Because if someone else had done it, they both would be doomed in a way. Izuku would still be trapped in Tokyo, marching towards an altar with Chisaki. All while Katsuki would still be hellbent on revenge, spiraling deeper into the dark. Because if anyone else pulled that trigger, he would have never known it wasn't Chizome.

But instead, they had been torn loose from those paths. Cut free by a single bullet. And now, they were falling from grace in tandem, hand in hand towards freedom.

That day, Katsuki decided he believed in fate because fate brought him Izuku.

And maybe, just maybe, Izuku was his fate.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed!! :'D I cried a touch writing this chapter during the Masaru and Mitsuki dream sequence. I dunno why that was really a part that hit me. I really loved developing Mitsuki's complex character for this fic 🥹💕

Next chapter is pretty much all the action parts compressed and then a full lap to where the present left off :') then we're officially in endgame!

Let me know what you think below!! ❤️

Chapter 41: Risoluto

Chapter Summary

Risoluto (Instrumental indicator) — To play with intense resolution/devotion.

Chapter Notes

Helloooo!!!

First, I lied. This isn't a full lap but the next chapter 1000% is. This chapter cuts off exactly two hours before the Yakuza raid the cabin. There's a lot of scenes from Katsuki's POV in this chapter that are important and I think need to be digested separately before we see what happens post-buried alive :')

I hope you enjoy this monster chapter!!

Big thank you to Luna, the LOML for betaing like always <3 Also I will reply to comments on the last chapter soon!! :') had another busy week at work!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Izuku was his fate.

Six months ago, a thought like this would have scared him shitless. But right now, it was the opposite. It felt right. Like a breath of fresh air after suffocating for so long.

He stared at Izuku in the glow of the fireworks, unable to look away. The bursts of red and orange lit up the curves of his face in flashes. But it was the green glow—that brilliant, defiant green—that held him still. Katsuki didn’t blink. He wanted to burn this sight into his brain and never let it go.

Izuku slowly began to lean in. The new resolve in Katsuki’s chest told him to lean in too.

But right as they were about to kiss, the sharp sound of steel whistled through the air.

Both Izuku and Katsuki stopped, eyes shooting open.

A star knife embedded itself in the window between them with enough force the glass splintered on impact. Spiderweb cracks erupted from the point of contact, fracturing across the pane in jagged, deadly lines.

Both of their heads whipped to the door.

“Well, isn’t this heartwarming?” A woman hissed.

Beside him, Katsuki heard the horrible way Izuku’s breath caught.

The intruder walked into the room all the way, sauntering out of the shadows like she’d bathed in them. She had blond hair wrapped neatly in two buns. Her eyes were sharp and golden, piercing in a way that held nothing but bloodlust—and they were locked on to Izuku like bullseyes.

The way she leered at Izuku made Katsuki uneasy. He could see a lifetime of pure, unadulterated hatred.

Katsuki glowered and lowered his chin.

“Katsuki,” Izuku harshly whispered. He slowly began reaching for one of the knives in the back of his sash. “That’s Himiko.”

He didn’t need to hear more. Katsuki’s lethal instincts locked in place within the second.

They rose in tandem and the air shifted the moment they did. The tension strung tighter and tighter as Himiko assessed them.

The twisted scowl on her lips was vaguely familiar. And his heart sank when he realized why. He’d seen her before—in Biei in the goddamn coffee shop.

Himiko took an offensive stance.

Katsuki mimicked her, and the snarl on his face deepened in its viciousness.

Himiko uncoiled her weapon. It was a chain with twin blades melded on either end. She gripped it like it was an extension of her. The daggers along her arms caught the light. Her outfit was bright red, skin-tight and made her look like a real venomous viper more than a human.

Carefully, all three of them assessed each other’s movements.

Two on one should likely work in their favor, but he wasn’t dumb enough to underestimate Vipers. Much less Himiko, who’d successfully fucked them both with her mind games.

In an attempt to draw first blood, Katsuki quickly drew his gun.

But the sound of a second pistol cocking made him freeze.

Both Izuku and Katsuki cut their eyes to the second entrance on the side.

Slowly, another person approached, and Izuku's eyes widened with each step. Katsuki's gut dropped to the furthest pits of hell when another man peeled out of the shadows—and Izuku seemed genuinely scared.

"Aw, don't look so surprised, baby bro," the man chuckled wickedly. "You didn't think The Double Headed Viper would go down that easily, did you?"

Katsuki swallowed dryly at that name. This was Jin.

Izuku killed this guy with a point blank gunshot to the head.

How the fuck did anyone survive that? But right as he questioned his own sanity, Katsuki took a closer assessment. Jin was wrapped in layers of filthy, bloody bandages. One covered his left eye and another stretched across his whole head. Both of his arms were wrapped up too—but this guy moved like he wasn't injured at all.

But then—Jin winced.

It was subtle. But Katsuki's sharp eyes caught the movement like a shark smelling blood. Jin was leaning onto one leg more than the other. Which meant it was a weak point Katsuki could exploit.

Katsuki gripped his gun tighter.

"What? You're not going to greet your dear ol' brother and sister after we've come all this way?" Jin taunted. "Especially because you left home in complete fucking disarray. Hell, you could at least apologize for killing Ibara and Aoyama like they were goddamn animals—and trying to kill me."

"You all gave me no choice," Izuku spat.

"There's always a goddamn choice," Jin snapped. "And the choice you made is protecting some snot nosed brats and this outsider over us." He glared at Katsuki. "But I'm sure that's just your M.O. by now. You shot me in my beautiful face and then stole my katana? What a fucking good way to piss me off."

Katsuki clenched his jaw.

Two ticked off assassins wasn't good.

Taking a small chance, Katsuki wearily glanced at Izuku. Izuku glanced right back.

Katsuki took a step forward, keeping his gun aimed at Himiko. He expected her to mouth off too, but she was unnervingly quiet. She surveyed them with the precision of a well-seasoned predator who knew her prey well.

“Please, let us go,” Izuku attempted to reason. “We’re going to be leaving, and I promise you we’ll be out of your lives forever.”

“I think you’ve forgotten who Tomura is.” Jin scoffed. Then suddenly, he pointed at Katsuki, and said, “And by the way, Chisaki wants you buried six feet deep.”

Katsuki frowned, unfazed.

But then Jin pointed his finger at Izuku and said, “and he wants you to come back with us to Tokyo. Fortunately for you, Chisaki decided he still wants his green-eyed prize.”

Rage roared loudly inside of Katsuki. He tightened his grip on his gun and his nostrils flared.

Unexpectedly, Himiko laughed. Everyone froze as she did. It started quiet, and it slowly slithered up to a sharp, unnatural pitch. It was so eerie it began to creep Katsuki out. She shook her head like the universe was mocking her then abruptly stopped.

Her lips curled in humor but her eyes were dead cold.

“Once again, you somehow lucked out, Izuku,” Himiko taunted. “Tomura is such a damn persuasive person, isn’t he? It took him nothing but two weeks to convince Chisaki to change his mind.”

“Yup,” Jin sourly agreed. “You did have a helping hand though. That bastard basically got a hard-on right there after hearing that you killed over twenty of your own and two of the Viper Seven. You gave him exactly what he wanted: a family member for a family member—and more.”

“The sick fuck was delighted,” Himiko spat bitterly. “But I suppose that’s what’ll make you two a good match, huh?”

Katsuki cocked his gun at that. “You two are doing a lot of goddamn talking.”

“Yeah, I suppose we are.” Jin sighed and tilted his head. “So. Which way are we doing this, Izuku? The easy way or are we going to have to drag you by that pretty hair of yours all the way back to Tokyo?”

“Ouch! Mr. Viper Killer has got bite now,” Jin laughed. His unnerving smile widened and his one good eye stretched with blood lust. “Good. I was hoping we would do this the hard way.”

Instantly, Katsuki lunged at Jin with brutal speed. Izuku launched himself toward Himiko in the same breath.

They clashed like titans in an earth shattering collision.

The room crackled with the raw power of experienced killers who knew how to slay a room in the blink of an eye. The result was the most brutal, bloody fight Katsuki had ever been in.

His shoulder smashed into Jin's chest. Jin's katana sliced at his calves. Katsuki fired bullet after bullet, gun blazing.

Across the room, Izuku met Himiko's blades with his own, teeth bared and eyes locked.

Jin moved like he was inhuman. His smile was unnerving and far too fucking delightful. Katsuki gritted his teeth as he began to break a sweat far earlier than he anticipated. He cursed. The Vipers were nothing like he'd ever countered. They were trained down to the millimeter of precision and every hit that landed was packed with bone shattering force.

But Katsuki stood his ground.

He ducked, bobbed, and weaved and fired off kill shot bullets in rapid succession. He fought tooth and nail with everything he had. They had to win. He'd be damned if Izuku was ever dragged back to that hell hole.

He had a burst of strength and so did Izuku. The fight shifted and they began fighting side by side in perfect harmony. They melted together like two deadly halves of a whole that were absolutely unbreakable together.

It wasn't before long that they executed a new strategy. Izuku took Jin and Katsuki took Himiko.

They were fighting, scraping and bleeding. But Katsuki pushed through the pain as he held on tightly to the concept of fate. It gave him new, untapped perseverance.

Soon, Izuku cut down Jin. He drove Jin's own katana through his abdomen and cut upwards. Blood and screams filled the room and next Himiko retaliated. She slammed her fist into Katsuki's face to the point he was sure she nearly broke his jaw.

And in a blur of hate, she threw Katsuki into a sauna to bake alive.

But the resolve inside of Izuku burned as bright as the one in Katsuki. Katsuki could feel it.

Even though the heat inside the machine burned into his skin, he had no doubt Izuku would make it—and he did. Izuku blinded Himiko, and broke himself free from her chain. He rushed to rescue Katsuki.

And in a sharp haze, it all ended as quickly as it started.

Himiko charged them, and Izuku locked her in the same sauna to burn alive.

When it ended, blood was everywhere.

The scarlet color painted the walls, the floors, and both of their bodies.

Katsuki reveled in it. The bastards were dead and he couldn't be happier. He was proud that Izuku put them down. But he knew that he couldn't rejoice too long. If those two knew where they were, then they were compromised. They needed to get a move on, now.

He turned to Izuku—

And Izuku was horror stricken.

He was hyperventilating, eyes darting around his family's dead bodies. When Izuku's eyes caught on the katana he lodged deep inside of Jin, his breath started coming in unsteady pulls.

Then he stopped breathing all together.

Shit.

Katsuki quickly sprung into action.

He grabbed Izuku by his shoulders and lightly jolted him. The sudden movement jerked Izuku back to reality. He focused his gaze and stared up at Katsuki with glossy, red eyes.

"Hey, breathe," Katsuki desperately urged. "We need to go."

Izuku swallowed dryly and took a deep inhale. He nodded and shook himself out of it. He hardened his nerves. He glanced down at the corpses of his brother and sister and a distant seriousness enveloped him. He looked Katsuki in the eye, and it was like a flip was switched.

"We need to cut their jugulars," Izuku instructed surgically. "We have to make sure they're dead and bleed them out."

"Good idea," Katsuki agreed.

Together they walked over to Jin's mangled body. Katsuki unceremoniously kicked him over and Izuku yanked the katana out of his corpse. Without hesitating, Katsuki kneeled down and barred Jin's neck for Izuku. He tilted it precisely, showing the rise of the jugular under the skin.

Katsuki watched as Izuku steadied his shaking hands. They looked at each other once.

Izuku put the blade to the vein and slit Jin's neck open.

They moved quickly after that, blood still drying on their skin as they ran through the bathhouse.

They found the rest of the employees bound and bruised, held hostage by a secondary squad of Vipers. The confrontation was brief. Katsuki and Izuku ended it with two accurate bullets.

They didn't waste a second after that. Bags were packed with deepened urgency. All their movements were clipped and purposeful while adrenaline drummed under their skin.

It was only a mild surprise to discover that Nemuri, ever the mistress of masks and secrets, had a hidden chamber inside the bathhouse. It was a concealed space that neither Katsuki or Izuku knew existed. Its walls were lined with industrial-grade cleaning supplies and, more disturbingly, thick steel tubs brimming with acid sat in the middle of the space.

It became obvious this wasn't the first time the bathhouse employees had done this.

And judging by the efficiency with which they moved, it wouldn't be the last. Ryoku worked with a chilling steadiness. Her gloved hands guided the bloodied corpses of Jin, Himiko, and other Vipers into the bath with a practiced ease.

The acid sizzled upon contact. The sound it made was angry and high-pitched, much like the unmistakably reminiscent of a rattlesnake's hiss.

Fitting, Katsuki thought.

The whole time, Izuku didn't look away. His eyes didn't blink once as the bodies of his siblings melted down to bone.

In the far corner of the room, Katsuki and Izuku were as still as statues. They sat perched on worn metal chairs while Sekijiro silently patched them up. The big man was gentle, but his hands moved quickly. He stitched their gashes with clinical skill and swabbed their wounds with astringent alcohol that burned.

"We need to make a plan to keep out of their reach until we can make it to Nana," Katsuki whispered as Sekijiro treated his blisters. "We're not going to be able to slow down now."

"Is there any place you can think of for us to hide?" Izuku asked wearily.

"No," Katsuki answered reluctantly. "Nemuri? Is there any place you know we could go?"

"I'm sorry, there's not," Nemuri sad replied.

Katsuki exhaled sharply. Dread punched its way through his ribs, and it really fucking scared him. But he kept his head high and his resolve sturdy.

"I guess we're going to have to keep cutting these bastards down in the meantime until I get a call back from my ex-supervisor," Katsuki said solidly. "We're officially on the run."

Katsuki found out quickly that when the Yakuza wanted someone dead, they pulled out all the stops.

Even after they fled from Midnight Sento on his motorcycle, it didn't take long for them to be cornered into a high speed chase. Katsuki's nerves rattled out of control as he maneuvered his bike sharply. He pushed it to the limits in a way he never did before.

Luckily, the combined force he and Izuku were together was unstoppable.

They took down all the Yakuza in the cars in no time. One car flipped over. Another skidded off the road and flipped. And the last came to a stop after Izuku blew their brains out in one clean shot. But even though they'd come out victorious twice tonight, Katsuki was uneasy.

How the hell did those bastards find them so fast?

Katsuki's jaw tensed as he stood amid the wreckage. Blood pooled beneath the fresh corpses, as his eyes scoured the scene. He traced every limp body and every shattered piece of glass as though the answer might be hiding in the mayhem.

But then it clicked.

He walked himself back in his memory to the morning after the Scarlet Masquerade.

That goddamn Tomura followed him to the hotel. He didn't think much of it then, but now he made a connection that Tomura likely saw him get on his bike. Katsuki's eyes blew wide and they snapped toward the bright red motorcycle parked near the fringe of the chaos. Its paint gleamed mockingly beneath the moon.

"It's my bike," he hissed.

That conniving bastard. He must've slipped a tracker on him for insurance. Katsuki knew this was true because it was exactly something he would do.

"Fuck!" Katsuki let out a loud, disgruntled groan and gripped his hair. "Fuck. Fuck. Fuck."

Izuku's eyes widened, recognition dawning in his expression as puzzle pieces began locking into place.

He was probably thinking of CCTV or city surveillance. But Katsuki knew better. That would've been too impersonal for someone like Tomura. Tomura was as sick as him, and would use a more intimate method—more obsessive.

"Damn it all," Katsuki cursed angrily. He grabbed his helmet and hurled it at the ground, the crack of plastic against the concrete echoed through the silence. "We're going to have to go dark completely with these fucking blood hounds. No bike. No phone. No contact with anyone. We can't even so much as breathe in the wrong city otherwise they'll send another goddamn squad."

Izuku closed his eyes. He began drawing in slow, shaky breaths to try to steady the panic rattling in his chest.

"What about the call from your supervisor?" Izuku asked between sharp pulls of air. "We can't get rid of your phone just yet."

Katsuki let his head drop and his shoulders sag. "We'll have to play it risky until it gets too hazardous. How are you on ammo?"

"I have a fair number of rounds left," Izuku said, exhaling a breath that trembled out of him. "But not enough for an entire month and a half worth of shoot outs like this. I could only probably last another five ambushes before I'm forced to only use a blade."

“Same.”

Katsuki fell into a grim silence.

He crossed his arms tight as he stared down at the corpse slumped at his feet. He kicked the body over with a muted thud, studying the shredded, road-burned face half-buried in gravel and dust.

“Once we ditch the motorcycle, we’ll be able to buy some time—but not a lot,” Katsuki muttered darkly. “In the meantime, we’ll keep the phone—but only until my shitty ass supervisor calls me back. After that, we’ll destroy it immediately. So, let’s hope he calls before someone tries to take my head off again.”

With shared bitterness, the two of them left their helmets abandoned on the roadside.

Then they walked up to the one car that was still in decent condition. The car was dented but operable. With methodical urgency, they scoured the interior. They felt out for any hidden trackers, laptops, or burner phones. Every device they found, they shattered. Plastic and wires crunched beneath their boots as they made sure there was no way they could be followed.

When they were sure the car was clean, they wordlessly transferred their bags from the bike to the back seat.

“We should drive to the next city over and steal another vehicle,” Katsuki suggested. “We’ll be okay in this, but only for a few hours. But it’ll be good enough to confuse them.”

Together, they returned their attention to the bodies still occupying the vehicle.

Katsuki reached in first and dragged one corpse out by the collar. He tossed the limp frame onto the asphalt with all the care of someone discarding rotten meat. He was annoyed beyond words right now with the Yakuza. When this was over, Katsuki never wanted to see another tiger tattoo.

Izuku reached for the second body. But just as his fingers curled under the arm, he stopped. He leaned in, expression shifting from focused to mortified.

“What’s wrong?” Katsuki asked, instantly on alert.

“This person is a Viper,” Izuku said with so much profound horror that it sliced into Katsuki. “If this Viper is with a Yakuza, then…then that means they’ve teamed up.”

“Oh, perfect,” Katsuki grumbled sarcastically. “Those bastards are officially working together to bring us in.”

Izuku then carefully laid out his fallen family member on the ground. Katsuki noted the way that Izuku was still gentle with his siblings, even after everything. He softly patted down the corpse’s pockets and pulled out a small, silver cell phone.

Izuku entered a pin code and began sifting through the emails.

As Izuku did this, Katsuki glanced at his motorcycle. His husband remained preoccupied with searching for something on the phone so Katsuki did a quick backtrack. He began to pat all over his bike, slightly frantic. He wearily glanced over his shoulder at Izuku, praying he didn't notice. And he didn't. Then Katsuki's hand tucked under the belly of his bike and froze. He felt something jutting out.

Katsuki pulled and it snapped right off.

He stared at it, and it stared back. It was a tracker, and it looked exactly like the kind Katsuki planted on his own prey. He gritted his teeth and crushed it in his hands. His temper began to swell.

Tomura. That thorough motherfucker.

It was eerie how similar to him Tomura was in his hunting methods. It was almost poetic—if it hadn't been so terrifying.

Suddenly, he heard Izuku's breath hitch.

Katsuki's head whipped around. Izuku was frozen in place, eyes wide and locked on the screen.

Without a word, Katsuki crossed the distance and leaned over his shoulder. And on the phone was an email—from Tomura.

> From: Mamushi Tomura

> CC: One
> Subject line: URGENT: Shie Hassaikai Merger under way and Viridian Viper Situation
> All,
> Thank you for your cooperation over the last two weeks. I know it has been a trying time given the circumstances. The number of Vipers lost to Viridian Viper's defective actions has undoubtedly affected us all. Many missions have been canceled and as a result, some of our clients have pulled their support to seek business elsewhere until we get everything under control.
> Because of this, we are down in fiscal numbers. However, after discussing the situation with One, together we have arrived at a solution that would be able to mend this fiasco.
> As of now, it is in our best interest to begin pursuing a merger with our biggest clientele, the Shie Hassaikai.
> I know this comes as a surprise for many of you. But after much discussion with One, we feel as if it is the best course of action. Once the merger is complete, this will mean our family will function as a faction of the Yakuza rather than assassins for hire. This union will allow us to recover the number of forces we have lost from the fire and the murders. Additionally, we will be able to recover financially from having clients pull away. We will also be able to gain access to unlimited Yakuza resources that would help us begin preparing a new cohort.

Mr. Chisaki, One, and I met and hashed out a proper business deal. We wanted to make sure this moves forward with all parties' best interest in mind. There have been many conditions set on both sides. However, two large conditions were set by Mr. Chisaki, and they are non-negotiable:

1. The Viridian Viper must be delivered to him.
2. Bakugou Katsuki must be killed for murdering his family members.

As of now, both are a priority. The merger cannot move forward until these tasks are completed. Going onward I will be selectively dispatching you all to complete these checklist items.

I will be answering all suitable questions at the next all hands meeting, which will be scheduled for tomorrow at 18:00 in the Grand Hall.

Signed,

Mamushi Tomura, The Horned Viper.

Izuku breathed out unevenly. The sound caught in his throat like jagged glass. His eyes darted toward Katsuki, wide and deeply shaken.

Katsuki's anger simmered low, ready to blow the lid at any moment.

He read the whole thing. He didn't care that his murder was high on the priority list. He was sickened by how Tomura and Chisaki discussed Izuku. They acted as if Izuku was a bargaining chip. An asset. A tool to be handed over once the ink on their alliance dried.

"C'mon." Katsuki's nostrils flared and he looked Izuku dead in his eye. "Let's get the fuck out of here."

They drove into the open dark with nothing but the moon. The whole way, Katsuki never once let go of Izuku's hand. His grip was firm, anchoring them both as the car hummed low. They skimmed along desolate roads that stretched out like veins through a lifeless, moon-washed landscape.

Along the way, they didn't speak. There was an underlying tension in the air as the night's events piled up. The fireworks. The fight. Jin bleeding out and Himiko burned alive. Then finally the acid baths and the car chase.

It was a lot for the last few hours.

Katsuki's only comfort came from the way Izuku's skin felt beneath his fingers. He traced slow, grounding circles over the back of Izuku's hand, again and again, trying to keep himself from unraveling.

But Izuku was unraveling. Quietly, cleanly, and almost invisibly.

He was good at hiding the worst of his spirals, Katsuki noted. Izuku was trained to mask emotion the way others were trained to breathe. Still, Katsuki saw it. The way Izuku's hand twitched, thumb pressing rhythmically against his forefinger like he was trying to ease himself with the pressure.

Katsuki's stomach turned.

He hated that goddamn twitch. And worst of all, he hated that he couldn't fix it. He wished he could make Izuku feel secure—but they weren't exactly looking too hot right now.

He made another attempt to reach Aizawa.

But he got the same recorded voice memo. Katsuki left another message, though he doubted anyone would hear it. The phone might as well have been a brick.

Reality was closing in like a trap. They were bleeding resources and time, and the only person Katsuki trusted enough for help had apparently gone off the goddamn grid. If Aizawa didn't call back soon, they'd be left to survive on sheer will and dwindling ammunition.

When they finally made it to the next town over, immediately Katsuki began scouting for a car to hijack. They found one easily, and began to drive further south with no stops.

When they passed a sign that said, 'Welcome to Kitakyushu', it signaled to them that they were nearly all the way at the southernmost end of the country—as far away from Tokyo as possible.

Katsuki's eyes were beginning to droop, and Izuku was dozing off. The adrenaline comedown was hitting them both hard.

All the wounds they sustained from the consecutive fights were beginning to show. Katsuki suddenly felt every damn punch Himiko and Jin landed on him. He also could feel some blisters on his skin sting from being locked in that malfunctioning sauna.

Izuku was clearly feeling it too. His shoulder, which sustained a nasty blow from Himiko, was stiffening.

When the ache in their bones and muscles became too much, it was obvious they needed to rest.

Katsuki drove up to a secluded cliff top and parked the car off in the grass. They were covered by the barren trees, and there wasn't much traffic coming in and out of the mountain road. They climbed into the backseat and used Katsuki's sleeping bag as a blanket to warm them up.

Katsuki sighed and his frosty breath spilled into the air. He pulled out his phone once more, leaned further into the makeshift blanket, and he began dialing the same contact yet again.

This time, it wasn't frustration driving him—it was fear.

He dialed Aizawa again. Katsuki's usually steady hand was beginning to shake. The phone rang. Once. Twice. Again. The tone went on and on, looping endlessly. Katsuki swore it started to sound like a death march—the kind of slow, inevitable rhythm that haunted funeral parlors.

Then: beep.

"Sorry, the inbox of this receiver is full. Please try calling again."

Katsuki let the silence stretch for a beat. He pulled the phone from his ear and dropped it onto his lap like it burned him.

"No dice," he said, sadly. "Yet again."

Katsuki watched as Izuku's bottom lip began to tremble, and then it all came crumbling down. His teeth clenched. His eyes squeezed shut. And finally, his shoulders dropped like his body buckled under the weight of the direness they were trapped in.

A broken sob wrenched from Izuku's chest.

Katsuki jolted upright, heart seizing at the sound.

Izuku covered his mouth with a shaking hand and turned away, like he was ashamed. He clearly didn't want Katsuki to see him like this, but the cries came anyway. They wrecked him in full-bodied shudders.

Katsuki reached for him instantly, pulling him close. His arms wrapped around Izuku like they could somehow shield him from all the horrors of the last two weeks. But it didn't feel like enough. Katsuki's chest tightened with helplessness.

This wasn't what he wanted. He wanted to make Izuku happy. He wanted to see that teasing smile and hear that breathy laugh.

"Hey, don't cry," Katsuki comforted. He soothed his hands over Izuku's shoulders. "Shit. Izuku, please don't cry."

"I'm sorry," Izuku whispered back, voice frayed.

He pressed himself into the crook of Katsuki's neck. Katsuki held him tighter, fingers sliding into his hair. He tried to ground him with soft shushes and a light rock.

"I'm so sorry. I can't help it," Izuku stammered. "I-I'm worried now. What if he doesn't call us back? What should we do? Do we find somewhere else to go? Nemuri was all Nana could give us. I-I feel so guilty dragging you into all of this. You were so happy at the estate and now you're back in this because of my mess."

“We’ll get that call back, don’t worry,” Katsuki whispered. He held Izuku closer, and tried his best to believe his words too. “I promise you, we will.”

“But it’s been nearly two weeks,” Izuku’s voice rose in desperation, hands fisting into the front of Katsuki’s shirt. “There’s no way we can keep this up for six more weeks, Katsuki. We don’t have the resources. And if the Vipers and Yakuza are working together that means there’s more places we can’t go and more eyes on us. A-And if they catch us, you’ll—you’ll —”

Another sob spilled from Izuku’s lips. He dug his fingers into Katsuki.

“I don’t want you to die, Katsuki,” Izuku wept. His voice cracked on the last syllable. “I don’t think I-I could go on if you—”

“—Stop that,” Katsuki cut in, sharper than intended.

Izuku blinked up at him, startled.

Katsuki’s face was distorted in anger. Not directed at Izuku, but rather all the other bastards that were driving them into a corner. He knew deep down there was no one that could keep him away from Izuku, not even the goddamn Yakuza themselves.

He cupped his husband’s face in his hands and wiped away the tears rolling down Izuku’s cheeks.

“I’m not going to die,” Katsuki promised, voice dripping in that signature, unshakable conviction. “Especially not by the hands of some scummy ass yakuza. And I’m not going to let you come within a fucking inch of that bastard. I meant what I said in those shitty ass vows when I said I will kill anyone who gets between us. That includes yakuza, vipers and it especially includes your fucking brother.”

“You remember what you said during your drunk vows?” Izuku asked quietly.

Katsuki continued to wipe away his tears and nodded.

“Of course, the embarrassment that tape left me with is hard to forget,” Katsuki replied with half a laugh. “Sure, I was plastered, but those words were from the damn heart. And I don’t go back on promises very easily. Now, c’mon. Give me a smile. We did really fuckin’ great today—and we’ll keep doing great until we get to Nana.”

Izuku attempted to smile, but it didn’t form fully.

Katsuki bit his lip as he tried to think of something to lift Izuku’s mood. He looked down at Izuku’s ticking hand and his eyes lingered on the barren ring finger.

“Y’know, I…have something that might really make you smile,” Katsuki said.

“I don’t think anything could make me smile right now,” Izuku muttered.

Katsuki’s lips twitched into a smirk.

He grabbed for his backpack in the passenger seat and unzipped the small pocket on the front. His fingers grabbed hold of a small, forgotten item he'd shoved in the bottom of his bag back in Tokyo.

When he pulled his hand back, he held up the faux wedding ring from Okinawa for Izuku to see.

Izuku's breath hitched and his eyes went unbelievably wide.

"Y-You kept it?" he whispered, disbelief and longing braided into his voice. "After everything?"

"Mhm, I did," Katsuki replied. He twirled the ring around, admiring the emerald in the center as if the rust from wear and tear wasn't there. "I couldn't find it in myself to toss it, even when I was blinded by anger. All I saw was you when I looked at this stupid little gem."

Izuku's smile bloomed weakly across his face, small but so powerful.

"See, I told you it would make you smile," Katsuki teased.

He reached out and pinched Izuku's cheek, earning a soft bubble of laughter. Izuku blushed, looked down shyly, but his smile held firm and radiant. Katsuki leaned in to press a kiss to his forehead, gentle as he could be.

When he pulled back, Izuku's eyes were brighter.

"I actually still have mine as well, Kacchan," Izuku confessed.

This time, it was Katsuki's turn to be shocked. "You do?"

"Of course."

Izuku reached forward and dipped his hand into his duffle bag.

He pulled out the ruby ring.

Something in Katsuki broke open. A short laugh escaped him, hopeful and soft around the edges. Seeing that stupid little piece of metal stitched back a part of his broken heart. The healing came again, smooth and easy. Another piece of closure, and more proof that Izuku really was meant to be in his life.

His husband's smile was dazzling now. It shone through his tears and his dimples showed like stars.

He took the ruby ring from Izuku and slid it onto his finger. Izuku mirrored him, slipping the emerald ring onto his. Under the soft silver glow of the moon, the fake gems glimmered like they were worth a million bucks. And to Katsuki, they were worth all that and more.

Their hands laced together and Katsuki leaned in for a kiss.

The kiss was slow and rich with history. It was soft at first but Katsuki pressed it deeper. Their mouths moved in sync, and Katsuki was sure this was the only language they ever truly needed. The cold wrapped around them, but the heat they kindled sank straight into both of their bones.

When they pulled back, Katsuki's eyes were set at half mast.

"We'll be okay," Katsuki whispered, voice melting against Izuku's skin. They rested their foreheads together and cuddled further under the sleeping bag. "When this is all over, we'll be living in our house in the countryside. And all this bullshit will be nothing but a bad memory."

Their fingers curled tighter, and the rings caught the moonlight.

Their love had survived the impossible, and Katsuki was sure it would keep doing so.

That night, for the first time in a long time, Katsuki didn't dream. His mind was at peace, and in a weird way, he missed the absence of his mother from his dreams. But he supposed this is what moving forward felt like. He wasn't clinging to the past anymore, but rather fighting for the future.

And for a moment, he thought he dreamed of Aizawa calling him back.

Once upon a time, he set an annoyingly loud ringtone for his supervisor in case of emergencies. It was mainly because Aizawa rarely returned calls. He was very much an e-mail guy and more often than not preferred to discuss things face to face.

And he could have sworn it was ringing through his dreams right now.

Then suddenly, it got louder.

When Katsuki opened his eyes, he was confused. Was he still dreaming?

Then when the phone rang once more, Katsuki jolted. He was definitely not dreaming. Immediately, he was shocked awake with a large pulse of adrenaline that set him on edge. Katsuki frantically moved out of his sleepy haze and sprang up. He hastily grappled for his phone.

He answered it and the loudest exhale of relief expelled from him.

"You bastard," Katsuki nearly yelled. "It's about time you called me back, old man."

Katsuki never thought he would be more relieved to hear Aizawa's tired, angry voice. But what greeted him was not the voice of a man who was tired. It was of a man who was really fucking pissed off.

“What the hell have you gotten yourself into, Bakugou?” Aizawa exclaimed.

“Did you get my voicemails?” Katsuki asked.

“Get them?” Aizawa snapped back. The octave raised so sharply that Katsuki flinched and so did Izuku. “Did I get them?” Katsuki pulled the phone away from his ear and groaned. “Bakugou, I was bombarded with them—while I was on vacation! I just finished listening to every single one. What the fuck is wrong with you—”

The verbal onslaught didn’t stop. Not even when Katsuki was yanking on his boots, the entire car rocking with the speed of his movements. Aizawa’s voice was still going strong on speaker, stringing together obscenities in a way only he could manage.

Katsuki huffed and threw open the door as Aizawa called him a ‘reckless, fucking disaster.’

Izuku made a confused sound.

“Sorry,” Katsuki grumbled to his husband. “Give me one second to calm him down.”

Katsuki hurried out of the car. He shut the door behind him and shivered under the winter winds.

He walked far away from the car so Izuku could keep sleeping.

“—Sixty fucking voicemails and over a hundred text messages!” Aizawa roared through the phone. “Bakugou Katsuki, I genuinely regret ever taking pity on your sorry ass sometimes. You were supposed to be retired. Retired! And instead of enjoying a quiet, non-homicidal life, you decide to piss off the fucking Yakuza?! What the hell did you do?!”

“I know, I know,” Katsuki hissed. “I’m sorry, okay? I’m really fucking sorry. I’ll make it up to you and buy you a cake or something—”

“I don’t give a fuck about a cake!” Aizawa shouted. “Answer the damn question or so help me—”

“I’ll explain everything in person,” Katsuki interrupted, desperate now. “I promise. I just—I don’t have time right now, Aizawa. I need to go dark soon. I’ve done a good job staying ahead, but it’s getting tight. Really fucking tight.”

He glanced back at the car. His heart clenched.

“I don’t know how many more shootouts I can survive,” he admitted quietly. “I already escaped one by the skin of my teeth. It was a high-speed chase and I had to ditch my motorcycle.”

A long, gritted breath hissed through the speaker. Silence lingered.

“Yeah,” Katsuki replied. “It’s that bad.”

A pause.

Then Aizawa said, “If you’re going fully dark, you know I can’t extract you once you cut contact.”

“I know. I figured.”

“Meet me at my cabin in Mount Rausu,” Aizawa ordered at last. “It’s off-grid and built for this kind of emergency. I’ll keep watch on the pass and flag you down. When you get here, you’d better explain what is going on.”

“I will,” Katsuki promised. “I swear. You won’t regret this. Thank you, Aizawa.”

“Don’t thank me yet,” Aizawa growled. “I might slap the shit out of you when you get here.”

Katsuki cringed. Yeah. He deserved a slap from Aizawa and maybe two from Izuku. Maybe more, if he was honest.

The line was quiet for a moment too long. Then Katsuki cleared his throat awkwardly.

“…So,” he mumbled, swaying slightly on his feet. “How was the vacation?”

Aizawa sighed. Then the call cut.

Katsuki pulled the phone away from his ear. He winced.

Well. That went better than expected—marginally.

Getting to Mount Rausu was more trying than Katsuki expected.

Leave it up to Aizawa to have a cabin in the most inconvenient place known to man. Seriously. What shit luck that the place they needed to go was exactly on the opposite end of the country.

They began driving there right after he got back in the car.

Along the way, Katsuki could see Izuku was still deflated. The hope in his eyes was running on empty so he decided to try his best to make that sparkle come back. He stopped and got a cheap, disposable camera then began to take pictures along the way.

At first, Izuku thought the plan to make it a road trip was ridiculous. But as they made their pitstops, he saw Izuku’s eyes grow bigger and brighter with every new place they visited.

Katsuki played music low on the car speakers while Izuku hummed along, tapping his fingers against the console. They drove until they stumbled across a park on a hill. The grass was long and the trees swayed gently in the wind. They lay down side by side and stared up at the sky in silence.

“That cloud looks like your hair when you wake up,” Katsuki snorted.

Izuku laughed, half-heartedly smacking him in the chest. “You’re the worst.”

But his smile stayed. And Katsuki caught it in a photo, mid-laughter, cheeks dimpled and lashes low.

They stopped again before nightfall, this time at a hidden waterfall just off the main road. It was the kind of place with no signs, only a narrow dirt path and the sound of rushing water tucked into the trees. Katsuki only found it because he’d needed to pee and they ended up discovering something beautiful.

Izuku stood barefoot in the cold shallows, jeans rolled up to his knees. His eyes were wide like he was seeing magic. Katsuki took another photo. The light hit his skin in golden patches, and Katsuki couldn’t stop staring.

That night, they stopped for rest.

They pulled and parked beneath the stars. For a moment, they both sat on the hood of the car, wrapped in the sleeping bag and each other’s warmth. Katsuki held the camera in one hand and Izuku’s hand in the other.

“Can we take another one right now?” Izuku murmured.

Katsuki smiled and leaned in. They smiled just before the flash went off.

Katsuki had no doubt that in that photo, they looked like love in motion. A little bruised, a little tired—but warm. They stayed on the hood of the car for a while, looking at the stars together before getting in the backseat and going to bed.

On the second day, they switched drivers.

Izuku, to Katsuki’s horror, had no understanding of what a speed limit was.

He cut corners too fast, sang loudly to songs he half-knew, and grinned every time Katsuki cursed at him from the passenger seat. It became painfully clear those photos of him making the illegal turns in Osaka weren’t because he was hastily trying to make a getaway—he actually just drove like that.

“What the hell was that?!” he snapped as Izuku veered into a wild left turn on a busy street.

Izuku smiled sheepishly and gave a little wave to the furious driver behind them. “Sorry!”

“You’re gonna get us killed,” Katsuki hissed.

“I’m enhancing the experience!” Izuku replied.

“You’re enhancing my stress.”

Izuku laughed and reached across the console to squeeze Katsuki's hand. "Then relax. We're fine."

And they were more than fine.

They stopped for lunch under a tree beside a quiet field where wildflowers grew in small, colorful clusters. Katsuki made them sandwiches with ingredients they bought earlier. And Izuku picked petals and pressed them between the pages of the black folder from Nana.

When Katsuki asked what he was doing, Izuku said softly, "Saving them. I want to remember what this part of our journey felt like."

Katsuki didn't say anything. Simply kissed his temple and passed him a bottle of water.

They continued to stop at various places like parks. The seaside. Then they took pictures at a wine vineyard and again in a large meadow. They even went to some quirky restaurant that sold different flavored almonds from Korea.

Even with all the stops, they were still on track for getting to the safe house on schedule.

The long road they were on suddenly began filling up with larger villages, then small towns. The lonesome road transformed into winding bike trails, railroads and two way traffic much closer together.

Katsuki caught sight of a crisp white sign as they passed.

"Welcome to Numata!" it read, cheerful and bold against the overcast sky.

They were nearly at the country's heart now, skimming the edge of Tokyo's outer sprawl.

Izuku tilted his head to read the sign, thoughtful. Katsuki reached into the glove box, yanked out the folded map, and uncapped the red sharpie with his teeth. He leaned back and spread the map wide across his lap.

"Halfway there. Thank fuck," he muttered, dragging the sharpie across the route they'd taken. His spine gave a weak crack as he shifted. "My back is starting to get a crick in it from sleeping in this cheap-ass car. I'm too old for all of this."

Izuku stifled a laugh, stealing a sideways glance. "You're not that old."

"Yeah yeah, I know. But my spirit is sixty," Katsuki shot back, waving the sharpie. "All I know is there better be a warm bath waiting for us at this safe house—and a full plate of food —or I'm going to lose my goddamn mind."

Izuku's hands stayed on the wheel, but his tone softened with curiosity. "Have you ever been where we're going?"

"No," Katsuki replied.

His eyes roved across the map until they landed on a small marker. It was a castle etched in faint ink. He hummed quietly, then circled it with unnecessary flair. He figured Izuku would want to stop there—he always liked places like that, places with structure and weight and history pressed into every stone.

“The old man would never let me crash at one of his private properties,” Katsuki muttered distantly. “He’s way too cagey.”

“What about the other safe house?” Izuku asked.

Katsuki didn’t look up. “What other safe house?”

Izuku blinked in confusion. “The one that was on Oshima Island? That we missed the ferry for?”

Katsuki’s hand froze mid-motion. The red sharpie hovered above the page.

“Right.” Katsuki went still and his stomach dropped. “I’ve never been to that one either.”

Shit.

His eyes slid toward Izuku. And sure enough, he saw the exact thing he didn’t want to see. Izuku’s brows pulled together and there was a faint, sharp glint of analysis forming behind Izuku’s gaze.

Katsuki swallowed. Hard. That deal he’d nearly completed, the one he promised himself he’d eventually confess, crawled back up his throat like acid.

His fingers curled around the map.

“Um, Izuku,” he started. His voice was nearly inaudible under the hum of the tires against the road. “There’s something about that I’ve been…meaning to tell you.”

Izuku turned his head slightly, just enough to fix those sweet green eyes on him.

Katsuki’s heart dropped like a stone.

He could already see it: Izuku pulling over, hands shaking, tears forming, and disappointment thick as oil in the space between them. Or worse: silence. That deep, gutted quiet that meant all the joy they’d fought so hard to rebuild would collapse like wet paper.

He opened his mouth and momentarily glanced at the road ahead of them.

And then he saw a parked car dead ahead—way too close.

His eyes widened.

“Shit—Izuku!”

Izuku’s eyes snapped forward like a whip crack.

His foot slammed the brake, and the car lurched forward violently. Their coffee tipped over, splashing across the center console. Katsuki clutched the dash. Izuku's head jarred down with the momentum. The parked car grew monstrously large in the windshield before the vehicle finally skidded to a stop—mere inches from disaster.

The silence that followed was thunderous.

Izuku exhaled slowly and looked over at Katsuki, expression pale and shaken.

"Shit," he breathed. "Sorry—I'm so sorry—"

"Don't worry about it," Katsuki rushed to say, breathing unevenly. "That was my fault."

His pulse thudded painfully behind his eyes. His hands were still braced and his body rigid with tension he couldn't blame on the road.

He took that as a sign from fate or the universe or whatever.

This must've been a blunt way of fate telling him to shut the fuck up. Maybe if he dropped that bomb too soon—it could all crash before they even got to Nana. So he folded the map with one long, deliberate breath. Then he recapped the sharpie and stayed quiet.

He'd wait, just a little longer.

After that, it came as no surprise they came across several, insane road blocks.

The moment they got near Tokyo, suddenly multiple 'check points' occurred. Watching the corrupt cops filter through cars one by one sent a chill through his spine. He could practically taste Tomura's deformed dedication.

They ended up ditching the car to travel by train because of this.

During their voyage, he saw Izuku shift from drowning in despair to floating in hopefulness. His eyes were brighter, and his smile was more frequent. He laughed through the long train rides as Katsuki took pictures on the disposal camera.

During these train rides, he got to know Izuku a little better.

His nerdy husband talked his ear off about things Katsuki never gave a single shit about before. But because it was Izuku, he listened and ironically began to care. Somehow, between the first four hour train and the next, Katsuki started giving a damn about different kinds of snakes.

Turns out, Izuku knew a lot about them.

"Wow," Katsuki muttered, a grin tugging at his mouth. "You're like a fuckin' snake encyclopedia."

Izuku beamed, eyes crinkling in half-moons. “I kind of am! We studied them as kids at the Academy. It was part of the training curriculum.”

“Seriously?” Katsuki tilted his head. “Why the hell would you need to know that much about snakes?”

Izuku laughed softly, as if it were the most normal thing in the world. “Because we needed to know how to spot the one snake we aren’t immune to. In case we ever got bitten in the field.”

Katsuki blinked and his smile faltered. “Wait. Aren’t immune to?”

Izuku tilted his head innocently. “What?”

“You said ‘the one snake you aren’t immune to’ What does that mean?” Katsuki asked, brows pulling together. “I thought you were immune to all poisons and toxins.”

“Oh,” Izuku sighed with a shrug and a sheepish laugh. “Nearly. I’m immune to most snake venoms. And I’m immune to common poisons and toxins. Pretty much all drugs that are frequently used in the underground scene and by assassins.”

“So…all the ones that could actually kill you in the job,” Katsuki clarified dryly.

“Exactly.” Izuku nodded. “Full immunity is not really possible. Mithridatism has limits. But The Viper Academy’s been trying to push those limits for decades.”

Katsuki leaned back slightly, eyes narrowing. “What kind of limits?”

Izuku’s smile thinned. “Like Mamushi venom.”

“Wait—” Katsuki stared, his brows furrowing. “You’re not immune to the venom from the snake you’re named after?”

“Nope,” Izuku replied with a light chuckle, scratching behind his head. “Kinda ironic, right? Our founder, One, thought it was poetic. Mamushis are some of the most deadly snakes on the planet. He wanted us to be the same. Fully lethal and feared. But their venom? It’s too potent. If it hits the bloodstream, even a trace amount is enough to start the clock if an antidote isn’t given.”

Katsuki didn’t say anything. His eyes locked on Izuku as he went on.

“It erodes the nerves first,” Izuku explained, softer now. “Then the organs start failing. It’s a slow, drawn out process. Eventually, the body can’t fight it off. It just…gives in.”

“That’s a fucking awful way to die,” Katsuki muttered, uneasy.

“It is,” Izuku agreed quietly. “There were a lot of…failed trials at the Academy to try to build up tolerance. It ended with every test subject dead. One’s been obsessed with cracking it since the beginning, but I don’t think it’s possible.”

A chill settled in Katsuki’s gut.

He didn't like the way that sounded. It was strange, he never thought about it until now, but he always felt a sense of safety with Izuku's immunity. It was nice to know no one would ever be able to sneak up on him and inject him with some toxin and knock him out for more than maybe a few minutes tops.

But knowing that even Izuku had an Achilles' heel didn't feel good.

He shook off the feeling with a grunt.

"Alright. That's enough venom talk for one day," Katsuki huffed. "Can we go back to your weird obsession with plants or whatever?"

"Oh! Sure!" Izuku perked up immediately, his smile brightening.

He slipped right into a tangent about flowers and medicinal herbs. His hands moved as he spoke and his voice was light as air. Katsuki let him ramble, loving that Izuku was getting back to his nerdy ways. But in the back of his mind, he was stuck on that one fact: Izuku wasn't immune to a Mamushi bite.

The next roadblock they encountered on their road to Aizawa was the Yakuza themselves. They popped up like the goddamn roaches they were, ruining everything.

While they were on their last train, they both woke up from a nap and noticed it was strangely empty. No one else was there except them and one, elderly man. Then, like a horrible nightmare, when Izuku got up to go pee, that same elderly man struck Izuku with a strong paralytic.

It was all mayhem and blood after that.

Katsuki barely remembered what happened. All he could recall was struggling and punching. One moment they were together, and the next, they were separated by a wall of muscle and suits. The further and further Izuku got from him, the tighter and tighter the string holding his rage in check drew.

Then, Izuku screamed out his name.

"Kacchan!" Izuku yelled.

He looked up in time to see Izuku thrash against two men. One arm tore free and reached for him, fingers stretched for help. Izuku cried out in pain. His arm was wrenched backward into a brutal hold. Two men dragged him toward the rear of the train and the automatic doors hissed open.

As the doors slid shut, Katsuki could see Izuku struggling, lugged away into the opposite cart.

Katsuki saw scarlet.

They tried to restrain him. Hands grabbed his shoulders and arms locked around his ribs. They shoved him toward the far end of the train car like he was just another corpse to be moved.

But they were slow, overconfident men who hadn't earn their arrogance.

He tore out of their grip with channeled violence that he now could tame. His elbow snapped into faces and his knuckles slammed into their ribcages. His teeth gritted as he rammed his knife up through the soft underside of one man's jaw.

Blood spurted everywhere, hot against his cheek. It dripped down the collar of his shirt and he didn't even flinch.

He moved through the scum like fire through dry grass. Every slash was deliberate, brutal and anatomical. He sliced carotid arteries with surgical precision. They screamed, but it didn't matter. Their screams made it better for Katsuki.

He liked that they felt pain.

He killed two at once, blade buried in one neck while he slammed another man into the train door so hard the glass cracked with the force of the impact. Another man lunged, and Katsuki ripped the knife across his gut so fast it took the idiot two whole seconds to register he was already dead.

They kept coming.

Maybe they were stupid. Or desperate. Or too full of orders from Chisaki Kai to think for themselves.

The more goons that came at him, the more he slaughtered like animals. His arms were red up to the elbows now, his boots slick with blood and sinew.

Someone dropped a gun in the chaos. Katsuki caught it mid-scramble and turned it against them.

After that, it wasn't a fair fight—not like it really was in the first place.

He shot one through the mouth. Another through the heart. One tried to run and got a bullet through the back of his skull. Red mist burst against the train wall in a pulpy fan. Blood coated the seats, the ceiling, and the windows. It soaked into the floor beneath him until it felt like he was walking ankle-deep in his violent urges.

There was no mercy left in him.

Because they weren't taking Izuku from him. Not now. Not ever.

When the last man blocking his path fell, Katsuki didn't even glance down. He was already sprinting towards Izuku.

His heart pounded a furious rhythm in his chest. Every beat was like a countdown. His boots slammed against the metal floor, picking up speed with every cart he crossed. He was a blur of rage and desperation, a creature unchained.

He didn't pause when more Yakuza appeared in his path. He pulled the trigger before their hands could even get to their guns. He kept going and the smoke from his barrel trailed behind him like a veil of death.

He cut his way all the way through until he saw the last door at the other end. It was beginning to close and he shot forward with an urge so powerful he felt like his blood was screaming.

His hand jammed in the thin closing, clutching the door. His muscles were shaking. His jaw was locked. He gritted his teeth and ripped that damn door back open. The metal screamed and the bolts snapped. The gears inside cracked under his fury, sparking as he shoved the mechanism open with brute force alone.

"Wh-What the hell?!" one of the men shouted, but that was all he managed.

Katsuki slammed into the largest thug like a battering ram. The other two scrambled, fumbling to raise their weapons. But Katsuki didn't give them the time. He hoisted the first body like a ragdoll, shielding himself as bullets punched into muscle and flesh. The man jerked, gurgled, and went limp in Katsuki's arms. But Katsuki only snarled. Blood streaked down his face and his eyes glowed with murder.

The second goon didn't even have time to flinch before Katsuki dropped the dead weight.

He raised the stolen gun, and sent a bullet straight between his eyes.

The body dropped and the elderly Yakuza man turned to flee.

Katsuki grabbed him by the collar, spun him, and threw him into the metal wall hard enough to rattle the cart. The man crumpled, throwing a coughing fit until Katsuki silenced him with a fist that shattered his nose and split his lips wide open.

The older gangster tried to pull out his gun but Katsuki seized his wrist. He twisted and snapped it so hard the bone cracked through skin with a sickening pop. The gun dropped uselessly, and the man screamed. Katsuki slammed him against the wall again. This time pinning him with one hand and unsheathing his knife with the other.

"N-No," the man whimpered and began struggling against him. "Get your filthy hands off of me! I'm a high ranking Yakuza! You'll regret this! Chisaki will make sure you die a slow and painful death for this—"

Katsuki leaned in cruelly and his eyes swarmed with shadows.

He placed his blade on the man's bobbing throat and pushed.

"Chisaki will never get the upper hand on me because I have the one thing he doesn't," Katsuki hissed. His voice dragged the same way his knife did across the man's throat. "I have killer instincts."

Blood poured down the man's neck and he began gasping for life. Katsuki took a large step back and the body slid down the wall. It landed with a wet thud beside the others.

In the suffocating stillness of the cart, all Katsuki could hear was the drip, drip, drip of blood hitting cold steel.

His eyes cut over to Izuku on the ground. His husband was tied up, hands and legs bound with thick rope. There was also duct tape was sloppily smeared across his mouth. Izuku's eyes were bloodshot and watery and looked up at him with mountains of relief.

Katsuki didn't realize he'd dropped the gun until he was already at Izuku's side. He kneeled down, cutting away the restraints with shaking hands and a breathless curse. There were so many new bruises along Izuku's collarbone and needle punctures at his neck. His anger stirred fiercely.

"Are you okay?" Katsuki asked as his eyes darted all over. "Did they hurt you?"

"No, I'm okay," Izuku replied breathlessly.

Katsuki's jaw clenched, but he nodded. He pressed his forehead to Izuku's for half a second before standing and hauling him up. After that, they quickly grabbed their bags, and the two of them jumped the train into the freezing dark.

The final stretch to Aizawa's cabin was a brutal, near-vertical, hike up the dead-white back of Mount Rausu.

Katsuki could feel the cold wrap around his spine like steel wire, sinking in like vicious teeth. And the higher they climbed, the more the wind turned against them. It cut through the trees with a chilling temperature that was much colder than before.

With every step upwards, Katsuki regretted only bringing a thin motorcycle jacket. His leather gloves were useless as well, and his damn fingers were beginning to feel like stone.

Half way, the incline grew steeper and snow deepened past their ankles. Below them, the world stretched vast and merciless. The ocean gleamed black and silver, a fractured mirror beneath the sallow moonlight. The crescent moon hung crooked behind drifting clouds like a watching eye, casting a sheen over the water.

There, they came across an overlook that was suspended between the mountain's jagged spine and the starlit sky.

Katsuki and Izuku stopped moving for the first time in hours to gaze out.

Katsuki turned toward Izuku. Snowflakes clung to his husband's lashes. His cheeks were flushed with windburn and his dark hair was haloed by frost. He looked tired, wind-chapped, and sore. But still determined.

“I never told you where we had to meet Nana,” Izuku announced suddenly.

“Huh. You’re right,” Katsuki replied. He tilted his head to the side. “Where do we have to meet her?”

Izuku smiled, small and secretive. “The sunny place.”

Katsuki’s eyebrows knitted together in confusion. Then like a bolt of electricity, realization struck and his eyes widened in disbelief. Okinawa. They were escaping to Okinawa—all over again. The reference to their failed getaway made everything click into place in a strange, full circle way.

“You’re joking,” Katsuki whispered, stunned.

Izuku shook his head. He grinned until it stretched across his wind-reddened face.

“I’m not. It’s…It’s fitting isn’t it?” He asked.

Katsuki couldn’t answer right away. He was too shocked.

He stared at Izuku, lips slightly parted and heart thudding quicker with every passing second.

Izuku stood framed by the glow of the moon and the endless, silent sweep of the ocean behind him. He looked like he was cut right out of one of Katsuki’s lucid dreams, standing halfway between the boy he used to be and the man he was becoming.

“It is,” Katsuki whispered.

After that, any last doubts about fate were discarded.

Which is why Katsuki’s heart stopped when Aizawa suddenly popped out and held Izuku by gunpoint with a shotgun.

“Bakugou. Why the hell did you bring a snake on my property?” Aizawa jeered.

All the dread in his stomach tripled as he saw the love of his life better so close to that damn shotgun. It was the same weapon he’d seen Aizawa use to blow clean holes through people he did not trust. And given where Aizawa left off telling him to kill Izuku months ago—he was likely to get trigger happy.

“Aizawa, hold on a moment. Put the gun down—”

Aizawa did not.

He snapped the shotgun upwards to catch under Izuku’s chin and pushed up. Both Izuku and Katsuki’s breaths hitched high. Izuku held his position, locked in a dead stare with Aizawa’s cold, hate-filled gaze.

“Bakugou, you better explain what the hell is going on right now or I’m putting a hole through this serpent’s throat.”

During the long train rides, Katsuki had mentally prepared an explanation to give Aizawa.

It was a concise, clear speech that explained perfectly what had occurred within the last several months. He even had planned to sprinkle in a note worthy apology. However, all that flew out the window at the sight of Izuku being held at gunpoint.

All the words he wanted to say began tripping over his tongue. He tried his best to make Aizawa understand the danger and the high stakes that were at risk. But no matter how much he mentioned how the Yakuza were hunting Izuku too—Aizawa remained unmoved. He didn't even so much as blink as his glare cut into Izuku.

Then when Katsuki told Aizawa Izuku was trafficked as a child—he saw a small blip.

Aizawa wavered, but then hardened.

"Even if all that were true, Bakugou, why are you extending your neck for him?" Aizawa snapped, unmoved. "Let him clean up his own goddamn mess."

"…Because I love him," Katsuki whispered.

The confession landed like a sniper's bullet. Aizawa whipped his head towards Katsuki with neck breaking speed and his eyes widened in shock.

He gawked so hard that the cigarette in his mouth dropped straight to the ground.

"And I'm also responsible for his mess." Katsuki shakily exhaled and clasped his hands together like he was praying. "I haven't been truthful about what's been going on since Okinawa, Aizawa. There was a lot more to that assignment and I omitted more than half of it from my report. And he…was also with me while I was at the estate for those four months after."

He bit down on the inside of his cheek until he tasted blood.

"Then after that, I put us in a tight bind because I exploded—exactly like you said I would."

At that, Aizawa stiffened.

His jaw tightened as he asked, "…Exactly in what way did you explode?"

"Well. That massacre that was on the news in Tokyo." Katsuki winced. "The one that was given the name 'Scarlet Masquerade'…"

"That was you?" Aizawa growled angrily.

"Uh, yeah..." Katsuki scratched behind his head.

"Goddamnit, Bakugou—"

Aizawa cursed under his breath and immediately snatched the shotgun away from Izuku.

He whirled around like he couldn't believe what he was hearing and pinched the bridge of his nose. Katsuki winced and watched as Aizawa closed his eyes and took in a deep inhale. That was never a good sign when he did that—

Then Aizawa muttered under his breath. It was too low to be audible but Katsuki knew exactly what was being said, 'these goddamn thick headed children are going to be the death of me'. Probably followed by a few choice expletives about Katsuki being emotionally unstable and clinically insane.

Which, in all fairness, was probably true.

When Aizawa turned back around, his face was red with fury and his patience was absolutely eviscerated.

"You're going to explain everything—in vivid goddamn detail—when we get inside," Aizawa lectured sternly. He pointed to Izuku with the gun again. "Tie him up. I'll decide after I hear whatever story you have if he's going to be executed here and now or not."

After tying Izuku up, they continued their trek up the mountain to a secret passage.

There, the cabin stood tall and waited for them. When they finally got inside, Katsuki was halfway surprised to find a whole damn welcoming party.

Miruko was leaning back on the couch with her feet kicked up like she owned the place. Denki looked like he hadn't slept in days. Sero was gawking at Izuku. Shinsou and Monoma shot him glares so sharp that Katsuki knew they were gearing up to likely strangle him for this whole fiasco.

But honestly, Katsuki was relieved to see everyone. He was beyond relieved that Aizawa took his voicemails seriously. Knowing the old man, Aizawa didn't fuck around. If there was even a chance that Katsuki was in over his head, of course he would call in reinforcements.

And truth was, they'd been very much in over their heads.

So he and Izuku sat down in the middle of the living room like they were giving a war report. They took turns, tagging in and out at certain points.

They told them everything. From the first time they crossed paths as kids in Tokyo, to the crazy mission in Okinawa, and the absolute hell that came after. They talked about the red folder that shattered both of them and even touched on Izuku's upbringing and how he was trafficked.

They talked about the shit show that was the Scarlet Masquerade. Then they segued into Chisaki.

And then, finally, they revealed their marriage.

Which, caused absolute chaos. Katsuki took it on the chin though. Everyone was confused, reminding him how much he rejected romance.

“Holy shit,” Sero exclaimed, taken aback. “Bakugou, you’re in love? How is that even possible?!”

Denki was equally perplexed. “You quite literally have shouted ‘fuck romance’ in public several times?”

“Not to mention berated couples who did PDA in front of him,” Monoma muttered.

Katsuki shrugged half heartedly. “Feelings change.”

By the time they were done, Katsuki was hoarse and Izuku looked like he’d been wrung out. After everything was out in the open, the room was stunned and silent. Katsuki worried when he saw Aizawa’s eyes darting between him and Izuku, still assessing.

He was about to beg again, but Izuku beat him to it.

“Please,” Izuku pleaded. “I know it’s wrong to ask for your help. It goes against everything in my being to do this, b-but I need your help—we need your help. Katsuki is the one they want dead and I don’t want him to be hurt. I couldn’t live with myself knowing that he’s in harm’s way because he got involved in my life. If you want something for your time, I can give you all the money I have on my person. I don’t have much, but I can give you everything I have if it means he’ll be safe.”

Izuku bowed low to the ground. He touched his forehead to the rug and pleaded with all he had.

“I know what type of life I’ve lived,” Izuku uttered mournfully. “I’ll never fully outrun it. Forced or not, I still killed hundreds, if not thousands. But if I have any chance to do something right—anything at all—I want it to be making it up to Katsuki. I want to keep Katsuki safe and watch out for him for as long as I live. I-I want to earn my life.”

Katsuki’s throat closed up.

Goddamnit, Izuku.

He wanted to tell his sappy husband that he didn’t have to earn his life. He was allowed to simply live. But he held onto the words when Miruko moved. She walked up to Izuku with her usual swagger, and gazed down with mixed emotions.

“For someone who killed their husband’s mother, you sure make it sound so poetic,” she said.

“I only want to make sure Katsuki is taken care of,” Izuku confessed, voice breaking a little on the words. “That’s all I’ve ever wanted.”

And that’s all Katsuki ever wanted too.

Miruko dusted her white pants slightly. She crouched in front of Izuku, studying him. She gazed into Izuku's eyes, and Katsuki's heart swelled when he saw her approval shine through.

"You're scared, aren't you?" She asked solely.

"I'm always scared," Izuku whispered, voice sad but strong. "But I've learned to push through it."

Muriko stood, turning to Aizawa. "Well?"

Aizawa watched the entire exchange in silence with an unreadable expression.

When he finally stood, the weight of his decision hung in the air. He didn't say a word. He sent a single, pointed look in Katsuki's direction—sharp enough to silence whatever was about to tumble out of his mouth. Then, with slow deliberation, he laid the shotgun down on the table with a heavy clunk.

He circled behind Izuku, crouched low, and pulled a knife from his belt. With a few terse, practiced movements he sawed through the restraints.

The ropes dropped away from Izuku like dead skin. The breath Izuku let out was shaky—but Katsuki's was rougher. It took every ounce of self-control not to pull his husband into his arms.

Aizawa stepped back in front of Izuku, gaze softening. "So what's your name?"

"My name is Izuku," he whispered.

Aizawa sighed from the depths of his spirits and Katsuki grinned internally.

They were golden.

Aizawa dismissed them all with the laziest flick of his wrist, like even lifting his hand was a burden too heavy to bear. But without hesitation, his group of colleagues followed the command.

On the way out, Katsuki saw Miruko and Denki spare Izuku kind, pity filled smiles. On the other hand, Monoma and Sero didn't look at Izuku directly. They made eye contact with Katsuki, and shared intense looks of apprehension. Only Monoma tossed one, unsure backwards glance Izuku's way before leaving.

Then finally, the last person to leave was Shinsou.

He stiffened when he caught Shinsou's stare at Izuku. It was heavy with disgust and distrust. Katsuki was expecting this to a degree. Out of everyone, Shinsou always had the most trouble adjusting to new people.

After everyone left, Aizawa gave them a grand tour of the cabin.

It wasn't exactly Aizawa's taste, Katsuki noted. Some of the furniture was a little too colorful, steeped in hues such as violet and dark blue. Aizawa was more of a grey guy. His home in Yokohama was all various shades of grey with a small pop of yellow in the artwork.

At the end of the tour, they stopped right in front of their new room for the next five weeks.

"Now, go ahead and get a good night's rest you two," Aizawa murmured. "We'll talk more in depth in the morning."

They said their goodbyes and immediately Katsuki hopped in the shower. When they both finished and got into bed, Katsuki happily rested his head on Izuku's. He kissed the temple of Izuku's damp head of curls. And then his thumb stroked lovingly at Izuku's waist beneath the sleep shirt.

"We're almost there," Katsuki whispered.

Izuku smiled and turned to give him a kiss on the cheek.

If he could put a bullet through the sun, he would right now. Because the way the sun's beams snuck through the window was progressively annoying him. And god, all he wanted to do was rest. But the brighter the rays got, the less he was able to get back to sleep.

He groaned unhappily and sat up.

Aches and pains riddled him from the top of his head to the bottom of his soles. He felt every lick of pain from all the fighting over the course of the last few days compile into one mountainous gust punch.

He looked around the room, and then glanced down at Izuku beside him. His nerdy husband was snoring loudly, like always. And he looked as if he was in a really deep fucking sleep. His mouth was open. He was drooling. And his hair looked like the most adorable bird's nest Katsuki had ever seen.

Being mindful not to be too loud, Katsuki kissed Izuku on the cheek and got out of bed. He proceeded to get dressed in the black sweater and sweatpants Aizawa picked up for him.

When he walked out to the living room everyone was sitting talking. He scanned the area in one slow sweep, and it didn't take long to register the shift in air pressure. As soon as they saw him, everyone went unnaturally still.

Sero's eyes cut down, and he cleared his throat.

Denki quickly swallowed whatever sentence he was in the middle of and awkwardly wave.

Monoma twirled a knife between his fingers. Then he set it down like he was preparing to throw it at Katsuki. Behind him, Shinsou stood with the deepest damn frown. His back was against the wall and his arms were crossed.

Beside him was Aizawa. He was at the kitchen table, leaned back in one of the old wooden chairs. He looked up with a stare that suggested he'd been up all night. And then there was Miruko. She leaned back in the old recliner with a raised brow. She shot Katsuki a look that said he'd walked into the frying pan.

"What the actual hell, Bakugou?" Sero yelled first, blunt as a brick to the face.

Katsuki shrugged and took a seat next to Aizawa. He sighed, folded his hands and pursed his lips. "Yeah. I know. It's all a damn mess."

"Mess is an understatement," Monoma deadpanned. "But in a way, this is unsurprising. You did always have a flair for the dramatic."

"Fuck, man. You're really gonna run off with him?" Denki asked, voice small with worry that didn't suit his usual energy. "Is it safe to disappear off the grid with this Nana lady? What if she's not even legit?"

"She is," Aizawa cut in. All heads turned towards him as he took a slow sip of his coffee. "I'm the one who gave Bakugou the information a long time ago. He said it was for a friend." AIzawa glared at him. "Had I known back then he was in this much trouble, then I think some of this could have been avoidable."

"I'm sorry," Katsuki mumbled. He glanced around and caught everyone's gaze. "Really, I am. I didn't mean to drag any of you in this. I didn't know what else to do. Izuku needs help. Like a lot of fucking help. And I—"

Miruko's eyes softened as he choked on his words. Several others were taken back by the uncharacteristic stutter.

"I-I can't turn my back knowing he's in this much danger," Katsuki finished.

Within the next moment, everyone erupted all at once.

Questions layered over concerns, layered over disbelief. Sero asked if he understood the risk, unsure if he was thinking clearly. Denki wanted to know what would happen if Izuku betrayed him. Shinsou said nothing at first, but Katsuki could feel the burn of his stare against his skull.

"I killed five of Chisaki Kai's people," Katsuki reiterated sharply, louder than the rest. "And not just his mindless goons. His fucking family. That type of shit doesn't get forgiven, and sure as hell it doesn't get forgotten. If I don't leave the country, with or without Izuku, I'm a fucking goner and so are you guys. You being involved too long will put a target on everyone's back."

The room quieted again. Katsuki let it settle.

"So yeah. I'm going. I know what I'm choosing." His tone was hard, showing his resolve.

"I would understand if you were leaving by yourself though," Denki whispered. "But you're leaving with this guy. And don't get me wrong, after hearing all the shit he's been through, he needs to leave. But do you really feel safe living with him?"

"Yes," Katsuki sharply snapped. "I told you, Izuku and I were separated once—and that should have never happened. He's meant to be with me. And I know for a fact I'm supposed to be with him."

Denki swallowed hard and looked away. Miruko's eyes softened, if only for a second. Monoma still looked annoyed, but not enough to interrupt.

"So does this mean this is goodbye?" Shinsou finally spoke.

