot eyes glared from over his shoulder like a wounded creature.

Izuku's feet didn't move. His eyes remained locked on the crimson blood oozing down Hiryu's back and onto the carpet. The beige surface material around Hiryu had soaked up large amounts of blood and the crimson color was spreading fast like a deadly infection.

Izuku's heart clenched with the need to help.

"I said leave!" Hiryu nearly screamed.

Hiryu's broken voice boomed so loud it startled Izuku. It was similar to rolling thunder that was crackling over and over like the gods above were weeping. It was painfully broken, and splintered at all ends of his words. It was heartbreak.

Izuku began to walk away when he knew he was no longer welcomed. Hiryu sobbed so violently as if he had lost something vital. All Izuku wanted to do was hug him—but he knew he couldn't. His back hit the door and he lowered his head.

He'd talk to Hiryu another time when this all blew over.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku woke the next morning to an empty suite. Tomura was up and gone like usual if they didn't have shared scheduled agendas. Izuku himself didn't have any assignments today, and originally planned on spending the day shopping at the mall with Ibara later in the afternoon.

However, the first thing on his mind was Hiryu. Izuku couldn't shake that last, bloodshot gaze they shared. It was haunting him like nails on a chalkboard and he needed to remedy their relationship somehow.

Eventually Izuku wandered to Hiryu's hallway once he showered and dressed. As he walked around the corner, he anticipated Hiryu to still be moody and silent.

He began to brainstorm things that would help Hiryu cheer up. Like maybe reminding him of how good they had it.

To Izuku, life at The Academy wasn't that bad.

They were protected from the cruelties of the outside world in exchange for exterminating a couple of pests.

They had extravagant dinners every night. Expensive suites, porcelain tubs, and were paid commission for every assignment to blow on whatever they liked. Jin had an extensive collection of motorcycles. Tomura tattooed his skin with thousands of dollars worth of ink. Even Aoyama had the most up to date technology that made him foam at the mouth.

They could see movies, drive cars and wander Tokyo now that they were the top vipers. They took trips on their off weeks to places like Paris or sometimes just stayed at home in the middle of the most expensive neighborhood in Tokyo.

Nine doted on their every whim now that they were The Viper Seven.

Izuku began daydreaming about how this whole incident would be like a bad toothache from the past. Soon he and Hiryu would resume their usual rooftop hangouts and everything would be as it was.

Then that daydream was snapped in two when Izuku arrived at Hiryu's room.

Everything was in chaos.

Hoards of his viper siblings were gathered around, whispering and staring. Dozens of fingers were pointed at the puddle of blood that was seeping out from the mouth of the door. Adrenaline caused Izuku to see double at the sight of bright red. Bright red was never good. Izuku staggered forward, pushing through all the warm bodies huddled together.

Frantically, Izuku's eyes darted all around until he broke free to stand in the front of the crowd.

He came to a halt in front of Hiryu's wide open suite.

Every item in the suite he could see was demolished. The golden clock was shattered. The kitchen chairs were broken into bits and sheets from the bed were torn off and ripped to frayed fragments.

Standing in the wake of the aftermath was Tomura. He was off to the side, leaning on the wall next to the open window. His brows were pinched together and his arms were crossed.

For the first time in Izuku's life his big brother seemed defeated.

Next to Tomura was Ms. Nagant. Her face was distorted as if she swallowed a swarm of bees.

And finally, Nine was standing in the middle of the living room. He juxtaposed the brokenness of the scene with his put together outfit. His black dress shoes stood on top of bloodied shards of glass and one of his hands was tucked into his black slacks.

His gaze was locked on his other hand.

Izuku followed his stare to see what he was holding. Inside of Nine's gloved hand was a tiny scrap that Izuku couldn't make out. He squinted his eyes to see it was small, in the shape of a square and covered in a thin layer of blood.

Nine's face melted into fury and he crushed the object in his fist.

3 years before The Incident

Two years without Hiryu was two years Izuku bitterly hoped he was safe and happy.

He had seen this before in the romance book he used to read when he was younger: the one who got away. That's exactly what Hiryu was to Izuku, and the impact his missing brother had was irreversible.

Without Hiryu, Izuku smiled less and laughed sparsely. In Hiryu's wake were only residual traces of emptiness.

Once again, Izuku had been left behind by someone he trusted. He knew he and Hiryu never talked about running away together like him and Kacchan had, but his brain still felt slighted all the same. Only this time, he didn't cry.

Izuku however had a secret notion brewing in him that was stirred to life in Hiryu's absence: the desire to be far away from here. Izuku had locked away all feelings of romance, love, and yearning for a normal life. He buried those concepts because he was convinced that was unachievable for someone like him.

But Hiryu was tangible proof that notion was wrong.

Hiryu risked everything to be with the person he loved, and he had successfully gotten out.

Izuku never said it out loud, but in the back of his mind his old self was resurfacing. His hands itched for the hidden romance novel and the old violin. He ached to indulge himself in the ideas of love and romance.

Hiryu was so lucky.

Izuku was seventeen now, and he was securely tucked underneath Tomura's wing. Without Hiryu working as a counter force against Tomura, Tomura bloomed like poison in the veins.

The ice in Tomura's heart consumed him entirely and now there was no one to question his methods. The Viper Seven's name never changed to The Viper Six because no one besides their squad, Nine, and Ms. Nagant knew that Hiryu had escaped for good.

As far as others knew, Hiryu was on a long term mission embedded in another country as a permanent spy for Tokyo's Governor. But in private, they all knew what really happened and no one dared to mention Hiryu for two years.

That was, until now.

They were all currently sitting around at a private dinner with Nine. Nine was placed at the head of the white marble table, eating a large steak off a gold plate with golden cutlery. On his right hand side was Tomura, possessing silver plates and cutlery. Then to Tomura's right was Izuku.

Everyone else had regular, unimportant metal utensils. Izuku never paid it any mind, but after heeding what Hiryu said, Izuku could see Tomura secretly glance at Nine's golden plate with envy every time they had dinner.

Everyone ate expensive steaks with casual conversation floating around the table. The pitter patter of rain against the giant window beside them provided ambiance.

Then Nine spoke up.

"We found 102."

Everyone stopped eating.

Izuku's eyes widened and his stomach flipped. He glanced around and noticed everyone was surprised except Aoyama.

"Where?" Jin asked eagerly.

Nine looked at Aoyama as he continued to eat his rare steak.

"He slipped up," Aoyama answered for Nine. "During a mission, one of the lower ranked Vipers saw him down south. He got a nose job and plastic surgery work to change his features, but he took his glove off to type a text and his tattoo on his mark was revealed. That Viper, who didn't know Hiryu was missing, walked straight up to him and asked him how his spy mission had been going. Hiryu got spooked and ran away."

Izuku closed his eyes and lowered his head in dread.

Oh, Hiryu.

"This situation needs to be handled immediately and quietly," Nine said. He wiped the corners of his mouth with the expensive napkin and then clasped his hands calmly. "I did my research and confirmed he's been working with an agency that also deals with assassinations, using a fake surname."

Izuku's heart twisted as his stomach grew more and more nauseated.

"Luckily for us, 215 hacked 102's current agency's system without being detected once I gave him the information I found," Nine praised slightly. "102 is going across seas tomorrow on a lowly bodyguard assignment."

Ibara tilted her head. "What an odd choice to do after leaving us."

"Agreed," Nine said. His calculating eyes then scanned the table. "Now, who wants to be the one to kill 102?"

Izuku's head whipped up.

Kill? They weren't even going to bring him in?

As Izuku had that split second thought, he was the only one not to raise his hand immediately.

Nine's eyes cut to Izuku, as everyone else started begging for the chance.

Izuku's skin swarmed with heat.

He slowly raised his hand as if he had just heard what was said. It felt so goddamn wrong but Izuku kept his hand raised. He prayed with every fiber that Nine picked any of the other five maniacs at this table to do this deed.

"Oh! Oh! Choose me!" Himiko pleaded. She grinned with all her teeth and waved her hand a bit. "I would love the chance to gut him. I've been perfecting new torture techniques and I would make sure he felt every ounce of pain."

"Or send me," Jin cut in. "I would be delighted to end his life for you. He's disrespected the viper name far too many times."

"I have the same sentiment as Jin," Ibara added.

Izuku stayed silent, absolutely horrified by all his siblings for the first time in a while. How could they all be so nonchalant about killing one of their own? They grew up with Hiryu.

Nine strummed his fingers on the marble surface without uttering a word.

"Interesting," Nine said. It didn't sound good. "Everyone but 217 leave."

Everyone deflated a bit, sad not to be chosen. Himiko shot him a glare, and Jin groaned out loud. The colorful bunch of killers walked out the room—well. All but one.

Everyone left except Tomura.

Izuku was surprised that Tomura didn't immediately jump at Nine's command. When Izuku turned his head to his brother beside him, Tomura was actually regarding him with a level of pity.

"117, I asked that you leave 217 and I alone for a while," Nine repeated himself. "Did you not hear me?" A small crease in his eyebrow appeared from agitation.

“I did,” Tomura said calmly. He clasped his hands on the table as if he owned it. “I would like to request to be present for this conversation.”

“Why?” Nine questioned unkindly. The crease in his brow grew bigger.

“Because 217 is…” Tomura stole a quick glance to Izuku then cleared his throat. “Because I would like to be the one to execute 102, sir. It would bring me great joy considering all the trouble he’s given me in the past.”

“117—leave.”

“But sir—”

“I said leave.” Nine finally snapped. His mouth finally pulled into a frown.

Tomura had pushed Nine’s boundaries and tested a line of authority no one else had dared to before.

Izuku held his breath while Tomura became withdrawn. Nine huffed slightly and brushed his hair out of his face. When Nine turned his attention on Izuku, he missed the deep, envy filled glare Tomura gave the backside of his head.

But Izuku saw it and it sent a new type of chill down his spine.

Tomura then cut his eyes to Izuku as if he wanted Izuku to see the glare he gave Nine. Then Tomura exited the lavish dining hall, closing the door softly.

Nine reached below his seat to his briefcase, pulled out a shiny red folder that held an emblem of their twin snakes. He stood up from his chair, red folder in hand, and walked towards the large window in the room that overlooked the city of Tokyo. He motioned fluidly with his hand for Izuku to follow.

Izuku proceeded with caution and stood side by side with Nine.

They gazed down at the neon city lights and the rain that was sprinkling down on their hometown. Some lights flickered, others flashed brightly. The city limits stretched beyond the horizon like an endless sea.

“217. Do you know how animals are domesticated?” Nine asked without looking at him.

“A bit,” Izuku answered. He kept his eyes trained on the pouring rain.

“It’s quite fascinating honestly.” Nine spoke casually and took a posture as if they were friends. “Handlers breed for kindness towards humans and cull the ones that are vicious. They pluck and pluck, breeding the weak, sappy animals over and over until it gives them the personality they want: a dumb, kind animal that dotes on their every whim.”

Nine laid a heavy hand on Izuku’s shoulder.

Izuku turned his head to look at Nine and wanted to flinch.

Nine's lavender eyes were burning right into his.

"Want to know why that's fascinating?" Nine asked.

Izuku nodded as if he had a choice.

"Because it shows that kindness is genetic as is viciousness in animals, and aren't we all animals? Walking, talking, breathing filthy animals. If it's possible to weed out and breed for kindness, then the reverse can be true, can it not?"

"Yes, sir," Izuku whispered.

Nine's hand on his shoulder gripped him painfully. Quickly, Izuku wanted Tomura to be here —Nine would never touch him in front of Tomura Izuku noted now.

"As you can see I am in the business of killing off the weak, kind ones. I only want the vicious ones—so. Tell me, Izuku: are you vicious or are you weak?"

Nine held out the folder for him to take.

Izuku could feel the heavy weight of it before he touched it. He didn't want this, every nerve in his body was on fire, rejecting the concept of what he had just been chosen to carry out. But Izuku knew that Nine was threatening him, not lecturing him.

Izuku had two paths laid plainly in front of him: kill or be killed. And unfortunately, he was only alive to survive.

Defeat settled into Izuku's core as he took the folder and the paper scorched his fingertips.

Nine approvingly nodded at him with a smile as fake and shiny as plastic.

"Glad to see you're smart. You leave for Vienna in an hour."

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku was shipped in a tiny, private plane to Vienna, Austria.

The flight was a full fourteen hours long and it gave him time to prep how he would execute this assignment.

This situation was Izuku's greatest fear and exactly what Tomura had been warning him about for years. Hiryu had tested their rules in the name of love and now love was going to be the reason Hiryu's body would become food for worms in the cold ground.

Half way through the plane ride, Izuku tossed and turned in the uncomfortable cabin bed.

The suffocating dread in his gut was growing more and more overpowering. He really didn't want to do this, and this was the first mission that he couldn't ignore who was inside the red folder.

He had made it this far by avoiding humanizing his targets. They were marks. Prey. Ants. Anything but human.

But now, he couldn't trick himself into this kill. Izuku knew this mark almost better than he knew himself and his empathy was sitting directly on the surface of this case.

Izuku scanned through Hiryu's red folder in the dead of night. He wanted to see how much information there was exactly—and his heart dropped further and further with every file.

Everything was in here.

Aoyama truly was impeccable at hacking and tracking. He found a list of fake names and IDs Hiryu used. The plastic surgeon who reconstructed his face. The apartments he had been bouncing around in for the last two years.

But worst of all—Kanna's picture was stapled on the bottom of page six. She was smiling so happily in the photograph that was clearly taken from a distance.

Seeing Kanna's face again made Izuku briefly consider letting Hiryu live. Maybe he could help Hiryu disappear a third time? But Izuku was too weary of how watchful the eyes of The Academy were. No Viper left so simply. Hiryu had now failed at this twice.

No matter where Hiryu went, Izuku knew his brother would be found over and over again by the bloodthirsty snakes they called family. Izuku recounted how desperate to kill Hiryu both Himiko and Jin were. They probably would drag out his death over multiple days and slash away at the same spots until he was mutilated beyond recognition.

At that, Izuku found peaceful resolve and closed his eyes to sleep.

At least out of the six possible people who could be assigned to kill Hiryu, Izuku knew he would be the most gracious.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku landed in Vienna the day before Hiryu was supposed to arrive.

It had been raining in Vienna and the sidewalks were glossy with puddles of rain. Izuku used a bright yellow umbrella as he discreetly scouted out the area. He had memorized the map of the lavish building and its surroundings on the plane. Now, he was overlaying it in his mind to carefully execute his mercy kill.

Hiryu's current assignment was to protect an Austrian diplomat. Hiryu had two other partners on this assignment. Good to know. Izuku didn't bother sinking too much interest in those details in case things went south and he had to exterminate those guys too. He could handle knowing details on Hiryu because he already did—but he couldn't do strangers.

In hindsight, Izuku wished he had bothered to memorize the photos of the partners.

Maybe then he wouldn't have been so caught off guard.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the next day arrived, Izuku masked his emotions.

A mercy kill.

This was a mercy kill, he repeated to himself as he loaded his gun. He snapped on the silencer with a stone, cold gaze. He strapped himself with sharp knives that were easily accessible. Then he combed his hair to look as nice as possible.

He stared at his reflection in the mirror before carefully unfolding the venue's waiter uniform. It was a deep red color made of silky material and the neckline plunged down. Izuku then carefully put on the ruby earrings Tomura had picked out for him one time in Barcelona. Izuku took in a deep, steadying breath as he shrugged on a black trenchcoat.

The moment was here and the red folder had suggested one of two ways to kill Hiryu.

The first approach, poison. Quick, easy, but unfortunately public.

The details suggested that Izuku slip their fail safe poison in Hiryu's drink as he walked by disguised as a waiter. Because Hiryu had been missing for so long, his poison tolerance was likely gone. Mithridatism only worked if you did it every day. And the likelihood Hiryu had hundreds of poisons to keep his tolerance up like they did was close to zero.

Cons of this approach was that there would potentially be a scene in that type of crowd. Izuku would have to be ready to exit quickly and fast. Plus, there was the potential of him being seen fleeing.

The second option was a bit more hands on but far more discreet.

Hiryu and one of his partners were scheduled for rooftop duty at the venue. The diplomats were going to be meeting at the sixth floor at the venue. The rooftop Hiryu would be stationed at would give a perfect view inside to the diplomat in case things became sticky.

Unfortunately, no other buildings in the area would give a perfect view to Hiryu. A close kill would be needed. Izuku would have to enter the roof top and then execute Hiryu and whoever else was there.

Izuku decided on the first option.

He didn't want to be in the room when Hiryu died, Izuku concluded.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku walked into the room that smelled like the filthy rich.

Various perfumes and colognes intermingled into each other like an exotic dance. The chandeliers above twinkled from diamonds and all around was gold lining and red velvet fabric.

Izuku walked into the room in his trench coat, then made his way to the service area where he discreetly discarded his coat. He blended quickly with the other waiters, taking a tray in the busy room. He walked around slowly, careful not to draw attention as he quickly scanned the room for his run away brother.

Then he saw Hiryu from a distance.

Hiryu looked different.

His cheeks were hollow, and his nose no longer had that crooked slant to it that Izuku used to admire. His forehead was shorter and his lips were now oddly thin. But his eyes were still inky and cold in a way only the Obsidian Viper could possess.

The table Hiryu was sitting at was egregiously long and full of what seemed to be useless conversation. His brother had his black eyes trained on the front door while the diplomat chatted with other politicians in the middle of the long table. Who Izuku presumed to be the other two bodyguards were dressed in all black tuxedos, closely watching the other two doors from the other far end of the table.

Izuku shifted himself fully out of Hiryu's line of vision.

He knew Hiryu would never take his eye off that entrance door. He was too well trained.

A dark shadow cast itself over Izuku's eyes as he turned on his kill switch.

He pulled a dissolvable poison bead from his pocket, ready to slip it in the drink as he walked by. He strolled up to the table, eyes zoned in on the sapphire drink Hiryu had beside him.

Izuku quickly assessed the other people on the opposite end of the long table to make sure no one was paying close attention to him.

But he froze.

Blazing, crimson eyes met his and time stood still.

Izuku halted walking, feeling a crazed sense of whiplash slap him across the face. His breath hitched in his throat and he could feel his heart skip a needed beat. The other teen held eye contact right back, looking equally as awe-struck. The stranger slightly cocked his head and Izuku could feel his face flush for the first time with a forgotten emotion.

This was single-handedly the most handsome person Izuku had ever laid eyes on.

His face was angled yet gentle and the portions of his features were eerily perfect. From his symmetrical eyebrows to his high cheekbones, it was almost as if the universe was fated to make someone as stunning as him. This guy was an inevitable type of handsome, Izuku concluded.

But what was most off putting was his red-orange eyes and ash blond hair.

That combination made Izuku feel like he had been thrown off a moving train because this other teen looked like—

—Kacchan.

Izuku gaped like a fish until the handsome teen smirked.