Katsuki turned his gaze to his mysterious colleague. Shinsou's eyes were shadowed but it was clear he was holding back hurt. His frown was pulled taut, and Katsuki recognized that type of frown. It was the one he would always wear when he was trying to override his sadness with anger in order not to cry.

Katsuki clenched his jaw.

Then he said, "I promise once things are quiet I'll find a way to call. Hell, maybe we'll host a reunion in whatever country we land in."

"You'd better," Sero muttered. "You owe us at least a postcard."

"Of course," Katsuki said. "Besides, it's probably better this way. It's not like I had much going for me here. I needed a fresh start after retirement, and let's be honest—I'm not really giving up anything by going. I don't have much of a life left here."

The silence in the room was broken with Shinsou's sharp groan. All eyes turned toward him, but his scalding glare was already locked on Katsuki.

"You don't have much of a life here?" Shinsou repeated. His voice was acidic and bitter. "You really believe that?"

Katsuki met his stare, jaw tightening. "I do."

"Well, I don't," Shinsou shot back. His throat bobbed and his hands curled into fists like he was holding back more than rage. "You're giving up the team, Bakugou. You're giving up us. You built a life here—hell, you fought for it from nothing. And now you're willing to throw it all away because you got caught up with some guy whose life is screwed six ways to hell —"

"Watch how the fuck you talk about him," Katsuki snapped, sharp with warning.

Shinsou scoffed. He rolled his eyes, but there was no heat left in the motion—only hurt. "Whatever. You're giving up everything to go—what? Be with him on a beach or something?"

The words shouldn't have landed the way they did. But they had. And Katsuki felt the weight of them settle between his ribs like a quiet bruise. Because now that he was looking around the room he saw something he didn't before. He saw Sero's sad, quiet frown. Denki's teary confused eyes. Miruko's resigned stare and Monoma's stiff jaw.

They all looked like they were already missing him.

Suddenly Shinsou's anger wasn't just bitterness. It was heartbreak.

Katsuki's shoulders lowered. The fire inside him didn't go out but it changed shape.

"I'm not giving you guys up," he said quietly, the tenderness in his voice startling even himself. "I promise I'll be in touch when the coast is clear. I didn't realize you all would miss me that much. I always figured I was, and I quote—'a crazy blond menace with more bullets than brain cells,' right? I think Monoma said once that I was more likely to bite people's ankles than talk through a problem."

His gaze flicked to Shinsou. A faint smirk tugged at the corner of his mouth. "Guess you won't have to worry about your ankles for a couple years."

It was a weak joke, but it landed.

Denki laughed first. Then Sero. Miruko rolled her eyes, and Monoma snorted. Even Shinsou huffed a bitter breath through his nose.

Then Denki's face crumpled in a heartbeat. His grin folded in on itself, and without warning, fat tears spilled from his eyes.

"Bakugou," he wailed, his voice pitching high. "I'm going to miss you so much!"

Katsuki gagged instinctively. "Okay. Let's dial back the emotions—"

But Denki sobbed louder. He cried obnoxiously with such fervor that the tension in the room snapped. Sero cracked up again, and Miruko barked out a laugh so sudden it startled herself. Then her eyes watered too. Sero reached up and rubbed his sleeve across his face like maybe no one would notice the tremble in his jaw.

Katsuki blinked, unprepared.

He wasn't ready when Aizawa wiped a slow tear from the corner of his eye like it was a stray eyelash. He wasn't ready when Monoma turned sharply to the side to hide the way he sniffled. And he definitely wasn't ready when Denki launched across the room like a weepy missile and threw himself around Katsuki's neck.

"What the fuck—Denki!" Katsuki barked, staggering back as Denki latched on like a grief-stricken octopus."Get off me! Christ—"

But Denki only clung tighter.

"Group hug!" Miruko yelled gleefully, wiping her eyes as she stood and bounded over.

“Absolutely not,” Katsuki growled, trying to peel Denki’s arms off. “This is not happening, get the hell away from me—”

But it was already too late.

Miruko slammed into him with enough force to knock the wind out of his lungs. She grinned wide even as her cheeks were damp. Then Sero crashed in from the side, laughing and crying. He looped an arm around all three of them. Then Monoma joined, of all people, puffy-eyed and stiff. He leaned up, reluctant, but unable to stop himself.

Katsuki’s arms froze mid-pry.

He felt like he was drowning in limbs and emotions he wasn’t built to handle. Then Shinsou stepped in close. Not quite hugging, but he pressed a firm hand to Katsuki’s shoulder like a reluctant brother who’d die before embracing but meant the affection all the same.

Even Aizawa, standing back with tired eyes, gave a small sigh and let the moment play out.

And Katsuki…stopped fighting.

It took a second. Maybe longer. But he let his fists uncurl. He breathed in the layered, sweat-and-tears scent of his unit and leaned in slightly. The warmth wrapped around him like a blanket he hadn’t known he needed.

That’s when it finally hit.

This wasn’t just a group of coworkers. This ridiculous, volatile, absurdly loyal mess of people was family. And he’d been part of it all along. He’d spent so many years clawing through the world, trying to make something of himself from the heap of mess he was birthed into.

Somehow along the way—he’d built a home in these weirdos.

And he was about to leave that behind.

Not because he didn’t care about them. Not because he didn’t need them. But because Izuku had become another kind of home. Katsuki couldn’t imagine surviving without Izuku now. It would be like ripping out a lung and expecting to breathe.

And maybe that was what made this goodbye hurt the worst. Because it wasn’t a betrayal. It was a necessary fracture in the foundation they’d built together.

So when the group hug finally broke apart, Katsuki quietly wished it lasted longer. He wiped his eyes with the sleeve of his shirt and pretended it was sweat. No one called him on it. They gave him space and smiles.

Even Shinsou.

And Katsuki knew, with more clarity than he’d ever known, that he’d find a way back to them one day.

Later that afternoon, after lunch was scarfed down, most of the group dispersed into the quiet of their rooms. Aizawa and Katsuki sat at the old kitchen table alone. They both cradled ceramic mugs in their hands and stared at the dancing fire across the way.

The coffee they were drinking was strong and bitter. No sugar and no cream. Exactly Aizawa's preference.

"You remember the first time I saw you?" Aizawa said, voice low and full of nostalgia. "I think about that a lot. It's…one of my fondest memories."

Katsuki snorted. "You mean when you held me at gunpoint and broke into our apartment? That's a fond memory for you?"

"Yeah," Aizawa continued, tired eyes watching the steam rise. "I think fondly of it because it was the first time we met. And while you have been a real goddamn nuisance, I'm happy you're a nuisance I got to see grow up. Because, god, you were so damn skinny back then. Like a twig with a big head and bigger mouth."

Katsuki laughed and Aizawa laughed a bit too. They chuckled lightly before Aizawa sighed and shook his head.

"But I should've sent you to child protective services," Aizawa muttered regretfully. "Or the hospital. Anywhere but this life, really. I regret it so much."

"Then why did you do it, if you regret it?"

"Because when I saw you that day, I saw it in you," Aizawa replied seriously. "The way you looked at that gun was the exact way I looked at it when I was the same age. That's when I knew you hadn't killed to survive—you liked it."

Katsuki stayed still and listened.

"You had no outlet for all your anger," Aizawa sighed. "And that anger got a taste of blood. Nothing satisfies that violent urge once it's triggered. There was no saving you from the edge unless someone showed you how to walk it without falling off. And I figured if I didn't teach you to control it, you'd end up another disgraced name in the papers with body counts beside it."

Katsuki looked down at his coffee, the heat still coiled in the ceramic between his palms.

"You're not wrong," he muttered. "You saved me. So…thanks for that."

Aizawa grunted, sharp and quick. "Don't go sentimental on me now. I already feel like shit about it."

"I am going sentimental on you," Katsuki retorted, smirking slightly. "Get over it. You did save me. And I'm grateful, not sorry if it makes you squirm, old man. I think—" He hesitated, for a moment, "—if I'd never met you, I'd be dead by now. Or worse."

Aizawa didn't answer right away. But his lips twitched. The look he gave Katsuki then was full of pride, maybe, or something adjacent to it.

They drank in silence for a while.

"Y'know," Aizawa muttered after a long pause. "You've changed. Between the Okinawa assignment and now, I can see you're different. You're softer. It feels like some of your jagged edges have been sanded down in a good way."

Katsuki laughed into his mug. "Yeah. You can thank Izuku for that. The damn nerd makes me soft."

Aizawa hummed. "Good. You needed it."

They sat with that truth and let it settle like silt in deep water.

Then Aizawa asked, voice quiet, "Are you sure he's the one?"

Katsuki didn't have a doubt in his mind. His face softened. His shoulders dropped. And when he smiled, it wasn't bitter or cocky, but warm.

"It's always been him."

Aizawa nodded once.

And that was all the blessing Katsuki would ever get from him. But it was all he needed.

Later in the afternoon, Katsuki returned to the quiet of their room.

He stood beside the bed and looked down at Izuku, whose breaths came deep and even. He was wrapped beneath the tangle of blankets cocooned tight around him.

He looked so small like this, tucked in and cheeks kissed pink by slumber.

Izuku's lips parted ever so slightly as he dreamed. His wild hair was a mess, as always, curling over his forehead. It splayed over the pillow in a way that should've looked ridiculous —but to Katsuki, it was perfect. Everything about him was. The curve of his mouth. The way his lashes fluttered when he stirred. Even the way he curled his fingers under his cheek seemed so delicate.

Kasuki smiled a little. Then in that moment Izuku's eyes cracked open, hazy with sleep. Those impossibly green eyes blinked up at him slowly, disoriented and full of trust.

"Kacchan?" Izuku's voice came low, still heavy with dreams. He tried to rise, but his body was sluggish and sore from everything it endured. "Is it time to get up?"

Katsuki leaned down. He pressed an affectionate kiss to his husband's forehead.

“Don’t worry. Keep resting, Izuku.”

Izuku sighed, the sound small and content. He melted back into the bed without resistance, eyes falling shut again as his body yielded to comfort. The blankets shifted as he curled deeper into them, a breathy “M’kay,” escaped his lips, barely audible.

Katsuki crouched beside the bed. He hesitantly lifted one hand, brushing it gently through Izuku’s hair. He caressed Izuku as if trying to soothe away every ache and nightmare that ever touched him. When Izuku snored again, Katsuki faintly smiled.

He didn’t move for a long time.

He stayed there, admiring his husband as he reflected on everything.

The next morning at breakfast, Izuku joined them after sleeping for a full day. Izuku was mortified, but Katsuki was glad. His husband’s body must’ve shifted out of survival mode to rest mode. It pleased Katsuki deeply to know Izuku’s subconscious felt safe.

He hoped in the future they would have a lot of days where Izuku slept peacefully from sunrise to sunset.

As they ate, Aizawa remained unusually focused on a mess of documents in front of him. He was scribbling something in sharp, short strokes. It caught Katsuki’s attention—mostly because Aizawa never did paperwork at the table.

“What’s that?” Katsuki asked, because subtlety wasn’t his strong suit and never would be.

Aizawa signed one last line with a practiced flick of his pen. “I was just finishing going over the final details of Izuku’s case.”

Everything stilled. Katsuki stopped chewing. Izuku paused, his fork midair. Even the quiet murmur of conversation around the table stuttered out into silence.

“My case?” Izuku clarified.

“Yup. You’re officially a client of ours.” Aizawa then reached down and pulled out a green folder from under his seat. He neatly tucked away the papers inside and held it up. “Congrats.”

And there it was, as clear as day: Izuku’s eyes and hair matching the green folders he used to despise so much. He wondered if this was a stroke of fate too—so clearly flailing her arms in front of him for years trying to get him to notice that Izuku needed help.

He felt so damn dumb for ever doubting all this cosmetic shit.

When their breakfast concluded, Aizawa passed the folder to Katsuki with more weight than he’d ever handed over anything before.

“This is officially your last green folder assignment, kid,” Aizawa stated. “Make it count.”

Katsuki gave a single nod, stiff with purpose.

Izuku, brows pinched in confusion, leaned in and asked gently, “What does green mean?”

Silence folded over the room. Everyone turned towards him. Katsuki didn’t let go of Izuku’s hand. Instead, he gripped it tighter until he could feel Izuku’s pulse in his fingertips.

When Katsuki’s voice came, it was rough and certain.

“Green means to protect.”

And if green meant protect, then Katsuki would make damn sure Izuku was protected at all costs.

The next two weeks at the cabin passed like melting snow. All too quiet, unnoticed, and far too fast.

It was strange how easily Izuku blended into the rhythms of their group. It was like he’d been there all along, waiting for the right moment to appear.

Katsuki found himself silently watching those interactions more often than not. He would lean in door frames or hovering at the edge of the room, taking it all in.

Miruko and Denki, the twin terrors of loud affection and louder teasing, adopted Izuku almost instantly. The two of them trailed behind him constantly, clinging to his side like excitable siblings. They showered him with attention and laughter. Izuku basked in it. He was shy at first, but then slowly he opened up and became more trusting.

It filled Katsuki with a strange, warm pride to watch. He would have never guessed he wanted to see this. The sight of his husband laughing with people he loved. It felt like witnessing two halves of his life gently merge into one.

One of his favorite moments came unexpectedly. He wandered into the living room and caught sight of the scene.

Miruko was perched comfortably on the couch. Her legs were stretched out in front of her, and between them, seated on the floor, was Izuku. He leaned back into her space, relaxed and trusting. His eyes closed in lazy contentment while she gently brushed through his unruly curls. They were snickering about something, voices light.

Katsuki’s heart nearly stalled when he saw the small ponytails she was tying at the base of his husband’s nape. Two stubby little things that bounced slightly with every laugh.

“This should be illegal,” Katsuki said flatly.

He stepped closer with a fake glare and a real smile tugging at the corner of his mouth. He leaned down and flicked one of the tiny pigtails with exaggerated judgment.

“I think it’s sort of cute,” Izuku replied brightly.

His eyes opened and looked up at Miruko with a grin. Miruko matched his energy, her face glowed with mischievous pride.

“Ahh, this is so nice!” she practically sang. “I’ve always wanted to do this with Katsuki, but he never lets anyone touch him.” She shot him side-eyed as if to say ‘see what you’ve been depriving me of all these years?’

Katsuki scoffed and crossed his arms. “I would sooner throw myself into traffic than let anyone put pigtails on me.”

Izuku looked up at him sweetly, almost too sweetly. He held up a pair of thin, pink rubber bands like an offering.

“Can I?” His husband asked.

Katsuki’s knee jerk reaction kicked in first. He was about to blurt a loud, “Hell no”—but it died in his throat. He hesitated, pinned down by Izuku’s puppy-like stare. Those green eyes were damn near criminal. He swallowed, scowled, and muttered curses under his breath.

Moments later, Katsuki was sitting cross-legged on the floor.

He hunched just enough for Izuku to reach. He didn’t look at anyone else and kept his eyes locked on his husband’s face. He frowned deeply when he found himself blushing.

Izuku grinned cutely as he gathered the top of Katsuki’s hair into two tiny puffs.

Miruko was practically vibrating with glee beside them.

“I can’t believe what I’m seeing,” she giggled. “You’re officially a domesticated man, Bakugou.”

“We’re never speaking a word about this,” Katsuki replied darkly.

They both laughed. Katsuki scowled and he could feel the stupid pink rubber bands tight against his scalp. But as Izuku and Miruko chuckled together, making small jokes about how he resembled a Pomeranian, Katsuki felt a small, love sick smile creep over his face.

He adored Izuku so much.

There were more moments like this during their two weeks in the cabin. Most of them were gentle and made Katsuki feel completely at ease. But he did notice he and Izuku got teased more often than not.

He pretended not to care but it was starting to feel like their entire relationship was the house’s entertainment. At first, he rolled with it. He had thick skin, and Izuku blushed prettily whenever someone poked fun at them.

But then the ring conversation happened, and Katsuki suddenly did mind.

“Speaking of the big M,” Miruko interjected suddenly. Her sharp grin already meant trouble. She pointed with perfect aim at the two battered rings on their fingers. “Please don’t tell me those are what I think they are.”

And just like that, everyone, even Aizawa, lifted their gaze.

Katsuki tensed the moment Aizawa leaned forward. The old man took a good look at the ring on his finger and tightened his jaw. Then Katsuki watched with dread as Aizawa got up, crossed the room in a few deliberate steps, and gently took Izuku’s left hand in his own.

No one said a word as Aizawa pulled a pair of reading glasses from his pocket and perched them on his nose. The entire group watched, stunned, as he peered at the ring with the solemn precision of a jeweler assessing a counterfeit.

Aizawa’s face pinched with disapproval. Deep lines formed on his forehead with every second he squinted at the ring like it personally insulted him.

Then his gaze inched towards Katsuki. It was flat and weighted with judgment.

“Bakugou, I didn’t peg you as cheap,” he chastised, tone unforgiving. “You proposed to this poor boy with a fake ruby? Even with how much I pay you?”

Katsuki sputtered, heat flushing up his neck like a damn geyser.

“N-No!” He barked, flustered beyond reason. “I’m not fucking cheap, you know that!”

He stood up abruptly and stormed across the room. In one swift motion, he snatched Izuku’s hand away and covered the ring with his palm to shield it from everyone’s invasive stares.

“And there was no proposal,” Katsuki muttered sharply. “We got these rings quickly at a street vendor in Okinawa to keep up the ruse. We didn’t exactly have time to take a stroll through Tiffany & Co.”

Shinsou, lounging with his usual air of amusement, raised a brow. “Not even while you were practically on a honeymoon in Biei?”

“I—” Katsuki started, then stopped.

His gaze flicked down to Izuku, and the embarrassment burned out quickly. In its place came the heavier weight of regret. He glanced down at the rusted band encircling Izuku’s finger.

“No. We didn’t…have time.”

Izuku said nothing. But his expression shifted—just slightly. A quiet sadness settled in the corner of his eyes. It was the kind of sadness that made Katsuki want to turn back time to do things differently.

It hit him then, and it hit hard.

In the chaos of simply surviving, Izuku had been robbed of all the small things he probably dreamed about: a proposal, the perfect ring, the ceremony, and the deliberate joy of building a future with the one he loved.

And Katsuki, the dumbass that he was, never asked about those things.

He could picture it if he tried. He saw Izuku curled up with some secret scrapbook, all smiles and highlighters. He probably carefully planned his dream wedding between assassination missions. The dork was hopeless like that. Probably even knew what kind of suit he wanted to wear down the aisle.

Katsuki swallowed hard.

Izuku hadn't gotten to live out a single piece of the romantic part of marriage.

That truth bothered him the rest of the week, until it became so big he couldn't ignore it.

So when they were alone again on the balcony, he let the thought slip free.

Aizawa had told them that he used to listen to the town's orchestra from this same spot with his wife. Now, the same delicate music wove its way through the air, curling up to meet them in faint, whispering waves. Izuku leaned gently on the railing beside him, bundled in his sweater. His cheeks touched pink by the cold and his expression was utterly relaxed.

Katsuki's eyes were drawn again to the shabby ring.

"Do you have a dream wedding ring?" Katsuki asked quietly.

Izuku blinked in surprise, clearly caught off guard. Pretty blush bloomed up from his neck and kissed his cheeks as he let out a shy laugh.

"Ha, I do," Izuku replied. He scratched at his cheek, sheepish. "Or I did. You know me, hopeless romantic. B-But what my ring looks like and all that doesn't matter to me anymore. I'm okay with anything as long as you're my person at the end of the day."

Katsuki huffed, gaze dropping to the railing as he shook his head. "But if you could have your dream ring, what would it be?"

Izuku pressed his lips together thoughtfully. His brows furrowed with focus.

"I've always adored 'eternity' wedding bands," he answered truthfully. "The concept and look of them is very romantic to me. The way they loop endlessly with diamonds, or whichever jewel, all the way around. It feels like they truly represent love instead of one, big giant rock. Eternity like infinity. The love just…keeps going around and around, never ending."

He smiled at Katsuki. Then Katsuki, softening with every heartbeat, smiled right back.

“I would love an eternity wedding band made of rubies,” Izuku whispered. He paused, eyes searching Katsuki’s. “Or maybe an amber stone that leans more red would fit your eyes better.”

Katsuki felt his heart squeeze.

Eternity bands. Damn, how was Izuku always this tender without even trying? He made a silent promise right then to get him whatever the hell he wanted for their future redo ceremony.

“…And your dream wedding?” Katsuki questioned.

Izuku shrugged lightly, eyes glittering as they returned to the view.

“Small. Very personal with a few people and the person I love.” He grinned to himself, a far-off look overtaking his face. “I’ve always loved the idea of a wedding on the roof of the tallest skyscraper at night. The city and ocean in the background stretching on and on like the eternity bands…Maybe we’re both dressed in all white with handmade flower crowns.”

Katsuki could see it. He pictured them on the roof top of the highest building. All around them would be hues of orange, pink, and blue. The colors would melt together and it would be like getting married in the clouds.

Birds would sing and best of all, Izuku would be with him.

He envisioned Izuku in a white suit with a warm breeze threading through his curls. Maybe flower petals in his hair and glitter around his eyes.

He probably would look like a damn dream.

“How about you, Kacchan? Any romantic ideas floating around up in there?”

“I never gave it thought,” Katsuki confessed. “But I think I would like an eternity band too. One made of emeralds preferably.”

Their hands found each other in the silence that followed. Their fingers tangled like ivy. They held each other gently as the morning hushed around them.

And somewhere, down in the town below, a new melody began to rise.

It started softly with an opening line whispered from a violin—then built with cautious grace.

Katsuki stiffened. So did Izuku.

In unison, their heads turned toward the sound, eyes wide. Katsuki strained to listen, heartbeat caught in his throat, convinced he’d imagined it. But then came the next few notes, lilting and delicate. Each one threaded into the next with eerier familiarity.

The violins sang to the air, joined by a low, echoing viola. The tempo weaved like silk through the day, bright and aching. It shimmered, alive and unmistakable.

His breath caught in his chest. It couldn't be.

"Is…" Katsuki whispered, barely breathing, "Is that—"

Izuku finished for him, voice full of stunned wonder.

"The Dance Of The Love Birds?"

Katsuki couldn't believe it.

But he was proven wrong.

Clear and unmistakable, the melody drifted through the air like a dream made real. Each note was exact, hitting every childhood memory that was etched into his bone. It was almost the same. Almost. Now, something new wove itself through the familiar melody: a viola.

It was low and mournful, wrapping around the violin. Together, the two instruments caught in an intimate, wordless conversation.

The violin called out, tender and yearning.

The viola answered, solemn and grounding.

Together they danced, fragile and deliberate. It was like hearing the echo of two hearts that had always moved in tandem, even when they didn't know it. The music unfolded much like a promise, each note a step taken along the edge of danger.

They sat frozen, the world narrowing until it was only them and the sound.

And suddenly, they were no longer on a snowy balcony. They were children again—laughing under the statue of the broken angel. Their eyes were full of wonder, and their heads were full of bright dreams about the future. The notes fluttered through them, soft as a passing breath. Each high note pierced and each low note cradled.

The final chord descended with the grace of a feather.

When the last note dissolved into silence, neither of them moved.

Katsuki's eyes burned. He hadn't blinked once.

"…Did I hallucinate that?" he asked, voice hoarse.

"No," Izuku breathed. His eyes were wide, blinking hard as if trying to snap himself out of a trance.

"Did we fucking hallucinate that?" Katsuki muttered. He leaned over to examine Izuku's mug. "Were we slipped shrooms by that damn Denki—"

“—Kacchan, that was real.”

Izuku finally looked at him. They stared at each other, bewildered, still caught in the remnants of the music.

“How is that possible?” Katsuki whispered.

“Maybe someone else heard the song?” Izuku offered, reaching for logic.

“Yeah,” Katsuki murmured. He nodded slowly. “He could’ve played it for other people.”

But they both knew that wasn’t it.

They’d been there for the entire process. That long winter of fine-tuning every note was too unique. The elderly violinist had gone through several versions until it became the variant they just heard. What existed before their input had been scattered and incomplete. But the final piece, the one that now played from the snowy town below, was unmistakably theirs.

“But you have his violin,” Katsuki said suddenly. His voice was lower now, cautious. “You said he gave it to you, right? How could he play this version for other people without his violin?”

Izuku’s brows furrowed. “Maybe he bought another?”

“With what money?” Katsuki countered quickly. “He was homeless. Just like I was.”

“After you left, I gave him all the money I saved for us to go to Okinawa,” Izuku replied.

Katsuki nodded. But then Izuku’s expression shifted.

“But it wasn’t enough to buy another violin,” Izuku mumbled.

He turned, back toward the town, and dove deep in thought. Katsuki sat still and strained his ears. He searched for the music again, hoping to find some proof of what they had heard. He felt crazed a bit, wishing with everything he had that they could hear it once more.

But the melody was gone.

Katsuki was the first to move. He stepped away from the railing and slipped inside. The warmth of the fire was a stark contrast to the chill still clinging to his shoulders. Izuku followed without a word. They closed the balcony door behind them and sat down on the couch, side by side.

No words passed between them.

They simply watched the fire and held the silence.

“How’d you like it?” Aizawa suddenly asked.

Their heads turned in tandem. Aizawa sat across the living room in his usual reading chair. A book was open in his lap. He looked calm—completely unaware of their turmoil.

Izuku blinked, caught off guard. Katsuki cleared his throat and straightened his spine.

"We…" Katsuki began, the words dragging out of his mouth. "…We really liked it."

Aizawa frowned, unconvinced. "Are you sure? You look like you've seen a ghost."

Izuku forced a smile. "We did like it," he said gently, trying to sound steady. "It was magical. Thank you for telling us about it."

That seemed to satisfy Aizawa. His posture relaxed, and he offered a crooked grin.

"I had a feeling you two would enjoy it," he said. "It's a very romantic time. Makes the impossible seem possible."

"Is there a website or something for the orchestra?" Katsuki asked quickly. "Like can we check out who is scheduled to play or the name of the songs?"

Aizawa shook his head.

"Unfortunately, they're old school," he explained. "The town below is pretty rural given its mountain location. You have to go to Will Call to look at the set list and purchase tickets."

Katsuki scowled faintly. "You mean we would have to go in person?"

"Yes," Aizawa said, now eyeing them with growing suspicion. "Is something the matter?"

"We heard a song we recognized from a long time ago," Izuku explained. "It's silly but we knew the homeless street performer who created it. So it's bizarre to hear it played by a real orchestra."

That got Aizawa's attention. His brow rose with interest. "What's the song?"

The two shifted slightly, exchanging uncertain glances. Then, after a short pause, Izuku started humming first. Katsuki joined him a moment later, and together they tried to reconstruct the melody. It was clumsy and off-pitch, but unmistakably The Dance of The Love Birds.

"Ah." Aizawa nodded slowly. "Yeah. I've heard that play from the town a couple times the last two years."

Both Katsuki and Izuku sat up straighter.

"Really?" Izuku asked, eyes wide.

"Did you ever go see it in person?" Katsuki added at the same time.

“No,” Aizawa replied. “It’s a beautiful melody though. The venue down there has a lot of concerts from new Neo-Classical hits. I think they do tours from select composers.”

The two stared at each other, tension heavy between them.

“Crazy coincidence though,” Aizawa mused. “That’s very neat that you knew who made the song. Do you know their name?”

“No,” Katsuki said gruffly, a bit ashamed. “We, uh, never asked.”

Aizawa let out a long, theatrical sigh and shook his head. “Rude. Even as a child. Well. Maybe you’ll get to hear it again before it’s time to go.”

This felt too simple to let slide by. But realistically—what else could they do?

After that, Aizawa launched into a brief lecture about the importance of asking for people’s names. Katsuki groaned, letting his head fall back against the couch. When the scolding ended, the conversation tapered into a lull, leaving only the low hum of wind.

Eventually, Aizawa stood. With a grunt, he stretched his arms above his head and muttered something about tracking down the other “headaches” on his property to make sure no one had died yet.

Katsuki and Izuku went about the rest of their day.

But the entire time, Katsuki couldn’t stop turning the melody over in his head. The more he thought about it, the more it unsettled him.

“Wow,” Katsuki muttered later that night, still reeling. He turned to Izuku with a crooked smile and gently took his hand. “What a fuckin’ coincidence, right?”

“Yeah,” Izuku said with a quiet laugh. “How crazy.”

It didn’t feel like a coincidence.

It felt like goddamn fate.

But he struggled to admit it out loud. He was gradually coming to terms with it, but it was as if that word was stuck on the tip of his tongue.

That night, they crawled into bed and chalked the entire thing up to an insane fluke. Katsuki closed his eyes and tugged Izuku close into his arms. As he drifted off, he dreamed—not of what had been, but of what could be. In his dream, he and Izuku danced to the music, their steps perfectly matching the rhythm of thee violin and viola respectfully.

Izuku fit the light, reaching notes of the violin. Katsuki grounded them, rich and steady like the viola.

Together, they made the song whole.

The next day slipped by before Katsuki knew it.

Denki and Sero remained their usual bright, chaotic selves. Miruko and Aizawa held down the fort with their unique brands of order. Shinsou and Monoma stayed mostly to themselves, content to exist on the periphery of the ever-moving chaos.

Katsuki, meanwhile, rarely liked to leave Izuku's side.

They didn't mention the song again. And The Dance of the Love Birds never returned. No stray notes haunted the wind. No familiar melody echoed in the distance. It was as if the moment had come and gone like a real ghost of their past.

By the second day, Katsuki had convinced himself to let it go.

Maybe it was fate, he reasoned. One final echo of their childhood before they left the country for good. A reminder of everything they'd once been. Or maybe, more dangerously, it was fate calling them down the mountain. Inviting them to chase that unfinished part of their lives.

That last thought lingered, feeling a bit too right. But Katsuki refused to give it room. They were too damn close to getting to Nana. And he wasn't about to risk unraveling it all just to chase some phantom song—no matter how beautiful.

But as hard as he tried to bury it, the thought lingered.

It tapped at the corners of his mind like an unwanted visitor coming by over and over and over again.

On the third night, wrapped together under a thick comforter, Izuku broke the silence.

"I think we should go to the orchestra," Izuku whispered, keeping his voice cautious. "Only for a little bit, if only to see who was playing the song."

Katsuki stirred beside him. The mattress dipped as he propped himself up on one elbow. Izuku rolled to face him with weary but serious eyes.

"Is it really that important?" Katsuki asked after a moment, voice low. "I get it. I do, but…" He exhaled heavily. "I don't want to risk setting anything off. We've managed to stay off the radar this long. I'd rather not give the Yakuza another opening."

Izuku didn't answer right away.

His fingers moved idly along Katsuki's arm, tracing quiet, invisible circles against his skin.

"I guess it's not that important," Izuku mumbled. "It's just…I don't know why, but I feel like we have to close the loop. Especially if we're not coming back to Japan." He hesitated. His voice turned softer, almost like he was talking to himself. "What if it's the violinist?"

Katsuki grew sad at that. “I think he might be dead by now, Izuku. He was pretty damn old and frail.”

“I know,” Izuku replied quietly, his fingers still moved against Katsuki’s arm in small, rhythmic motions. “But…I guess I want to see who else knows our song.”

Katsuki let out a reluctant huff of laughter, shaking his head.

“Our song, huh?” Katsuki parroted lightly.

“Yeah, it’s our song,” Izuku smiled lovingly at his husband, and Katsuki returned the gesture with equal warmth. “Is that weird to say? I’ve always thought of that melody as our melody. It feels weird to have it out there and not know who else is playing it.”

Katsuki stared at him for a long, pensive moment.

Then he exhaled a steady breath and laid back down beside his husband. One hand reached up, threading gently through Izuku’s curls before drifting down the curve of his cheek and then his neck.

Izuku’s eyes fluttered shut beneath the touch, and when they reopened, Katsuki knew he could never really say no to Izuku.

“Okay. You have a point,” Katsuki muttered. “In the morning, I’ll talk with Aizawa and see if there’s any leeway. If he says it’s safe to go, then we’ll go check it out.”

Izuku’s face lit up with gratitude. He leaned in without hesitation, beaming.

“Thank you, Kacchan.”

“Anything for you, darling,” Katsuki whispered, soft and sure.

He kissed Izuku’s forehead, and together they sank into the quiet comfort of sleep. As they cuddled, Katsuki kept bringing his eyes back to the shabby rings on their hands.

He began to form a small idea the longer he gazed at the rings.

The next morning at breakfast, much to his surprise, the old man was on board with them going down to the orchestra.

Aizawa gave a lazy shrug while sipping his coffee. He explained that the town seemed safe enough. A few of them had already gone down the mountain for groceries without an issue. So a short trip into town for a few hours shouldn’t raise any red flags. Katsuki felt a jolt of relief and excitement. So did Izuku, who turned to him with a smile so bright it made Katsuki’s heart stumble.

His gaze flicked to the rusted ring on Izuku’s finger, and before he could stop himself, he blurted out, “How about we go at the end of the week then?”

The words tumbled out faster than he meant. There was a slight edge of nerves in his voice that made him wince internally. He bit his lip, silently cursing himself.

“I think that would be a perfect time to go,” he added, trying to sound casual.

But he was sure he failed when he began to bounce his leg slightly beneath the table.

Aizawa’s brow lifted as he caught the movement.

“Why the end of the week?” he asked, eyes narrowing. “It’s not like we’ve got much going on here besides slowly driving each other insane.”

Katsuki froze, his knee locking mid-bounce. Both Aizawa and Izuku were staring at him now, their expressions mildly suspicious.

“I, uh, wanted to ask you a favor,” Katsuki muttered, eyes darting to his plate of food. A slow flush began to creep up his neck. He cleared his throat and added quickly, “Privately. After breakfast.”

Denki groaned dramatically, dragging the sound out with a mock-offended look.

“Aww, come on, Bakugou,” he whined, flashing a wide, impish grin. “We’re all basically family at this point. Whatever it is, just spit it out!”

“I said privately, dipshit,” Katsuki snapped.

His voice came out sharper than he intended and he immediately regretted it. A collective groan circled the table. Miruko shook her head into her coffee while Monoma rolled his eyes with theatrical disdain.

Aizawa exhaled through his nose and nodded. “Alright. We’ll talk after everyone’s eaten. Try not to explode in the meantime, Bakugou.”

The conversation moved on from there. Denki launched into some ridiculous story, and Miruko found a new reason to tease Monoma about his table manners. The room was loud and easy, but Katsuki’s mind wouldn’t settle. His thumb kept drawing slow, anxious circles against the rim of his mug.

Every time his eyes drifted to Izuku, he felt the nerves spool tighter in his chest.

Eventually, breakfast wrapped up. Chairs scraped back, conversations trailed off, and one by one, their friends wandered down the hall. But Izuku lingered. He stayed seated, clearly unsure whether “privately” included him.

Katsuki caught the hesitation and gave him a small, sheepish smile. Then he tilted his chin toward the door.

“That means you too, nerd,” Katsuki said.

Izuku frowned, the pout unmistakable as it formed on his lips. Katsuki had to hide his grin when Izuku let out an unhappy huff and turned around, clearly sour.

Once his footsteps faded, Aizawa raised an eyebrow from behind his coffee mug.

“So what’s with the secrecy?” he asked.

Katsuki cleared his throat, his face heating as he rubbed the back of his neck. He looked anywhere but at Aizawa.

“I want to propose to Izuku at the orchestra.”

Aizawa paused mid-sip. He lowered his mug slowly to study Katsuki with a strange expression.

“But you’re already married.”

“Yeah but it was by accident. And the officiant might’ve been a scam artist,” Katsuki muttered. He rubbed his face with a groan reliving that ordeal. “Look, it’s not about the legality. The nerd’s a romantic. I know he’s always dreamed of some fairytale proposal, and instead he got...a drunken ceremony in Okinawa that he was blacked out for with a ring that turns his finger green.”

Aizawa chuckled. “Charming.”

“I want to do it right,” Katsuki confessed. “Like, actually right this time. I want to surprise him and make it special.”

Aizawa leaned forward slightly. “So what do you need from me?”

“I need help getting a real ring. I don’t want to risk using my account with the Yakuza still looking for us, and I didn’t take out enough cash to afford anything decent. I’ll pay you back when we’re in the clear.”

“I’ll hold you to that,” Aizawa replied, smiling. “I don’t exactly want to use my own accounts right now. But luckily for you, I keep cash in the cabin. In case of a rainy day I stored away a lot of dollars. But I would be glad to use it on this.”

Katsuki exhaled, surprised at how grateful he felt. “You’re serious?”

“Dead serious,” Aizawa said. His tone was dry, but his eyes were warm. “Can’t say no to love, I guess.”

“I owe you.”

“You do. I’ll send you the bill when you least expect it.”

Katsuki snorted. His mind wandered as he excitedly thought about the proposal. He could perfectly picture how surprised Izuku would be. His nerd probably would cry out of joy and smile until his damn cheeks hurt.

While he was lost in his thoughts, Katsuki didn't notice he was grinning himself.

Aizawa did though. He smirked and said, "You really like him."

"A ton," Katsuki laughed. He shrugged, and though he tried to suppress it, his smile stretched wider. "I don't think I've ever liked someone this much—and much less had them like me back. It feels like I can tell him anything, even show him how goddamn fucked up I am, and he'll always smile and somehow love me more for it. It's more than I could ever ask for."

Aizawa didn't respond right away. He stared at him with eyes full of pride, relief, and a little bit of awe.

"There's a jewelry shop down in the town that can do rush orders," Aizawa said finally. He cleared his throat, as if brushing off the emotions he didn't want to show. "I can go today and see what he can do. Do you know what type of rings you want to buy?"

Katsuki grinned.

"Eternity rings."

Within three days, Aizawa came through with the wedding rings. He pulled Katsuki aside in private, opened the velvet boxes, and revealed the contents.

Katsuki's grin stretched wide the moment he saw them. One eternity band was made entirely of emeralds, the other was made of rubies. And both were equally breathtaking. The stones gleamed with rich color that perfectly matched the hue of their eyes.

The moment he had them in hand, Katsuki wasted no time pulling everyone into his plan.

"Oh my god," Denki squealed, practically bouncing. "This is so awesome, dude! I call the decorations!"

"Yeah, I'll help!" Sero chimed in enthusiastically.

Katsuki was buzzing. This was going to be the best damn proposal imaginable. The nerd wouldn't know what hit him.

That night, when the cabin had gone quiet, Katsuki sat alone and turned the emerald ring over in his fingers. He didn't realize he was gently smiling as he stared at it, watching the way the light shimmered off the stones.

In each emerald, he could see him and Izuku together. In one he saw them as kids. In another he saw them throughout their teen years and then finally their reunion. Every emerald reflected back a memory doused in green like a storybook. And in one, Katsuki could see them old, together. They were sitting on the porch in chairs hand in hand.

Eternity looked damn beautiful.

By the end of the week, everything was in place.

Denki and Sero stayed behind to decorate the cabin for the party. Shinsou did too, not particularly thrilled by Katsuki's idea for the proposal. But despite his lack of enthusiasm, he still pitched in. Katsuki was mildly surprised when Shinsou offered, without being asked, to bake the cake.

Miruko, Monoma, and Aizawa accompanied them down to the orchestra.

Monoma, of course, said he only wanted to come because he needed to see Katsuki get down on one knee. He claimed he didn't believe Katsuki could actually pull off a proper proposal. His tone was as snide as ever, but the jab carried no real meanness. If anything, it felt like he genuinely wanted to be there.

They descended the mountain in a questionable, rickety, cable car. It creaked with every sway and caught on the line in one violent snag that startled them all.

By the time they reached the base, Katsuki was relieved to be alive.

But even more so, he was relieved to see the venue looked as romantic as he'd hoped.

The concert hall stood like a glowing ember in the snow-covered town. Warm light flickered from tall, arched windows fogged with condensation. Golden light spilled into the pale afternoon, casting a glow that almost felt like music itself. Even from the outside, the sound of string instruments drifted into the air.

He scanned the small crowd. Most of them were elderly people, bundled in heavy coats and wool scarves.

They approached the ticket booth as a group. It was an old-fashioned stand trimmed in polished brass. The attendant handed them narrow slips of paper, simple white with delicate black lettering.

Katsuki paused to study his ticket. He read the name of the orchestra printed cleanly across the top.

"Fated Strings: The Twin Stars Concert Series"

Composer: Souta, Amane

They filed quietly into the auditorium, following the slow-moving crowd.

The room itself stole his breath. Rows of plush red velvet seats stretched in perfect symmetry. Each one was trimmed in gold that shimmered beneath the soft glow of the lights. The stage ahead was small and intimate. Its wooden floor was bare except for two simple chairs placed at its center. They were angled facing each other just so.

Katsuki and Izuku settled in the front row beside Aizawa, Miruko, and Monoma. All around them, the audience buzzed with a gentle excitement.

“They say the composer rose to fame only recently,” an older woman whispered from behind them. “Unusual for someone our age to break through now.”

“Definitely,” her companion replied. “But his music—it speaks like it’s been waiting to be heard all his life.”

Izuku glanced sideways at Katsuki, his eyes lighting with quiet curiosity. Katsuki caught the look and grinned. Without saying a word, he reached out and laced their fingers together.

Then, the house lights began to dim.

The low hum of conversation faded. The air thickened with anticipation, and a collective breath held tight.

In that quiet, Katsuki looked at Izuku—really looked.

The soft curve of his smile. The warmth in his big eyes. The calm that radiated from his presence. It hit Katsuki how lucky he was. Somehow, after all the tragedy and violence that riddled his life, he still got to sit here next to Izuku.

His husband caught him looking and smiled back.

The audience erupted into applause as a small woman walked briskly onto the stage. Her skin tone was similar to Miruko’s. And her brown eyes were large and expressive behind thick black glasses. Her dark hair was twisted neatly into a bun. She adjusted her blazer with practiced ease before gesturing warmly to the crowd.

“Hello everyone!” she announced, her voice echoing clearly through the auditorium. “I welcome you to the final act! Thank you all so much for sticking around. We have saved the very best performance for you. He is a new composer on the scene and his masterpiece has been sweeping the country. You all know him—Souta Amane.”

She stepped back and offered a low, graceful bow. “Please, give him a warm welcome!”

As she exited, two new women entered the stage.

Their presence was commanding. They both were dressed in elegant black ballroom gowns. One woman held a violin, and the other a viola. They took their seats in perfect silence, facing each other like reflections. A flicker of a smile passed between them.

Then, the man neither of them ever expected to see again stepped onto the stage.

Both Izuku and Katsuki froze. Their hands clenched tighter.

“Hello, music lovers,” Souta greeted warmly.

The audience erupted in applause and Katsuki’s jaw fell slack.

He stared, stunned.

It was him.

That same face was now lined with age but still alight with mischief and magic. The man's posture, presence, and voice was unmistakable. It was their quirky violinist. Holy shit.

The man walked with a limp now, and the curve of his spine had deepened. But he moved with purpose. His wild white hair was now combed neatly into a bun. Fresh, well-fitted clothes replaced the tattered layers of the past. And in his eyes, still, were stars.

Souta smiled delicately at the crowd. His gaze flitted across them like a breeze, never lingering too long in one place.

"I want to personally thank you all for coming out tonight," he said, his voice as smooth and whimsical as Katsuki remembered. "I know many of you have traveled far to come hear my humble concert pieces. And for that, I am more than thankful. I have composed a lovely hour-long session for you, about two twin stars falling from the sky in tandem. It's a love story, at its core. But it is also my vehicle to express my calling. And all I have ever wanted was to share my calling with the world."

He paused to take a deep breath. Then he straightened his back as much as his worn frame would allow.

"My calling is that I want to create something beautiful," he said—exactly as he had told them all those years ago. "Something that would never leave someone. I want it to imprint on their hearts and in their minds so whenever they hear this melody, they will remember where they were when they first heard it. They will smile, look towards the one they love, and be reminded of all the gorgeous reasons to live."

Beside him, Izuku exhaled shakily. Katsuki tightened his grip on his hand.

"Without further delay," Souta said with a familiar glimmer in his smile, "let us get started with the opening number."

He turned, suddenly solemn. His posture sharpened and his spine drew taut. With grace and precision, he raised his baton.

The violinist and violist lifted their instruments in unison.

Then the song began.

The Dance of The Love Birds wove through Katsuki's ears like wind through bare branches. The song brushed goosebumps across his skin. The melody moved with the softness of a river in spring. It was gentle but relentless, pulling him beneath its surface.

Without warning, he was carried backwards through the timeline of his life.

It began, as it always did, in the cold.

He saw himself surrounded by endless white. The brittle quiet of winter pressed in on all sides. Snow clung to his skin like judgment and gnawed at his bones as he froze alive in a world that offered no warmth. He chased flickers of heat. He even chased flashes of comfort that never stayed.

The tempo picked up. And with each measure of the viola, he felt his childhood unfold: cold shoulders, cruel silences, and the aching hunger for love. The frost bit into him deeper with every reminder that something in him was too broken to be held.

Then—a spark of warmth.

He saw the boy with pretty green eyes and a yellow plastic watch.

Izuku. Small, awkward, and smiling. He came into Katsuki's life like a walking ember. From behind his eyepatch spilled tenderness like sun through a half-drawn curtain. Katsuki watched as that love flooded the frozen corners of his world, melting snow drifts he thought were permanent.

He saw Izuku on a bench, shrugging off his own coat to give to him. Then he saw Izuku come back, day after day to make sure he was alright. And every time he visited with his radiant smile, came safety, kindness and heat.

As the melody softened, Katsuki saw the nook again. It was their perfect sanctuary. The warmth of it bled across his skin, soaking into his frostbitten soul. It whispered to the deepest, most damaged parts of him: You are worthy. You are not unwanted. You are not too broken.

Then the violin rose, brilliant and sure. He saw them dancing. Two small kids awkwardly swaying beneath the fractured wings of the stone angel. Stained glass poured color onto their skin and warmed them both.

The tempo spun them through time.

Then it slowed—and flung him forward.

He was older, alone again, and the cold had returned.

Snow blanketed everything. The only heat he had left was memory. He survived on dreams, rewinding time in his sleep just to touch the warmth once more. But the world had grown colder as he aged. It reminded him every day that he was too broken to be loved. His jagged edges were too sharp for anyone to ever want to get close. He assumed the warmth he'd once known was a fluke.

Until the music exploded.

The violin and viola collided, melting together into a fierce wave.

Every cold memory exploded into fever because Izuku had returned. He came back into his life like he had never left. He was older now, but just as warm—just as loving. Katsuki saw the years they spent orbiting one another. Their melodies were on parallel staves, always edging closer to harmony. Their lives had been messy, broken, and bloodied—but they always circled back to one another.

Struggling. Searching. Surrendering.

And then—heat.

Katsuki saw them kiss. The music roared and the cold burned away. His brittle frostbite was replaced by a feverish passion. It consumed him whole. It was terrifying. Beautiful. Alive.

Katsuki turned to Izuku then.

His husband sat beside him, transfixed. His hands were tucked beneath his chin and his eyes were bright. Tears were sliding freely down his cheeks.

Katsuki's chest tightened.

Izuku had always seen him. Not as a monster or broken—but as a person worth loving. In every version of Izuku, in every year of knowing him, he had pushed Katsuki to be something the world never gave him permission to be: soft.

For the first time in his life, Katsuki saw the truth.

He wasn't broken. He wasn't cold by nature, he had merely been waiting to be thawed.

And Izuku was the one who had done it.

As the music swelled, Katsuki gave in. He let himself drown in the strings and in his memory. He gave himself over to the heat of what it meant to be truly, irreversibly loved.

By the end of the concert, Katsuki and Izuku sat stunned in silence.

There were no words that could capture what had passed through them. The music, beginning with the melody that tied their lives together, felt like a rebirth.

It wasn't until thunderous applause erupted that the spell finally cracked. The audience rose around them like a tide, applauding with awe. Katsuki and Izuku stood too. Slowly, almost reluctant for the experience to end. They clapped not only with praise but with disbelief. Then they clapped faster in gratitude. Then finally, happiness.

Katsuki wiped a tear from his cheek and huffed out a quiet, shaking laugh.

The man who had once been a drifting street violinist was now transformed. He was a maestro of feeling, story, and sound. It made Katsuki's chest ache with joy.

He had thought of the violinist often, even if fleetingly. He'd been the reason Katsuki dreamed of music at all. He'd shown Katsuki that beauty could still come out of pain. That no matter how dark the road, somehow, brightness could still come from it.

Souta stood under the lights, smiling wide as roses fell from the balconies.

Katsuki cursed himself for not bringing any. Instead, he cheered until his throat went raw and clapped until his palms burned. On stage, Souta bowed deeply alongside the violinist and violist. The three of them smiled and waved until the crimson curtains swept shut.

Katsuki let out a breathy laugh and wiped it away with the back of his hand. He turned toward Izuku, heart full.

“That was the best thing I’ve ever fucking seen,” he said, voice cracked with emotion.

Izuku gave a watery laugh. “Yeah,” he breathed, dabbing at his cheeks with little success.

Katsuki reached out and gently brushed away the dampness clinging to Izuku’s face. For a moment they stood there, smiling like fools in the afterglow. Then Katsuki’s expression shifted. His brows knitted, eyes flicking toward the curtain.

“We have to go find him,” he said suddenly.

Izuku nodded without hesitation, and their hands found each other.

Together, they turned to the rest of their group. In urgent voices, they explained that the composer meant a lot from their past in Tokyo. Aizawa, Miruko, and Monoma didn’t ask many questions. They simply nodded and followed. They weaved through the crowd, Izuku at the front, Katsuki close behind.

When they reached the lobby, it wasn’t hard to find him.

Souta stood beneath the statue of a golden angel, bathed in warm light. A group of older women surrounded him. They all offered flowers and laughter as he bashfully rocked on his heels. He grinned at them with the same mischief and gentleness that had once lit the streets of Tokyo.

Katsuki and Izuku exchanged a glance.

Their fingers tightened together. And when the group began to thin out, they stepped forward.

Souta turned to them. In his eyes was the same quiet magic that had followed them all their lives.

“Hello there!” he said brightly. “Did you enjoy the show?”

“We did,” Katsuki replied, voice stiff at first. “We more than enjoyed it, actually.”

“We—” Izuku began, then paused. He swallowed and started again. “We wanted to ask you something. If that’s alright.”

“Of course,” Souta replied, warm as ever. “Ask me anything.”

They both shifted awkwardly, nerves tying their tongues in knots. Their silence dragged a beat too long, like they were trying to step forwards and backwards at the same time. Somewhere behind them, Aizawa let out the faintest sigh. Katsuki winced.

He hadn't felt like a kid in years. And yet here they were again, two small, uncertain boys at the edge of the world.

"I'm Katsuki," he finally said, voice a little steadier now. "And this is Izuku. We used to hang around you a lot. In San'ya, Tokyo. About eighteen years ago?"

Souta's smile faltered.

His brows slowly knitted together, and Katsuki leaned in a little. He watched the realization unfold across the man's face. Souta's gaze moved to their hair, eyes, and finally, their interlocked hands.

"We were there," Katsuki added quietly, "when you first started refining your opening song."

Souta gasped. His hands rose instinctively and hovered midair like he wasn't sure what to do. Then his face bloomed with wonder.

"Oh my goodness," Souta whispered. "It's you! My little ones!"

His gaze flicked between them, eyes going wide with disbelief. Then he blinked, taking in their adult frames, and let out a soft laugh.

"Or—well, not so little anymore. Either of you," Souta chuckled. A delicate grin stretched across his face.

Izuku let out a light laugh. Katsuki followed, unable to stop the smile curling at his lips.

"This is incredible," Souta sang happily, clasping his hands together. He stepped closer, eyes gleaming with warmth. Without hesitation, he opened his arms wide. "Well? What are you standing there for? Come give me a hug!"

They didn't need to be told twice.

Izuku and Katsuki moved in at once with tearful smiles. Souta's bony arms wrapped around them with surprising strength, and Katsuki leaned into the embrace. His arms clung tighter to the man who had unknowingly stitched music and Izuku into the very fabric of his soul.

He smiled wider, holding on as if he could make the moment last forever.

When Souta finally pulled back, he took his time studying them. He nodded in approval and grinned, showing the same crooked teeth. Still a few were missing, but now it was obvious he had a toothbrush.

"I can't believe this," Souta murmured. His gaze dropped to their intertwined hands, and pride spread across his face. "You've been reunited. All my life, I thought you two were separated for good after you disappeared. But you're here. Together."

Katsuki wiped his face with the back of his hand and laughed dryly. “What are the chances, huh?”

Souta wagged a finger. “There’s no such thing as chances, little one. It’s always fate.”

Fate.

Katsuki broke out into a hopeful smile.

Of course it had been fate. How had he been so damn blind all his life?

“I’m so happy to see you’re doing well,” Izuku said softly, stepping back as the embrace loosened. “I thought about you a lot, after everything. I was worried something bad happened.”

Souta’s expression turned tender.

“I was able to get my life together again because of you both,” he said. “When you stopped coming around, it was… hard. I didn’t realize how much I leaned on you. Your presence, your ears, your belief in me—it was like medicine. You helped me grieve my wife. You were the best audience I’ve ever—no.” He corrected himself with a soft shake of the head. “You are the best audience I’ll ever have.”

He turned to Izuku then, gratitude shining in his warm brown eyes.

“And that money you gave me?” Souta said. “I used it to get a room in a small hotel. Something stable. It gave me time to breathe, to think, to pull myself back together.”

“I’m glad it helped,” Izuku replied gently.

“There aren’t enough ‘thank yous’ in the world for it,” Souta whispered. “After that, I got clean. Started playing again. The song finally felt finished. And secretly, I hoped that if I played it long enough, loud enough, it would bring you two back to each other. Just like it did the first time.”

“You were right,” Katsuki chuckled. “We were—just in a roundabout way.”

Izuku smiled. “Adding the viola was a perfect touch. I always thought that song was a solo.”

Souta’s eyes twinkled.

“It was always a duet,” he said with a playful wink. “It was never meant to be played alone.”

Katsuki and Izuku exchanged soft, knowing looks.

“Enough about me!” Souta announced suddenly, alive with energy. He clapped his hands and brought them to his chest. “Tell me—how have the two of you been?”

Katsuki almost said, fucking terrible—but stopped himself. Because right now, everything was okay. Izuku was by his side. They had found each other again. And now even Souta, this unexpected anchor from their past, had come back into their lives.

For the first time, it felt like they were moving forward. Healing, even.

Katsuki shrugged. “We’ve—We’ve been great.”

“Yeah,” Izuku agreed weakly.

Souta beamed. He turned eagerly to Katsuki, eyes gleaming.

“Please tell me you grew up to be a composer!” he exclaimed. “Your ear for harmony and timing—it’s like listening to a clockmaker fine-tuning the gears of a symphony. I couldn’t have pulled off that piece without you.”

Then he turned to Izuku, warmth deepening in his voice. “And you! I’ve never seen anyone take to the violin the way you did that year. You played like someone who’d stumbled upon a buried part of his soul and was aching to let it sing! Surely, you both stayed in music?”

Katsuki saw Izuku’s shoulders slump.

The lights in his eye flickered off for a moment, clearly affected.

Without missing a beat, Katsuki wrapped an arm around Izuku. He lovingly squeezed his shoulder.

“We’re working on it,” Katsuki declared confidently. He turned to Izuku then and offered up a strong, hopeful smile that said, ‘we will get there’.

Izuku nodded back and he leaned into him.

“We’re actually leaving Japan soon for a, uh, fresh start. You could say,” Katsuki continued. “But we’re both really damn happy we got the chance to see you again before we headed out.”

Souta perked up. “You’re leaving together?” He glanced between them. “Like you meant to before?”

“Yeah,” Katsuki replied. “We are.”

They fixed each other with gentle gazes. A piece of Katsuki gradually softened. He stared, lost in those beautiful green eyes. Somehow, those eyes were somehow the answers to all of his worries in life. His heart rate increased. The longer he studied Izuku, the more it felt as if fate was surrounding them.

Truly, how could he ever ask for a better moment to propose?

He licked his lips and cleared his throat.

“Actually,” Katsuki said. He shifted his stance, squaring his body towards Izuku, bracing himself to do something he never thought he would ever do. “There was something I wanted to do tonight. I was going to wait until later but—I can't think of a better time than to do it now."

His arm slowly slipped from Izuku, breaking their hold with deliberate care. He cleared his throat again out of jitters.

Izuku's brow pinched. "Kacchan?"

Katsuki took a step back.

His movements were taut with purpose. He gazed Izuku dead in the eyes and all he could see was them together in that future countryside. He reached in his coat pocket with full confidence and burning resolve.

The crowd and world amplified as he felt every emotion rush towards him in a stampede. He felt love. He felt joy. Affection. Happiness. Relief. And above all of it, he felt that unshakable pull of destiny—a red string from his heart to Izuku's.

Katsuki dropped to one knee.

The moment unfolded in total clarity.

The soft hitch of Izuku's breath. The way his damn gorgeous eyes went wide when Katsuki flicked open the velvet box. The way the warm glow of the chandelier brightened the hue of the moment. The sound of everyone around them gasping and cheering them on was like a melody keeping rhythm to the beat of his heart.

"Bakugou Izuku," Katsuki said, his voice cracking around the edges. He pushed the ring up and tethered Izuku's gaze. "Will you marry me?"

For a heartbeat, Izuku could only blink. His mouth parted in shock.

"Wh-What—" Izuku stammered. His cheeks bloomed with color. "We're already married—"

"—Marry me again," Katsuki insisted. His grip on the ring box tightened. "Sober this time."

His gaze didn't waver. He burned from the inside out with passion and conviction for Izuku. But behind all that fire was a vulnerability he usually never let anyone see. Progressively, piece by piece, Katsuki unraveled himself. He shed his defenses, tucked away every instinct to flinch, to guard, and to hide. He offered up the barest parts of himself to be seen.

He showed everyone around them the aching, gaping wound he'd never dared let be exposed —all for Izuku.

Without a word, Izuku dropped to his knees. He reached out to cup Katsuki's face and nodded.

"Yes," Izuku choked out. "Yes, of course, I'll marry you again."

Laughter burst from him through the sobs, the sound was shaky and radiant. Soon Katsuki laughed too, overcome by emotion. It felt like his broken heart inside him was mending again, pulled together by the strength of Izuku's love.

They grinned like fools, two lovers who had braved many storms and finally found harbor within each other.

Katsuki took Izuku's hand. With care, he slipped off the old, rusted ring and tucked it safely into Izuku's pocket. Then, with a triumphant grin stretched across his face, he slid the new wedding ring of rubies into place.

It fit like it had always belonged there.

The crowd erupted into applause.

Katsuki's heart soared so high it felt like it might fly away. He glanced up to see Miruko whistling and clapping with wild enthusiasm. Aizawa stood with his arms folded and a rare look of quiet pride. Even Monoma rolled his eyes. But not even he could hide the crooked smile tugging at his mouth.

All around them, guests began to join in. Cheers echoed through the golden-lit lobby. The sound swelled to an applause that matched the one Souta got.

And in the center of it all, Katsuki and Izuku knelt together.

Souta was crying now too, clapping his frail hands. His face was alight with joy. He laughed exactly like he used to, raspy and full of warmth.

"My little ones," Souta murmured through trembling lips. "My fated little ones."

Then, with care, Souta bent down and lifted the violin case at his feet. A quiet click echoed as he opened it, revealing a gleaming white violin nestled inside. He drew it out and cradled the instrument like it was his only possession.

With one fluid motion, he raised the bow and set his stance.

The three of them exchanged a single look. And for a fleeting moment, Katsuki felt as though he'd stepped into Izuku's book.

"Let me offer you a dance," Souta said gently, his voice threaded with joy. "To celebrate your real marriage."

He didn't wait for a reply. He simply began to play.

The Dance of the Love Birds unfurled like silk in the air. But this time, it sounded even richer, even more alive.

Katsuki reached out and tugged Izuku to his feet. Dazed but smiling, Izuku followed.

They stumbled a little at first, bumping into each other with breathless laughter. Then, as always, they found their rhythm. Their push and pull. Their chase and catch. They twirled and stepped, swayed and turned. And they let the music guide them like it had all those years ago in Tokyo.

The song wrapped around them like a ribbon of nostalgia, binding them beneath the golden angel.

They never looked away from each other.

When the final note rang out, applause blossomed again. This time it was softer. Murmurs and sniffles wove through the air. A few scattered whistles broke the hush, but even those felt weighted with emotion.

Izuku gazed up at him with stars in his eyes.

And for once, it felt like the universe had aligned.

Katsuki pulled his husband into him, arms wrapped tight. Izuku held him back, matching the strength. It was a fierce hold that said I love you in more ways than there were languages.

“Sorry for the ambush,” Katsuki murmured against Izuku’s ear. “I wanted it to be a surprise. Y’know, romantic and all.”

Izuku smiled into his chest.

“It was,” he whispered. “Well done.”

Katsuki swelled with pride for making his husband happy.

When they returned to the cabin, the celebration that followed felt like it could’ve lasted a hundred nights. It was, without question, the most unforgettable evening of Katsuki’s life. Despite the tacky decorations it was somehow more beautiful than anything he could have asked for.

Izuku couldn’t stop staring at his ring. His cheeks tinted pink and his lips curled into that radiant smile Katsuki always loved. He looked happy in the way Katsuki always hoped he could one day make him.

And being surrounded by their chaotic, beloved crew made it all the more perfect. Just as the room had quieted from the initial cheers, Katsuki revealed the second ring.

A emerald eternity band meant to mirror Izuku’s.

Izuku’s eyes widened, and with slightly trembling fingers, he slid it onto Katsuki’s hand.

It clicked into place like it had always belonged there.

Joy flooded Katsuki's chest. It was almost overwhelming. He hadn't known happiness could feel this full. He felt somehow both wild and tamed. But above all, complete.

The rest of the night unfolded in an ecstatic blur. They danced. They drank too much. They sang off-key and off-tempo. All of their laughter rose into the rafters like firelight. The world beyond the cabin might as well have vanished; nothing existed except this moment.

And when things finally calmed down, Katsuki wasn't ready for it to end.

One by one, their friends stumbled off to bed. They were all too drunk or too sleepy to keep their eyes open. Doors clicked shut down the hallway, and the two of them were alone on the couch. They were tangled together and giggling. Their cheeks were flushed and they both were very much tipsy.

Izuku was still gazing at his hand like it held the galaxy.

They sat like that for a while, shoulders pressed and limbs overlapping.

"What color suits should we wear at our wedding?" Izuku asked, voice soft.

"White or black," Katsuki answered without missing a beat. "Maybe you in white. You'd look—" he hesitated, almost shy, "—fucking beautiful."

Izuku grinned. "I think we should both have pink suits."

Katsuki barked out a laugh. His eyes narrowed in mock horror as the image invaded his mind.

"Not a chance," he chuckled. "It'll be a long day in hell before I ever wear a pink suit."

"Never say never, Kacchan," Izuku sing-songed.

They laughed together, warmth radiating in every direction.

They stayed there, curled together on the couch. They talked into the quiet of the night, debating wedding decorations and clothes. They lightly bickered about table runners and flower arrangements. They also joked about a cake made of katsudon.

Katsuki never thought he'd be arguing over what songs to play for a first dance, but here they were. He played fake appalled at all the cheesy songs Izuku suggested. But really, he loved them all. He'd dance with Izuku to any song as long as his husband was the one he was dancing with.

At some point, Katsuki's eyes drifted closed, lulled by the calm and the comfort of the body against his.

Izuku followed soon after, their breaths slowing in sync.

And eventually, in the softest kind of peace, they both fell asleep in each other's arms.

The next three days passed with a quiet, growing kinship in the cabin.

Conversations flowed more easily. Laughter lingered a little longer.

Even Shinsou, who had wielded his suspicion like a sword, began to soften at the edges. His replies lost their bite, and he no longer looked at Izuku like a ticking bomb. Which was great because Katsuki wanted them to be on good terms when they inevitably departed—which was coming soon.

They were officially less than a week away from leaving with Nana.

Katsuki couldn't believe it.

No. Really.

He couldn't believe it.

While the others relaxed, Katsuki went the opposite direction entirely. After the proposal, there was no doubt left in his mind—being together with Izuku was his fate. And that certainty made everything feel more dangerous. Because now Katsuki fully understood how much he had to lose. The thought of being separated from Izuku, gnawed at him day and night.

And their current situation felt too easy.

If there was one thing Katsuki had learned from Izuku's horror stories, it was that easy was never a word that described Tomura. That bastard played the long game. He sets traps within traps, always with a contingency plan waiting underneath. He was a cunning, calculating master strategist who saw the board ten moves ahead.

Katsuki had witnessed that firsthand when he discovered the tracker buried in his bike. And he knew—deep in his goddamn bones—that something was off. Because monsters recognized monsters. And Tomura wasn't just any monster—he was an apex predator.

Which begged the question, why had nothing occurred the last few weeks?

He knew better than to underestimate the Yakuza or the Vipers. And the longer this fragile peace held, the more it set him on edge. Which is why when Aizawa began to discuss their escape route, his gut was screaming bloody murder.

"Alright, everyone," Aizawa said. He gathered them at the large dining room table with notes and a map. "We're going to begin our journey to Okinawa soon."

He dragged his finger to the point where Nana would be located and circled it in red marker.

Aizawa continued on, "I have sent word to a friend and he's bringing my private boat up to the north point of Mount Rausu. It should be smooth sailing. The ship is discreet enough that we'll be able to ease by without alerting any Yakuza."

“How long will we be on the boat?” Izuku asked seriously.

“About three days,” Aizawa informed them. “Which means, we need to leave from here in two days. After this, everyone needs to start packing their bags and preparing their weapons. Please leave the bags in the bunker area in case of an emergency exit.”

No one argued.

One by one, they packed their things in tense silence, quietly storing bags in the bunker beneath the cabin. Once the preparations were done, the house fell into a hush, broken only by the wind brushing against the windows and the soft crackle of the fire.

By the time the last light flicked off, Katsuki and Izuku were in bed. Katsuki laid on his back. One of his arms was around Izuku’s shoulders and his fingers absently traced circles on his bare skin. He stared into the darkness, eyes fixed on the opposite wall.

Izuku was curled into his side. His head rested over Katsuki’s chest, utterly content.

“Wow, we’re so close,” Izuku whispered with a sleepy grin. “Can you believe it?”

Not really, Katsuki wanted to say. But instead, he murmured, “Yeah. We are.”

Izuku cracked one eye open and tilted his head. “Aw, c’mon. Add some enthusiasm in there.” His grin widened. “It’s a miracle nothing’s happened so far. Smile a bit.”

Katsuki offered a fake, crooked grin. “You’re right. It’s a miracle.”

“I’m gonna dream of us on the boat,” Izuku mumbled, already halfway to sleep.

Katsuki leaned in and kissed his forehead. “You do that.”

Katsuki couldn’t fucking sleep.

The hours dragged on, ticking by like the countdown to a bomb. Each minute was louder in his skull than the last. The clock read almost midnight, and he hadn’t caught a single wink of sleep. Why? Because his cursed, relentless paranoia had clawed its way back in his head. It was whispering poison straight into his skull.

But this time, it wasn’t about him.

It was about Izuku.

“You’re not strong enough to keep him safe,” hissed his self hatred. “He’s going to be taken from you, and you won’t be able to stop it.”

“Even if you were strong enough,” added self-doubt, quieter but crueler, “what if you’re not prepared for the Vipers? What if they take everything?”

Then came the worst of it—

“What if you’re not smart enough to outmaneuver Tomura?” His anxiety slithered in. “He could show up tomorrow and snatch Izuku from your arms. And you’d just have to watch it happen.”

That was the thought that did it.

Katsuki bolted upright, heart racing and breath uneven. Sweat pricked along his hairline. He reached over and shook Izuku, urgent and sharp.

“Izuku. Wake up.”

Izuku groaned sleepily, voice gravel-thick and confused. “Huh…? Kacchan?”

“We need to put a tracker on you,” Katsuki announced without preamble. “Now. In case we get separated. I—I have a bad feeling. And I’m not taking chances with your brother involved. Frankly, we should have done this a while ago given the situation.”