Shit. Izuku quickly pulled it together once he realized he was staring. Why does he remind me so much of Kacchan?

It's just the hair and eyes, the reasonable part of his brain told him. Red eyes are common. Think of Tomura. Blond hair is also common. Think of Aoyama, Himiko and Jin. There's no logic behind the possibility of it being him in Austria halfway across the world after ten years.

With that, Izuku convinced himself that seeing someone with blond hair and red eyes shouldn't shock him as much as it just did—but it was terrible how much this guy looked exactly how Izuku envisioned the future version of Kacchan to be in his head.

He had a small fixation on that, he knew. The model on the cover of the romance book having blond hair and red eyes was the whole reason Izuku read it in the first place.

Izuku quickly stole a glance at Hiryu who was paying no attention. He was promptly grounded back in reality when he could feel the pressure of the poison tab in his palm.

An older man sitting next to the blond teen waved him over. "Are you our server? We've been sitting here forever!"

Izuku forcefully smiled and played his part of the waiter perfectly.

He had been compromised and needed to go along with the flow before Hiryu turned his head and this ended in a bloody shootout. Izuku found himself taking faux orders for half of the large table but when it came time to take the blond teen's order, Izuku could feel a tiny shift in his mood.

"Er, what is this called?" The blond teen asked curiously in bad German. Izuku soaked in his voice, it was deep and raspy. Izuku could tell it was only going to drop more the older he became. The blond gave a lopsided grin and scratched his cheek. "I, uh, don't speak German very well."

"Oh, it's Käsespätzle," Izuku replied in perfect German. "I think you said it nicely."

Hypnotizing red eyes peered up at him so curiously, studying his every move.

"Really?" The other teen asked. The crooked smile grew bigger.

"Yeah." Izuku smiled sweetly at how hard the other teen was trying at a new language. "You have to emphasize the syllable with your tongue to the roof of your mouth more."

The tiniest chuckle escaped the handsome stranger. He tried to pronounce the dish again and was horrible. Izuku bit back a snicker at how rough it was and the other teen marveled at Izuku's smile.

"Did I do it better this time?" The stranger teased.

Izuku genuinely laughed. "Not at all, but I understand you."

"Well. As long as you understand me, I'm alright then."

Izuku smiled at the extended grace.

The blond was not only unfairly gorgeous, but kind as well. Izuku was then pulled into taking other people's orders at this end of the table. Mostly drinks and a couple of desserts. He kept an eye on Hiryu in his peripheral vision. Luckily for him, Hiryu never bother to mind himself with what was happening at this far end of the table.

Hiryu sipped on his drink and Izuku felt the window closing for him to slip in the poison.

When Izuku was done scribbling on the note pad, he tried to walk away—but was stopped by a hand that reached to grab his elbow. The connection felt like electricity, and Izuku whirled around, surprised by the soft touch. The blond stranger also seemed surprised by himself. The stranger reeled back his hand, and quietly pressed it in his lap as if he needed help to control himself.

"Sorry," the stranger murmured, embarrassed. "I don't know what came over me."

"It's okay," Izuku replied quickly. The jolt of where the stranger had touched him lingered. "Did you need something?"

"I just wanted to ask…is it your first day on the job?" The blond asked dumbly.

"Um," Izuku didn't know what to say but the shining red eyes were pinning him in place, as if begging him not to go. "Yes, why do you ask?"

"You seem nervous. Not in a bad way but definitely nervous."

"I am a bit."

Not a lie. He had to kill someone he was close with tonight.

"Well, you're doing a great job." The blond smiled shyly. "I don't know if my opinion counts for anything since I am just a random guy, but I'll be sure to tell the others to give you a big tip for your first day."

Izuku laughed slightly at how absurdly kind this guy was. "Thank you, that's very sweet of you but you don't have to do that for me. Tips aren't customary here."

Izuku tried to take a step away again, but was gripped once more by that damn voice.

“But what if I want to do it for you?”

The blond’s gaze intensified. Izuku’s cheeks flamed up.

Sharp, embered colored eyes roamed all over his face. He could see the other teen’s body language shift. The blond leaned towards Izuku, and stared at him like he was the most beautiful thing he had seen.

“Th-Then I guess that’s fine.” Izuku stammered, fully blushing. “Thank you.”

The heat gathering under his collar was taking him off guard because he didn’t know what to do. He hadn’t been trained on how to react when a handsome blond flirted with him in bad German.

Izuku wearily stole a look at Hiryu.

Hiryu’s glass was empty now. The metaphorical window for his first option shut tight and locked. Izuku felt like kicking himself at how he had screwed up.

“I’ll be right back with your orders,” Izuku quickly said.

“Wait—what’s your name?” The blond asked but Izuku hurried out of there.

He practically ran away from the table, too fearful of staying there and getting caught. As Izuku retreated, he couldn’t help but glance over his shoulder. Saddened, red eyes were watching him go and it nearly looked like the blond wanted to chase him. The stranger waved goodbye at him, and Izuku gave an unwillingly sad half smile back.

Once he was clear of the building, Izuku mentally berated himself mentally over and over.

How did he let himself get that deeply distracted? All of this trouble was because he was entranced by the concept of someone even slightly resembling the boy from his past.

This will not happen again, Izuku lectured himself. From now on, no more thinking of Kacchan on assignments.

But he didn’t know that fateful meeting was the beginning of the end.

ɯɯɯ

Izuku was left with the final option to kill Hiryu.

He didn’t want to have to see his brother die up close, but they were in the business of doing things they had no desire to do.

Izuku sucked it up.

He did what Tomura trained him to do: he shut off his emotions. Izuku meditated himself to fall all the way into the bottom of his being. It was dark there. Cold and unwelcoming. It was the perfect viper den where the darkest side of him resided. He let the dark side of him slither forward and grasp the wheel, and he himself sat at the bottom of his mind like he wasn't the one steering.

His perfectly trained killer took over and he became a shell of himself, feeling nothing.

Izuku was the Viridian Viper now.

He waited until he could see Hiryu and someone else walk across the street to a dark building. The pair went in through the back, and Izuku followed behind at the perfect pace. Not too close, not too far. Izuku picked the lock effortlessly and stealthily climbed up the metal staircase. He was light on his feet and the moment he reached the top floor, Izuku drew his gun.

The dark shadow overcasting his eyes returned—and this time it didn't waiver.

Izuku fluidly moved on the rooftop, blending with the shadows.

Before either man could see him, Izuku locked in on them and fired off four shots.

Two into Hiryu. Two into Hiryu's partner.

Izuku registered briefly that Hiryu's partner was actually the handsome blond from earlier. The only thing that crossed his thoughts while he was in the mindset of the Viridian Viper was: Shame. What a waste of looks.

Izuku bum rushed the blond teen because he knew Hiryu was slow to recover from being shot. Izuku elbowed the stranger in the throat to disorient him and in a twisted dance, quickly rounded to grab a hold of his arm. Izuku disarmed the other and in a flash, slammed the other teen to the ground with all his strength.

He could hear the other teen's skull crack against the concrete.

A rustle behind Izuku told him Hiryu was rebounding from the two gunshots. In the next moment, Izuku pulled his gun once more. He fired off two perfect shots in Hiryu's knee caps, shattering them. Hiryu folded on himself like a burning house collapsing inwards. The four bullet wounds in Hiryu bled and bled. Izuku followed the trail of pouring blood to stand over his runaway brother, eclipsing the light of the moon.

Hiryu's inky black eyes gazed up at him.

The split second of recognition flashed before Izuku could prevent it.

"Sorry, hyung," Izuku whispered in Korean.

"Please. No. Izu—"

The Viridian Viper pulled the trigger.

Silence.

Blood.

So much blood.

Izuku stared at the body beneath him and all the red that was pouring from it. Hiryu's eyes looked directly up at him and an ominous chill brought Izuku back to the front of his mind. He tried to stop it—but he began floating back into the driver's seat. Izuku tried to tear his eyes away from Hiryu's growing pale face—but he couldn't.

As Hiryu died in front of him, all their memories together flashed before Izuku's eyes.

He saw his brother who helped raise him. He saw the brother who was the top of his class. The brother who helped defend him against bullies when he was a kid. He saw the brother that helped him train and gave him pointers. He saw the brother that smoked with a crooked smile and held hands with his girlfriend in the park. He saw the brother that was in love.

And now, he saw that same brother bleeding out on a rooftop.

Izuku's heart squeezed and squeezed until something in him snapped with grief.

What have you done? The voice of empathy within him asked. He loved you and you killed him.

Izuku slumped.

He crouched down with the burden of murder laying heavy on his shoulders. He got a clear view of Hiryu now, and he knew this was the whole reason he didn't want to do this up close in the first place.

Hiryu's face still looked the same despite the plastic surgeries to Izuku. His eyes were uniquely Obsidian all the way up to his death and his hair was always neatly combed back.

When the final twitch went out of Hiryu's body, Izuku could see now he was squatting above the corpse of someone he used to deeply care for. Izuku held up his digital watch's face and clicked the side button to take a small picture for proof. Hiryu was dead, and he had done it.

Izuku closed Hiryu's eyelids sadly.

Ragged breathing brought Izuku back into the present.

He cut his eyes to the teen in front of him who was floundering on the dirty rooftop. Izuku held up his gun and pointed it directly at the blond. He felt a surprising twinge of pity when the blond stared at him. His stunning ember eyes were now bloodshot and he seemed to be in enormous pain.

"I'm sorry you had to see that," Izuku said sincerely. "It's nothing personal. You weren't my mark."

"I'll kill you for this."

Izuku raised a brow.

The other guy was gritting his teeth, unable to even lift himself off the ground. But his eyes were full of unchecked, blazing fury. Izuku could feel the hate from here, but it was stupidly pointless to him. The other's gun was out of reach and without proper medical attention Izuku was sure this guy would have Vienna marked on his death certificate.

"Huh? You're saying you are going to kill me when I'm the one with the gun on you?" Izuku asked slowly. He made sure to emphasize exactly what type of position this guy was in because maybe he didn't realize. Usually this was the part where people begged for their life. "You're a bit mouthy."

"Quit fucking toying with me!" The nameless guy snapped. "Why don't you just kill me already instead of fucking holding conversation?"

Izuku decided he was right and cocked his gun.

He held up his weapon and moved to pull the trigger—and immediately he was bombarded with the memory of Kacchan shivering on the bench in the snow with the soft sounds of violin in the background.

Izuku furrowed his brow at the inappropriate moment for such a memory.

He tried again to pull the trigger, but was once more greeted by another memory of Kacchan. This time he saw them together in the nook cuddled and reading comics.

He unwillingly halted.

Izuku told himself to simply pull the damn trigger but each time he attempted, his brain supplied him with memories from when he was a child. Trying to fire the gun felt like there was a string attached from the trigger to his heart and if he pulled too hard he might hurt himself in the process.

All he could see was Kacchan while staring at this stranger.

Izuku tried to shake himself out of it but soon the teen in front of him blended with the memory of the boy from his past. They perfectly overlapped with the same colored hair and eyes.

Then Izuku looked down at Hiryu's corpse at his feet.

That was a mistake.

His mind warped the imagery of his dead brother with the forgotten boy of his childhood. He saw Kacchan dead, bleeding out in the nook covered in old rags. Beneath him was Hiryu with his eyes rolled back and their blood mingled together horribly.

Tears pushed at Izuku's eyes for the first time in years.

His breathing stopped and he realized he had been emotionally compromised.

Everything began to tilt as the memories in his head leveled his whole being. Izuku was ambushed with memories of the violinist, Kanna, Kacchan, the nook, Hiryu, and more. It was all coming too fast, too potent, and far too much for Izuku to stop.

Izuku turned his head away from Hiryu's corpse and pointed his gun away from the blond.

Immediately all the memories stopped.

Shock echoed into Izuku's core.

What just happened?

Stunned, slowly Izuku stood up. The Viridian Viper side of him was long gone now, slithered safely away into the dark parts of his core. In its place stood the tiny boy he once was, hurting for Hiryu and Kacchan.

His inner child was spiteful and held bloodshot eyes. With all its neglected resentment, the younger version of himself caused all his pent up emotions to pound against his rib cage. They banged and banged with balled up fists, demanding to be let out.

Tears bursted from Izuku's eyes.

In an instant before the other teen could see, Izuku turned his back. The hot tears streamed down his face like a dam finally breaking and Izuku's throat tightened at an alarming tempo.

Izuku had to get away from this man.

"Please stay out of my way," Izuku whispered quietly before disappearing into the night.

Izuku couldn't think.

Hell, he couldn't breathe.

He boarded the private plane back to Tokyo with his whole world flipped upside down—and it was all because of one, single blond.

Once Izuku was alone in the plane's private cabin, his hands began to tremble. The tremors ached through his bones like earthquakes, splitting his heart into countless fractures. He tried to will himself to stop shaking but he couldn't. He tilted against the wall of the plane as he trembled and trembled until he slid down on the cold, hard floor.

Suddenly, from out of his eyes an endless stream of tears poured down like a hurricane. Izuku balled up his fists and choked on his bottled up emotions. His vision swayed with grieving thoughts of Hiryu and Kacchan melting in his mind. He mourned Kacchan. He mourned Hiryu. He had killed Hiryu for simply loving someone like he had in the past.

Izuku could feel the invisible string around his ring finger and that spot burned to be acknowledged.

Izuku pressed the heels of his palms into his eyes in an attempt to will all the unwanted tears back inside his skull. But they kept coming, and going, and Izuku sobbed like a child until his throat was sore.

"Why?" Izuku gasped desperately. He sobbed into his quivering palms. "Why did he have to die? Why did I have to be the one to kill him?"

He reeled back, and stared in horror at his shaking hands that were now coated in his tears. He was mortified at what he had done and what he didn't do.

He had successfully killed Hiryu and in the process Izuku let a witness live.

This was the first and only loose end Izuku had ever had.

When the seriousness of his screw up fully slammed Izuku, he grasped that he could never let anyone know what happened—or worse—what he discovered. Because Izuku had a bigger problem than a loose end—he had a mental block.

A giant, Kacchan shaped mental block.

All these years he thought he had buried his inner child that yearned for love and Kacchan—but oh, how wrong he was. Not only had the younger version of him survived in the darkness all these years, it had burrowed its way into his very core and laid crippling roots.

The haunting melody of The Dance of The Love Birds echoed in his ears.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku arrived back in Tokyo the day after killing Hiryu feeling panicked. The melody from his childhood wouldn't leave him, and as a result he kept envisioning sweet memories from when he was seven.

He numbly confirmed his kill on Hiryu with the photo and lied about there being anyone else on the roof. Izuku kept his eyes down when he said this, too afraid that anyone could see the agitated red blood vessels in his eyes from his breakdown.

Nine nodded in approval and Tomura patted Izuku's shoulder. In Tomura's eyes was a glimmer of deep pride that Izuku knew he didn't earn. Everyone in The Viper Seven was back to normal like they weren't six now. Himiko and Jin laughed in conversation while Ibara and Aoyama talked about casual business.

But Izuku didn't say a word.

Everyone's mouths moved, but all around him every noise sounded muffled, like the ghost of Hiryu was holding his hands over Izuku's ears.

ᔓᔓᔓ

"Good job on the assignment," Tomura complimented.

“Thank you,” Izuku replied emptily.

They walked into their suite together and Izuku felt like he was observing himself from the outside. They routinely showered and changed into their pajamas. Tomura’s hair was down, brushing his shoulders and he had on a baggy black shirt and black sweats while Izuku was dressed in normal gray sweats.

Tomura informed him that he was going to cook, and instructed Izuku to go sit in the kitchen.

When Izuku got to their kitchen on the other side of the suite, he noticed it looked different. The small dinner table was replaced with a longer, wider wooden table.

There were seven chairs instead of two.

Izuku found it strange for a split second, but was in no state of mind to outwardly question it. Instead, he took a seat on the right hand side of the head of the table.

As Tomura began to cook, Izuku didn’t say a word the entire time.

“Are you…okay?” Tomura probed. He peaked over his shoulder at the quiet teenager. “You seem pretty out of it.”

Izuku kept his lips tight. He was fearful that Tomura would be the one to push the truth about the blotched assignment out of him.

“I-I’m fine,” Izuku said. He kicked himself for stammering.

“It’s okay if you aren’t. I suspected you might be upset by what you had to do.”

Izuku was caught off guard. This was new.

“You did?” Izuku asked carefully, not believing his own ears.

“Of course,” Tomura reassured. He shrugged and prepped two bowls of ramen. He began boiling two eggs. “You can relax, I’m not going to punish you for doing a difficult task. At the end of the day, you still did it despite it being hard for you. That’s good.”

Izuku perked up a bit because he had never seen this side of Tomura.

“I know you better than anyone, Izuku,” Tomura said confidently. “I knew this would be hard for you because Hiryu was always…closer to you in a way I can’t be.” Tomura made a sour face. “I was hoping Nine would choose anyone else—but it seemed like you were the one he wanted to test loyalty with. I thought your soft spot for Hiryu might get in the way of what needed to be done but—I was proven wrong.”

Izuku didn’t know how to feel.

He was being praised for doing something he hated himself for. But at the same time, he was seeing a part of Tomura that he never experienced. Tomura finished topping off their bowls of ramen and sat next to him in the chair that was at the head of the table. The warm steam from the food made Izuku's belly rumble, and Izuku smiled at his big brother and gave a tiny 'thank you' for the food.

Right as Izuku was about to relax, Tomura pulled a small object out from under the table.

It was the old, tattered romance novel Izuku had hidden away.

Dread washed over Izuku seeing the blond haired red eyed model on the cover.

Izuku panicked, dropped his chopsticks and his heart palpitated. "Tomura, wait. I—I can explain—"

"No need. I read it already." Tomura put his hand up and Izuku's stomach churned. "I'm not going to punish you for reading a fictional romance. But you understand this type of stuff is strictly fictional, right? Especially with what just happened with Hiryu?"

Tomura instantly slid back to his usual demeanor.

The regular, menacing version of his older brother was put forward and the gleam in his eye was terrifying. Izuku's back straightened automatically as he floundered around his words. Izuku tried to keep his cool as his mind flashed between the novel, Kacchan, and the stranger on the roof.

Izuku fiddled with his thumbs and hung his head. "I know it's not real."

Tomura pushed the book towards him, nearly disgusted.

"Good. As long as you know it's fantasy, then we don't have a problem."

Izuku nodded obediently and took the book, placing it in his lap with a slight tremble. He felt deeply ashamed.

"I was surprised to see what exactly was in that book," Tomura mumbled. He slurped on his ramen and Izuku began eating too, blushing slightly. "But I guess it makes sense you need something to fill the void for your defect of empathy. As long as you're feeding it with escapism and not in real life, I decided it'll be allowed. But, I will admit, reading that I realized something…I want to try to be close to you in the way Hiryu was."

Izuku nearly knocked over his bowl and whirled to stare at Tomura. "You do?"

"Yes."

"But, why?" Izuku furrowed his brow. "Why now?"

"Because I recognize you need more attention than other vipers because of your emotional defect." Tomura pointed to the book in Izuku's lap. "It's my job to take care of this team, but more importantly you. Maybe if I paid closer attention to Hiryu's needs, he wouldn't have attempted to run away with that civilian girl. I can't help but wonder if he felt like this unit was more closely knit, then he would have stayed with us."

Izuku deflated a bit.

This was a preventative measure to make sure Izuku didn't run away like Hiryu.

"I don't feel emotions the same way Hiryu did but I know you're important to me," Tomura said with a straight face. "I care about you, I do."

Izuku could tell his brother was trying his best at this awkward lecture. All of this went directly against his cruel, sadistic nature. But he was trying for Izuku's sake—like always. It was then Izuku really saw his brother for the first time.

His silver hair was fainter now. It was nearly so white there was a blue hue peaking through. The length of his hair had grown, falling over his face messily, and the bags under his eyes were darker than Izuku remembered. There were fine lines and wrinkles decorating the corners of his mouth, eyes, and forehead more than they should for someone who was only twenty two.

Under the bleak kitchen lighting, Izuku grasped how young Tomura really was.

"I'm proud of you for doing what you had to do on this assignment," Tomura muttered softly. "You really proved yourself to me tonight." Tomura sucked in a deep breath and braced himself for what he said next. "And because of that…I want to give you your own space."

Izuku's brows shot up in shock. "You mean I'm getting my own suite?"

"No. Your own room," Tomura corrected. "You're not ready to have your own suite yet but I talked with Nine and we're going to rearrange our suite so that the training room we have will be a second bedroom. I know you've been wanting your own space for a while and I figured this is a good middle ground."

"Thank you," Izuku said, bowing his head slightly.

"Thank you—what?"

"Thank you, Big Brother," Izuku said quietly. "This means a lot."

"You're welcome." Tomura rested his hand on Izuku's. "Things are going to be a lot different from here on out. I will make sure of it."

Right then, a loud knock rained on their door.

Izuku stood up first and walked over to answer it. When the large, metallic door opened Izuku was a bit surprised to see the rest of their unit standing in their lounge clothes with food ingredients in their hands.

Himiko peeked her head from behind Jin and with a sarcastic grin said, "surprise, baby brother!"

Tomura wiped the corners of his mouth with a napkin before gesturing everyone in.

Ibara and Aoyama greeted Izuku with warm smiles. Jin's shoulder bumped Izuku on the way in and Himiko continued to grin darkly at Izuku's shock. Izuku furrowed his brow at the sudden intrusion but then one by one each of his siblings took a seat at the table, laying down food. Ibara and Aoyama immediately went to the kitchen and began cooking.

"Ah, I forgot to tell you, Izuku," Tomura said. "I invited everyone over for dinner to celebrate your mission's success. I hope that's okay."

"That's fine with me," Izuku replied. "A bit random but I don't mind the extra company. Make yourselves welcome."

Jin rolled his eyes and flicked his wrist. "Like we would need your permission, runt."

"Jin. Play nice." Tomura shot him a killer glare and Jin shut up immediately.

Soon everyone was sitting at the long table eating and discussing their days. Izuku peered around, taken back at how normal it felt. This was just like in his romance novel. The family in the beginning always ate together and it was how they came to be close and loving.

Izuku chewed slowly on his heaps of food. He studied everyone talking and laughing around the table. Jin teasingly grabbed Himiko's nose with chopsticks and Aoyama was humming in delight as he downed the broth out of his bowl. Ibara looked over her shoulder at him with a tiny wave.

Tomura, seated at the head of the table, rested his elbows on the surface and intertwined his fingers. He cleared his throat and all five pairs of eyes turned to him.

Tomura slowly stood up and then smiled the best he could.

"I wanted to do this because tonight marks a change for all of us," Tomura said proudly. The bass in his voice was deeper than usual and the look in his eye was more focused. "From now on, we'll be having family dinners together on the nights we're not requested with Nine. I want us to be strong not only as a unit but as destined siblings who were lucky to find each other."

Family.

Izuku's heart thumped so loud he thought Tomura heard it.

Everyone at the table shrugged nonchalantly and gave approving sounds. They bled into chit chat around the table about what foods they should cook, how to cook it, and who would cook what. Soon they were all discussing mundane things like sports, topics they never would go over in any other situation.

It felt so normal.

Part of Izuku liked the idea of them being more than a unit of venomous assassins. But the other half of him took a millisecond to assess Tomura's motives. He noticed Tomura's cutlery was gold, much like Nine's.

Then Izuku glanced at the extra chair at the end of the table that didn't have a body in it.

It was lonely and heavy with absence.

Izuku could see the faint visual of Hiryu's ghost with a bullet hole between his eyes. He was sitting there staring at them as blood oozed from the wound in his face. It was no longer just his irises that were black, but now the whole of his eyes were swallowed up by the color obsidian and it mimicked two voids sitting in his skull.

Hiryu's ghost wasn't smiling. His face was pulled down into an eternal frown with envy for the living in his eyes.

Hiryu's phantom whispered, "be careful Izuku, or you'll be next," in a lilting voice.

Izuku's body chilled down to his bones.

He hoped the blond stranger bled to death on the roof where he left him. He needed his secret mental block to die with that man because Izuku was more defective than he thought—more than Tomura knew—and far more than The Viper Academy would ever allow within their walls.

Izuku was as good as dead if anyone ever found out because now, Izuku was unsure if he could do the one thing he was trained to do.

He didn't know if he could go for the kill when faced with blond hair and red eyes.

Chapter 20: Entr'acte IV

Chapter Summary

A series of encounters between two fated souls.

Chapter Notes

Helloooo and welcome back!!! :3

Firstly, thank you to the love of my life Luna for betaing like always!! She's amazing 💜💜💜

So, originally, this chapter was going to be 40k because the actual "Incident" ended up being such a dozy it was 15k alone. All the different Viper relationship that have been building come to a head into a huge clusterfuck basically. But after Luna read through it, we found a good place to cut it and now that gives you guys two more chapters!!

Without further rambling, please do enjoy all bakudeku moments here <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

2 years until The Incident

True to his word, over the next year Tomura hosted dinners every night—and every night that single, lonely chair remained.

Sometimes, Izuku swore that he saw Hiryu's phantom occupy the creaky chair. He could hear the sound of it go back and forth with weight when he was in his bed. Part of him knew it was the guilt distorting his senses. But the other half of him was convinced he was rightfully being haunted by the ghost of his sins.

He killed someone he loved, and that blood would never come off his hands.

Ever since Vienna, Hiryu's voice echoed in the back of his head like a second consciousness. Each thought was a taboo opinion that would never leave Izuku's mouth.

"Awfully kind of that sadistic bastard to start treating you like family after I was out of the picture," Hiryu's ghost muttered in Izuku's ear any time Tomura offered Izuku an ounce of kindness. "He only plays nice with people he can control."

The worst part was that Izuku didn't disagree with these thoughts. He was often bombarded with these opinions during their family dinners.

Their dinners weren't always all six of them, due to varying degrees of assignments. Sometimes it was four of them. Or five. Sometimes it was solely Izuku and Tomura.

For meals, Izuku and Aoyama often handled preparing the desserts. Tomura and Ibara always cooked the main course. Jin was always on drink duty and Himiko was on appetizers. Izuku was surprised to learn Tomura and him had similar tastes in foods, and his big brother would always reward him after assignments with a main dish Izuku could hand pick.

Izuku grew to love these moments because during this small segment of the day he felt like a normal person.

He didn't feel like a slithering viper, he felt like a regular teenager having meals with his sisters and brothers.

Notably, everyone else seemed different too.

Tomura seemed more relaxed and sometimes, if Izuku squinted, he could see the semblance of something close to a smile tugging at his big brother's lips.

Within the year, Tomura had even gotten several new piercings that complimented his cluster of ink black tattoos. He pierced his ear four times on each side and got snake bites to match his ever growing viper tattoo collection that slithered up his arms.

Aoyama became a bit less shy. He and Izuku grew closer and would often find themselves seeking out movies together in their free time. They shared a checklist of all the films they wanted to see and found mutual ground in horror films.

Ibara soon let out her love for aesthetics and fashion. She deeply enjoyed dressing up and playing the part of whatever role she was in. It came as no surprise to them when she began leading the department of espionage.

Soon Jin eventually warmed up to everyone. He let them in on his love to travel and started proposing trips they could all take together. They all liked the idea, and over the past year they would find themselves on vacations in different places around the globe. Nigeria. Thailand. France. Chile. They even went to Antarctica for a weekend all together.

All of his siblings suddenly felt like people instead of vipers.

Even Himiko was humanized a bit to Izuku—but only a bit.

She was the only one to never warm up even slightly to Izuku.

One evening when the two of them were coming back from a stake out in Matsue, she made it viciously clear that Izuku was her anathema.

It had been a beautiful night in that city when the encounter occurred. The sky was full of sunset-colored clouds and fallen Sakura blossoms poured down like rain.

Izuku miscalculated their closeness and smiled at her.

Her reaction was visceral—she pushed Izuku up against a cold brick wall and immediately Izuku went on the defense and grabbed her right back. Their glares clashed like fire and water, and all the tension in the air was as visible as steam rolling off from them.

“Let’s be clear, I will never consider you family,” Himiko spat. Her lips had twisted into a nasty snarl and the venom in her words felt like acid. “Do you really think I would forgive you for what you had done to Sen so easily, hah? You killed him and now you’re wrongfully in his spot.”

“Get over Sen already, Himiko,” Izuku snapped back. “It’s almost been eight years!” He pushed her off, regretting the simple gesture of a smile. “Even Jin has almost let go of it and Sen was his Little. Why can’t you accept that maybe I deserve to be here as much as you do?”

“Because I see through you, Izuku.”

A dark shadow danced across Himiko’s face and her eyes sharpened like blades. Pinned underneath Himiko’s noxious glare, Izuku straightened his back with a scowl.

“You’re still the same, sniveling cry baby from when we were kids,” Himiko accused. “Just because you’re better at hiding how defected you are, doesn’t mean you’re not. Sen was perfectly cruel. He was a real viper. You—you’re nothing but a lamb cowering behind Tomura.”

Izuku now understood there wasn’t a shred of camaraderie between them.

“I’m as much of a viper as you are, Himiko,” Izuku defended.

“No. You’re not. Vipers don’t have weaknesses and I know you do. Tomura has been good at hiding it from Nine, but I know why your punishments are private. He’s protecting you from being discovered as defective.”

Izuku stilled at how spot on she was and Himiko continued speaking.

“I’m going to find out exactly what that weakness is, Izuku,” Himiko promised. Her voice was as solid as the ground she wished to bury Izuku in. “And when the day comes, I’m going to use your weakness against you to lead you straight to slaughter like the lamb you are.”

If this had been before Vienna, Izuku would have rolled his eyes and marched forward. He wouldn’t have thought of it twice and gone on to practice an extra round of sparring with Tomura to make himself feel confident in his rightful spot in this family.

However, Vienna happened and Izuku was now painfully aware of his weak spot:

Blond hair and red eyes.

Izuku stiffened ever so slightly.

The ghost of Hiryu leaned in to whisper, "I told you you'd be next if you weren't careful."

Izuku chilled and goosebumps ran along his forearms. He backed away from her with a careful assessment and strode away from the conversation.

They didn't speak all the way back to Tokyo and Izuku no longer tried to bond with her. In fact, he did the opposite. When they came back from Matsue, Izuku made sure to put extra distance between him and Himiko.

Because she was right—he did have something to hide.

ᔓᔓᔓ

It was now a quiet evening in their home in Tokyo. The summer was here and Izuku's eighteenth birthday came and went with the breeze.

Currently Ibara, Jin, Tomura and him were stationed in Nine's debriefing office.

They were waiting for their handler to come in. He was running slightly late which no one seemed to mind. Jin and Ibara were currently gossiping about people in the underground. Tomura was off to the side with Izuku, casually leaned against the window dressed in all black.

Izuku stared up at his big brother. Something in Tomura was tenser than usual and Izuku could feel it like a coil ready to snap.

The two large double doors opened, and in strode Nine. His silver hair was down today, and his power suit was a deep purple. Tucked safely in his arms were four separate red folders.

The four assassins lined up on cue.

"110, you'll be on a solo assignment in Beijing," Nine said. "Make sure to read through the details carefully because it'll be a complicated one. 199—you'll be in Toronto this next week. 117 you'll be here. I have some clients from the yakuza that want to meet with you."

Nine handed each of his siblings the folders, and Izuku patiently waited for his own.

However, Nine looked him up and down slowly before tilting his head. His well manicured fingers traced the twin viper emblem on the folder thoughtfully.

"217," Nine called Izuku's number. "This next assignment is going to be a new type for you. Upon discussions with Tomura, you'll begin taking up a more specific type of assignments into your portfolio given your new developments."

"Which developments would that be, sir?" Izuku asked, mildly confused.

"Your looks," Nine said bluntly. "Being attractive is a deadly asset of its own. Some missions require getting close to a person through their weakness—and for many in our world their weaknesses are beautiful faces and sex. You will have Jin and Ibara to help guide you through that as they are also vipers we send on these types of assignments."

"Understood, sir," Izuku said automatically.

He in fact did not understand.

Nine handed him the folder and Izuku felt extremely caught off guard.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku was now sitting at their end of the day family dinner.

Everyone was home on a rest day and the main meal was chicken katsu. Izuku was brooding at the table, thumbing through his red folder with freshly damp hair from his shower.

This was the first folder since Hiryu's that Izuku broke his vow of not reading the whole details. It wasn't because he wanted to know more about the mark—but he wanted to know exactly what the hell he was being asked to do.

His mark was a young drug smuggler by the name of Chih-wei Tang. The target possessed unfairly kind eyes and perfect teeth. But according to the file he had one giant weakness: barely legal men. He especially liked lean, young men with blue hair and Izuku fit the profile of being exactly his type.

All he needed was a wig and he'd have Chih-wei hooked.

It was a seduction operation that required sneaking into a large party Chih-wei was hosting. Izuku was to flaunt his assets enough to catch Chih-wei's attention. Then if all went as planned, he would be dragged off to somewhere private and allow the man to ravish him.

And when Chih-wei's guard was down, Izuku was instructed to kill him.

Izuku blanched at the fine print.

"This says that I have to wear a playboy bunny outfit?" Izuku was exasperated. He huffed and put down the stack of papers like it was making him ill. "I don't get it. Why am I doing something like this? I'm a poison sniper, not a seduction agent."

"Because you're very pretty," Aoyama said with a laugh as light as a feather. He pointed up and down Izuku's body with his fork. "In case you haven't looked in the mirror recently, you are shaping up to be quite the looker. You got the whole doe eyed minx thing going for you with those freckles."

Freckles.

Izuku wanted to sarcastically scoff.

After the painful encounter with Inko, Izuku preferred to forget what he looked like. He couldn't find any vanity to regard his freckles as a thing of beauty when they were the reason his birth mother couldn't look at him.

"You're also exactly the type a lot of criminals love to take to bed," Ibara informed with a pity filled half smile. She gave him an extra dumpling on his plate and patted his back. "You'd be perfect for these types of missions because no one will ever expect a sweet looking guy to harm them."

It was strange hearing himself described like this.

All Izuku knew was he filled out more and grew slightly in height. But compared to Tomura, Izuku always felt small. Tomura shot up to be nearly 190cm in the past year and filled out to be one of the more muscularly built of their unit. Izuku remained lean and stopped right around 167cm.

"And I have to do these assignments?" Izuku asked cautiously. "Can't I decline?"

"Unfortunately no," Ibara said. "Whatever Nine asks of you, you have to do. He already instructed me and Jin to train you for this. We'll be working closer together so I can begin to teach you seduce and kill techniques."

Izuku groaned. He hung his head in his hands to hide his blush.

Everyone at the table besides Tomura laughed.

"This is the price of being an attractive assassin, baby bro!" Jin grinned wide as he took a giant bite of his chicken. "Nine uses me and Ibara all the time for these types of missions, don't worry. It's not as bad as it seems. You only sometimes find yourself having sex."

At that, Izuku shook his head and squirmed in his seat.

"I don't know if I feel comfortable with this," Izuku said wearily. "This seems a bit…much."

"Oh, please." Himiko groaned from across the table. "Don't tell me you're a prude."

"I'm not a prude," Izuku rebutted. "I just never considered having sex on an assignment. Weren't we taught to not do that because it creates unneeded loose ends?"

"Yeah, but there's always leeway," Jin said flippantly. "We're The Viper Seven. We can do whatever the hell we want to as long as a body is in the ground."

Aoyama studied Izuku and asked, "Not even once were you curious about getting into bed with any of our clientele?"

“No, he hasn’t been curious,” Tomura cut in. There was an edge in his voice as sharp as his machetes. It was only then Izuku realized Tomura had been silent this whole conversation. “Izuku has kept his mind only on work this whole time correctly like vipers should be doing.”

Tomura was sitting in a formal position, watching Izuku while strumming his fingers along the wooden table. It was plain as day that he was irritated at this topic. He glared lightly at everyone and the conversation almost died.

Almost.

“Aw, c’mon Tomura,” Jin, who was the least afraid of death, humored. “You really kept him that heavily sheltered this whole time? You’re an impressive Big Brother. Before my Big was sold to the Governor, he told me to go fuck as soon as possible. One of the many pleasures we Vipers can indulge in.”

“I bet Izuku is the only virgin at this table,” Himiko taunted.

Izuku bristled and became immediately defensive. “I am not!”

“You’re not a virgin?” Tomura whirled his glare on Izuku.

“I-I mean, I am.” Izuku fumbled his words. He was surprised by how serious Tomura’s stare became. “But surely not everyone has had—er, relations. I’m not the only virgin here… right?”

There was silence across the table.

No one spoke up and Izuku’s mouth dropped open.

Everyone? Absolutely all of them?

Izuku spun to Aoyama, who was bashfully rubbing the back of his neck.

“Aoyama? You too?” Izuku gasped in disbelief.

Aoyama gave a tiny shrug and a smile. “It randomly sort of happened? I was hanging out in Hadeus one day after work with some of our clients and we went to play darts. Next thing I knew we were heavy petting and heading up to a motel. It’s only natural, we’re all human.”

Izuku was shocked. He turned to his big brother next. “…Even you, Tomura?”

Tomura stayed silent at first before sighing in defeat. “Yes. But sex is just sex. It’s solely for pleasure, power or dominance.”

“Or money,” Jin chimed in. “I sold my virginity to the highest bidder in the Yakuza to buy my rarest sports car. Turns out, a lot of people will pay steep dollars to fuck a trained assassin. Especially a Viper—we’re a rare commodity.”

Izuku slumped in his chair when heat poked at his cheeks.