Izuku blinked blearily, his eyes barely open. “...I don’t have a cracker,” he mumbled.

Katsuki frowned. “What?”

“I said—no more cracker talk, Kacchan,” Izuku slurred, eyes drifting shut again. “We can get more crackers when the boat docks.”

“What the fuck,” Katsuki muttered.

He gaped as Izuku flopped back onto the pillow and curled up like nothing happened.

Then Katsuki tried shaking his husband again. “Izuku.”

But he was already gone, lips parted in sleep, breath gently even. He mumbled something that sounded vaguely like ‘cabin cheese’. He swatted lazily at Katsuki like he was an annoying fly.

Katsuki exhaled hard. He dragged both hands down his face. “Fuck me.”

He sat back, grinding the heels of his palms into his eyes. He tried to force the intrusive thoughts into silence. But they didn’t fade—they multiplied.

The longer he sat there, the louder the inner noise became, a chorus of worst-case scenarios. He saw every single one. And in every story line, he wasn’t crafty enough to get the upper hand on Tomura. Because that bastard’s sharpest weapon wasn’t his physical strength, it was his mind.

Katsuki glanced toward the bag by the wall. It was the one that held all his tracking gear.

Then he glanced down at Izuku’s hand. His ruby wedding ring glinted in the moonlight.

Katsuki's stomach turned.

An idea was forming. It was birthed from a lifetime of sheer survival instinct. He hesitated, heart pounding with an inkling of guilt. The better half of him told him to wait until the morning to discuss it with Izuku—but the side of him that was controlled by his insecurities was louder.

Fuck it.

Cynicism is what kept him alive this long. Because while he might've started to believe in fate lately, he sure as fuck didn't believe in miracles.

With a steady, practiced hand, Katsuki slid the ring from Izuku's finger.

He got out of bed and moved toward his gear.

Katsuki sat hunched over the kitchen table. The only light in the dark cabin came from a single overhead bulb casting a harsh yellow circle over his work.

Scattered across the wooden surface were thin wires, globs of adhesive, and the tiniest tracking chip he'd ever tried to use. It was about the size of a small, unremarkable beed. His magnifying glasses sat perched on the bridge of his nose as he held fine-tipped tweezers. He was carefully attempting to wedge the tracker between the rubies of Izuku's wedding ring.

It wasn't going well.

The glue he had wasn't meant for metal, and the tracker kept slipping.

But Katsuki was stubborn. He'd make it work, even if it took all night.

Just when he thought he found the right angle, a deliberate throat-clearing snapped him out of his tunnel vision. Katsuki's head jerked up.

Standing in the hallway was Monoma. The other blond was dead-eyed and draped in a royal blue robe with fuzzy purple slippers. And on his face was the most unimpressed expression, looking like a true judgmental king.

"What are you doing?" Monoma asked flatly, arms crossed and an eyebrow arched.

Katsuki yanked off his glasses and put down the ring. "Nothing."

Monoma cocked his head. "That doesn't look like nothing."

Scowling, Katsuki crossed his arms over his chest. "What are you doing up?"

"I came for a drink of water," Monoma quipped back. "The air up here dries out my throat. I have delicate vocal cords and I want to make sure they're not damaged for future karaoke sessions."

“Then get your water and go back to bed,” Katsuki snapped.

But Monoma, ever the pain in his ass, took his sweet time. He shuffled to the fridge, opened it with a sigh, and let the fluorescent light spill out. He retrieved a glass with exaggerated slowness, filled it with water, and drank it like he was a goddamn fish.

Just when Katsuki thought he was finally done, he was proven wrong.

Monoma wandered over and took a seat across from him at the table. He looked at the mess with scrutinizing eyes. Then he reached for Izuku’s ring and held it up between two fingers.

“You’re not seriously putting a tracker in your husband’s wedding band, are you?”

Katsuki pressed his lips together, jaw ticking.

They glared each other down, like two bulldogs locked in a dead stare. Katsuki hated how easily Monoma could read him. And the feeling was likely returned tenfold.

Finally, he broke.

“Yeah. I am,” Katsuki confessed.

Monoma didn’t react.

No scoff. No judgment. Only silence, and his eyes remained fixed on the ring.

Katsuki sighed, rubbing the back of his neck. His voice dropped low, barely above a whisper.

“I couldn’t sleep,” he admitted. “I kept thinking...if something happens—I need a way to find him.” His fingers hovered over the tracker again, trembling slightly. “This is the only thing I could think of.”

For a long beat, Monoma said nothing. Then, finally, he set the ring down on the table. He gave Katsuki a look that was uncharacteristically tender, and leaned back in his chair.

“Are you going to tell him?” Monoma asked.

Katsuki huffed. “Yeah, I’m gonna tell him,” he muttered, more defensive than he meant to be. “First thing in the morning. I just…couldn’t sleep with the idea bouncing around in my head. I had to do something.”

Monoma tilted his head, studying him. “Honestly, I’m surprised you two didn’t discuss tagging him already. Considering how high stakes the situation is.”

Katsuki exhaled hard through his nose. “Yeah. I know, I should’ve. I’m stupid.”

“Not stupid,” Monoma offered. “Simply overconfident. Like most barbarians.”

Katsuki shot him a look. “Takes one to know one.”

Monoma chuckled and his eyes dropped to the mess spread across the table. A pensive minute passed.

“Well,” he said, voice quieter now. “Then let’s make sure it doesn’t fall off when he runs for his life.”

Katsuki blinked. “…You’re helping?”

“Of course I’m helping,” Monoma snipped. “You think I’d let all this work go to waste just because your glue sucks?”

Katsuki huffed a quiet, exhausted laugh. “Thanks.”

“Don’t thank me yet,” Monoma said. “You still owe me a real drink when this shit show is over.”

“Yeah,” Katsuki agreed softly. “Deal.”

“That glue’s not going to hold on to metal,” Monoma added, voice flat. “You need to weld it. Sero left his repair kit under the sink after fixing that busted pipe.”

Without waiting for a response, he shuffled over to the cabinets. He crouched and pulled out a small black toolkit. He tossed it gently onto the table in front of Katsuki.

“There’s a mini soldering iron in there,” Monoma informed him. He walked back to the chair and flopped down with a sigh. He kicked his feet up onto a nearby stool. “That’ll hold better than any glue.”

Katsuki muttered a quick “thanks” and opened the kit. He plugged in the soldering iron to warm it up.

While they waited, Monoma tapped a finger against the table.

“So…why the wedding band?” he asked, curious now. “Why not sew the tracker into his coat or boot or something less sentimental?”

“Because clothes get tossed,” Katsuki answered without hesitation. “This wedding ring is the one thing I know Izuku will keep until the bitter end.”

Monoma considered that, then asked, “But what if the Chisakis or his crazy brother throw it away if they capture him?”

Katsuki hesitated. His jaw worked, eyes narrowing in thought. “Chisaki might strip him of it, yeah. But Tomura…” He trailed off, then wet his lips and leaned forward, elbows on the table. “I don’t think he would.”

Monoma frowned. “You think that psycho would let him keep the ring? Really?”

“I do,” Katsuki muttered seriously.

“What makes you think that?”

“We had an interaction. And it’s been making me think long and hard.”

“When the hell did you have an encounter with him?” Monoma hissed.

“I…I haven’t told Izuku yet, but directly after that masquerade, Tomura found me,” Katsuki regretfully admitted. “I didn’t know who he was. He introduced himself under an alias. But he proposed this stupid fucking deal to me. He asked me to bring him Izuku in exchange for letting me kill Chisaki.”

Monoma’s expression darkened. “Did you take it?”

“Not at first,” Katsuki hesitated, the shame surfacing hard and fast. He looked away. “I told him I was going to kill Izuku. But for some reason, even after I declared that, he gave me the information to go track Izuku down.”

“…Strange,” Monoma murmured. His voice was tight, calculating.

“Right? It was fucking weird,” Katsuki agreed, meeting his eyes now. “But when I realized I didn’t want to kill Izuku. I…I took the deal.”

A long, tired sigh passed through Monoma. He pinched the bridge of his nose and shook his head.

“Bakugou…”

“I know.” Katsuki grimaced. “I thought giving him back would be bringing him to this super comfortable life. All I saw was the shiny watches and name brands he was dressed in. Things I could never even dream of affording all my life. I thought giving him back wouldn’t be that bad—” He choked up, and clenched his teeth. “And after he told me everything, I was so fucking wrong. I realized who Tomura was and I—I panicked. I panicked all the way to this fucking cabin.”

Nothing happened for a long moment.

Monoma didn’t speak. He stared, his face unreadable.

Katsuki let out a hollow laugh, trying to mask the guilt curling in his gut. “Well? Aren’t you gonna rip into me? Call me a lunatic?”

But Monoma shook his head slowly.

“No,” he said. “If it were me in your shoes, I probably would’ve done the same thing.”

Katsuki blinked, caught off guard.

Monoma gave a small, tired shrug. “We’re not saints, Bakugou. We’re only humans trying to survive the fallout of our own damage. The fact you’re here now, protecting him after getting the whole picture, says more than whatever bullshit deal you made when you were blinded by hurt."

"…Thanks," Katsuki said, a touch surprised.

"But what does any of that have to do with thinking Tomura won't toss the ring?"

Katsuki took a deep breath, gathering the words. He leaned forward, elbows on the table, hands folded in front of his mouth.

"I keep thinking about him giving me that information," he murmured. "It makes no tactical sense—unless he already knew what I'd do with it."

Monoma's eyes narrowed thoughtfully. "You mean he predicted you wouldn't go through with killing Izuku."

"Exactly," Katsuki said, sharp now. "He handed me a loaded gun and bet on me not pulling the trigger. And the only way you can predict someone's move that precisely is if you know yourself what choice you'd make."

Monoma tilted his head. "Because it's the choice you'd make in their place."

Katsuki huffed out a grim laugh. "Bingo. That's how projection works. You see someone's path so clearly because it's your own. You pretend you're reading them when really you're just looking in a mirror."

Monoma slowly nodded, the pieces beginning to click. "So you think Tomura saw something of himself in you."

"Not in personality," Katsuki clarified. "We're nothing alike on that front. But our loyalty to Izuku? That's where we align. As twisted as it is, I think he's just as fucking devoted."

That gave Monoma pause.

His eyebrows lifted slightly, and he looked away for a second before quietly nodding in agreement.

Katsuki continued, his voice a little quieter now. "From what Izuku's told me…Tomura thinks he's protecting him. He's got this warped, sadistic big brother complex. He believes the pain he inflicts is justified because of how they grew up. He basically thinks breaking Izuku down somehow makes him safer. Stronger. Better."

He ran a hand through his hair, eyes heavy with the weight of understanding.

"But Tomura has weak points," Katsuki whispered. "There's these cracks that show up when Izuku's at rock bottom. It's like, no matter how damn cruel Tomura is, he still can't fully stomach watching Izuku suffer. He can't help but try to coddle him."

"And that," Monoma murmured, "is why you think he wouldn't throw away the ring."

Katsuki nodded. “If Tomura separates me and Izuku, Izuku will be devastated. Like really fucking devastated. And I know Izuku well enough that he’s going to cling to his damn ring like it’s oxygen. And if Tomura tries to take it—Izuku will break down. And when Izuku breaks down, Tomura’s weak point is activated.”

“…Ah,” Monoma hummed. “Makes sense. You’re gambling on him letting Izuku keep the ring like he gambled on you not being able to kill him.”

“I’m not gambling,” Katsuki shot back. “I know he will.”

Monoma’s brows lifted. “Do you have any proof that Tomura’s got a soft spot?”

Katsuki didn’t hesitate. “He let Izuku stay with me for a whole month after finding out about us. Realistically, he should’ve dragged him back to Tokyo that same night. But he didn’t. And get this—he built Izuku a fucking library full of romance novels. Books that are completely banned for them. It’s considered forbidden literature. But Tomura gave it to Izuku anyway.”

Monoma let out a low whistle. “Damn.”

“The list doesn’t stop there,” Katsuki muttered. “Izuku told me enough little moments that make it obvious. Tomura’s weakness is Izuku. And somehow, he knew Izuku was mine too. But I don’t get how. He threatened him into silence about my mom, like he really believed I’d kill him if I found out. But then, just like that, he hands me the key to find him? What the hell made him switch?”

“He probably figured it out after the masquerade.”

Katsuki blinked. “What makes you say that?”

“C’mon,” Monoma scoffed. He rolled his eyes. “You wiped out sixty Yakuza, but magically Izuku walked away breathing? You’re a lot of things, but inaccurate isn’t one. Aizawa would’ve never hired you if you couldn’t shoot straight.”

Katsuki drummed his fingers against his lips, brows drawn in deep thought.

“You think he pieced that together?” Katsuki asked.

“If I can put that together, then someone nicknamed the fucking Horned Viper, definitely can,” Monoma deadpanned. “He probably saw those bodies, and knowing you, they all were killed with a clean single bullet. Then he saw how you magically missed Izuku. The math is pretty easy. After the masquerade, he realized he was wrong.”

The two of them sat in silence for a long moment.

The weight of the conversation lingered in the air like smoke.

Katsuki assessed Monoma’s words over in his head, dissecting each one.

As much as he hated to admit it, Monoma was right. It was impressive and terrifying that Tomura might’ve managed to connect the dots. Even more impressive that he adjusted his strategy accordingly. If Katsuki ever wanted a shot at staying one step ahead of him, he'd have to start thinking like a serpent too.

A sharp beep cut through the quiet.

The soldering tool was ready.

Katsuki stood, retrieved it, and returned to the table. Without a word, Monoma slipped on the spare pair of heat-resistant gloves and helped him get to work. They didn't speak. They simply moved, fully synchronized like old pros who'd worked side by side for over a decade.

Katsuki used the fine-tipped tool to carve a tiny groove inside the band.

He placed the crumb sized tracker into the hollow, then carefully layered melted metal over it. He sealed it solidly into the silver. When it was cool enough, he picked up a mini-sander from the toolbox and buffed it smooth. It wasn't flawless, but it would pass any glance.

No one would see it unless they were looking for it.

And no one would ever be looking.

When it was done, he and Monoma exchanged a silent glance of mutual understanding.

"You should tell Izuku about the deal tomorrow," Monoma advised quietly. "Maybe at the same time you tell him about the tracker."

Katsuki exhaled slowly through his nose.

"I know you're scared it'll hurt him," Monoma added gently, "but you have to tell him. He deserves that. And I think…I think he'll understand. Just like he will about this."

Katsuki clicked his tongue and looked away, conflicted. For days now, things have felt easier. The glow of the proposal still hung in the air, and Izuku had finally relaxed. It was clear Izuku let himself believe they were safe.

But Monoma was right.

"Yeah," Katsuki muttered. "I'll tell him tomorrow after breakfast."

Monoma nodded, satisfied. He pushed his chair back and tucked his hands into his robe pockets.

"Goodnight, Bakugou. Try not to let the world end while I'm asleep."

Katsuki snorted. "No promises."

With a tired grunt, Monoma disappeared down the dark hallway. Katsuki began to clean up the mess. He packed away all the tools, wires, and polish.

In the end, he picked up the finished ring. He held it under the pendant light. Carefully, he turned it slowly between his fingers. The embedded rubies shimmered faintly, catching glints of silver and red under the low light.

A grin tugged at the corner of his mouth.

“Checkmate, Tomura.”

Chapter 42 — Riprendendo

When Katsuki returned to their bedroom, he found Izuku sleeping soundly. He was swaddled in a tangled heap of blankets with his curls poking out like little sprouts.

Careful not to wake him, Katsuki eased back into bed. Beneath the covers, he searched for Izuku's left hand. His fingers brushed around until they found it. Tenderly, he slipped the eternity ring back onto his husband's finger, placing it exactly where it belonged.

He peeled back the blanket just enough to catch a glimpse of it. The silver band caught in the moonlight.

He really fucking hoped he was being paranoid. He didn't want this tracker to ever actually become necessary.

But having it there helped quiet the anxious whispers in his head.

As Katsuki held Izuku's hand in both of his, the other man stirred slightly. Izuku mumbled something unintelligible. Then he instinctively curled closer, drawn to Katsuki's warmth.

A small, tired smile tugged at Katsuki's lips.

He tucked them both deeper under the blankets and wrapped his arms securely around Izuku. He allowed the quiet heat between their bodies to soften every last knot of tension in his body.

This time, when he closed his eyes, sleep came easy.

A dark haze infected Katsuki's lucid dream.

He was trying to swim and find a way out. But every direction he turned he encountered nothing but stifling darkness. The blackness grew thicker and thicker until it started to taste like astringent. The acidic burn crawled across his tongue, his eyes, and down his throat. He screamed out in the suffocating, onyx fluid—but no sound came.

Unexpectedly, through the poison smog, he heard Izuku's voice.

"Kacchan!" Izuku shouted.

Katsuki turned, trying to find him. He tried to call back—but his voice was stuck.

"Kacchan, you need to wake up!" Izuku screamed into the darkness.

Hearing Izuku's fear zapped him into action with a shot of pure adrenaline. His lungs expanded and he willed his body to move.

His eyes snapped open.

He was wrenched from his nightmare so violently it took him a second to breathe. His first thought was Izuku—his second was danger. He shot upright, heart slamming against his ribs. His eyes searched frantically for his husband. But then the moment he moved, the world spun. A wave of nausea crashed over him, and then he coughed—hard.

A sharp, acrid taste burned the back of his throat. His nose stung like he'd inhaled caustic liquid that was meant to kill.

Quickly, he covered his face with his arm and he jumped to his feet.

His eyes scanned the room. He could see a layer of smokey haze filling the space.

His heart stopped. The poison fog in his dream was not fake.

He looked at Izuku in pure, sheer horror when he realized what this meant. They both glanced to the door and saw a grey cloud of gas creep from beneath it. The thick fog rolled in like two hands scraping their way towards them, taking its time to come claim their lives.

Within the next split second, the door to their bedroom slammed open. Both Izuku and Katsuki jerked back, getting ready to strike—but it was Aizawa, covering his mouth with a rag.

Behind him was mayhem. Denki was doubled over, hacking. Sero gagged against the wall, eyes streaming. Monoma had his shirt over his face, scanning the corridor like a cornered animal. Shinsou was coughing while he gripped a long blade in his hands. Miruko stood silent but furious, loading her pistol with practiced speed and trembling restraint.

Aizawa pointed sharply at them, his voice low and urgent through the cloth.

Without wasting another second, Aizawa rushed forward. He kicked aside the rug in their room, gripped the hidden handle in the floor, and heaved.

“Everyone get in,” Aizawa ordered.

Then that’s when they heard the foreboding sound of glass breaking. It came from upstairs.

Miruko cursed under her breath and slammed the bedroom door shut. She locked it, bolted it. But it wouldn’t hold for long. The air was turning thick. Katsuki could feel it in his throat, clinging to his lungs like oil.

One by one, they dropped through the hatch.

When they were all safely inside, Aizawa expertly maneuvered the rug back over the top of the secret entrance. That way when he closed it, it would be masked once more. He locked the final bolt and a grim silence spread.

They gasped in the clean air, greedy and loud.

Sero dropped to his knees, coughing uncontrollably. Denki was shaking, his fingers twitched like he couldn’t stop them. Monoma wiped his eyes furiously, blinking through the blur. Shinsou groaned, trying to spit out the taste of the poison that accumulated on his tongue. Izuku clutched Katsuki’s hand in a white-knuckled grip as they both hacked uncontrollably.

Right as Denki was about to say something, Aizawa slapped a hand over his mouth. He put his finger up in a ‘quiet’ motion.

They all listened intensely.

Multiple people barged into the cabin. Up above them, they could hear glass breaking and footsteps spread out corner to corner. The movements of the people were ultra organized. Tactical in a way that Katsuki never heard before. His stomach dropped when countless footsteps got closer. He tried to number them and it was damn near impossible.

Aizawa removed his hand from Denki's mouth and motioned to all of them.

"Everyone needs to make a run for the boats at the base of the mountain," Aizawa whispered low and serious. "There's no point in trying to go toe to toe, there's too many. If you get separated, rendezvous in Nemuro. Now, everyone—go. Put your gear on and grab what you can as quietly and quickly as possible."

They all scattered.

Everyone began throwing on clothes. Coats, gloves, and boots. They armed themselves with their weapons, and Katsuki wearily glanced at Izuku who was next to him. His husband was gearing up without an ounce of hesitation.

He glanced down at the ring on Izuku's finger.

As the sound of more people flooded into the cabin, everyone picked up the pace. They had stored extra clothes and bags down in the bunker, in case they needed an emergency exit. Katsuki grabbed his backpack pre-packed with guns, knives, and his burner phone. He took out several guns and stored them in cargo pants pockets for easy access.

The others dressed in silence, getting their weapons ready. All of their expressions dived into a lethal seriousness Katsuki had seen a thousand times over.

They began moving hastily toward the emergency exit, each step measured and silent.

But then—the bedroom door above them slammed open. The force used made the floor tremble. A loud creak was followed by a crash. Something heavy hit the ground.

Then came the boots. Dozens of them began stomping and scattering.

Everyone below the floorboards froze. Their breaths lodged in their throats, paralyzed by the threat just inches above their heads. They eyed the thick metal exit door with tight, anxious gazes. Every one of them was poised to move but were terrified of making a single wrong sound.

Aizawa crept forward first. Each of his movements was deliberate and ghostlike. He tried not to betray their position.

And above them, chaos was happening.

The invaders moved with purpose. They wasted no time turning the bedroom inside out. Katsuki could hear the rustling. The bathroom door was thrown open, the closet was searched, and the bed frame was heaved and overturned.

"We can't find them," a man's voice muttered above, annoyed and sharp.

“They couldn’t have gotten too far after we sent that gas bomb down the chimney,” a woman answered.

Katsuki wearily darted a glance to the door—then to Izuku. His husband stood frozen, like he was hearing some sort of sound no one else could. Without a word, Katsuki gently tugged him along. Izuku followed, breath caught somewhere in his lungs.

One by one, they crept toward the emergency door.

Every footstep was a gamble. Sweat dripped down Katsuki’s temple. His jaw clenched so tight he bit through his lip. He tasted blood, but didn’t stop as he moved very carefully.

Then, Katsuki heard his voice.

Dread spilled down his spine.

“The trick is listening closely,” Tomura said, voice smooth and too fucking patient. “Because if you do. You can hear the scratching of vermin under the floorboards.”

And in an instant, all of Katsuki’s worst fears detonated into reality.

Bullets tore through the ceiling above them like thunder cracking through wood. The trapdoor exploded open as gunfire screamed from above. They ran. Behind them, lead splintered the ceiling of their bunker into a rain of shrapnel. Smoke and poison gas followed, chasing them like the grim reaper. There was no time to think. No time to breathe.

Only to run.

They burst into the brittle cold. The shock of winter air slammed against their skin like a slap to the face. The mountain echoed with howling wind, and all of their boots frantically crunched the fresh snow as they ran for their lives.

All of Katsuki’s thoughts began to blur. His paranoia and anxiety spiked, making him spiral.

As he sprinted, Katsuki forced himself to focus. He gritted his teeth as he shoved aside all the shouting voices. He activated his tunnel vision and focused on only one goal: get Izuku to safety.

Snow crashed down around them in violent sheets, blanketing the mountainside in blinding white. It was a near whiteout—until the white was ruptured with flashes of red.

Explosions of blood and muzzle flares painted the storm in violence.

The Yakuza were swarming. Hundreds of them poured down the mountain like a black tide. Their faces were twisted and marked with the ink of the Shie Hassaikai. Their war cries split the storm as they threw themselves at them with reckless brutality.

Their team fought back with everything they had. Steel slashed. Bullets cut. Fists flew.

But they were drowning in numbers.

Their enemy moved like a living creature. A writhing, endless thing with too many limbs and too many teeth. For every man struck down, two more surged forward.

Soon, their team was forced to split up.

“Go! We’ll hold them back!” Miruko shouted as she ducked behind another tree. She shot from around the trunk. “We need to split up and shake them off!”

Miruko and Aizawa were the first to break off, carving a bloody path through the snow. Then Monoma, Denki, and Sero were dragged sideways into a skirmish too thick to escape. The mountain swallowed them in layers, one by one, they peeled away by necessity to get to safety.

Shinsou, him and Izuku ran as fast as they could to the cable car.

“We’re going towards the ski lift!” Shinsou shouted. “At this rate we’re not going to make it down by foot. The cable car will get us down quicker!”

He and Shinsou flanked Izuku on either side. All three of them sprinted through the storm, boots slipping, and breaths ragged. The cable car was their only hope. It was the one way down the mountain before the whole peak turned into a gravesite.

But just as it came into view, glowing faintly through the snowfall like salvation—

—they were surrounded.

From the trees, like a nightmare given form, a man emerged.

The Yakuza brute was enormous. He was packed with muscle and menace, his single good eye gleamed with violent intent. Cold air fumed from his mouth as he barreled forward, heavy and fast.

Shinsou didn’t hesitate. He pivoted on his heel with that same lethal speed Katsuki had seen in him time and time again. His first strike was too fast to track until it landed. The thug reeled as Shinsou ducked a wild grab. He drove an elbow hard into the man’s ribs. Then he spun and drove his heel into the side of the man’s knee.

A sharp crack echoed. The man screamed.

But Shinsou wasn’t done. He grabbed him by the collar, twisted, and slammed his skull against the steel girder of the station.

Once. Twice. He did it until the body dropped, fully limp. The man slid down, leaving a thick smear of blood behind him.

They moved again. Faster this time.

Katsuki was swearing in his head, eyes burning. All he could see was Izuku chained somewhere in the dark. Hurt and alone. The thought lit desperation inside him. His pulse surged. He forcefully pushed Izuku to the front.

Then he quickly hoisted Izuku by the waist and shoved him frantically into the cable car.

Footsteps pounded behind them.

Katsuki spun around just in time to see another swarm break through the trees. Dozens of Yakuza poured. They were armed with guns, knives, and brass knuckles—and they attacked them without hesitation.

Katsuki met the first with a blow that cracked like thunder. His fists moved fast, each strike brutal and practiced. One dropped. Another took his place. He twisted. Pulled his gun. He fired—and two more went down in bursts of scarlet.

Beside him, Shinsou danced through the shadows. His blade carved clean arcs through the air, cutting down anyone that stepped in range. Every dodge was sharp. Every swing was decisive. They moved as one. Side-by-side, honed by missions from the past. Katsuki took high. Shinsou swept low. They covered each other in a silent rhythm as bodies piled up around them.

But they weren't winning—they were merely scraping by.

And then, another wave of attackers came.

Katsuki suddenly heard movement behind him. His head snapped around—Izuku was trying to climb back out of the cable car. He began to shout, but Shinsou beat him to it.

"Stay there!" Shinsou barked, voice sharp as a whip crack.

Katsuki's eyes met Shinsou's. The space between them charged with an unspoken communication.

Then Shinsou turned, with blood streaking his cheek, and shouted, "I'll see you two at the rendezvous point!"

Katsuki bolted for the car. Someone tried to grab his leg, but Shinsou cut the man's hand off with a sharp swing of his blade. Blood sprayed across his face as Katsuki hoisted himself up and in the car.

Then Shinsou made a sprint for the control panel.

A blade cut across his arm, but he didn't waver. Another Yakuza lunged, but Shinsou dodged, rolled, and came up swinging. His fist collided with the attacker's temple so hard that blood sprayed.

He reached the switch.

He punched it to full speed.

The cable car jolted.

The cart surged forward with a mechanical whir that echoed across the mountainside. The jolt of motion snapped Katsuki forward, and Izuku too. Both of them clutched at each other instinctively, bracing as the car rocketed away from the station.

Cold air slammed into Katsuki's face like a punch from nature itself. His heart thundered straight into his throat as the station behind them began to shrink into the distance.

Below, Shinsou was still fighting for his life.

They saw him twist an enemy's arm until the joint gave with a sickening pop. Then he pivoted with terrifying precision as he used the limp body as a shield against the next attacker's blade. The machete lodged between the man's ribs, and Shinsou responded with a brutal kick that landed squarely in the next man's chest.

Red bloomed across the snow like spilled ink.

As they got further, the bodies blurred together. Movement and color meshed into shadow as distance swallowed the shapes of the figures below. The car continued to descend, groaning along its cable. It carried them deeper down the mountainside until fog turned the entire world above them into a smear of white and gray nothingness.

Beside him, Izuku clung to the cold steel bar with trembling hands.

His eyes were dark with fear and brimmed with tears. His breath came fast and shallow, showing how horrified he was by the splintering of their team.

"They'll be okay," Katsuki tried to reassure, his voice taut and low. He spat a thick glob of blood to the floor, and wiped his mouth with the back of his glove. "Don't worry. We've been in tighter situations as a unit before."

Izuku turned to him, uncertain.

He didn't respond, but the way he stared made it clear—he wasn't sure if he believed that. Katsuki could see it. But he did believe it. He had to. They'd survived worse and sure as hell would survive this.

Then, a shriek split the sky above them.

It was the sharp sound of metal on metal. It was high and sharp—but it sounded dead wrong.

Their heads snapped up simultaneously. Instinct overrode everything else.

Suddenly, the cable line snagged.

It jerked violently and the entire car lurched forward. The force snapped them both backwards. And Katsuki's shoulder hit the side hard. Izuku's skull slammed into the window behind him. Startled, a yelp tore out of Izuku's throat. But before Katsuki could curse or reach for him—another snap.

This one was louder and sharper.

Then, the line gave out.

And the world fell.

The car sheared off the cable like a blade torn from its scabbard, clean and deadly. Gravity yanked them downward in a single merciless motion and the mountain opened up below like a black hole. They plummeted, fast. The velocity was too ferocious for thought and all too quick for them to brace.

Katsuki's stomach dropped like a stone. His vision tunneled.

They both screamed.

Izuku's arms wrapped around his torso and his face buried in his neck. Katsuki threw his arms over Izuku's head, locked them there, and he twisted them in midair. He steeled himself to eat the brunt of the incoming impact.

And when it came, the pain was blinding.

The cable car hit the ground and they were slammed into the metal floor.

Glass exploded outward in a furious storm of jagged shrapnel, slicing the air. The car bounced, skidded, and twisted midair. Then it slammed again, harder this time. They clung to each other as they were helplessly tossed around. Steel groaned and screeched beneath them, twisting like paper. Each bounce threw them into the walls. Each crash bent the car further out of shape.

It was a wild, savage descent.

Wind screamed through shattered windows. Cold kicked them in the face. The floor tore open. The ceiling buckled. Snow surged inside like smoke, swirling violently as they rolled. It was like the entire cable car turned into a metal coffin skidding down the mountain.

Then—another impact.

A final collision occurred, heavy and immediate.

The cart smashed into something massive and unmovable. The force hit so hard Katsuki felt Izuku's body seize up against him. Somewhere in that moment, Izuku gagged, mouth full of stomach acid, the force jostling it up his throat.

The car tipped.

It lifted again, a sickening weightless moment. And then it dropped back to earth with a shattering, thunderous crash that made the ground shudder beneath it.

Everything went still.

Neither of them moved.

A silence so deadly followed that for a moment, Katsuki worried he had passed away right then. Then he heard the distant hiss of snow melting against hot metal. Pain bloomed in full clarity now. His ribs ached. Glass was lodged deep in his back. Blood trickled hot down his face, soaking his lips.

He pushed through the shock, driven by the need to keep Izuku safe.

He moved first.

Katsuki hissed in enormous pain as he tried to peel himself upright. Blood dripped from a deep gash under his eye. He nursed his temple and tried to stop the world from spinning.

Izuku did the same. Broken glass fragments cut into his gloves as he tried to find leverage to pull himself up. Katsuki shoved a jagged sheet of metal out of the way that had fallen from the ceiling. He staggered upright with a groan that sounded less like a man in pain and more like an animal trying to escape from a trap.

He stood to his full height, and tried to find an exit.

All around him, was ruin. The once smooth metal was bent and torn in several places. The windows were entirely gone, and in their place were sharp left over shards of glass like teeth.

His hands searched everywhere.

He knew they didn't have much time. A crash like that was loud and bound to draw attention. Katsuki yelled out a loud grunt as he pushed against the jammed door on the side. His neck flexed with effort as he gave a full strength haul.

The door shrieked and surrendered to Katsuki, popping open and falling to the ground.

Suddenly, the sound of Izuku coughing split the air.

Katsuki spun towards him. Izuku was doubled over, blood slicking down his chin. Each breath he took sounded like a damn rattle in his chest. Katsuki's heart dropped—then plummeted further when he saw the shards of glass embedded in Izuku's legs, glinting red and white like broken bones.

Izuku tried to speak—but choked. Another gout of blood wetted his lips.

Katsuki dropped to his knees. He swept Izuku into his arms, keeping his grip firm, but gentle.

"C'mon," Katsuki rasped. With effort, he hoisted Izuku and carried him as best as he could. "We have to keep moving."

Izuku hissed in agony, the glass in his legs shifting with every movement.

"I got you," Katsuki whispered shakily as he exited the tattered cable car. "I got you, don't worry, darling."

His voice cracked on the last word.

He ran.

The cold singed across his face. Each step burned and his cut up back screamed in protest. But he kept moving, faster and faster—because there was no other option.

Behind them stretched silence. There was no shouting. No gunfire. Not even footsteps. The only thing that lingered was an awful, unnatural quiet. It pressed in around them like a tomb and made him move quicker and quicker.

His breath tore from him in sharp bursts. He pulled Izuku tighter and closer. His husband's arms were weak around his neck, trembling faintly. Izuku's breath hitched and cracked against his collarbone. Every inhale punctuated by another coughing fit.

Katsuki kept his eyes forward, tunnel vision sharp. Every step was aimed toward the rendezvous point—where he knew with full confidence his team would be waiting.

So he didn't look back.

He ran into the dark, with Izuku bleeding in his arms. The weight of everything he loved hung in the balance as he bolted as quickly as he could.

Katsuki ran the entire way to the coastline without stopping.

His lungs were in flames. His legs were burning. But never once did he break his pace. Trees blurred past in streaks of shadow, and the only sounds that kept them company were the harsh crunch of snow underfoot and Katsuki's ragged, relentless breathing.

At some point, Izuku had dug the shards of glass from his thighs. The cuts were deep, angry, and bleeding.

But Katsuki knew his husband was tough enough to grit through it.

They rounded a bend and one of the marked docks came into view. Its silhouette rose out of the fog like a lifeline. Katsuki sighed out of sheer relief. The small boat Aizawa said was hidden was there, its form tucked under a heavy tarp that flapped violently in the ocean wind.

They both scanned the area for danger, shoulders taut.

But the clearing was quiet and barren.

"Do you think the others made it?" Izuku asked, voice tight with worry.

"They'll be fine," Katsuki replied. His tone was firm despite the tremor of exertion in his breath. "We've done this before. Whenever there's too many people to take out, everyone is really good at getting to safety. We'll see them soon, don't worry."

They moved onto the dock. With deliberate care, Katsuki lowered Izuku to his feet, watching closely as he stretched out his legs, testing what adrenaline hadn't already numbed.

Izuku winced but gave a nod. He could move and that was enough.

Katsuki stepped to the tarp and yanked it away in one sharp motion. The canvas caught the wind and fluttered off into the dark. Beneath it sat a small white-and-blue motor skiff. It was bare-bones, unassuming, but seaworthy.

“C’mon, darling,” Katsuki urged.

Izuku nodded and followed. He let Katsuki help guide him into the rocking boat. The water slapped against the hull as Izuku stepped in. He caught Katsuki’s hands and steadied himself. Their fingers locked. Katsuki turned and Izuku helped him get in just the same.

Then suddenly, as Katsuki was halfway inside, a strange sound cut through the wind.

It was sharp, clean, and almost delicate.

Piercing pain sunk into his neck.

Katsuki choked and stumbled.

Their eyes locked, both wide with horrified recognition. Like watching a slow-motion nightmare come to life, they saw too late the tiny dart embedded into the side of Katsuki’s throat.

Izuku scrambled out of the boat and Katsuki staggered backwards.

With a snarl, Katsuki ripped the dart free and flung it aside. But it had already given its kiss of death.

The tranquilizer was working fast. The world began to tilt and stumble out of focus. His nerves ignited, trembling with foreign heat. Then next his muscles turned to cement. His vision glossed over and his stomach churned as though he’d taken a hundred gut punches. And then finally, his limbs stopped listening to him.

He tried to fight it. But he couldn’t. His knees buckled and he dropped.

The last thing he heard was the anguished sound of Izuku’s voice screaming, “Kacchan!”

And then—black.

Katsuki gasped awake.

His eyes snapped open and he found his world was on its side. Then came pain. It surged up his legs, arms, and beat against the back of his skull. He moaned and suddenly a bile flavored cough wrecked his chest. Katsuki spat out a sloppy wad of blood, gritting through the sharp, metallic taste of iron.

His memory came in pieces. Every bit was blurry, and incoherent.

The boat. The paralyzer bullet soaring through the air. Izuku's scream—

He stiffened.

Izuku. Where was Izuku?

His head whipped around, too fast. The edges of his vision pulsed with static. Shapes blurred. Then cleared. Across from him, slumped against the metal floor, was Izuku. His body was limp and he was gagged by a cloth. Moreover, his wrists and ankles were bound with coarse rope.

And he was unconscious.

Katsuki tried to lunge forward—only to barely move.

He looked down. Thick industrial-grade zip ties bound his hands in front of him. His restraints were so tight they were digging into his flesh, turning it raw. His skin throbbed with every heartbeat and the edges of the plastic bit deep into him. But worse than the pain was the stiffness still clinging to his limbs. The paralytic hadn't worn off completely.

He tried to move his legs. They barely twitched.

The world clarified steadily. He was on his side, tossed carelessly into the back of a van. The interior was stripped to bare metal. No windows. Just him and Izuku flung inside like discarded trash and all their bags and belongings were gone.

Katsuki strained his neck, fighting the dead weight in his body. He clawed himself inch by inch across the freezing floor towards Izuku. The van jolted suddenly. His shoulder slammed into the wall. He groaned, nausea swelling like a tide.

He gritted his teeth and forced himself forward.

Each scrape along the floor rattled the bones in his arms. But finally, finally, he reached his husband. He leaned over as much as his stiff body would allow and pressed into Izuku's side.

"Izuku," he rasped, voice shredded with urgency. He tried again, harsher. "Izuku. Wake up."

Nothing.

Izuku was out cold.

His breathing was shallow, almost barely noticeable. It was then Katsuki saw that his lips had a faint bluish tinge. His lashes didn't flutter as much as they did usually in his sleep—and it was concerning. It was like someone had drugged him to the edge of death and held him there, suspended in stasis.

Katsuki's gut twisted. The helpless rage that surged up threatened to choke him.

Think, he hissed at himself. Move, goddamnit.

He shifted, fumbling awkwardly until he could bring his wrists up to his mouth. The plastic dug deeper. He ignored it. He paused and looked at his hands. He went for the part of the zip ties that could be hidden when pressed against his body.

He bared his teeth and bit down hard on the thick band of plastic. It was tougher than any zip tie he'd ever encountered. But Katsuki pushed.

Fueled by panic and fury, Katsuki ground his incisors against the tie.

Wherever they were taking them, it was far.

Katsuki mentally tracked the time. Over an hour and a half had passed.

He couldn't guess where they were or what the fuck was happening. He wondered how long he had been passed out before he came to. He hoped it wasn't long, but he had a feeling they were very far away from the rendezvous point.

Sweat pooled at the base of Katsuki's neck as he chewed relentlessly at the zip ties.

He hadn't stopped a single minute of the way. His teeth were beginning to go numb, and faint shocks of pain bloomed in his gums. But he didn't even consider taking a break.

The plastic was giving, little by little, and that was exactly what he needed.

As the minutes dragged on, his strength gradually returned. He flexed against the restraints in small bursts, bleeding slightly each time the edge of the tie cut into him. It was slow progress, but it was what was going to save both him and Izuku.

By the time the van began to slow, the restraints were halfway chewed through.

Katsuki's stomach turned when he heard the gear shift click into park. Next, the crunch of boots in the snow approached and he estimated it was well over a dozen people coming.

Panic prickled at his spine. He bared his teeth and gave one final, vicious bite with his canine. He twisted his wrists, testing the damage—and the plastic nearly gave way.

Katsuki sucked in a sharp breath, eyes wide.

He could break free.

But timing would be everything now.

He quickly pressed the worn down part of the zip ties flush against his body, hiding it from view.

The van's back doors flew open with a metallic bang.

The first thing Katsuki registered were the twelve Yakuza grunts. They were dressed head to toe in black and they clutched a mix of guns and swords. Each one was twitching with anticipation.

The second detail he clocked were the Vipers. In stark contrast, they were cloaked in white from neck to boot. Their faces were hidden behind unsettling porcelain masks with only eye slits carved into the surface. And in their gloved hands were sleek, matte-black rifles held with quiet precision.

But the third thing he noticed was the sky. It was still dark.

Which meant dawn hadn't come yet, and less than three hours had passed.

They were still on Hokkaido. That meant they could still make it to the rendezvous point.

Suddenly, the van rocked as the men swarmed in. Hands grabbed at him and Izuku. They were rough and merciless. Katsuki grunted as several Yakuza yanked him upright and shoved him out of the van.

His eyes darted frantically. He searched through the flurry of movement until he landed on Izuku.

Katsuki's chest seized.

Izuku was still unconscious, limp in the arms of a different man. The bastard was holding him gently. It felt like a twisted mockery of care, cradling him like a precious gem to be sold.

"This way," one of the men barked. "Move it."

Katsuki stumbled forward as they forced him to walk into the wintry dark. His breath puffed harshly in front of him, thick and ragged.

Around them, there was nothing. There were no streetlights. No buildings. Just an empty, snow-covered road in the middle of nowhere. The thick blanket of white blurred the landscape into anonymity. Katsuki strained to recognize anything.

He tried to find a detail that might give him an edge—but everything looked the same.

Then, just as he thought he saw a familiar slope in the distance, a figure emerged.

Katsuki's breath caught. Rage surged through him so fast it left his hands trembling.

There, standing like a ghost summoned from hell, was the man he wanted to kill more than any one.

Tomura's face was expressionless, and his eyes were colder than the winter winds. He was dressed annoyingly perfectly in a pure white coat, hat, gloves and pants. His white boots stood on top of the snow and he was poised like a deadly blizzard himself.

"Bakugou Katsuki," Tomura greeted slowly.

His voice was smooth and deceptively soft. Much like when frost formed over skin right before it burned.

“This wasn’t how I hoped we’d see each other again,” Tomura said with an edge of mock disappointment. “But either way, thank you for giving my brother back to me.”

A muscle in Katsuki’s cheek twitched. He bared his teeth in a snarl.

He looked past Tomura to Izuku. There, his lover hung limp in another man’s arms. Izuku’s head was tilted back, curls spilling downward exposing his blood-smeared face. His chest still moved, slow and shallow.

“No words?” Tomura tilted his head. “Really? Not even from a loudmouth like you?”

Katsuki cut his eyes at Tomura and glared.

“I have nothing to say to you,” he growled.

“Pity.” Tomura walked closer. He stopped just short of Katsuki and studied him. “I have to give you your flowers,” Tomura complimented. “You gave me a fair run around. More than anyone else has before.”

And I’m not done, Katsuki thought sourly. He carefully kept his wrists close to his stomach, hiding the weakened point in the zip ties.

Tomura pivoted sharply and pointed forward without a word.

The entire crowd began to move in perfect, chilling sync. Katsuki gritted his teeth as he was yanked along, legs half-asleep and full of lead. Each step sent sharp, biting pain up his calves, needling through his core as they marched him deeper into the winter-dark.

When they made their way through a small passage, suddenly everything began feeling familiar.

Too familiar.

Then Katsuki’s eyes widened when he saw the Bakugou estate gates.

“What the fuck is going on?” he snapped. His voice rose with panic as he began to fight the grip of the men on either side of him. “Why are we here?!”

Tomura didn’t stop walking.

“No place like home, right?” he replied easily. He casted a cold glance over his shoulder. “I thought this would be a fitting place for you to meet your end. I did some digging and it turns out—you were born here. Did you know that? Home birth with a midwife, very charming. Your mother filed the paperwork at the hospital later.”

Katsuki’s gut twisted as the group trudged through the garden and towards the back.

Along the way, he saw flashes of his mother's ghost walking past. He felt the eyes of family members he never met watch their sacred place be defiled.

When they made a sharp left turn, his gut dropped.

They were at his family's gravesite.

Tomura marched right up to the grave marked 'Bakugou Mitsuki' and stopped. But right next to it Katsuki found a goddamn headstone with his name on it. It was black, perfectly new, and in front of it was a shallow grave dug deep enough for a body.

But what shook him to his core was the black wooden coffin, laying off to the side.

Katsuki's breath came fast and shallow, fogging in the cold.

They were going to try to kill him—here.

"Poetic a bit, isn't it?" Tomura taunted. "Your birth and death location will be the same."

"You're fucking deranged!" Katsuki yelled, trying to wrench forward. One of the men holding him slammed a fist into his stomach. Katsuki coughed and doubled, snow biting into his knees.

Tomura crouched to Katsuki's level, narrowing his eyes. "I think that's rich coming from someone like you."

Katsuki ground his teeth down. He groaned from the brutal blow, and tried his best to not show weakness. But he couldn't help it. His vulnerability began to rear its head, because all he could think about was how he might've failed Izuku.

Katsuki's eyes flicked towards his husband.

Naturally, Tomura's eyes followed. But they lingered a second too long on Izuku.

At this, Katsuki paused.

He stared at Tomura and realized he had one chance to dig his heels in. If they were going to make it out alive, he needed to apply pressure to all the weak points Tomura had. He swallowed and readjusted his approach.

"Do you really think selling him to Chisaki makes you some kind of protector?" Katsuki whispered cruelly. "If you do this, you'll be hurting him. But I'm sure you're used to that. All you've ever done is hurt him all his life."

Tomura's face didn't twitch. "I'm the only reason he's lived this long."

"And you're going to be the reason he's dead inside."

For a moment, neither of them spoke.

The wind howled louder, as if the winter itself was bracing for violence.

Katsuki couldn't tell if the words had hit their mark. If they did, Tomura didn't show it. Instead, the intimidating man slowly rose to his full height with his coat billowing behind him. Without so much as a glance back, he addressed one of the Vipers standing at attention nearby.

"When Izuku wakes up, we can get started," Tomura commanded. "I want to make sure Izuku witnesses his death."

The two men gripping Katsuki moved. Katsuki struggled and twisted, and it earned him a blow to the ribs. He began thrashing as much as he could as they dragged him towards the headstone. He watched with terror as six of the Yakuza and Vipers began to get shovels and prepared the coffin by removing the lid.

"If you go through with this Izuku will never forgive you!" Katsuki shouted. "He'll hate you until his very last breath!"

Tomura didn't turn.

"He'll understand, eventually," he said softly. "He always does."

"No," Katsuki warned. "He won't this time."

And for a second, something flickered behind Tomura's eyes—just briefly.

It was dark, but it was uncertain.

The Yakuza men holding him forced Katsuki to kneel into the snow. The cold bit into his skin through his clothes and his head hung low. He clenched his jaw and rigidness seized his shoulders in both defiance and terror.

Suddenly three men with rifles circled him like vultures. They pointed their guns dead at him. He watched helplessly as the man holding Izuku placed him down in the snow, directly across from the grave for the perfect view of the execution.

Katsuki screwed his eyes shut.

He hoped Izuku never woke up.

Not for his sake, but for Izuku's. If he had to die, he hoped he did out of sight.

Suddenly, real fear filled Katsuki. It pressed down on him with the weight of inevitability, sharp and cold as a machete against his throat. He held his breath without meaning to, fully paralyzed. For a fleeting second, he wondered if this was the kind of terror the people he'd killed felt before their end. It was a hollow, dizzying realization that all his luck had finally run out.

A muffled cry cut into the dead silence.

Katsuki's head snapped up, and he and Izuku's eyes met.

His lover's expression was dazed, terrified, and achingly lost.

Panic and confusion warred across his face. He thrashed instinctively, only to be seized by two massive Yakuza enforcers. They wrenched him upright onto his knees, arms pinned, and Izuku gasped through his nose, trying to scream through the gag shoved in his mouth.

"Ah. Finally awake," Tomura spoke.

Tomura began walking towards Izuku, and a vile sensation uncoiled in Katsuki.

He had always known of Izuku's Big Brother that lurked in the shadows. He was this ominous dark legend in the background of stories. Proof of his existence echoed in bruises on Izuku's skin and the smallness in his voice. Up until now, Katsuki never saw them actually interact. He could only imagine it.

But now, the ugliness of it all stood clear in front of him.

His eyes darted between the two brothers. In the narrow space separating them, Katsuki could see the poisoned power imbalance. He saw the tight look of control etched into Tomura's face. And on Izuku's—

On Izuku's face was a kind of fear Katsuki had never seen before.

It was old, and clearly familiar.

Katsuki felt his heartbreak for his lover.

"I'm only half sorry for the headache you must have," Tomura said coldly to Izuku. "We had to hit you with extra dosages for obvious reasons."

Izuku screamed again, fully guttural. He was trying to say something, but it was pointless. The gag was keeping anything he could say confined inside of him. Tomura turned his back on Izuku, the action very clearly punishing and Izuku began to cry.

Tomura then walked straight up to Katsuki. He glared down at him like he was trash to be disposed of.

Izuku thrashed harder. He tried to say something but once again, no words came out.

"However," Tomura continued. "I am fully sorry that it took me so long to come collect you. I admittedly have known where you were the last three weeks. But Chisaki had this headstone specially made and it was only delivered today."

Tomura delicately ran a gloved finger down the curve of the headstone.

"He has a twisted sense of humor," Tomura taunted. "At least now you'll be next to your dearest mother, Katsuki. Mother and son. Forever side by side, doomed by the weight of their mistakes."

“Fuck you,” Katsuki sneered through gritted teeth. “I’m going to kill you with my bare hands after this.”

Their gazes collided. Searing heat met glacial indifference and the silence between them quivered like a taut wire on the brink of snapping.

Tomura’s upper lip curled, and his expression grew icier by the second. He slowly walked back over to Izuku and crouched down to his level. He hooked his finger under the gag and with a sharp flick of his wrist, he slipped the rag down from Izuku’s mouth.

“Tomura,” Izuku sobbed, fully unraveling in the smallest voice Katsuki ever heard him use. “I’m sorry—” another wrecked sob. “I’m sorry. Don’t hurt him. Please.”

Tomura’s eyes glared down at him.

He didn’t say a word, and the whole time Izuku never stopped begging. He groveled with all he had and Katsuki felt his heart break more and more as he watched. With every plea Izuku gave, he could see Tomura soak it up and wield it like a weapon as a confirmation of his influence over Izuku.

“Don’t hurt him,” Izuku begged. “Tomura, I love him. Please.”

Tomura didn’t waiver.

“You know he doesn’t care about you, Izuku,” Tomura berated. “Did he tell you about our deal?”

Suddenly, everything went still.

Katsuki’s heart didn’t just skip—it flatlined.

The world around him collapsed into a dead stillness, a vacuum where sound and breath ceased to exist. Dread crashed down his spine like a falling blade. And the sharp edge of it carved through every one of his nerves.

His lips began to move, quiet and frantic. “No, no, no, no—”

He saw it hit Izuku.

He watched the confusion seize Izuku mid-struggle. His thrashing completely stopped. His wide eyes flicked between Katsuki and Tomura, searching desperately for someone to tell him this wasn’t what it sounded like.

And Tomura, a true master of weaponization, ceased the moment.

“Ah.” Tomura clasped his hands. “He didn’t tell you.”

Izuku’s silence deepened. He looked again at Katsuki. In that uncertain blink, Katsuki saw the doubt starting to settle.

“Izuku,” Katsuki rasped, voice serrated with desperation.

He lunged forward, fighting against the bite of the zip ties. He cried out only to be slammed back by a Yakuza thug. The muzzle of a rifle jammed between his eyes. But Katsuki didn’t care. The terror of losing Izuku’s trust burned more than any bullet ever could.

“Izuku, I swear to god I was going to tell you—”

“—He was going to trade you in,” Tomura cut in. “Hand-deliver you to me like an offering. Just for a shot at his pathetic revenge.”

“I changed my mind!” Katsuki screamed, his voice cracking wide open. His face contorted with grief and fury as he glared at Tomura, spitting the words like fire. “You know I changed my mind the second I realized who the fuck you were!”

Tomura didn’t blink. “Still,” he said. “The thought alone is proof enough you don’t deserve Izuku.”

Katsuki lost it.

His whole body convulsed with rage. He fought with everything he had left in him—screaming, sobbing, straining—until another guard had to step in just to keep him upright.

“No! No, Izuku, please—I had changed my fucking mind!” Katsuki’s voice shredded, consumed with remorse. “Izuku, I—”

But the rest didn’t come.

The words were caught in his throat, razor-sharp and unforgiving. His chest heaved as the words turned to ash behind his teeth. Blood, dirt, and tears mingled down his face as his mouth worked uselessly, trying to say what couldn’t be unsaid.

“I’m so fucking sorry,” Katsuki apologized through his sobs. “I—I didn’t know everything back then. I didn’t have the whole picture or know anything. I was so fucking angry, Izuku. I was blinded by my rage—”

Tomura rolled his eyes and snapped his fingers. “Gag him.”

A guard moved before Katsuki could get another breath out.

A filthy rag was jammed into his mouth, silencing him mid-sentence. Katsuki convulsed in protest. His wrists shredded against the zip ties. He kept trying, even through the pain—even through the silence. His mouth couldn’t speak anymore, so his eyes screamed for him instead.

Please. Please forgive me. I’m sorry, I love you.

Izuku stared back, unmoving. His eyes were wide, tear-filled, and trembling on the edge of shattering.

Katsuki clung to Izuku's gaze. He was desperate to pour everything he couldn't say into a single look.

The weight of his own failure crushed him. How could he have been so fucking stupid? Every silent moment, every held breath, and every swallowed confession echoed back at him like a countdown to ruin. All because he hadn't wanted to tip Izuku over the edge.

And here was Tomura, not only tipping—he was shoving Izuku over the edge, hoping to break him.

"I told you Izuku," Tomura calmly said. "I may be cruel, but I would never lie to you. Unlike me, this mutt jumped at the idea to trade you in to me, all for a shot to kill Chisaki. I told him if he brought me you, he could get his revenge—and he agreed."

Katsuki shook his head violently, mouth straining behind the gag.

But Tomura kept going.

"How else do you think he found you so quickly after the masquerade?" Tomura's voice twisted the truth into a dagger. "I'm the one who told him what car you took after noticing which one was missing from the garage."

Izuku was shaking his head in denial.

But in his eyes, Katsuki saw exactly what he didn't want to happen, happen.

Izuku broke.

His face crumbled and his body wilted like it was too small to carry the hurt.

The trust they had built fractured like glass underneath Tomura's boot. It scattered across the snow in glittering silence. And Tomura picked up every shard. He turned each one in his hands like a sculptor admiring his work. He shaped the destruction he crafted into exactly the form he wanted.

Katsuki folded forward. His shoulders trembled with silent, uncontrollable sobs.

He was burning alive in shame. His tears fell freely. They stung as they slid over bruises, mixing with blood and into the new gash under his eye. He tried, still, to translate a thousand apologies through his eyes. Every sorry he'd waited too long to say. Every I love you he should've shouted from the rooftops.

Then Tomura sighed. He stood up and brushed his white pants.

"We're done here," Tomura announced, already turning away. "I've wasted enough time with this childish runaround. Bring in the coffin."

Katsuki's veins turned to ice.

His brain stuttered, struggling to process what was going to happen next. But Izuku instantly went pale. Katsuki saw Izuku's heartbreak become eclipsed by a wave of pure dread.

"Coffin?" Izuku whispered, barely audible.

Katsuki and Izuku's head snapped toward the shadows, and there it was.

Half-obscured in the dark stood a long wooden box. Four Vipers emerged and surrounded it, their movements clean and practiced. In eerie silence, they lifted it together and began to carry it forward. Their boots struck the frozen ground in perfect rhythm, like a funeral march composed just for Katsuki.

The coffin neared.

Katsuki could see it clearly now. It was long, narrow, and built from coarse wood stained the color of nothingness.

A sharp, wounded breath tore from Izuku's lungs.

Katsuki turned just in time to see the explosion of horror break across Izuku's face. His body jerked forward violently as pure panic seized him. A scream broke loose from his chest that sounded nearly primal.

"No!" Izuku cried, voice fraying apart. "Stop! Tomura, please! Don't do this!"

Tomura didn't flinch. He didn't even turn.

"You're still bleeding through your heart for him?" Tomura asked. The words were as brutal as they were calm. His tone had all the cold patience of someone explaining a hard truth to a child who refused to listen. "Even after what I just told you? You really are foolish, Izuku. But I suppose that's my fault for sheltering you so much."

The coffin touched the ground with a heavy, inevitable thud.

"Tomura, please don't—" Izuku begged. He looked up to Tomura with bleary eyes. "Big Brother, don't do th-this. I'll marry Chisaki—I'll go back with you, I swear. I'll do whatever you want, just—don't kill him. Please. Please—"

But Tomura said nothing and Katsuki's heart stung hearing that string of words.

Izuku, even now, was still pleading with all he had—offering himself up for Katsuki's sake.

Tomura circled behind Izuku in silence, like a noose drawing closed. Then, without a word, he grabbed the cloth and forced it between Izuku's lips. He tied the gag mercilessly tight. The force jerked Izuku's head back until his jaw trembled with pain. Katsuki heard Izuku whimper as the cloth cut into his skin. He tried to fight, but the paralyzer still dragged down his limbs like chains.

Katsuki flexed his wrists subtly, testing the weakened zip ties once more.

This was his chance to break free.

He drew in a deep breath. He braced every nerve in his body, readying to strike.

Then, without warning, the two hulking Yakuza guards yanked him upright. His boots scraped against the frozen ground, but his eyes were already scanning for a break. He found it.

Now! He ordered himself.

He bucked hard, launching his shoulder into one man's gut with enough force to stagger him. He drove his head back into the nose of the other, then spun and slammed his elbow into someone's ribs. A crack echoed out. He didn't care who it came from. He moved fast and viciously. Like a whirlwind of raw instinct and precision.

For a breathless second, it seemed like he might pull it off. His mind sprinted through routes, options, and every angle. But right as he saw one scenario that they would both make it out alive—four rifles cocked in perfect unison.

Cold steel kissed Katsuki's back, ribs, and his temple.

He forced himself still.

He clenched his jaw so tight it ached. With a heaving chest, he looked around. Twelve weapons. Twelve killers. All of them were highly trained, uninjured, and unflinching.

Katsuki was cornered, and he couldn't see any way out.

Then his eyes drifted to the coffin. It sat there, black and silent, like a goddamn invitation to Hell. The guards didn't wait. They dragged him toward it and shoved him to stand before it.

The wood loomed taller up close, and his headstone gleamed under the pale moonlight.

Katsuki steadied himself. His eyes began to sting, tears breaking through his threshold. That fear came back again, full force. For the first time in a long time, Katsuki wasn't in control. He genuinely didn't know if he was going to die here or not, and that made him terrified.

But he refused to let a bastard like Tomura see it. So Katsuki put on his best, hardened face and ignored the painful uncertainty that knocked at his door.

Tomura approached Katsuki. Their gazes clashed with control and loathing. Tomura gestured for one of the Yakuza men to de-gag Katsuki. When the cloth fell, Tomura stared expectantly at him.

"Any more lies you want to confess?" Tomura mocked.

Katsuki's lip curled. Then he reared back and spat directly in Tomura's face.

The impact landed like a backhand.

Tomura flinched, eyes snapping shut for half a second. But he didn't lash out. He simply reached up and wiped the mess from his cheek with his gloved fingers. When his hand fell, his face had changed. He was no longer smug or cold, but he was furious.

Good, Katsuki thought spitefully.

Tomura took a single step back, rage burning in his stare like black fire.

"Actually," Tomura muttered, as if suddenly remembering a misplaced trinket. He extended his hand with the same cold indifference one might offer to collect a knife. "I almost forgot —"

One of the Vipers stepped forward and silently withdrew a folder tucked beneath their arm. Without even looking at them, Tomura took it with fluid ease. He peeled open the flap and plucked out a stapled set of documents.

Then he turned to face Izuku.

Katsuki's confusion bristled immediately. What the hell was that?

Tomura threw the papers to the ground in front of Izuku.

"You haven't been married for an entire goddamn month," Tomura hissed.

Katsuki's eyes locked onto the page closest to the ground, the one that landed askew and caught the moonlight just right.

He read the header and a vital part of him ruptured.

The Official Divorce of Bakugou Katsuki and Mamushi Izuku.

Finalized.

The printed words were a stab through the heart.

Pain flared like a fresh wound cracking open from the inside out. His chest caved in and his breath shuttered. The shock stuck deeper than any wound ever could. He felt the invisible red string that bound him to Izuku break. It was violently severed by Tomura.

He stared harder and begged for it to be a mistake.

But it wasn't. That was Izuku's handwriting—but that wasn't his. Sitting next to Izuku's, was a crude copy of his signature. It wasn't even correct. The B was too big, and the I had been dotted. But it didn't matter. It was close enough to pass.

Katsuki felt violated.

But above all—he became fucking wrathful.

Izuku shook his head, tears streaking down his face as he cried through the gag. He screamed 'no' with everything he had. The sound was muffled and breaking as his heart shattered in real time.

Katsuki steadied himself through the heartbreak. He couldn't look away from the mess of pages strewn across the snow. His whole body trembled with the quiet, soul-deep realization of what had just been stolen from them.

Their eyes met, and Katsuki's skin went cold.

This was it.

Katsuki hollowed from the inside out, accepting what was coming.

Tomura turned to Katsuki then. The white coat around his frame snapped in the wind like a banner of death as he cocked his gun.

Izuku erupted. He kicked, thrashed, and screamed into the gag with his whole soul. The sheer desperation pushed him beyond the paralytic in his veins, sending his body into convulsions. The two Yakuza restraining him had to force him to the ground. They shoved him down as his knees buckled and his chin struck the dirt.

His face hit the snow, but still he screamed.

Katsuki swallowed thickly as Tomura leveled the gun at his chest.

His throat bobbed. His lungs constricted. He flicked his gaze to Izuku, then back to the barrel aimed at him. He tried not to flinch and not to cry. But it came out anyway. Despite himself, his lip trembled and a single tear slipped past his blood-smeared lashes.

"Don't cry," Katsuki tried to soothe.

Izuku's screams grew louder but Katsuki nodded, trying to convince him that it was going to be okay. Katsuki's nose flared as he took a deep breath, never letting go of Izuku's gaze.

Katsuki braced himself for what was to come. He began counting down in his head.

"I told you—even in death, Izuku. I'll claw my way back to you again and ag—"

The gunshot cracked like thunder, cleaving the world in half.

Izuku's scream tore his throat to ribbons at the exact moment the bullet punched through Katsuki's abdomen. The impact exploded through his body in a searing burst of agony. Blood sprayed in a vivid, violent arc, splattering on the white snow.

Katsuki staggered. His eyes flew wide as the wind was knocked from him. He toppled backward into the waiting coffin with a sickening thud.

The wood groaned beneath his weight. He choked out a gasp that turned to a gurgle as pain overtook him. His hands scrambled weakly against the inside of the box. Blood began dripping from his core as his gut burned and his vision scattered with blinding white spots.

Before he could even process the enormity of the moment, the Vipers picked up the lid of the coffin.

It was slammed down with brutal force, sealing him inside.

Darkness devoured him and terror clung to his skin.

“Nail him in tightly,” Tomura’s muffled voice instructed. “Chisaki has specific orders that he’s buried alive. The heir wants him to suffer in agony up until his last breath.”

From inside the coffin, Katsuki could still hear Izuku’s sobs.

Then the hammering began.

Each nail driven into the coffin was a scream in his ears. Every strike was like a drumbeat of torment, all orchestrated by the two men who had essentially ruined his life. The coffin rattled with every blow, and Katsuki gritted his teeth. He helplessly pressed his blood-slicked hand to his stomach, shuddering against the pain.

Outside, the Vipers dragged the coffin across the snow.

Ice cracked beneath them as they heaved it over the edge. Katsuki winced as he was jostled around. All his cuts and the fresh new bullet wound pulsated with punishing pain.

Then he felt them pick up the coffin and drop it down the grave.

He screamed on the impact as his body bounced. The pain became mind numbing. He tried to push his hand more in the wound to apply pressure. But it was pointless. His fingers trembled as he bit down his bottom lip until it tore.

Next, he heard the horrific sound of the dirt raining down on him.

Heave after heave, soil hit the coffin.

And with every layer piled on, Izuku’s crying grew more distant. The sound of the world grew muffled until he heard nothing at all. All that accompanied him was the hiss of his breath and the pounding beat of his heart. His eyes darted around in the pitch-black, looking for something and getting nothing.

He strained to hear some sort of sound—but he was entirely cut off from the land of the living.

The coffin creaked as he shifted. He laid there, stunned in pain for a long moment.

Then his breath hitched in panic. He had never been trapped like this before. He was buried alive, bleeding, and suddenly the sheer horror of it slammed into him like a freight train. The limited air was laughing at the futility of his heartbeat. He tried to recall if Aizawa trained them for a situation like this. But he drew a large, dire, blank.

His heart rate spiked in fear.

It was only a matter of time before he ran out of air.

As he felt the count down to his death, all the events rushed into him. He saw the cruelty of Tomura at the same time the broken look inside of Izuku's eyes haunted him.

He laid still, entirely paralyzed. For a moment he thought he had died already. Because there was nothing but the stale scent of his own sweat mixed with the iron tang of his insides. That smell spread and he wondered if he was really rotting away slowly in the dark.

But no, he was alive.

He was alive, running down the clock to suffocation, and he could feel every single goddamn ounce of his volatile emotions.

They rose, then collapsed.

Sadness. Fury. Hurt. Regret. Fear.

Each one took their turn swinging at him. And each one landed a punch exactly where it hurt.

He screwed his eyes shut as he cried in pain.

But he wasn't crying from his physical pain. He was crying from his heart break.

The agony from the bullet wound was nothing compared to the hurt in his heart. It was harrowing having to watch Izuku's expression crumble when he was told about the deal. The truth was wrenched out of his hands before he ever had the chance to offer it willingly—and he hated himself for it.

He had waited too long. Why did he wait so long?

Suddenly, every regret he ever had in his twenty five years piled up. The air began to thin, and his wound started bleeding more profusely.

This was really the end for him.

Katsuki's body shook with a loud sob.

As his eyes stayed shut, the world behind his lids showed him everything he lost: He saw his father. Then he saw his mother. He saw Aizawa and all his friends. Then he saw Izuku, happy and smiling. But then he saw divorce papers.

And suddenly, he saw Tomura.

Katsuki's sobs slowed, and his eyes opened.

Panic pulsed through him, and all his spiraling thoughts halted.

Tomura had Izuku. And if Katsuki didn't do something, then his lover would be lost again. But this time, possibly forever through the binding contract of marriage to the Yakuza Heir.

Fear washed over Katsuki. It showed him Izuku walking down an aisle like a lamb to slaughter. Then his fear showed him Izuku under Chisaki's thumb, wearing a ring that wasn't his.

And that was what kicked him in gear.

That possibility.

That fate.

"No," Katsuki rasped, voice shaking. The word dragged itself through his chest. And then it became louder, stronger, sharper—"No. That's not going to fucking happen."

The word fate burned in his head.

All Katsuki felt was utter compulsion to get to Izuku before it was too late. This new flame inside of him burned brighter. It seared so hot that the flame transformed from red, to blue, then pure blinding white. It burned down all the old parts of him that were dead set on revenge. And from those ashes sprouted the wings of the new man he was.