He was teased a bit longer before the topic naturally shifted into something else. Izuku stayed quiet, too lost in his thoughts to contribute to whatever his siblings were discussing.

Admittedly, Izuku hadn't thought about sex before.

He didn't know when he would ever have time to be intimate like that. Yet somehow everyone, including Tomura, found the time for pleasure in their hectic lives.

But Izuku now supposed that it made sense when he connected all the dots.

Within the last year their unit was given more freedom. Because of their rank, they were fully immersed in the lifestyle of the underground world now. They frequently hung out in Hadeus in the open with crooked politicians, gang leaders, drug smugglers, and Yakuza henchmen. The organized crime in Tokyo was a city within a city at this point.

Ibara, Aoyama and Jin were regular club goers these days. They were found hopping from bar to bar high on various contraband. Himiko now deeply enjoyed gambling games where lives would be at stake for her to take.

Even Tomura was allowing himself to bask in the darkly tinted scene that was their lifestyle. Only difference was that Tomura didn't go to clubs unless it was for discreet meetings.

He would come back with documents and folders Izuku wasn't sure Nine knew about. His older brother was often out on his free days and sometimes Izuku could overhear conversations that sounded riddled with construction terms. Blueprint. Beam. Asphalt.

Izuku thought maybe Tomura was building something, but whenever he asked, his brother deflected.

Maybe Izuku had it wrong this entire time and all that was a sex thing.

ᔓᔓᔓ

At the end of the dinner everyone left, leaving Izuku and Tomura to wash the dishes alone.

"You don't have to let them sexually touch you," Tomura advised without looking at Izuku. He rolled up his sleeves and lathered up a dirty plate. "Kill the mark before they can go that far. Jin enjoys snuff sex, that's why he always winds up further. Ibara doesn't sleep with the people she kills."

Izuku nodded, silently soaking in the information.

He continued to wash the dishes. He kept his focus on his watery reflection in the dishwater. He could vaguely see an inkling of himself and noticed how shiny and full his curls were.

Tomura then put a hand on Izuku's shoulder and gently turned him so they were facing each other.

Izuku could feel the lecture incoming and awkwardly shuffled on his feet.

“Assignment or no assignment, sex is something you shouldn’t take lightly,” Tomura started. He held an unreadable expression. “You’d ask my permission before you did anything that reckless, wouldn’t you?”

Izuku nodded automatically again. “Of course.”

“Good,” Tomura said. “Especially in the social circles we’re in. With your looks, a lot of people will want to chew you up and spit you out. Or take advantage of you. Or force themselves on you. There’s no need to invite all that outside calumny into your life all because your hormones are running high.”

“What about you? You’re not a virgin and you didn’t tell me,” Izuku grumbled.

“It’s different for me,” Tomura said sharply. He narrowed his eyes and Izuku immediately regretted his words. “Do I have to remind you that only one of us is defective?”

There it was: the broken piece of Izuku Tomura always held over his head.

Izuku thought about the tiny, forbidden kiss he shared in the nook now over ten years ago.

Then he immediately thought about the stranger on the roof who he failed to kill. A direct result of that year he shared with Kacchan.

“Of course,” Izuku murmured, shying away from his secret. “Sorry. You’re right and you know best.”

“Glad you see it that way,” Tomura said. He pushed a stray curl out of Izuku’s face. “You’re going through a lot of changes and your brain is going to make confusing decisions because of new hormones.”

Izuku believed it, but he couldn’t explain why he felt so embarrassed about this topic.

When Izuku didn’t answer, Tomura leaned over the sink tiredly and clasped his hands together. They held eye contact and Izuku noted the immeasurable protectiveness in Tomura’s eyes.

“I’m only like this for your benefit, okay?” Tomura muttered.

“Okay,” Izuku whispered. “I understand.”

Tomura then lifted two fingers to push Izuku’s face side to side, inspecting him.

“You have grown into quite the rare beauty, haven’t you?” Tomura muttered. He sighed as if Izuku’s changing appearance was going to be tiresome. “You’re probably the most striking assassin The Academy has ever owned.”

Izuku’s eyes averted away from Tomura, embarrassed. “I suppose.”

“Not a bad thing, but be mindful,” Tomura warned. “With lethal beauty like that always comes pain.”

Later that night while Tomura was fast asleep, Izuku decided to try to google adult videos on his laptop.

He was undoubtedly curious and there were changes happening in his body that he was admittedly ignoring. Then to top it all off, every single one of his siblings had thrust themselves into their sexualities. Izuku was once again left behind in the pack.

Izuku carefully typed in the taboo search words and waited for the page to load.

Only then did he discover that Tomura put a parental block on all possible porn sites.

Izuku sat there gawking at the giant red exclamation point that told him he could not proceed. Izuku typed in website after website for a crumb of something—but each time was met with a dead end.

He was so flustered he didn't know what to do.

How in the world did Tomura always think this far ahead? Izuku's face burned bright red and he groaned into his pillow.

Then right as he was about to give up hope, Izuku peaked up on top of his book shelf. He saw the romance novel that he only used as a kill count keeper sitting as if it had a glowing light around it.

Izuku knew exactly what page to turn to.

He grabbed it, and for the first time in five years, read the words on the page. Izuku sank into his bed with a candy colored blush shyly. His cheeks reddened upon reading the words, and heat crawled across his skin in a way it hadn't before. He squirmed slightly in his bed and pressed his knees together when he got to the overly detailed ravishing.

This was much more vivid than he remembered it being, but also—it was romantic.

If this was Izuku's only example of sex, he didn't understand why his siblings made it seem so opposite. The sex in this book was soft and it was important to the characters. They were separated for so long that their union boiled over to heated tension.

But the way his siblings discussed sex, it seemed like the act was something solely for pleasure, power, or money.

A dull pang hit Izuku's chest.

He realized he would want to have loving sex like this but probably would never.

Over the next month, Izuku was prepped for his Taiwan assignment in extreme high intensity.

This was one assignment that Nine made clear that the mark could not live under any circumstances. Chih-wei had been wanted in the underground scene of Tokyo for years. Now, he slipped up and was officially located. He had stolen from several drug lords that were some of The Viper Academy's more powerful connections. If they wanted to keep those relationships well watered, Chih-wei's blood needed to be in water.

It was an assignment that only could be entrusted to Nine's best assassins: one of The Viper Seven.

Izuku took it dead-serious. He brushed up on his mandarin, and worked out rigorously with squats and core exercises to tighten up his body. Izuku noted that Tomura stopped hitting him in the face as well during this period.

It seemed like the one perk of being deemed a pretty viper was that his face was off limits.

Jin and Ibara trained him on seduction tactics and it made Izuku burn with his natural shyness. He had to practice a gentler voice and carry all his words like air was gliding beneath them.

Ibara put him through the ringer on how to wear heels and Jin taught him how to show off his lean muscles in a way that was subtle enough to catch people's attention.

By the time Izuku was shipped off to Taiwan, he was certain that he would have a bullet in Chih-wei's skull within twenty four hours.

While in the motel, he unpacked his luggage. Sitting inside of his suitcase were all the clothes for the assignment. On top of that pile: frilly, pink lace panties. The red folder informed Izuku that Chih-wei possessed a dire weak spot for men in lace so this part was important.

Izuku put on the tiny cloth and assessed himself in the mirror. He tilted his head curiously.

He looked soft—and gentle.

Blush gathered across Izuku's face when he realized he liked how he looked. Probably for the first time in his life. His body of freckles didn't feel like a curse, and his reflection didn't disgust him. Slowly, Izuku dragged a finger tip along the hem of the lace.

He considered switching out his boxers for these to enjoy the sensation of feeling beautiful more often.

Izuku nodded, feeling resolved about the topic. He then put on the playboy bunny uniform, fishnets and blue wig without protest.

Izuku turned on his killer politeness.

ɯɯɯ

It was easy to get into Chih-wei's party because like the red folder described—the man held devious eyes for people of Izuku's build and age. The morning before the party, Chih-wei was hand picking the server staff to make sure a 'certain standard' was upheld.

Izuku researched where the auditions were being thrown and weaseled his way into the line up. He kept a flirty gaze like Ibara taught him and allowed himself to be objectified like Jin instructed. He clearly stood out against the other assortment of men and women with his lethal looks.

As if Chih-wei was one of the most predictable people on this planet, he stopped right in front of Izuku. He grinned from ear to ear.

"You," Chih-wei proclaimed with a low whistle while pointing to Izuku. He tipped his golden sunglasses down on the bridge of his nose to get a better look. "You, sweetheart, are definitely hired. Turn around and give me a three-sixty of that perfect body."

Izuku did as he was told, and Chih-wei howled happily.

Izuku coyly smiled and tilted his head to hide his disgust. "Does this mean I'll have some special one-on-one attention as well?"

"Of course, baby." Chih-wei rubbed his palms together and leaned in to whisper against the shell of Izuku's ear, "Come by the VIP section after midnight and I'll make sure you get the full experience. The stars say it's supposed to be a meeting of fate and I think you're mine."

Chih-wei's hand became a little too friendly with the curve of Izuku's backside, brushing beneath Izuku's cheek. Izuku blushed to hide how much he wanted to drive a knife through this pervert's eye.

When Chih-wei handed over the address to his mansion, Izuku happily took it.

ᔓᔓᔓ

While on the way to Chih-wei's mansion, Izuku noted how beautiful Taiwan was. The air was sweet and the people were friendly. The green trees were tall and clustered in a protective way to shelter its population.

In contrast to the peaceful haven the country was, Chih-wei's mansion was the exact opposite. It was large, out of place and a blinding white color. Inside the building were hoards of people gathered around drugs, alcohol, and loud blaring music. Confetti rained from the ceiling with glitter catching the colorful disco lights.

Izuku arrived with the rest of the staff in his uniform and Chih-wei winked at him upon arrival.

When he was given a silver tray to serve drinks, Izuku smiled at how easy this assignment was going to be.

The night went on and Izuku distributed drinks and food with a sweet persona. Several hours wore down without Chih-wei approaching him, but Izuku wasn't worried. All he had to do was wait out the party until midnight and he was sure Chih-wei would take him up to the private bedroom quarters. Izuku would slit his throat, be out the window, and off this island before the sun would rise on Chih-wei's corpse.

As time pressed on, Izuku did become slightly antsy.

He then decided to do a trick Jin taught him to ensure he kept Chih-wei's interest all night.

Izuku discreetly made sure his backside was in view of the VIP section. He bent over ever so slightly to show off all his assets. On cue, Izuku could feel a powerful presence eye-fucking him as he did this. He bent over further, faked picking something up, and the eyes burning into him grew more intense.

Izuku stood straight up again. Now he waited.

It didn't take long before someone tapped him on his shoulder. He assumed it was Chih-wei and his plan worked.

"Hey there," a gruff, distinct voice greeted in horribly annunciated Mandarin.

Izuku froze and all the color in his face drained.

That was definitely not Chih-wei.

The rasp of that voice was so unique that Izuku was sure he heard it once before in German and a second time in Japanese on a rooftop.

There was no way—

"I know this is weird, but I think you're really damn cute," the voice continued and it confirmed all of Izuku's worst fears. "I wanted to, er, see if you would like to go somewhere a little more private?"

Izuku spun around with a face paler than the moon. The blond stranger who Izuku failed to kill was standing in front of him like a ghost with a grudge.

The stranger paled the same as Izuku. Then the terribly handsome face contorted in pure anger.

"You?!" They both exclaimed in Japanese.

Pure chaos ensued.

The stranger grabbed for him, but missed and pulled his wig off. The blue hair went flying into the sky much to Izuku's horror. Izuku cursed under his breath as he broke free from the strong hold.

His green curls were exposed for all to see, and when Izuku cut his eyes over to the VIP section he saw Chih-wei staring wide eyed at the two of them.

Izuku had been compromised—once again—because of this same guy.

A deadly shadow enveloped Izuku's face as his viper instincts kicked in.

He needed to kill his mark now.

He struggled to fend off the blond man who was as strong as he seemed plus more. Without the element of surprise, Izuku was in a grid lock of fight. He tried everything to throw the blond off his tail but found each time he reached for one of his daggers—his wrist froze and he slipped in accuracy.

Damn it all, Izuku thought angrily at himself.

He was once more greeted with memories of his childhood friend upon seeing such beautiful blond hair and scarlet eyes. He could hear Kacchan's voice and feel the tiny kisses on his cheeks.

Izuku willed all those thoughts back to the darkest corners of his mind—but they fought their way out like a worm. Izuku was moving slower, and he was now struggling for his life.

Him and the stranger danced back and forth in a mix of throwing knives, punches and bullets. Izuku hated how his movements were sloppier. And each time he tried to home in on his skillset, his concentration was unwillingly broken down by his mental block.

"What are you doing here?!" Izuku demanded, absolutely distressed.

The stranger yelled loudly, tripping up Izuku and bringing him down to his level. "I should be asking you that, you worthless little—"

Izuku pulled out his fanged dagger and swiped for the stranger's throat in an attempt to prove to himself that he could do it. He could kill this guy—

—But he couldn't.

Now matter how hard Izuku tried, he always froze a millisecond too late. He was being held back by memories of his childhood like ropes wrapped around his wrists, puppeteering his choppy movements.

As he spiraled, Izuku realized that he needed to find a work around swiftly.

He grunted and pushed the larger body off of him. Izuku scrambled up right and once again found himself running away at full speed. He caught sight of Chih-wei being escorted upstairs and ran in that direction.

"Get fucking back here!" The stranger screamed as Izuku started running up a flight of stairs.

“Leave me alone!” Izuku screamed back, angrily glaring over his shoulders. “I told you to stay out of my way!”

Izuku ducked several bullets and used a woman as a human shield to fend for himself. He saw the flash of empathy in the stranger’s eyes and knew the guy would never shoot a civilian. Izuku took this moment to try to get the other off his tail. If he couldn’t shoot his gun then the next best thing would be his shoes.

Izuku chucked both heels at the stranger, happily hitting him in the head twice. The heel hit the blond man in the eye and Izuku used this opportunity to bum rush him. They found themselves toppling off the stairs and landing ungracefully on the cold, marble floor.

Everything after that was a blur. Izuku punched him. The stranger kicked him. Izuku bit him. The stranger slammed him against the wall. Izuku tried to slice his throat and the stranger tried to choke him to death.

Desperation rose in Izuku’s body like smoke from a burning building. It suffocated him from the inside out and clouded his judgment. All he saw was a thick fog of Kacchan.

The memories from that single year were gathering like a ball of snow growing bigger and bigger as everything slid down a hill. When it became too much to maintain, Izuku messed up. He was pinned down entirely by accident. The stranger’s hands struggled their way around his neck and squeezed.

Izuku whimpered in shock.

This was the first time he was bested by someone who was not Tomura.

“I’m going to kill you for what you did to Hiryu,” the stranger promised with a sneer.

At the mention of his dead brother, Izuku squeezed his eyes shut.

Hiryu’s ghost was laughing at him, “Damn. I like this guy, he’s trying to avenge me.”

Izuku began to claw against the stranger but the other man was bigger, and far stronger. The warm body above him pushed its way in between his legs. There was a spark of friction from their pressed pelvises Izuku never felt before.

He jolted, eyes wide as the stranger pressed down on him in a way that nearly felt good.

Startled, Izuku bucked in a poor attempt to throw the other off. But much to his dismay, all it accomplished was setting off the stranger to grind down on him. A flush of heat ran over Izuku when he realized he sort of liked it.

The guy was far too focused on choking him to notice his whimpering wasn’t from the lack of air. But rather he was confused by the strange, new combination of affixation and heat.

Something hard and warm began pressing into Izuku’s cock. Which only worsened his situation.

By the large size and thickness, Izuku presumed it to be a very big gun. How the hell did that guy fit that into his pants without discomfort?

At that, Izuku decided this mission was a wash. Anyone who walked around with a gun that size in their pants sleeve was a specific type of reckless. He needed to get out before he was killed, or worse, the police arrived.

Izuku used all his will power to reach down and grab his last knife. It was tucked securely between his leotard and fishnets. In the process, he ripped his fishnets against the sharp edge of the blade. For some reason, the sound seemed to throw the man above him off his game.

The hands clasping around his throat loosened enough for Izuku to gasp for air.

Intense red eyes burned into Izuku at the same time oxygen slammed into him. The air filled his lungs, and an inordinate amount of pleasure came with it. His senses were amplified an extraordinary amount as he shuddered and his cock pulsed with white heat.

Izuku froze as mortification sunk into his skin. He nearly orgasmed.

The stranger above him was also staring wide eyed.

Shit. These were the hormones Tomura warned him about.

Izuku tried to use the moment to cut the stranger's throat—but his hand holding the knife didn't move.

His face twisted in a vicious snarl and he head butted the stranger instead. The stranger, caught off guard, cried out and cradled his skull. Izuku stumbled upright, and defensively kicked the man in the temple to disorient him long enough to get away.

Izuku ran faster than he ever did in his life.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku was inside his small, remote hotel room that night horrified. He was beat up pretty badly, and was bitterly bandaging his cuts and scrapes. The dingy gray wallpaper inside of the hotel matched how he felt. Izuku laid wide awake, recounting every terrible detail that occurred.

He was stressed out for exactly four reasons.

The first reason: a very real loose end was simply walking and talking perfectly fine.

But worse, from what he discovered tonight, the man was likely a trained professional bodyguard based on how calculated his attacks were. Which meant the likelihood of them running into each other skyrocketed.

Izuku needed to take care of that—but how?

Which brought him to his second, horrible, reason for being stressed out.

He couldn't kill that blond and his defect was growing larger than he ever expected.

Izuku tried everything to cut that man's throat. But each time an invisible string tugged his heart to prevent him from sinking all the way into his deadly persona. That guy was red eyed kryptonite that sucked all of Izuku's killer instinct dry.

Now thirdly: Izuku was grimacing over the very real consequences that would be waiting for him at home. He missed a mark. Izuku never missed a mark. He cowered at the idea of what would be done to him.

Then lastly, Izuku realized that he had gotten turned on during a mission—by the loose end.

Izuku grumpily laid in bed tossing and turning, trying to rid himself of the moment but it wouldn't go away.

The feeling of hands around his throat returned. The hot breath against his ear sunk into his core. The bucking ghosted his hip bones. The squirming etched on his nerve endings. That raspy voice grunting echoed in his memory.

All the blood in Izuku's body went rushing south every time he closed his eyes. He told his body it was wrong. The guy was trying to kill him—that alone should turn any normal person off.

But, Izuku wasn't a normal person. He was a viper.

He laid awake obsessing over the sensation of being underneath the stranger. It didn't help that the guy reminded him a bit too much of Kacchan.

Izuku begrudgingly rolled onto his belly.

He only really had one option to clear his brain.

"I hate this guy," Izuku muttered, flustered.

His hand snuck into the side of the leotard and into the torn hole of the fishnets. He was ashamed of what he was about to do. But he had no choice. He needed to get rid of the imagery that was plaguing him.

Izuku whined desperately as he gripped his pulsing cock and ground onto the bed.

He curiously thought about the sensation he accidentally felt today. Izuku reached up and clasped his free hand around his own throat. He tightened his grip to mimic how he felt before.

Izuku shuttered, shocked that he liked it.

He perfectly pictured the handsome stranger above him for an entirely new purpose.

Izuku suddenly understood what Jin meant by the power of ‘post orgasm clarity’.

It was witchcraft.

His mind felt like it had been bleached of all thoughts concerning red eyes and blond hair. Now he could deal with the very pressing matter of missing his mark.

Izuku recounted what Nine told him about Chih-wei not being allowed to live under any circumstances. He grimaced. There was no way he could go back to Tokyo like this, he would be practically skinned alive by Nine.

The ghost of Hiryu appeared in his head. He was looming in the corner watching Izuku’s next move carefully.

Izuku swallowed. There was one person he knew would help him fix this.

Izuku opened his cell phone and shakily went to his contacts. He pressed the contact that was labeled ‘117’ with shaky fingers. It only took half a ring for his older brother to pick up.

“Izuku?” Tomura’s deep voice asked. “Why are you calling?”

Izuku licked his dry lips. He clutched the bed covers and hung his head.

“I messed up, Tomura. I missed the mark and I was compromised out in the open. He saw how I looked and so did some of his bodyguards. I don’t know if I can get close to him again without raising alarms.”

The silence that followed was potent.

Izuku could feel Tomura’s slow but steady rising anger from way across the East China Sea. Izuku shifted on the old, creaky motel bed and swallowed thickly.

“Send me the information of where you’re staking out,” Tomura eventually said. There was a tightness in his tone that Izuku knew would unravel to anger. “I’ll be on the next flight.”

Tomura hung up without a goodbye.

ɯɯɯ

Izuku braced himself for Tomura’s arrival. He went over every terrible scenario and held back from breaking down by monitoring news outlets closely.

Luckily for him, it seemed like the fiasco at Chih-wei’s mansion barely made headlines. It popped up on the ten o’ clock news as a quick five minute segment: ‘Party Gone Wrong!’ and there were no photos of him anywhere.

Izuku continued to suffer in anticipation for a full five hours until Tomura arrived in Taiwan. He knocked on his door in the dead of night and when Izuku opened it, he was surprised to see both Tomura and Aoyama standing in the doorway.

Aoyama was dressed in his usual, relaxed clothing. His purple t-shirt that read ‘tech nerd’ on it was half tucked into his jeans. On his back was a large, black backpack that had several cords messily sticking out.

Next to him was Tomura, looming like a nightmare.

His head was tilted to the side, unimpressed. The coils of snake tattoos on his neck followed the motion and the piercing on his lip curled with his visible disgust. He was dressed in all black sleuth gear, with a stone cold expression in his eyes that made Izuku shrink.

Aoyama gave Izuku a tiny wave. Tomura stalked inside without a word.

Izuku quickly moved out of his brother’s path. Tomura threw down the giant briefcase on the bed and immediately popped it open. An assortment of guns, knives, and ammo gleamed underneath the naked bulb of the hotel room.

“Sorry.” Izuku didn’t know what else to say. He pulled at his sleeves nervously. “What are we going to do?”

“We are not going to do anything. I am,” Tomura harshly corrected. He cocked his gun and slid several poison vials into his sleeve. He turned to Izuku and jutted his chin towards Aoyama. “Aoyama is going to rewrite some details in The Academy’s system. We’re going to extend your time here by a tiny fraction that won’t cause Nine to notice. Then we’re going to report it as if you killed the mark.”

Izuku balked. They were forging documentation.

That was unheard of—and directly a slight against Nine.

“Should we be doing something like that?” Izuku whispered hastily. “We could get in a lot of trouble.”

“And you could get in more trouble if you report that you missed the mark,” Tomura reminded him. He crossed his arms and glared at Izuku. “For the sake of your perfect kill streak we’re going to stage this mission as if the fluke didn’t happen. If Nine found out not only did you fumble this case but needed backup on your first seduce and kill operative, you’d be painfully demoted.”

“Maybe I deserve to be,” Izuku muttered.

“You do,” Tomura agreed. “But I refuse to have your tarnish attached to me. Anything you do is a direct reflection on me and because of that, little brother, I refuse to let you be dead weight. Are we clear?”

This was mutiny to a degree.

Nine entrusted Tomura with a lot because he was the perfect viper. Nine thought of Tomura as an extension of himself that could do no wrong and would follow every rule to the final detail. But now, Tomura was taking advantage of that fact and going behind their handler’s back.

Izuku lowered his eyes and nodded when he realized he was backed into a corner.

“Yes. We’re clear.”

Izuku could feel the ghost of Hiryu bark out a dry laugh in the corner. “I told you. Feeding right out of the palm of his hands.”

In death, Hiryu was proven correct about his theory about what Izuku would do if it came down to obeying Nine or Tomura.

“Good,” Tomura muttered, annoyed. He pulled out his old porcelain mask that he used to wear on his past missions and hooked it to his face. “I’m going to go out and handle this myself. You two stay here and whatever happens between the three of us stays between the three of us.”

Tomura grabbed his sharpest machete and left into the dead of the night. Izuku watched him go, and it was as if Tomura blended with the blackness effortlessly.

Izuku pursed his lips. He turned to see Aoyama setting up at the shabby desk in the room. The other viper slowly began to pull out three different computers and connected them all with massive cords.

“I’m so sorry for dragging you into this, Aoyama,” Izuku said with a heavy conscience. “I know this was your rest week, I didn’t think Tomura would bring you along.”

“It’s okay, Izuku. I don’t mind.” Aoyama gently smiled and walked over to meet him across the room. He rubbed Izuku’s shoulders affectionately. “If it makes you feel any better, I’m not doing this because Tomura dragged me along. I asked him what was going on and he told me. I volunteered to rearrange the system for you.”

Izuku’s eyebrows shot off his face. “Really? Why?”

“Because without you, I wouldn’t be alive.” Aoyama’s expression melted into a level of pity. “That day you helped me in The Cull really was my saving grace. I do owe you a lot. If that entails using my skills to make you seem like you’re perfect and stay on the team with me, then I’m alright with that.”

“…Thank you,” Izuku said with a sad smile.

Aoyama sadly smiled back at him.

An unspoken understanding settled between the two. Izuku eyed their closely numbered marks. It was then Izuku noticed the fresh tattoo that coiled around Aoyama’s wrist. It was a single pit viper that wrapped around several times, encasing his ‘215’ mark.

Izuku looked at his own bare skin.

He realized he was the only one left of their unit not to have a viper tattoo.

ᔓᔓᔓ

True to Tomura's word, their secret mission within the operative went as planned.

Tomura stalked and found Chih-wei that night. The inexperienced drug lord decided he didn't have his fill of partying after his own was crashed. He was seen going club to club, drinking off the rails recklessly. Eventually, Chih-wei wound up in some underground mahjong gambling scene.

According to Tomura he was surrounded by five, poorly trained bodyguards who were dismissed after the gambling was done. Tomura waited until the five bodyguards were out of sight before closing in. Chih-wei went home with someone for the night with a sloppy, drunk grin.

Tomura took that window to strike and killed both Chih-wei and the unfortunate soul he chose to bed that night.

He hid the bodies and Aoyama reported it as if Izuku was the one who committed the killing.

They took the next flight back home on the tiny, private jet. Izuku couldn't help but ponder what was to come for him. Tomura hadn't said anything, or so much as looked at him. His brother slept quietly on the short flight and Izuku attempted to do the same with little luck.

By the time they arrived back in Tokyo, it was the afternoon. No one noticed Aoyama or Tomura's absence enough to say anything. Tomura gave Izuku the cue to come in an hour later after them, and Izuku followed his lead like always.

When Izuku walked back into their suite, he could feel the sharp edge he was balancing on.

Immediately a shift in the atmosphere occurred. Izuku could feel disappointed eyes digging into him. He looked up to see Tomura waiting for him on the dark, leather couch in the living room. He was sipping on a small glass of wine with one hand and in the other tightly held a dark brown belt.

Izuku kept his eyes down because he knew what was coming.

"Don't you dare move an inch," Tomura commanded coldly.

Izuku nodded and tensed his muscles.

Tomura stood up, towering over him. "Shirt off."

Izuku's fingers shook as he slowly undid each button. He shrugged off his shirt and took his position on the ground, kneeling.

Tomura circled behind him, casting a shadow that made the temperature on his skin drop.

"Remember," Tomura said all too calmly. He snapped the belt in his hands, testing the tension. "This is for your own good."

Izuku wished that was the first and last time Aoyama and Tomura needed to cover for him. But to his dismay, it was not.

The blond bodyguard stuck to him like glue the same as Hiryu's ghost did. Izuku felt like he was in his own personalized version of hell every time he spotted spiky blond hair and red eyes.

He encountered that man everywhere.

He saw him in bars.

He saw him on trains.

He saw him in shady warehouses where drug lords dealt.

Izuku was baffled. What were the chances that the one person he couldn't kill would keep falling in his path? It was shaping up to feel like for every ten assignments Izuku had, one would flunk because of that man.

And each time he failed—Tomura covered it up.

Aoyama would weakly smile at him to give him reassurance. But that inkling of hope would always be violently ripped away by the punishments he endured at Tomura's hand. At first the punishments were regular. Izuku could do the belt. He was used to it and the nerve endings on his back were basically numb after eighteen years.

But with each assignment he flunked, Tomura's patience with him thinned.

"It's been months. How do you keep messing up?" Tomura growled at him one particular night. "Are you that goddamn useless that I have to do everything for you?"

This was the night that life shifted and Izuku would never forget it.

He endured another punishment by the belt—but it didn't stop where it should.

Tomura kicked him hard enough in the side for him to spit up blood. He curled into his body as his brother let out all his frustrations. Kick after kick, Tomura stomped him into the floor in a hateful fit. Each blow was jam packed with resentment and Izuku didn't know where it would stop.

Recently, Tomura was prohibited from hitting Izuku in the face. Nine told everyone in The Academy that Izuku was their new prized gem for seduction cases as his face matured. Izuku was a rare green eyed beauty that was supposed to be taken care of—and because of that his face was to be handled with care.

However, this evening Tomura seemingly struck him in the face on purpose.

He reeled back his leg and gave a swift kick directly to Izuku's eye socket. A black eye and bloody busted lip was left behind.

"Why did I have to get stuck taking care of the most useless person?"

His brother let out an exhausted sigh and calmly stalked off. The door scraped shut, leaving Izuku alone with his pain.

Every possible part of his body ached. His ribs burned. His insides felt twisted out of place. The deep taste of iron was filling his mouth. Izuku sobbed at the agony he was left with. This was more damning than Tomura ever inflicted before.

He knew this wasn't a regular punishment: it was animosity built up for over eighteen years.

Izuku knew deep down Tomura hated him. Tomura cared in a way a parent does but Tomura hated that they were fatefully tied together. Tomura never wanted to be his keeper, yet he was forced to raise a child while he was one too.

Izuku tried to pull himself up by his shaky arms.

He looked up from beneath his disheveled bangs to see the ghost of Hiryu sitting in the dark corner. His dead brother was shaking his head, sad for him.

"He's going to kill you if this continues," Hiryu's phantom whispered with a deep warning. "He's only kind to you if you're of use to him. Otherwise, you're simply a burden he's better off without."

Izuku believed it.

He found an ounce of strength to crawl back to his room like a man who survived the trenches of war. Blood trickled along with him and Izuku could feel his chest break underneath the frustration he held for himself.

He broke down crying that night, defeated.

Why couldn't he kill the stranger?

ɯɯɯ

The morning came and Nine was livid.

He inspected Izuku's battered body like he was a race horse that gained an injury before the competition.

Because of Izuku's busted face and ribs, the next seduction and kill operation was canceled. They were forced to fall through on the assignment, a first for The Academy in ten years. There were no other vipers to replace Izuku while his body healed, and because of that Nine decided to punish Tomura.

Tomura being punished was like Lucifer being cast down from the heavens.

The impact quaked their whole unit and shook The Academy. Tomura was taken to the basement without a fight by the guards. He held his head high.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The night Tomura was released from the basement, Izuku made sure to be cooking in the kitchen before he came home. He figured a warm meal would ease the tension and hopefully spare him Tomura's full fury.

He was watching the news as he chopped vegetables.

The headliner caught his attention: The Scarlet Eyed Killer.

News of this gruesome murder was circulating all around Japan nonstop recently. One of the most prominent crime lords, Imasuji Goto, was gutted like a pig and crucified within his own playground. It was not only shocking, but impressive. Imasuji Goto possessed A+ security and he himself was a powerhouse.

So who could best him? That brutally on top of it?

The answer came in a singular grainy photo. It was a mysterious man dressed entirely in black with only a sliver of his blood splattered eyes showing.

No one knew who he was, but everyone wanted to. However, there was no evidence left behind. No weapon. No DNA. No hint at who it could be. The only thing that pointed to the killer was the grainy photo of CCTV footage.

Deep, viciously scarlet eyes glowed in the dark on the screen.

Izuku slowed his chopping as he stared into them.

Izuku's mind flashed a memory of Kacchan. Then the stranger. Now the grainy photo of The Scarlet Eyed Killer stared back at him with the most bloodlust Izuku ever seen.

While Izuku was deep in a trance, the door opened with a heavy thud.

Izuku tore himself away from the powerful set of eyes on his television screen. He quickly clicked the device off and the new silence seared at Izuku's skin. He turned to greet his brother, but the words caught in his throat at what he saw.

Tomura's once perfect skin looked like it was gassed with some chemical. There were now endless cracks like a broken piece of porcelain along his jaw, brow, and cheeks. It spread from the scar over his eye, stretching over his face like a distorted hand.

It looked painful. But worse, it looked permanent.

Guilt ate away Izuku as he examined his brother's face. Here he was, regarded as the 'rare beauty' of The Academy with a face that was deemed untouchable. Yet now he was responsible for all of Tomura's disfigurement. The scar over his brother's eye from his 13th birthday was always a glaring reflection of his defectiveness.

But now, this. This was something worse.

Izuku's bruises would heal. Tomura's scars would not.

Tomura walked over to Izuku and flopped down a new, red folder on their garnet countertop.

"Your next assignment," Tomura said with no inflection. "It's a silent kill mission." Before Izuku could say anything further, Tomura leaned down and hissed in his ear, "If you screw this up, I'll make sure both of us are permanently deformed for the rest of our lives."

ᔓᔓᔓ

His next mark was a man by the name of Soto Genkai, someone Izuku heard stories about growing up.

Back then, he went by an entirely different alias: The Midnight Butcher.

The vipers in his home would whisper about how the Midnight Butcher would come for you if you didn't pass all your exams. They would all cower in their beds at the thought like he was the boogeyman. But now that boogeyman was retired, and Izuku stood in the shadows about to exterminate him for good.

Soto Genkai messed up before he went away to start a new life. He killed the son of a powerful mobster while the boy was walking home from school one night. The victim was no older than Izuku was now, and the killing was done out of pure lust for murder. No money. No hit. He just wanted to get his ax bloody.

Now that Genkai's location had been found, that mobster wanted revenge for his only child.

Izuku crept into the small home in the dead of night. The sky was a dense cloudy gray and there was a thin layer of fog. Izuku expertly picked the lock on the window with no effort and carefully opened it. He winced as he crouched, his battered body burned still. His black eye, busted lip and limp hadn't gone away but Nine still deemed him in shape enough to execute assignments.

He climbed into the dark house through the window and landed quietly on his feet. Izuku clenched his teeth through his pain and fear. He hoped that this was an assignment that was free of blond hair and red eyes—but of course his fate was cursed with those two things.

When Izuku rounded the corner, vibrant crimson eyes were shining in the moonlit hallway.

They stood there with their guns pointed at each other in tense silence. Izuku tried to breathe in to prepare himself for their routine struggle, but winced instead because of his damaged lung.

Desperation crept into him as he fathomed returning back to Tomura with another failure.

Izuku didn't know what else to do but gaze at the stranger with a silent plea.

The stranger stared at him, taken back.

The guarded face disarmed to reveal softness. The stranger's eyebrows unfurled and the frown on his lips relaxed all the way. His eyes no longer held intent to kill but sincere concern.

A flash of sadness was triggered in those dangerous red eyes.

At the sudden shift, an invisible tug in Izuku's heart pulled him towards the stranger. Izuku felt like he wanted to run into his arms and allow himself to be cradled. He resisted the motion and stayed where he was.

What happened next changed Izuku's whole outlook on the stranger.

The man lowered his gun slowly in their wordless exchange. Izuku relaxed into pure shock. The nameless bodyguard walked over to an unmarked bedroom and unlocked the door. He turned his back to Izuku, exposing a vulnerability.

Izuku's viper knew this was his chance to kill two birds with one stone. He should kill the blond now and rid himself of all future trouble and then kill Genkai.

However, Izuku didn't harm the stranger.

Izuku put his gun away and quietly walked into Genkai's room. He did what he came to do, and it was a kill that Izuku felt was different from all the others. He inserted the poison into Genkai's system while thinking about the unnamed bodyguard. He'd shown Izuku something he hadn't experienced before: mercy.

He finished his job and walked out into the moonlit hallway.

The stranger was standing there, studying him with piercing red eyes. He was trying to decode Izuku with a stoic expression.

Izuku did the same right back, glancing at him once up and down. When his heart skipped an unexpected beat, he decided it was time to go. He turned away, waiting for a knife or bullet to the head but nothing came.

Izuku looked over his shoulder once more at the strange man.

"Thank you," Izuku whispered quietly.

After that, Izuku disappeared quickly before he could hear that voice.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku went home that morning feeling bizarre.

It was as if his consciousness was plucked clean from his skull and placed outside his body. He observed himself submit the proof of the kill. Nine nodded like he always did, and everything went smoothly.

In his suite that day, Tomura's scolding stare was still there.

His brother barely spoke or looked at him during their routine family dinner. The cold shoulder was evident and a chill fell amongst their table.

Ibara wearily glanced between them, specifically eyeing Tomura's new facial scars. Aoyama shifted awkwardly. Jin attempted to throw jokes that didn't land. Himiko was the only one who seemed to be having a good time. She chewed happily on her food watching the two of them like they were a movie. It was clear she was enjoying the prospect of him and Tomura not on good terms.

Their dinner ended with barely a word, and Tomura shut the door to his room without so much as a goodnight. Izuku knew one successful assignment wouldn't earn back Tomura's trust.

But Izuku couldn't focus on Tomura even if he wanted to.

The entire day he had been distracted. The soft gaze the stranger gave kept repeating over and over in his imagination. No one ever looked at him like that before, and it stuck with Izuku.

He now was morbidly curious about what type of person the stranger was.

For the first time, he wanted to run into the nameless man again.