With his breath trembling and fingers slicked in blood, Katsuki twisted his arms.

The pain came fast. It was white-hot and nauseating as the shredded flesh of his wrists scraped against the too-tight zip ties. He bared his teeth like an animal as he continued to twist. He wrenched harder, biting down on his tongue, and ignored the scream building in his throat as his wrists burned like fire.

And then, with a savage jerk, the tie snapped.

The yell he let out was hoarse and broken.

He pressed his palms to the roof of the coffin, feeling the rough grain of the wood under his trembling fingertips. For a moment, he calmed his thoughts to focus. Katsuki carefully slowed his breathing, and controlled his oxygen intake.

His nostril flared as he calcified his sadness down to rage.

"You've made it this far for a reason," bellowed his fierceness.

"You're not some rookie anymore," roared his instinct, sharp and clear.

"And he's not leaving your side ever again," growled his anger.

His wrath reminded him who he was.

He was Bakugou fucking Katsuki who stood in the face of death time and time again, and swung on sight. He never submitted so easily to the grim reaper before. And he'd be damned if he didn't go down swinging yet again.

He began to punch.

With every hit, a memory came.

The first blow, he saw Izuku laughing in the rain that day in Biei. His curls were slicked to his forehead, and his eyes were glowing with the kind of joy that made the world stop spinning.

The second punch brought the quiet memory of Izuku curled against his chest after a nightmare. His voice was quiet as he whispered, "I feel safe with you," so soft Katsuki had to hold his breath just to catch it.

Another punch, and there was Izuku in the grocery aisle. He was clutching a box of instant ramen like it was treasure, smiling with all his teeth.

Then more images came as he began striking in rapid succession.

Izuku in his arms, whispering that no one had ever looked at him the way Katsuki did. Izuku running barefoot through the garden at the estate, leaves brushing his ankles and sunlight tangled in his hair. Izuku leaning up to steal a kiss, his lips featherlight and loving. Izuku tangled in a blanket on their couch, warm and drowsy.

The wood began to crack.

It was small, but it gave a sliver of hope for him to sink his teeth into.

Katsuki barred a vicious snarl. His expression darkened and he punched up harder.

Splinters bit into his knuckles and he felt warm blood streamed down his forearms. But he didn't stop, not even when his bones felt like they might break.

He yelled as he drove up with everything he had.

He punched harder, and faster.

He saw Izuku laughing with Aizawa about a book they both loved. He did it again and saw Izuku shuffling across the cabin floor in socks too big for his feet. He saw Izuku pressing his face against the window to watch the snowfall like it was magic. Izuku humming softly, almost to himself, as his fingers absentmindedly combed through Katsuki's hair.

And then—one last image.

It was so clear it stole the breath from his lungs.

Izuku, standing under the yellow kitchen light, nervous and soft. He was twisting the new wedding ring around his finger as he whispered, "I'm so happy we found each other again, Kacchan."

Katsuki roared, slamming one final punch into the splintering wood.

It broke clean.

Icy air rushed in like the first gasp after drowning. Then dirt spilled down in a choking wave, heavy and cold. It swallowed his chest and mouth as he forced the jagged gap wider. His hands shook and cut on the wood. The pain in his abdomen screamed. It was a ripping sensation that clawed up his spine and down his thighs, but he kept pushing.

He was held aloft by one word that anchored him through the agony—fate.

He clawed at the dirt with ragged, ruined fingers. He dragged the soil into the coffin with frantic motions, choking on earth and breathless terror. But he pushed. He dug. His fingers slipped through the dense weight of earth, trembling and desperate.

His body began scraping upward through the tunnel he carved by sheer force of will. The soil pressed in on him, flooding his mouth and nose. His vision was still blacked out, but he didn't stop. Not even when his lungs burned and his muscles spasmed.

He kept crawling. He kept clawing.

And then—his hand broke through the topsoil.

Snow and wind exploded around the bloodied flesh that reached from the earth like vengeance itself.

A second hand followed, trembling but unstoppable. Then it was followed by one elbow, and then the next. He dragged himself up, inch by agonizing inch. His sharp teeth were bared and his body was weighed down in blood, filth, and sweat that clung to him. His wound throbbed like a second heartbeat the whole way. It spilled fresh blood with every heave, but he pushed past every ounce of pain.

His back groaned with effort. His knees dug into the frozen dirt. His hands dragged his mangled body forward until his shoulders cleared the grave. Then his chest. Then his feet. The snow stung his skin and he snarled through his clenched teeth.

When he finally collapsed onto the frozen ground beside the open grave, his chest hit the snow with an earned, exhausted thud.

He gasped. A ragged, breath ripped from his throat.

Air had never tasted so alive to him. He blinked rapidly as his heart spun out of control.

He shakily looked up across the graveyard and found no one was there. Then he looked down, trembling as he dangerously registered the amount of blood he lost—or rather, was losing.

Katsuki's fingers dug into the freezing snow.

He turned his head towards the path back to the estate and began to crawl.

Every inch of his body screamed with mind numbing pain.

But he dragged himself across the snow-soaked garden of his family's estate. Along the way, he left behind a streak of scarlet that marks a brutal line between death and survival.

His limbs trembled under the weight of what he'd endured. But adrenaline vibrated through his veins like wildfire, burning away any hesitation and fear.

The estate loomed in front of him, dark and cold. He clawed his way to the back entrance, hands scrabbling against the old wooden steps. The world tilted sideways. His vision was nothing but a haze of white and red now, and lightheadedness was closing in.

He grabbed the doorknob and twisted. He groaned when it didn't budge, and hauled himself up by the door handle.

Then he reeled back and threw his shoulder into it with a guttural roar.

The wood cracked beneath him as the door splintered inward. He stumbled through, hitting the floor hard with a rattling groan. Dots danced across his vision, giving him the count down that he was going to pass out.

Katsuki tried to move, but he couldn't breathe.

His vision spun and black bloomed at the edges.

He dug his fingers into the floorboards and dragged himself forwards. He pushed through the hallway, scraping past walls that once held his mother's photos. The pain in his abdomen pulsed with every movement, red hot and wet.

He crawled through the wreckage of the house, his blood marking every floorboard, until he reached the kitchen.

With trembling fingers, he reached up and yanked himself onto the counter, gripping the edge like he was holding on to a raft in a stormy sea. The gas stove loomed above him, and he turned the knob with a shaky hand.

The flame burned steady and blue.

He fumbled toward the silverware drawer. He pulled it open and grabbed the first spoon he could find. His hands were barely working.

Carefully, he held the utensil over the flame.

The metal turned red slowly, making the seconds drag like hours.

Katsuki could barely sit upright, but he forced himself to strip off his ruined coat. He pulled off his shirt. Blood was everywhere, smeared across his body. When he exposed the abdominal gunshot, he almost threw up.

He didn’t give himself time to think too long.

He shoved his torn shirt into his mouth, bit down hard, and reached for the glowing spoon.

And then he pressed the searing metal to his wound.

The pain was immediate and catastrophic. He screamed into the gag, high and feral. The sound vibrated in his skull. The stench of burning flesh filled the kitchen as he held the spoon in place. He cursed himself repeatedly as his whole body convulsed. His hands trembled violently as he turned the spoon and pressed it to the exit wound on his back.

He choked on the scream this time.

Tears streamed from his eyes, mixing with the grime on his face. The pain was a tidal wave and he was barely keeping his head above the surface.

His vision flickered. Everything went gray, then black, then back again.

He nearly collapsed, nearly passed out right there on the tile.

Katsuki’s body slumped against the counter, skin clammy and cold. His chest heaved as if it were the only thing tethering him to the world. But then his vision blurred again. He wearily felt himself going. The colors smeared and the edges of the kitchen were darkening, spinning out of focus like ink dropped in water.

His head lolled.

Then he caught on the old beige landline mounted on the far wall by the pantry.

Katsuki groaned and forced his body forward.

He dragged himself across the tile, each movement was tormenting. His blood left slick handprints behind him. His vision blacked out once, making him hit the floor with a breathless grunt.

The world went momentarily silent.

But when it came back, he pushed harder. Crawled. Clawed. Reached.

His fingers found the edge of the wall, then the coiled phone cord.

He pulled himself upright just enough to reach the receiver, nearly dropping it as it came free. He blinked hard to stay conscious and pressed the numbers slowly, one by one. The buttons clicked beneath his trembling fingers.

He dialed the one person’s number he knew by heart.

The call rang once.

Then twice.

Then a voice crackled to life on the other end, instantly alert.

“Katsuki?!” Aizawa yelled, fully panicked. “Why are you calling from your estate? We’ve been waiting here at the rendezvous point for hours. Everyone else is here—what the hell happened—”

Katsuki opened his mouth, but nothing came out at first.

He clenched his jaw and tried again. He poured the last of his strength into the one word that mattered.

“Help,” he rasped. A broken whisper clawed its way up his throat. “Th…They took him.”

Then Katsuki’s grip slipped.

The phone hit the wall and swung limply on its cord as he collapsed in a heap. His body folded in on itself like a dying flame. His eyes fluttered, finally losing the fight. His world turned black as his blood spread quietly beneath him.

The only sound left was the soft creak of the swinging receiver and Aizawa’s distant voice yelling his name.

Chapter End Notes

Someone commented last chapter that Katsuki could excuse being buried alive but drew the line at divorce, and that is EXACTLY his energy in this fic lol this man will never willingly sign divorce papers.

Please let me know what you think below!! I hope you all have a great rest of your day :')

Chapter 43 — Sordino

He didn't know how long he was out for.

But when the door slammed open somewhere across the house, Katsuki flinched like a hunted animal. The impact vibrated through the floorboards and he could hear the hectic, scattered running of boots spill into the house. Distant shouting from familiar voices echoed down the hall, overlapping, urgent and panicked.

"Check the bedrooms!"

"I've got nothing over here—"

"Basement's empty!"

Then—

“Kitchen! He’s in here!” He heard Denki scream.

Katsuki tried to lift his head for help. But it lolled back against the floor beneath him. His body refused to listen and his vision was blinking in and out. But he could feel the chaos build. Shoes scraped against tile. Someone was shouting his name, trying to get him to respond. But he didn’t. He could only wheeze.

Now, hands were suddenly on him, pulling and frantic.

“Bakugou, can you hear me?!” He heard someone say.

But he couldn’t see them. Darkness came for him again and this time, he awoke to a sharp sting in his core. He looked down and saw red. So much red.

“He’s out of it,” Aizawa’s voice hissed. “He’s lost too much blood. Quickly, we need to get him fluids and treat this wound.”

“Holy shit, he cauterized himself.”

“He’s barely conscious,” someone else said, kneeling beside him. They reached down and checked his pulse with quick precision. “Shit. It’s thready, but holding.”

“—I’ve got the gauze, we need to hurry.”

“Get him on the table,” Aizawa ordered.

Katsuki groaned in pain as multiple people hauled him upright. Someone swiped off everything on the kitchen table that was last set how he and Izuku left it, months ago. They pulled him onto the surface underneath the single light of the room.

The pain in his gut flared again, stealing the breath from his lungs. Blood smeared beneath him, sticky and warm. His bloody, bruised hands trembled uncontrollably.

He barely registered Miruko’s voice by his ear.

“You’re alright,” she comforted. “We’ve got you. You’re alright.”

“Izuku,” Katsuki rasped. “They—he’s gone—he’s—”

“We know,” Aizawa said somewhere to his right. “Don’t worry, we’ll get him back. But you need to focus and hold on right now. You lost a lot of blood.”

“Shit—he’s burning up.”

“That’s from the cauterization,” Monoma hissed. “He’s probably in shock.”

Someone ripped open a bottle of water with their teeth and poured a capful over his lips. “Hey. Hey, Bakugou. You hang in there. You don’t get to die and leave us behind, you hear me?”

Katsuki choked on the water, coughing violently. “I—need to get to him—Izu…”

“You will,” Shinsou replied, voice surprisingly loud. “But not like this.”

Someone peeled back the fabric around the makeshift cauterization.

“It’s messy, but it’s keeping him alive,” Aizawa shouted. “We’ll clean it, stabilize him, then move him.”

Katsuki’s head fell to the side. He caught a glimpse of the emerald ring still on his finger. A sob shuddered from his chest and his eyes glazed over with tears.

“He’s not safe,” Katsuki wept.

“We know,” Aizawa repeated, gripping Katsuki’s shoulder. “And we’re gonna fix that.”

His vision came back for a moment. He looked around and surrounding him was his team. They were all bruised and bandaged up. But they all wore looks of ghostly worry, staring down at him.

Denki pressed more gauze into his wound. Sero braced Katsuki’s legs, keeping him still when he convulsed. Miruko stayed at his head, smoothing back his hair with surprising gentleness as Monoma administered a painkiller and Shinsou began prepping an emergency IV.

“We’ve got you,” Miruko comforted softly.

Katsuki blinked once. Then again, slower.

Soon, he slipped under completely.

When Katsuki woke up, his entire body felt like it had been dipped in static.

Not pain exactly, but rather the numb, humming echo of it. A thick fog of painkillers clung to his flesh and bones, making everything feel far away. He blinked slowly and his vision swam until it finally focused enough to take in his surroundings.

He was in the master bedroom, laying in the bed. The afternoon sun filtered in through sheer curtains, casting golden slants across the sheets. Above him, a clear IV bag hung from the crooked top of the bedpost. And his body was wrapped in thick, white bandages. He felt twice as heavy beneath its layers. His stomach was tightly wrapped and blood seeped out faintly through the gauze.

But his hands were shredded beyond recognition. Every finger was bonded and stiff.

He tried to move. But his appendages barely twitched.

When he looked around fully, the first thing he saw was Denki. His friend was sitting at the edge of the bed, teary eyed and slumped.

When Katsuki called out for him, Denki jolted upright and whipped his head.

“He’s awake!” Denki shouted.

The room came alive in an instant.

Miruko whirled around from her spot by the window, her face crumpling with visible relief. She strode over in two quick steps, crouching by the bed to check his pulse.

At the same time, Monoma let out a long, rugged exhale and pinched the bridge of his nose. Beside him Sero leaned back against the wall with his eyes closed, his mouth whispering a soft, grateful curse under his breath. And Shinsou, who’d been seated silently in the corner, looked up and his eyes softened fully.

Then finally Aizawa, who was already beside him with a chair, leaned forward slowly.

“You okay, kid?” Aizawa asked quietly.

Katsuki shook his head weakly. “No.”

“What the hell happened?” Monoma asked, his tone gentler than ever. “How did you end up back here?”

“Tomura,” Katsuki rasped. His throat felt scorched. “He caught up to us somehow and took Izuku. Then he shot me, and buried me alive in the fucking graveyard behind the estate.”

The silence that followed was full of building anger. One by one, everyone’s expressions darkened. Miruko closed her eyes with a quiet inhale. Monoma looked away, jaw clenched. Sero pushed off the wall and began to pace.

Aizawa however, sat up slightly and looked over his shoulder, paranoid.

“How the hell did you survive?” Sero asked wearily.

“This crazy idiot punched his way out,” Shinsou answered. “That’s why your hands are so torn up, right?”

Katsuki nodded faintly.

“Shit, man…” Sero exhaled, raking a hand through his hair. “You clawed your way out of a goddamn coffin?”

Aizawa’s head suddenly snapped up.

“We need to get out of here,” he announced firmly, rising to his feet. His voice had the sharpness of urgency now, cutting through the weight of the room. “If they think Katsuki’s dead, it’ll give us an upper hand. But it’s only a matter of time before he sends someone back to check that Katsuki’s actually dead. We need to put a body in that grave before that happens.”

He turned to Sero with a hardened gaze. “We need your worst magic. Do you think you can stage it?”

“Yeah.” Sero straightened and nodded. “I can make it look like he bled out and suffocated. I’ll just need a body that’s the same height and build—and a coffin.”

“I can help scan morgue records in the vicinity,” Denki offered quickly, already reaching for his tablet. “It’ll go faster with two people cross-referencing.”

“Good. Get on it,” Aizawa ordered.

“We’ll need to clean up the blood trail too,” Miruko said, scanning the smeared red marks on the floorboards. “I’ll start clearing the path.”

“I’ll help clean up too,” Monoma added.

“We need to be gone in two hours,” Aizawa stated firmly. “Everyone set your watches. After we’re done here, we’re heading back to Nemuro for the rendezvous point at The Company’s satellite HQ. We have to move fast and quiet. And Katsuki,” he glancing down again, “Rest up while you can.”

Katsuki nodded, even though his chest hurt.

Sero finally got his moment to shine, putting his morbid talents to work in real time.

Katsuki had seen flashes of this over the years, but he’d never bothered to pry. Sero’s resourcefulness and his unnerving knack for acquiring bodies was fucking insane. But it was exactly why Aizawa hired him to stage scenes.

But even though he knew what the guy was capable of, Katsuki couldn’t suppress the chill that moved down his spine when Sero returned with a corpse that looked eerily close to him.

It wasn’t an exact match. The man was around thirty, with mildly darker blond hair and strange orange eyes. But he was the right build, the right height, and more importantly, he’d died quietly in his sleep from an aneurysm two days prior.

Sero handled the rest with precision.

He secured a fresh coffin. Then he doctored the body with just enough blood, bruises, and dressed it in Katsuki’s clothes. He shot the corpse through the stomach and placed the man face down in blood with zip-ties binding his wrists. Then he got the whole thing buried.

After that, the rest of the team helped re-fill the grave and discreetly dispose of the shattered coffin. They scrubbed every trace of blood from the surrounding snow and soil.

By the time cleanup was done, Katsuki regained some strength. He put on new clothes that were in his closet and hobbled his way through the estate. He was leaning hard on Izuku’s old crutches, which had been tossed aside and nearly forgotten in the living room.

When he stepped outside, the cold stung his cheeks and lungs. Everyone was out in the gravesite, working hard to make sure not a single drop of blood or disturbed patch of dirt gave anything away.

He paused when he saw the scene.

It was surreal.

His grave sat right beside his mother's, clean and undisturbed. From a distance, it looked like he never escaped. It was as if Bakugou Katsuki died in that coffin, right beside his mother.

Monoma walked up next to him and lightly patted his shoulder.

"Congratulations," Monoma said. "You're officially a dead man."

When they reached the satellite HQ, Katsuki took a second round of high-strength painkillers. The drugs dulled the edge of his wounds, but they couldn't mend the ache in his chest.

Several dozen other Company agents were staring with wide eyes as they burst through the halls. Shinsou and Monoma held him up on either side while Aizawa yelled for someone to go find more medical supplies.

They spilled into a stark, functional room. It was part command center and part makeshift shelter. There was a long metal conference table in the middle and a beat-up blue futon in the corner. And along the walls were several super computers and surveillance equipment.

The first thing the team did was get him down onto the futon. They layered him with blankets and fresh bandages, replacing the soaked ones from the drive. Sero handed him water and Monoma else adjusted the IV drip again.

All the while, Katsuki remained silent.

His mouth was tight with pain. And in his head, the lingering aftershock of everything that occurred rang out again and again.

Everyone kept telling him to close his eyes to try and sleep. But every time his lids drifted shut, all he could see were fragmented flashes of the night's events. The chaos of the mountain ambush. The divorce papers. The coffin closed above him. Dirt pouring down like rain. And worst of all, the expression on Izuku's face.

He re-lived how Izuku broke down, over and over.

"First things first," Aizawa announced loudly, eyes already scanning the map projected on one of the large flat screens. "Kaminari, do you think you can pull up any leads? We should start in Tokyo and fan out from there—"

"I put a tracker in his ring," Katsuki admitted.

The room went silent. Then everyone turned slowly. Their faces shifted from stunned to impressed then to something shy of horrified. Only Monoma didn't react. He simply pressed his lips together and looked off to the side as if he wasn't an accomplice.

Aizawa's brows shot up. "You what?"

Katsuki winced. "Right before the ambush, I welded a tracker inside his ring. I didn't get a chance to tell him—I just...I needed to know I could find him if something happened. Denki, I can give you my passwords. You should be able to access my cloud and sync the signal to your system."

"Perfect," Denki exclaimed immediately, already pulling out his laptop. "Man, I am so glad you're paranoid. That's the kind of crazy that saves lives."

Katsuki gave the barest nod. "We have to find him before it's time to—"

And then it hit him.

Nana.

He jolted upright. Pain spiked through his abdomen, but he was too panicked to give it notice. He stumbled forward, desperate, lungs working too hard.

"W-We—" Katsuki broke into a violent cough, clutching his stomach. "Someone has to find Nana! We have to tell her what happened and ask if she can wait. We need to buy more time."

The team exchanged tense glances. Aizawa immediately began running through logistics in his head.

"I'll go," Shinsou volunteered without hesitation. He squared his shoulders, already rising to his feet. "Do you know her location?"

"Not exactly," Katsuki admitted, voice thin. "But I know enough to get you started. Her code phrase is 'One for All.' Izuku said she's using an anagram, 'Lone Flora.' She's probably staying in a hideaway under that name. It would be some kind of discreet business, maybe a pub."

"I'll go too," Miruko added firmly. "We'll take turns driving and push through the night."

Katsuki nodded, forcing himself to focus. He scribbled down everything he could remember from the black folder. He wrote down addresses, names, contacts, and every description that he could recall from when he'd done his intense research on the matter. He handed the list to Shinsou and Miruko as they prepared to leave.

Then he jotted down access codes and system credentials for Denki and Sero so they could tap into the tracker. They moved fast and jumped off to the computers on the other side of the room. Their fingers began typing faster than Katsuki could even think.

Within minutes, Shinsou and Miruko tore out the door.

The silence afterward was heavy.

Aizawa went outside the room and came back with food for everyone. He set down a bowl of broth and handed it to Katsuki, who could barely hold the spoon. Monoma took a bowl of soup and began to eat. As he did, he periodically adjusted Katsuki's IV bag and administered more pain killers.

"We'll find him," Aizawa whispered, eyes tired but steady.

Katsuki couldn't answer.

Because deep down, he didn't know if that was true.

The pressure bearing down on him now felt worse than being trapped in that coffin.

☽ ☽ ᔓ ☾ ☾

Izuku couldn't feel his legs.

He wasn't sure if it was from his injuries or the aftershock. Everything inside him felt sluggish and warped.

It felt like he was being held underwater. Every breath he sucked in was thick. Every step he heard was too far away. He didn't feel like he was in his body. Not really. His mind was stuck at the gravesite, staring into the black headstone that read Bakugou Katsuki.

He could still hear the sound of dirt hitting the coffin. The soft thump of it repeated like the ticking of some cruel clock that was stuck.

They drove all the way back to Tokyo with Izuku tied up in the backseat.

Tomura instructed that he be put in extra restraints. But really, there was no need for that. Izuku didn't move. He didn't even talk. He stared blankly up at the car roof, remaining mute the whole, eighteen hour car ride back to Tokyo.

When they arrived at their destination, it was nearly nightfall.

Tomura dragged him out of the car without so much as a word. His brother's hand clamped around his arm like a vice as he unkindly yanked him along.

Izuku stumbled the whole way through the slush and gravel. His body ached. His ribs screamed. His lip was split—but none of it registered. It was far away, like it was happening to someone else. Behind him, the loud, synchronized footsteps of the guards kept pace. Half were Vipers. Half were Yakuza. A wall of silence and steel pressed in on him from every direction.

But he didn't fight them.

He couldn't—not now.

Not when every time he blinked, he saw Katsuki falling.

The image of blood splashing across snow kept looping in his mind. He swore he could still hear Katsuki groaning in pain through the dirt.

That wasn't real. It couldn't be real. This was wrong. Maybe it hadn't happened the way he thought. Maybe Katsuki was alive and breathing and okay. Maybe they would open the coffin and find it empty, broken open by Katsuki's indomitable strength. Maybe Izuku imagined the whole thing. Maybe this was all a dream, and they were still actually in the cabin.

Maybe.

Maybe.

Maybe.

He clung to denial like it could breathe for him.

They rounded to a large golden bridge that crossed a giant mote. In the center of the large body of water was the Chisaki family home. It rose out of the Tokyo fog like a fortress ripped from another era. It was an enormous traditional castle with sweeping tiled eaves, black lacquered beams, and walls wrapped in elegant jade motifs.

Gold shimmered across the gates, tracing ancient characters in artful brushstrokes. It was objectively beautiful, and didn't belong in the modern skyline. The Chisaki family estate was truly untouched by time, anchored in power so deep it didn't need to evolve.

They passed under the archway. Awaiting them were hundreds of guards poised in black and gold. In their hands were katanas and on their backs were rifles. They stepped aside when Tomura came into full view.

The gates opened for them like a flower blossoming.

The floors were polished mahogany, and the scent of incense and old cedar lingered faintly in the air. Tall golden statues stood at the corners of every hallway. They passed by sculptures of dragons, phoenixes, and tigers carved in exquisite detail, each somehow more menacing than the last.

Black and beige screens partitioned corridors like shadows. Their painted surfaces glinted with gold leaf patterns of beautiful flowers and crows.

Tomura kept dragging him deeper and deeper into the palace.

The doors at the end of the corridor loomed large, carved from thick ebony wood and set with gilded chrysanthemums and cranes. When they opened, they did so with ritualistic slowness, revealing the long, cavernous chamber beyond.

And waiting inside, like royalty on a throne of brutality and gold, were the Chisakis.

Chisaki Kai sat at the center of the elevated platform, spine straight, expression bored. He wore traditional clothes. His kimono was black threaded with gold designs. Obsidian beads hung around his wrist and his gloved hands were folded neatly in his lap.

To his right sat his mother.

Izuku had never seen her before, but he knew she was the beating heart of the yakuza. Her name was Chisaki Kurenai. Her hair was pinned up with dazzling hair jewelry and expensive combs. And her beauty was as perfect as ice. She was dressed in an all gold kimono, and her eyes were a deep brown exactly like her hair.

On the Heir's left was the Chisaki patriarch, Takeshi.

He was older than his wife, hair a dusted grey with black streaks. And his eyes were shining gold, like his son's. He dressed in an all black kimono, resting against a black cane that held the symbol of a crow etched into it. His eyes were sunken but sharp and his mouth was drawn in permanent disdain.

All three of them assessed Izuku.

They didn't move. They waited expectantly.

Tomura shoved him forward.

Izuku collapsed at the edge of the tatami with a weak grunt. His knees buckled from under him and his body locked up. He flexed his arms out of instinct, but they were uselessly tied behind his back.

He didn't dare to lift his head. Everything in him screamed that if he looked up, he'd lose what little was holding him together.

"Well," Chisaki Kai said finally. Izuku hated how his voice sounded so polished and perfect. "About time."

Izuku didn't answer. He lowered his head further.

"You'll have to excuse his silence," Tomura replied for him and bowed at the waist. "He's in shock."

"Ah, poor thing," cooed Chisaki Kurenai, tilting her head with pity as she leaned in slightly. Her delicate golden fan fluttered at her wrist. "How long do you think it'll take him to recover?"

"I'd give it a week or so," Tomura replied, as if discussing a common illness. "He rebounds fairly quickly, especially when left undisturbed."

Chisaki Kai exhaled heavily, as though he was the one being inconvenienced.

"And Bakugou?" he asked curtly, tone flat with impatience. "Did you bury that obnoxious bastard alive like I asked?"

“I did,” Tomura replied easily. “The job was done without an issue.”

“Good. I was beginning to get a headache.”

The conversation moved on without Izuku, even though he was its subject. He tried to pay attention, but he could barely keep himself in the moment. He stared down at the floor, blinking against the sting in his eyes. His mind was spiraling—and his heart was still somewhere beneath the snow in Biei.

When his awareness returned, the voices were closer.

“Well, let’s get a good look at him,” Takeshi sighed, slightly displeased.

Izuku tensed as they approached.

Kurenai crouched gracefully in front of him, lifted her fan beneath his chin, and gently tilted his face upward. Her touch was delicate, but it made his stomach turn. He remained silent as the three of them took in his face and all his new bruises. They tipped his head left to right, assessing him then and there like a jewel.

Kurenai looked closely at his eyes and he could see a spark of admiration.

“The bruises seem like they will fade,” she noted happily. “He really is as striking as the rumors.”

“He better be worth the trouble,” Takeshi grunted. “We’ve lost too many good men over this brat. He’s not going to throw another fit, is he?”

“His outbursts are under control,” Tomura replied smoothly. “He didn’t struggle on the way here. I’d say that’s a clear sign he’s finally learned his place. My apologies again for the casualties.”

Takeshi scoffed, face hard. “If it were my call, I’d have put him in the ground right next to that Bakugou bastard. He should consider himself very fortunate that Zen is a long term family friend.”

Izuku’s brow furrowed faintly.

Who was Zen?

If he wasn’t in such shock, Izuku would’ve dwelled on that more. But instead, his thoughts kept rewinding to Katsuki being shot if he even dared think of anything else.

“I, for one, am glad he’s still breathing,” Kurenai interjected lightly, as if to smooth over her husband’s disdain, “Kai has been looking forward to spending time with him more than he lets on.” She turned to her son with a knowing smile. “Isn’t that right, Kai?”

All eyes turned to the man in question. He’d been silent this whole time, watching Izuku like a vulture. He picked Izuku clean with his gaze, breaking down every inch of the man who dared defy him.

“That is right, mother,” Kai confirmed.

With a flick of his hand, he gestured for Izuku to be lifted.

Two guards moved in, hoisting Izuku roughly to his feet. His legs buckled from the strain, and pain flared in his joints, but he grit his teeth and bore it.

When he opened his eyes, sickness hit him.

Standing across from him was Chisaki Kai. His expression was a mix of his mother’s and father’s. Distaste and warped admiration. He was visibly annoyed at all the trouble Izuku went through to get away from him. But Izuku could see in his eyes, the denial made him more interested in a roundabout way.

The Yakuza heir tilted his head, and a cruel smile twitched at the edge of his mouth.

“Still as beautiful as the day you slaughtered your family,” Kai complimented.

Izuku recoiled.

Then suddenly, Kai called out, “Uraraka, bring the ankle bracelet.”

At that, Izuku’s whole body locked up. He turned and saw someone he didn’t notice before.

Coming towards him was a small woman in a plain, grey yukata. She was shorter than him, and hunched ever so slightly. She possessed medium length brown hair and chestnut eyes. Her face was rounded and rosy, but her eyes were distant. She moved like she wasn’t here mentally and in her hands was a tiny wooden box.

When she opened it, sitting inside was a delicate golden ankle cuff. It was a solid, thick metal and in the center it was embossed with the Shie Hassaikai symbol. But it also held a small blinking light on the back.

“A little insurance,” Chisaki Kai explained simply.

The woman knelt at his feet, hands trembling ever so slightly. She secured the cuff around his ankle with a muted click.

The chill of the metal hugged his skin immediately, cold and final.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The Chisakis offered them a cordial tour of the estate. Even though the civility of it all felt like a performance meant only to pat themselves on the back.

Izuku was paraded through the halls. His hands were still bound by his restraints and on all sides were armed guards and Tomura, keeping his arm in a vice grip. In front of them, the Chisaki family walked in elegant formation.

And behind them trailed the small woman, Uraraka. She kept her eyes downcast and all her movements were quiet. It was as if she were trying to become invisible.

The large group moved through corridor after corridor. Every room was more lavish than the last, but the luxury barely registered to Izuku. His mind was trapped back in Biei, frozen in time and stuck in denial. For the hundredth time, he relieved Katsuki being nailed in the coffin. He tried to rewrite the memory. He added a miraculous extension where Katsuki clawed his way free.

He had to. Right? It was Katsuki. His Kacchan was unyielding, powerful, and clever.

Izuku's eyes blurred. And behind his ribs, his heart was still beating in the dark with Katsuki. It pounded against the coffin lid, waiting to be let out.

They walked every floor of the estate, all five towering stories of it. All the while Chisaki Kurenai spoke in lilting, pleasant tones as if she was giving a tour of a cozy countryside inn. She described each wing with theatrical enthusiasm: the grand music hall that was lined with traditional shamisen and drums, the endless corridors of libraries, and the twin kitchens that smelled faintly of spices and smoke.

Every room they passed gleamed with deliberate elegance, adorned in the house's signature palette—obsidian black, deep jade, and glinting gold.

As Chisaki Kurenai went on, Izuku wondered if she noticed the dried blood on his face or the tears that still streaked his cheeks. Or perhaps, like her son, she took a quiet satisfaction in seeing him hollowed out.

Maybe to them, he really was just a wild, beautiful thing that'd finally been tamed—finally theirs.

Eventually, they reached the last staircase leading to the top floor.

At the very end of the corridor was an elegant, large shoji door. It was slid open by silent servants.

"And here is the last room," Kurenai announced smoothly, gesturing with a graceful hand. "Your residence for the time being."

Izuku froze in the doorway.

The color palette was entirely dark green and gold. The arrangement of furniture was nearly like his room at the Viper compound and the shelves were all lined with his favorite books and vinyl records. It was an eerie reconstruction of all the comforts he gravitated towards—and it made him sick.

"With your brother's help, I had this prepared for you a few days before the masquerade," Kai explained casually with his hands folded behind his back. "If anything isn't to your liking, let Uraraka know. We'll see to it."

“She’ll serve as your handmaiden,” Takeshi added, stepping forward with a voice that was both formal and sharp. “Her family’s debt is significant, and she’s paying it off by serving here. She’s been instructed to meet your every need—no exceptions. So if there’s something you require, do not hesitate.”

Uraraka bowed slightly then. Her hands clenched tightly around the sleeves of her samue.

“I’m afraid this is where we part for a couple of days,” Chisaki Kai huffed, a bit annoyed. “But only for a week. We weren’t sure when you would be brought here, so we scheduled a business meeting overseas. In the meantime, Izuku, please rest up and recalibrate. It’s quite late.”

“Same for you, Tomura,” Takeshi instructed. “We have a lot to discuss when I come back.”

Izuku stared at the room, and his mind ripped him back to Biei.

He kept hearing the gunshot, over and over.

It didn’t even register when the Chisakis gave their goodbyes. And he didn’t notice when the Yakuza bodyguards peeled off. Izuku only snapped back to the present when Tomura pushed him forward into the room and one of the vipers began to cut him loose.

On instinct, he brought his hands to his chest. He quietly nursed his wrists as he took a look around. Sourness bit at him. This was yet another beautiful cage he was trapped in—and this time he got a golden shackle to match.

Tomura turned his back and began discussing logistics with the remaining Vipers.

Their voices dropped to quiet murmurs as they exchanged plans for the week. But Izuku’s attention drifted downward—until it landed on his left hand.

His body jolted.

There, gleaming defiantly on his finger, was the eternity wedding band.

His breath caught in his throat. Slowly, with trembling fingers, he slipped the ring off and curled it tightly into his fist. He shielded it from view and his body began to shake from nerves. Out of fear, Izuku dared a glance toward Tomura. His brother was still talking, and then Izuku cautiously looked to the side.

He froze.

Uraraka’s gaze was fixed on him.

She saw the ring. She saw everything.

For one tense second, Izuku braced himself for her to speak. He began to prepare himself for her to expose him and call attention to it like a good, loyal Yakuza servant would do. But she didn’t. Her expression shifted a bit, mildly unreadable.

She dropped her gaze to the floor and said nothing.

“The first chance you get, go back to Biei,” Tomura suddenly instructed. “Dig up the grave and make sure the body inside is dead.”

Izuku’s head snapped up. His heart clutched.

“Understood,” one of the Vipers replied. “We’ll report back tomorrow afternoon.”

And with that, they turned on their feet with the guns. They marched out of the room with military precision.

Izuku stood frozen, his ears ringing with a single thought: they might find nothing in that coffin.

His pulse thundered so loud it nearly drowned out the quiet. If they returned and said the body was gone—if Katsuki somehow survived—then everything wasn’t lost. Katsuki would come for him, Izuku knew it.

Tomura then walked towards him and cleared his throat.

“Izuku, there’s something you should know regarding you and One,” he began gently. “It’s… the underlying reason you needed to be brought back. He’s coming tomorrow to talk to you.”

But Izuku barely heard him.

He was too busy praying that Katsuki’s grave would be empty.

“Izuku?” Tomura repeated. “Are you listening to me?”

He didn’t respond. He leaned his head down further, shadowing his eyes. He couldn’t stomach looking at his brother after what he’d done.

Tomura opened his mouth again. He hesitated, starting and stopping on a word.

If he didn’t know any better, it nearly sounded like Tomura was conflicted. His brother then shifted on his feet and exhaled roughly. He turned his back on Izuku and then walked towards the door. When he reached the exit, he turned to glance over his shoulder, quietly apprehensive.

“I’ll be back tomorrow,” Tomura murmured. “Goodnight, Izuku.”

The doors slid open then they slid shut.

The only people left now were the Yakuza guards outside his door and Uraraka who was quietly gathering a damp towel. She silently began wiping his face clean of all the dirt, sweat and blood. Izuku shut off his mind and let himself be led. She drew a bath for him and laid out a fresh set of pajamas for him on the sink.

“I will come and take you to breakfast in the morning,” she whispered, bowing slightly. “Have a good rest.”

And with that, she left Izuku alone in the bathroom. He stood there for a moment, then finally he stripped out of his dirty clothes. Izuku climbed in and hugged his knees to his chest. He sunk into the warmth and let it cradle him.

Only when Izuku knew he was alone, did he open his palm.

He cradled the ring and softly cried.

ɯɯɯ

Izuku didn’t sleep, not really. He’d spent the entire night going through every possible outcome.

Katsuki clawing his way out. Katsuki holding his breath long enough. Katsuki using brute strength to splinter the wood and punch through the dirt. Even Aizawa finding him, and digging him out in time. There were a thousand ways Izuku imagined Katsuki could’ve survived.

But there was one, more realistic way he didn’t.

And Izuku refused to believe in that one. He bargained everything he could think of, offering it to the universe as a token. If Katsuki was alive, he’d give anything. Absolutely anything.

Uraraka helped him get ready. She laid out a plain, black samue for him that was donned with decorative gold stitch work along the hems. Quietly, they were escorted down to the main dining room by two stoic guards. The golden ankle bracelet on his leg rattled with every step he took.

When they reached the grand dining hall, Izuku was ushered to the long mahogany table and seated alone.

His breakfast was already waiting. It was hot rice, miso soup, grilled fish, and pickled vegetables.

Behind him, four Yakuza guards stood quietly, monitoring him.

Instead of eating, Izuku gazed out the window. He looked across the vastness of Tokyo and waited anxiously to find out what happened to Katsuki.

As he waited, he imagined his tenacious lover barging through the doors. He could perfectly picture Katsuki breaking through multiple guards bare fists alone. Everyone would scatter and it would become a bloody brawl. Izuku almost smiled. He held out hope that Katsuki was alive. Or even better, he would come find him.

He always did. They always found each other.

Again and again and again.

Izuku was certain that it had to happen once more, right?

Because if his grave was unearthed and no body was found, Izuku was going to find his way out immediately and search for Katsuki.

He stayed like that, staring out of the window for however long. His food went cold and no one said anything as he held his arms closely to his body.

At some point, Izuku slipped the ring from his pocket. It was still warm from being cradled in his palm all night. The metal glinted softly in the light, delicate and eternal. He turned it in his fingers slowly, as if the act of holding it could conjure Katsuki from thin air.

He imagined his lover alive somewhere, sitting just like this. He was probably staring at his own ring and thinking of Izuku, too.

With that thought, the ache in his chest softened for a moment.

But then the doors slid open with a sharp click, and the spell shattered. His eyes darted to the side, catching Tomura stepping into the dining room. His brother was accompanied by two Vipers and he was dressed casually.

Izuku's pulse spiked.

Quickly, he closed his hand around the ring in a fist—but it was too late.

Tomura's eyes narrowed, and his steps faltered.

"What was that?" he asked, already knowing.

Izuku shook his head, eyes wide with panic. "Nothing—"

"Izuku," Tomura warned, low and sharp. He crossed the space in long, fast strides, looming over him with a glare that iced over any chance of mercy. "Give it to me."

"N-No," Izuku whispered.

He stood up and stepped back when Tomura came at him.

"Tomura, please—not this," Izuku begged, voice cracking. Tears burned hot behind his eyes.

But it didn't matter. Tomura seized his wrist.

Izuku fought to keep his fist clenched. He twisted and resisted with what little strength he had left.

"Tomura!" he cried. "Please! Just let me have this—just this!"

The pain shot up his body like fire, making his healing injuries scream in protest. But he held on anyway. He held on to the ring as if both his and Katsuki's lives depended on it. Because in some twisted way, it did.

But Tomura was stronger—always had been.

With a snarl of frustration, he grabbed Izuku's wrist in both hands and began prying his fingers open one by one, ignoring Izuku's howls of pain. Izuku writhed in his grip, voice breaking with every desperate plea he made—until the ring slipped free.

It hit the floor with a soft, damning clink.

Tomura picked it up without a word and pocketed it like it was nothing but a trinket. His face was stone, but his sigh was low and heavy, filled with exhaustion.

Izuku fists clenched tight against his chest, trembling. He bowed his head low, his bangs casting his face in shadow. The taste of blood filled his mouth as he bit his lip to keep from sobbing.

"This is for your own good," Tomura chided, turning away.

Izuku heard that sentence too many times to believe it anymore.

He used to think Tomura was doing what was best for him. He believed that somewhere beneath all the harshness and the cruelty—there was care. He figured, maybe it was just buried under the same violence they'd both been raised in.

But now…now he wasn't so sure.

Maybe once, Tomura had been protecting him. But somewhere along the line, that instinct twisted. Now, all Izuku could see was control dressed up as care. He realized, with quiet devastation, that Tomura couldn't tell the difference anymore between what was good for him —and what was good for Izuku.

Tomura sat at the long table, visibly trying to compose himself. The cold mask slipped over his face, but not fully. There were cracks now. He looked older and tired.

Still, his voice came sharp. "Sit down."

And Izuku, as if yanked by an invisible chain, obeyed.

He lowered himself slowly into the chair, hands trembling in his lap. He tried not to cry. But his left hand ached with absence. His ring finger throbbed like an open wound and no amount of biting his tongue could soothe the rawness of it.

They sat in silence as a servant delivered Tomura's breakfast. He ate quietly, eyes on his plate, as if nothing happened. And beside him, Izuku said nothing at all.

When too much time went by Tomura turned to him with a level of apprehension.

"You should eat," Tomura advised, not unkindly. "It's been too long."

Izuku didn't answer. He turned away, pressing his lips together. His fingers curled in his lap, trembling as he fought the urge to scream.

Then Tomura leaned forward, eyes narrowing.

"What did you do to your hands?" He asked tightly.

Izuku blinked. His hands?

Before the thought could even settle, Tomura reached out and grabbed his wrist. Izuku flinched on instinct, trying to snatch his arm back, but Tomura's grip tightened. He dragged Izuku's arm upward, leveling it between them.

Both of them froze.

There, he found his thumb was angry and irritated. The skin on it had been picked raw. The wounds weren't fresh, but they were clearly new. They were infected with stress and etched from days of unconscious damage.

Izuku stared, momentarily disoriented. When had he done that?

"When did you start doing this again, Izuku?" Tomura hissed, annoyed but slightly concerned.

A long time ago, Izuku used to pick at the skin around his hands when he was a child. He didn't do it on purpose. Most of the time, he wasn't entirely aware of it. Hiryu told him it was a response to anxiety and tried to get him into meditation to help take the edge off, but it didn't really work.

Tomura noticed it shortly after.

Later, he quietly placed a stress ball on Izuku's desk.

No words were exchanged and they never discussed it. Izuku used that stress ball and he tapered off picking at his hands. He eventually didn't need it. Because the next year, he met Katsuki. And after that, he began to calm himself down by imagining lovely red eyes and blond hair.

But he supposed that small, ugly habit must've resurfaced somewhere between the masquerade and now.

Tomura sighed, barely audible. He put Izuku's hand down when he didn't get an answer and couldn't meet his eye. He looked across the way instead, staring at one of the jade dragon statues in the corner.

"One is coming to talk to you today," Tomura whispered, barely audible. His eyes skirted down with reluctance, unlike him. "He has a couple of things to discuss with you."

Izuku tensed. He closed his eyes, took a deep breath.

Of course One was coming.

Their leader was going to strip him down for the disgrace he'd caused. Maybe One struck some backroom deal with the Chisakis to get Izuku dragged home faster. He likely needed to do damage control before the news could spread too far that one of Viper Academy's top assassins had defected, fallen in love, murdered two dozen of their best, and freed the next cohort.

This time, Izuku felt his thumb twitch. The pain was sudden and sobering, but he stopped himself. He squeezed his hands together instead, knuckles whitening as he tried to ground himself.

Instead he tried to think of lovely red eyes and blond hair—alive.

They sat in silence for a long stretch, unmoving.

Neither of them spoke again.

One of the attendants approached and set a black teacup in front of Tomura, who took it without a word. He sipped slowly, and the two of them stared out the tall windows. The Tokyo skyline was painted in fog and morning haze.

And in that silence, Izuku thought of how much he hated his brother.

Not with the hot rage of a child, but with the cold anger of understanding. Because now—after knowing what real family, real tenderness, and real love was supposed to feel like—he could finally name what he'd never had. He'd lived his entire life in grayscale, and only now did he realize the world was meant to be painted in color.

The books hadn't lied to him.

The outside world was better.

It was softer. It was kind. It didn't demand blood for loyalty or obedience in exchange for survival. People out there weren't simple like he'd been taught. No. People were layered, shaped by heartache and hope. They weren't all good or all bad; they were messy, complicated—human.

And now that he knew that truth—Izuku wasn't sure he could ever stomach the poison of this life again.

So he held onto hope that Katsuki was alive.

Because if his books were right about the world, then they had to be right about love, too. In those stories, lovers always reunite. They broke through impossible walls, fought armies, cut through monsters and madness and dug themselves out of graves if they needed to.

Because love, true love like he and Katsuki had, made someone unstoppable.

So Izuku repeated that to himself, over and over. He did this until it became a chant louder than the silence.

And eventually, he believed it more than anything else in the world.

ᔓᔓᔓ

One requested they meet in the sunroom.

The sunroom was a glass-walled chamber nestled beside the estate's central garden. The space was quiet, serene almost, and filled with natural light that glinted off the polished stone floors. A small tea table sat in the center atop woven tatami. Surrounding it were two black cushions.

And just beyond the frost-laced windows, the garden stretched in perfect stillness.

It sat untouched with snow blanketing evergreen shrubs and curling around the black stones. In the center was a frozen pond and a pop of color of jade and gold in the sculptures that were scattered around.

The world outside looked peaceful.

But when One entered, the temperature dropped.

Izuku stiffened before he even saw him.

One glided into the room with the lethal grace of an old snake. He was dressed in a black suit so crisp it looked crafted from obsidian. His white curls were slicked back and the starkness of them brought out the contrast in his skin. Even the freckles on his face looked darker, and his crimson eyes were as expressionless as cut gems.

In one gloved hand, he carried his signature gold-plated cane with its serpent's head. The diamond eyes glinted like they knew everything Izuku's done.

And the stare One gave him—it could've carved through stone.

Izuku clenched his jaw.

"217," One greeted smoothly, voice devoid of warmth. "It's good to see you again."

Izuku didn't respond immediately. But the sheer weight of One's presence pressed against him like a hand on the back of his neck. It broke the silence he'd wrapped around himself for protection.

He bowed deeply. "It's…good to see you too, sir."

A silent attendant entered, dressed in muted gray. He poured green tea into their porcelain cups that were patterned with delicate golden cranes.

One gave a soft, vacant thank-you, then raised his cup and sipped without breaking eye contact.

“How was your brief expedition?” One asked, pointedly.

Izuku’s throat dried. He opened his mouth, tried to speak—but nothing came out. Sweat broke out beneath his sleeves.

“Speak freely,” One commanded.

He leaned in and rested his chin on his folded hands. The gesture was almost casual, but the heat behind his eyes wasn’t. It sliced through Izuku and pinned him in place.

“Go ahead. Tell me, Izuku. How did you enjoy your months of defiance?”

Izuku bowed low to the table instantly. He squeezed his eyes shut and held his breath. He prayed that One didn’t take his head right then and there—not before he found out Katsuki’s fate.

“I’m sorry, sir,” Izuku muttered, voice trembling. “I’m so very sorry.”

One scoffed. “I want to know what idiotic fantasy you’d constructed in that head of yours. Where did you think you could run? Hah? Who would take in a thing like you?” His tone turned venomous. “You weren’t planning another Hiryu disaster, were you? You’re smarter than to repeat such stupidity.”

“I…” Izuku swallowed, voice raw. “I was going to leave the country.”

“To where?”

“Anywhere,” he admitted, voice shrinking.

One stared at him like he was filth.

“You really are a goddamn child.”

His hand slammed the table. The cups jumped, tea sloshed. Izuku didn’t flinch—but only because he braced for it.

“I’m deeply disappointed in you,” One hissed, every syllable sharp enough to cut down to the bone. “You’ve cost me more money than you’re worth, and Tomura has wasted countless hours cleaning up the wreckage you left behind. Do you have any idea the kind of disgrace you’ve brought to me? To the Academy?”

Izuku pressed his lips in a thin line.

“Tell me,” One pressed. “Where did you take the kids? We’ve been trying to locate them or their families but we are unable to.”

"…I gave them back to their parents," Izuku admitted, steeling himself a bit. "And then I helped them disappear so they would be safe from us."

He dared to look One in the eye then. He was scared, but he wasn't sorry. Of all the things Izuku's done, this was one he was willing to stand behind fully. He would never regret saving those kids lives, not even if it meant getting slapped brutally across the face.

One grew colder. He straightened his spine and their gazes clashed for a vicious moment.

Izuku could see One's fist curl, as if preparing to strike.

He readied himself for it—but it never came.

"If you weren't you," One growled slowly, "I would've dragged your body back in pieces and strung your head up as an example for everyone to see. You've broken my laws. You've stained my name. You should be dead."

"I'm sorry," Izuku said through his clenched jaw.

"You're not," One snarled. "I can see it in your eyes. But it's okay. You are already dead to me."

A silence followed. It was overpoweringly chilling and suffocating.

"But tell me," he jeered, voice low. "Have you learned your lesson?"

"…I have, sir," Izuku replied, voice nearly gone.

One narrowed his eyes, examining him.

"Don't lie to me. If even one ember of rebellion is still burning in your mind—if you even think of disobedience again—speak, so I can put it out permanently right now."

Izuku hesitated. He thought of scarlet eyes and golden hair. Then he thought of a grave that may or may not be empty.

"I've learned my lesson," he lied, fluidly. "I won't try to escape again."

One watched him for a long time. He picked him apart. Izuku wondered if One could see right through him, and sense his urge to flee. But if One noticed it, he didn't say anything. He narrowed his eyes, leaned back and shook his head like he was disgusted.

"Tomura blames that Bakugou boy for corrupting you," One said. His voice turned contemplative, but no warmer. "He thinks it was love that turned your head. I am unsure if I believe that. But I suppose we'll find out now that that Bakugou boy is…gone."

Izuku clenched his fists.

"You had so much potential," One continued. "All that brilliance—wasted. Thrown away because you got caught up in something as weak and foolish as feelings."

Izuku muttered another apology, barely audible.

He sealed his emotions away behind walls he hadn't touched in months. It'd been so long since he needed to repress his emotions. Katsuki taught him what it was like to feel something real, and just be human.

But Izuku reverted at that moment, for Katsuki's sake. Because if there was even the faintest chance that his lover was still alive, Izuku was going to run as fast as possible to find him.

So he needed to survive this.

"I'm going to be entirely transparent," One stated suddenly. "Chisaki is not the only one who wanted you brought back home. I did as well. I helped push forward the mission to get you back."

Izuku kept his expression neutral and took a careful sip of tea.

"Why, sir?" he asked, throat tight.

"Do you remember what I said before I sent you to eliminate Peter Moore?" One asked, swirling the tea in his cup.

"Vaguely, sir."

"I mentioned your hair color." He nodded slightly toward Izuku's curls. "The dark green, it's very unique. I've only ever seen it one time before in my life, and it made me think curiously about you having it. After you left, I looked at your file."

He paused, setting down his tea with a faint clink.

"I don't normally concern myself with the files of every child dragged through our system. That's beneath my station. But something…pulled at me. And when I read your records, I saw her name. There's no delicate way to say this. Your mother and I…we knew each other."

Izuku's breath slowed.

Time suspended in the air and Izuku's fingers tightened around his cup.

"After I saw that," One sighed. "I asked Tomura to get one of your hair brushes and I pulled a strand out. Then I ran your hair against mine."

One looked at Izuku directly now, his gaze sharpened.

"We're a match," One said.

Izuku leaned back.

His back straightened involuntarily, spine locking into place as though something cracked down the center of his chest. He couldn't feel the floor beneath him. The air turned thin. His thoughts scattered and scrambled for something solid to hold onto. But the conversation turned into a straight vertical drop, and he was free falling.

"…What?" he whispered.

But One's expression barely changed.

"Don't make me repeat it," he said coldly. "I didn't know she was pregnant. If I had, I would've tracked her down the moment she disappeared."

Izuku reeled.

His lips parted, but no sound emerged. Only a faint, fractured echo of his breath catching in his throat came out. The walls of the sunroom tilted, warped by the sudden shift in gravity as the truth crashed through him.

His heartbeat surged, deafening him. His lungs forgot how to work.

He looked at One's features—not one. His father? He looked at his father's features. The curly white hair. The red eyes.

The freckles.

Izuku soaked in the information the longer he counted One's freckles. Then he began to recall Inko's features. He overlaid them on each other and became progressively queasy when they perfectly melted together to—

Make him.

"Cruel how life works sometimes," One bitterly mused, leaning back. "I always wanted a biological son. But no one ever matched your mother's beauty to bear my children. So I gave up. I took Tomura under my wing instead—he was driven, and in need of guidance. But you…" He smiled reluctantly. "You were under my roof this whole time, and I didn't know."

Then it hit Izuku: the violent, ugly reason why Inko gave him up in the first place.

He recoiled in fear, disgust, and horror.

If One caught the change in his demeanor, he didn't seem to care. Instead his eyes danced across Izuku's face. His tone softened with something that might've passed for nostalgia if it hadn't sounded so icy.

"I feel foolish," One murmured. "Now that I really look at you, you're the spitting image of Inko when she was your age. You have her heart shaped face and her honey kissed skin. You even have the exact bright eyes and dark hair that allured me to her in the first place. Her beauty captured my attention the same way yours has captured Chisaki Kai's."

Izuku wanted to scream, but he couldn't.

He was feeling too many emotions. They piled on top of each other, weighing him down. It became so much to the point all the things he was feeling began to cancel each other out in a numbing, static sensation.

“I suppose this is karma, in an ironic way,” One continued. “My own son, subjected to trafficking under my nose this whole time. And worse—he is somehow both reckless and stupid.”

The energy shifted.

Suddenly a deep look of sourness was being tossed his way.

“Your stunts have cost us a lot,” One growled in a low, threatening tone. “Over several dozen clients pulled their funding and their assignments because you murdered all our top assassins. The financial distress you have placed on my shoulders is considerable. If you weren’t my own blood, I would have ordered to have you beheaded, just like Nine. Do you have any idea how to fix this burden, Izuku?”

“…No. I’m sorry, sir,” Izuku replied quietly.

“Well I do,” One snapped. “You are going to convince Chisaki Kai to marry you.”

As if summoned by the cruelty of the moment, a cloud passed over the sun. The light dimmed. Shadows bled across the room, stretching like claws across the tatami.

Izuku stayed motionless, but inside he unraveled.

“I have to admit, I was never planning on discussing those DNA results with a soul,” One continued. “I was going to just show you quiet favoritism. Maybe take you out to dinner a couple of times much like I’d done with Tomura. I figured we could slowly build up a more personal relationship.”

Izuku’s stomach turned. Shame burned through him like acid.

“But then you slaughtered over twenty Vipers,” One angrily reminded him. “I then needed to ask Tomura why the hell you were on a date with Chisaki Kai in the first place. And after that, he had no choice but to confess his little scheme to try to merge the Vipers with the Yakuza.”

Izuku lowered his head, throat dry.

His eyes locked on the rippling surface of his tea. His reflection trembled.

“He told me everything,” One hissed, voice sharp. “He confessed how he’s been priming you for Kai. How he orchestrated the perfect debut and how he sold your virginity to Kai for a goddamn seat at The Underground Council table. I will admit, it was a good bargain. But given the financial stress you have put on The Viper Academy—I told him you’re worth far more.”

He stood and circled the table slowly, each step a threat.

And then—his hand landed on Izuku's shoulder.

It was heavy. Not just with weight, but with possession, power and control. No warmth. No softness. Only a reminder: you are mine because you are my blood. There was nothing fatherly in his touch.

Izuku thought of Aizawa then.

He recalled his quiet, steady patience. The grace in his voice. The way he checked on them without needing to say a word.

The contrast between One and Aizawa made Izuku miss him.

"The Chisakis are big on family," One continued. "They have been lifelong friends of mine, and once upon a time, I thought I could be one of them. But the differences between us were too great to overcome. They are a line of pure bred prodigies. Bringing an orphan into the family who didn't know his parents was beneath them. I possessed no legacy, only a sword and poison to my name."

He paused and then sucked at his teeth.

"However," he continued. "I gained their trust over decades. I built an empire from the ground up that matched their lavish lifestyle. And when I succeeded in doing that over forty years ago, Takeshi was impressed."

One hummed lightly and tilted his head.

"He said that if I ever had a son or daughter, he would consider a marriage bond between us. But it would have to be a biological child, per their traditional morals. And the child had to meet their standards of beauty—which is why Inko was perfect to be the mother of my children. I knew her looks would pass down easily to our children."

Izuku began to feel sick.

"But when she escaped," One sighed then, angry. "I gave up. I pushed the whole idea to the side for decades and never pursued it again. But it seems like Tomura and I are more alike than you and I. He came up with the same goal as I did, all those years ago. And what luck it is that Inko was actually able to give me a child. A gorgeous one at that."

One turned to Izuku then. "Do you get the picture here?"

The hand on his shoulder tightened, and the words were squeezed out of him.

"I do," Izuku whispered, voice tight.

"I know you're trained in seduction tactics," One said, more threat than statement. "If you're wise, you will use them and behave from now on. We will merge with the Shie Hassaikai and fix your mess. If you successfully convince that spoiled brat to marry you, I'll consider all this forgiven."

One then began to turn to leave. He stopped briefly and finished his tea. When he placed down the cup, he paused. He hummed thoughtfully and turned to Izuku.

“I suppose you should know this,” One sneered. “My name is Shigaraki Zen.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku remained in the sunroom long after Zen left, rooted in place. The hours slipped by unnoticed, swallowed by silence and the slow, drowsy light drifting through the paper-paneled walls. Snow drifted lazily outside the window, and still he did not move.

Eventually, he looked down at his hands.

They trembled faintly in his lap. But what struck him most was how familiar they looked. The curve of his fingers. The shape of his knuckles. They weren’t his father’s, they were hers. Inko’s.

And for the first time in his life, Izuku truly saw her.

He saw a beautiful young woman, barely more than a girl, trapped beneath the crushing weight of her circumstances. He saw the fear she likely wore, and felt the pain she endured. He never considered what type of situation she must’ve been in to be caged by someone like Zen for her looks.

But if he’d been anything like Chisaki, entitled and possessive, he hurt for her.

He pictured her carrying a child born from that fear, and then making the impossible choice to leave it behind in order to survive.

And suddenly, all the bitterness he’d carried with him for years began to dissolve. Piece by piece, it slid off his skin, shedding like a layer of his old self. The resentment he’d buried deep, that ache of being unwanted, disappeared into the breeze.

If she saw Zen in him—then Izuku didn’t blame her. How could he? If he was able to get pregnant, he was unsure if he could love the child of a man like Zen or Chisaki.

That thought hit him like a hammer.

If she looked at him and saw her worst nightmare staring back, then maybe she hadn’t abandoned him.

Maybe she’d been trying to save them both.

She didn’t have intentions of him landing back here with Zen. Because if she did, she wouldn’t have run away from the man. Life was just cruel to him, and placed him ironically back into the hands of his violent father.

Izuku rose at last from the floor. His movements were slow like a soul returning to a body that no longer felt like home. Outside, the sky shifted colors. It was now washed in pale orange and bruised with purple dusk.

He stepped out of the room.

Uraraka was waiting in the hall, standing quietly like she'd been there for hours. Their eyes met, and only then did Izuku feel the tears on his face. They were cold and stiff with dried salt.

Without a word, she walked to him and gently wiped his cheeks clean with the sleeve of her kimono. Her touch was light, methodical, and when she was done, she smoothed his hair back into place with quiet care. She did this not like a servant, and not even like a friend. Just someone who had nothing else left to give to Izuku but dignity.

When she finished, she stepped back and folded her hands in front of her.

Izuku wanted to thank her. The words hovered on his tongue but never formed. They felt too heavy, like trying to speak with a stone lodged in his throat.

So he just walked.

His bare feet whispered against the wooden floors that gleamed like polished bone. Behind him, Uraraka followed at a respectful distance, saying nothing. She didn't try to guide him or offer comfort—perhaps because she knew there was no place safe enough to go.

The whole time, his gaze never lifted. He didn't see the priceless paintings or the intricate gold filigree carved into the moldings of the walls. The world shrunk to the weight in his chest and the noise in his mind.

Zen being his father echoed. It mixed alongside a thousand other truths that didn't belong to the life he thought he had.

His fingers twitched at his sides. He didn't know if he wanted to scream or fall apart.

And then—he passed by a door near the first floor. It was faintly ajar and he could see silhouettes against the paper sheets. A sliver of voices leaked through the frame. Familiar ones.

"We just came back from Biei," informed one Viper, casually detached.

"And?" Tomura's voice, sharp and expectant.

"He's confirmed dead. The grave was undisturbed, just how we left it. We opened the casket. It looks like he drowned, face down in his own blood. The smell was foul so we didn't pull him out fully, it seems like he's already decomposing. We nailed his body back up after we saw that."

Izuku stopped breathing.

He tried—he tried so hard—but the air never made it to his lungs. A stuttering, high-pitched gasp cracked from his throat and caught there like glass. His eyes went wide and the world bent in half, spiraling in on itself. The hallway tilted. The walls rippled. The sound of his heartbeat thundered, relentless.

Katsuki was dead.

No—no, no, no.

He dropped.

His knees hit the floor hard, and the pain barely registered. Everything inside him ignited and collapsed all at once. A tidal wave of fire and grief so deep swallowed him whole.

His hands clutched at his face as a sob tore out of him. Raw. Gut-deep. Shattering.

Then suddenly, the doors flung open.

Tomura stood in the frame, staring at him with a flicker of shock, as if he hadn't meant for him to hear that.

Their eyes locked.

Izuku's sob broke into a scream that finally made it past his throat. He scrambled backward, heels dragging against the floor, trying to push himself away even as Tomura moved toward him. His hands trembled, and his heart—

His heart broke.

It shattered in a way he never thought was possible.

"You killed him," Izuku cried, voice hollow and frayed. His face crumpled as fresh tears poured down. "Y-You really…you really killed him."

Tomura's expression cracked.

He took a slow step forward, squatted down, and reached out a hand.

But the moment his fingers brushed Izuku's skin, everything in Izuku burned like he'd been branded. Izuku flinched violently, ripped his arm away, and shoved Tomura with every ounce of strength he had left.

"Don't touch me!" he screamed, voice splitting at the seams.

The yell bounced off the walls and barreled into the stillness. Everyone in the vicinity stopped moving. Servants stared. Vipers and Yakuza guards alike turned to him. And Tomura, he didn't move. He stood there, stunned, his hand still half-raised as if reaching for something that was no longer there. He stood up slowly, taken back.

Izuku's body trembled as he stood, eyes locked onto his brother's.

He stumbled back, clutching at his chest—because it hurt. It hurt so badly he thought he might rip himself apart just to make it stop. He pressed his palm over where his heart used to be. The hollow space was quickly turning into a black void of sadness threatening to swallow him whole.

His tears refused to stop, spilling over as he thought of Katsuki's final moments.

He must've been so terrified and alone. The idea was unbearable and it demolished the last part of Izuku that'd been clinging to life. But what made it worse was that Katsuki loved Izuku enough to try to save him—and died for it.

The love of his life had been killed by his cruel, older brother.

Izuku's vision blurred. He looked down at his empty left hand—where the ring should have been. Where it belonged. He pressed it to his chest and turned.

And then he ran.

He ran blindly, anywhere, as far away from Tomura as his shaking legs would carry him. He ran from the hallway, from grief, from the ghost of a love now buried in a grave.

And behind him, Tomura did not follow.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku was always told all his life that he was immune to poison.

He consumed it until his tongue bled, until the ulcers in his stomach healed, and until he could no longer feel the bite of its bitterness. He thought there was no venom on this planet that would be able to hurt him—but no one warned him of love.

Love destroyed him from the inside out, and it claimed the one light in his life.

He tried to run away from this fact. He tried so hard but his grief stayed on his heels, tracking him down and showing him all his mistakes.

He ran until he couldn't anymore, trapped in a dead end of the Chisaki estate.

The light outside was gone now. It was only darkness and the sick yellow tint of the hallway lanterns that were spaced few and far between. Izuku wandered to the darkest part of the estate and the walls felt like they were closing in on him.

He cried, sobbing loudly like a banshee haunting the halls. Everywhere he looked he felt suffocated. All the golden statues glared at him at every turn. Their gemmed eyes pierced into him like they knew he was the one responsible for Katsuki's death.

If it weren't for him—Katsuki would still be alive, happy at the estate.

He would be there grumpily scowling and learning to live in his retirement. But instead, he got involved in Izuku's life. And now, he was buried in the grave site instead of tending to the garden it surrounded.

Izuku stumbled in his running, feet tripping. He sobbed out loudly, and collapsed against the wall. He clutched above his heart. He clutched as he tried to keep walking. He began to slow down, crying every step of the way. He walked until he felt all the sadness inside of him double up unbearably.

Behind him, Uraraka finally caught up. Her face was stricken with pain but still, she didn't speak.

Izuku wandered until he reached a small shrine tucked into the furthest part of the estate.

The altar stood tall, bathed in warm gold and soft candlelight. It was adorned with delicate engravings and crowded with flowers, incense, and statues that glimmered under the flicker of the flames. Five portraits lined the top shelf—all Chisakis. All watching.

His legs buckled beneath him.

He collapsed in front of the altar, body folding in on itself like a paper figure soaked through. He sat there, grieving until his chest hallowed out. Time folded into nothing. Hours felt like minutes and seconds compressed into cruel, repeated memories of Katsuki.

When he was at the depths of his pain, he heard Tomura's footsteps approach.

His brother's usual powerful, dominant stride was subdued. He stopped directly beside Izuku, but didn't make eye contact. Quietly, Tomura took a seat beside Izuku on his hunches.

He gazed up to the altar, contemplative.

"I…didn't have any intentions for it to be this painful," Tomura offered.

He then reached in his pocket and hesitantly pulled something out. Izuku turned his head to see, and there he found a small, plastic bag, tied neatly at the top.

Izuku's crying trailed off to a steady sniffle. His brows pulled together as Tomura placed the bag in front of him. His hand lingered as he did so, hovering as if he was unsure if he was making the right decision. He frowned deeply. And in his eyes was a mix of coldness plus the ounce of mercy he somehow always saved for Izuku.

"Don't let Chisaki see these," Tomura whispered.

And that was it.

He stood up, and wordlessly turned around. No other words were exchanged as he exited back down the long, dark hallway. Izuku watched him go, confused.

When his brother was completely out of sight and his footsteps were gone, Izuku turned to the bag. He untied it, and glanced inside. His breath hitched and an unsteady, broken sob slipped.

Waiting inside were the two disposable cameras he and Katsuki bought—and his ring.

With trembling fingers, he reached in. He cradled the ring, and its rubies caught the candle light. It twinkled, and another hoarse sob spilled from his lips. He curled the ring in his hand and held it closer to him, trying to cherish the last piece of Katsuki he had.