ᔓᔓᔓ

He got his wish sooner than expected. No later than the following week, Izuku came across the unnamed man for an encounter that shifted his viewpoint.

Izuku was on the hunt for a new mark in an underground club in Chiba.

He dressed in a slightly oversized shirt that was able to hide a tiny gun. To make sure he didn't draw unneeded attention, Izuku concealed his black eye and other bruises on his face with make up. He placed a straight black haired wig on his head and combed it neatly.

The yellowish lights were dim and Izuku kept his eyes peeled for any sign that the mark was near. He caught sight of his target from his spot on the dance floor. The man was surrounded by a posse of about nine people.

The mark himself was a middle aged British man with wiry white hair. All around him was a thick crowd of potentially bodyguards in a close protective circle. The mark was blissfully laughing and throwing money in the air at the hired adult entertainment in his VIP section.

Once it seemed like they were all tipsy enough, the group shifted in the dim lights towards the private rooms downstairs.

Izuku followed quietly like a snake, moving fluidly in the shadows. He kept a tactful distance, entirely unnoticed. He entered the downstairs through a dark stairwell. Immediately, his ears were blasted with the sounds of moaning and laughter. Once fully swallowed by the basement, Izuku could clearly see this was a secret sex club.

In several neat rows were large private rooms. Each room was closed off by velvety curtains instead of doors. The seductive giggles and groans of pleasure spilled into the air like music.

Izuku watched from the shadows as his mark moved into the biggest room. The large posse followed suit.

Izuku waited back exactly thirty minutes as one by one different people from the posse left. He counted them and noted that only one person was left in there with the mark.

However, as Izuku watched them leave he saw something strange.

Each time a person came out there was a shocked, disgruntled expression grasping them. One woman had tears streaming down her face while another man was holding his stomach as if about to vomit. The various people stumbled off, and many were cursing under their breath.

Izuku decided to take the small window before whatever fiasco caused him to miss his mark.

He moved to kill with lethal stealth, shifting into the Viridian Viper. His gun was pointed high and his venomous green eyes were dilated wide for any quick movements. He reached a hand forward towards the navy lavender curtain and grabbed it.

He whipped it open. He was ready to fire his gun but halted instead.

The mysterious blond stranger was sitting in the middle of the room on a scarlet red couch.

The man was slouched backwards and holding a glass of whiskey in his hand. His eyes were studying the small tornado he was making in his drink as he swirled it. The wallpaper behind him was a velvet wine color and his hair was haloed like an angel by a neon sign above him that read 'Fateful Meetings' in pink cursive lettering.

Piercing red eyes snapped up to look at Izuku.

The stranger scoffed dryly.

"Of course," The stranger muttered. He exhaled roughly and ran a hand through his hair. The neon lights followed his high cheekbones and Izuku hated himself for how handsome he thought the man looked. "Your mark is already dead."

At that, Izuku staggered. "What?"

The tired stranger jutted his head in the direction of a concealed room behind him. He then said, "go check for yourself."

Izuku did. He cautiously kept his gun pointed at the blond and peered behind the second curtain.

There, on the black satin king size bed, was his mark. The white haired man was lying flat on his side and naked as the day he was born. The man had lifeless pale skin and his eyes were rolled back into his skull. His hand was clutching his chest and his whole body was limp.

“A heart attack," the stranger provided. “He died while trying to have a six way orgy. The greedy bastard took too much viagra and his heart gave out. We might as well call it a truce tonight.”

Izuku whipped his head to the stranger and frowned. “Why would I ever call a truce with you?”

“Because I don’t have the energy to deal with your little ass tonight.” The blond took another swig of his drink and lazily patted the empty spot on the couch. Izuku noted his slurred words and concluded that he was tipsy. “C’mon, sit down. We need to have a talk, Deku.”

“No.” Izuku’s face screwed tightly. “And who is Deku?”

“You,” the stranger said. He pointed his index finger with a burning glare. “You’re Deku, Deku.”

Izuku spluttered. “That’s offensive—”

“—I don’t give a shit, Deku.” The stranger leaned back and rolled his shoulders. “You might as well relax, your job was done for you by Mother Nature. That group of people who left aren’t gonna call the cops or ambulance. They’re all far too high and no one actually gave a damn about this man.”

Izuku wearily looked at his target’s corpse. Then he looked at the blond stranger.

The sign above flickered.

Izuku then gave into temptation for the first time. Little did he know it would be the start of many, many paths this stranger would tempt him down.

Izuku went against all his viper instincts and put away his gun. He slowly sat next to the deadly stranger, crossing a line. Izuku knew he could never come back from this, but his curiosity spiraled out of control.

“Should I pour you a drink?” The stranger muttered casually.

Izuku shook his head. “No thank you.”

“Fair enough.”

The stranger drank a full glass of whiskey in one giant gulp. He gave a throaty groan at the burn as it went down then relaxed against the sofa once more. Izuku gazed on like a moth who finally got close to the flame that hypnotized it.

His eyes and hair look so soft close up, Izuku thought privately. He clutched his hands in his lap to hold down the feeling of want that arose.

“So, what are we going to do about the problem we currently have, Deku?” The stranger suddenly asked.

“I told you to stay out of my way,” Izuku murmured. “There wouldn’t be a problem if you listened.”

“Unfortunately, I can’t do that as you see.” The stranger gestured wide, motioning in the direction of the corpse in the next room. “We both have a job we have to do.”

“I guess.” Izuku pursed his lips. This was probably the closest he was going to come to figuring a way around his Kacchan shaped mental block. “So what are you? A bodyguard for hire?”

“No, I’m a hitman for hire,” The stranger strongly corrected. But he paused and tilted his hand in a ‘so-so’ motion. “…But I’m forced to specialize in bodyguard services because my handler is an uptight old man. He doesn’t want me to get consumed by my ‘unbridled rage’ or whatever bullshit he’s telling himself nowadays.”

“Interesting,” Izuku said slowly.

Usually unchecked rage was a plus in The Academy’s book. Whatever agency this guy worked for must’ve been vastly different—and it only fed into Izuku’s inquisitiveness.

Without being noticed, Izuku scooted slightly closer when the stranger poured himself another drink. This near Izuku could study all the various cuts and marks on the other man’s skin. He wondered what his life was like and if he was similar to Izuku.

“Well, how about you?” The stranger asked.

“I’m a career assassin,” Izuku said vaguely. He swallowed the lump in his throat that was telling him to shut up. “And that means, if you’re mostly a bodyguard and I am hired to kill —”

“—Then that means we’re probably going to be in each other’s way. Over and over and over again.”

They both slumped at the same time.

This meant Izuku was going to continue to screw up his assignments—and if that happened then more severe beatings from Tomura were guaranteed.

As Izuku pondered privately, a warm hand lightly brushed his bruised cheek.

Izuku snapped back so fast the room spun for him.

He whirled on the stranger, hand instantly going for his dagger that was hooked inside his belt loop. He was ready to draw it but stopped when that soft, gentle gaze was staring into him.

Izuku stilled, defanged once again by those striking red eyes.

The stranger moved again. He swiped his thumb against the layer of makeup that was covering Izuku's bruises. Pain bloomed across Izuku's face from the simple touch and he leaned back.

"Wh-What are you doing? Stop," Izuku harshly whispered.

He swatted the hand away from him and blushed at the foreign intimacy of the action. The stranger studied his thumb, rubbing it with his pointer finger carefully. Izuku could see the makeup that came off his face against the stranger's finger prints.

The man's gaze grew serious.

"Who hurt you like that?" The stranger asked.

Izuku blinked once, and then twice. Again—not what he was expecting this guy to say.

"Why do you care?" Izuku defended automatically.

"I don't," The stranger grumbled under his breath as if trying to convince himself. "…But who did it?"

"No one," Izuku muttered. "And I'm not hurt."

Izuku scooted away on the sofa slightly when his heart began hammering—but the stranger only scooted closer.

"Quit lying," the stranger spat distastefully. He angrily gestured up and down to Izuku's whole body. "I saw you last week. You were battered to hell and back, Deku. Your face was basically one large bruise."

"I'm not lying," Izuku defended. His chest tightened and his throat felt heavy with the truth. "I got those injuries on a mission and besides it's none of your concern."

"Oh, cut the shit. I've been fighting you toe to toe since Taiwan. It is extremely fuckin' hard to land a punch on you—especially that many. There's no way you got those injuries on a mission. You're far too skilled for that."

Izuku opened his mouth but he felt caught.

Making up a lie like he told Kacchan when he was little wasn't going to work anymore.

The stranger drew closer again but this time Izuku didn't move—or more so he couldn't. His eyes were locked on the other's and the gravity around them felt heavier. The universe kept Izuku seated in place as their knees slightly bumped. His heart hammered when their shoulders brushed far too close for their relationship with each other.

The stranger moved again. He lifted a hand and hovered it above Izuku's cheek.

Izuku shied his face away a little, and the stranger's gaze grew a thousand times gentler.

“Let me see you,” the stranger whispered.

A tug at his heart. A flutter in his chest.

The intensity between them sharpened and Izuku could feel unspeakable vulnerability coaxed from his core. He didn’t know what the stranger meant, but the plea mixed with that voice made Izuku forget himself.

He forgot why he was here. He forgot his training. He nearly forgot who was asking this of him.

The stranger reached up and pushed the wig on his head backwards. Izuku’s unruly curls sprung free and the disguise dropped to the ground.

Next, the stranger plucked a napkin off the table in front of the sofa. He dipped the tip of it in the glass of water. The stranger’s eyes darted all around Izuku’s face as he delicately cradled Izuku’s cheek with one hand and with the other wiped away the make up with the napkin.

Izuku winced as the pressure was applied. All the pretty makeup was wiped away, revealing the ugly truth underneath.

When the stranger finished wiping his face clean, Izuku felt raw in a way he never had before.

The stranger studied his beaten face with a solemn expression. He placed down the napkin then moved to Izuku’s shirt. Izuku’s hands automatically shot out to grab the stranger’s wrists to stop him.

But red eyes were like molten lava that burned right through Izuku’s defenses.

Izuku hesitantly let go of the stranger’s wrists against his better judgment.

Without breaking eye contact, the stranger unfastened each of his buttons. The calloused hands slid his shirt off his shoulders, leaving a trail of fire on Izuku’s skin where they touched flesh to flesh. The flimsy cloth fell off Izuku’s shoulders and pooled around his elbows.

Izuku’s breathing became uneven as he was put on full display.

The stranger tenderly touched the large bruise on Izuku’s side.

“Whoever did this to you, you should kill them,” the stranger muttered. His brows knitted together in deep contemplation. “You’re more than capable.”

Izuku’s throat tightened all the way. His emotions were coaxed forward by the stranger with little effort like always.

“…I can’t kill them,” Izuku whispered.

“But why not?”

“Because the person is my family. Our relationship is complicated.”

“I killed someone who would be considered my family because I found out he beat my mother.” The stranger glowered at the word ‘family’, as if it tasted bad. “If they deserve it, they deserve it—and whoever did that to you definitely deserves it.”

Izuku wasn’t phased at the murderous confession, he had heard and seen much worse.

“Why are you so weird tonight?” Izuku asked, deflecting. He curiously eyed the other’s borderline drunken state and how unnaturally close they were. “You should be at my throat by now, not giving me life advice.”

“Don’t feel like fighting.” The stranger shrugged, shoulders heavy. “Not too long ago I found out who my biological father is after thinking it was someone else for eighteen goddamn years. Today is the death anniversary of who I thought was my father. I went to his grave and…I felt like I didn’t belong there.”

Izuku was surprised at the vulnerability. His arms itched to hug the stranger, but he stopped himself.

“That’s terrible,” Izuku said sadly. “I’m so sorry.”

The stranger snorted sarcastically. “No you’re not.”

Izuku was, though. But he didn’t push back because the stranger was right to doubt him.

They weren’t friends. They were actually very far from it: likely doomed to be enemies until one of them finally killed the other. But, in this oddly peaceful moment, Izuku dared to think maybe in another lifetime they could have been the best of friends.

The stranger pursed his lips to the side and crossed his legs. He made their proximity painfully obvious when his whiskey tinted breath brushed Izuku’s lips.

“I used to know a boy whose brother would beat on him similar to how you’re injured,” the stranger confessed. “I used to tell myself I would slit his brother’s throat for hurting him so badly all the time. Maybe that’s why I get so goddamn mad when I hear about people beating on others.”

“…Did you ever kill his brother?”

“No. Never got the chance,” the stranger said. He grew quiet and his eyes stared past Izuku into a far off memory. “My biggest regret is leaving him with his abuser.”

Abuser.

Izuku never considered that word.

He recounted all the punches, slaps, and broken bones he obtained from Tomura. He recalled the moment Tomura nearly gouged his eye out when he was seven and he needed to wear that bandage for so long.

Would Tomura be considered an abuser?

Was that even possible in their world?

Izuku didn't know.

The two teens sat next to each other in silence, each in their own head.

The muffled music and dancing feet from the floor above echoed around them as they did nothing. The stranger kept his eyes on Izuku's injuries in a sad way, and Izuku kept his head down, thoughts full of what exactly his brother was to him.

"Well, I have to get going, Deku."

Izuku nodded. He moved to pull his shirt back on, but a hand shot out to stop him.

"I got it," the stranger said. He offered up a lopsided grin that terribly reminded Izuku of how Kacchan used to smile. "I'm the one who unbuttoned you, the least I can do is put you back right."

Izuku nodded and offered a small smile. "You're quite the gentleman."

"I try to be."

The drunk stranger shuffled in closely. It was clear the alcohol was driving a lot of this interaction, but Izuku took it regardless.

With clumsy hands, the stranger buttoned him, laughing as he missed buttoning some and needed to start over. He carefully smoothed out Izuku's shirt collar when he was finished as if Izuku was someone else. Then he picked up the forgotten wig and placed it sillily on Izuku's head with a pat.

The stranger stood up and Izuku noted his height change since Vienna. His shoulders were getting broader and his hair was growing slightly longer into more eye-catching spikes.

"Next time I see you there won't be a truce," The stranger slurred. He narrowed his eyes in a way that wasn't intimidating. "So, be ready or stay out of my way."

Izuku waved the stranger off. "I got it. See you around."

"Yeah…See you around, Deku."

An unreadable emotion poured from those captivating red eyes.

Then just like that, the stranger was gone.

Izuku stared after him, feeling a sore spot inside his chest grow three times bigger. He suddenly was hurting. His body. His head. His heart. Izuku slowly touched his cheek where the stranger cradled him and was surprised to feel wetness there.

A lone tear escaped out of his eye.

Why do I feel like I should miss him?

One Year until The Incident

The stranger lied to both himself and Izuku when he said that there wouldn't be anymore truces. There had been several over the next year, but they were silent exchanges.

It started when they resumed their normal struggle. It was their very own tango of push and pull involving guns and knives. They would always try to kill each other with no luck.

However, in between these violent moments was a soft spot.

Whenever Tomura's beatings were in full swing it seemed like the stranger could tell. There would always be a give away such as Izuku limping. Or him leaning his weight off one side. Sometimes it was Izuku slower than usual or wincing when he would try to kick at him.

Recognition would flash in the stranger's eyes and he would stop.

One particular night by the ocean stood out to Izuku.

Izuku's mark had gotten away in a dramatic frenzy via a speed boat. Izuku tried to chase after him, but instead the stranger tackled Izuku into the water in a gigantic splash. They went spiraling down, and the second they swam back to the dock, they began their usual tussle.

While dripping wet, the stranger slashed Izuku's shirt when Izuku moved a millisecond too late.

The blade cut the fabric clean open to reveal dark, bloodied bruises all along his torso.

The stranger's eyes widened and both of them grew pale.

Izuku instantly felt exposed and embarrassed. Like a secret had gotten out, or like he somehow disappointed the man in front of him. He quickly clutched his wet shirt close to hide the proof of Tomura's rage but it was too late.

The stranger lowered his knife.

"I'm done fighting you tonight," the stranger said. He flung his blade into the wooden surface between them with a dirty look. "The mark is safe."

Izuku hung his head, looking anywhere but those weakening red eyes. The water droplets from his hair dripped one by one, counting the passing seconds. He didn't move, too focused on his torn up shirt and how he would get home without drawing attention to him.

As if the stranger could read his mind, the man walked right up to Izuku.

Izuku was about to swing his knife, thinking it was another attack—but instead the stranger pulled his own shirt over his head. He wrung it with his hands, and shook it out to the best of his abilities.

Then he thrusted the shirt into Izuku's chest.

Izuku blinked, confused. His eyes ranked up and down the man's chest, noting how built he was underneath the single layer of clothing.

"Take it," the stranger grumbled. "Or don't. I don't care."

Izuku hesitantly took it.

"Thank you?"

"…Don't mention it. Ever."

No more words were exchanged as Izuku discarded his torn shirt in exchange for the new one. He pulled it over his head with shaky hands and the smell of cinnamon and caramel overtook him. Izuku blushed a bit, realizing this was the stranger's natural scent. It was strong and potent—exactly like he was.

Izuku glanced down at the white skull logo in front. The shirt was about five sizes too big for Izuku and would probably raise harmless questions if Tomura ever saw it.

This is really kind of him, Izuku thought.

The stranger turned his back on Izuku and Izuku gazed on after him. The sound of the ocean waves moved in tempo with his beating heart as Izuku watched him disappear into the darkness.

Izuku's stomach knotted in a way it never had before as he clutched the hem of the shirt.

ᔓᔓᔓ

He was nineteen now and all his fixations were on the blond haired stranger that reminded him of Kacchan. He felt like he was betraying his childhood pretend-husband in a way, but his fascination for the blond grew each encounter.

Sometimes Izuku found himself studying the stranger through the bullseyes of his sniper rifle if he didn't have to get close to the mark.

On those nights, Izuku realized there was a lot you could learn about a man through a sniper rifle.

He learned the stranger smoked once with a mark and decided he didn't like it. He also learned the stranger was a natural blond based on his roots. And he learned the stranger knew he was handsome by the way he cockily smirked anytime someone hit on him.

But most importantly, Izuku learned how gentle he was.

One day, through the lens of his sniper rifle, Izuku witnessed the stranger picking up a wounded love bird. The stranger held the tiny bird in his hands, and carefully tended to it until it flew away again.

The stranger smiled at the sky and Izuku's heart fluttered at the sight.

When Izuku ran into the stranger again, he let himself get purposefully caught in the middle of a fight.

It had been the two of them in a dingy warehouse. The mark successfully escaped and no other witnesses were around. Izuku called the mission a wash a long time ago, but decided he wanted to stay a bit longer with the stranger.

It was a risky move but Izuku itched to be closer to the guy.

"I've got you now," the stranger exclaimed as he roughly pushed Izuku down in a chair. "I'm going to make sure you don't fuckin' get away this time and I'm calling my supervisor so he can see I'm not making you up."

The stranger was short of breath, clearly untrained in the way Izuku was. Izuku hadn't broken a sweat yet, and pretended to struggle as he was tied up to the flimsy chair.

"Oh no," Izuku said in the most convincing voice he could, but he was enjoying this. "Don't tie me up."

The stranger restrained his wrists with the rope to the point it burned a little. Izuku tested the strength out by pulling his wrists apart and noticed it was a shoddy job. He could get out at any time he wanted, but stayed happily trapped.

The stranger stood in front of him with the meanest expression he had ever seen.

Izuku curiously gazed at him, happy to be close again.

As the stranger pulled out his phone, he was about to dial a number then paused.

The stranger glowered unhappily.

"You still haven't killed the person hurting you?" the stranger asked.

Izuku realized the stranger was glaring at his neck. A deep blush spiked from his collar bone to his face when he realized where he obtained those bruises from.

Izuku had been trying to find ways to mimic getting choked while he masturbated. He accidentally choked himself a little too hard and now hand prints were around his delicate neck.

"He didn't give these to me," Izuku admitted. "I got these…during sex."

Silence.

He didn't know what possessed him to say that.

The stranger gawked in appall then grew uncharacteristically quiet. His eyes raked up and down Izuku's body as if assessing something.

Izuku eyed the phone in the man's hand and realized he didn't move to dial anyone. Another bad move.

"Well, tell whoever is fucking you to choke you properly or not at all," the stranger grumbled. His cheeks tinted pink. "Those aren't the bruises of someone who is doing it right."

Izuku squirmed a bit in the chair. He studied the stranger wondering how he knew that.

"How can you tell?" Izuku asked calmly.

The stranger frowned. "Easily."

The simmer in Izuku's belly grew. He imagined the veiny hands squeezing his neck again and cleared his throat. Izuku knew he was playing with fire but took the plunge into the deep end.

"What's the difference?" Izuku whispered.

"What type of inexperienced shit bags have you been with exactly?" The stranger lectured. "The difference between how you choke a lover and someone you're trying to kill is night and day."

Izuku licked his lips hesitantly as he tested a line.

"Can you show me?" Izuku asked in his airy voice.

The stranger looked at him dumbfounded, but a blush grew on his cheeks. His lips curled into a mean snarl and he cocked his head.

"You want me to show you how to be choked out?"

Izuku knew this was absurd but he still pressed on. "For future reference of course."

"You're insane," the stranger deadpanned.

He shook his head, and ignored Izuku. He turned back to his phone and began to text someone.

But Izuku's curiosity couldn't be killed. He'd been thinking about their closeness since Taiwan and despite all his best efforts, he couldn't recreate how it felt. He blushed a bit, thinking about it. But then decided he knew how to get what he wanted.

According to Ibara, Izuku had a specific allure to him.

She told him all he needed to do was lean his head to the side and let his bangs fall in his face. He could stretch his neck to the side a bit and show off how far his freckles went to add to his target's imagination. Then to hook them, he could subtly make his eyes half lidded.

Izuku did just that. Immediately it affected the man in front of him.

The stranger grew quiet as he took in the way Izuku's restrained chest breathed in and out. Full attention was on his body so Izuku tested his chances further.

"Please?" He begged quietly.

The stranger put away his phone and stepped forward.

"I'm only doing this because I can't stand to see people not practicing rough sex safely," the stranger barked. He was glowering, as if he wasn't about to enjoy what was to come. "It's how false information spreads and people get hurt."

Izuku nodded, eyeing the knife in the other's hand. It was still drawn and contained a bit of Izuku's blood on it from earlier. The man could easily slit his neck if he wanted to.

That thought alone made Izuku slightly more excited than it should have.

"First, you place your hands like this," the stranger said slowly.

The warm hand encompassed Izuku's throat and they held eye contact for several moments. Izuku could feel his heart rate skyrocket and the stranger swallowed thickly.

Red eyes danced down to his parted lips.

"After that you add just enough pressure on the carotid arteries on either side to obstruct oxygen flow to the head," the stranger whispered and did exactly what he said.

Izuku exhaled roughly through his nose.

They didn't break the long gaze they were trapped in as the hand around Izuku's throat clasped tighter.

"This way you don't crush your partner's windpipe," the stranger muttered when Izuku whined slightly. "The effect of lightheadedness is the same without the possibility of long term damage. And it's the right amount of safe that it's easy to recover from later."

Izuku felt light as a feather.

His eyes fluttered closed as he leaned into the stronghold. Slowly, the fingers around his throat began to experimentally massage into his neck. Izuku craned himself more, as his toes curled. This was very much different than how the stranger choked him before.

It was gentler but just as effective.

His eyes relaxed open so he could examine in the stranger's appearance. He never noticed how much the stranger had changed since Vienna but the difference was stark. His eyes were sharper. His cheekbones were chiseled and his chest was broad and wide. The leather jacket he was sporting complemented the silver chain that dangled around his thick throat.

But even more so, Izuku noted all the growing muscles. He looked as strong as he was now.

Izuku squirmed slightly at the mildly impure thoughts that passed through his head. The stranger let out a dry, sharp scoff.

"You're more twisted than I thought, Deku."

Izuku was then ripped out of his daze when the alarm on his watch went off.

It was a specific sound he set for whenever Tomura texted him. The thought of his older brother was like ice water dosing out whatever heat gathered in the moment. Izuku's eyes snapped open and the stranger frowned at Izuku's smartwatch. Izuku lurched back to free his neck from the hold and gave a sheepish smile.

"Ah, that's my cue," Izuku said. He twisted his wrists and ankles around in the rope and freed himself. "Sorry about that but thank you for the lesson."

"What the hell—"

The stranger didn't have much time to react. He was staggered at how easily Izuku freed himself from the ropes.

Within a blink of an eye, Izuku knocked him back on his ass with a swift kick.

ᔓᔓᔓ

By the time Izuku realized he had a crush, it was too late to stop it.

He realized it on an assignment to the beautiful city of Yokohama.

He had never been there before, and he was fascinated at how pretty it was during this time of year. The blue sky felt richer than it did in Tokyo and the bright Ferris wheel was perfect.

He had been hunting a mark who was an avid concert goer. The red folder informed his next concert was for Utada Hikaru at the Yokohama Stadium. The place was huge and packed to the brim with pulsing lights and people. Rows and rows of concert goers were dressed in rave gear waving neon glow sticks. To blend in, Izuku dressed himself in a hat, jean shorts, and a regular shirt.

Well.

Not just any regular shirt.

He put on the black shirt the stranger gave him.

He didn't know why he chose it. Nowadays he found himself wearing it casually at home, to the movies, sometimes even in the park. It was his new favorite article of clothing. Tomura asked him why he bought it so large and Izuku lied and said he liked the baggy feeling. His brother didn't question it and Izuku never led on for it to be anything else.

Izuku happily played with the hem of his new favorite shirt as he purchased a large cherry slushy.

Aoyama was able to secure a ticket for him that was exactly three rows behind his mark. It would give Izuku enough distance not to be noticed, but allow him to follow the man directly after the concert.

He took his seat, and was happy that he could see the mark exactly where he was supposed to be.

However, despite his perfect station, his view was eventually obstructed.

Directly in front of him were two people loudly making out. The sounds were awful and lewd. Izuku scrunched up his face at the obscene lip smacking and frenzied groping. He craned his neck to see who possessed the galls for this during an Utada Hikaru concert.

Izuku couldn't catch a glimpse of the couple's faces as they were mushed into each other too hard. But he could discern that it was a larger blond man and a small black haired man. The black haired man was stationed comfortably in the blond's lap and his big head was blocking Izuku's view.

He tried to peer around them—but it was useless.

When the second opener started, Izuku grew progressively agitated. He groaned out loud, hoping the two people making out like starved rabbits would get the hint. Didn't they know PDA was unacceptable? Especially in this type of venue?

Izuku was about to reprimand them, but stopped when the black haired man finally pulled back from the kiss. The couple's blushing faces were revealed and Izuku's stomach dropped to the ground.

It wasn't any blond stranger—it was his blond haired stranger with his eyes half lidded and biting his lip.

His gaze was the same one that he'd given Izuku in Vienna.

"God, you're so fuckin' perfect, Mako," The stranger cooed.

Cutthroat green eyes locked onto the black haired man.

Izuku never felt jealousy before. He read about it in books but no piece of literature ever properly described the ugly churning that grew inside of him at that moment. It was dark, and more overwhelming than he ever gave it credit for in movies. Izuku clenched his fists when the two hungrily kissed again.

The second opener introduced Utada Hikaru and all around him the rows of people stood up. The audience jumped excitedly, waving glow sticks and throwing glitter. Izuku stayed seated watching the two lovers in front of him with a bitter gaze.

What happened next, Izuku would say, wasn't entirely him. It was another green eyed monster but it was as sinister as The Viridian Viper.

Izuku stood up slowly with his slushy. Without making it too obvious, he tipped the cup lightly. All the cold, red liquid directly poured onto the black haired man.

A scream erupted so loud everyone in their section flinched and stopped dancing.

“What the hell!” The man named Mako yelled.

He scrambled off the blond stranger’s lap and everyone whirled around to stare at Izuku. Izuku feigned innocence, gasping and covering his mouth. He muttered apologies and quickly bowed to hide the shock he held towards himself. Jealousy really was a powerful emotion.

When he peeked from under his hat, both Mako and the stranger were staring at him.

Instantly, the blond stranger’s face fell when he recognized Izuku. Maybe the stranger was here on an assignment like he was, Izuku realized. It made sense. They were similar, always working deadly jobs and a mark was exactly three rows ahead.

Izuku patiently waited to be ousted per their routine, but it didn’t happen.

Mako groaned and put his hands up. “I’m going to go clean up, I can’t believe this.”

Mako stalked off, dripping red slushy from his head all the way to his toes. The blond stranger stared at Izuku in silent assessment. The stranger’s eyes raked up and down and a scowl pulled at his lips at the sight of his shirt. Instead of saying something, the stranger shook his head in disapproval. The blond followed behind the unhappy black haired man without so much as a second glance at Izuku.

And it irked Izuku.

The stranger had never ignored him before.

Izuku glanced at his target who was waving two white glow sticks to the rhythm of the song, then he looked at the two men who were walking towards the bathroom, outside of the arena.

Izuku knew he shouldn’t have followed but he was undoubtedly curious.

He trailed quietly to find Mako storming into the bathroom and the stranger waiting outside scrolling on his phone. Izuku didn’t know what came over him. Stop it, he told himself. Go back and watch the mark. But despite himself, like always when it came to this man, he walked right over to the stranger.

Upon seeing him, crimson eyes were furious.

The stranger quickly glanced at the bathroom door and then stormed towards Izuku. Without a word he grabbed Izuku by his elbow and dragged him around the corner out of sight. He slammed Izuku into the brick wall with all his strength and pinned him against the wall with his forearm. His nostrils flared like a bull about to charge for the kill.

“Why the fuck are you here?” The stranger spat, and Izuku was admittedly happy to have his attention.

“Same reason you probably are,” Izuku said easily. He didn’t move to unpin himself. “Aren’t you guarding my mark?”

“For once, no. I’m not on an assignment, Deku. I’m on a date.”

“A date?” Izuku’s eyebrows furrowed and the bitter taste inside of him intensified.

“Yes, Deku. A date that you probably ruined by pouring slushy all over the guy I’m trying to ask to be my boyfriend.”

Boyfriend.

That single affectionate word made Izuku’s world stop spinning.

He could see all the hand holding, kissing, and hugs that came along with that title flash through his mind. His stranger was on a date like a normal person which meant he most definitely was not like Izuku. He was an inkling bit normal and allowed to feel lo—

“You did that on purpose didn’t you?” The stranger said, cutting off Izuku’s thoughts.

“No, I didn’t,” Izuku lied through his teeth. He churned unhappily as his thoughts stayed caught in the imagery of the stranger having a lover. “It was an accident.”

“There’s no such thing as accidents when it comes to you,” the stranger said in a short tone.

The stranger eyed Izuku up and down, and removed his arm.

Izuku stayed pressed against the wall with a sour expression.

They stared at each other in a quietness that felt different than all the other times. Usually they were at each other’s throats or the stranger was giving him a pity filled stare. But this time, he was looking at Izuku with disgust—like he wasn’t worth his time.

“I’m going to get back to my date,” the stranger said. “Leave me the hell alone for the rest of the concert or I’ll kill you.”

The stranger turned his back on Izuku and marched around the corner.

“Fucking freak.”

It was murmured so soft Izuku nearly missed it. But the stranger said those two words under his breath so viciously that it cut right through all of Izuku’s thick skin.

Fucking freak.

It hurt in a way that Izuku knew shouldn't.

They didn't know each other. They didn't even like each other. But Izuku felt ugly. He felt ashamed for what he'd done and the label 'freak' stuck to him like it was written all over his forehead. However, he couldn't help but want the stranger's attention again. No matter how angry. Or furious. Or laced with the intent to kill.

But nonetheless, Izuku was given absolutely nothing for the first time.

Tediously, Izuku peered around the corner to see the stranger meet up with Mako.

The stranger affectionately rubbed the flustered man's shoulders to calm him down. Once it seemed like Mako rebalanced, they began to return to their seats. A single, unhappy glance over the shoulder was all Izuku was given before the stranger wrapped his arm around Mako protectively.

Izuku stood there, greener than he ever felt.

"It seems like all you'll ever have is that piece of cloth," Hiryu's ghost said pointedly. "Mako gets the rest."

Izuku's eyes teared up as he tugged at the hem of the oversized shirt. He was jealous of Mako and envious of the stranger.

Together, they both basked in a light Izuku would never see.

His eyes welled up at the thought of Kacchan.

ᔓᔓᔓ

What happened next would be the last domino placed into a long string of events that went tumbling into oblivion. It would affect more people than Izuku would know, and it would be the beginning of his life fully unraveled down to its hinges.

Izuku cut the mission short to return to Tokyo, where things made sense.

He couldn't stay seated behind the blond stranger and his date after that. Like a bat to the face, Izuku painfully admitted he had a full blown crush. What was worse he had a crush on a man whose name he didn't even know and the guy surely hated him.

During the middle of the concert, the mark decided to go for a refill of his Pepsi.

Izuku followed the mark. He slipped the man a drop of poison that absorbed through the skin. It was the tiniest interaction to administer it, the brush of their hands in passing. The poison was slow acting, and Izuku waited outside for his confirmation versus returning back to his seat.

Right on time, within the next hour the sound of ambulances could be heard in the distance.

A body bag was carried out of Yokohama stadium and Izuku quietly disappeared into the night.

He cried all the way on the commute back to Tokyo. He didn't know what came over him but he was unable to put a stop to the tears. He softly cried with his head down the whole time, watching as wetness gathered on the oversized shirt.

The jealous monster inside of him was replaced by the lonely boy he was. He repeated what the stranger had called him.

Freak.

Izuku walked into Hadeus with his head down.

His arms were crossed defensively over his chest as he lugged his tired body along. He didn't know what to do now. But knew he needed to figure out how to kill this growing crush before it devoured him whole like Hiryu.

Izuku routinely walked past a fancy restaurant near their home. It was one of Tomura's favorite spots because it was the center of all organized crime in the city. Yakuza, mobsters, and criminals all alike gathered here for private meetings that the governor turned a blind eye to.

Which is why Izuku wasn't surprised to see Tomura across the street walking in. However, what he was surprised about were the two people his brother was with. Izuku's pace slowed when he recognized one man as Chisaki Kai, the Yakuza heir. He'd only seen the man from afar but he knew what he looked like with his crow-like features and reddish brown hair.

However, the man next to Chisaki was the one who made Izuku stop walking entirely.

It was their Grand Father, One.

Somehow, he was more threatening in person and his stature was muscular for a man of his age.

His curly hair was pure white now and the power he radiated was tangible. There was a dark gleam in his piercing red eyes that Izuku had never seen. To top this all off, he was sharply dressed in a clean black pinstripe suit and decorated in mountains of golden jewelry. In his right hand was a gold cane in the shape of a hissing viper with diamonds as eyes.

One touched Tomura's shoulder like he was a son to him.

Tomura held the door open for the two men and glanced over his shoulder carefully. Then he did a double take when he caught sight of Izuku standing like a statue.

Quickly, Tomura said something to One and Chisaki. He then hurried across the busy street to Izuku. Izuku peered around his brother to see the two powerful men take a table inside the restaurant as if this wasn't the first time they met all together.

“Izuku, what are you doing back in Tokyo so early?” Tomura immediately asked, skipping hello. “Your mission isn’t scheduled to finish until tomorrow night.”

“I disposed of the mark early,” Izuku muttered. His brows pinched together and looked at Tomura suspiciously. “Was that Chisaki? And One?”

“…Yes,” Tomura said. He folded his arms and leaned down to Izuku’s height. His gaze grew the most serious Izuku ever saw it become. “Don’t tell Nine. It’s a private meeting between the three of us.”

Izuku looked at his brother sideways, not liking those implications. “What would you have to meet privately about with One and Chisaki that Nine couldn’t know?”

“Nothing that you have to worry about. Are we clear?”

“He’s up to no good,” Hiryu’s ghost murmured. “I told you.”

Izuku’s bloodshot eyes flickered between his brother and the door across the street. As he did this, Tomura was watching him like a cobra. Surely he was looking for any indication that Izuku would tell and how to make sure he didn’t—and that threatening glare alone made Izuku take a large step back.

“We’re clear,” Izuku whispered. He curled into himself when the energy shifted darkly. “I won’t tell anyone.”

“Good.” Tomura studied him for a millisecond longer. “Now go home. If anyone asks where I’m at, say I’m running errands for an upcoming assignment.”

Izuku nodded and did as he was told.

He walked home in the howling wind. It was like the breeze was pushing him to go back and figure out what was happening. But his fear of Tomura’s rage was more compelling.

Izuku walked home, ignoring the feeling of Hiryu’s phantom eerily pointing to the restaurant.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku stayed wide awake in his bed all night. He laid on his side, gazing out the large window to their neon city. His sad reflection was ghosted back to him and in the haze, he could see a blend of him and Hiryu. The events of the evening replayed in his head as he softly cried.

Then the door opened carefully.

It was pushed open so softly Izuku almost missed it. It was as if Tomura was sneaking in after being out all evening. Which he was, was the killer part. It was the dead of night, and Izuku wondered what exactly Tomura needed to discuss with both Chisaki and One for so long that he missed their scheduled family dinner.

Next, the door to his bedroom opened suddenly.

Izuku quickly wiped his face, disguising his weakness. He peaked over his shoulder to see Tomura looking at him in the dark room.

“Ah. You’re awake,” Tomura said, surprised. “I was checking in on you.”

Izuku sat up on the bed. “I didn’t tell anyone about the meeting, if that’s what you’re wondering.”

Tomura nodded in approval and Izuku realized how tired his brother seemed.

Tomura dragged his feet a bit as he walked inside of Izuku’s room. His brother peered around and glimpsed at the decoration Izuku had done recently in his re-found interest for fictional romance.