His head lifted slowly and looked up at the altar.

And then he saw them.

In the flicker of the candlelight, kneeling before the shrine, was everyone he'd ever killed. They appeared in neat, silent rows, cloaked in memory and blood.

Nameless faces of people he murdered on assignments shadowed the back. So many figures he didn't know, and couldn't even name. He could barely recall some of their faces as they stacked on top of each other. And sitting in front of those lost souls, he saw his siblings. Aoyama, Ibara, Hiryu, Himiko and Jin gazed at him. Their stares were a mix of cold and affection. But they all stared at him full of pity.

Then finally, kneeling in front closest to him, were Katsuki and Mitsuki.

They were side by side, staring at him with warm, lovely red eyes.

It clicked then.

He understood his dead ex-husband far better now. He'd always grasped Katsuki's need for vengeance. He sympathized deeply with Katsuki's grief, but he never truly ever knew how it felt. He never knew what it was like to wear that kind of loss so close to his skin.

Not until now.

His shaking hands hugged his arms. He sobbed, progressively getting louder as depression finally caught him.

He struggled to understand that this was his new reality. How ironic, how one death changed everything when he spent his life surrounded by death. He delivered it. Witnessed it. He kept count of the bodies he claimed until the numbers blurred into nothing. He'd even murdered his own brothers and sisters.

But this was different. This was the kind of grief that felt wrong. Not simply sad or painful. But wrong.

It was as if his world tilted off its axis and refused to rebalance. And what caused it to tilt was the indignation. The injustice of a wrongful murder didn't sit beneath his sorrow; it sat on top of it. It was a crushing weight that made it impossible to breathe, let alone move forward.

Now he understood that rusted, dragging shackle Katsuki had carried behind his every step.

Izuku was floating in his mourning now, unmoored. No anchor. No compass.

Katsuki was gone.

He clawed at his chest like he could tear out his grief. His fingers trembled as they dragged across skin. But it wouldn't move. Wouldn't lift. It was wedged beneath the weight of injustice, a boulder that refused to budge.

His palms began to itch. A thought in the back of his head grew louder as the itching grew more and more intense. It whispered to him: the only way to ease it was to balance the scales. A life for a life. A truth older than law.

Only then—maybe—could his grief fly free.

The glow of the candle lit his figure in the dark and he turned and showed his face to the world. His eyes were bloodshot, red, and his cheeks were streaked with tears. Anger was marred so deep into his face that his viridian eyes glowed with wrath.

He stood up, shoulders heavy and anger on full boil. He curled his fist around the ring as he walked up to the window. Down below, he could see Tomura and Zen. They were walking away from the Chisaki estate towards their cars, talking.

Izuku stopped crying then. His sadness transformed to hatred, then to unparalleled rage. His eyes darkened to the point of no return as a scornful glare took over his face.

If it was a wedding they wanted—then fine. A wedding they would get.

And Izuku would make sure it'll be a wedding everyone in Japan would remember for decades.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you guys think below!! ❤️ I'm eager to hear everyone's thoughts, screams, theories and more 🥳

Everything is finally coming to a peak and merging together :') According to my outline, there's ~7 chapters left, which is insane. But who knows tbh so many times in this story chapters I outlined to be one chapter split into four chapters lol (all the flashback/rewind chapters did that) so I am very stoked to get into this last bit!!

Thanks so much for reading <3

Chapter 44: Accelerando

Chapter Summary

Accelerando (Tempo indicator) — A gradual increase in tempo.

Chapter Notes

Hellooo!! I'm back from my break! :'D IM SO HAPPY TO BE BACK WITH THESE ANGSTY BOYS!!!
If you're still around I'm so thankful and happy you guys are here. Really :)) you are all so amazing. Commenters and silent readers alike, I appreciate you! <3

First, thank you to the LOML, Luna, for Betaing like always!! Now lets get started :D

I hope you guys enjoyed the last 60 days of peace, we're done with that now <3

Izuku stalked through the dark hallways, not uttering a word.

The weight of the small plastic bag in his hand was heavier than it should've been.

Originally, Izuku thought their disposable cameras were gone, along with all the memories. During the ambush, the small items were left behind in the chaos. But, now that he reflected on it, it made sense his brother swept Aizawa's cabin for any proof of Izuku's rebellion. Tomura was probably going to burn every lick of evidence to hide what he considered to be Izuku's 'defect'.

But now, his and Katsuki's memories were given back to him—as a gift.

Handed over by the same man who killed the love of his life.

Izuku's fingers clenched tighter around the bag until his nails bit into his palms. The anger inside him burned hotter than anything he'd ever felt before.

When he reached the door of his new imprisonment, he paused and turned.

Ochako was standing there, small and unmoving. In the dim hallway light, her figure was half-silhouetted. She didn't make a move towards him. She simply waited, still and steady, like she'd been this entire time.

Izuku scrubbed at his eyes with the back of his hand and cleared his throat.

"Um…thank you," he rasped, voice rough from crying. "For everything. And sorry for being so quiet. I know it's probably uncomfortable for you."

"You don't have to apologize," she gently replied. "If you don't feel like talking, that's okay."

Something about the way she said that made him stop. He looked at her again, properly this time. Fatigue sat heavy on her shoulders, and there was a slight slump in her posture. His eyes cut down and noted the faint tremble in her hands she tried to hide.

"…Is your name really Uraraka?" He asked, voice softer now. "Or is that just something the Chisakis call you?"

"My full name is Uraraka Ochako," she replied. "They use my family name."

"Do you prefer Uraraka or Ochako?"

She blinked, startled. "I—I prefer whatever you prefer."

Izuku gave a tired, weak head shake. "And if I said I prefer whatever you prefer?"

"Then…I like to be called Ochako," she admitted quietly.

A flicker of warmth broke through his exhaustion. He stepped closer and peered down at the plastic bag.

Carefully, he removed the ring tucked inside and held the bag out to her.

"If it's not too much trouble," he said, barely above a whisper, "Would you mind getting these photos developed for me?"

Ochako's face lit up. "Of course," she replied immediately, accepting the bag. "I'll have them ready for you by breakfast."

Izuku gave her the faintest smile he could manage. "Thank you, Ochako."

"Of course, sir—"

"—You don't have to call me sir," he interrupted. "You can call me Izuku."

She hesitated. "…Are you sure?"

“I’m sure.”

“Okay. Then thank you, Izuku.” Her smile returned, a little tentative but earnest. “I’ll see you in the morning. Please, try to rest.”

“Thank you, same to you.”

They said their goodbyes quietly. As she walked away, Izuku lingered in the silence for a moment longer. When he was alone, the pain returned. The rawness of it permeated him entirely and moved his body for him. With a heavy heart, he opened his new bedroom door and stepped inside.

His bloodshot eyes raked across the glittering items. As he did this, gradually, his rage started to hold hands with his sadness. He changed into the pajamas that were laid out on his new bed.

Right as he changed clothes, he heard faint footsteps outside his door.

He quieted a bit and noted it was two people. Guards, more than likely.

When he got into bed, the grief and resentment in his heart doubled. Then it tripled. Then it became so vast, Izuku couldn’t see past it anymore. He laid on his back, like a man adrift in a dark ocean. No anchor and no shore in sight. In front of him was only fog, and the memory of someone who’d once been all the color in his life.

Izuku’s eyes burned, and he curled his fingers tightly around the wedding ring. His thumb rubbed slow, desperate circles against the rubies, as if he could conjure his dead husband’s heartbeat back into him.

His anger spoke to him and it viciously asked him what Katsuki would want to be done.

But Izuku didn’t have to think for long.

He knew Katsuki would want him to make that wedding a living hell.

ɯɯɯ

He didn’t sleep all night. Instead, a quiet, burning blend of pain and vengeance consumed him.

He shrouded himself with it, wearing the loss of Katsuki like a new layer of skin. It hardened his exterior as he prepared for the day. He dressed in one of the all black custom made samues that held the symbol of the two winding viper on the back.

He walked over to the dresser. This time, he sifted through all the expensive jewelry that was placed in his room. He quietly raked his eyes over all the metals and jewels. Most of them were green, the same color of his eyes. A pitiful attempt by Chisaki Kai to make him feel special, no doubt.

Izuku soured.

He passed up all the emeralds and picked up a small, delicate silver chain. He threaded his wedding ring on it and clasped it around his neck. For a long time, he stared into the mirror. The rubies caught the light, and behind him Izuku could feel the phantom presence of Katsuki press against him, hugging his shoulders.

Izuku somberly kissed the ring, and tucked it away under his collar.

He turned on his heels to the door. The first thing he noted was that Ochako was missing this morning. In her place, he was escorted down to the dining hall by two guards. Izuku sat alone for a while at the large table. And when his breakfast arrived, he couldn't conjure an appetite, yet again.

Half way through pushing around his eggs, Ochako arrived with a small paper bag in her hands. He perked up, and his heart skipped a beat. She approached him with a thoughtful expression and quietly laid down the two thick sets of photos beside his plate.

"Good morning," she greeted. "As you've requested."

"Thank you," Izuku replied quietly.

Ochako lingered for a moment, gazing at him sadly.

"Um," she mumbled. She looked down and to the side. "You two were a beautiful couple."

Izuku's eyes widened, and his head snapped towards her.

She then quickly bowed and assumed her position in the corner, fading into the background. For a moment, Izuku was stunned, blinking back tears. A sudden, sharp pain in his chest sparked and his anger flattered.

His fingers trembled as he tried to muster up the strength to look at the photos.

And when he did, his heart broke all over again.

There was more than he thought. There were photos of them in the car. On the train. In the grass and in front of frivolous tourist attractions. There was even one of them on top of the hood of the car, smiling together. He recalled the sun baked asphalt ribboning through the landscape and the blur of roadside scenery. Their entire journey had been captured in countless photos, each click a tiny burst of sound against the hum of tires.

He paused on one photo of him standing solemnly in front of the train station. He could still hear Katsuki's smug, teasing voice behind the camera.

"Look this way, darling," Katsuki had said that evening. "One day we'll look back on these photos fondly."

"Yeah," Izuku whispered distantly. He echoed the same sentence he'd said back to Katsuki. "One day."

He thumbed through picture after picture, reliving their trip to the cabin. He hunched over and his eyes began to sting again. As he looked at these photographs, he finally thought deeper about the night of Katsuki's death.

First, the divorce papers came to mind. In Izuku's opinion, that one stung the most.

Tomura robbed them of something that meant so much to both of them. He couldn't even let Izuku be a widow in the end. Because really, why did his brother go through the trouble to file the divorce if he was going to kill Katsuki anyways?

Spite was the only answer.

He destoryed their marriage because he could, nothing more.

Next, the deal between Tomura and Katsuki finally demanded attention. He had been avoiding it. He didn't want to think there was ever a moment Katsuki and Tomura agreed on anything—but it made sense. In a way, Tomura attempted to rob them of trust too.

But deep down, Izuku didn't blame Katsuki.

He knew Tomura and Katsuki all too well. Without any doubt in his mind, he knew his brother must've manipulated Katsuki. He didn't exactly know the logistics, but he knew it couldn't have been a fair fight.

His brother zeroed in on people's weaknesses and used them to his advantage. If what Tomura said about giving Katsuki the license plate number was true, then he must've offered the deal directly after the masquerade. And that was Katsuki's lowest moment in Izuku's eyes. Katsuki just discovered his lover killed his mother in one of the worst ways.

If Katsuki encountered Tomura when he was at his most vulnerable—he never stood a chance.

Izuku knew this, because he'd lived it. He'd been there, over and over, caught in Tomura's chess games. So many times he thought he had a choice when really, he never did. And that was Tomura's real talent. He didn't only break people with fists or bullets. He broke people by making them think they'd chosen their cage.

But Izuku saw through it now.

For the first time in his life, he understood Tomura clearly. And he promised himself he would never fall for his brother's manipulation ever again.

He flipped slowly through each photo, and his heart skipped when he got to a particular one. It was a photo that neither of them took. Someone in the cabin must've done it.

The photo was taken in the cozy yellow light of the fireplace. They were on the couch, wrapped up in a small blanket with Izuku resting peacefully pressed against Katsuki. His dead lover's arm was hooked around his waist, and they were blissfully unaware of their surroundings. They were both smiling, talking about something.

But what was more eye-catching was the amount of love pouring out of both of their eyes.

A teardrop hit the photo.

Suddenly, the sound of Tomura's footsteps began to draw near.

Izuku straightened at once, and his spine went rigid.

He wiped the tears from his cheeks with the back of his sleeve and quickly gathered the photographs into their folder. He tucked them out of sight beneath the table. His chest ached at the thought of Tomura laying eyes on them. The idea of Katsuki's smile being scrutinized by his murderer felt unbearable.

The doors slid open with a soft hiss.

Tomura entered, composed and cold. He dressed in casual black clothes that deepened the pallor of his skin. His silver piercings glinted sharply in the morning light. His eyes swept across the room, pausing on each Yakuza soldier with a curt, almost royal nod before finally drifting to Izuku.

Izuku slipped on his emotional mask and clutched the photos in his lap.

"Good morning," Tomura greeted, his voice low and smooth.

"Morning," Izuku replied quietly.

Tomura crossed the room and walked up to him. He didn't look him in the eye as he sat down a small stress-ball next to his utensil. Izuku gazed at it unhappily. It was red, damn near the same color as Katsuki's eyes.

Bitterly, Izuku wondered if that was on purpose.

His brother then took his seat across the dining table. Silence stretched between them, thick and loaded, until Tomura finally looked away and folded his hands in front of him. A servant appeared with his breakfast, all its contents arranged neatly.

Without hesitation, Tomura began to eat.

He was poised when he did it, never chewing too loud and not eating too fast. He savored each bite elegantly, and precisely cut every piece of meat.

As he took his time, that's when Izuku realized why Tomura always held the upper hand. He had patience. Endless, eerie patience that could outlast even the Grim Reaper. He'd plotted for years to kill Nine. And now, he manipulated Chisaki so expertly in the last half a decade that the man hadn't even noticed the strings being pulled beneath his feet.

Izuku swallowed his anger and molded it into a weapon that would last. He could no longer be the desperate, naïve boy who clung to fantasies and fairytales. He decided to follow his brother's lead.

If he was going to get revenge for Katsuki, he needed to play the long game too.

“Ochako,” Izuku called gently.

She looked up from her corner by the door, her eyes alert and kind.

Izuku gave her a soft smile. “If it’s not too much trouble, would you mind excusing the guards? I’d like a moment alone with my brother.”

“Oh! Of course.” She gave a polite bow, then turned to the men stationed near the walls. “We’ll be right outside. Take your time.”

She was nice, Izuku noted. Too nice for a place like this, and it made him sad to wonder why she would be indebted to people like the Chisakis.

Izuku waited until the last of them stepped out, the door clicking shut behind them. Once everyone was gone and it was only them, the two brothers caught each other’s gaze.

“Did you want to talk about Bakugou?” Tomura asked, a bit too casual for Izuku’s liking.

Izuku took a moment to compose himself. He watched his brother closely, shifting gears. He carefully curated himself to appear both compliant and broken enough to be believable.

“We should be on the same page about the story you told Chisaki,” Izuku replied, voice steady but soft.

Tomura looked up from his coffee, brow raised. “What do you mean?”

“If we want him to marry me, I need to know what version of me he’s buying into.”

Tomura set his cup down, studying him. “You’re going to go along with the plan this easily?”

“Yes,” Izuku replied. “I—I’ve learned my place.”

Tomura narrowed his eyes, clearly not fully convinced.

“If I’m going to sell the part,” Izuku added, lacing his voice with meekness, “I need to know what story I’m walking into. I want to make sure we’re aligned.”

Tomura’s gaze lingered, then he nodded slowly. He leaned back and folded his hands neatly.

“All right,” he said. “You’re right. You should know. I gave the Chisakis a version of the truth that made you look like the victim.”

Izuku nodded once. “What’d you say?”

“I told them Bakugou found out you killed his mother on Yakuza orders,” Tomura said matter-of-factly. “Then I said he found out Chisaki Kai was interested in you, and used that to hurt both of you in retaliation.”

Izuku blinked. “And Chisaki Kai believed that?”

“Yes,” Tomura replied. “He’s so self-absorbed it wasn’t hard to feed into his ego. I said Bakugou ambushed you on your mission to kill Peter Moore, got you drunk, and tricked you into marrying him. And you, being a loyal Viper, tried to get a divorce.”

“…But he refused to sign the papers,” Izuku added, guessing Tomura’s angle.

“Exactly,” Tomura confirmed. “It was good that you told me where the divorce documents were before you defected. I showed them to Chisaki. The date next to your signature was before the masquerade. That detail was enough to clear you of being Bakugou’s accomplice in the murder of the five Chisakis.”

Izuku’s fingers tightened around the stack of photographs in his lap. His knuckles whitened as he forced himself to remain composed.

“And Katsuki’s motive for killing them,” Izuku said slowly, “you told him it was revenge for his mother?”

Tomura nodded. “That, and to frame you. I said Bakugou isolated you and made sure you had no one to turn to. Then, once you were scared and alone, he moved in and took advantage of your vulnerability. Claimed you for himself. Not out of love—but just to spite Chisaki.”

Izuku clenched his jaw and fury flared beneath his skin.

“And what was the reason I stayed with him?” Izuku asked tightly.

“Because you’re naïve,” Tomura answered easily. “You fell for Bakugou’s scheme because you’re sheltered and hold on to silly notions of love and romance. He manipulated you.”

Izuku clutched the photos harder.

It was a carefully spun web of lies, but held a couple of holes. But like Tomura said, Chisaki was vain. And egotistical men didn’t look for faults in stories that made them feel important.

He swallowed the bile rising in his throat and nodded once more, stiffly.

Tomura caught his discomfort and frowned. “Are you feeling alright?”

“I am,” Izuku replied. “Thank you for catching me up to speed.”

A silence stretched between them, taut and heavy. Tomura eventually returned to his meal, methodical in every bite. When he finished, his eyes flicked to Izuku’s plate that was still full. His lips thinned, but he didn’t press the matter. Instead, he exhaled sharply through his nose, displeased.

“How did the conversation with One go?” he asked.

Izuku blinked. He shifted his fork, pushing a piece of egg across the porcelain plate.

“As well as it could’ve,” he said truthfully.

Tomura clicked his tongue. “So he told you.”

“That I’m his son? Yeah. He did.”

“And how does that make you feel?”

Disgusting. Filthy.

“…Content,” Izuku lied, keeping his face carefully blank. “Now that I know, it feels like things make more sense. Like I know what I’m supposed to do.”

Tomura studied him for a beat longer than was comfortable, then nodded.

“That’s good, Izuku,” he said, with a trace of cautious approval. “I’m glad you’re finally seeing the bigger picture. If there’s anything else you want to ask, now’s the time.”

There was one thing flickering around in the back of his mind.

“The others from the cabin,” Izuku murmured, eyes still fixed on his untouched food. “What happened to them? Did you…?”

“No,” Tomura answered, his voice clipped. “They got away.”

Izuku’s heart skipped. He looked up.

“But we’re in the process of tracking them now,” Tomura continued. “It’s only a matter of time.”

Izuku froze. “You’re going to kill them too?”

“Stupid questions aren’t like you,” Tomura chastised. His tone hardened, and his eyes narrowed. “You know as well as I do we don’t tolerate loose ends.”

“O-Of course,” Izuku replied shakily. He swallowed thickly and nodded slowly. “No loose ends.”

They didn’t speak again for a while. In the silence, Izuku hoped with everything in his heart that Aizawa and the rest of Katsuki’s friends got far away and never looked back. But he realized the worst: they didn’t know Katsuki was dead. They didn’t know where his body was, and Izuku felt so much shame and guilt for being the reason he up-ended all their lives.

Shinsou’s harsh words echoed in his head: “He might be the death of him. Izuku is not normal.”

In the end, Shinsou was right. Izuku was the death of Katsuki.

Self-loathing wrapped around his throat, making him wish he wasn’t breathing.

As their quiet meal came to an end, Tomura stood and slid his coat over his shoulders. He didn’t look at Izuku, his attention already drifting toward his phone. His thumbs tapped out a message with swift precision.

“I’ll be in and out the next few days,” Tomura informed casually, eyes still fixed on the screen. “One wants to meet with us the day before the Chisakis’ return. Just to make sure we’re aligned, this deal has to go through clean.”

“Understood,” Izuku murmured, folding his hands over the photos in his lap.

Tomura paused, then reached into his coat and pulled out a small glass vial. He set it down on the table between them with a soft clink. The liquid inside was a deep, unnatural blue. Thick, almost syrupy, with tiny air bubbles suspended in it.

“Here’s your master-mix for toxins and poisons.” Tomura looked at him and slid his phone into his pocket along with both his hands. “Your tolerance has dropped too low. You know what to do: one drop to start off with, then work your way up to three a day after a couple of weeks. When you’re running low, let me know.”

“Ah, right,” Izuku muttered distantly. “Thank you, Big Brother.”

The words tasted bitter coming out, but they landed sweetly in Tomura’s ears. His eyes sparked with subtle approval, and a small satisfied nod followed.

“You’re welcome,” Tomura replied. “Get some more rest, Izuku.”

And with that, he turned and left, his footsteps echoing as the door clicked shut behind him.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Izuku got back to his room, his mask slipped.

All the emotions he forced down came back, full force. His hands shook, his body trembled, and his heart ached. He placed the pictures down on his dresser and went to the bathroom. He untucked the ring around his neck and shut the door tightly behind him.

With a bitter gaze, he eyed the vial in his grasp.

It was almost ironic how their lives worked, Izuku thought to himself. How easily they accepted poisoning themselves—both literally and figuratively. This vial wasn’t the only poison they swallowed. They consumed it in their teachings, in their training, and in every command barked at them. All they ever did was poison themselves.

And Izuku was done with it.

Without ceremony, he turned the faucet on. The smooth water ran in a steady stream.

He angrily pulled off the cork top and tipped the vial. His fingers didn’t shake, and his eyes didn’t blink. Thicker than water, the bright liquid swirled down the golden drain. Sharp, metallic scent rushed up, curling into his nose. The smell awoke terrible, putrid memories. He saw all the beatings, the trainings, and all the deaths he witnessed wash down with the liquid.

And Izuku watched every drop vanish.

He held the empty vial a moment longer, then set it gently on the counter beside the sink. In the mirror, he caught his spiteful reflection looking back at him.

He had no intention of becoming a Viper, ever again.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When Izuku stepped out of his room, Ochako was waiting for him. She was quiet, composed, and small against the gilded hallway. She offered him a smile that didn't quite reach her eyes.

He took a few steps forward, and without needing to be told, she began to follow a couple steps behind.

After a moment, he glanced over his shoulder.

"You don't have to linger behind me," he told her softly. "You can walk beside me."

Ochako blinked, startled. "Are you sure?"

"Yeah." He managed a polite smile. "I'd prefer it."

She hesitated for a breath. Then she took two light steps to fall into stride beside him. Once they were shoulder to shoulder, their eyes met briefly and a quiet understanding passed between them.

"So," Izuku asked, voice low, "what's your favorite thing to do here?"

"There's not much we're allowed to do outside of work," she answered with a small shrug. "The Chisakis keep us busy."

"Do you get breaks?"

"Sometimes. I took one last night after you went to bed."

"And what do you do when you get them?"

She smiled faintly. "I like to sit in the garden. It's very beautiful and serene."

"That does sound nice," Izuku murmured.

As they strolled down the jade and gold corridor, Izuku took in the opulence with distant eyes. The walls were lined with a strange clash of styles: traditional watercolor paintings in delicate wood frames sat beside massive, hyper-realistic oil works of the Chisaki lineage. One in particular made his lip curl. It was a portrait of Chisaki Kai standing regally beside a black bear, eyes full of arrogance and entitlement.

But what struck Izuku more were the people moving quietly in and out of view. Other servants shuffled by in dull grey clothes, walking in the shadows in hopes of shrinking into them. They passed without eye contact, faces blank, and shoulders slumped.

Izuku surveyed them closely. Then he whispered, “Is it okay if I ask you something personal?”

Ochako turned to him with a polite, practiced smile. “Of course.”

“Why are you here?” he asked. “And how did you end up indebted to the Chisakis?”

She stiffened at first, then let out a hollow laugh. “That’s two questions.”

“Ah—sorry.” Izuku scratched the back of his neck, mildly embarrassed. “You don’t have to answer. I let my curiosity get ahead of me.”

“No, it’s okay,” she said softly. “If anyone deserves honesty, it’s you.”

She looked straight ahead as she spoke, voice hushed.

“It was my grandfather. He took out a loan from the Yakuza during the factory boom. He wanted to start his own business and ride the wave of wealth like everyone else. At first, it looked like it would work. But then the market crashed and he lost everything. He accumulated more debt than he ever borrowed with interest.”

Izuku’s brow furrowed, listening closely.

“The Chisakis offered a solution,” she continued. “He could work it off—basic wage with grueling hours. Or he could lose his head and family. Obviously, it wasn’t really a choice. But then he died, and the debt passed to my father. But my dad got hurt and couldn’t keep working. So I dropped out of school, signed my name on the contract, and took on the debt to keep them from killing us.”

Her voice cracked slightly at the end.

“They said they’d only wipe the slate clean if they killed us all,” she whispered. “Me, my parents and my little brother and sister. So…I offered myself up. This way, my siblings can continue their education without worrying.”

Izuku’s chest tightened and his fists clenched at his sides. The photos of Katsuki suddenly layered over the vacant eyes of the servant who passed then.

“…Are most of the servants here in debt?” Izuku asked, disgusted.

She nodded. “Nearly all of us have some sort of generational debt. No matter what, someone always pays.”

Izuku stopped walking. He looked at Ochako. He really looked at her. There he saw a girl who sacrificed her freedom for the people she loved.

“I-I’m so sorry,” he whispered, voice breaking.

She smiled softly, but it didn't touch her eyes. "It's okay. I've accepted it. I work hard so if I ever have children, they won't inherit this. I want to be the last one."

Izuku felt sick. The taste of helplessness mixed with the slow-burning fire of grief. He turned his head as another servant passed and saw Katsuki in him—but more so, he saw Mitsuki. He saw an alternative path that could have been theirs if Mitsuki didn't flee Tokyo. He briefly wondered if that's why she ran instead of repaying them.

And something clicked.

Katsuki's death wasn't only because of Chisaki Kai.

It was the legacy he came from. It was the rot in the roots of the Chisaki family tree that spread across the country. From Kai's father to his grandfather and beyond. Their cruelty was disease passed down like simple inheritance. And if Kai had a child, it would begin again.

There would be more Ochakos. More Katsukis. More Mitsukis. More graves.

He blinked, eyes soft again as he gazed at Ochako.

"Thank you," he said quietly. "I appreciate you telling me. That was very eye opening."

"Of course," she replied. "If you have more questions I'm happy to answer."

"I think I'm good for now," Izuku said gently. "Would you show me the garden? I'd really like to see it."

ᔓᔓᔓ

The days that followed blurred into one another, blanketed beneath a steady fall of snow. It grew heavier with each passing morning, collecting against the windowpanes like nature itself was trying to muffle the world into silence.

True to his word, Tomura came and went. He made a point of having breakfast with Izuku every day, sitting across the long table in either crisp black or stunning white. No in between. He offered casual updates on The Viper Academy and how the rebuilding efforts were progressing. His voice was even, almost bored. It was as if they were discussing the weather and the last few months were merely a blip.

Izuku responded with nods, brief replies, and the occasional faint smile. While he came up with a plan for avenging Katsuki, he couldn't afford to show anything. Not sorrow. Not rage. Not fear. He expertly pressed down his emotions, suffocating them beneath a performance of obedience.

But the moment Tomura was gone, his mask disintegrated, and the flood poured out.

When he was alone, Izuku would weep. Grief clawed at his throat, hot and unrelenting. He mourned Katsuki in one long wave that never let him catch his breath. And he deeply feared that Aizawa and the others were next.

During these days, he couldn't find the strength to get out of bed after breakfast. He rotted away under the covers, refusing to step foot into the hallway. He stayed there, drowning in his sorrow, reliving Tomura killing Katsuki again and again.

On these nights, he slept with the photos in the bed. He would flip through them until he memorized every single last image.

Katsuki in the car. Katsuki laughing by the train. Katsuki with his confident, crooked smile in front of a tourist stand. When he held the photos, he could almost feel Katsuki beside him again. It was as if he were holding his hand, telling him he was still beside him. He could feel the ghost of the tiny hearts Katsuki used to trace into his skin with his fingertip.

But more importantly, with every single day that passed, Izuku's rage simmered hotter and hotter.

And when the day finally came to meet with Zen, Izuku's resentment was tightly coiled in his gut, waiting to strike.

ᔓᔓᔓ

They met in the west wing, in the Chisaki estate's opulent library. The room was cavernous, lined with floor-to-ceiling shelves that housed thousands of books. It smelled of old parchment and varnish, a scent both comforting and stifling. The furniture was all carved dark wood, bulky and regal, like it was stolen from a king's manor.

They took a seat privately in one of the reader's rooms. There were no Yakuza here. Only Viper guards and them, allowing them privacy. Zen was awaiting him already with Tomura. The two of them were seated at a small round wooden table with paperwork and pens.

Both sets of blood-red eyes cut up at him the moment he entered.

Izuku bowed politely, suppressing the chill crawling up his spine. He took the empty seat across from them. His expression was blank, carefully offering nothing of the grief and vengeful thirst beneath his skin.

Zen didn't waste a moment.

"Is your head on right, boy?" he spat harshly.

Izuku felt a sting behind the words. His throat tightened, but he forced a shallow nod.

"Yes, sir," he murmured.

"Good," Zen snipped, not bothering to hide his contempt. "Glad to hear you've come to your senses. Maybe your idiocy really was all that Bakugou brat's doing."

He leaned back in his chair with a dismissive shrug. There was no warmth and no hint of a second chance in his aura. Zen was many things, but forgiving was never one.

Zen turned to Tomura then, and his expression flipped. His eyes sparkled with approval, and his mouth nearly quirked into a smile.

“Good job in wrangling him,” he praised.

Tomura bowed his head with humility. “Of course.”

Zen cracked his neck with a grunt and reached for the paperwork. “Let’s get to the point. I’ve run the numbers, and we’re going to have to speed this up. The merger can’t afford to crawl, we need to accelerate things quickly. Tomura, I know you said Kai and Izuku would need time to warm up to each other, but if we move at a snail’s pace, we’re going to be buried in debt before spring hits.”

“Understood,” Tomura replied. He began scribbling notes in that meticulous way of his.

Zen didn’t even look up.

“217,” he said, using the number like a leash. “When Chisaki Kai returns, you’re going to need to make yourself indispensable. Smile, flatter him, and be exactly what he wants. Make him want you—for the long haul.”

Izuku’s jaw clenched, but he didn’t let it show.

“Understood, sir.”

Tomura eyed him quietly. His gaze flicked up and down Izuku’s form while the tip of his pen rhythmically tapped against his notepad.

Then, with a slight tilt of his head, he said, “Maybe you could do one of those elegant dances Ibara and Jin taught you. That always seemed to have the desired effect of making someone enamored.”

Izuku clicked his tongue against his teeth, irritation twitching beneath his skin.

“I could do that,” Izuku said. His voice was cool, distant. “It’s been a while, but I can brush up.”

“Then be sure to do that,” Tomura replied, tone easy but expectant.

“Of course, Big Brother.”

Tomura’s eyes flickered a bit, once again approving the title address.

Zen, who’d been quiet, huffed. “And don’t forget to emphasize that you’re still a virgin. I don’t believe it. But at this point, I doubt Chisaki Kai cares about the truth. He’ll believe whatever fantasy you sell him if you spin it right.”

Izuku’s eyes dropped to the table. “Understood.”

The rest of the conversation drifted on, gliding from topic to topic with a calculated ease. They discussed strategy on how to best press the right buttons when it came to the Chisakis.

Zen and Tomura coached him on topics to emphasize, and advised him on which ones to avoid. Izuku nodded along, committing every detail to memory. He began drafting a plan to charm Chisaki Kai the moment he returned.

Then, the talk pivoted to logistics surrounding The Academy. That was where Izuku zoned out. He didn't understand the operational side of The Academy, nor did he care to. Spread sheets, supply lines, and assignment quotas meant nothing to him.

What did catch his attention, however, was the easy rhythm of conversation between Zen and Tomura.

They spoke with matching cadences. Their tones echoed off one another in a way that only true familial bonds could create. It was unsettling, and almost cruel, to witness.

He wondered if Zen felt disappointed that Tomura wasn't really his son.

He barely had time to follow that thought before it was eviscerated by the next words out of Tomura's mouth.

"What about the next cohort?" Tomura asked. "Are we going to try my plan again?"

Izuku's eyes slid to his brother, and the ghost memory of Katsuma's infant screams grew louder inside his skull. His breathing slowed, like his lungs were afraid of what they might inhale next.

"I think we need to tweak your approach," Zen replied, stroking his chin. "I know you originally proposed the hospital method, which I still think is viable. But I'm leaning toward our older methods. Let's keep the cohort small like you recommended—but this time, let's aim for fifty. It's a cleaner number."

Tomura almost smiled. "I was actually thinking the same."

"Oh?" Zen glanced over, intrigued.

Tomura's smirk widened as he reached into his folder and slid a paper across the table. "I've already contacted a new trafficker. He was a direct competitor of Peter Moore's White Dove ring. A while ago he sent us a gift basket for taking him out. Said he'd offer us a discount on the next shipment to celebrate."

Zen laughed, dry and heartless. "If I'd known that, I would've slit that white devil's throat a decade earlier."

Both men chuckled. The sound was hollow, mirthless and made Izuku's skin crawl.

"What if we split the cohort?" Tomura suggested. "Half from hospitals, half trafficked. That way we save a bit of money, but still get the numbers we want."

“That’s efficient,” Zen agreed. “Let’s do that.”

“Perfect,” Tomura said, and it was the happiest Izuku heard him in years.

Izuku looked at him then. Really looked.

He studied the neat bun pulled tight at the back of his brother’s head, and the clinical coldness in his crimson eyes. He assessed the careful way he folded his hands over the notepad. Ugliness crept up his spine slowly. He’d always known Tomura ran their branch of The Viper Academy, but this was the first time he understood the unwavering nature of his brother’s cruelty.

No matter what, Tomura wouldn’t be stopped.

Izuku getting five kids out wouldn’t save the next fifty.

There would always be more kids.

More Vipers.

“I’ve also been considering a revamp to our disciplinary structure,” Tomura said casually, shifting in his seat to face Zen. “I think Bigs should be allowed a bit more freedom to correct their Littles—within reason, of course. Izuku always responded well to firm punishment.”

Zen’s gaze cut toward Izuku. “Is that true?”

“Ye—” Izuku’s voice cracked before the word was fully formed.

A rush of memories surged through him.

Kicks to the stomach, iron belt buckles, and days spent locked in the dark with nothing but his own heartbeat for company. His body nearly buckled at the ghost sensation of leather kissing his skin. He cleared his throat, forcing his body to still, and caught Zen’s curious glance from across the table.

“Y-Yes,” he managed at last, dropping his eyes.

Zen nodded, then turned back to Tomura. “Go on.”

And Tomura did.

He explained the punishments clinically. He talked about how the thinner edge of the belt left cleaner welts and how a sharp angle increased pain without breaking skin. He spoke like a craftsman describing his tools, and not a brother recounting beating him. Izuku stared at the woodgrain of the table as Tomura’s voice buzzed past his ears.

“How long did you use that method?” Zen asked when Tomura finished.

“Until he was twenty,” Tomura replied flatly. “After that, I transitioned him to famine punishments.”

Zen frowned. His eyes flicked to Izuku with a mild sneer. “Why stop? Seems like he needed a good beating more than ever this last year.”

Tomura tilted his head, as if genuinely reflecting. “It wasn’t by choice, really.”

“Then what?” Zen pressed.

“The first time Chisaki Kai saw Izuku, he was intrigued. But then his interest soured when he saw the welts on Izuku. The ones on his arms were especially off-putting.”

Zen scoffed. “Of course. That brat recoils from anything remotely ugly.”

“Yeah,” Tomura muttered. “I stopped using physical punishment to avoid leaving marks. Switching to famine allowed Izuku’s value to remain intact. That way, he could get Kai’s interest again and it wouldn’t be compromised.”

“Understandable,” Zen murmured, eyeing Izuku again. His gaze dropped to the younger man’s bare forearms, noting the tanned, unblemished skin. “Aside from a few faint scars on his hands, he looks clean.”

“That was the goal,” Tomura replied, voice devoid of remorse.

“Always thinking several steps ahead,” Zen happily mused.

The conversation moved on, but Izuku didn’t. He recalled that night where Tomura said he would stop hitting him. And while it hadn’t been the happiest memory—it was still a highlight for him in the bleakness of his life. But learning this, made it lose all its luster.

Zen excused himself to the bathroom. He strode away with his cane and one guard followed him.

Once Zen was out of earshot, Izuku turned to Tomura.

He kept his voice careful, “I thought you said you stopped hitting me with the belt because you realized it was too harsh.”

Tomura didn’t look at him right away. He let the question hang in the air for a beat before glancing sideways.

“That was the truth,” he replied smoothly. “It was too harsh, physically. Most of your value lies in your appearance. Punishments that leave scars devalue you. I need to correct you in ways that preserve your appeal.”

“So when you put me on that skincare regimen…”

He trailed off, unsure if he could stomach the answer.

But Tomura obliged anyway. “It was to make you more desirable to Chisaki, yes.”

Izuku’s heart dropped. His breath caught in his chest as the truth snapped into place.

"…You've been grooming me for him," he whispered, stunned. "This whole time."

Tomura met his gaze without shame.

"I have," he confirmed. "Is that a problem?"

His brother stared him down, daring him to step out of line.

"No," Izuku whispered. He twisted his hands in his lap. "It's not a problem, Big Brother."

Tomura leaned back and exhaled through his nose. As quiet fell over them, the anger inside of Izuku grew more sinister. It began to grow claws and showed its teeth. He squeezed his hands to keep from lashing out as he reflected on the last five years in a new light.

And when Zen returned, Izuku saw his brother and father for what they truly were: snakes.

Tomura and Zen had no humanity.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When they finished, they left the library in a perfect triangle formation. The whole way downstairs, Izuku idly walked behind them. There was no room to walk beside them, and frankly, Zen looked happy that he couldn't.

Izuku gazed ahead at the two of them, strolling side by side. In an eerie perfect way, it was like gazing through a looking glass of an older and younger version of the same person.

They both possessed hair of pure, chilling white. Zen's was obviously from age. But Izuku wondered how Tomura's hair got so pale. He still remembered when it used to be black before it lost its color and turned a bluish grey.

Now, it looked as empty as his heart.

They made their way to the exit downstairs, and Izuku stopped at the door. He looked down at his ankle bracelet idly. Tomura did as well. Zen began typing on his phone.

"I won't be back for breakfast," Tomura announced. "I'm going to let you and Kai have it to yourselves. Make sure to go over everything we said and put on your best face."

Izuku nodded dully. "Will do."

Tomura waded in silence for a moment. He looked at him with an unreadable expression and pressed his lips into a thin, thoughtful line.

"…Do you want me to come back to check in at the end of the day?" He suddenly asked.

"Sure," Izuku replied emptily.

"Okay. I'll see you then."

He stepped forward, and so did the Viper guards and Zen.

Two Yakuza guards opened the large doors, and in poured sunlight so radiant it felt wrong. Izuku watched, expressionless, as they both left. Zen didn't bother to look behind him, but as they got halfway away and the doors began to close, Tomura glanced over his shoulder.

The two brothers held gazes as the large doors slammed shut.

From beyond the doors, Izuku could faintly hear Zen talk.

"Keep him under control by any means possible," he warned. "We don't need him screwing things up again."

When the voices of Tomura and Zen were no longer there, Izuku's mask dropped straight to the ground. His eyes darkened and his fists curled. He leered at the door as his hands began to tremble.

As his anger rose, he thought back to before he defected.

He landed on one particular day. It was a few days prior to his reunion with Katsuki and a time when Katsuma was still trapped in this hell. He recalled the vision of a giant viper made of stone, slithering around in endless circles. It endlessly ate its own tail with the help of new additions to keep it growing. The body grew longer with the help of every kid trapped in their system.

Back then, he viewed the person sitting at the head of the snake to be Tomura.

But really, it was Zen.

Tomura was simply his prodigy, much like Nine was before him. Zen's poisonous ways had spread to Tomura, exactly like they spread to Nine and to everyone who ever entered his Viper Academy. The poison even spread to him.

Zen had infected them all, damning for the sake of his own ambitions. He trapped them in this vicious cycle—just so he could profit. And a long time ago, Izuku vowed that he was going to drive a wedge straight into the cycle and snap its neck. He promised himself that he would do it, even if it was the last thing he did.

And maybe, it should be the last thing he did.

Because if he didn't, their violent history would repeat itself.

It was already doing so. With him as Inko, trapped for his looks. With Tomura as Zen, using him for personal gain. And Katsuki, killed young—exactly like his mother. It was happening all over again, without missing a beat.

Izuku wanted so badly to break this cycle, and he realized there was only one way to do so.

Both the Yakuza and Vipers alike, needed to be eradicated.

Izuku found Ochako in the garden after that. She was dressed in outdoor gear, sitting beneath a golden gazebo, reading a small book in the cold. A pink scarf was wrapped around her throat and pink gloves were snugly on her hands as she perched on the bench.

Izuku didn't bother to find a coat. He walked out barefoot into the snow and welcomed the chilling touch of what he now knew was going to be his last winter. Slowly, he sat down next to her, admiring the snow-covered garden. He leaned back fully onto the wooden bench.

Gradually, she glanced up from her book and looked at him. She didn't mention is lack of outerwear, but concern was evident in her big brown eyes.

"Ochako, am I allowed to get a pet?" Izuku asked quietly, not taking his eyes off the snow.

"Of course," she replied. "Chisaki Kai said that anything you request should be met so you can feel comfortable. What kind of pet do you want?"

Izuku turned, and smiled at her calmly. "A mamushi snake."

☽ ☽ ᔓ ☾ ☾

Katsuki solemnly held up his wedding ring in the sunlight.

The emeralds sparkled as his heart filled with heaviness similar to stones weighting it down. It'd been several goddamn days. And the longer Izuku was out there, the more Katsuki felt himself unraveling. He couldn't stop thinking about where he was and what they were doing to him—

He clenched his jaw so hard it hurt.

"What's taking you so damn long, Denki?" Monoma snapped from across the room, his voice sharp with impatience.

Denki didn't even look up, his fingers were busy flying across two keyboards. "Trust me, if I could go faster, I would," he muttered, irritation simmering under his breath. "But a small tracker means a weak signal. And welding it into silver? That makes it a nightmare to trace."

Monoma groaned loudly and stalked over to Denki's desk. He peered at the screen like glaring would make the process faster. Within seconds, they were bickering about code, signal interference, and tracking clouds.

Across the table, Aizawa worked silently on his own laptop. He was scanning through Tokyo's sprawl for even a flicker of a lead. His face was unreadable, but his eyes told the truth: nothing yet.

The voices around him blurred into static.

Katsuki leaned back against the conference couch, careful not to tug at the IV taped to his arm. His body still felt like shit. All his limbs were weak and battered but that was nothing compared to the wreckage inside his chest.

Quietly, Katsuki spoke through the tension. “There’s nothing I can do to make this go faster?”

The room grew quiet. Everyone turned to look at him sadly.

“No,” Denki said softly, finally meeting his gaze. “I’m sorry, Bakugou. You’ve done everything you could. I promise we’ll find him. I’ve already narrowed it down to eastern Tokyo—it’s just…trial and error now.”

Aizawa spoke next. He was calm and deliberate, like handling a landmine. “If he’s with the Yakuza, they’re likely using heavy signal disruption. That’s why Chisakis’ main location has never been pinned down—they blanket their sites with scatter fields to kill GPS.”

Denki’s jaw tightened, his eyes sparking with something fierce. “If that’s true, all we need is for him to step outside their perimeter. Even for a few seconds. If he does that, I’ll get him. I swear.”

Katsuki didn’t answer right away.

His throat locked up. He stared down at the ring in his palm.

“…Okay,” he managed at last, voice cracking. “That…makes sense.”

Nobody replied. They all gave him that look. The one that stabbed stupid pity straight through his damn ribs. Then slowly they all turned back to their screens and began searching with desperation humming in the air.

Katsuki shifted, pulling the blanket tighter around his shoulders as he stared out the window at the city of Nemuro.

In the last several days, Katsuki was growing progressively restless. He thought for certain the tracker in the ring would be a sure fire way to keep Izuku safe—but it hadn’t. Maybe the only way to have kept Izuku safe was to keep Izuku with him. Maybe what the old violinist said about love birds was true.

Maybe they weren’t meant to be separated.

Katsuki’s self loathing struck him as he sat with this. His eyes burned with tears as he reflected on Izuku’s life. He’d been fucking trafficked at a young age and now he was being trafficked yet again as a bargaining piece between the Vipers and Yakuza.

It made Katsuki feel sick that he failed Izuku.

He began to ponder on ‘what-ifs’ that only fed into his cycle of depression. What if he noticed Izuku needed help sooner? What if they connected earlier? What if he never left Tokyo with his mother? So many what-ifs and so many chances to save Izuku. And he missed them all.

A sharp ringtone shattered the tense silence.

Every head snapped toward Aizawa as he answered without hesitation, putting the call on speaker.

“We found Nana,” Miruko’s voice came fast and urgent. “She said she can wait—but there’s a complication.”

Katsuki shot upright, his pulse spiking. The room tilted for a moment as he swung his wobbly legs off the couch. He clutched the IV pole for support. Then his heart hammered so violently it felt like it might tear through his ribs.

“That’s good news,” Aizawa replied, his tone flat but edged with caution. “What’s the complication?”

There was a pause. A low sound of uncertainty from Miruko. “She’s…right here. I’ll put her on.”

A new voice filled the room. It was soft, warm, and steady. “Hello?”

Katsuki froze hearing Nana for the first time. He’d never met her, but the gentleness in her voice made it feel like he had.

“This is Aizawa Shota,” he said.

“Perfect,” she replied. “It’s nice to meet you. I understand the depth of the situation. First, thank you for getting word to me—you caught me right in time. I’ve been…holding out, hoping Izuku would come.” She hesitated, and her breath cracked faintly through the speaker. “There’s something urgent I need to speak with him about. It’s regarding the children he brought to me.”

The words landed like stones in Katsuki’s gut. He flicked a glance at Aizawa, who was already staring back with the same mix of worry and confusion.

The children? What the hell happened?

“What kind of urgent?” Aizawa asked, voice like a taut wire.

“It’s safer if I explain in person,” Nana said softly, urgency lacing her calm. “But for now—I’ve sent my apprentice, Yagi, ahead with the people who needed to leave Japan immediately. I’ll wait for you all in Okinawa as planned. Any idea when you can get to me?”

Aizawa’s gaze lifted to the massive tracking map glowing on the wall. His pause was heavy. “…No. We’re still working to pinpoint his location for extraction. When we do, you’ll be the first to know. Is there a deadline?”

“No,” Nana said firmly. “Given the situation, I’ll wait as long as I have to.”

“Understood,” Aizawa replied. “Is there a secure line we can reach you on?”

“Yes.” She rattled off the number, and Monoma scrawled it down in a blur of motion. There was a soft exhale on the other end before she spoke again. “Please—keep me updated.”

A shuffle, and then Miruko’s voice returned. “We’ll handle the rest on our end and regroup in four days. We’ll see you then.”

Aizawa gave a low grunt of acknowledgment before the line clicked dead. But just before it did, Katsuki heard something. It was a faint, wavering sound bleeding through the background. It nearly sounded like a child crying.

The noise clung to him long after the call ended. He stared at the phone, confusion knotting with relief in his chest. Finally, something shifted in their favor. One piece had fallen into place. But the piece that mattered most—the one he cared about—was still missing.

Monoma drifted over as Aizawa murmured something to Denki. He lowered himself into the seat beside Katsuki and studied him with a cautious glance.

“At least it’s something,” Monoma said finally, voice hushed.

Katsuki gave a stiff nod. “Yeah.”

The silence that followed was dense, suffocating, thick enough to choke on. Both of them stared at the floor like it might offer answers the maps and monitors couldn’t.

“…How are you holding up?” Monoma’s voice barely broke the stillness.

Katsuki didn’t look at his colleague. Instead his eyes gazed down at the wedding ring in his hand. His thoughts spiraled back to the horrifying power imbalance he witnessed between Izuku and his brother at the gravesite.

“I’m…” The word snagged in his throat. He forced it out anyway, even though his voice cracked like glass. “…Terrified.”

His fingers closed around the band, digging it into his palm until the edges bit into his skin. He hoped that his pain could bridge distance.

Maybe if he bled hard enough, Izuku would feel it and know he wasn’t alone.

☽ ☽ ᔓ ☾ ☾

The next morning, Izuku cradled the ruby wedding ring in his hands. Its warmth grounded him as if Katsuki was right there holding his him as he watched Ochako carefully bring in his new ‘pet’.

Two Yakuza servants carried a terrarium larger than anything he had ever seen. It was a perfect miniature ecosystem within glass walls. Branches twisted elegantly, leaves rustled softly, and a warm lamp cast a gentle glow over the enclosure. A fine mist clung to the glass and droplets sliding lazily downwards.

Inside, the Mamushi slithered with grace. Its scales caught the light like molten metal. Its piercing eyes were calculating, tracking him immediately. The snake's gaze was hypnotic, intelligent, and dangerous all at once.

"Set it right there," Ochako instructed, and the servants obeyed. They placed the terrarium carefully by the window where sunlight filtered in. "Perfect!" she said, clasping her hands together, her face alight with joy.

Izuku approached, standing beside her as they both observed the Mamushi.

The snake twisted sinuously around its enclosure, exploring its new domain with cautious curiosity. Izuku's chest tightened; his mind spun behind his calm exterior.

"I never realized how beautiful Mamushis are," Ochako gasped softly, leaning in to watch the creature. Her voice carried a mix of awe and delight. "Did you request this because it's your family namesake?"

"Something like that," Izuku responded.

They lingered together in silence, each absorbed in their own reasons for watching the snake. To Ochako, it was simple admiration; to Izuku, it was the key to ending an endless cycle of pain.

"What are you going to name it?" She asked.

Izuku pressed his lips in a thin, contemplative line.

"It doesn't need a name," he said. He then turned to Ochako and met her eyes. "Can we keep this between us? I don't want my brother or father to know I asked for a pet…they're not exactly fond of animals."

Ochako nodded, her smile warm and reassuring.

"Of course, Izuku," she said happily.

They both leaned up and then a heavier silence followed them. The ticking of the clock in the room stretched on, and with every passing second both off their faces fell further and further.

"It's almost time for breakfast," Ochako muttered, nearly mournful.

Izuku stiffened. The ticking from the clock now felt louder. He nodded and his eyes grew distant.

"Will he be joining?" He asked.

Ochako replied reluctantly, "Yes. He will."

The lump in Izuku's throat tightened. But he held himself steady as he clutched the ring in his fist tighter.

He looked at the snake in front of him one more time. The plan inside of his head was beginning to become real and the resentful, vengeful fire inside of his heart grew stronger.

He turned to Ochako and solemnly gazed at her.

He said with a sad smile, “What should I wear that would make him happiest?”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku walked down with Ochako wearing a perfectly curated outfit in all black that held the Chisaki family emblem on the back. He cleaned himself up enough to look less grief stricken and appealing and pampered his face with enough light make up to enhance his features.

When he reached the dining hall, Izuku paused in the doorway.

Chisaki Kai was already present. He sat regally at the head of the long, lacquered table.

The morning light caught the sharp angles of his pale face and the glint of gold cufflinks. His posture in his all black pinstriped suit was deeply apathetic, nearly bored. A plate of grilled fish, rice, and pickled vegetables had been placed in front of him, steam rising delicately, yet he didn’t touch a bite.

His golden eyes flicked toward the door.

“Ah, finally,” Chisaki said smoothly. His lips curled into a smug smile. “I was beginning to think you’d prefer to sleep through breakfast instead of joining me.”

Izuku stepped inside, keeping his expression neutral. The ruby wedding band in his pocket was a constant weight against his hip, reminding him of what was stolen from him. He bowed slightly, low enough to show respect but high enough to keep his pride intact.

“Good morning,” Izuku greeted quietly. “Sorry to keep you waiting.”

Chisaki leaned back and jutted his chin to the seat on his left. “You can make it up by joining me.”

Izuku walked fully into the room, and Ochako and the other servers blended into the sides. Izuku glanced back at her once, noticing that her bubbly personality faded away in Chisaki Kai’s presence. She kept her eyes down, not daring to look at him.

He sank into the chair as a server quietly set down his meal, placing the utensils with precise care.

They began eating in companionable silence, punctuated by stolen glances and lingering looks. Izuku forced himself to eat for the first time in a long time, and he immediately felt the ache in his stomach. When he felt a touch too sick, he placed down his utensils and neatly folded his hands in his lap.

The air between them hummed with tension, so Izuku decided to break the silence first.

“Did you enjoy your business trip?” he asked, tilting his head slightly as he spoke. “I hope it went well.”

Chisaki shrugged, a smirk tugging at his lips.

“It did,” he said smoothly, his tone tinged with amusement. “I won’t bore you with the details if it’s not your thing.”

Izuku’s mind flicked through the list Zen and Tomura drilled into him. One of Chisaki Kai’s favorite topics was his business exploits. He deeply enjoyed bragging, though he needed to be cautious about the details around outsiders. However, among the Vipers, he loosened his tongue and let his ego show freely.

Izuku saw his first move in a long, delicate game.

“Not at all,” Izuku replied, masking the tight knot in his chest with an innocent smile. “I’d love to hear about it, if you don’t mind. I’ve always appreciated hearing the stories behind your work.”

Chisaki’s eyes flickered, and it was all the encouragement he needed. The Yakuza Heir leaned back slightly, beginning to regale Izuku with his trip. His voice carried a practiced mix of arrogance and charm as he described the deference of his business partners. He mused about how they kissed his ring and complied with his parents’ every whim.

He then went on to talk about the entertainment—the killing of a man who dared speak illy of the Chisaki family. It seemed like his new business partner thought it would be a great way to get on the Chisakis’ good side to have the man’s tongue cut out in front of them.

And it worked.

“Overall, it was a great time,” Chisaki concluded, reclining in his chair. He let his eyes linger over Izuku’s form, scanning the neat line of his clothing. The subtle intensity of his gaze made Izuku stiff slightly, though he kept his composure.

“And you?” Chisaki asked, boring his eyes into Izuku’s. “How was your stay here? I hope you were made comfortable.”

“I was,” Izuku replied, forcing warmth into his tone despite the hatred in his chest. “Thank you for thinking of my comfort. I truly appreciated it. The last few days I took to adjusting to being here, but it was pleasant.”

Chisaki arched an eyebrow. His eyes narrowed slightly in mock suspicion.

“And you are adjusted now?” he asked, his voice low and testy. “No more running away from me?”

“No more running away,” Izuku reassured. “Sorry for all the trouble I caused you, Kai. Please allow me to make it up to you.”

Chisaki's grin broadened, and his smugness became palpable. But as he did, Izuku noted there was an undercurrent of excitement in the man's posture.

"Perfect," he said, voice dripping with self-satisfaction. "I have a great few weeks ahead of us planned."

"Like what?" Izuku asked.

"You'll see," Chisaki replied, dripping control.

The rest of the day unfolded in a way Izuku hadn't expected. He had braced himself for unwanted advances and hands pulling him toward some sort of intimacy he wanted no part of. But Chisaki did something far worse: he courted him like a gentleman.

He was polite, and perfectly in control, like a real prince would be.

It was almost disarming. Almost.

Izuku kept his mask in place. Every smile he gave was calculated, and every glance he spared was measured. He kept his tone innocence and his posture modest—right in a way he knew Chisaki would love. His entire body language was curated to show a naivety he no longer felt inside his heart. But he threaded his words with just enough hesitance to seem shy without appearing unwilling.

And of course, Chisaki lapped it up like a damn dog in designer gloves.

Their first stop was the kitchen. It gleamed with marble counters and copper pots that shone under the warm lights. Chisaki moved through the space with comfortable confidence. His hands stayed clasped lightly behind his back as if strolling through a gallery rather than a room of servants scrambling to attention.

"I need to select a wine for my aunt in Italy," he said. "I'd be honored to have you assist me, Izuku."

Izuku offered a practiced smile and tilted his head just so. "Of course. I'd be happy to."

Chisaki gestured for a servant to present an array of bottles. Each one was an artifact of wealth and taste, their labels inscribed in various European scripts.

They began to sample them one by one in crystal glasses. Izuku held each to his lips, his throat burning with the dry bite of reds he secretly despised. He masked the flicker of distaste with a shy sip, lowering his lashes in a show of feigned demureness.

"Are you enjoying the tasting?" Chisaki asked, watching him closely over the rim of his own glass.

“I am.” Izuku’s voice remained airy, casual. “A sister of mine used to collect wines like these. She had me taste a lot of them.”

“Then I was right to have you help me pick some out,” Chisaki remarked with a low chuckle. He snapped his fingers once, a sharp sound that made the kitchen still. “These two,” he ordered, indicating a rare dessert wine and a pale, expensive white.

The servants moved in hurried silence to box them.

“I knew you’d have exquisite taste,” Chisaki added, smiling in a way that almost looked warm.

Izuku inclined his head, forcing his lips to soften in gratitude.

From there, they drifted deeper into the estate. Their footsteps echoed through halls lined with gold-framed art and heavy velvet drapes. During his isolation, Izuku learned the estate’s layout well enough. But when they turned toward a wing guarded by four men in black, he found himself in unfamiliar territory.

Several times, he’d been turned away whenever he wandered into this exact hall.

But now, it seemed like that wouldn’t be the case. The moment the guards saw Chisaki approach, they stepped aside like tall reeds bowing in the wind. Without a word, they pushed open the pair of towering doors.

“This,” Chisaki announced, his voice dipping with pride, “is my private wing of the estate.”

Izuku stepped inside, and for a moment, it was like being swallowed whole by Chisaki’s ego. The rooms beyond were drenched in gold, ivory, and obsidian, every surface curated to reflect extravagance. Silk screens painted with coiling dragons and chrysanthemums divided the space. Heavy chandeliers spilled pools of amber light across floors of polished stone.

“What do you think of it?” Chisaki asked, eying Izuku. “I wanted it to reflect the regal nature of my family.”

“You certainly succeeded,” Izuku murmured, letting his tone wobble slightly with awe. It wasn’t entirely an act; he was stunned by the arrogance.

Chisaki offered a smile, jutting his head toward a pair of glass doors. “Come. There’s something I’d like you to see.”

From there, Chisaki led him to another pair of doors. They stepped into an indoor greenroom garden so pristine it felt unreal. It stretched four times the size of the estate’s front grounds, blooming in defiance of winter’s grip. Rare orchids in colors too vivid to be natural spilled from stone planters, and pines rose like emerald spires against a backdrop of pale snow.

“Beautiful, isn’t it?” Chisaki asked softly.

“Yes,” Izuku replied, forcing his lips into a delicate curve.

Like a cage lined with flowers, he thought bitterly.

Next came the art room. Its walls were lined with half-finished canvases and delicate porcelain vases. Izuku was taken back, not expecting this. He walked in slowly, fully mystified by the various figurative paintings lying on the ground and leaning against the walls. He strolled up to one in particular and felt an eerie stare looking back at him.

In a small pile were portrait paintings of him.

Izuku stopped dead in his tracks.

"I find painting…clarifying," Chisaki explained. He came up behind him, casting a cold shadow over Izuku as he leaned in to whisper in his ear. "When everything around you feels chaotic, creating order brings peace. I like to paint what I most desire."

Izuku looked at his own green eyes staring back at him.

He swallowed.

Lunch followed after several more room tours. They settled in the reading room, and servants brought them trays bearing dishes that were both intricate and excessive. They ate in quiet, save for the low crackle of an occasional murmur from Chisaki.

Afterward, the servants drew a table set for Shōgi for them along with more wine for them to enjoy.

In the end, Izuku let Chisaki win. Five times.

Each game, the Yakuza Heir's smile sharpened at the edges. His ego was practically on display as he gleamed with the idea of outwitting Izuku.

"You'll get the hang of it soon," Chisaki chuckled. He poured more wine into their glasses without asking.

Izuku hesitated when the ruby liquid caught the light. He didn't want it. But he took the glass anyway, bowing his head in silent thanks before bringing it to his lips. The bitterness struck hard, but he swallowed it down.

And through it all, Chisaki never once reached for him. Never pressed. Never lingered too close. He was pleasant as though they were simply two companions passing an idle afternoon.

It was as if Izuku hadn't run halfway across the country to escape him.

And it pissed Izuku off.

Chisaki moved as though Katsuki's death was merely a small price for this charade.

The thought seared through him like acid.

By the time they rose from the table, the sky begun to blush with sunset. Orange bled into rose across the horizon and light spilled through the high windows. They walked in silence for a time and their shadows stretched across the polished floors.

For a moment, Izuku almost believed the day would end without consequence. Maybe Chisaki truly wanted nothing from him but conversation.

Until they stopped.

Another set of double doors loomed before them—doors unlike the others. They were black and etched with curling veins of gold. The surface was marked by the Shie Hassaikai crest at the center.

Izuku paused.

He turned his gaze to Chisaki, whose amber eyes gleamed in the dimming light.

“What room is this?” Izuku asked.

“A surprise,” Chisaki replied. A faint, taut smile tugged on his lips. “Go on. Step in.”

Izuku took a careful look. Then suddenly, the air shifted. It was here he glanced back at the Yakuza guards that had been trailing them all day. He noted they stopped further down the corridor than they’d done previously. Izuku glanced once at Chisaki again, and his skin crawled.

He stepped inside first, back to the other man. It was dark inside, but in the dim light of the setting sun, Izuku could see what this was.

It was Chisaki’s bedroom.

The door locked behind him.

Izuku turned, and his heart hammered loudly in his ears. He looked at the Yakuza Heir who followed behind him. The tall, crow-like man strolled inside with unhurried grace. He kept his posture regal like he knew every inch of the world bent to his will.

He removed his gloves with meticulous precision. First the left, then the right. He snapped the leather gently before setting them on the table by his door.

That small sound was louder than the pounding in Izuku’s skull.

Izuku offered a shallow nod, pulse hammering against his ribs.

Smile. Keep calm. Breathe. He summoned the faintest curve to his lips.

Chisaki hummed to him a low, approving sound that curled like smoke.

He moved closer, slow and deliberate, loosening the knot of his tie as he crossed the space. Each step hit against Izuku's nerves, dragging him toward the moment he'd dreaded since the day he learned of Tomura selling his virginity.

"You've been very sweet today," Chisaki said as he nearly closed the space between them. His hand lifted, fingers brushing a stray curl from Izuku's forehead with disquieting tenderness. "It was everything I hoped for when this arrangement was first planned out—but you've been very hard to catch. You're lucky I like the thrill of a chase."

Izuku swallowed hard as Chisaki's hand began to wander. As they did, the room felt smaller. The walls inched closer with every second as he could smell the dark musk of the other man's cologne.

Then Chisaki's fingers trailed down his jaw, slow and possessive.

"However, this cat-and-mouse game," he murmured, his voice dipping silk-smooth as his fingers curled beneath Izuku's chin, tilting it up, "is officially over."

And then he moved.

Izuku barely had time to register what was happening before Chisaki's body pressed flush against his. Lips crashed against his throat. Greedy fingers grazed his sensitive skin as kisses burned trails down his neck, leaving him shuddering with revulsion.

Izuku jerked back, a reflexive shock tearing through him. But Chisaki followed, relentlessly. One step, two, and Izuku's spine struck wood with a muted thud. The dresser rattled against the wall as the heir loomed over him like a shadow.

His shirt yanked open in one brutal tug, buttons breaking and baring his chest to the chill of the room. Izuku gritted his teeth and his eyes widened as his instinct screamed to break Chisaki's bones until he was nothing but pieces—but Izuku forced his fingers to curl against the dresser instead of Chisaki's throat.

"W-Wait—" Izuku's voice trembled like glass under strain. "Kai, wait—"

"Izuku," Chisaki hissed against his Adam's apple. "I'm done waiting."

Panic ricocheted through Izuku's skull. His training surged up like a lifeline, whispering tactics through the static in his brain. His lips parted, and before the moment could break, the lie slipped out.

"Please—I-I'm still a virgin."

"I'm well aware," he said curtly, impatience licking at the edges of his words. "Don't worry. I'm experienced enough for both of us." His tone darkened, final. "Now, relax."

He seized Izuku by the wrists and flung him toward the bed. Izuku landed hard, and the mattress swallowed his grunt as he scrambled upright. He yanked his shirt closed over his exposed skin. His heart skipped in his chest, a frantic warning drum as Chisaki shrugged off his blazer, movements slow and predatory.

A sneer carved across his face as he stood at the foot of the bed.

“I’m not fond of forcing myself on people—especially trained assassins.” His eyes glinted coldly. “But Izuku, you’ve been testing my kindness for months. If I have to signal my guards to come in here and hold you down for me, I will do it.”

“I-I don’t want to have sex until I’m married!” Izuku blurted out.

Chisaki paused. Then he frowned. “What?”

Izuku forced himself to meet Chisaki’s gaze while his heart tried to claw out of his chest.

“That’s the reason wh-why I never had sex,” he whispered, voice breaking at the edges. “A-and the reason I’ve been so resistant to this arrangement—” He swallowed hard. “I always thought my first time would be…after I got married.”

The silence was thick enough to drown in.

Chisaki didn’t move. He didn’t even blink.

Izuku could feel the weight of every second pressing down on him. He scrambled upright and flitted his eyes to every corner of the large room to avoid looking at the man in front of him.

“I…” His throat closed, but he pushed through. “I-I’m a hopeless romantic.”

“Your brother mentioned that a long time ago, yes,” Chisaki confirmed testily. “Why are you saying this now?”

“Because life as a Viper is…bleak,” Izuku confessed.

He swallowed when his heart began to become heavier. Truth slipped into his act as he felt the weight of the ring in his pocket.

“And the only real thing I had to hold on to was wanting my first time to mean something. I thought it would be beautiful if I belonged to someone who really loved me—” A visual of Katsuki smiling appeared in his mind. His breath hitched and rawness cracked through his emotional mask. “—th-then maybe I could have the fairy tale romance I’ve always dreamed about.”

A single tear slipped loose, hot against his cheek.

It wasn’t staged. It wasn’t part of the script. It was Katsuki, pulsing in his heart even now.

Chisaki fell away slowly, like he was pulling back from a precipice. His eyes turned unreadable as he tracked the tear rolling down Izuku’s face.

His voice came flat and even. “You really believe that, don’t you?”

Izuku nodded stiffly. “I do.”

Chisaki exhaled through his nose, the sound was almost like a laugh but stripped of humor. He turned slightly, paced a few steps, and folded his hands behind his back.

A long silence stretched, coiling tighter with every beat of Izuku's heart.

Then finally, Chisaki spoke.

"I've been very patient with you," he said curtly. "More patient than I've ever been with anyone. I wondered for a while why I cared so much about a mindless Viper—no matter how beautiful you were. I kept telling myself to drop it, and move on to someone who knows their place. But there's something about you that I can't seem to let go of."

He turned back around, and there was a possessive glint in his gaze.

"And now I see why," he finished.

Izuku stayed perfectly still as Chisaki approached again.

"You're not like others," Chisaki continued, voice low and intrigued. "Not a normal Viper. Not a common…plaything." His hand lifted, brushing lightly over Izuku's cheek, tracing the line of the tear. "You're truly pure. And I've been searching for someone like that my whole life."

Izuku's stomach knotted. He lowered his lashes to feign embarrassment.

"At the masquerade, you said you were going to make our time together romantic for me," he whispered. "I was looking forward to that before it all fell apart."

Chisaki studied him for a moment, then let his hand drop.

"I did say that, didn't I?" he murmured. "Interesting. You have the kind of dignity a Yakuza spouse would hold for themselves. I always assumed Vipers obeyed orders without thinking—but yet. Here you are, giving me a boundary."

Izuku's heart thudded and dread swirled in his chest.

"I'll have to take some time to consider this," Chisaki continued, tone smooth. "A man like me doesn't rush. I'll have to weigh whether this want of yours is valid given our arrangement—seeing as I have already paid your brother a very hefty bill for you."

"Of course," Izuku breathed.

And when Chisaki leaned in, Izuku froze. He thought he was going in for a kiss, but instead Chisaki pressed his lips to Izuku's knuckles. The heat from the gesture rippled through the room as Chisaki's predatory eyes burned into his.

He leaned away with a limerence stricken gaze and smiled.

"Let's get you back to your room."

They walked in silence, their footsteps echoing against the polished corridor.

Izuku clutched his half-open shirt shut with one trembling hand, his knuckles white against the black fabric. The chill of the hallway brushed against his bare skin, but it wasn't the cold that made him shiver.

Beside him, Chisaki strode with his hands folded neatly behind his back. His gaze wandered down every so often, lingering without shame on the tanned column of Izuku's exposed throat.

When they reached the door to Izuku's bedroom, both men paused. Their eyes met in the dim light pooling from the chandeliers above.

"I'll see you at breakfast tomorrow," Chisaki said.

He smiled tightly, and his eyes drifted down to Izuku's neck.

Izuku bowed and forced a smile. "Looking forward to it. Sleep well, Kai."

"Same for you."

And with that, Chisaki departed with the two guards who shadowed him. They disappeared down the long hallway and Izuku walked into his room.

When the door clicked shut, Izuku's smile instantly crumbled.

His hand trembled as it rose to his neck—where Chisaki's rough lips dragged over his skin. He felt an invisible stain left there, and he knew it couldn't be scrubbed away. It made him feel filthy. Without warning, a blistering mix of rage and humiliation surged up his throat.

His fingers clenched, nails biting into his flesh as though he could scratch out the memory.

Soon, the tears came fast. They blurred his vision until the room swam in shadows. He bit down hard on his lip. He tasted iron, but he refused to let a sound escape. His anger was molten now, flooding through his veins until his soul reshaped under the weight of it. His chest heaved, his jaw locked, and his bitter tears spilled freely.

He turned, eyes full of resentment.

Across the room, the mamushi snake was coiled in its glass prison. Its golden eyes glinted in the dark like two shards of malice.

For an instant, in the reflection of that glass, Izuku thought he saw Katsuki looking back at him.

His face twisted. The grief in his expression contorted into vengeance. He wiped his tears with the back of his hand, leaving streaks across his flushed skin as he crossed the room to the cage.

Izuku knelt, reaching under the stand for the jar he hid earlier.

It was a small, clear vessel capped with a thin sheet of parchment stretched taut and secured with twine. His pulse spiked as he slid the lid off the cage.

The snake hissed, low and threatening. The sound slithered straight into his bones. But Izuku didn't flinch. He slid both hands inside. He kept himself steady merely with the thought of Katsuki. As his mind filled with the memories of his dead husband, it was as if Katsuki was helping hold his hands still and confident so he could do what needed to be done.

Immediately, the creature struck instantly. Its fangs flashed and its jaws snapped for flesh. Izuku jerked his wrist back with sharp reflex, twisting to seize the serpent's body in one swift, merciless grip.

It writhed furiously. Its scales rasped against his skin, and its muscles coiled like steel wire as it fought against him. The tail lashed, curling tight around his forearm in a crushing spiral. But Izuku held his ground. His grip clamped down on the narrow head, fingers pinning it in an iron vise. The snake hissed louder. Its mouth began yawning wide, and its fangs gleamed wet in the dim light.

"Shh," Izuku soothed gently.

With surgical precision, he pressed two fingers along its skull to force the jaws apart, exposing the venomous needles within.

Slowly, he lowered its head towards the jar. The parchment dented under pressure as he guided the fangs through the thin membrane.

A moment of resistance. Then the paper tore, and the venom flowed.

Drop by glistening drop, pale yellow-green venom bled into the glass.

The sharp, acrid smell hit him. It mimicked a scent similar to a mixture of rust and rot, making his stomach knot. As the poison flowed, the snake hissed and thrashed, but Izuku kept steady. He watched without blinking as the liquid gathered into a tiny pool.

When the last drop fell, Izuku eased the serpent back into its cage with the same deliberate care. He slid the lid shut, and exhaled shakily.

In the dim light, the venom gleamed.

It spoke to him, whispering a promise of freedom and a clear path to end this cycle of agony. A strange mix of revulsion and fascination churned in Izuku's stomach. And soon, cold sweat slicked his palms from a spike of anxiety. His heart hammered against his ribs, a frantic warning urging him to look away. But he couldn't. His eyes remained glued to the viscous liquid.

Izuku lifted the jar to his face.

In the glass, he saw not his own reflection but the ghost of beautiful scarlet eyes.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think below :') I re-wrote and restructured this chapter and the next about 5 times. Balancing Izuku's descent into hatred/vengeance was surprisingly more complex than other element in this story. Its sad to think our little pink loving man is dressing in all black :'(

It's about to get very chaotic!!

Thank you so much for reading <3 <3

Chapter 45: Prestissimo

Izuku sat forward, back hunched and shoulders tight.

He concentrated on the notebook in front of him. His eyebrows furrowed, and his hands rattled with a slight tremble. His gaze never left the page as he scraped the pencil across the surface.

“Lecithin…” Izuku muttered under his breath, “An emulsifier to help proteins pass through the gut-lining. Then a low dose of an acid to act as a corrosive agent and burn a hole in the gastrointestinal barrier.” A pause. His eyes slid over to the jar of venom, and measured it quietly. “But I would need something that would let the toxin seep into the bloodstream. Venom isn’t lethal through digestion alone.”

He glanced at the snake, and its bright eyes glowed in the dark.

When it coiled onto itself, inspiration struck. Izuku’s eyes snapped down to the paper and he hurriedly wrote the last thing he would need.

“Dimethyl sulfoxide,” he whispered with finality.

He leaned back and stared at the mess of words. The yellow tint from the lamp next to his bed spread across his hasty handwriting. As he read it back, pressure pushed unrelenting tears against his eyes.

This was really it.

Suddenly, a sharp knock split the stillness of the room.

Izuku jolted. His back straightened, and his gut dropped.

“Izuku?” Tomura’s muffled voice carried across the heavy door. “Are you in there?”

“I—I am!” Izuku called back. “Just give me a second.”

He scrambled upright and shoved the notepad under his pillow. He smoothed the sheets, erasing any sign of what he’d been doing. When he was sure nothing incriminating remained in sight, he cracked the door open and slipped through, pulling it firmly shut.

In the hallway, his big brother stood tall, and he looked exceptionally drained. Tomura’s coat hung against his frame, black as ink with the faint sheen of melted snow. And his eyes were undercut with deep shadows.

“Sorry I’m so late,” he said, voice low with apology. “I know I promised I’d be back after dinner, but meetings stacked up.”

Izuku nodded once. “It’s okay.”

His voice was thinner than he aimed for. But he couldn’t summon the energy to wear the mask any longer. The facade with Chisaki drained him dry. Every smile and flutter of his eyelashes cost him more than he ever thought.

“How’d the day with Chisaki go?” Tomura asked after a breathing space.

“It went well,” Izuku replied mechanically.

His gaze slid away toward the frost-laced window. He couldn’t look at Tomura—not with the taste of humiliation still burning at the back of his throat.

A quietness passed through them. Izuku kept his eyes on the windowpane while Tomura kept his eyes on him. A question was coming, and Izuku could sense the heavy anticipation of it in the air.

When Tomura finally spoke, his tone was delicate. “Did you two…?”

“No,” Izuku quickly replied. He shook his head and cleared his throat, biting back all the disgust from where he could still feel Chisaki’s lips at his neck. “I’m going to withhold intimacy until the wedding night. I think it’ll push him along to the idea of permanently acquiring me.”

“That’s a smart angle,” Tomura said with a note of admiration.

“I figured it would play into his obsession with purity,” Izuku continued. “He says he’ll weigh things out. But I’ll keep his attention as planned. I want to make sure I accelerate things as fast as possible, like One wanted.”

“You did good,” Tomura praised. There was an inch of happiness in his voice, but so was apprehension. “You’ve always been smart.”

“Thank you.”

“And how is fixing your tolerance going?”

“It’s going,” Izuku lied. He hugged his arms and pressed his lips in a thin line. “I feel sick to the stomach most days but—it’s building back to where it was.”

“Expected. I’ll bring you some medicine for stomach ulcers tomorrow.”

Izuku didn’t have it in him to give another reply. He could feel the last of his mask slip, and grief demanded his attention. His body felt heavier, and his eyes dropped low. The back of his throat pushed with tears as he struggled to keep it together.

“I’m…tired,” Izuku rasped. He held his arms tighter to his body. “Is it okay if I go to bed?”

“Of course.”

He didn’t move right away. But he didn’t speak again. When Izuku finally glanced up, their eyes met. His brother was studying him, silently cataloging his body language.

“Do you think you could convince Chisaki within the next three weeks?” Tomura asked. “One is anxious about the financial issues we’re going to face when spring comes.”

“I could.” Izuku grew quieter. “Three weeks is enough time.”

Tomura nodded, lingered another beat, and then stepped back.

“Good night, Izuku,” he said quietly. “I’ll check in tomorrow.”

“Good night.”

Tomura turned, allowing himself to be swallowed up by the shadows. Once he was gone, Izuku slipped back into his room and shut the door. He twisted the lock until it clicked. Then his hand stayed there. His body sagged forward and his forehead rested against the cold wood.

When he opened his eyes again, the darkness surrounding him felt deeper.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The next morning, Izuku ate breakfast alone with Chisaki. The servants were in the corners with their heads down, and the snowfall outside looked heavier. Chisaki was eating slowly, patting the greasy residue off his lips between bites. Izuku thought for a moment he wasn't going to speak to him, given the previous night. But he was proven wrong.

"I've decided to take your stance seriously," Chisaki announced. He took a gulp of water and then looked Izuku in the eye calmly. "I suppose it's not a bad thing to want to wait until marriage."

Izuku blinked, masking his surprise with neutrality. "You have?"

"Yes." A slight shrug. "At first, I thought your hopeless romantic nature was naïve. Endearing, perhaps, but overall impractical. But after some thought—" His gloved hands folded neatly on the table as he leaned back. "—Now, I see the value in it."

His eyes flared faintly as he spoke, cold and unnaturally golden in the pale morning light.

"You see, the reason I admire purity is because my world is drowning in corruption," Chisaki explained. "Every day, I am surrounded by greedy, selfish people. They are all entirely predictable. But worse, they bore me. But someone truly untainted? Someone whose heart has not rotted from ambition or filth?"

He leaned forward, his eyes burning with desire.

"That," he whispered, voice much lower, "is rare. And rare things fascinate me. I can't predict them. I can't control them entirely. And that unpredictability?" His lips curved upwards. "It is intoxicating."

Izuku forced himself to hold the ensnaring eye contact.

"A counterbalance," he replied. "You want someone who feels like a breath of fresh air."

The smirk on Chisaki's face widened.

"Exactly," he said, savoring the word. "I want someone to show me something different. Someone that can make me feel something other than boredom."

"I can do that," Izuku replied. He leaned in enough to mimic sincerity. "I'd love the chance to get to know you better, Kai."

Chisaki chuckled, clearly flattered. He tilted his head and raked his eyes without shame up and down Izuku's body.

He then spoke, "But I will say, if I'm not convinced in at least a month that you are genuinely marriage material—I'll have my way with you and have you discarded after." The smirk on his face flipped insidiously. "I don't want it to come to that, but I'm sure you understand I have to make sure I get my money's worth in the end."

Izuku's smile faltered for less than a second.

But Chisaki didn't notice.

"Of course," Izuku agreed. "I understand."

☽ ☽ ෆ ☾ ☾

"I'm done fucking waiting around."

Katsuki violently ripped the IV out of his arm. He hissed as blood welled in tiny, angry beads. The pain blistered instantly, but he pushed through it because it was nothing compared to the growing worry gnawing in his gut.

Instantly, Aizawa and Sero tried to calm him down. But he wasn't having it. He grabbed the IV pole to help him upright and rose to his feet. With a curse, Aizawa crossed the small room and put his hands firmly on Katsuki's shoulders and forced him to sit back down.

"Bakugou," he warned. "If you push it, you're going to be in no shape to help him save him."

But Katsuki was fed up. He shook his head and shoved Aizawa's hands off of him.

"And if we keep sitting on our asses, he won't be there to save anymore," Katsuki hissed.

Silence blanketed the room when Aizawa didn't give a reply. Instead, the older man exhaled, low and tired, and glanced at his nephew.

The look they shared said enough: Katsuki wasn't wrong.

It'd been exactly a full day since Miruko and Shinsou returned, making it five days since Nana told them she would wait. Which meant they were nearing another full week of no answers. Who knows if Izuku was even still alive. They were going on a thread, hoping that Izuku—or whoever had the ring—stepped outside for even just a second.

And all the while, Katsuki was on the verge of tears. But every time he tried to cry and let it out, nothing came. The tension sat at the back of his throat, suffocating him in all his regrets.

Sero brought Katsuki another bottle of water. His friend sat down next to him and rubbed his back.

"I know things are tense, but you gotta hold it together," Sero tried to reason.

Katsuki closed his eyes and hung his head.

"Easier said than done," he whispered.

Their team was in limbo. After coming back from Nana, everyone pretty much began to set up camp at The Company's satellite headquarters. There were spare bedrooms upstairs, and other agents from The Company trickled in and out curiously.

It didn't take long for nearly everyone at the satellite HQ to be nosy, hoping to figure out what was going on. But Aizawa and Miruko shooed them away like flies. They told all the other agents they were in the middle of something extremely top secret and to respect their privacy.

“Do you want to go lay down upstairs with the others?” Aizawa asked. “You could probably use a proper bed.”

Katsuki shook his head. “I feel better sleeping down here with Denki.”

He eyed the giant projection that displayed his colleague’s grueling work. It was a large map, littered with Xs showing all the places Denki ruled out. Katsuki’s heart sank further when another red X appeared, striking down yet one more place Izuku wasn’t.

He glanced at Denki, who was hunched over three monitors at once.

One displayed a map pulsing with data points. Another scrolled endlessly with green and black code that hummed across the screen. And the third flickered as it tore through CCTV feeds at a blistering pace.

Perched on his head were glaring yellow noise-canceling headphones, sealing him off from the world. He was wired in, oblivious to everything but the glow of his screens. Katsuki caught the bloodshot focus in his eyes—sharper than he’d ever seen—and the growing graveyard of empty energy drink cans scattered around him.

“Bakugou,” Sero started, slightly uneasy. He shifted uncomfortably and hesitated on his next words. “Have you considered…leaving without him?”

Katsuki’s head snapped up, and instantly his anger flared.

“Why the hell would you suggest something like that?” He growled.

Sero held up his hands and his throat bobbed. “I just—look, the Yakuza think you’re dead. That’s keeping you safe, but if they find out you’re not—” He swallowed hard. “That’s a death sentence, Bakugou. A real one. If we don’t find Izuku soon, maybe…maybe you should still disappear with Nana for your own safety. You deserve to live.”

Katsuki’s nostrils flared. He was on his feet before the suggestion even finished leaving Sero’s mouth.

“How could you say that to me?” He hissed in betrayal.

Sero’s face fell. “It’s only a suggestion. You should think about your own safety.”

“Izuku’s life is as important as mine,” Katsuki snarled. “Leaving him behind is the same as killing him. And I’m not sentencing him to death, Sero.”

With a determined glare, Katsuki grabbed the IV pole and began limping towards the door. In the background, Aizawa quickly shot a scolding, chastising remark to Sero then stopped when Katsuki’s hand reached the door knob.

“Where are you going, Bakugou?” He asked, exasperated. “You’re in no shape to wander around.”

“I’m going to get my strength back,” Katsuki spat without looking. “If we can’t find him by the time my body works again, I’ll go searching for him myself.”

He marched out the door, ignoring the calls for him to come back. Katsuki held back tears as small sprouts of pain trickled into his extremities. When he found the empty lounge upstairs, he sat down angrily.

His gaze fell to his trembling hands.

The bandages were still dark with blood and his wounds pulsated every second. The damage from clawing his way out of the coffin was worse than he’d allowed himself to believe. Every movement was stiff and every attempt at control showed how fragile his body still was.

Aizawa was right, and he hated it.

He was still too weak to even consider rescuing Izuku. But Katsuki bit down hard on the thought. He sucked in a breath and tightened his jaw as he forced his resolve deeper.

With his chin lowered and teeth clenched, he fixed every ounce of focus on the slow, deliberate act of flexing his fingers. Pain lanced through him, sharp and unforgiving. But he endured.

Step by step, again and again, he told himself to make a goddamn fist.

He could do it. He had to do it.

He repeated the motions until the sun burned itself out and darkness crept across the windows. Only when the moon hung overhead did his efforts show: a single fist, trembling in triumph.

Relief tore from his chest in a shaky breath.

When he successfully balled up both fists, he could feel a shift in the atmosphere. That small thread of hope transformed. It was stronger. Bigger. And far more defiant. It pushed aside all the doubts screaming in his head and focused on the ferocious determination to be back by Izuku’s side.

“I’m coming,” Katsuki whispered. “I promise, I’m coming.”

☽ ☽ ෧ ☾ ☾

The next two weeks blurred into a performance that chipped steadily away at Izuku’s will.

The mask he was wearing was so tight, it felt like skin. It was suffocating, but he knew it was necessary. He needed to mold himself into the shape everyone always wanted him to be.

With Chisaki Kai, he became the fantasy the man obsessed over.

Submissive. Delicate. Overly meek.

Izuku presented a version of himself that didn't exist. It was surprisingly easy to do. All he did was imagine who he'd be if he never met Katsuki. This fake self was flawless: the perfect Viper, pliant and poised in equal measure. He spoke only when spoken to and never volunteered an opinion out of turn. And when Kai talked, Izuku listened like a devoted acolyte.

He smiled at every word and laughed softly at every carefully delivered jest. He mirrored Kai's admiration so convincingly that even the Yakuza Heir himself, with all his suspicious sharpness, seemed lulled into believing it was real.

For Zen, Izuku vanished.

On the days his biological father visited, Izuku made sure to fade so far into the background that he was nothing more than a shadow against the walls. He allowed silence to consume him, knowing it pleased Zen not to hear the echo of Izuku's voice.

And for Tomura, Izuku yielded completely.

He let all his resistance seep from his bones and dissolve into the ache in his chest. The anguish hollowed him out to the point that he could be as controllable as his brother needed.

He played each part with perfect precision, using every ounce of his training and energy.

Kai believed it. Zen believed it.

But, Izuku was unsure if Tomura did.

There were moments when Izuku could feel his brother's cold eyes dissecting him. He'd look over his shoulder, and would catch Tomura boring his eyes into his soul. It was like his brother was stripping the mask from his face with his eyes alone.

Why was it that Tomura was one of the few people Izuku could never read? It was hard to tell whether or not his brother saw through the false compliance.

But if he did, he said nothing.

Tomura never pressed. Never accused. He simply observed and let his gaze linger.

And when everyone was gone, and it was only Izuku by himself in the quiet hours, he collected venom from the mamushi snake. The creature began to understand his routine, and resigned itself like some passive deity trapped in a cage. The serpent bared its teeth easily and expected nothing more than its poison to be extracted.

Soon, Izuku measured the passage of time by the amount of venom.

First it was a droplet. Then a thin film that shimmered underneath the dim light. Next, it was enough to ripple and mirror back his grief-stricken eyes. And when two and a half weeks crawled by, the jar was half full of pure death.

When he knew he collected enough, Izuku quietly asked three separate servants for a long list of mundane, useless items. Lotions. Notebooks. Baking soda. And within those things, he asked for the chemicals he needed.

He did this because he knew separately, the items drew no attention. But together, they would raise red flags.

Originally, Izuku considered asking Ochako to get the chemicals, but he quickly dismissed the idea. Over the last few days, she turned out to be a small, bright presence that offset the shadowed corridors of the estate. She was kind, clever, and empathic. The mere thought of her discovering even a hint of his plan made Izuku feel nauseous.

He didn't want her to become ensnared in his mess like Katsuki.

And because of her, he found moments to breathe. These were brief interludes of shared laughter that carried them past the oppressive walls. It began one evening, as Ochako drew his bath for him. She chuckled at the absurdity of the estate.

"This place is lousy with chandeliers," she whispered, smirking as she adjusted the water. "There's so many. It's ridiculous, isn't it?"

Izuku pressed a hand to his mouth, stifling his laugh. His gaze flicked to the massive golden chandelier hanging above them.

"I never noticed," he admitted, a small smile tugging at his lips. "But you're right. There really is an insane amount."

"Like, why does the bathroom downstairs have two?" Ochako leaned in, eyes crinkled with amusement. "As if these people need two chandeliers to just…wipe."

Izuku let the corner of his mouth lift into a grin. "They probably need two to see past their enormous egos blocking all the light."

They both erupted into restrained laughter, careful not to let their mirth carry beyond the locked door.

These moments became frequent. They would sit together on the cool bathroom floor, quietly chuckling at all the follies of the estate. Or sometimes they would simply vent about how awful the Chisaki were. Their chats gave Izuku a brief reprieve from the ache in his chest.

Other times they stayed up together in the dining hall chatting.

Ochako was very curious about his life. She inquired a lot about how he ended up here, with Chisaki Kai. And Izuku, with nothing to lose, told her everything. The lock on his throat that told him to never speak ill about his upbringing was officially gone.

"It's all for a merger," Izuku explained with dull eyes. "Everyone benefits except for me. The Vipers get respect, money, and status. The Yakuza get free protection and expand their power. And to top it off, Chisaki gets…me."

Ochako's eyes softened. "As a trophy?"

"Yeah," he said. "A beautiful trophy."

She fell silent, pity settling across her features, but it didn't linger long. She leaned in, shifting the conversation with deft curiosity toward the photos he kept. The first time she asked, Izuku was caught off guard. But over time, recounting the memories of Katsuki became a source of solace.

Which brought them to now, with Izuku sitting on the stool in front of the vanity mirror while Ochako combed his hair.

She was softening it and applying light touches of product to shape it just so. The warm glow of the room caught the soft highlights in his mane as he flipped through photographs of Katsuki. He laughed with Ochako at memories that still felt so vividly alive.

"And you two were at each other's throats for eight years?" Ochako giggled. "And neither of you realized who the other was?"

She swept his bangs back and smoothed them with a delicate hand.

"No," Izuku chuckled. "Crazy, isn't it?" He lingered on one photo of Katsuki. His dead husband was squinting against the sun with a scowl tugging at his charming face. "We were always side by side, even when we didn't know it."

"I think that's the closest thing I've ever heard to soulmates."

She patted light blush on his cheeks, deepening their rosy look. As she primped him, Izuku's eyes remained locked on the photo.

A small, wry smile tugged at his lips. "He was…really amazing."

Silence settled between them, and Ochako paused mid-motion. Her hand hovered, waiting, as if she could feel the grief on him.

"If you want to talk about something else, we can," she suggested softly.

"No," Izuku responded swiftly, shaking his head. "It's—it's okay. Talking about him makes me feel closer to him."

He flipped to another photo. Then another.

And suddenly, the grief in his chest felt heavier than before.

It wasn't that it had lessened in the days prior. Only that, for the last two weeks, Izuku managed to carry it with anger alone. His hatred for the Yakuza and the Vipers was a shield large enough to conceal himself from the burden of sorrow. Vengeance was his shelter, preventing him from drifting away into misery.

But this morning, for reasons he couldn't name, the ache pressed harder. It was insistent. It rose around him like a violent storm, battering against the windows of his shelter, rattling his cage of protection demanding to be heard.

Abruptly, an impatient knock struck against the door.

Both Izuku and Ochako jumped, and turned their heads.

"Izuku, are you ready yet?" Tomura called, annoyed. "Everyone is waiting downstairs for you."

"I'm almost ready," Izuku called back. "I just need to put my kimono on."

"Okay. You have eight minutes. Don't make the Chisakis wait long."

"Right. Of course not."

Tomura's footsteps faded, and the laughter that was once in the room was officially gone.

In the past few weeks, Tomura urged Izuku to choreograph a dance for Chisaki Kai. The performance would serve as the final link in a long chain meant to bind the man's attention to him. His brother pressed him into it because these dances always were Izuku's most reliable means of seducing marks. And, as Tomura reasoned, the language of assassination was not so different from the language of luring someone into marriage.

Izuku checked himself in the mirror once more. His skin was dewy, and his lips were tinged with the faintest pink. Ochako solemnly sprayed cologne on his wrists and neck.

Pushing down the storm in his chest, Izuku stood up and anchored himself the best that he could. The kimono on the bed stared at him, and he stared right back. It was pitch black, a shade deeper than usual, and decorated in patterns of iridescent flowers. Matching the floral pattern was an obi of pale gold, offsetting the darkness.

"Let's get you ready," Ochako suggested, mournful.

Izuku dully nodded as she began.

She wrapped him in the intricate layers, covering his body fully. Her hands cinched his obi tight, suffocating him in the name of beauty. Through the full-length mirror, Izuku observed himself transform into someone who looked like they belonged to the Shie Hassaikai.

"Are you experienced at dancing?" Ochako inquired, trying to lighten the mood.

"I trained in a lot of different styles since I was a teenager," he explained. "It's second nature at this point."

Right after Nine declared his looks were a weapon, Ibara and Jin wasted no time throwing him into the fire of seduction training. They sharpened him like a blade and sculpted his movements. His brother and sister taught him how to speak desire like it was its own dialect.

Eye contact. Flattery. The right breath at the right time.

But most importantly, they taught him how to move like a flame. They showed him how to transform into a light that was too captivating to resist. Together, the three of them practiced dance after dance. Some were sharp and slow, others playful and teasing. A few were soaked in lust.

But the most dangerous were the ones laced with elegance and subtlety.

And those worked every time without fail.

Ochako draped the heavy black haori over his shoulders, letting it fall perfectly into place. Her hands lingered briefly on his arms as she adjusted the fabric. She was careful not to disturb the smooth line of the kimono beneath.

When she stepped back, Izuku's reflection in the mirror was exactly how Tomura would have wanted it: full of allure.

Hopelessness crept up again, and the grief rattled him once more.

Carefully, Izuku tucked the necklace with his eternity ring inside of his collar.

Izuku and Ochako exchanged one wordless glance and headed out. In the hallway, Tomura was waiting for them. His brother wore a black kimono, and his long hair was tied back into a pony tail with his usual red string.

He looked Izuku up and down for a moment, and then stepped forward.

Without a word, he lifted a hand and tucked one of Izuku's stubborn curls behind his ear, like always.

"Ready?" Tomura asked, simple but commanding.

"Yeah. I'm ready," Izuku replied.

He kept his head leveled, but in the back of his mind, his grief was roaring louder and louder.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Downstairs, the private room brimmed with the Shie Hassaikai.

It was smaller than the grand halls, intimate in size. The walls were paneled in dark wood that shone under the dim lanterns. Tatami mats lined the floor in rows, creating a symmetry that framed the narrow center aisle—a strip of space that stretched forward like a ceremonial runway.

Above, a single light hung low. It cast its pale luminosity down the middle while pulling everything else into subdued shadow.

When Izuku entered, the first thing he noticed was the scent. In a terrible way, it reminded him of Katsuki. The heady mix of smokey incense triggered memories of how his lover's natural musk used to be. And alongside the comforting essence was the harsh, acrid smell of cigars. The smoke drifted up in thick ribbons, veiling the shadowed faces in the room with a golden haze.

Along either side of the aisle, the Yakuza sat in two unbroken lines.

Men and women poised like wolves in waiting. Their sharp eyes snapped to him the moment his foot crossed the threshold. In the middle, were the Chisakis. Kurenai's hair was down with golden charms spilling over her shoulders. On the other side of her was the stoic Takeshi. His arms were folded and his cunning eyes stared straight ahead.

And at the very center was Kai.

His gaze raised the instant Izuku appeared. That molten gold stare cut through the smoke and Izuku felt it pin him.

Kai's lips shifted into a delighted smile. He rose and languidly strode over to meet him.

"Izuku," he greeted and humbly bowed. "You look magnificent tonight in this kimono. I think the Shie Hassaikai symbol suits you well."

"I have you to thank for picking it out," Izuku acknowledged. The smallest flicker of a smile touched his lips. He maintained the mask of docility and charm. "You have great taste."

Kai stepped closer and his hand brushed lightly against Izuku's arm.

"I may have great taste, but I'm sure you'd make anything look wonderful."

The air between them pulsed with tension, and every eye in the room was assessing them closely. Izuku moved closer to the center of the room and kept his body poised.

Behind him, Tomura walked in tow, body squared out. He greeted Kai as well, along with several other higher-ups in the Yakuza. In perfect stride, he walked Kai back to his seat and took a comfortable spot amongst the others in the crowd. When he was settled, he turned to the guests and bowed, respectively.

"Thank you all for coming," Tomura began. "My lovely brother has prepared a gift for the Chisaki family tonight as a gesture of appreciation. He knows how deeply you value tradition —and intends to honor it."

Tomura leaned back and allowed his tone to deepen with intrigue. "Tonight, you'll see one of his rarest talents. Consider yourselves fortunate. Nearly everyone who has witnessed the Viridian Viper's charm paid the price in blood afterwards."

The room erupted in small laughs. Cigars glowed, and sharp teeth flashed with a sense of power.

"Izuku," Tomura called. "You can begin."

Izuku stepped into the light. It slid across his skin like liquid gold, softening the sharp lines of his face. The hum of the room fell away instantly. Every pair of eyes pulled to him as if he'd become the center of gravity.

He glanced over the crowd and stopped when he made eye contact with Chisaki Kai.

His servants were fanning him and his parents, keeping them cool as the smoke swirled up into the air.

When the music began, Izuku snapped open both of his fans. The rich gold color shimmered.

First, the strings flowed. Several simple, measured thrums echoed and wove into a labyrinthine rhythm. Then the flute followed. Soft notes slid across his skin like a wind threading through the ruins of a grave. And when the drum joined, Izuku took his first step.

He equipped himself with persuasion and moved like a serpent.

His sleeves trailed like streams of liquid as he danced. Each gesture was precise, carved into his muscles by the years of grueling discipline. The tempo swept him away as he stepped in refined, elegant expressions.

A stretch of the hand. A turn. A pivot. Then a bow.

The crowd could only stare as he spun the two golden fans with effortless command. The metal shimmered under the lanterns, scattering light across his skin until he seemed forged of twilight. With a coy dip of the wrist, he veiled his face behind one fan, only to reveal the curve of his smile as the edge traced his jawline.

He caught the deepening infatuation on Chisaki's face as he did this. It scorched the room, proving the bait was working. And right when he knew he hooked him, Izuku offered the curve of his neck in surrender.

But when he looked up again, he didn't see Chisaki.

He saw Katsuki.

Izuku's flow faltered. Quickly, he folded the stumble into a classic twirl. He carefully hid his face behind his fan. Confusion hit him like a brick, making it hard to regain balance. But when he glanced at Chisaki again, the mirage of his dead lover didn't fade—it intensified.

Fully materialized, Katsuki was sitting where Chisaki should have been.

He was in a scarlet kimono that burned as bright as a hundred sunsets. His mouth was quirked into that familiar scowl that always hid his softness. And his ash-blond hair was as wild as ever—but his skin was sun-kissed and alive.

Izuku stared as he danced. He felt a pull stronger than gravity suck him in. He moved closer to the burning, beautiful scarlet eyes. And the ghost of Katsuki watched him right back with all the love in the world.

Chills spilled down his spine when the vision leaned in with that lopsided grin.

“Dance for me, darling,” Katsuki’s phantom whispered.

The words soothed his aching heart like they were the antidote for all his pain. He continued, hiding the surge of emotion with a graceful spin. And with that twist, the world shifted. The incense became wind. The ground was grass. And the room became an open sky colored in sunset.

And Katsuki began walking towards him.

When the vision came close, Izuku’s palms caressed the air like they were brushing Katsuki’s cheek. His arms floated outward, fingers moving as if he was sculpting his dead husband from memory. He traced the sharp line of a jaw. Touched the hands that used to hold him. Skimmed phantom collarbones.

Every motion was a plea: come back to me.

The music climbed high. The strings pulsed like a heartbeat while the flute sang a note so aching it could have been Katsuki’s breath against his ear. Izuku’s body answered in silence, swaying low with arms stretching toward the vision.

Katsuki was closer now. So close that Izuku swore he felt the warmth of his skin.

Their eyes met and Izuku let himself drown. Katsuki began to dance with him, and a handsome grin slipped across his husband’s face. Izuku smiled back and they began to orbit each other.

No push and pull. No clash. Just perfect balance, for once in their lives.

The smoke circled them, tying like a ribbon around their bodies. Katsuki spun him and Izuku grinned as they joined in step, dancing together like they used to.

The tempo quickened, and Izuku whirled swiftly. Once, twice, and then a third time. Katsuki joined, feet gliding across the wooden aisle.

As the music swelled, Izuku danced faster. And faster. Then he spun so hard he grew lightheaded. With every whip of his head, he saw Katsuki, moving in circles with him.

He was a vision: a flower with petals unfurling in the wind.

And suddenly, this was no longer just a dance.

Izuku was begging with every line of his body for Death to change its mind. He was praying for it to bend and take mercy on them. Undo what had been permanently done. Maybe if he danced beautifully enough, Death would listen. Maybe if he offered everything in his body, Katsuki would step out of this illusion and into his arms again.

His dance went off script. It wasn’t seductive anymore, but rather full of longing.

His head tipped back, throat bared. His arms curved, gathering Katsuki in his arms. Katsuki lifted his hands and cupped his face. Izuku lulled his head, leaning into the weight of calloused hands against his skin.

A small, loving kiss pressed against his forehead.

“Perfect,” Katsuki said.

Then the music descended. Izuku turned one last time, reluctant and desperate like a comet wheeling through the night sky. He made one more plea with death and let his golden fans ripple in his hands. They rose and fell in fluid waves, resembling streams of moonlit water spilling endlessly from his fingertips.

And when the final note struck, Izuku gorgeously caved to his knees.

He sank so low his forehead kissed the floor. Silence cut through the space and the room returned. The wind became smoke again and the sunset vanished.

Izuku was back in the dim room with the Yakuza, breathing in short pulls. Sweat slid down his spine. His fingers curled into emptiness. He stayed there for what felt like forever, waiting for Katsuki’s voice to come again.

But it didn’t.

“Exquisite,” Chisaki whispered.

The word slid over Izuku’s skin like oil. Gradually, he lifted his head.

His husband was gone.

Chisaki sat where he always had. His spine was straight, and his pupils were blown wide, swallowing the gold until nothing remained but black hunger. When he eventually moved, it was to tug at his collar with two fingers. His throat worked around a swallow.

He was enamored—exactly as they wanted.

The silence shattered with the soft patter of applause. It was polite at first, then swelled like rain on a roof. Compliments rippled through the room from voices dripping with adornment.

Tomura looked stunned, and slightly confused. Izuku froze, petrified when he realized his mask had dropped. He watched his brother with slight fear as Tomura’s intelligent gaze sliced into him. And for one fractured second, Izuku swore the whole world tilted.

Then his brother moved, gradual as frost, and began to clap. But he did not smile.

Izuku’s pulse stuttered. He let his eyes flicker sideways, seeking an anchor—but what he found was worse. Ochako stood among the crowd, the only one not clapping.

She stared at him intensely, eyes glassy with tears.

“I think we have a lot to talk about tomorrow,” Chisaki spoke with a tenderness worse than cruelty.

Izuku dropped his gaze before the disgust could show. All his instincts were telling him to burn this room to the ground and run barefoot into the night until the world swallowed him whole.

But he knew, even if he did that, it still wouldn’t bring Katsuki back.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku’s pulse thrummed like wings trapped in a jar.

He was walking back to his room in silence with Ochako beside him.

After the performance, everyone showered him with compliments. How graceful he was, they said. He was truly a gem, rare and beautiful. The Chisakis were impressed. And the other Yakuza members complimented Tomura on having such an accomplished brother. When no one was looking, Izuku wandered off into the halls.

He relived the way Kai assessed him in the end. It was full of avaricious desire—much more than before. Which meant only one thing: Izuku had succeeded.

Kai wanted him. For good.

Which meant Izuku was going to be married. Again.

Katsuki’s face struck like lightning.

That grief from earlier came back. It rattled and shook. It slammed on the windows and screamed to be let in. He bit down on the sob rising in his throat. Hold it together, he told himself. But every step he took fractured him further. Soon, all the corners he turned, he saw Katsuki.

Katsuki alive. Katsuki waiting. Katsuki with hand stretched out.

He saw their journey, their intertwined smiles, and heard all their failed promises.

He even saw what he thought would be their future wedding. There, Katsuki was waiting for him at the end of the aisle dressed in a tux. His beautiful eyes sparkled with love as he held his breath. He stared at Izuku like he was the only other star in the sky.

And then, the precious image bled into a nightmare. The figure of Chisaki overshadowed Katsuki—waiting for him at the altar.

Izuku’s stomach lurched.

His pace quickened. His heart slammed harder, too loud in his ears. It was pounding like it wanted out of his cursed body too. Breathe, he told himself. But it was no good. His lungs locked tight. It was as if the silk obi around his waist constricted like a fist and crushed his ribs.

Izuku clawed at the sash. He stumbled forward, breath breaking apart in jagged gasps.

“Izuku?” Ochako’s voice was distant. “Wh-What’s wrong?”

But he couldn’t answer. He couldn’t even think. He couldn’t breathe. Izuku bolted, feet slamming the floor. His vision tunneled. His breath rasped in his ears like a saw. Ochako’s footsteps pounded after him, but he barely heard her as the world fell away.

He reached his door and tore it open, choking on the nothingness in his lungs. The room tilted and spun. He collapsed to his knees, dragging air into a chest that wouldn’t expand. Darkness edged his vision. He squeezed his eyes shut—and it was a mistake.

Katsuki was there.

All he could see were memories. But his husband was gone. Gone. Gone. Gone.

He was never coming back.

“No—no—” Izuku’s hands tugged at the silk sash.

He frantically threw off the haori and tried to rip the obi’s knot, but failed. The kimono felt alive. It transformed into a second skin, strangling him and sealing him in. Tears blurred everything as he yanked and tore, but the silk held fast.

“H-Help me,” he choked, voice breaking apart. His nails scraped at his stomach, trying to shred himself free. “Get it off—get it off! Please!”

Ochako dropped beside him. Frantically, she tried to tear the sash off, but the tight knot wouldn’t budge. When Izuku started shaking more, she cursed under her breath, spun, and snatched the scissors from the vanity. She sliced the blade down the fabric, splitting it in two. Then she tore the kimono open with all her strength.

Air crashed into Izuku’s lungs in a single violent rush.

He collapsed forward, stripping the kimono off his skin like it was eating him alive. He was sobbing so hard his body quaked. It was almost as if the sound wasn’t him, but rather a Deity of Grief, trying to tear its way out his throat.

Every ounce of mourning, terror, and anger ripped his voice chords apart.

Ochako caught him quickly. She wrapped her arms around his trembling frame, holding him tightly as he broke apart into millions of pieces.

“H-He’s really gone,” Izuku cried, words shattered into hiccups. “He’s never coming back, is he?” His head dropped against her shoulder, tears soaking her sleeve. “My Kacchan is really gone.”

He wept, harder than the day it happened. Grief had come for him again, and it would continue to in its cruel, inconsistent waves.

Ochako said nothing.

She simply held him while his world collapsed piece by piece in her arms.

ᔓᔓᔓ

When the next day came, Tomura got everything he wanted.

Izuku stared blankly at the contract in front of him. It was massive, at least a hundred pages and stamped with the crest of the Shie Hassaikai. But instead of its usual shape, it entwined with the serpent emblem of the Viper Academy. The two symbols fused together in flawless harmony.

Flanking either side of Izuku at the table was Tomura and Zen. They were all dressed in crisp black suits with silver ties. Their hands were folded in a near identical manner.

Across from them were the Chisakis, dressed in black and gold. Kurenai and Takeshi were on either side of their son. Kurenai was smiling while Takeshi held his stern, unreadable expression. Kai brimmed with excitement. He was smiling at Izuku, eyes full of life and appreciation.

And at the center of it all, a black velvet box with a twenty five carat diamond ring.

Izuku was quiet, working on keeping his mask on his face. Signature after signature signed on the dotted lines, and just like that, he was officially sold to the Yakuza Heir. Tomura glanced at him once as he signed something on page twenty. Then Zen signed right below.

They chatted, going over the legal details of their merger.

As Izuku listened, he gathered that the Vipers would become more than mere killers for hire. They would transmute into respected parts of the Shie Hassaikai machine, an integrated limb of the syndicate. This meant Tomura and Zen were no longer lowly freelancers for hire. They were powerful co-leaders of a branch in the strongest crime family in the world.

And to top it all off, Zen got a seat at The Underground Council right next to Tomura.

In exchange, the Chisakis paid nothing for assassins. No more exorbitant fees for hired kills. No more risk of competition. The Academy was absorbed whole. Any debts from the books were scrubbed clean, and all business with future clients would be funneled through the Yakuza. This officially meant the Chisakis controlled the assassins-for-hire market in one stroke of a pen.

The Vipers' and Yakuza's perfectly symbiotic relationship was now written in stone.

Zen flipped to a page and scanned his eyes across the print.

“Children?” He asked. “Not to be rude, but these two can’t reproduce with each other.”

“Well of course not,” Takeshi replied with a snark. “We have a protocol for this type of instance. In the chance that a Heir happens to be more fond of the same sex, we have approved surrogates. They have all been screened for genetics, IQ levels, and physical beauty has also been assessed.”

“How many kids do you want to have, sweetie?” Kurenai asked.

“I think five is a good number,” Kai replied. He smiled at Izuku and cocked his head. “Izuku, how does that sound?”

He stared, sick to his stomach. He knew why Kai chose that number.

“Five sounds good,” Izuku agreed.

Kai smiled, fully sadistic.

“Five it is,” Takeshi cut in. He wrote down the number in a blank space on page fifty two. “We’ll use one surrogate, so all the kids will share DNA. The first three will be sired by Kai and the last two will be sired by Izuku. This way the first few in line will be of the Chisaki blood line.”

“Izuku does well with children,” Tomura added. He nodded towards Izuku confidently. “He’ll enjoy being a parent.”

“Oh, of course he will,” Kurenai laughed as she smiled sweetly at Izuku. “I was delighted to hear what you did for those kids, Izuku. I think that type of fiery protection is perfect for a Yakuza spouse. When I heard that, I knew you would be a wonderful addition to our family. You would never let anything ever happen to your children.”

“I wouldn’t,” Izuku replied earnestly. “I think children should be protected, at all costs.”

And there it was: their cycle, repeating itself without fail.

Izuku watched as more signatures bloomed across the page as they went over every minor detail. And as they did this, Izuku saw his alleged new name staring back at him: Chisaki Izuku.

It was insulting.

He ached as he reflected on how many surnames he’d gone through. He was born a Midoriya, but meant to be Shigaraki. He was then branded a Mamushi, and now he was being forced to become a Chisaki.

But he knew what he was, really. He was a Bakugou, like his dead husband. And Bakugous were spiteful. That spite had been passed down from Mitsuki to Katsuki—and now, from Katsuki to him.

And Izuku was going to wield it exactly like The Scarlet Eyed Killer would’ve.

“For the wedding, I would really love it if we invited all of our families,” Izuku suddenly added. He sweetly peered at Kai and tried his best to sell it as his fury boiled. “A big wedding has always been a dream of mine.”

“I wouldn’t have guessed that,” Kai replied with a tinge of surprise. “You seem like the type who would have preferred a smaller sized event.”

Izuku shook his head lightly, voice calm and warm.

“No,” he said, reassuring. “I think for a union like ours, all the Yakuza and Vipers should be there to witness it. It’s the joining of our families after several generations of collaboration. We should make it very lavish and celebratory.”

“I can agree with that,” Takeshi agreed, thoughtful. “But that means a lot of planning. For something that scale, we’re looking at spring, potentially even summer. We’ll need months to prepare—”

“—No.”

The word cut sharper than Izuku intended. All eyes turned to him, their surprise heavy in the silence. His pulse stuttered, but he forced a sweet smile across his lips.

“I-I mean…” He laughed gently, feigning timidity. “Waiting that long would feel like torture, wouldn’t it?” His eyes flickered toward the windows, where snow laced the night in white. “And I also think a winter wedding could be truly beautiful. It’s unique.”

Kai arched his brow with intrigue. “Eager to be by my side, are you?”

“I am,” Izuku answered smoothly. “The thought of waiting months—it seems unbearable, especially after so long of us dancing around each other.” He tilted his head, smiling tightly but convincing. “Maybe we could make it happen in two weeks?”

Kai’s eyes drifted down.

His greedy gaze lingered on the dip of Izuku’s collarbones. He inhaled deeply, and his composure tightened with restraint.

“Agreed,” he said at last, nearly breathless. He turned to his parents, and his voice shifted into a command. “Spare no expense and arrange everything immediately. Make sure this wedding is the top priority.”

They exchanged a couple of looks, but no one objected. Everyone agreed, and soon a lightness of celebration rested across the table. Zen and Takeshi began chatting like old friends and soon the conversation poured into nothing more than pats on the back and official signings.

When they reached the last page, Izuku was finally required to sign.

“And now if you put your signature here, we’re all set to go,” Kurenai sweetly told him. She handed over the pen, her golden nails shining in the light. “We’re going to have ourselves a beautiful, big wedding!"

Izuku smiled, hiding his pain.

He looked down. His signature was required directly underneath the words 'asset purchased.'

He signed the dotted line and sealed all of their fates.

ᔓᔓᔓ

"I can't believe we did it!" Zen cheered loudly.

He chuckled deeply from the back of his throat as he clinked his glass of whiskey with Tomura's.

"We're officially on top of the whole Tokyo Underground." He tipped his head to Tomura. "And it's all because of you."

Tomura lowered his head humbly. "I was merely doing what I know you would have done."

"And look how wonderfully it worked out," Zen chuckled.

Izuku observed, feeling like he was a world away. Zen's body language was telling him he didn't belong in this room celebrating with them, but he wasn't allowed to leave. So he kept his head down, gazing with hidden distaste at the new diamond ring on his hand. It glittered under the chandelier in the library, and it made Izuku deeply ill to be wearing it.

"To family," Zen said, brimming with triumph. "And to the future this alliance promises."

Tomura mirrored the gesture and a faint smirk tugged on his scarred lips.

"To family," he echoed.

His tone was smooth, but Izuku heard the small strain underneath it. It was a subtle reach for approval. Zen clapped him on the back. The hearty, solid strike nearly toppled the glass in Tomura's hand.

"You are great." Zen's grin widened, teeth flashing. "You're brilliant, ruthless, and decisive. You're exactly what I hoped Vipers would be when I started this Academy. You have just kept amazing me every step of the way. And now, you've secured my legacy."

Izuku sat to the side, smiling as neat as origami. His glass was half-lifted, fingers steady despite the quiet storm in his chest.

Zen didn't look at him. Not once. He treated Izuku as if he was another painting on the wall.

The toast continued on. Zen's booming cheer segued into some story about when he was a boy killing for Chisaki Kai's grandfather. He painted his stories in fierce, prideful strides with his booming bellow. And the whole time, Tomura subtly smiled.

As the two bonded further, Izuku tilted his glass and let the whiskey burn its way down his throat. He stared at his reflection in the amber depths for a long moment.

Another toast. Another round.

Zen poured with a generous hand, crystal singing as it filled. Izuku drank without protest. Sip after sip, the weight in his chest grew heavier.

Tomura leaned back in his chair, eyes relaxed for once. His smirk was fully satisfied. Although Izuku wondered if it was indeed satisfaction or simply the echo of Zen's praise warming his old wounds. He could see it in the way Tomura's shoulders loosened with every approving word he received.

Izuku's smile started to fade the longer he went on being ignored. He let the fire kiss his throat again and again, until the edges of the room blurred.

Zen rose at last, the picture of true power and satisfaction. His tailored coat swept the floor as he reached for Tomura once more. A final pat to his shoulder that was firm and stable.

"You've outdone yourself, Tomura," Zen repeated, voice thick with delight. "Truly, you've made me proud. Make sure you take a day off to celebrate your accomplishment."

Tomura inclined his head with the faintest tilt. He tried to play it cool, but Izuku saw the spark of validation in his eyes.

Zen barely glanced Izuku's way as he turned for the door.

"Enjoy the night, boys," he said over his shoulder, voice already fading down the corridor.

The silence left in his wake was heavier than all the whiskey in the room.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Eventually, Izuku excused himself, leaving Tomura alone to continue celebrating. Or go home. Frankly, Izuku didn't care.

He gathered Ochako and drifted into the living room that held the only TV in the estate. But really, it wasn't a living room. Not in any meaningful sense anyways because no one here ever used it. The Chisakis possessed endless luxuries at their fingertips—what was a TV compared to their lives that were already scripted like crime dramas?

But still, in true Chisaki fashion, they wanted the option.

Greed always demanded choices.

Izuku sank onto the stiff leather couch, the cold cushions pressed into him. Beside him, Ochako reached for the remote and flipped on a random sitcom. Instantly, the laugh track erupted. It was bright and slightly artificial. The sound bounced against the walls, but none of it touched him. The humor skidded off his skin like rain on glass.

Izuku's grief officially built an armor. Nothing could get in now.

He slid off the diamond ring and carelessly threw it on the coffee table.

Within a few minutes, Izuku heard his brother's footsteps approaching. Then, like clockwork, Tomura's large figure appeared in the doorway. A long, dark shadow stretched into the room and loomed. Both sets of eyes in the room wearily glanced up to see him standing there with his coat in hand.

"Uraraka." Tomura's voice cut clean through the canned laughter. "You're dismissed for the night."

She hesitated, looking between them. Uncertainty flickered in her eyes.

"Are you sure?" She asked.

"I'm positive."

Ochako lingered for one last glance. Izuku gave her a small nod of reassurance that he'd be fine. She pressed her lips together, then slipped out into the hall. The door closed behind her with a click and the air in the room thickened to the point it turned stale.

Izuku kept his gaze on the TV, pretending his brother wasn't there. He didn't have the strength to indulge Tomura tonight. But Tomura, as always, didn't need permission. He strolled around like he was inspecting a cage before lowering himself next to Izuku on the couch.

His pointer finger drifted across the coffee table, tracing a neat line through the dust right next to the expensive diamond ring.

"Surprisingly filthy in here," he murmured, rubbing the gray smudge between his fingers.

Izuku glanced at him briefly. "Why didn't you head out with One? There's not exactly much to do around here."

Tomura shrugged. "It's quiet without you back home."

Izuku frowned. "What do you mean?"

Tomura pressed his lips into a thin line. He looked at Izuku and an emotion flickered in his eyes. His gaze then slid to the TV, observing the fake laughter play out on the screen.

"I'm adjusting to not having you around," he admitted. His tone was strangely fragile for him. "The dogs are sad without you. They sit outside your room, waiting for treats like you never left." He exhaled through his nose. "But I suppose once you're married to Chisaki, you'll move here. I'll just have to get used to it, even though it'll be hard."

Izuku stiffened. "Why would that be hard for you?"

“We’ve never lived apart,” Tomura replied, matter-of-fact, as if stating a law of nature. “It’s been…odd, being alone. But this is for the better. How I feel doesn’t matter.”

Izuku stared, words knotting in his throat. The weight of the confession settled: this was as close to saying ‘I miss you’ Tomura would ever come to. If this were a world before Katsuki, this small fiber of warmth would have meant everything. He would have reached for it, cherished it, and probably let Tomura manipulate him with it.

But that world no longer existed—and Tomura was the one to kill it.

Izuku turned away to keep from showing his hurt.

He looked towards the window. Outside, snow was drifting down in perfect spirals. Snow always brought him to the memory of when Katsuki was a boy. And these days, it never stopped snowing. He could perfectly see them dancing together in the sharp winter air, spinning in the cold until their cheeks were flushed pink.

Tomura’s eyes followed his line of vision.

“Is being cramped in here making you extra depressed?” He asked.

Izuku shrugged distantly. “I guess it would be nice to go outside,” he replied dully. “Fresh air is never a bad thing.”

“If I could take you outside for a bit, you wouldn’t attempt anything troublesome, would you?”

Izuku let out a short, humorless huff. “You have nothing to worry about.” He lifted one leg and tilted it so the gold-plated anklet caught the dim light. “I couldn’t go anywhere you wouldn’t find me.”

Tomura’s expression tightened for a split second.

“I can make some arrangements,” he declared. “I’m sure Chisaki would be happy to escort you somewhere now that everything has worked out. Maybe we could all go to a park, or something of that degree.”

Izuku smiled without warmth. “That would be nice.”

The laughter from the TV bubbled again, and Tomura sharply exhaled, fully irritated.

“You can drop the act, Izuku,” he said flatly. “It’s just us.”

Izuku didn’t answer. His gaze fixed on the TV screen, its glow painting shadows across his face. He gripped his hands until his knuckles whitened, fighting the tremors in his chest and the heat pricking behind his eyes.

“You’re still upset about Bakugou,” his brother said, laced with something Izuku hated to call concern. “What can I do to make you get over it quicker?”

Slowly, Izuku turned to look at his brother.

“Get over it?” The words left him like broken glass, and confusion cracked through his composure. “You think I’ll just get over you killing him?”

The slightest spark of surprise crossed Tomura’s face right before his expression hardened back to being sharp and cold. But Izuku didn’t flinch under his glare this time. He stared his brother down, desperately searching to find a shred of understanding.

But there was nothing.

He found only emptiness where humanity should be.

“You don’t get it,” Izuku muttered. His anger thinned into astonishment. “You’ll never get it because you don’t know what it’s like to love someone, do you?”

Tomura’s jaw clicked. “Izuku. Let’s not play this game.”

Izuku leaned back, examining him.

He studied his brother’s frown, the scars on his face, and the tired bags under his eyes. He finally grasped that Tomura’s heart wasn’t frozen over, it was absolutely made of ice.

It could never thaw.

“I think I actually feel sorry for you,” Izuku said. He gazed at his brother with pity, for once. “You don’t understand love, so you’ll never understand the gravity of what you did.” More tears gathered in Izuku’s eyes. “You took someone I’ve loved my whole life away from me. I can’t get over that.”

Tomura’s frown deepened. “I was doing what needed to be done—”

“—It doesn’t matter what the reason was,” Izuku explained gently. “I-I won’t be able to forgive what you did.”

Tomura froze. He leaned back as well, as if what Izuku said was in a foreign language. And for a half of a second, Izuku thought he saw an emotion—hurt, maybe. But no, Tomura didn’t get hurt. He didn’t feel. Izuku accepted that love and empathy were concepts his brother could never grasp.

They stared at each other, two points on opposite shores.

Between them stretched an ocean of blood, and at its center, Katsuki floated facedown with the scarlet swallowing his golden hair. There was nothing left between them. And Izuku knew he could never look at Tomura the same way again.

Yet knowing that didn’t dull the ache.

Somewhere deep inside, the child who once clung to his brother screamed for comfort. He needed someone to make this nightmare all untrue. And he hated that a part of him wished it could be his big brother.

Quickly, Izuku turned away. His tears began to fall, heavy and unstoppable. He pressed his palms into his eyes and his shoulders curled inward like broken wings.

“C-Can you please just—” Izuku’s voice broke. “Just leave me alone, Tomura.”

And his brother granted his wish.

He didn’t say goodbye, and he didn’t try to say anything or press a lecture. He stood up, hovered for a moment and grabbed his coat. He walked towards the hallway and began to leave. But not before he stopped in the door frame and looked over his shoulder.

“…I’ll make some arrangements to get you some fresh air,” Tomura said quietly.

And with that, he left Izuku there by himself.

When no one was around, Izuku pulled his real wedding ring from around his neck. He gazed longingly at the eternity rubies as the sound of happiness he would never have again echoed from the TV.

☽ ☽ ☾ ☾

The rubber mat was slick with sweat.

Katsuki dropped into a deep lunge, dragging his leg forward until his thigh burned. He hissed as he tried his best to rehabilitate his body. His muscles were shuddering like they could snap at any moment. But he pushed through the pain with the mere thought of getting Izuku back.

He’d spent the last two weeks rebuilding himself from the ground up.

He pushed his body and did every single physical therapy exercise he could think of. If he wasn’t gathering his strength through resting and eating, he was holed up in the training room downstairs. He was keeping sharp by throwing punches and kicks, trying to beat the tremble out of his scratched up knuckles.

But also in the last two weeks, there was no word about Izuku.

And the silence was eating him alive.

His breath came sharp through gritted teeth. He kicked up his leg with a loud grunt, forcing his speed. He held his knee to his chest. The veins in his arms bulged as he pulled, pulled until his hamstrings screamed.

He collapsed with a heavy thud against the mat. The sound cracked through the empty lounge.

His legs were still recovering.

“Damn it,” he snarled angrily.

He slammed a fist against the floor in defeat. He hung his head low as he panted harshly. His eyes slowly drifted to the emerald ring on his finger. It gleamed in the light, encouraging him. He tried to refocus, but all he could see was Izuku's heartbroken expression from when he learned about the stupid damn deal.

Katsuki hung his head lower.

The second I find you, he promised silently. I need to tell you how sorry I am.

He sucked in a breath and started again. Pain clawed at his body, but he stubbornly pushed through the burn until sweat was rolling down his spine in sheets. His lips curled in victory when he lifted his knee to his chest without a wobble.

Good. This was good.

With a final twist, he stood. He rolled his shoulders and flexed his arms. His neck cracked as he tilted it side to side. The limp was mostly gone. Not perfect—yet. But he'd get there.

Right as he was about to go another round, suddenly the door burst open.

"Katsuki!" Miruko's shouted. She stood in the doorway, chest heaving and eyes blazing. "We found him."

Katsuki froze mid-breath.

His heart skipped as the room blurred with a spike of adrenaline.

He didn't remember moving. One second he was on the mat, the next he was barreling down the hall, bare feet pounding against the tilted floor. He ran as fast as he could. His pulse roared in his ears as he burst into the ops room.

He looked up frantically at the large screen—and there he was.

Izuku.

A little green dot pulsing on the map, faint but unmistakable.

Denki's hands clicked across the keyboard in a vigorous sequence. He pulled up the local CCTV footage, and the screen flickered through dozens of static images. Then it froze on an picture that drove a knife through Katsuki's chest.

It was Izuku, standing in a park beside Chisaki and a bunch of others. He was surrounded by elegant silk banners and tables that were heavy with what looked like wrapped gifts. He was poised in all black traditional winter garbs, as was everyone there.

Suddenly the static picture moved and turned into real time feed.

Izuku blinked, smiled, and bowed respectfully to someone.

Katsuki walked forward, using all the strength not to collapse in relief.

“He’s alive,” Monoma whispered, astonished.

Katsuki’s hands trembled. Shinsou patted his shoulder, trying to help share the load, but the longer Katsuki stared at the video, the more perplexed he became. There was a long line of people giving gifts and money.

Izuku awkwardly smiled at some woman with jet-black hair. Then Katsuki frowned at how uncomfortable Izuku seemed when she touched his cheek.

“What the hell are they doing?” Katsuki asked.

Miruko and Aizawa exchanged glances. They both looked at the young men in the room uneasily.

Aizawa hesitated for a moment. “It’s a Yuinou.”

Sero frowned. “What’s that?”

Miruko cleared her throat. “An engagement ceremony.”

The air in the room thickened, and Katsuki couldn’t breathe. His eyes burned into the footage they were looking at. A horrible, sinking feeling was building.

Right as his breathing began to grow uneven, another ping came from Denki’s computers. Quickly, Denki rolled his chair over to the third computer. He rapidly clicked on the alert, and a new window popped open.

“Oh shit,” Denki gasped. He turned, swallowing hard. “So. One of the Shie Hassaikai guys didn’t have two-factor authentication on his phone. I’d gotten into his email and was monitoring it to see if anything could come up, and a new message just came in…”

Denki trailed off.

“And?” Monoma pressed testily. “What did you find?”

“It’ll be better if I show you,” Denki suggested.

The second projector flickered on, painting the wall with an image that made Katsuki’s stomach drop.

It was a wedding invitation, printed in black and gold. Elegant ink skated across the page like it was the event of the century, and at the top were Izuku and Chisaki Kai’s names.

Lying in the center was a save the date for exactly two weeks from now.

Denki whispered as he pulled up another file. “It looks like it’ll be in this underground place called Hadeus? The wedding will be on the lowest level, hailed The Grand Hall. It’s a private space for the Shie Hassaikai.”

“Well. It looks like we got our extraction date and place,” Aizawa hissed. He ripped his scarf off his shoulders and began moving. “I’m calling Nana and letting her know right now. Everyone, begin to make preparations for fourteen days’ time.”

Miruko was right behind him. “Kaminari, start making a virtualized layout of that place.”

Everyone began shifting and prepping. But Katsuki didn’t move. He couldn’t. As everyone around him started to gather supplies, his feet were nailed to the floor.

Izuku was staring at him, smiling. But something wasn’t right.

Katsuki cocked his head at the screen. Izuku’s eyes were bloodshot, and the smile on his lips was painfully fake. But it wasn’t a typical type of fake. It was off. Katsuki had seen Izuku pretend smile with Koizumi and Peter Moore—and this was definitely not that.

This was destructive.

Through the footage, Chisaki wrapped an arm around Izuku’s waist. And like a match being thrown into a lake of kerosine, Katsuki’s rage roared to life. His hands curled into fists so tight the wounds on his knuckles tore again, and blood seeped through the bandages.

“I’m coming, Izuku,” he hissed. “Just hang in there.”

☽ ☽ ᔓ ☾ ☾

Izuku quietly looked at the wedding invitation.

It was on parchment paper and printed in neat calligraphy. It was perfect. Exactly how he pictured his wedding invitations with Katsuki were going to be. Slowly, the ink on the page faded, and in Chisaki Kai’s place, Izuku saw Bakugou Katsuki written instead.

Unable to look any longer, Izuku put it down.

“Well, at least on the bright side, we’ll be here together now,” Ochako said from beside him. “It’s been nice having you around here, despite everything.”

Izuku returned her smile, letting it suggest agreement. But behind it, he understood with absolute clarity that when everything finally went up in flames, she could not be anywhere near.

The next two weeks blurred together for Izuku. Time passed in strange colors—flashes of laughter in blue, clinking glasses in green, and the soft lavender hum of low conversations that never seemed to include him.

Izuku sat with Zen and Tomura in the garden one afternoon. The winter sunlight bled pale orange across stone paths. The Chisakis lingered nearby, all talking. Kai’s hands were folded neatly behind his back, eyes warm with approval and eagerness.

When Zen and Tomura were pulled into a light conversation with Kurenai and Takeshi, Kai leaned down and whispered into his ear.

“I finally got you,” he said with amusement. “I’m looking forward to our wedding night very much.”

Izuku smiled back.

“I am too,” he said honestly.

After that evening came the meetings. Days of them.

The long table in the grand hall slowly became buried under swatches of cloth. Velvets, silk, cashmere. Soon the taste testing for the dinner menu was pushed through like it was a marathon. Every servant in the estate was worked to the bone to meet the two week deadline. Hundreds of invitations were stacking up to the sky as they finalized the guest list.

And the entire time, Chisaki Kai controlled the planning.

He chose the decor, the music, and even picked out special dance performances. His deep voice commanded the room, and every word he spoke came with an iron seal.

“The music has to be classical strings,” he said. “It needs to be as beautiful as Izuku.”

“The table decor? Black and viridian roses that are as close to Izuku’s eyes as you can get.”

“We’ll also need to make sure everything has a gold accent for my family’s colors. But I would also like to make sure there are deep emerald drapes. I want it to look like a nice blend of Izuku and I.”

Piece by piece, Chisaki crafted their wedding to be everything he ever dreamed of. Every detail filled his vision: an event that would look less like a marriage and more like a coronation. And Izuku, drowning in his grief, sat with a smile fixed so tight it burned.

The days continued to pass, but the weight in his heart didn’t. Every choice stripped something from him until all that remained was a name he didn’t want and a ring that glared like a shackle on his finger.

It wasn’t until two days before the wedding, Chisaki seemed to realize he was there.

He rested a hand on Izuku’s shoulder.

“I almost forgot about the cake,” he said with generosity. “I think you should pick the flavor. It can be anything you want.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Later, the kitchen was alive with heat and sweat. He walked in with Ochako into the symphony of the clatter of knives and the rhythmic scrape of sugar against metal bowls.

Izuku leaned against the marble counter with his sleeves rolled up. Thoughtfully, he watched the hundreds of chefs move like a well-oiled machine. He scanned the room, trying to find an opening that would work for his plan.

Ochako looked on too, bright-eyed as she scribbled notes on her clipboard.

It pained Izuku to think how pure she was in all of this.

After a while, a large man with round cheeks and a jovial grin approached them. The crisp white hat on top of his head marked him as the head chef. He bowed before Izuku before speaking.

“Do you have any flavors you prefer, sir?” He asked. “We need to make the batter tonight for a cake this size. We’ll be cooking it tomorrow evening.”

Izuku pursed his lips. He glanced around and his fingers tapped once against the counter. He turned to Ochako.

“What’s your least favorite cake flavor?” Izuku asked.

“Huh?” Ochako stared at him, confused. “Why does that matter?”

“I’m curious, that’s all,” Izuku replied easily. “I don’t have much of an idea, so I’m narrowing it down.”

Ochako gave it some thought. She hummed, tilted her head and tapped her finger on her chin.

“Hmm, okay. Probably matcha then,” she answered with an embarrassed chuckle. “I know a lot of people love it, but I don’t. It’s just so bitter to me, I never eat it.”

Izuku’s lips curved faintly. “Okay.”

No more than a few seconds later, Ochako politely excused herself to the bathroom. She sat her clipboard down and disappeared down the hall in a small hurry. Izuku waited until the sound of her footsteps disappeared completely. He turned to the head chef.

“Make the cake matcha flavored,” he said firmly.

That same night, Izuku stayed awake until he heard the estate ease into silence.

The lights went out one by one, servants went home, and the Chisakis retired to their separate private wings. Izuku’s eyes were wide open in the dark, fully adjusted. For a long moment, he lay still, listening for any sounds. He heard the soft ticking of the clock. The distant crunch of snow settling on the roof outside.

But more importantly, he heard the murmur of guards outside his door. Two, to be exact.

Slowly, he pushed himself up. The sheets slid against his skin as he moved, and he swung his feet off the bed soundlessly. His bare soles pressed into the cold floor as he rose and turned on all his stealth instincts. He crouched down low, holding his breath as he reached for the hidden items under his bed.

The jar was more than halfway full now, officially gathered over a month and several days.

He eyed the collection of smuggled chemicals under the moonlight. Exhaling quietly, he steadied himself the best he could. His fingers wrapped around the emulsifier first. Then the acid. Then finally, the DMSO.

One by one, he gently mixed them into the jar of venom.

Drop by drop and swirl by swirl, the toxin slowly transformed.

The liquid gradually glowed an unnatural green, as bright as a serpent's eye.

After completing his forbidden alchemy, he set the jar down and tip-toed to the double doors. He pressed his eye to the narrow crack. In front were two guards who were rigid and alert.

Izuku soundlessly drew back and glanced at the window. Beyond the frosted glass below was the courtyard garden, the same place Ochako loved to sit and read her books.