Izuku had a large book shelf of newly released romance novels. It was all organized by the author and he gave his favorites golden star stickers on the spines. On his wall were vintage posters from movies such as Casablanca, In The Mood For Love, and Drowning Love next to his extensive dagger collection.

Tomura then glanced at Izuku.

“Were you crying?” Tomura asked.

“No,” Izuku quickly replied. He shifted uncomfortably, and wiped at his eyes to make sure no tears were showing. “My allergies are acting up, that’s all. It’s that time of the year.”

“Izuku. You’re lying again.” Tomura exhaled and his shoulders sagged. He tiredly sat down on the edge of the bed to look Izuku in the face. “I know what your eyes look like when your allergies are irritated. I’ve raised you since I was seven. Did you mess up on the mission again?”

“No, I promise. It’s allergies.”

“Izuku. Tell me the truth.” Tomura’s face hardened sternly and he narrowed his eyes. “We have our one rule: lie to everyone but me.”

But Izuku had been lying to Tomura ever since Vienna for a very blond reason.

“…I’m lonely, Tomura,” Izuku said as honestly as he could. He looked at the In The Mood For Love poster across the way. He studied how they gazed at each other and longed for it too. “I was crying because I’m stupid and lonely.”

“Why are you lonely?” Tomura frowned. His brother gestured to the large bookshelf and movie posters behind him. “You have me, your books, your movies and everything you could ever ask for. Not to mention everyone else like Ibara and Aoyama—”

“—No, not like that,” Izuku quickly cut off. He sighed and waved his hands. “It’s okay, forget it. Goodnight, big brother.”

Izuku turned to fall asleep but Tomura caught his shoulder and forced him to face him.

“Izuku. Explain,” Tomura said seriously. “Is this why you’ve been messing up on your missions recently?”

There was a comfort in his brother’s eyes that was rare, but when it did show up Tomura wouldn’t back down until he got some sort of answer.

“No, it’s nothing to do with my missions,” Izuku lied halfway, protecting his true weakness. “It’s my defect. It makes me lonely, that’s all. I saw a couple on the train and—and it made me lonely.”

Tomura sat up straight, taken back. “All this fuss because you want to have a girlfriend?”

Izuku peered at the stranger’s black shirt hanging off the side of his dirty hamper.

“A boyfriend—more specifically,” Izuku muttered with a blush.

“Ah. You’re gay.” Tomura sucked his teeth and cocked his head at a thought that passed through his mind. He nodded slowly. “That…makes sense.”

Embarrassment ate Izuku from the inside out. How did he come to a point in his life where he was admitting his potential sexuality to Tomura of all people?

“I-I keep trying to push down my defect,” Izuku whispered. “But it keeps coming up. I keep wanting in a way I know I shouldn’t and it makes me feel uneasy. I’m sorry, I know you don’t want to hear this.”

“No, I do,” Tomura countered.

Tomura lifted a hand to move a curl out of Izuku’s face.

Izuku turned at the familiar motion and was surprised to see his brother gazing at him with a contemplative look. He was expecting coldness, or a lecture but this was different—and it felt a bit too easy.

“I’m happy you could tell me this versus imploding and doing something idiotic like Hiryu,” Tomura continued. “But, how about we put this on hold in the meantime and you don’t act on anything until you get approval from me. Okay?”

Approval?

Izuku drew a blank on what Tomura exactly meant by that.

But still, Izuku apprehensively nodded and weakly said, “okay.”

Tomura gave him a tight smile. “Don’t worry. I’ll figure a solution out like always, but give it time.”

He had no choice, really.

“Of course,” Izuku said. He smiled to hide his unease.

Tomura exhaled and stood up from the bed. He cracked his knuckles, and Izuku caught the blood speckles that were littered across his brother’s forearms. Tomura walked towards Izuku’s bedroom door and gave him a single, unreadable glance.

“Goodnight, Izuku.”

Izuku clutched his comforter.

“Goodnight, Tomura.”

If Izuku was told to pinpoint the epicenter of all his mistakes, it would land here.

Year of The Incident

A year passed and Izuku forgot all about the conversation. He wrongfully assumed Tomura did too.

He continued about his life like those two particular days didn’t happen. Izuku tucked the stranger’s shirt away at the bottom of his drawer. He didn’t wear it anymore after that in hopes of starving out his crush. But, despite his best efforts, Izuku’s crush grew even without him feeding it. It grew and grew until he was having dreams about the stranger and dreams about Kacchan.

By the time he was twenty, Izuku also came to terms with his mental block.

He was doomed to always fuck up when red eyes and blond hair were involved. Instead, he found ways around it. Such as, he discovered he could shoot the stranger in the foot or in the leg. He could slice at him in an area that was non-lethal and his brain would be more kind to him.

As long as he wasn’t going for the kill then he wouldn’t be stunted.

As a result, Izuku found the tiniest bit of pleasure in toying with the guy. It was oddly fun to get under the hotheaded man’s skin.

“Your aim is worse than usual today,” Izuku would sometimes tease as he easily deflected any attacks. “Off your game?”

“Oh fuck you, Deku.”

He enjoyed the vicious rise that would come from the stranger. The blond man would grit his teeth and stare at Izuku with hate fueled eyes. They burned so deeply with passionate loathing—but still it was passion. Izuku found it exciting because it was the closest to passion he probably would ever come.

He kept this secret close to him. No one could ever know about this guy and the secret he carried.

Tomura and Aoyama continued to cover for him, and like clockwork Tomura dished out his punishments each time. The increased beatings were beginning to take a toll on Izuku's body. The scars, bruises, and gashes were evident all along his skin. But as long as it wasn't his face that was wrecked, Nine didn't care or step in.

Izuku didn't mind the beatings though.

As long as his secret was safe, he would rather endure that pain versus whatever would happen if someone knew about his mental block.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku happily sat at their family dinner eating Okonomiyaki.

Ibara was gone for an assignment which only left Izuku, Tomura, Jin, Aoyama and Himiko. Izuku quietly ate beside his big brother who was more apprehensive than usual this evening.

About half way through their meal, a white envelope was suddenly handed to Izuku.

Izuku stopped chewing and peaked up at Tomura who was holding it with an expectant stare. Izuku swallowed and took the envelope, slightly confused. He turned it over, searching for The Viper Academy emblem but it was blank as could be.

"What is this?" Izuku asked curiously.

"Open it," Tomura said. He rested his chin on his intertwined hands with a half smile. "It's a surprise for you that I've been working on for the last year."

Izuku peered around at his siblings.

Aoyama gave him a thumbs up, and Jin was texting on his phone lazily, not even paying attention.

However, Himiko was curiously looking at the packet as well.

Izuku fiddled a bit before carefully opening the top. He reached in and pulled out a small binder. It was white, and unlabeled. Izuku opened it and was surprised to see on the page was a profile of a man. Next to his photo were random numbers and information.

Height. Income. Age. Gang or organization affiliation. Then finally the location where he lived in Tokyo.

Underneath were descriptions of mundane things. This random man's favorite foods, places to shop and hobbies were listed so plainly like he was trying to be advertised.

Izuku quickly flipped to the next page to find the same thing. Then he flipped to the next and it was the same. Again and again and again.

Izuku stopped flipping when it became very clear: this was a binder of men.

Heat fanned across his face when he saw one very handsome blond man. It was listed that this guy worked for their corrupt governor, oversaw rigging elections, and his hobbies included sailing.

“Wh-What is this?” Izuku asked, voice taut and high pitched.

As Izuku read this man’s ridiculous height, a sinking suspicion crept. He connected several wild dots to hint at what was happening. But there was no way—

Tomura’s all too pleased expression grew. “It’s an eligible list of men I’ve vetted for you.”

Aoyama smiled.

Jin stopped texting, gawked, and exclaimed, “he’s gay?”

Aoyama wiped his face at the exact moment Izuku dropped the binder like it was made of hot coals.

“I figured that this was a nice thing to do for you per our conversation last year,” Tomura said slowly. He hinted just enough for Izuku to understand but for everyone else not to pick up on the fact Izuku was defected. “I put a lot of hard work into that so take your time going through it. The trouble I went through was far more work than I ever wanted to do for such an absurd thing.”

Izuku’s whole face was red as he stared in horror at the tiny binder of Tomura approved eligible bachelors—

“You won’t believe how many people he made me wiretap this past year,” Aoyama added with a chuckle. “We did so much digging that we found enough blackmail to last the rest of our lifetime.”

“A lot of disgusting people out there,” Tomura quipped with a sour tinge. “Everyone in that binder is approved by me. But let’s keep it a secret from Nine for now. Consider this my gift to you.”

Himiko quickly stood up and hurried to the empty seat next to Izuku. She leaned in, eyes wide with curiosity and flipped through the binder for him. She gaped like she was looking at the holy grail.

“Holy shit,” Himiko exclaimed. “Everyone in here is some sort of organized criminal connected to The Academy. I recognize all these guys from the underground gambling scene in Hadeus.”

“Yes,” Tomura said. He shrugged his shoulders like it was obvious. “It only makes sense to keep it in our circles. People on the outside would regard us as monsters if they knew what we truly are.”

“Actually, these aren’t common criminals, these are leaders or people in power positions,” Himiko pointed out. She pieced something odd together. “…What would Izuku want with these guys?”

“Izuku asked me to find him someone he could potentially have sex with,” Tomura explained.

Izuku halted because that’s not at all what he said.

But maybe Tomura was covering for him—right? He was trying to make it seem like a sex thing and not a romance thing in front of everyone? However, despite that making sense, a looming fog hovered above Izuku’s skin making goosebumps pop up one by one.

“Tomura doesn’t mince his words,” Hiryu’s ghost reminded him. “He also doesn’t do anything unless he is getting something out of it.”

“Damn, you really went out of your way to help this poor kid get laid,” Jin said with a laugh.

Izuku nervously fiddled with the corner of a page. He eyed Tomura who was waiting for him to continue searching through the binder. It didn’t help his nerves that all his other siblings were staring on like this was the six o’ clock news.

He was stuck though, caught on a notion he couldn’t shake since he was seven.

The sterile whiteness of the binder reflected exactly how this all seemed: bleak. There was no passion connected to the act of simply picking someone who Tomura deemed was okay enough. Izuku furrowed his brow when he finally realized why he avoided getting close to anyone this whole time.

He was too attached at his core to the concept of romance and this—this was not it.

“I kind of imagined finding someone on my own,” Izuku muttered in a small voice. He pushed his hands in his lap when he thought of Kacchan. “Kind of how you guys do. Y’know, organically.”

“You’re incapable of that,” Tomura said tightly. He frowned and shifted to fold his arms across his chest. “I already spoke to each of these men and they would be interested in getting to know you.”

This time it was Izuku’s turn to frown. “In what way?”

“Don’t ruin this by thinking too hard,” Tomura warned and slid right past giving Izuku an answer.

Himiko curiously peaked over Izuku’s shoulder again.

She then made a strange sound and tilted her head while saying, “Hey, Tomura. Isn’t this the gang leader you met with about learning more about the Tokyo Underground Council—” “—Go through the damn binder, Izuku,” Tomura snapped.

Everyone fell silent.

Deep down, Izuku hated how Tomura could do that.

The fear that was installed in them by Tomura activated at the slightest mood shift. Jin went back to texting. Aoyama turned his head away. Izuku snapped into obedience like a magnet. Himiko also quickly sat down in her original seat and resumed her meal.

They all waded there quietly until Izuku started from the beginning of the binder.

Izuku took his time flipping through it. Not because he was genuinely curious, but because he could feel Tomura watching him with a pissed off glare. Izuku tried to actually see if there were people in here that he may like—but not a soul appealed to him.

Izuku was bluntly hit with the fact his taste in men hinged very heavily on his Kacchan-mental block.

Which is unfortunately why Izuku paused a little longer on the blond men in this binder.

He read the blond men's profiles more carefully. The slim flicker of hope residing inside of him wondered if any of these men were Kacchan as he scanned their ages. But as he searched, nothing came close to matching. A lot of these men were older, Izuku realized. Most were nearly twice his age.

Then the world came to a halt as his one weakness was exposed:

"You only like blonds," Tomura said offhandedly, like it wasn't a big deal.

But it was.

On cue, Izuku became guarded. He quickly flipped away from the blond man he was staring at in an attempt to cover his slip up.

"No, I don't," Izuku deflected a little too hard. "I like everyone equally."

Jin and Aoyama started laughing—

—but Himiko was watching Izuku carefully.

Her golden eyes homed in on him. Then she grew uncharacteristically quiet to study his body language with lethal assessment.

"No. You're only interested in the blonds," Tomura said like it was easy. Tomura leaned over and turned the page back to the blond man who caught Izuku's eye. He pointed to the man's photo and tapped his strawberry blond hair. "I can see you stare longer at blonds versus everyone else. Nothing wrong with having a preference if that's what you like."

"You have good taste baby bro," Jin said with a conceited grin. He ran a hand through his own blond hair and shook it like he was a movie star. "Blonds do have more fun!"

Izuku waited a beat too late for his laugh to pass as natural. He forced himself to chuckle but Himiko caught it.

She tilted her head at the way Izuku's body language shifted to defensive.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku thought his slip up was buried and forgotten, but he was sorely mistaken.

It reared its ugly head the next month while him and Himiko were on a hunt and kill operative.

Their mark was a simple man. He had brown hair and wore thick, black rimmed glasses. He was a regular business worker who skipped town years ago to avoid paying back his gambling debts to Chisaki Kai. Usually, Chisaki would say it was petty change and go about his life.

However, the death of Imasuji Goto set off a chain reaction.

Every criminal leader decided it was time to wrap up all loose ends. Even the small ones.

It was supposed to be an easy mission. They successfully cornered the mark in a barren alley with no witnesses when he stepped off the train in Osaka. But of course—fate had other plans. The mark hired bodyguards to wait for him at the train station—and not any bodyguards. Oh no. It was Izuku's pain-in-the-ass stranger plus two others.

The mission quickly went sideways.

Izuku froze on the spot when he saw familiar red eyes and blond hair.

Guns were shot. Knives were thrown. Himiko managed to kill the two other bodyguards and Izuku was able to shallowly cut the mark on the leg with his poisonous dagger. It wouldn't be too long before the target died after that—but when it came time to finish off the last loose end—Izuku's mental block kicked in full force.

The blond stranger was running away full speed to a train that was departing.

Himiko tried to fire off her gun and it was jammed. She snatched her mask off, began pointing and yelled for Izuku to hurry up and take the shot before the loose end got away.

Izuku switched to his long distance pistol and pulled the trigger.

The bullet barely grazed the stranger, dinging the metal train instead. The stranger was able to barrel roll into the closing doors before they slapped shut. Izuku cursed and aimed his gun again, lining it up perfectly with the glass window where the stranger's head was.

Himiko was screaming in his ear to take the shot, but as Izuku looked through the bullseye of the gun—terrified red eyes stared back at him.

All Izuku could see was Kacchan, alone and abandoned in the depths of winter.

He couldn't pull the trigger.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku sat with his head down and hands pressed on his lap. He shifted on the uncomfortable chair in the conference room as its cold surface dug into his back. The ticking clock above him felt like a countdown to his imminent doom.

They were back in Tokyo at the debrief and by some stroke of luck, Nine was out of town for the next week visiting Peter Moore. In his place, Tomura was put temporarily in charge of all Viper Seven debriefs. Himiko was standing next to him, her gaze and shadow were colder than a brutal storm.

Tomura sat across from Izuku, paperwork stacked in front of him with a red pen. His brother refused to look at him.

Between these two, Izuku's skin was boiling under pressure. He had momentously screwed up. He never considered that he'd ever see the stranger while on a duo mission—but he did and with Himiko of all people.

"Izuku could have killed him and he missed!" Himiko hissed. "There was another perfect shot to take too and he didn't pull the trigger. It was weird, like they knew each other. This needs to be reported to Nine immediately."

Tomura tapped his pen on the table to hold his patience. He took a deep breath in and then cut his eyes to Himiko.

"Is the mark dead?" Tomura asked evenly.

Himiko frowned. "Yes, but—"

"—But what?" Tomura cut her off. He narrowed his eyes. "The mark was exterminated so there's no need to say otherwise. I'm going to report on records that the operation went fine. One loose end in the grand scheme of things isn't the end of the world."

Oh how wrong Tomura was, Izuku thought. Especially about this specific loose end.

Himiko was scandalized. She dropped her mouth and stared at Tomura in disbelief. She glanced between Tomura and Izuku and shook her head.

"Are you asking me to lie to Nine for Izuku of all people?" Himiko spat.

"No." Tomura held their eye contact and leaned forward. He clasped his hands together and tilted his head. "I'm asking you to lie to Nine for me."

"But Nine is our handler—"

"—And he respects me the most," Tomura reminded her. "I would like to keep that respect too. So no, we're not about to expose Izuku's fuck ups as a weak spot under my watch. Plus, even if you go to Nine, who do you think he will believe? You or me? I can always remind him of the little sentimental grudge you are holding against Izuku over a weak boy who died years ago."

At that, Himiko seemed to back down.

She twisted her mouth and took a stance of obedience similar to Izuku's. She turned her head away in an attempt to mask her dissatisfaction.

Izuku felt guilty and lowered his head further.

Tomura really was the only reason he was safely alive, wasn't he?

"We'll keep a close eye out for the loose end if he ever comes back again," Tomura said tiredly. He clicked his pen and began writing on his private notepad. "Tell me, what did the loose end look like?"

"It was a male, about in his late teens or early twenties," Himiko muttered. Her lips were pressed in an agitated thin line as she spoke. "He was tall, about 183cm. I didn't see his face well because it was dark. But he wore all black. He had red eyes and—"

A pause.

She cut her eyes to Izuku and studied him.

"…and blond hair," Himiko finished in a whisper.

"Not much of a description," Tomura said. He let out an exhausted exhale and finished writing down what Himiko said. He ripped out the page from his notepad, neatly folded it, and placed it into his pants pocket. He turned to Izuku with a deeply disapproving glare. "Izuku, go practice shooting at the range. You clearly need to sharpen your aim. Do that for the next ten hours."

"Yes, big brother," Izuku muttered.

"You two are dismissed," Tomura said in a short tone. "Try not to bother me for the rest of the evening."

Izuku stood up with his head still down. He bowed at the waist at the same time Himiko did and the two of them walked out of the office together.

Once outside of the stuffy room, Izuku exhaled and brushed his bangs out of his face. The skin on his cheeks felt like it was melting off from how flush he was. That was a close call, he realized. He knew Tomura covered for him for mainly self-preservation reasons, but Izuku was thankful that his safety was a side effect of Tomura's need to always look good in front of Nine.

He didn't bother to say goodbye to Himiko as he walked away, assuming she would ignore his existence like always. It wasn't until about halfway to the training facilities did Izuku realize she was still following him.