Working quickly, Izuku stripped the sheets from the bed and twisted them into a tight braid. His fingers moved with trained accuracy, knotting fabric until it became a long rope. He anchored it to the heavy bed frame, tested the hold once, then silently pushed open the window.

Cold air rushed in. It bit his skin as if it was warning him to turn back and think about what he was about to do.

Izuku gritted his teeth and grabbed the venom. He tucked the jar snugly under his arm and gripped the rope. He pushed all the clashing thoughts in his head to the side as he slid over the ledge, and descended. The entire way down, Izuku thought of Katsuki. He kept himself seeped in the memory of his husband to make sure his perspective never wavered. The sheets swayed with his weight, but his movements were expertly fluid.

When his bare feet touched the snow, he instantly moved. He crept inside the first floor, leaving behind a small puddle of wetness behind him.

Then suddenly, he heard footsteps.

There were three guards passing on patrol on the first floor.

With no hesitation, Izuku melted into the shadows. He pressed against the wall as they walked by, deadly green eyes glowing with lethal intent. The Yakuza guards sauntered ignorantly, laughing.

"Man, I'm so relieved we're getting back all our vacation days," One guard said.

The moment the coast was clear, Izuku moved fast. He slipped like a vengeful ghost through the halls, avoiding the pools of lamplight. He timed his steps with the creak of the old walls so his presence vanished beneath the sound.

When he finally reached his destination, his heart rate kicked up.

The kitchen doors pushed open without a sound.

Inside, warmth hit him like a comforting exhale. The faint scent of sugar lingered in the air, yet somehow all the counters were spotless. The staff cleaned up well, hiding the chaos of the cooking frenzies that’d happened. Izuku wandered a bit, ignoring the ticking of the clock in the room. It wasn’t until he got to the fourth refrigerator that he found what he was looking for.

Inside sat a massive bowl of cake batter.

The pale green shone under the moonlight.

Izuku sat the jar down. His reflection peered back at him on the venom’s surface. There was a new wrinkle on his face, and the shadows under his eyes were deeper. He’d aged nearly years —in less than two months. When did that happen?

Between the two items, his mind started to play cruel tricks again.

He half expected Hiryu’s ghost to appear and knock some sense into him. But he saw nothing. It was only him, and he couldn’t seem to shake the sudden onslaught of memories. And the longer he looked at the venom, the more he felt a pain in his heart for Tomura.

And he hated himself for it.

“You’re scared,” a familiar rasp whispered. “It’s okay.”

Izuku turned. His hands went ice-cold.

Standing in front of him was the vision of Katsuki. But unlike last time, he wasn’t lively. He looked like all the other ghosts now—dead. Blood matted his hair and face, and his clothes were saturated red. Dirt from the grave clung to him, and the rims of his eyes were raw from crying.

And at his center was the bloodied gunshot where Tomura shot him.

Izuku tried to piece together what this was. He always saw ghosts. He saw people as they were in their final moments. It was evidence of his guilty conscience. But the ghosts never spoke. They never morphed into visuals that could actually reach him—only Hiryu’s did that. So he tried to reason with his broken psyche: if Hiryu’s ghost was his instinct to survive, then what was Katsuki’s?

Only one, grim answer came to mind.

“You can do this,” the ghost encouraged sweetly. “Once it’s over, we can be together again.”

The phantom approached, and Izuku blinked away tears.

With the help of the ghost, Izuku poured the poison into the cake batter. It slipped down, making a bright green ribbon. He reached for the scoop of sugar nearby and added it generously. The grains twinkled like fading stars as they fell, steadily consumed into the thick mixture.

Then, painstakingly slow, Izuku stirred.

He folded death into sweetness until the two blended flawlessly.

And when he was done, Izuku stepped back and stared at the bowl.

There was no going back now.

The next morning, morning light spilled across the dining table for breakfast. The smell of freshly brewed coffee hung in the air, mingling with the steam rising from their food.

Izuku sat across from Chisaki. He kept his posture perfect and his hands folded neatly around a cup that had long gone cold. The shadows under his eyes were deeper, and he failed to hide his lack of sleep with makeup.

Chisaki, however, was alive with cheer. He hummed under his breath, flipping through the dinner plans and finalizing the menu. Every so often, he’d mutter something approving to himself. He’d tap the menu with a pale finger and nod, fully self-indulgent.

“Yes. Perfect,” he said. “This will be the best wedding this family has ever seen.”

Behind him, Ochako stood among the servants against the walls like protocol. Her brown eyes tracked everything and her forced smile remained in place.

Suddenly, the doors burst open with sudden brightness. Everyone’s head snapped to the entrance and in strolled the head chef. His cheeks were flushed from the kitchen’s heat and he flashed a large grin that was dripping pride.

Everyone craned their necks when from behind him, two assistants appeared.

They wheeled in a towering creation on a silver cart.

The room instantly became awe-struck. The cake was nothing short of a marvel. It was huge, five perfect tiers cloaked in deep velvety green that shimmered like gems. Pale gold scrollwork laced the sides like delicate vines, and jade-colored dust shimmered faintly under the light. And crowning it all were two viridian roses.

The chef clapped his hands together with satisfaction.

“Here it is!” he announced, voice booming with triumph. “One beautiful matcha cake!”

Everyone began to hum in delight and Chisaki Kai immediately gave his compliments. Other servants nodded happily at the glorious cake, and the two assistant chefs high-fived between themselves for their hard work.

However, while everyone else was distracted, Izuku and Ochako’s eyes met.

“It’s…matcha?” She asked, unsure.

But no one heard her besides Izuku. Guilt came in quickly and Izuku couldn’t look at her. His throat tightened as he swallowed. He kept his gaze on the table, trying his best not to crack under the heaviness in his chest. His fingers curled until his nails bit into his palm.

However, as he kept his eyes down, he missed the way Ochako glanced at him.

She frowned, tried to decode what was happening, and eyed Izuku uneasily.

Chapter End Notes

Lemme know what you think! Things are officially coming to a full peak 🥳 Next chapter is the big day :^D

Also super sorry for being so behind in responding to comments, I got super sick 🥹 I'm finally recovering after a long NyQuil coma but I have read and loved each and everyone one of your comments!! I smile with my coffee every morning reading every word ^^

Chapter 46 — Martellato

.

"Matcha was a wonderful choice!"

"I love the look of it. The flowers are an amazing touch."

"Damn. This is one of the most beautiful cakes I've ever seen."

Compliments on top of compliments piled high as the kitchen staff circled the towering confection.

Izuku and Chisaki were standing next to it, quietly agreeing. His soon-to-be husband lounged with casual poise, hands tucked into his suit pockets. His golden eyes swept the cake with cool detachment. He tilted his head, and a smile tugged at his lips.

"I'm glad I left the cake to you," he said cooly, cutting his eyes at Izuku. "Matcha was an excellent touch. It fits perfectly with the color scheme."

Izuku smiled thinly. “That was the goal.”

Chisaki patted his shoulder lightly and then began chatting with the head chef. They talked about logistics, and Izuku tuned out. He turned his head, searching for Ochako. But the longer he looked, he found she was not among the crowd.

A nervous twist settled in his stomach.

He shot a quick glance over his shoulder—no one was watching him. Quietly, he slipped away. He knew the cake flavor would be strange to her. He needed to get the situation under control and make it seem like it was just him being an oddball.

As he searched for her, he began rehearsing excuses in his head. He could tell her he hadn’t thought of another flavor. Or that matcha fits the theme, like Chisaki said. However, after he thought of all the excuses in the world, he still couldn’t find her.

The next servant he saw, he tapped on the shoulder.

The short man turned to him, bowed nervously, and quietly folded his hands.

“Is there anything I can help you with, Mr. Mamushi?” The servant asked.

“Yes,” Izuku said. “Do you know where Uraraka went?”

The servant blinked, surprised. “Oh. She left after the cake was revealed. She said there was an emergency with her family.”

Izuku froze.

She left? Just like that?

“My apologies, sir,” the man added quickly. “I thought she said she told you. Shall I send someone to retrieve her—”

“—No,” Izuku interrupted. “It’s fine. You’re right, she did mention it. Leave her be, please. I don’t want to disturb her family.”

“Are you sure? It really is no problem.”

“Yes, I’m very sure. Sorry for bothering you.”

Izuku promptly excused himself, leaving the baffled man behind. Thousands of thoughts began to race because something about Ochako’s sudden departure was wrong.

Rather than heading back downstairs, Izuku walked to his room. Once he was inside, his sharp eyes slid side to side. He examined the dresser, the vanity, and then double-checked the snake cage.

However, he found nothing. It all looked ordinary. Exactly how he left it.

Nevertheless, his gut was twisting.

He dropped to his knees and checked beneath the bed.

Immediately, his heart plummeted through the ground.

Sitting underneath his bed was his hidden notebook. It was covered underneath a sweater, completely non suspicious to any eye. He'd given the house cleaners orders not to touch his room, and they always respected his word.

However, Ochako sometimes still cleaned, out of kindness.

And now, his notebook looked touched. It was exactly an inch out of place from where he left it. And on top of that, the sweater he placed over it was crumbled entirely differently.

Izuku slowly rose to his knees, notebook in hand.

He swallowed and his nerves spiked.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The next morning approached, and Ochako called in. She informed everyone she was going to be late.

Chisaki asked Izuku if he wanted guards to retrieve her, but Izuku declined. In her place, another servant filled in. The man's name was Mr. Noboru. He was an older gentleman whose eyes were as calm as the ocean.

He'd been paying off a debt to the Chisakis all his natural life.

Mr. Noboru helped him prepare for the wedding. Together with the Chisakis, they reviewed the last details. The coordinated dances. The menu. The order of events and speeches. Izuku watched it all, absorbing the details, so he knew exactly how the last few moments of his life would go.

"Once the cake is cut, you'll move right into your first dance," Mr. Noboru explained. "After that, the floor will be open for everyone to join in."

Izuku nodded. He did the calculations. Since it was being ingested, the venom would spread slowly. First would come the stomach pains. Then, the acid would take over. It would gnaw through the gut lining and allow the venom to spill into the blood stream.

And from there, the shutdown would begin. Organ by organ.

Which meant that by midnight, the poison would claim anyone who ate a piece of the cake.

To quiet the unease curling through his chest, he returned to the choreography again and again. He lost himself to rehearsing the steps until his body moved entirely on muscle memory.

As he did this, he waited for Ochako to return.

He waited through the morning.

Then again into the afternoon.

However, by evening, he understood she wasn't coming back.

She'd seen his notebook. She must have. Had she pieced together the scribbles and the cake? Was she planning to tell the Chisakis? He braced himself for everything to collapse—yet nothing happened.

Maybe she simply ran. And though dread lingered, Izuku was content with that.

The further away she was, the safer she would be.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The rehearsal dinner lingered long into the evening.

The Chisakis and all their kin filled every seat at the table. Aunts, uncles, and cousins from all over flew in for the wedding. They raised their glasses to Kai again and again, congratulating him on his acquisition. Their voices boomed with pride, celebrating Kai for yet another successful merger. He truly earned the name Overhaul, his father said boastfully.

Izuku sat through it all, right next to his future husband.

His smile stayed fixed in place, while beneath the table the metal anklet dug against his skin.

When the last toast was given, the family rose to their feet. They put on their coats and scarves with bright smiles, voices spilling down the corridors like a powerful tide. They congratulated Kai one more time at the door, laughing loudly, eager to continue the night with drink and spectacle.

"C'mon!" One of the uncles barked, beckoning with a meaty hand. "Tomura! Zen! Come with us. We're going out on the town in Tokyo, and you'll both drink at our table tonight!"

Instantly, a grin split across Zen's face. He rose to his feet with the heat of sake already red in his cheeks.

"Of course!" He said, laughing so loud it rattled the silverware.

He grabbed his coat and followed the crowd out. But Tomura didn't move. He stood still and neatly folded his tattooed hands into his pants pockets. When Zen saw Tomura wasn't right behind him, he paused with one foot out the door.

He turned, confused. "You're not coming?"

Tomura shook his head. "I'll celebrate here, with him."

His chin tilted toward Izuku, who was still seated at the table.

Zen hesitated, the laughter clinging to his throat like surely that must've been a joke. But Tomura didn't laugh, and he didn't move. His steady gaze held firm showing that he was indeed serious. When Zen realized this, he huffed. With a shrug, he raised his hand in parting.

"Suit yourself," Zen muttered, slightly disapproving.

He didn't give more as he shut the door behind him. His voice blended into the rowdy chorus of the Chisaki family and then, all together, they faded away.

The house fell silent. There weren't many guards tonight and all the servants were given the evening off in preparation for tomorrow. The large estate, for once, now seemed as hollow as Izuku felt.

He glanced down at his ankle monitor.

"So," he said, voice edged with irony. "How exactly are we supposed to celebrate?"

Tomura crossed the room without hurry, allowing his steps to echo in the emptiness. He reached underneath the seat he was at for the rehearsal dinner—and he revealed a case of shochu.

Izuku blinked in surprise.

For once, Tomura's voice was soft, almost kind. "Like this."

ᔓᔓᔓ

The elevator chimed softly, carrying them to the highest room in the estate.

It was a space seldom used, with walls made entirely of glass. Through those portals, a perfect view of Tokyo's sea of lights. The endless neon blinked below, like the steady thrum of a heartbeat in the city that never slept.

For a moment, Izuku stood there, soaking in the giant metropolis he always called home. A bright blue and purple glow washed over his face, and he started to reminisce. He recounted all the different places he'd been across the world, yet somehow he always ended back here.

Always.

Tomura moved to the small cabinet against the wall. It was adorned with different vintage vinyl records. records. He chose one without looking too hard and placed it on the track. With casual ease, he grabbed two champagne glasses from the cart off to the side.

As he poured the shochu, the space filled with soft music.

"I won't bother you with a speech," he said, handing a glass to Izuku.

The silence that followed was easily familiar. Tomura always kept his thoughts close, leaving Izuku to guess at what could be running through his head. But tonight there was no need to wonder. Tomura was relaxed, sitting on top of the world, basking in his accomplishment.

He'd finally gotten everything he wanted.

After several glasses, they drifted to the floor, legs crossed before the vast window with their shochu in hand. Tomura leaned back on one arm, gaze soft as he traced it across the radiant skyline.

"You know," he murmured, almost wistful. "I think we've been over every inch of this city."

"Yeah," Izuku agreed, eyes roaming over the buildings he knew so well. "You're right."

"There," Tomura said, pointing to a narrow street lined with low buildings. "Remember that alley? It was one of the first Viper Seven missions we were on. The mark we were chasing almost got away because Aoyama tripped and fell into the middle of traffic somehow. He nearly got flattened by a truck."

Izuku's lips quirked. That memory was fairly humorous. "Yeah. I remember. You yelled at him for hours afterwards and put him on desk duty indefinitely."

Tomura chuckled. "It was the right thing to do." His eyes sharpened as he raised his glass again. "And over there," he said, pointing off into the eastern distance. "Your favorite ice cream shop is somewhere in that heap. You always asked me to take a break there, even on the coldest nights."

"I don't remember begging that much," Izuku retorted quietly. "But, they really do have the best ice cream."

Tomura's gaze lingered on him, eyes unreadable in the half-light. Then he gestured toward the western edge of the city, where the lights flickered like dying stars.

"And there. Your first assignment. You froze at first, but you did it anyway. That's when I knew…"

His voice trailed off, lost in the music.

Izuku swallowed.

That memory was horribly bittersweet. But still, it washed over him like the neon tide beneath them. He took another sip of shochu, welcoming the warmth to mingle with the ache of what had been and what was to come.

Tomura studied him. Izuku could feel the unspoken weight beneath his brother's eyes as he stared back: every memory they shared, every laugh and painful clash was documented in invisible footprints in the city below.

They sat like that for a long while. Music soft and the glasses warm in their hands.

For once, they seemed bare: just two brothers sharing a moment.

And then dull pain shot through Izuku's heart. It was horrible, wasn't it? Tomura had been there from the beginning, somehow both his greatest torment and his only lifeline. His brother stayed true to his word and kept him alive at all costs—but oh, how steep those costs had been.

And once more came the question. The one that haunted him, the one he'd never been able to decode.

If there was ever a night to ask, it was this one.

"Tomura," Izuku murmured, voice tight. "Can I ask you something?"

"Of course," his brother replied. "You can ask anything you want the night before your wedding."

Izuku's eyes fixed on Tokyo, searching for those towers of glass where they were raised.

"…Have you ever loved me?"

Silence fell. But Tomura's face betrayed nothing.

"Is there a reason you're asking me that?" He asked, tone sliding icy.

"I need to know if you've ever really loved me," Izuku explained, twisting his hands. He stared into the rippling drink as grief pressed its weight into his features. "Some days it feels like you might. Other days…I'm not so sure."

"And today is one of those days where you're unsure?"

Izuku shrugged, unable to find his voice.

Tomura sucked his teeth and let the pause stretch. "We don't have to do this, Izuku. There's no point in dissecting our emotions."

"I need an answer, Tomura," Izuku pushed. "I-If I'm going to go through with tomorrow—I need to know."

He looked up, and met his brother's gaze. He searched there, and he saw all the versions of Tomura from youngest to now. They all looked at him, giving absolutely nothing, and it made Izuku's heart ache.

"…I don't know," Tomura whispered.

The words took a while to settle.

They drifted there, three words that were not the three his inner child wanted to hear. He stared, trying to grasp it, but the uncertainty was too thick to see through.

“You don’t know?” Izuku whispered, pained.

“No. I don’t.” Tomura shrugged, as if too tired for this. “It’s hard to know what you feel when you don’t have anything to measure it against.” He gestured out to the city of Tokyo. “Look at how we grew up, Izuku. How would I ever know what love feels like? We weren’t even allowed to be affectionate.”

That made sense, Izuku supposed.

He deflated, feeling silly for asking that type of question to someone who Zen deemed to be the perfect Viper. Of course this was the answer.

Right as Izuku was about to accept that, Tomura swayed. He leaned forward and turned his whole body to Izuku. He met him head on, and there was a shift in the air. Tomura quietly put his glass down and folded his hands.

“But I guess, if you need an answer,” Tomura said in a strangely soft way. “On most days, I know I care for you.”

“…And on the others?” Izuku pressed.

“On the other days, I resent you.” His voice was flat, factual. “But that’s part of the job.”

Tomura continued, voice shifting to something close to a reluctant tenderness.

“There’s never been a moment I didn’t have to worry about you,” he explained. “I was seven and needed to figure out what you liked to eat. I needed to make sure you did your homework and trained. I even potty trained you. I did everything while no one did anything for me. Everyone else had a Big to guide them, but I only had you—and I couldn’t even make you stop crying. And when you cried, I was punished. So I resented you. Over and over.”

“…Sorry,” Izuku said, almost automatic.

“It’s fine.” Tomura leaned back and looked at Izuku in an almost fond way. “I eventually figured out how to make you stop.”

“You did?” He asked, surprised by the turn of the convo.

“Yeah. It took me a while. But, you liked being held.” A bitter edge crept into his tone. “Honestly, you being so soft is probably my fault, in an ironic way. I coddled you when we were kids. I knew I wasn’t supposed to, but hugging you was the only way to calm you until you fell asleep. You were too young to remember this I’m sure.”

Quietly, something called from the back of Izuku’s memory.

It was covered in thick, hazy fog and subtle as a distant lullaby. He stared at Tomura, trying to grasp onto it. The longer he did, the more clear it became.

“I…I think I remember a little,” Izuku said.

Tomura raised a brow. “Really?”

“Yeah.” Izuku nodded, and the memory took shape. “I remember you letting me sleep in your bed, reassuring me that there were no monsters in the closet.” He blinked, surprised. A faint smile touched his lips. “You said they were all out in the hallway, and if I kept crying, they’d come inside and hurt us.”

Tomura scoffed dryly. “Did I lie?”

“No. I guess you didn’t.”

Tomura took another long swig, bitterness twisting his mouth. The influence of alcohol was evident in his eyes, and Izuku realized this was the first time he’s ever seen his brother close to tipsy.

“Maybe that’s why I still get the urge to coddle you whenever you cry,” Tomura muttered quietly. “That’s the one weakness I can’t seem to shake.” He scoffed sourly, and swirled his drink. “The power of familial bonds, huh? They cling to your instincts so deeply, whether you want them to or not. It’s fate, really.”

And that was something Izuku couldn’t agree on.

Fate didn’t exist to Izuku anymore, it died with Katsuki. All that he could believe in was ripples of consequences passed down from one person to another.

Tomura gave him a look, as if he knew Izuku rejected his sentiments.

Slowly, his brother raised his glass, and held it out for a toast. Izuku followed and clinked their glasses. They leveled gazes, and an unnamed energy surged between them. They both drank, lifting the glass to their lips again.

As the burn hit his throat, the memory of Tomura shooting Katsuki showed itself.

It played again and again cruelly, reminding him that the person his inner child loved was the same one his adult self hated. And that was a duality Izuku needed to accept because Tomura was bound to the cycle he was seeking to destroy. His brother carved himself into its shape so completely that he could never be anything else, even with his weakness.

And though they shared a bond, there was no reality where both their visions of the future could coexist.

Tomorrow would decide which one of them would get their wish: the one who kept the wheel turning, or the one who broke it apart.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Morning came too brightly, as if the sun itself had no sense of the weight it illuminated.

The estate stirred awake with restless movement. Doors opening. Voices rising. Izuku heard the scrape of countless chairs and the shuffle of fabric below his bedroom.

He stayed in bed as long as he could, flipping through the photos of Katsuki.

No one came for him, likely letting him rest.

And as the day dragged forward, Izuku felt a heaviness stalk him.

It was a looming sensation that crept just beyond reach, lingering in the corners of his vision. It was subtle at first, hiding where the shadows were shortest. But as the hours passed, the shadows lengthened. They stretched across the ground, crawling toward him with patient inevitability.

The light dimmed by degrees and with it came a terrible certainty: when those shadows finally touched him, it would be for the last time.

It was not a feeling he found unfamiliar. He'd walked with it all his life, stood shoulder to shoulder with its presence. In the past, he'd only witnessed it and helped it close in on someone else. But this time was different.

This time the shadow chose him.

It wasn't until it was near dusk, did someone finally come and check in on him.

"Mr. Mamushi," Noboru called gingerly with a soft knock. "It's nearly time for you to get ready. We will be coming with your montsuki in ten minutes. Is that alright?"

"Yes, that's alright," Izuku replied. "Thank you."

With all his strength, Izuku pulled himself from the bed. Dusk orange kissed his cheeks through the window, painting his crestfallen face in beautiful hues of red, yellow and gold.

He patiently watched the sunset until there was no more light.

The shadows were officially here.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku sat on the edge of his bed, waiting and fiddling with his eternity ring.

The slow creak of the door broke the silence. He looked up, expecting Mr. Noboru. However, he froze in shock when it was Ochako. She eased herself through the door, alone and carrying his wedding garments. As she clutched the robes, on her face was a pale, pain stricken expression that weighed heavy on her eyes.

"Ochako—" Izuku stumbled to his feet, surprised. "Y-You came back."

Her eyes swept over him, lingering and retreating all at once. She forced a fragile smile.

“Hi, Izuku,” she whispered. Bowing low at the waist, she struggled to lift her gaze. “I’m sorry for disappearing. It won’t happen again.”

He stepped closer, bracing for her to confront him about what she knew. But she kept her eyes lowered and shifted away.

“Yes. Everything is fine,” she murmured, staring at her feet. “I only wanted to spend some time with them.”

“That’s good.” He tilted his head and twisted his fingers together. “I should explain about the cake—the matcha wasn’t to upset you. I thought it fit the green theme Chisaki wanted—”

Izuku frowned. “Are you sure?”

Her silence answered for her.

“I brought your montsuki,” she replied instead, her voice pitched too bright as she lifted the garments. “Let’s get you ready so we can stay on schedule.”

He hesitated and wanted to press more, but Ochako slipped past him without giving any leeway.

She began laying the silk robes out in order. Izuku watched her shoulders tense with every motion, unease tipping back and forth in his stomach. Her body language screamed what her lips refused to say, but he couldn’t risk exposing more than he already had.

So he yielded.

“…Alright,” he murmured.

They dressed in silence, opposite to the usual laughter they typically shared.

First, the black and gold hakama pants, then the crisp white under-layer came next. Soon the heavy silk layers wrapped tighter and tighter around him. The cloth squeezed his chest with every tie, locking him in. There was a brief moment of hesitance before Ochako cinched the obi around his waist. She kept her touch quick and careful, and the silence between them grew.

When she was done, Izuku stood before the long mirror.

The top of the montsuki was a white so bright it looked like the purity Chisaki always fetishized. Golden threads wove in and out across the silk, forming geometric flowers that shimmered only when the light caught them. Across the back blazed the pure gold crest of The Viper Academy—his mark of belonging.

And at his ankle was the golden ankle bracelet, tracker still blinking.

Ochako moved behind him. She began raking product through his thick hair and parted it neatly down the center. With a delicate hand, she brushed color across his cheeks, tinted his lips a deeper pink and traced a faint line to sharpen his eyes.

When she stepped back, her reflection lingered beside his.

He looked perfect. Like a true Yakuza spouse.

Their eyes met in the mirror, only for her to look away almost instantly, as if the weight of his gaze was too much to bear. Izuku pressed his lips into a thin line.

There was one more thing he needed to do.

“Ochako,” he called gently, “I wanted to give you something before the wedding begins.”

She frowned, confused. “You’re giving me a gift on your wedding day? Izuku, it should be me giving you something.”

He crossed the room without answering and paused at his dresser. From its surface he picked up a small, purple velvet bag. When he turned he gave her a tender smile and walked back to press it into her hands. When she didn’t immediately take it, Izuku folded her fingers around the soft pouch.

Her voice was unsteady. “Wh-What is this?”

“The jewelry the Chisakis gave me.”

Her eyes widened. Immediately, she tried to push it back into his hands, shaking her head. But Izuku anticipated this. He closed her hands firmly around the bag, insistent.

“It won’t be missed,” he promised. “I thought…maybe you could use it for your family’s debt. The gold necklace with the large square emerald alone is worth more than enough if you pawn it. Please, Ochako. Take it. Use it to get—”

Her cry cut him off.

He nearly jumped back, and his eyes went wild. Piece by piece, she broke down. The sound ripped out of her throat before she could stop it. Izuku froze when she collapsed into tears with her shoulders shaking violently.

“—Izuku,” Ochako cried. “I’m s-so sorry.”

Her face fell and Izuku’s heart dropped.

Through the tears, she placed the bag of jewelry off to the side. Instead, she cradled Izuku’s hands in her own as if she was trying to shield him from the world.

“I’m sorry I couldn’t do more,” she whispered through her sobs. “I’ve been trying to help, I’ve been trying so hard to make things feel lighter for you, but none of it can undo the pain they've put you through, can it? I thought I could keep doing this job, that I could stay neutral, but…"

She lifted her head and looked him in the eye.

"You're too selfless, Izuku. I can't stand by and pretend I don't know what you're about to do."

The fractured pieces of Izuku's heart ground against each other in his chest.

"I-I don't know what you mean," he deflected.

But she wasn't fooled.

She pushed, her eyes searched him as if she were reaching for the truth that sat against his tongue. He knew then that there was no hiding. She was as smart as he always knew, and this was the exact reason he tried to be as careful as possible around her.

"When I saw the cake," she admitted with shame laced in her words. "I thought it was some kind of cry for help. I can't explain why, but the look on your face when they showed it made me think something else was wrong. So I…I went through your room." Her voice shrank, ashamed. "I'm sorry. I know that was an invasion of your privacy, but I was worried."

She paused.

"I found your notebook."

Izuku's heart stopped.

"I thought it was a journal," she confessed brokenly. "I opened it to see if you were spiraling worse than I thought—but then I saw what you'd written inside." Her grip on his hands tightened, and she looked at him with wide, pleading eyes. "I know you're planning on poisoning yourself."

For a moment, he could only blink. Then, his face softened with a sadness too heavy to hide.

She didn't know the full scope of what he'd set in motion.

"I don't know when you're planning it, but please, don't," she begged, stroking his hand with shaking fingers. "The Chisakis aren't worth your life. I promise we'll figure something out. I already talked to my father—he thinks maybe, ma-maybe we can find a way to get you out. It's a long shot, but it's better than this. Please. Don't do this to yourself."

Her tears fell hot against his knuckles, and Izuku, almost against his will, tightened his hold on her hands.

"…Ochako."

"Please." Her voice filled with sobs. "Izuku, please don't. Don't."

His vision blurred, and he tried to hold it together. But his body betrayed him, as it always does. With a heartbreaking smile, his lips trembled with his next words.

“I’m sorry,” he rasped. “It’s too late.”

Pain struck across Ochako’s round face, making her lower her head as tears slipped free. Izuku turned away too, fighting back his own cries.

This wasn’t at all what he expected. But somehow, this was worse.

She clung to his hands stubbornly. Her tremors passed into him until they could no longer tell whose grief belonged to whom. Slightly desperate, Izuku’s gaze flickered around the room. One more time he searched for something—anything—else he could give her before it all went to waste.

Slowly, her crying subsided into soft sniffles.

Ochako wiped at her damp cheeks with her sleeve, and when she lifted her head, their eyes met again.

Through all the sorrow, there was an ember of light in her.

“I was worried you’d say something like that,” she said, her voice firmer now. She straightened, released his hands, and reached into her pocket. Without hesitation, she pulled out something small and pressed it into his palm. “Here.”

Izuku uncurled his fingers—and his breath caught. “Is this—”

“—the anti-venom.”

Izuku was speechless.

He stared at the vial made of amber glass, no bigger than half his palm. Its surface was marked with a simple label: mamushi. A scarlet cap sealed it, holding within the remedy to all the destruction that’d manifested from his broken heart.

“I spent all of yesterday trying to find it on the black market,” Ochako explained quietly. Her hand came up to close his fingers around the vial, her touch both firm and sorrowful. “It’s a triple dosage. Strong enough that even if you take it late, you’d still have a chance. A slim one—but a chance.”

Izuku’s mind was reeling. It spun and spun, circling back to the same truth: how unbearably kind she’d been to him.

Ochako lowered her head, as if there was nothing more left for her to give. Her eyes drifted toward the clock.

“It’s almost time.” She drew in a shallow breath before asking, “Do you want me…there at the wedding?”

The double sided tone made Izuku know what she was really asking.

“No.” The word faltered in his throat. “I want you to go home and be with your family.”

Pain filled her eyes, but she nodded.

“Okay.” She reached for the nearby table, gathering what little resolve she possessed. “Then let’s fix your makeup. You cried out all your eyeliner.”

When they stepped out of the room, Izuku carried the anti-venom in his hand while Ochako clutched the velvet bag to her chest. Both of them were composed on the surface, but their silence swelled with everything said.

Together, they descended the stairs toward the foyer, where voices and footsteps stirred in restless anticipation. Just before the noise could swallow them, they stopped short. They lingered for a while in the quiet pocket between worlds.

Izuku turned to her. “Thank you. For everything.”

Ochako’s lips pulled into the gentlest smile she could muster. “And the same for you.”

She bowed low, as if pressing the farewell into the marrow of her bones. When she rose and turned away, the motion dragged with a sorrowful gravity. Much like someone retreating from the shore while the tide pulled a stranger under. She wanted to reach back and save him —but she possessed no raft to offer and no rope strong enough to pull him free.

So Izuku stayed where he was, alone in the undertow.

He looked down at the vial glinting in his palm.

She’d given him a choice that only he could decide: swim or drown.

But he knew the truth. He drowned long ago.

“Are you ready?” Tomura’s voice cut in, a little too close.

Izuku jolted, nearly dropping the vial.

He tightened his fingers around it before turning. Like an ever-present shadow, his brother stood there. He was dressed in a tailored black suit with his hair tied back with a strip of red string.

“I am,” Izuku answered quickly, forcing steadiness into his tone. “I’m just taking a moment to gather myself before the big event.”

Tomura inclined his head, accepting the excuse. “Understandable. We’ll wait here a little longer. But not too long, alright? Take a deep breath, and you’ll be fine.”

Izuku nodded, throat dry.

Tomura leaned against the wall and pulled out his phone. As he typed, Izuku's palms dampened with sweat. Carefully, he slid the vial into his pants' pocket, praying Tomura's attention stayed elsewhere. When he seemed in the clear, he exhaled and began silently counting backwards from ten.

In the lull, he studied his brother.

Tomura was dressed in the ever famous Yakuza Black Tie Attire: black suit, silver tie, and black leather shoes polished to perfection. To top it off, his twin machetes rested across his back in their usual X—the perfect mix of fashion and intimidation.

His silver rings encircled his fingers, the king cobra one was recently polished, and his piercings and tattoos caught the light in a way that made him seem more threatening than usual.

For a second, Izuku tried to commit it all to memory. This version of Tomura might be the last he ever saw.

Tomura's eyes lifted. He frowned and sighed through his nose.

"Forever the crybaby," he muttered, annoyed.

Izuku stiffened as Tomura reached out. His thumb brushed away a tear Izuku hadn't realized fell. Their gazes met, and Izuku's nerves strained under the weight of it. Suddenly, Tomura stepped forward, eyes unreadable and contemplative.

Then without warning, Tomura did something he hadn't done since Izuku was thirteen.

He hugged him.

The embrace shocked Izuku to his core. His whole body went stiff, and a roaring clash of emotions ruptured inside of him. Under the turmoil, the world fell away. He didn't feel inside the Chisaki estate anymore, but rather back home at The Viper Academy in their old room.

A vulnerability he never could shake with Tomura came running forward. It pulled him to lean in as his brother's arms cradled him closely. Izuku tried to fight it. He tried to resist. He wanted to remain angry until the bitter end. But, he couldn't.

He was only human at the end of the day.

With trembling arms, Izuku hugged his brother back and melted into the embrace. They both stayed there suspended in time for a generous minute.

How cruel, Izuku thought. His brother chose this moment, of all moments, to be the softest he's ever been.

When Tomura pulled away, he rested his eyes on Izuku's face.

He tucked the stubborn curl behind Izuku's ear.

"It's time to go, little brother."

Leather gloves, tightened. Holster, snapped shut. Boots, zipped.

Katsuki loaded his third gun with a hard snap and locked it into place at his hip. The chest holster came next. He pulled it taut across his chest, the weight of knives and guns pressed against him like they were his old companions.

Without hesitation, he tossed back three high-dose painkillers.

The bathroom mirror stared back at him. He was dressed head-to-toe in black tech gear, pockets teeming with ammo, blades, and slim trackers for when their plan inevitably went to shit. Taking a large inhale, Katsuki adjusted a strap and straightened his spine.

His limp was officially gone, which meant his body mended well enough to be thrown into the fire again.

He strode through the halls of The Company's Yokohama headquarters. Every glance that landed on him caught the mean sneer etched across his mouth.

In the past two weeks, everyone dug their heels into preparing.

Shinsou sharpened his blades. Monoma drilled himself in the shooting range. Sero ran hand-to-hand combat drills with Miruko until both their knuckles bled.

And lastly, Denki buried himself in hacking. He acquired multiple stolen files through cracked accounts. He pulled everything they needed: floor plans, a wedding program, and a detailed map of the nine circles of Hadeus from Yakuza servers.

All of it funneled toward one purpose: get Izuku out, alive.

Katsuki pushed into Aizawa's private ops room. The air was already thick with the smell of gun oil. A large, long steel table was in the dead center, and their entire teams circled around it. Everyone was homed in, checking weapons and syncing phones.

Aizawa glanced up, and within a second took two strides towards him.

"Make sure you don't lose these," he said sternly as he placed an earpiece into Katsuki's hand followed by a signal tracker.

Katsuki nodded, snuggly fit the earpiece in place, and pinned the tracker to his holster.

"We won't stand out too much in this, will we?" Sero asked.

He flexed his gloved fingers and eyed everyone's black tactical get up.

“Where you’re going, you’ll blend in fine,” Aizawa replied. “Just remember to keep your weapons hidden. Don’t point them at Yakuza personnel until the moment is right. This is an extraction. Not a war.”

“I beg to differ,” Monoma muttered while adjusting the silencer on his pistol.

“Hey,” Miruko barked. She pointed up to the screen on the wall. “Izuku’s tracker is officially on the move.”

Everyone glanced up to see the projected map. The tiny blinking green dot was in fact moving, at a fast pace—directly towards Hadeus. Katsuki’s eyes narrowed in, struggling to look away as Izuku’s signal moved further and further into the heart of the city.

“Alright, everyone—set your watches,” Aizawa ordered. “Things are officially in motion. We’re going to review the plan one last time.”

Aizawa pressed a small clicker in his hand. The massive screen dominating the wall split into two. One side showing Izuku’s location, and the other flooded the room in a cold, blue light.

A 3D render of Hadeus appeared on the screen. It rotated slowly—showing all nine circles in their glory.

“Starting at the surface,” Aizawa said, sweeping the room with his gaze. “You all will descend with the crazy crowds. This wedding isn’t only a family affair—it’s a spectacle that’s drawing a lot of attention. People from the Tokyo underground scene will be there along with other big players from across the country. Everyone is there to show support for the Yakuza Heir securing his legacy.”

Miruko leaned forward and tapped the screen where the top circle gleamed.

“The parade kicks off in Limbo, the first circle,” she said. “It winds all the way down to the Ninth, where the ceremony and reception are locked behind guarded doors. From here, only those invited will be allowed in. The rest of the crowd will scatter back up, drinking and celebrating.”

Shinsou frowned deeply. “So every level is going to be jammed?”

“Packed shoulder-to-shoulder,” Miruko grinned, feral. “But that works in our favor. It’ll be easy to vanish in crowds like that, unlike last time.”

Aizawa pointed to the map again. “Bakugou, Sero, Shinsou, Monoma—you’re the ground team. Your job is to stay close to the parade and get eyes on Izuku. Then you’re going to find a way inside that reception.”

The map zoomed down to the Ninth circle and floor plans appeared in clean cut lines.

The ceremonial hall was perfectly laid out alongside the banquet chamber, and all the exits were marked in red.

Katsuki’s stare locked onto the glowing green marker for Izuku’s seat.

His heart pulled towards it.

Aizawa continued, “Intel from Chisaki Kai’s personal assistant’s emails says the Heir is planning to leave immediately after the reception. He has a private jet set for an unknown destination. If Izuku boards that plane—we lose him. Forever.”

Sero shifted uneasily. “Er. I’m still not sure how we’re supposed to break into the ceremony room.”

“We’ll figure it out,” Katsuki said flatly. His eyes burned holes into the seat marked for Chisaki Kai. “There’s always a way in.”

“Bakugou’s right,” Aizawa confirmed. “I trust you four to improvise. But once Izuku’s in your hands, it’s all going to go to shit. The Yakuza will come down on you hard and that’s when you all need to run like hell.”

The map expanded outward again. Two bright trails in the colors orange and green shot upward through the spiraling undercity. They weaved across multiple floors around buildings, roofs, and stairs until they broke to the surface of Tokyo.

“This is where the split happens. Team A.” Aizawa pointed to the orange line. “And Team B.” He dragged his finger to the green line.

“Team A will be Shinsou, Sero, and Monoma,” Miruko said. “You’re the decoy team. Monoma, you’ll wear the disguise. The second you have Izuku, take his clothes and bolt. Hopefully this makes the Yakuza chase you and all you need to do is lose them. Your job is to keep running until you hit the surface. I’ll be waiting at your exit with the car. We’re going straight back here to Yokohama.”

Aizawa clicked again and the screen began to follow the flow of the green line.

“Team B is going to be the real extraction,” Miruko explained. “It’ll be Izuku and Katsuki. The moment you split, strip Izuku of anything identifying. You won’t have a lot of time, but get a hoodie on him and keep his face down in the crowds.”

“Bakugou,” Aizawa said, eyes meeting him. “When you surface—I’ll be there waiting with a vehicle.”

Katsuki nodded once, sharply. He turned his eyes back on the glow green route on the screen, burning the path into memory.

“Alright!” Sero cracked his knuckles with a smile. “I think I got it. This is going to be a piece of cake.”

Monoma tsked at Sero. “This seems like a piece of cake to you?”

“Sort of,” Sero replied with a toothy grin. “It reminds me of when we went to South Korea to help rescue that gangster’s daughter. It was on a smaller scale, but very similar. I remember that being a bit of a breeze.”

“It was a breeze because you were on clean-up, not ground ops,” Monoma deadpanned.

Shinsou snorted next. “Yeah, that extraction nearly went to hell.”

“Extractions rarely go smoothly,” Aizawa added, dead serious. “But that’s why you’re all going to stay on your toes and communicate, got it?” He tapped the ear piece on the side of his head. “Make sure to give active updates and if you need help—signal.”

Denki, stationed at the tracker console, waved. “I’ll try my best to assist along the way! I’ve got eyes on everyone from here and I figured out the IPs for a lot of Yakuza devices. If anything goes sideways, I’ll guide you or reroute you—whatever it takes. Just make sure not to lose those GPS trackers.”

Miruko’s gaze swept over all of them, stopping at each pair of determined eyes. “Everyone knows their role. Stick to the plan. Keep your cool. Do not improvise and do not play the hero.”

Everyone nodded then began to gather the last of their gear. When the final gun was secured, Aizawa turned to Katsuki.

The room stilled. All eyes shifted to them.

Aizawa’s hand landed gently on his shoulder. “Are you ready, kid?”

Silence hung for a second.

Katsuki’s jaw locked. His muscles strained. The pressure inside him began building.

Every beat of his heart was pounding, begging to get back to where he called home in Izuku’s arms.

In the back of his mind, he could see him. His lover was waiting for him in the dark shadows, trapped in black fog that wrapped around his wrists and throat. Izuku was stranded there, slowly getting swallowed whole by the darkness as he glanced over his shoulder.

Katsuki curled his fist.

He lifted his head and his eyes gleamed like the edge of a knife.

“I’m ready,” he hissed.“Let’s go crash that goddamn wedding.”

Tokyo moved with a different appetite tonight, rumbling with a hunger so dark it seemed the neon itself fed on blood.

Red and violet lights pulsed over the throng, cutting through the cigarette smoke that clawed skyward. Every street funneled toward the underground like a vast throat, and down it spilled every type of predator: gang bosses draped in heavy coats, assassins wearing their knives like ornaments, women flashing diamond-capped teeth, and men whose katanas caught the city's light as carelessly as a pinky ring.

And above it all hung the blood moon.

The city felt less like Tokyo and more like a marketplace for spirits dredged from the abyss. It was as if they were all monsters allowed to walk unmasked for a single night, basking in the glow of that burning orange eye overhead.

"Holy shit," Sero breathed, eyes blown wide. "What did we walk into?"

"Hell," Monoma answered, folding his voice down. He drew his bandana higher across his nose. "Don't gawk at anyone too long—they'll definitely punch you."

The four of them moved as one, keeping close in the crush of bodies. The current of the crowd was slow but relentless, forcefully sweeping them through alleys that funneled into the familiar part of Hadeus. Buildings Katsuki recognized loomed ahead.

Blood sprayed across the pavement when a shove escalated into a knife fight. They quickly moved out of the way when the crowd closed in and swallowed the altercation whole.

A sequence of firecrackers set off in the distance and the sound was followed by the roar of the crowd surging louder for the ceremony to come.

Katsuki's eyes cut through the press of bodies. Past the sea of faces, he found what he was looking for: a familiar blacked-out club front.

"That one," he said to the group. "The public elevator is in there."

He gave a sharp glance and signaled the others. They all angled toward it, carefully weaving through the rambunctious crowd.

When they breached the club, the darkness grew deeper. The crowd was only thinner by a damn hair, but Katsuki kept his focus. He pointed to the back, where everyone was heading. Batch by batch, people spilled down into the dark elevator, alcohol and drinks in tow.

When it was finally their turn, they gave the password 'inferno' and were shoved in with two other groups.

Katsuki fixed his stare dead ahead while the others let their eyes flick warily around the cage as it sank. Three full minutes ticked by, and the bottom never came. The churn of chains and the drone of machinery scraped at the silence. Shinsou, Sero, and Monoma traded unsure looks.

Then the elevator stopped with a rattle that shook through their bones.

With a mechanical groan, the doors stretched open.

Sound exploded against them immediately. The deep bass of drums. The clammer of voices overlapping.

Others pushed past them, shouting at their friends in the distance. Everyone else began walking off the platform, but the four of them stood at the railing looking at the sea of commotion below.

Thousands of people packed the underground streets, making the crowd above seem like child's play. The air reeked of liquor and banners stamped with the Shie Hassaikai crest draped from every building. Infinite voices clashed and roared over the pounding of taiko drums as the crowd grinned with unrestrained joy.

Katsuki glanced at his friends.

Everyone was taking in the enormous black pillars. The bridges that hung between the columns were bustling with people hollering with grins. And at the ground level, every building was cast in darkness and bright neon lights. But unlike last time Katsuki saw it, the colors of plum and indigo were absent.

Now it was a dazzling crimson, gold, and bright silver filling every nook and cranny.

Katsuki folded his arms as the cold air licked his skin. Beside him, Monoma leaned forward against the rail, wide-eyed with disbelief.

"Holy shit…" Monoma whispered, leaning to look up at the high ceiling. "Has this been down here this whole time?"

"Only the last five years," Katsuki corrected. "The Shie Hassaikai built this with the help of Tomura. According to Izuku, this was the first step of Tomura getting his foot in the door with Chisaki."

Shinsou gave a low, impressive whistle.

"Hey guys," Sero said, pointing to the far side. "I think over there is where the parade is going to be."

At the dead center of Limbo stretched a wide avenue strung with lanterns. Red and gold light bled into the atmosphere, bouncing against the stone walls and painting the faces of the crowd. From here, Katsuki could see that was where the sea of bodies was most dense. Countless bodies were pressed into two neat rows that left a long, clear aisle.

It ran straight down to the massive staircase that led into the circle below.

Katsuki pulled his bandana over his mouth and his eyes darkened.

"Let's go."

The four of them shoved shoulder to shoulder through the crowd, swallowed by a tide of sweat, perfume, and sake. Lantern light swung overhead, casting everything in molten red while the deafening boom of drums rattled through their chests. The percussion got louder the further into the dense crowd they pushed, making their ribs feel like hollowed out wood.

Katsuki grimaced. He pulled his bandana tight over his mouth, trying to avoid getting elbowed in the face. But it was damn hard. Every step he took someone stepped on his foot. Or elbowed him in the side.

“Shit,” Sero muttered, wiping sweat from his brow. “Feels like the whole damn country is here.”

“That’s because it is,” Shinsou hissed, his mouth drawn tight. “Seems like the Shie Hassaikai want every witness they can get for their successful acquisition.”

With one final shove, they broke through to the railing.

Katsuki dragged in a breath, sharp and thin, as they pressed against the cold metal. On the other side, Yakuza guards formed a black wall. Intimidating rifles strapped across their chests and sharp Katanas perched on their backs. Their mean eyes scanned the masses like wolves pacing a pen.

The four of them straightened into a row, shoulder to shoulder. They stared down at the empty avenue carved through the chaos.

Monoma looked down at his watch. “Should be starting right about—”

Suddenly, a sharp boom cut through the air.

“…Now,” Monoma finished in a whisper.

The lanterns overhead dimmed all at once, plunging the crowd into a restless hush. Every head tilted upward, waiting. Then—one gong strike. It was low, thunderous, and so deep it snapped the chaos into silence.

A wave of cymbals followed, shattering the stillness. Flutes trilled upwards above the roar that began to swell in the crowd. The lanterns flickered, stuttering like dying stars, then they exploded back to life in a blinding blaze of gold.

A chilling perfect choir of voices cut through the air and the music began.

Dancers poured into the aisle in gleaming silks. The first line spun and bowed as the crowd erupted into unruly cheers. Their golden sleeves rippled like banners in the glow. Every step they took was measured. Every smile was bright as they traced perfect circles and lines that twinkled in the haze.

Behind them came a row of drummers. Their headbands were tied and their bare arms snapped with every strike as the rhythm deepened.

The dancers multiplied. One row. Then two. Then three. They kept coming until the entire street overflowed with leaping figures. The upbeat music rang louder as their sleeves cracked like ribbons in the air.

“Wow,” Sero muttered under his breath as a whirl of masked dancers appeared.

Hundreds of porcelain masks of foxes, demons, and faceless ghosts appeared. The contemporary dancers swayed and enticed, keeping their movements sharp as their feet slapped in rhythm to the rolling drums.

Then the first carriage thundered in.

Drums boomed. Cymbals clashed. And the shouts of the crowd surged into a frenzy.

A palanquin swayed forward, carried high on the shoulders of sweating men.

Off of it draped gold silk and it was made of polished wood. The carriage shone under the golden lanterns as if it were worth more money than the entire country. Fire-breathers flanked the carriage, spitting plumes that burned blue against the underground dark. The smoke danced over everyone's heads before vanishing into the underground's endless height.

Inside sat a man and woman. Their faces were sharp, proud, and eerily perfect.

One glance was all Katsuki needed to know that they were Chisaki Kai's parents. He'd know that fucking crow-like bone structure anywhere. He could see Kai inherited his infuriating apathy from his father and that smug smirk from his mother.

The two elders sat perfectly cross-legged, waving to their adoring masses. All the while, the crowd roared their approval. Confetti rained from the towers above like colored snow, catching in the crowd's hair as the palanquin drifted by on a tide of celebration.

Then came the dragon dancers.

Bright bursts of red, gold, and green exploded into the street. The dragons leapt, coiled, and snapped their jaws. Their eyes glowed in a strangely enchanting way as their tongues flickered. The three dragons made shapes that caused people to scream in delight and the plastered drunks to raise their drinks in reckless abandon.

When one came near, its massive head passed so close that Katsuki could feel the hot brush of air.

"This is massive," Sero murmured, unsettled. "I don't think I really grasped how much influence the Yakuza held until now. Like I knew, but I didn't know."

"Yeah," Monoma replied, pale and quiet. "Talk about insane."

The second carriage rolled in.

It was painted deep black and mimicked spilled oil.

Katsuki looked at who was inside and a visceral, violent reaction detonated inside of him.

Chisaki Kai sat within. His hair was slicked back, and his wedding robes were impeccable. He wore what looked like a stupidly expensive montsuki made entirely of silk. It was black and gold with echoes of the Shie Hassaikai's emblem stitched into it. His hand raised in a lazy wave as if the entire world existed only to worship him.

Behind them, the crowd shrieked, and hundreds of arms began reaching towards Chisaki.

The smug tilt of Chisaki's mouth made Katsuki itch.

He clenched his jaw so tight it hurt.

"Tear his goddamn throat out," Katsuki's anger hissed inside of his head. "He took your mother, and now he's trying to take Izuku too."

His chin tilted down and murder filled his eyes.

Then the music shifted. The steady thunder of drums slithered into something darker and more venomous.

Out marched the Vipers, armed with guns and weapons. They strolled in rows so precise they looked inhuman. Their steps were perfectly in sync as one, and their formation was too clean to the point it sent uncanny chills down Katsuki's spine. Their suits mirrored the Yakuza's formality, but their colors marked the difference: black and silver.

Between them writhed dancers whose bodies bent like things without bones. Their arms curled into serpentine coils and their masks were painted with dripping fangs and forked tongues. Behind them loomed a float—a colossal snake effigy with black scales. It had glass-green eyes and smoke hissed from its gaping jaws.

And there, in the center, Katsuki saw him.

"That's Tomura," he whispered in a low tone. "The one with the machetes strapped to his back."

He jerked his chin towards the bastard and all of the others' eyes followed.

Tomura stood tall, marching in the middle with an older man who matched his eye and hair color. The elder man beside him waved and grinned, basking in the loud cheers and hollers. But beside him, Tomura didn't take part. His eyes were lifeless per usual, but there was a sense of calm inside of them.

Katsuki could tell. The heartless bastard was enjoying this.

"Holy shit, that's the guy?" Sero hissed. "He's scary as fuck."

"The Horned Viper suits him," Shinsou said. "I don't think I've ever seen so many tattoos on one person."

Abruptly, Tomura's cut throat eyes slid right towards them.

Katsuki instantly hid his face beneath the brim of his hat, pulse spiking so violently it hurt. The noise of the parade bled out, drowned by the heavy fear of being seen too soon.

Seconds dragged like chains. Finally, he risked a glance. He looked up to see Tomura had marched past without stopping. The parade carried him deeper into the sea of silver and black without so much as a backward glance.

Katsuki exhaled shakily, his shoulders loosening. But the relief was hollow. His gut was roiled with guilt and bile rose in the back of his throat. No matter how tightly he clenched his teeth, the guilt sat there reminding him of all his mistakes.

And then—a sudden silence. The rumbling crowd died down for a moment, and all the shouts were replaced with whispers and awes.

The final float emerged.

It was a carriage draped in pale silk, glowing as though it carried a precious gem. And when who was inside came into view, Katsuki's heart stopped.

It was Izuku.

He sat on viridian cushions, perfectly framed. He was dressed in a white and gold montsuki. The fabric shimmered like sunlight on water. The robes cinched at his waist and his hair was sculpted into a style Katsuki had never seen, every strand tamed until he looked like a doll.

Somehow, Izuku looked beautiful and devastating all at once.

The crowd broke into cheers as white and red petals rained down in waves. Drums thundered, flutes screamed, and confetti spun through the air like falling stars.

But all Katsuki could see was Izuku.

"We have eyes on the target," Shinsou said, finger pressing against the comm at his ear.

Aizawa's voice crackled through the line, "Good job. How's it looking down there?"

"Crazy," Shinsou replied. "You wouldn't believe how big this place actually is."

Katsuki didn't even realize he'd moved until Monoma's voice barked behind him. He was already tearing through the sea of bodies, hugging the railing. He shadowed the line of men carrying Izuku's carriage with his heart hammering impossibly fast. Every beat of the drums fell in perfect sync with the frantic rhythm in his chest.

If he could get Izuku to see him. One glance—that was all it would take. Just one. Then Izuku would know he was here. He'd know this goddamn nightmare was almost over.

Izuku's eyes swept the crowd slowly. Then they locked gazes.

Katsuki's lungs seized and the world stopped cold. For a heartbeat, he swore he saw a flicker of recognition.

And then—

Nothing.

Izuku's gaze stayed tethered to his, but there was no warmth. There was no relief and not even an inkling of surprise. His eyes were out of focus, flat, and blank. Cold green eyes sliced through Katsuki like glass.

Katsuki stopped moving.

An unnerving chill ripped up his spine.

Izuku's eyes never changed. He gazed at Katsuki like he was an omen. And then something darker seeped in. It was disconnected, calculating, and destructive.

Then gradually, Izuku tore his eyes away and stared ahead with empty obedience. More rose petals poured down on him and into the crowd.

Katsuki stayed frozen in place.

"Hey!" Monoma's hand clamped down hard on his shoulder, jerking him around. "Don't wander off like that, Bakugou! The hell got into you?!"

But Katsuki barely heard him. His eyes stayed locked on the fading outline of Izuku's carriage. When Izuku finally vanished into the procession, Katsuki turned his head back towards his unit. They all stared at him like he lost his head, and a knot choked his throat.

"…Something's wrong," Katsuki rasped, voice grave. "Izuku was…off."

"Well, no shit," Monoma shot back in a harsh whisper. "He's been forcefully sold off to the Yakuza as some sort of fucking bride. Of course he's off."

Katsuki shook his head, sharp and desperate. "No. You don't get it." His voice cracked with a terror he couldn't mask. "It wasn't that. His eyes—" He swallowed hard and all the color drained from his face. "They were empty. It—it was weird. He saw me and he didn't react."

That unsettled everyone.

Uneasy glances passed between the others.

"At all?" Shinsou asked quietly.

"Not at all," Katsuki confirmed.

The roar of the crowd swelled. The cheers multiplied, the petals tripled, and the thunderous applause swelled louder. The parade blurred into a maelstrom of noise and color, surging forward towards the grand staircase that led deeper into Hadeus.

"C'mon," Monoma commanded, pulling their focus back. "We have to stick tight to the parade. We can't let Izuku out of our sight."

Everyone nodded, adjusting to the current of the crowd. Katsuki followed along, keeping close to his crew. However, he couldn't shake the unnerving feeling that Izuku's eyes gave him.

That hollow, lifeless stare clawed at his throat, gnawing at him with every beat of the drums.

The four of them pressed onward, shoving through the rowdy crowd as the parade siphoned deeper into Hadeus. As they descended, the air grew heavier, and the neon glow from the underground city transformed into sharp streaks of red and gold. The energy from the crowd didn't die down either. It amped up, growing more and more boisterous as they dropped from the first circle and then to the second.

When they reached the belly of the third circle, the green lights shone down on the parade brightly.

"Hey guys," Denki crackled through the line. "Your intercoms are about to go out when you reach the fourth circle. I'll still be able to see your trackers, but you're about to go dark with us."

"Got it," Monoma replied, holding down the com button. "We'll be sure to communicate the moment we re-breech."

"Don't die down there," Miruko replied.

And like expected, the moment they reached the fourth circle, the intercoms went dead. For a heartbeat, Katsuki could feel the tick of dead seriousness in their crew. If things hadn't become real before, they were now. Katsuki drew himself up, shoulders rigid.

"No mistakes now," Shinsou muttered. "Everyone stay sharp."

Katsuki's jaw tightened. Sero's hands flexed. Monoma's eyes narrowed.

The parade surged forward, and finally, the procession approached the opening to the ninth circle. In the large foyer, hundreds of bodies pressed together. Everyone stopped in front of two massive black doors made of obsidian. They loomed ahead, towering taller than anything Katsuki had seen.

The parade crinkled on itself, and the dancers mixed with the crowd. The Yakuza guards build a wall again, allowing the carriages to separate a healthy distance from the masses.

Through the hundreds of bodies, Katsuki shakily could only get a glimpse of what was happening ahead.

The people in the carriages walked out, waving at the crowd. First, the Chisakis. They smiled and like a mirror, all their adoring underground masses waved back.

Chisaki Kai walked over to the carriage holding Izuku and stretched out his hand.

Delicately, Izuku emerged. He walked off the carriage and was helped upright. His mouth was forced into a small smile as he looked on to the crowd. He waved back as well, causing swoons to ricochet from person to person.

All the cheering made Katsuki sicker and sicker.

Because, Izuku's eyes were dull. And nobody seemed to notice.

Chisaki and Izuku stood side by side flanked by a phalanx of Yakuza and Vipers.

With a loud creek, the grand doors to the ninth circle opened, swinging wide like they were the gates of hell.

An eerie, almost poisonous green light poured out from beyond the threshold.

Around four hundred people walked forward, showing something in their hands. From this distance, Katsuki could only make out what appeared to be invitations printed in black, gold, and green. The armed guards ushered inside, one by one, every person who held an invite.

Those without invites began slowly retreating back into the upper circles. They continued on celebrating, as if this was a national holiday for the Tokyo Underground.

Katsuki's gaze flicked to Izuku.

The other man was still standing rigid beside Chisaki Kai.

Katsuki's heart pounded, and every instinct screamed: get in there, now. Fury simmered in his veins. It spilled into his lungs until every breath felt like goddamn fire.

When the last guest walked inside, it was then Chisaki and Izuku's turn. Together, they passed over the threshold, and the grand doors slowly closed.

Izuku took one last glance over his shoulder into the crowd.

Their eyes met.

For a brief, painful breath, it felt like the world narrowed to that single, impossible connection.

They didn't break contact as the doors slid shut, swallowing Izuku whole.

"Attention wedding dancers and entertainment!" A sudden voice boomed.

All eyes turned to a large yakuza guard with a giant 'mom' neck tattoo. He stood tall with a megaphone, bringing the clamoring crowd to a low murmur.

"If you're scheduled to perform later, proceed upstairs to the eighth floor as instructed! Come back here at the required time after the wedding ceremony is finished for the reception."

Katsuki's gaze snapped to Monoma. Their eyes locked and the same thought struck them both.

The mass began to shift again, a tide of performers drifting up the wide staircase. Those not scheduled to return, peeled away entirely. They vanished into the crowd with drunken laughter and celebratory shouts.

The rest broke off at the eighth circle, filing into an empty plaza bathed in neon haze.

Keeping low, Katsuki's crew shadowed them.

They slipped into the cover of a nearby building. From there, they watched as drummers, acrobats, fire-breathers, and exactly one dragon collapsed into the street outside a roaring bar.

With a loud huff, the dragon's painted silk covering sagged to the ground and revealed the four sweaty dancers underneath. One wiped his brow with the back of his hand, another hacked out a cough, a third squatted with a groan of relief. But the last stood tall, hands braced on his hips, not winded in the slightest.

"Shit, man, my feet are killing me," one groaned.

"Same," another muttered. "It took forever to get all the way down here."

The upright dancer leveled a stern look at them. "We need to practice."

His words drew a chorus of groans. The others stared at him like he'd lost his mind. Some other dancers nearby laughed, excused themselves, and drifted toward the bar. Three of the dragon dancers glared after them with equal parts jealousy and frustration.

"Really, Mori? Again?" one of the teammates protested. "We've gone over this a hundred times."

Mori huffed, folding his arms with authority. "As president of the Celestial Dragonfire Dance Collective, what I say goes. And I say we practice until the last available second. If one of you screws up because you're clumsy, I'm not losing my head for it." His gaze cut to the woman with a high ponytail. "I'm talking to you, Chiyo."

"Me?" she sputtered, offended. "I am not clumsy!" She looked around for support, but her teammates all grimaced and averted their eyes. Her jaw dropped. "Seriously? No one is going to back me up?"

"Well…" the other woman sighed. "You did mess up during the parade."

"No one noticed that!" Chiyo shot back.

"Yeah, well, people will notice when we're dancing with the newlyweds for their first dance," Mori snapped, stepping closer. "If your two left feet land on Chisaki Kai, it'll be all our heads on the chopping block."

Chiyo threw her hands up in defeat. "Fine! Let's go practice for the billionth time. Whatever."

Grumbling, the group lifted the dragon costume again and trudged toward a quiet section of the circle.

From the shadows, Katsuki and the others traded looks.

Monoma's mouth slid into a grin as he drew his gun and arched a brow. "Looks like we're about to learn a dance."

The dance crew moved to a secluded open area to practice. It was fairly simple. A step here, a step there. The dragon was long and when all four were in sync well enough, it could make a full circle with the tail touching the head.

From a nearby alley, their unit observed. They memorized every subtle sway and the beat that the dancers were counting to.

In the open space, Mori barked instructions like a drill sergeant as the head of the dragon. He loudly counted off moves while the others shuffled with half-hearted groans.

"Left, right, pivot—no, no, Chiyo, your timing is still garbage!" he snapped.

"Oh my god, Mori, nobody cares!" Chiyo groaned, nearly tripping over the tail section.

Katsuki leaned on the edge of the alley wall, arms crossed. His eyes narrowed as he studied every movement.

Monoma tilted his head. "I can't believe our way in will be interpretive lizard dancing."

"It's a dragon," Sero corrected.

"Dragons are still lizards."

"No they're not—"

"—Shut up, both of you," Katsuki growled, mind locked on Izuku's face still burned into his skull.

The practice went on for a while, making all of them check their watches. According to the schedule Denki obtained, the wedding ceremony was coming to a close soon, and the reception would be starting. The push of urgency pressed down like a hand on the back of all their necks. It gripped tighter and tighter with every ticking second.

Finally, the dragon dropped to the ground. The dancers slugged it off their bodies and one of the women checked the time and groaned.

"Okay. We gotta head back," she said. "It's almost the end of the ceremony."

That was their opening.

"Now," Katsuki hissed.

They moved. The four of them burst from the alley, guns drawn. Immediately, all the dancers screamed and panicked. Katsuki lifted his gun directly to one of the dancer's heads, and Sero pressed his against the startled ribs of another. Before any of the dancers could squeak further, each one of them was staring down the barrel of a gun, entirely encircled.

Mori's mouth dropped open, but Monoma shoved his pistol further into the man's face.

"Careful," Monoma warned with a smirk. "Make another sound and you'll be dancing with a hole in your eye for the rest of your life."

They raised their hands, and the dragon collapsed to the ground.

Quickly, their unit worked fast. They drew from their backpacks rope and duck tape. With the press of time on their backs, they moved efficiently. In minutes, they dragged the dancers into a narrow alley far out of sight and took their phones.

They pushed them to the ground and tied all their wrists and ankles. With silver strips, their mouths were sealed tight, muffling their protests and scared cries. Some of them tried to scream for help, but the loudness of Hadeus swallowed the sound.

And as the final touch, each of them tore the badge that read 'entertainment' from the dancers' necks.

Monoma gave a little mock bow to their captives.

"Enjoy your break," he said dryly. "We'll take it from here."

"Does everyone understand the new plan?" Shinsou asked.

"Yeah, we're ready," Katsuki replied.

Monoma and Sero nodded as well.

The four of them hurried, lifting the collapsed dragon between their hands before ducking under the silk in one practiced motion. Shinsou claimed the head, Monoma grumbled his way to the tail, and Katsuki and Sero filled the middle, shoulders hunched to keep the costume steady.

They shuffled forward, awkward at first, then eventually found a clumsy rhythm that at least resembled the dancers they'd studied. Passing through the crowded circle, they ignored the drunken cheers and half-slurred catcalls that followed them. Strangers tossed out jokes, toasts, and jeers at the wobbling dragon weaving past.

"Great job out there!" One man with a deep voice shouted.

With a sly grin a woman slapped the back of Monoma's ass as they passed.

"Can you give me a lift on your magic dragon ride?" She teased.

Dark chuckles surrounded them. But they ignored them all and pushed down towards the ninth circle. When the double doors came into view again, the rest of the entertainers were already lined up.

The guard with the neck tattoo prowled down the row, eyes sharp despite the chaos. He held a clipboard, ticking boxes one by one. When he reached them, sweat gathered on their foreheads.

“Badge?” The guard asked, automatically suspicious.

Katsuki dipped his hand from below the covering and held up the stolen pass with a steady hand.

For a beat, the guard’s gaze lingered. Then he gave a curt nod and waved them through.

“Okay, that’s everyone,” he announced, tucking the clipboard under his arm. “Follow me. We’ll be going through the side doors. Do not speak and do not interrupt the ceremony.”

The guard moved towards a narrow, shadowed corridor beside the massive double doors. They wound through the tight passage, walls swallowing the light. They walked until they came to a small set of doors. From beyond, a muted hum of chants seeped through.

The Yakuza guard held the doors open. One by one, they slipped inside the modest room.

A few chairs were scattered about, and a large white curtain separated this space from the main hall. Beyond the veil, the chanting persisted, thick and solemn.

Some of the dancers cautiously peered from behind the curtain, careful not to draw attention.

Even the guard leaned in slightly, curiosity tugging at him.

“Someone should take a look,” Shinsou suggested in a whisper. “Sero or Bakugou. One of you peek your head under and see what’s happening.”

They shuffled to the other side of the curtains, away from the Yakuza guard. Carefully, Katsuki lifted the silk of the dragon and poked his head out.

He peered around the curtains and was met with one of the most horrifying images.

The room beyond was a ceremony hall. Every surface was decorated in green, white, and gold. Bright marble tiles stretched endlessly down the aisle, reflecting the glow of lanterns that were shaped like lilies. They hung suspended between towering green-veined columns. Gold decorations traced the ribs of the ceiling and the edges of the altar. Along the aisle were silk runners of emerald and white that led the eye forward.

Guests filled the benches. Every single damn person was dressed in a sharp suit or flowing gown. There was a mix of formal attire and silk kimonos. Each outfit looked deliberately chosen to echo their wealth and status.

And at the end of the aisle, were two figures at the altar.

Izuku and Chisaki knelt side by side, wrists bound together with a single strand of red thread that the priest looped and tightened with deliberate care.

The priest's voice rang clearly over the gathered crowd.

"By this thread, your lives are intertwined," he recited. "Your hearts are bound and your destinies are one."

Every inch of the hall clapped, but Izuku didn't react.

He knelt there with a restrained, rigid posture. Katsuki could see the faint line of tension in his shoulders and the unnatural blank stare in his eyes. The vows drifted between them like they were made of nothing. Sweet, hollow poetry meant for everyone else, but did not match the dead look in Izuku's eyes.

Katsuki's gaze stayed locked and his heart began to beat loudly.

When the priest gave one last line, both Izuku and Chisaki stood. They turned to each other.

Chisaki lifted his free hand and caressed Izuku's cheek.

"You are now officially wed," the priest declared.

A roar of cheers erupted as all the guests stood up, clapping. Katsuki watched with a lump in his throat as once again, he was stuck witnessing Chisaki kiss Izuku. The man leaned in, and his hand weaved greedily through Izuku's curls.

But unlike last time, Izuku barely responded. He stood there as Chisaki took it all and closed his eyes. Katsuki's jaw tightened. His fist curled and every muscle in his body screamed to run forward.

And then—he saw it.

It was a flicker. A small, almost imperceptible pulse of resistance.

Izuku's eyes were shut, but at his side, his hand clenched into a fist.

Katsuki's heart kicked up. Izuku was still fighting.

"Alright time for everyone to go," The Yakuza guard said to the room. "We're going to shuffle in the reception with all the guests now. Follow everyone through the doors."

The whole of the wedding party and guests moved through a new set of doors. The entryway opened inside the ceremonial chamber, leading everyone further into the ninth circle.

The Yakuza guard herded them all like a Shepard. They shuffled from behind the curtain to follow the hundreds of guests. As one, they all poured into the new hall and Katsuki couldn't see shit. He did his best not to step on Shinsou's heels as his colleague led them into the room.

When the Yakuza guard ushered them into the corner and told them to wait for their signal, Katsuki discreetly poked his head out to glimpse at the room. His eyes scanned the exits and found exactly three.

“There’s open doors in front of the dance floor,” he whispered. “I think that’s going to be our escape route.”

Sero and Monoma carefully peered out too.

Stunned by the sight, Sero gave a low whistle. “I hate to say it, but the Yakuza have great taste.”

The reception hall was much grander than the ceremonial hall.

The room was entirely black. Streaks of gold and deep viridian were the only things that broke this up. The two colors scattered about in flowers and vines that hung from the ceiling. Candles were placed all around, adding to the glow of chandeliers that were dripping with emeralds. The gems cast fractured light across the space, making it look like the entire room was full of green stars.

Dozens of tables for the guests scattered along either side of the room, hugging a black marble dance floor. The tables were impossibly polished and their surfaces were alive with centerpieces of deep green and glinting gold. Gold and green roses ran in neat rows down each table, petals curling as if to drink in the light.

And at the head of the hall was a singular, elevated dinner table.

It was obvious who it was for with the way it was highlighted under the brightest of lights. Its surface was donned with a viridian tablecloth, perfectly lined roses, and large beautiful candles.

Overall, the reception hall in Katsuki’s opinion, was horrifying.

Every element of it. The deep greens. The blinding gold. It screamed that type of extravagance Katsuki was always disgusted by.

“What a waste,” Monoma mumbled under his breath.

All around them, the hundreds of guests took their seats. A tide of polite chatter and carefully curated smiles rippled through the hall from person to person.

Chisaki took Izuku’s hand, guiding him to the elevated table at the front.

Then, from behind, the clatter of wheels and footsteps drew attention.

Katsuki’s eyes narrowed instinctively and he turned his head.

And there he saw the largest damn cake he’s ever seen. His eyes tracked it across the polished marble floor. It was a giant, five-tier tower of light green frosting banded with deep emerald fondant designs. Every single corner of it was crowned with sculpted sugar roses.

The hall erupted in whistles as the cake reached the center.

As he looked at the two black roses on top, Izuku's heart churned.

A subtle twist of unease bloomed in his stomach, making his body shift ever so slightly in his chair. He was careful to keep the mask fixed on his face.

"How are you feeling, beautiful?" Chisaki's voice broke the moment. The scent of his cologne wafted into Izuku's senses. "You seem a bit dazed."

Izuku blinked and focused on the words. He forced his lips into a smile and turned to his new husband.

"I'm feeling perfect," he lied softly. "I just can't believe this is all happening. It feels… surreal, after so long."

Chisaki smiled at him, and placed a warm hand over his. "It does. I'm happy we could finally get here. I still remember the first day I saw you. Seems like it's been a long time coming."

Izuku glanced at the cake.

"It does," he said sincerely. "A very much deserved time."

The lights dimmed slightly, drawing everyone's attention toward the center of the room.

A pang of unease tightened in his gut as the crowd's chatter hushed and the MC stepped forward. The man was tall, lanky, and dressed with a dark purple suit and a high bun. His teeth gleamed unnaturally white under the emerald chandeliers. Without wasting time, he began speaking in a polished, relentless drone about life, dedication, and the power of the Chisaki legacy.

He even said how lucky Izuku was.

How fortunate they all were.

Izuku only half-listened. His mind started to fray at the edges, reality feeling thin.

On the way here, Izuku saw the phantom of Katsuki yet again. Twice. The ghost followed him the whole way down the parade like an ominous shadow beckoning to him. And when the door shut right before the ceremony—Izuku saw him again.

Beautiful scarlet eyes were trying to bring him back home.

Seeing that last vision of Katsuki was the final push Izuku needed.

He knew where he belonged, and it wasn't here.

Applause rippled through the room at the MC's carefully timed exit joke. After the MC sat down, the reception trudged forward in a blur of speeches, clinking wine glasses, and waves of food.

First came the appetizers. Bloody Mary shooters, oysters and olives dripped in a savory glaze called ‘venom’ as a cute play on words for the Vipers. Next came the first course. A choice of greek-salad or garlic soup. Then finally out came the entrée. Seared filet mignon topped with wild mushroom bleu cheese.

During dinner, Izuku allowed Chisaki to hold his hand while his attention drifted. Chisaki’s fingers tightened and loosened in an unconscious rhythm as he listened to his parents give some heart warming speech. They cooed about how proud they were of their son for how far he expanded the Shie Hassaikai.

As they ate, dancers fluttered across the marble floor as entertainment.

The echo of drums filled the hall with cheers. Across the floor, low smoke from the fog machine rolled out to make it all feel more enchanting and extravagant.

Beside him, Chisaki smiled, satisfied.

About halfway through the performances, Izuku caught Tomura across the room. His brother was seated next to Zen and the other important members of The Viper Academy. He leaned back in his chair with his hands neatly folded on the table. He looked onward at the dancers, not entirely entertained but not entirely bored.

As if he could feel Izuku staring, he cut his eyes over to him.

Tomura gave him a polite, small wave.

Izuku smiled back sadly. He returned the wave.

The performances cycled on. Each group was more elaborate than the last, making an effort to dazzle the Chisakis and get in good with their favor.

When the last group got a standing ovation, the MC returned to the center of the floor. He raised his hand like a conductor.

“Now it’s time for dessert!” he called. “Can I get the lovely couple up here to cut the cake?”

Izuku felt the weight of every eye in the room turn to him.

They rose and Chisaki guided him by his hand down to the center of the floor. All around, the emerald speckles shone just for this moment as they grew closer and closer to the cake. When they got right on it, it felt like it was alive. It towered over him, and Izuku needed to crane his neck to see the top.

On the small table beside it sat a single plate, a knife, and two forks.

Chisaki picked up the knife. He pressed it into Izuku’s palm before curling his own hand firmly around his. He forcefully turned Izuku around, slotting his back against his chest. With his two arms, he caged Izuku in and turned them both toward the towering cake. The crowd awed.

Together, as one, their hands pushed the blade through.

As the knife cut down, Izuku's eyes drifted over the sea of onlookers.

He saw Zen, happy. Tomura, approving. The Chisakis, adoring.

And for a moment, Izuku searched for Hiryu's phantom.

Would his lost brother come to him again? He wondered if the side of him that protected him from death all these years would surge forward. Maybe it'd come running, knock the cake out of his hand, and tell him he needed to survive—tell him he needed to live.

But the longer he searched the sea of unfamiliar faces, he couldn't find Hiryu.

And he knew why.

He couldn't find any more will to survive inside of him.

Instead, in the reflection of the cheering crowd, he saw Katsuki. He saw all the versions of his husband that were stolen from him.

The crowd cheered again as the first slice of cake was officially cut. Chisaki grinned brightly as he helped guide Izuku's hand. The green cake was placed neatly on the golden plate, and his new husband held up the dessert for all to see. The crowd clapped some more as Chisaki stabbed the sweet dessert with a fork.

Slowly, Izuku picked up the fork too. He took a piece off, and they held gazes.

Izuku smiled sweetly and Chisaki returned it.

Together, they fed each other a bite of cake.

The crowd whistled as the new couple chewed and swallowed together. Izuku blinked back tears as they did this three more times until the slice was entirely gone.

Between the two of them, they ate exactly half a slice each.

Chisaki licked his lips and nodded, humming in satisfaction.

"It's sweeter than I expected," he said. "I'll have to ask the chef for their recipe."

Izuku laughed, genuinely from his stomach.

The staff swept in and with large knives they started to sever the giant cake. Two slices were set aside for Izuku and Chisaki, and hand in hand they returned to their seats.

From his chair at the head table, Izuku could see it all.

The staff moved in clean, efficient lines. They set down slices before all four hundred of their guests. Some dug in at once, grinning with mouths already full. But others lingered in chatter, their utensils hovering before they gave in. Within minutes, fork marks marred nearly every slice of cake.

He watched them eat, running calculations as everyone consumed the cake in different portions.

Half a slice. An hour and a half.

Full slice. An hour, maybe less.

But then a few nibbled. Ms. Nagant took a single bite, wiped her lips, and stared ahead. Mr. Compress did the same, and they began casually talking.

Izuku pressed his lips in a thin line. They would be gone exactly at midnight.

His eyes slid to Zen.

His father was on his second slice.

Izuku's eyes turned to Tomura, and his heart stuttered.

His brother wasn't eating.

The feeling of being pushed over a cliff rose inside of Izuku. He blinked a bit, wondering if maybe Tomura was full, or worse, if Tomura knew he'd poisoned the cake.

However, when Zen nudged Tomura, asking if he'd eat the untouched slice, the answer came. Tomura slid his plate across the table without hesitation, smiling faintly as he offered it up—completely ignorant. Zen chewed happily on his third slice, and Izuku felt a sense of satisfaction watching him swallow.

"This cake is so good," Chisaki mumbled eloquently. He continued to eat another slice, and smiled with his eyes at Izuku. "Do you not want any more? You only had half a slice."

Izuku faked a charming smile. "I'm very full from dinner. But I would love some later."

"Of course, I'll have some of the servants save you as much cake as you want."

As the guests continued their dessert feast, it was time for photos. The MC called up people table by table for a picture with Izuku and Chisaki.

First came the Chisaki family, of course. Kurenai pressed a kiss to Izuku's cheek while Takeshi offered a simple nod. They gathered close around their son, and the flash caught their prideful composure.

Next came the endless parade of uncles, aunts, cousins, and distant relatives. Each new family member smiled happily for the camera. Then at last, the entire clan assembled for a single sweeping portrait. They formed a cluster of dark suits and silks with Izuku and Kai sitting like ornaments at the center.

After that, a ripple of chatter swept through the room as the governor of Tokyo approached.

Izuku still remembered the man from the last time he saw him in passing during the masquerade. He still looked the same. Rosy cheeks, sharp nose, and slicked-back black hair. On his arm tonight was his wife, elegant in deep emerald silk. Her bow was as graceful as her husband's.

The governor inclined his head. "Izuku. It has been far too long. I'm glad we finally have the chance to speak properly."

Izuku bowed in return, his voice even. "As am I, sir. I hope you're enjoying the evening. Please—there's plenty of cake to celebrate with."

"I'll be sure to." The governor chuckled, eyes roaming over Izuku with open approval. "Forgive me if this is sentimental, but I still remember when you were a boy, watching you pass the final exam at The Academy. You stood out even then, and now…well, it's clear you've made a remarkable match." His gaze flicked to Chisaki. "One that suits all of our shared interests."

Chisaki's laugh was low, measured. "Then it seems I owe you thanks, governor. I'll see that a gift is sent your way as a special thanks."

The governor's grin widened, bright and wolfish. "There's no need. Let's simply continue working together. We can speak of our future endeavors later."

They all took a photo together with the governor standing proudly behind Izuku.

Next came the Vipers.

Zen and Tomura rose together, adjusting the lapels of their suits as they made their way forward. Zen greeted Chisaki with a booming laugh, speaking to him like a fond uncle, recounting how honored he was to have watched him grow into the man he'd become.

While they talked, Izuku's gaze drifted toward Tomura's empty plate at the table.

He looked up at his brother.

"You don't want any of the cake?" Izuku asked.

Tomura tilted his head, then shrugged casually.

"No," Tomura answered. He gave Izuku a small, genuine smile. "Matcha isn't really my flavor. I'll drink some more of the dessert wine to celebrate instead."

Izuku's stomach knotted.

He grew quiet, unsure of what to say.

Of course. Somehow, always somehow, Tomura remained invincible. Izuku didn't know if he should push. He didn't want to risk looking too suspicious—so he didn't. Instead, he gave his brother a sincere smile for the first time in over a month.

At least when all this was over, Tomura wouldn't have his empire. The Chisakis would be gone. So would Zen and the Vipers. Everything would be in shambles, and maybe, just maybe, Tomura would be the one left standing in the wreckage, blamed for it all. Perhaps the Chisakis who couldn't make the wedding on such short notice would point the finger at him.

"Alright, let's take this photo," Zen said cheerfully.

He stepped behind Chisaki and clasped his hands neatly at his back. Tomura walked around and stood behind Izuku. From there, he patted Izuku's shoulders, then rested his hands there. They all posed and smiled for the photo.

The flash went off, and Tomura gave his shoulders one last squeeze.

The two walked away, and next in line were Vipers Izuku knew from home. They all gave half smiles, or full-on stale faces. He heard a couple of comments from his siblings. Under their breath, they snidely called him the 'untouchable' viper. He hadn't heard that callous nickname in a while, but he supposed through their eyes, that's what he was.

In the middle of what felt like the hundredth photo, movement flickered at the edge of Izuku's vision.

His stomach sank when he caught sight of a pair of staff slipping toward the cake, trying to steal away a slice.

He tightened his grip on Chisaki's hand.

"What is it?" Chisaki asked, glancing down.

Izuku leaned closer and lowered his voice. "I don't mean to be rude, but…I think some of the staff are taking the cake. I was hoping to save some for later—"

"—They're what?" Chisaki cut him off, tone sharp enough to draw blood. His eyes snapped toward the floor in time to catch a woman in grey attempting to shuffle away.

With a snap of his fingers, the Yakuza guards materialized at his side. He pointed directly at her, lips curling with disdain.

"Remind the servants—again—that the food is not for them," Chisaki spat. "They can eat tomorrow. Tonight, it belongs to the guests who matter. Go reprimand them."

Izuku pressed his lips into a thin line as the guards stormed off. Their barked orders scattered the staff like they were frightened animals. Several of the staff's shoulders hunched in shame, and some were even dragged out, shoved toward the doors. Others dropped their heads and slunk back into place.

A sigh slipped past Izuku before he could stop it, soft and resigned.

He forced himself to lean back and smile up at Chisaki. "Thank you."

“Of course,” Chisaki replied. “I’m glad you noticed. We told them to eat a large breakfast before they came into work today because they wouldn’t be served, but it seems like a few didn’t listen. I’ll have those punished further tomorrow.”

Izuku blinked once and buried the twist of disgust under his diplomatic smile.

When the photographs ended, the lights dimmed once more.

His stomach gave a low, unsettled groan. He pressed a hand to it, releasing a shaky breath through his teeth. A glance at the endless sea of faces made the ticking inside his head grow louder. Then he took one look at the clock on the wall and confirmed what he already knew.

At midnight, this would all be over.

His hand curled tight against the silk of his clothes, fingers digging hard enough to crease the fabric.

The fog machines hissed, sending another wave across the floor. It cloaked the reception hall until it looked as though the entire gathering floated on a glittering cloud of emerald light.

The MC strode back onto the floor. His purple suit gleamed faintly beneath the spotlight as though he too had been conjured out of smoke.

“Now,” the MC announced, voice booming as he lifted the microphone. “We come to a very special moment in our program. Everyone, get your handkerchiefs ready—it’s time for the first dance!”

Applause erupted, rippling through the hall. Chisaki gave a poised wave before taking Izuku’s hand. At the same time, they rose and crossed the room towards the center of the dance floor. As they moved, fog swirled at their ankles, drawing them close together.

The spotlight flared down on them, blinding Izuku in its brilliance.

The drums started first, building up in a sweet yet haunting way.

With the ankle monitor still blinking, Izuku moved stiffly into position. One hand was in Chisaki’s and the other trembled at his side.

From the fog, the dragon emerged.

It slithered out in a great sweep of silk. Its head snapped upward, baring its teeth that were painted in vivid celebratory reds and blacks. The body rippled behind, every scale catching the chandeliers’ light so that it seemed alive.

The audience applauded as the beast weaved between the tables. It moved in rhythm with the drums and hymns, every ripple of silk perfectly timed to the spell binding beat.

A melody joined the drums and the whole room became enchanted.

Chisaki's hand pressed into the small of Izuku's back, pushing them close. Their hearts met through the wedding garments and their eyes met. Izuku began swaying with Chisaki underneath the watchful eye of everyone. They turned and stepped. Twirled and dipped.

With every beat of the drum, Izuku counted down the clock to the poison settling in.

The dragon swept onto the floor with them, its long body gliding through the fog. It circled the outer edge, then drew closer and closer through a running spiral. Soon, it joined them in their orbit.

It circled once, twice, each pass tighter than the last.

Quickly, the world faded with every spin. Out of the corner of his eye, Izuku saw the dragon drawing nearer. He frowned slightly when the dragon tightened its arc, brushing too close to his waist. He ignored it, but then it happened again. It drew closer as it passed behind him and its tail coiled tighter.

Izuku faltered slightly.

This wasn't part of the dance.

He knew because he'd watched the rehearsal twenty-seven times.

Chisaki leaned in to whisper something, but Izuku didn't hear it at all. All he could feel was the weight of the dragon pressing in too close.

Then the lights dimmed further.

Both their heads snapped up at the same time colorful smoke bombs exploded across the floor in perfect sync with the percussion.

The guests cheered and the room lit up with bright, red and gold sparklers, making vision low. Izuku tried to squint but he couldn't see out to the audience now, which meant they could not see them either. All that there was was a dense red smog, blocking them off from the rest of the world as the music grew deafening.

Chisaki finally slowed his dancing as well. He looked around as the dragon blocked them in entirely.

He frowned. "Did you change the choreography last minute?"

"No." Izuku shook his head. "You didn't request the smoke bombs and sparklers?"

Then suddenly, someone dipped from the middle of the dragon directly behind Chisaki. A shadow in stepped forward through the smoke, unfolding to be as pitch black as night.

When it rose to full height, deadly scarlet eyes cut through the smoke.

Izuku's breath caught. His mouth parted.

Chisaki saw Izuku's ghastly expression too late.

He half-turned, confused—but the person was already there. In a blur of fury, the distance was closed in the blink of an eye. Katsuki erupted into view like a phoenix rising from ash, eyes blazing, and every muscle in his face was etched in murderous intent.

There was no chance to react.

Katsuki hammered his blade deep into Chisaki's throat, the steel tearing through flesh with a wet crack.

Time shattered.

Izuku stood frozen, arms suspended midair.

Chisaki gurgled, choking on his own blood. He desperately clawed at the steel lodged in his neck and his mouth tried to make sounds for help. But the loud drums overshadowed every bit of his cries. His eyes bulged as his terrified gaze dragged upward—and found Katsuki.

Katsuki leaned in so near that he could feel the shudder of Chisaki's final breath against his cheek.

"I was always told I had my mother's eyes," Katsuki whispered, lips twisted in a vicious sneer. "Tell me—do you see her in me?"

He twisted the knife deeper. The name carved into its hilt—Mitsuki—caught the light.

Chisaki's stare went wide with terror. His veins strained as he tried to form a reply that never came. His hands flailed weakly at Katsuki's chest, nails scraping but finding no purchase. The air between them filled with the sound of Chisaki's dying breaths and the sound of his flesh tearing as Katsuki drove the blade deeper and deeper, cutting every artery in his neck.

With one brutal wrench, he tore the blade free.

Blood sprayed across Izuku's face, staining his white ceremonial clothes in scarlet.

Blood poured in a thick, unbroken stream onto Chisaki's chest. Down, down, down it went all the way to the floor. He staggered back and clasped both hands around his bleeding throat. Before he could turn, Katsuki shot a hand out and shoved him down to the floor like he was nothing. Chisaki's knees buckled and he hit the ground in beat with the drums.

At all their feet, blood pooled beneath them in a widening halo.

Chisaki's eyes found Izuku for an instant and then they rolled back into his skull. His body convulsed once more in a grotesque final shudder—then he went utterly still.

Izuku froze, stunned into a state of shock.

His breath caught in his throat as his eyes locked onto the figure standing before him. Katsuki's eyes burned with unrelenting savagery. For a heartbeat—no, for an eternity he could not believe what he saw. His mind screamed it couldn't be real, that this was another cruel hallucination as he inched towards death.

But his body betrayed him. His hands began to tremble and reached out before he could stop them. He was desperate in the worst, most hopeless way for the impossible to be true.

"Katsuki?" he whispered, his voice cracking apart.

And then the figure moved, and it turned out not to be a ghost at all.

A strong hand closed around Izuku's wrist anchoring him to reality.

"Let's get the fuck out of here," Katsuki hissed.

Chapter 47 — Fortissimo

Izuku lost his balance as he was forcibly dragged under the dragon.

He looked around, dazed and confused. But he couldn’t find an inkling of sense. All around him, the world blurred into smoke and Chisaki’s blood. The two fused to make an impossible conclusion. Katsuki? Katsuki was alive? He tried to grasp it, but he couldn’t. All he could feel was the bruising pressure of Katsuki’s hands at his waist, desperately shoving him forward.

“Alright, we gotta move. Everyone kick it in gear!”

Izuku’s head snapped up. That was Shinsou’s voice.

He looked in front, towards the head of the dragon—and there he was. Shinsou was standing tall, pulling them fast. Suddenly, the whole dragon convulsed into a frantic, jolting sprint. Izuku tripped over his own feet, breath catching in his throat. But Katsuki held him steady and pushed harder until his legs fell into rhythm.

They bolted out of the reception hall in a blaze, and immediately the dragon was thrown to the ground.

There was only a second to look back. There, the entrance to the hall was clouded with colorful smoke. Blues, reds, and greens blocked the view while the deafening drums still hammered on. From within, sounds of confusion slowly rose.

But that's all Izuku could decipher before he was dragged by the wrist.

Katsuki began running, and so did Shinsou.

Izuku forced his legs to obey, lungs hitching as his thoughts lagged several beats behind.

He barely registered Sero and Monoma beside them. Their expressions were stripped of humor, and their eyes were fixed dead ahead. In front of them, Shinsou took the lead. He held a device in his hand that glowed with a map. They ran through narrow corridors that bent and twisted. Every turn was more disorienting than the last until they were spit out into the foyer of the Ninth Circle.

Izuku tried to continue running up the stairs, but Katsuki abruptly grabbed his shoulders.

"We gotta get him out of this before the smoke clears," Katsuki said urgently. "We don't have much time."

Before Izuku could question what that meant, Katsuki whirled him around in a dizzying spin. In the blink of an eye, he was stripped of his wedding hoari. Izuku grew more confused when the garment was frantically tossed to Monoma—who was fastening a green wig on his head.

Katsuki's hands were on him again. He ripped the top layers from Izuku's body until Izuku stood only in his hakama pants and undershirt.

Monoma shrugged into the discarded robes, transforming with startling speed.

Izuku tried to speak, but was cut off. With inhuman efficiency, Katsuki shoved his arms through a hoodie. And then with a harsh snap, he pulled the hood over Izuku's head and yanked the zipper up to his chin.

Screams split the air.

"That's our cue," Shinsou hissed. He flicked a quick nod toward Katsuki. "See you on the surface."

Katsuki curtly nodded and seized Izuku's wrist.

The five of them bolted up the stairs to the Eighth Circle. Behind them, a stampede rumbled. Screams, shouts, and turmoil began tearing the night apart. Izuku's pulse spiked as he dared to look back. And what he saw made his heart plummet as if he was on a rollercoaster.

Vipers and Yakuza were pouring out from every inch of the Ninth Circle. Their guns and weapons were drawn. Through the wobble of his vision, he caught a glimpse of Tomura and Zen spilling out with the mob.

And they looked murderous.

Izuku forced his legs to go faster.

They got to the Eighth Circle, and it was pandemonium. Hundreds of intoxicated partygoers were crammed wall to wall. From behind them, the disarray surged closer. Screams yelling out "get them!" and "they killed Chisaki Kai!" rang out in a brutally high-pitched cry.

Once those words were heard, all heads turned toward them.

They shoved and pushed through the crowd. The entire way, hundreds of people yelled and shouted after them. Several times they had to wrench their arms away from prying hands as they pushed their bodies to accelerate.

Through it all, Izuku followed Shinsou's lead.

They began to make a sharp turn—but then Katsuki abruptly yanked him the opposite way.

Izuku's head whipped around in shock just in time to see Shinsou, Monoma, and Sero swallowed by the suffocating crowd. For a fleeting heartbeat, he caught the glint of his wedding haori on Monoma's shoulders. It sparkled like diamonds, drawing eyes exactly as it was meant to.

Then the pack behind them shifted. The Yakuza and Vipers split—one wave chasing Monoma's group and the other broke off after Izuku and Katsuki. But it wasn't even. Most of their pursuers chased after the shining wedding garb.

Understanding clicked into place. Monoma was his decoy.

Izuku shook his head hard, fighting to snap himself back into reality. The barbarous recollection of Katsuki stabbing Chisaki replayed behind his eyes, intense and bloody. Then it finally hit him. Holy shit. Chisaki Kai was dead. He was dead and bleeding on the floor with his neck absolutely brutalized—in front of the whole damn Shie Hassaikai.

Like a hammer, adrenaline came crashing down, burning his veins wide open.

His lungs expanded. His stride lengthened. With a fierce grit of his teeth, he tore his wrist from Katsuki's grip and laced their fingers together instead. He ran. He ran faster and faster until his steps matched Katsuki's perfectly.

Katsuki's head whirled toward him, their eyes locking for an instant.

"Stop right there!" a Yakuza bellowed.

Bullets tore through the air, screeching past his ears. A few seared across Izuku's arms, tearing through the hoodie and burning hot lines into his flesh. He hissed. The sting jolted his mind into razor focus. He glanced back and counted—four Yakuza in black suits. They plowed forward, shoving through the packed crowd.

Then suddenly Katsuki's hand was gone.

In a fluid motion, he shoved Izuku behind him and drew his gun. His teeth were bared as he fired. Two clean shots. Two clean kills. Each bullet drilled straight into the skull. But the last two guards were faster. They lunged at them through the crowd. One leveled a pistol; the other drew a curved blade. The crowd screamed. Bodies scattered in every direction, leaving a wide circle.

Katsuki did a quick draw. He fired once, then twice, then thrice.

Each shot was deafening in the tight space. But the guard with the gun dropped low and the bullets chewed plaster instead. The man sprung up, ramming his shoulder into Katsuki's chest. Both of them staggered into a crush of people.

The second guard came for Izuku. His blade glinted under the orange neon lights.

Izuku ducked the first slash, and the blade whistled past his head. The man struck again in rapid succession, aiming to kill. But Izuku maneuvered fluidly. He twisted, bent, and sidestepped as the sing of steel grazed his ears. Taking the defensive, Izuku moved back. He adjusted in his geta sandals, shifting gears. The guard drew a smaller blade and hurled it dead at him.

Izuku dodged and snapped his bare hands around the knife—catching it midair.

His eyes became feral as pain seared his palms. He threw the blade back, twice the speed.

The Yakuza made a fool's attempt to evade, but couldn't. It sliced open his jugular in one precise cut. A hot spray of blood streaked across Izuku's cheek, layering on top of Chisaki's. The man dropped, clutching at his neck as he fell to the ground.

Izuku barely had time to exhale before Katsuki's fight crashed into him.

The second guard slammed Katsuki into the side of a building, knocking his gun out of his hand. Katsuki snarled and rammed his head into the man's nose. The sickening crack of bone rang out and blood splattered. But the guard only howled and drew his gun up again.

Izuku was there in an instant.

He caught the man by the wrist and torqued his arm backwards at an angle it wasn't meant to bend.

The guard screamed. Katsuki didn't wait—he drew another gun from his holster and pulled the trigger.

He shot the man directly in the mouth, making blood spray everywhere. Izuku let go and the body dropped.

Around them, the crowd scattered further. Countless people trampled over the bodies as if fleeing a fire. Katsuki ran to retrieve his gun off of the ground, his chest rising like he hadn't missed a breath. Another bullet cut past Izuku's ear, and he flinched. Through the crowd, another wave of guards were coming at full speed.

Katsuki jerked his chin toward the stairs to the Seventh Circle. "We gotta keep going."

They ran again, vanishing into the disarray as the music still thrashed on above the screams. Izuku could hear the shouts of the Yakuza behind them. He could feel the burn in his lungs and the rhythmic thumping of his ankle monitor—

Shit.

His ankle monitor.

Izuku came to a horrified, skidding stop. His head snapped down to see it blinking red, at an extremely fast pace. Much faster than ever before.

"Katsuki!" Izuku screamed.

Katsuki turned and glared at him as if he were crazy for stopping. Izuku quickly ran, caught up, and grabbed his arm. He peered behind them frantically and began searching for another route. In his panic, he found a denser, more chaotic group of people. They were all gathered around some sort of grisly street brawl.

Izuku dove into the crowd. Instantly, curses were hurdled their way.

Katsuki yelled at him too, "Where are we going?! Izuku! Izuku!"

But he didn't stop. He wedged them deeper and deeper into the sea of bodies, trying his best to lose the Yakuza tailing them.

When he looked back and couldn't see them, Izuku ducked them into a hidden, discreet alley. He pushed several gawking people out his way, leading with his shoulder as he gripped Katsuki hard. He didn't stop until they were tucked away in a corner, far away from the turbulent commotion.

"Izuku, we have an escape route," Katsuki insisted. "We need to go that way—"

"—I have an ankle monitor," Izuku blurted out. "They're still tracking me."

Katsuki looked down. His face went pale. He pressed a finger to his earpiece, breath quickening as his eyes darted through the shadows of the alley.

"We have a problem," Katsuki hissed. "Those sick fucks put an ankle monitor on Izuku. I'll try to find something to break it off with, but they may know you're a decoy."

Through the earpiece, Izuku could faintly hear Monoma's voice.

"Well, they don't seem to know right now!" He shouted back. Gunshots rattled off. "They are really trying to kill us over here!"

Izuku looked around too, both searching for something heavy. And when they turned the corner deeper into the darkness, they found a discarded pile of bricks.

Katsuki dropped into a crouch, snatching up the block in one hand as his other clamped firmly around Izuku's ankle, dragging him closer. Izuku bent down in the same breath, steadying the ankle monitor so Katsuki could work.

"Keep it still for me and brace yourself," Katsuki said.

That was all the warning he gave before he hauled back and struck. The brick slammed against the monitor, sending sharp pain up Izuku's leg. He gritted his teeth, refusing to cry out, and forced himself to hold the shackle stable. Katsuki struck again and again. Sparks spat out with every strike, bouncing against the damp alley floor.

Suddenly, the voices at the alley's mouth grew louder.

"Where did they go?!" a rough snarl demanded, close.

Another voice answered, trembling. "Th-They went that way!"

Katsuki's jaw clenched, and Izuku's hands shook. Katsuki raised the brick high and brought it down with a roar. The shackle buckled and a small split cracked down the center at the same time footsteps began moving in their direction. Katsuki struck again. Then again. And again —each blow harder, more desperate than the last.

Then finally, he hauled back and gave one more. This time, angrier.

The metal split straight down the middle, and the monitor fell to the ground in jagged pieces.

Izuku gasped in relief, shaking the numb pain from his ankle. They quickly stood up again, but they weren't given an ounce of breathing room.

"There they are!"

They tore deeper into the alley, the first Yakuza rounding the corner behind them. Gunfire cracked again, and bullets sparked off brick and ricocheted. Izuku flinched when a few tore through his hoodie and kissed his skin. That shallow burn of pain made him move faster.

Together, they weaved a hard left. Then right. Then they pushed their bodies through the winding alleys as the shouts drew closer. Beside him, Katsuki was fumbling with the map device in his palm.

Izuku took one glance and saw the route—and it was the long way.

Izuku seized Katsuki's wrist. Without a word, he yanked him to the left and took the lead.

Izuku had prowled this labyrinth for years, running errands and ferrying Tomura's deals. At this point, he knew the Nine Circles of Hadeus well enough to call them a twisted sort of second home. He pushed himself into high gear. He cut sharp turns. He pivoted hard. He juked around blind corners and leapt over boxes that stacked like broken teeth in the alley.

Ahead, Izuku spotted what he was looking for: a small, discreet doorway draped with black curtains that had violet light spilling from beneath.

He bolted straight for it.

They crashed through the curtain and into the club.

“Hey! You need to pay cover!” The bouncer barked, but was too slow to stop them.

They barreled through the purple haze at top speed. Izuku muttered a breathless apology to a man he knocked flat, while Katsuki hurdled over him without breaking stride.

The club was drenched in smoke and thick with heat. Countless partygoers curled around hookahs and low tables. Blurs of faces turned toward them, startled and irritated—then the sound of gunfire popped through the music, slicing the smoke apart.

The club exploded in chaos.

Izuku ducked low and veered sharply. He dragged Katsuki through the stampede of bodies trying to avoid the rounds the Yakuza carelessly pumped out. The deadly bullets whizzed overhead, cutting through paper lanterns and ripping into the wallpaper. Izuku wove them into the thickest part of the chaotic crowd, smothering their pursuers’ line of sight.

When he looked back and didn’t see them in the mayhem, he rushed towards the back.

With his shoulder, he rammed the side door, flinging it open. They were spat out into the street with dozens of people behind them fleeing the scene.

They looked up, there were the stairs to the Seventh Circle.

“Fucking perfect,” Katsuki complimented. He flashed his feral, lopsided grin Izuku’s way.

They flew up the stairs two steps at a time, racing upward. All up and down the pathway, crowds had gathered, still packed shoulder-to-shoulder. Every single person was pointing and shouting. Izuku caught flashes of people’s expressions as they climbed.

Horror. Delight. Astonishment.

It was obvious what was happening. By now, word likely spread faster than wildfire: Chisaki Kai, slaughtered at his own wedding. And Izuku, his newly wed husband, fleeing the scene hand-in-hand with his murderers. Izuku felt the critical time crunch now. The longer they lingered in Hadeus, the more the jaws closed around them. Izuku’s mind scrambled, trying to get them out quicker.

An idea sparked.

“I know a shortcut,” he panted, glancing at Katsuki as they climbed. “There’s a Shie Hassaikai personnel building on the Seventh Circle—it connects straight to the fourth. We can use it.”

“Any shortcut is a good one,” Katsuki replied hastily.

They reached the top of the stairs, and the street they spilled onto was alive with music and deep indigo neon lights. Revelers were gambling in the middle of the street in a drunken haze. Katsuki and Izuku sprinted toward the shortcut, only to skid to a halt as a fresh wave of Yakuza rounded the bend, blocking their path.

They spun and bolted the opposite way, shoving through startled onlookers.

“How many of these fuckers are there?!” Katsuki snarled.

“Hundreds,” Izuku replied. “They invited all the syndicates families—”

“Great. Just fucking great!”

Izuku risked a glance over his shoulder. His pulse spiked as he counted their hunters—then something happened.

One of the suits staggered mid-stride. He wobbled with a strange, jerking hitch in his gait, and his eyes popped wide. His hands fumbled, dropping his gun, and flew to clutch his stomach. He stopped fully and began heaving desperately—and blood came up in thick, grotesque chunks.

In the blink of an eye, he collapsed, knees buckling like a tumbling house of cards.

Goosebumps raised on Izuku’s arms.

He recognized that man. He’d been at the wedding—and he ate four slices of cake.

Katsuki shot him a confused look, but Izuku didn’t have time to explain. Behind them, the rest of the Yakuza charged forward, hesitation rippling through their stride as they turned to look back at their fallen comrade. They called out after him, urging him to get off the ground.

But the man couldn’t. He began convulsing, coughing up more blood, and crumpled further into the pavement.

Izuku snapped his head forward.

With a thick swallow, he became acutely aware of the anti-venom Ochako gave him. He hadn’t touched it after pocketing it right before the wedding, thinking he didn’t need it. He was ready to die with it in his pants’—but now Katsuki was here because he had somehow defied death. Which meant it was Izuku’s turn to do the same.

But he needed to time it right.

If he took it now, he would start to experience the side effects within five minutes: extreme dizziness, muscle cramps, nausea, and fatigue. He would become practically incapacitated as the expulsion process began—and he needed to fight his way out to the surface. If he couldn’t do that, then he was a dead man anyways.

Izuku glanced at the watch on Katsuki's wrist, eyes fully in tunnel vision.

It was 21:00 exactly.

It was going to be tight, but it was possible—he had until midnight.

He led Katsuki down a side street, past gaudy signs and through a gap between two stalls. They ran until they came across a nondescript metal door, tucked beneath an all black awning.

Izuku glanced over his shoulder, checking to make sure they were ahead of their pursuers. But he couldn't hear any booming footsteps. He prayed they stopped and went back for their fallen man.

Looking ahead, Izuku's fingers flew across the keypad and he entered the six digit code he knew by heart. It was impossible to forget. Chisaki Kai had a habit of standardizing passwords across his personnel. This one was the date he had officially taken the throne of his family's syndicate.

The lock dinged, glowing green, and then the door groaned open. They both hurried in and shut the door behind them. Inside, fluorescent lights buzzed over black painted walls. A narrow stairwell spiraled upward into the dark, hovering over them. Carefully, they surveyed their surroundings and found quiet. They were in the clear for the meantime.

"This way," Izuku whispered, already climbing the stairs.

Katsuki raised his handgun as he followed, eyes sharp. Without looking away from the shadows above, he unbuckled the pistol holstered at his hip and shoved it into Izuku's hand.

"For you," he said. "I fired one round, so you have nine left."

Izuku racked the weapon and forced his slick, blood-stained palms to steady. "We have to go up to the fourth floor."

Katsuki nodded, scanning the dark as they climbed. "How'd you know this place existed?"

"Vipers and the Yakuza have…or had a very close relationship," Izuku explained quietly. "Whenever we would do business with them, we'd come down to one of their buildings. They have several personal elevators scattered throughout Hadeus for fast transportation. Mainly because of Chisaki Kai—he didn't like to walk for a long time."

Katsuki rolled his eyes. "Figures."

"The Ninth Circle has a secret master elevator that stops on every floor," Izuku added, almost regretful. "But we're too far from it. This is the best we've got."

"Does that mean they probably used it?"

"Yeah. They likely dispersed across all levels. They're going to try to corner us."

“…Shit.”

They reached the fourth floor and found another keypad. Izuku punched in the code without hesitation, and the lock clicked open with a muted clink and a green light.

Then quietly, a creek. Both their heads snapped up when the sound of footsteps began descending towards them. Without a word, they slipped inside and eased the door shut behind them. When they entered, the room was dark. Through the blackness, Izuku could see it was lined with steel crates and the air smelled faintly of dust.

He craned his head to the back to see the door he was looking for: the exit towards the elevator.

As the footsteps drew closer, Izuku and Katsuki quickly dropped low. They pressed themselves into the shadows behind the nearest pile of crates. Fingers tightening around their triggers, Izuku and Katsuki peered out from the edge.

The door slammed open. Three men entered, but their movements were slow and unconcerned. The radios on their belts crackled, the static hum breaking the silence.

“This is a goddamn nightmare,” one of the men huffed. “If we don’t catch those bastards, the Chisakis will have all our heads for this. C’mon. Let’s head to the Fourth Circle.”

The others grumbled in agreement and began walking towards the door.

Then a burst of white noise cut through the room, followed by a woman’s strained voice.

“Hey. Team forty seven, something’s wrong here in the reception hall.”

“What do you mean?” the first man asked sharply. “Did those fuckers circle back?”

“No,” she replied, uneasy. “It’s…it’s something else. The wedding guests are dropping with really bad stomach cramps and sweating through their clothes. Worse, a few of them already passed out cold—the Governor and his wife included.” Her voice trembled. “We’re trying to drag them up to the surface and get them medical attention, but it’s not looking great.”

“What the hell?” Whispered the second guard. “Do they have food poisoning?”

“Probably the oysters,” the first scoffed, shaking his head. “Knew that shit didn’t look right. Rich assholes and their fancy food. Burgers and fries never killed anybody—”

But before he could finish, the quiet third man groaned. He swayed, clutching his stomach.

“Uh…guys—” His voice bubbled, breaking into a lurch. “I…I don’t feel so good.”

The moment their heads turned, Katsuki flicked his hand in a sharp signal. Izuku nodded, steadying his breath.

Together, they fired off two shots in unison.

Two bodies hit the floor.

The third man jerked his head up, eyes wide. He snapped his rifle up and unleashed a spray of bullets. Sparks exploded against the steel crates, painting the dark room with sporadic bursts of light.

Katsuki and Izuku rose from their cover, guns raised. They wove through the storm of bullets. They ducked low, rolled, and answered with return fire. But the man was nimble—sheer desperation making him move fast. He sprinted across the room in long, quick strides.

Izuku narrowed one eye and squeezed the trigger.

His shot flew straight and clean, tearing through the man's temple.

But the corpse's momentum carried it forward. The hand crashed down on the emergency alarm.

The button lit crimson. An earsplitting klaxon roared to life, shaking the walls and rattling through the building. Both Izuku and Katsuki cursed, and quickly began running for the door. They flung it open and entered an entirely steel corridor hall that was blinking red.

Izuku took the lead, leaning his body forward to sprint until his legs screamed. He turned sharply through the steel halls as the sound of endless storming boots began to charge their way in all directions.

When they turned more corners, the elevator came into view.

Izuku flew to it and slammed his hand on the up button. He pressed it rapidly, sweat beading on his brow. Behind them, the footsteps grew closer, and the shouts of the guards closed in on them like a tightening fist.

The elevator doors finally dinged open, and both of them ran inside.

Suddenly, a voice too close shouted. "I found them! They're in the elevator!"

Bullets soared. Izuku and Katsuki pressed themselves against the sides of the lift and shot out from around the doors.

"All units, head to the first four circles! I have eyes on the culprits—ah!" The man collapsed as Katsuki shot out his kneecaps.

The doors slammed shut, and the mechanical groan of the lift started. Without missing a beat, both of them started to recoup. Katsuki tossed ammo to Izuku, who caught it and reloaded in a single, swift motion. With a deep exhale, Izuku slid down the wall.

Katsuki locked eyes with him and said, "When we get to the Fourth Circle, we need to get back on track of the escape route. Aizawa is waiting for us at a designated spot on the surface."

“Okay,” Izuku nodded, anxiety pulling tighter. “You take the lead when we get out the building.”

The lift rattled, shaking with every floor it climbed. Above them, the red light still strobed. Katsuki kept his gun steady, barrel trained on the crack. Izuku pressed himself against the wall, pistol raised.

The ding came.

The doors slid open.

Instantly, four men in dark suits surged in at once. Their rifles fired rapidly as they charged into the elevator without fear. They shot off rounds recklessly as Izuku and Katsuki tried to dodge and take defense. Izuku cursed when one man pinned him to the wall with a rifle.

And then, through the static a voice cut in—loud through Katsuki’s earpiece.

“I got a read on Bakugou!” Denki yelled through the intercom, buzzing with interference. “He made it to the Fourth Circle. Do you have Izuku?!”

Katsuki snarled, ducking under a swing. “Yeah, I got him! We’re sort of fucking busy right now!”

He fired off several shots. One round to a man’s chest and another through his eye. The body spasmed and fell. Next to him, Izuku snapped his palm up, knocking a rifle aside as the trigger went off. The muzzle flashed, exploding inches from his face. The bullet shrieked past his cheek and split into the wall.

“Okay, great,” Denki said. He sounded strained, like he was trying to focus while half-distracted by something else. “You’re a bit off track from the topside exit point. You need to get back east! Team A is still out of my comms reach, but that’s expected—hold tight!”

Another guard swung the butt of his rifle into Katsuki’s ribs.

Katsuki caught it, ripped it free, and slammed the man’s skull against the steel wall so hard it cracked.

The third guard’s pistol came up, too quick. The shots rang out, deafening in the steel box.

Suddenly, pain ripped through Izuku’s arm. His own blood sprayed across the wall as the bullet tore into his muscle. He screamed loudly and his gun slipped from his grip. He swayed, vision flaring white.

“Fuck,” Katsuki growled, cutting his eyes to Izuku as he fought off another man.

Izuku steeled himself, then flung forward. His hand shot out and clamped the shooter’s wrist. He twisted it until the bone crunched, and wrenched the pistol free. In a flash of motion, Izuku squeezed the trigger. The bullet punched through the man’s throat point-blank.

Beside him, Katsuki slammed another guard's head into the elevator's circuit board. Sparks flew as Katsuki drove his knife into the side of the man's skull. He ripped it free, spraying more blood across the elevator walls.

The last guard lunged.

Izuku slammed into him, pinning him to the wall even as the rifle went off again. He winced, ignoring the pain in his arm as he overpowered the guard. In a swift movement, Izuku jammed the barrel beneath the man's chin. He forced the man's finger to pull the trigger. Blood sprayed up and came down on him, staining him further in red.

Silence stretched into the lift. Four corpses. Blood everywhere.

Izuku collapsed to one knee, clamping a hand over the hole in his arm. His head became slightly woozy, and he suddenly felt sick to the stomach.

Katsuki crouched beside him, panting. He tenderly wiped the blood off Izuku's face with his shaking hand.

"You good?" He whispered. "Do we need to bandage you up quickly?"

Izuku shook his head and forced his voice out. "I'll be okay. W-We have to keep going. There's not much time—"

The intercom came to life again. Denki's voice strained over the blurry static. "Bakugou, are you still with me? You need to move. A shit ton of signals are heading your way fast."

"Yeah, yeah—we're fucking moving!" Katsuki barked.

He reached down and helped Izuku to his feet.

Blood dripped in a steady trail as they ran out of the elevator. Izuku led them, sprinting down the steel corridor. Above them, the alarms howled in their wake. When his stomach turned unpleasantly, the adrenaline in Izuku doubled. The pain in his arm went numb as he ate the sensation and funneled it into his core for drive to push toward.

Denki's voice cut in through the static again. "Holy shit, there's a ton of people heading your way, Bakugou—What the hell? It looks like they turned direction."

"Izuku had a tracker on his ankle," Katsuki explained, clenching his jaw. "The decoy mission probably fell through when they figured that out."

They ran out of the building, and the Fourth Circle unfolded in a wash of golden light.

Gold lanterns glowed overhead while the air was alive with smoke from sizzling food carts. Vendors shouted, gangsters laughed, and strangers clinked glasses. However, whispers rippled beneath the noise. Too many heads were bent over phones, and too many thumbs were tapping frantically.

Word of the wedding was likely pinging from phone to phone now.

Suddenly, the sharp rhythm of boots echoed behind them. Katsuki yanked Izuku into the shadows, pressing him close as the Yakuza guards stormed into the building they had just fled. They froze, every muscle taut, holding their breath as the sound of pursuit thundered past.

Only when the echoes faded did Izuku risk a glance around the corner—the path ahead was clear.

They began moving. Leading the way, Katsuki steered them around the crowd with a predator's precision. They ducked from alley to alley, keeping their faces concealed as they moved through the surging crowd.

Along the way, Izuku peered from around the corners. There, he could sometimes see Yakuza lackeys loitering at the fringes. Their guns were pointed as they barked orders at civilians, demanding any information and directions.

By some miracle, they reached the stairs to the Third Circle unscathed. Izuku's chest tightened when the green-and-blue neon glow came into view. But worse, he saw Yakuza prowling the large staircase, snatching hoodies off of heads.

"There's guards on the stairs," Izuku whispered.

Katsuki rolled his shoulders. "Yeah. Prepared to make another run for it?"

Izuku nodded.

They both took deep breaths and sprinted. They dashed upwards, and in a gush of fierce wind, passed by several guards. All heads snapped towards them, and shortly the shouts came.

"There they are! Get them!"

Both Izuku and Katsuki cursed at the same time and plunged up the steps three at a time. Onlookers pointed and raised their phones to snap photos between taking bites of greasy skewers. As they ran this time, Izuku could feel the twist of nausea in his gut, but he forced his legs faster.

Behind them came the pounding sound of pursuit. Dozens were chasing after them.

When they breached the Third Circle, it cut straight into chaos. A barrier of bodies slammed against them. Strangers yelled, stumbled, and spilled food as they tried to shove through. Gunfire split the air, and one shot whistled past, slicing a line across Izuku's ear.

He hissed, swerving to throw them off.

"Bakugou, you're going west!" Denki shouted. "You need to go east!"

Katsuki slammed a hand against his earpiece, ducking another spray of bullets.

“We’re trying, but it’s not exactly easy!” Katsuki bit back. “How about routing us somewhere without Yakuza swarming every goddamn corner?”

“Okay, okay!” Denki’s voice rattled with static. “Uhh, on your left, there’s a dead end—but there’s a fire escape. If you climb, you can cut through a building and lose them. That building looks void of any Yakuza activity.”

“Got it,” Katsuki quickly replied.

They tore down the street, then cut left. The alley swallowed them in shadows but its foul scent leaked through the air. The reeking smell of rot and piss slammed into Izuku, nearly making him gag. Along the walls, dumpsters were lined up in crooked rows. But behind them, the mob’s roar was gaining speed. Civilians were shouting louder, giving away their position with pointing fingers.

And then they saw it—the fire escape.

Without hesitation, they both jumped from a dumpster onto the fire escape. The grate rattled and screamed under their force. Behind them, bodies were already filling the alley, not too far behind. They climbed up to the third floor, which had the nearest window. Izuku edged toward it, fingers trembling as he tried to jerk it open.

But it didn’t budge. It was locked.

His stomach sank.

He looked down and could see their pursuers closing in tight. He glanced at Katsuki, who was already staring back with the same grim understanding: if Izuku broke the glass, they’d give themselves away.

Soundlessly, they both slid down onto the platform, carefully crouched with their backs pressed into the wall. Izuku took shallow, quiet breaths, trying his best not to make any sound. Katsuki did the same as they cloaked themselves in the dark shadow, praying not to be seen.

Below them, bodies slithered about, running and then coming to a halt at the same dead end.

Izuku peered through the grate below, and his heart stopped when he saw who it was.

“Are you sure that wasn’t really him that went the other way?” Zen asked in a harsh tone. “I saw the Hoari.”

“I know it wasn’t him because I saw the hair color of the second person,” Tomura hissed. “He was blonde.” He whirled on the three other Vipers. “I thought you all said you were absolutely certain Bakugou Katsuki was dead?”

“We—” The Viper cleared their throat. “We were! I swear it, we dug up the grave and opened it exactly like you asked. He was rotting inside, face down drowned in his own blood from the abdomen wound. He even had on the same clothes from that night. There’s no way that wasn’t him.”

“Did you flip it over to be sure?” Ms. Nagant pressed. She walked up to the lower rank Viper and sneered. “Tell me you checked the goddamn face.”

The lower rank Viper hesitantly shook his head. “We didn’t think that was necessary given the smell, clothes and state. It looked exactly like him. It wouldn’t be possible for him to break out, clean up, and get a copy cat corpse that fast with the wounds he had all by himself.”

“You dimwits,” Mr. Compress sighed. “He probably had help.”

Tomura closed the distance in two swift strides and punched the Viper in the face. The sickening crack of bone echoed through the alley and the man crumpled to the ground. Looming over him, Tomura stared down with cold, unflinching disgust.

“It’s possible because Bakugou Katsuki is from the goddamn gutter,” Tomura spat. His eyes were dark, and his usual composure was coming undone. “Never underestimate a mutt’s determination to fucking live.”

“How could you be so sloppy?” Zen seethed.

In the dim light, Izuku could see an unnatural amount of sweat on his father’s skin. He remembered then that Zen had eaten three pieces of cake.

He eyed Katsuki’s watch. It was 21:15.

The Viper on the ground nursed his broken face and dropped his head. “I’m sorry, Grand Father—”

“—Sorry isn’t going to cut it!” Zen snapped. The sweat on his forehead increased, becoming shinier. “Do you know how much deep shit we’re in? The Chisakis will kill all of us for this! There will be no merger now that there is no more Kai. And all our clients will pull away once this gets around. No one will hire people associated with the Yakuza Heir’s murder. We’re going to be blackballed if we’re not gutted first.”

The vein on the side of his neck popped.

“Izuku has ruined us!” Zen continued. “Absolutely ruined! Everything I worked for in the last several decades is gone. Gone! All because of that goddamn thing.” He groaned, and then paused. He gritted his teeth and shook his head, like he was fighting off wooziness. “When I get my hands on him, I’m going to strangle him—exactly like I did to his fucking mother.”

His words tangled as something ugly shifted in him. He doubled over, then straightened, and clutched at his midsection. Several wet, hacking sounds rose from him. First a gag, then a cough that turned into a ragged, choking fit. His face drained of color and his lips began to turn blue.

Tomura eyed him wearily, unsure what was going on.

“Are you alright?” Tomura asked cautiously. He walked up to him and placed his hand on his shoulder trying to steady him. “You should take it easy.”

Zen's convulsions slowed into a ragged cough. As he looked up at Tomura, his eyes were glassy, unfocused and red at the rims. For a moment there was only the rasp of air and a sick, metallic smell that began to spill into the alley.

"I'm fine," Zen replied. He brushed off Tomura's hand as his breathing became increasingly labored. "I'm just—" His eyes blinked and slowly lagged. "I-I'm just winded from running and I'm stressed. I have no clue what we're going to do now. It's all gone. No fucking marriage means no goddamn merger means no…no—"

He collapsed.

The Vipers swarmed in panic, dropping beside him in a frenzy of useless hands. Mr. Compress cursed viciously while Ms. Nagant fumbled at her purse, grappling for water. Tomura dropped to his knees and caught Zen's shoulders, trying to hold him upright. His fingers trembled, hovering as though terrified of breaking him further.

"One?" Mr. Compress asked, voice taut with alarm. He turned to Tomura. "What's wrong with him? What the hell's happening?"

Tomura glanced up, eyes filled with fear. "I…I don't know."

For once, he looked helpless.

Zen's body convulsed, spine bowing as if something inside of him sunk iron claws into his guts. Froth bubbled at the corners of his mouth, thick and white. The foam mixed with the dark stream of blood that spilled from his nose and leaked from the corner of his eye. His face lost all color, fully waxen and corpse-like, and every breath came out a rattling wheeze.

"Grand Father?" Tomura's voice cracked. His frantic eyes searched Zen's face, his chest, his shaking hands—anywhere for a sign that this wasn't what it looked like. "Just hold on—we're going to get you medical attention."

But Zen couldn't talk.

His organs were shutting down, one by one, collapsing in on themselves. A violent cough wrecked him, spraying clots of blood onto Tomura's sleeves. More came after, thick ropes tearing up from his lungs and choking his throat until it sounded like he was drowning on the inside. His whole body shook as though he was being eaten alive from within, each heave bringing him closer to the grave.

Izuku watched from above, his lip faintly curling despite himself.

Watching the venom settle in was disquieting. There was no dignity in this kind of death, dying of poison in an alley that smelled like shit—but Izuku thought it was fitting for a man like his father. He surveyed silently as Zen floundered in pain, dissolving before their eyes.

At last, Zen's head rolled back. His body sagged into limpness.

His eyes, wide and bloodshot, locked open as though death itself had startled him. They stared upward like glass—fixing, with chilling clarity, directly on Izuku and Katsuki.

Both of them froze.

Zen's eyes twitched, just enough to prove he hadn't gone yet. His body shuddered with dying spasms. And with one final, spite-choked breath, his hand crept upward.

His crooked finger lifted, trembling, and pointed.

Straight at Izuku.

Every Viper's head whipped up.

For a split second, Tomura and Izuku's eyes met. Tomura's expression shifted from ghastly to straight down scathing. His brows furrowed. His lips curled. His chin lowered. And his eyes —his eyes seared with unfiltered, wintry resentment and a look of contempt Izuku had never seen before.

Without hesitation, Izuku hauled his elbow back and broke the window.

Glass shattered everywhere, and he threw his body backwards into the building. The jagged edges cut him as he went flying back into a private room. He scrambled upright amidst the shattered pieces and made a run for his life.

Katsuki was right behind, but so were the Vipers.

They tore through green lit rooms, curtains whipping behind them. They ran past beds where startled patrons screamed and yanked sheets over their naked bodies. The two of them pivoted sharply, spotting a spiral staircase and taking it at full tilt.

Behind them, the two footsteps chasing them were faster than the Yakuza. Heavier. Sharper. Better trained, and their pursuers locked on to them like bullseyes.

The stairwell rattled beneath their sprint, iron steps screeching under every frantic footfall. Izuku risked a glance back—and choked. Mr. Compress and Ms. Nagant were chasing them, faces cold with fury as they closed in like deadly snakes. Mr. Compress twirled a fan of kunais in one hand, and Ms. Nagant leveled her twin pistols.

Both struck at once.

The crack of a bullet tore the air, passing so close to Izuku's ear he felt the heat of it, then the railing beside him burst in sparks. Chips of plaster and rusted metal exploded everywhere.

"Down!" Katsuki shoved Izuku hard, forcing him lower as another round punched into the wall where his head had been.

They barreled down the next flight, the stairwell alive with bodies. Moments before it had been full of flirting and kissing, but now it filled with terrified screams. Izuku's lungs heaved, but adrenaline carried him. His feet pounded out a rhythm of desperation. Another shot rang —he flinched as the concrete beside him spiderwebbed.

Ms. Nagant was methodical. She was herding them down exactly where she wanted.

Katsuki yanked Izuku through a half-open doorway. Bullets shredded the hallway where they'd stood, splinters biting their skin as the rotten wood gave way. They stumbled into a narrow service hall, the walls sweating mildew.

Katsuki's face was a mask of fury. "We need to lose them."

"No," Izuku gasped, dragging him toward the next exit sign glowing faintly red. "We need to kill them. They won't stop."

The building was a labyrinth, each hallway choking tighter, and each corner a trap. Above them, Mr. Compress and Ms. Nagant's steps closed in.

The final door loomed ahead. Together, Izuku and Katsuki slammed into it with their shoulders, full speed. The lock gave way, breaking wide open under their momentum. Another gunshot cracked—and the bullet punched a millimeter away from Izuku's head, slicing some of his hair.

They fell into green neon chaos.

The bass hit first, a seismic thrum that vibrated through their bones. Strobe lights slashed the darkness into fragments. An inebriated crowd danced, bodies squeezed together in the fever of a beat that drowned any thought.

Katsuki led Izuku into the tide of bodies, dragging him deeper into the swarm. Izuku's chest heaved, his wide eyes darting in panic as the crowd swallowed them.

Behind, the door slammed open again.

Ms. Nagant stepped through, pistols raised and black dress flaring. She moved with the cool command of a general surveying her battleground. Mr. Compress followed, blades gleaming.

The dancers screamed louder, mistaking the guns for spectacle.

Then Ms. Nagant fired one shot—and the illusion shattered.

Screams shattered through the club as dancers and patrons scattered in panic. Everyone raced toward the exits. Chairs toppled, drinks splashed across the floor, and fear pulsed through the crowd like electricity.

Katsuki didn't hesitate. He shoved Izuku sideways as Mr. Compress lunged onto the dance floor, knives flashing under strobe light.

The two collided in a blur of motion. Katsuki drove forward and Mr. Compress slipped back with an acrobatic grace. The older man spun one blade in his hand before slashing low. Katsuki blocked with his forearm, teeth bared, then swung back with a vicious hook.

Their fight devoured the center of the club, fists and steel clashing in violent rhythm.

Across the room, Ms. Nagant was already raising her pistols. Izuku ducked as the first round tore through a glowing bottle behind the bar, glass exploding into a storm of deadly shards.

He dove behind an overturned table, breath ragged.

Ms. Nagant advanced, every step calculated. She fired again, making the wooden table fracture inches from his face.

“Come out, 217,” she taunted. “Let’s put an end to this now.”

Izuku had a visceral reaction to hearing his number.

He tried to not let it get to him, but that simple call made the tattoo on his collarbone burn to life, reminding him of all the misery he endured.

He refocused his thoughts, and his mind began moving at lightning speed. He knew Ms. Nagant was an expert in both near and distance fighting. But her sharpshooting would lay him out cold if he didn’t close the gap. He needed to level the playing field and get in close.

He bit his tongue and exploded out of his cover, sprinting straight towards her. He raised his gun and returned fire. She dodged swiftly, light on her feet. She backslid, keeping the distance, but Izuku tightened in, sidestepping bullets that clipped him along the way.

Ms. Nagant cursed and tried to reset her range, but Izuku was already too near. He slammed his shoulder into her, knocking her against a column. She hissed and swung a pistol down like a club.

Izuku ducked, drove an elbow into her side pressure point—then, from the corner of his eye, movement—

“Izuku!” Katsuki called from the heat of his own fight. “Behind you!”

A Yakuza thug lunged from the scattering crowd, jumping at Izuku with a katana raised. Izuku twisted, caught the man’s weight, and flipped him over his shoulder. The man hit the ground, spine cracking against the floor. In one fluid motion, Izuku fired his last round point-blank into the man’s skull and tossed the empty gun aside.

Seizing the opening, Nagant raised her weapons—and Izuku reacted quickly. He swiftly maneuvered the sharp bullets grazing his skin and grabbed for the katana.

He spun the sword in his grip, backing towards the bar.

Nagant followed, pistols steady.

“You know,” she chuckled as she slowly approached. “I told One you weren’t going to make it when you were younger. I was hoping you died during The Cull, hell. I even made a bet on it.”

Izuku spat out a wad of blood and showed his teeth. “I guess I’m a lot harder to kill than you think.”

She leveled her gun. “We’ll see about that.”

He leapt onto the bar counter as she fired. His feet scattered glass and spilled liquor. The bass thundered under his heels. Nagant climbed onto the opposite end, duo pistols in both hands.

Then they danced.

Steel flashed. Gunshots cracked. The bar exploded in broken bottles as they clashed along its length. Izuku swung the katana in sharp swings, aiming for the kill. Nagant fired between his lunges, bullets grazing him.

She ducked low and swiped at his legs. But Izuku countered, blade singing through the air.

Momentum shifted like tides. He pressed her back. She slipped behind him. She drove him low. He surged up again. A vicious rhythm of predator and prey, each refusing to yield.

Then suddenly, she blocked a downward strike with her pistol—and the katana hit against steel.

A crack split the air. Izuku's eyes widened.

The blade shattered in two.

He stared at the broken hilt in his hand, the rest of the sword lying jagged and ruined on the counter. Ms. Nagant smirked and raised her pistol to finish it—

Izuku dove. He grabbed the other half of the blade from the counter and spun both shards in his hands like twin daggers. The duel devolved into a flurry. Ms. Nagant began firing wildly as Izuku deflected bullets with vicious precision. He closed the distance and violently knocked both guns out of her hands with a kick. She snarled and snatched a knife from her leg holster.

She launched at him.

Izuku caught her wrist, slammed his elbow into her throat, and with a savage twist drove the jagged piece of katana through her temple.

The world went still.

Ms. Nagant's eyes went wide, and blood trickled down from her temple, creating clean crimson streaks. Her body flailed, and the shards of green light reflected off her as if she were another broken piece of glass in the room. Slowly, she crumpled, collapsing lifelessly across the bar.

A savage yell split the air.

Izuku's head snapped up just in time to see Katsuki press the muzzle of his gun against Mr. Compress. The bullet punched through the man's eye socket with a deafening crack. Mr. Compress froze mid-motion. His arms fell uselessly at his sides, and his whole body pitched forward.

He collapsed in the center of the dance floor with a heavy, final thud.

His blood spread in a dark pool beneath the pulse of the strobe lights.

Izuku jumped off the bar—but the moment his feet hit the floor, agony stabbed inside him. He staggered and choked. His hands flew to clutch his midsection as he fell to his knees.

Katsuki was at his side instantly. He crouched low, eyes full of concern. “Izuku? Are you sure you’re alright?”

Izuku waved him off. “W-We have to get to safety, quick. I—”

The words were drowned out by the barrage of boots charging toward them. Both of them jerked their heads toward the door. Promptly, Katsuki yanked Izuku upright and dragged them into a sprint.

They bolted out of the club, the cold air of the Third Circle turning their sweat to ice on their skin. All around them, everyone had their phones raised, shouting, pointing, and reveling in the spectacle of the chase.

Izuku could feel their pursuers closing in, but worse, he could feel in his gut the beginning of a steady gnaw.

Katsuki set a brutal pace up the staircase to the Second Circle, hauling Izuku with him two steps at a time. When they broke onto the next level, their bodies were streaked in neon red and fuchsia lights.

Behind them, the pack still chased.

But something had shifted.

Through his wavering vision, Izuku could tell their pursuers were slower now. Some stumbled. Others clutched their stomachs mid-stride. Then one Viper dropped to her knees in the crowd, gagging before coughing up a flood of blood across the floor.

Izuku paled. He recognized her.

She had eaten two slices of cake.

He glimpsed at the watch on Katsuki’s wrist.

It was 21:30.

He furrowed his brow slightly. Something wasn’t right.

This was sooner than expected.

Horrible realization hit like a gut punch: the venom was working faster than anticipated. Which meant he didn’t have until midnight—he significantly had less time.

They cut east, racing back onto the path Denki had mapped for extraction. Katsuki shoved through the sea of bodies, ferocity and urgency boiling inside of him in equal measure.

Denki cracked through the comm in Katsuki's ear, ragged but clear: "Bakugou, good job, you're back on track! Keep going east—then up to the First Circle. Find an elevator, and you're golden!"

"Got it, Pikachu," Katsuki barked, not slowing his stride. "See you soon."

They ran hard, lungs lighting up as if every breath they took was full of smoke. They forced their bodies to move through the exhaustion, moving on pure adrenaline.

In a blur of neon and gunfire, they climbed to the final, First Circle, limbo. Izuku's heart bloomed with hope as they took their final strides to safety. But every step dragged more shadows in their wake. The Yakuza and Vipers multiplied behind them.

His chest tightened when he realized some faces weren't at the wedding at all. They were fresh reinforcements, untouched and ready for battle. Still they ran, clinging to the thread of their escape route.

They kept going—until the street ahead collapsed into a nightmare.

The alleys they were meant to vanish through were already choked with Yakuza and Vipers. The killers swarmed from the shadows, flooding like hornets disturbed from their nest. And behind them came more, wave after wave, an impossible overflow of bodies that sealed every crack and corner.

"Shit," Katsuki wheezed as he made a hard juke away from the rush of bodies.

"Too many," Izuku rasped, eyes darting to look for another way. "There's too many. They know we're heading for the elevators."

Katsuki yelled into the comm. "Denki! Reroute us—now!"

They pivoted hard around the corner, but the jaws of Hadeus slammed shut. More guards appeared making another blockade. The trap was tightening.

Denki's voice came in panicked, "Okay it looks like there's another way for you through—"

Suddenly, a muzzle flash cracked from behind. The bullet sliced past Katsuki's temple with a kiss of hot air. It missed him by a hair, but the impact tore through the comm in his ear. The small device went flying and shattered against a brick wall.

Izuku looked back in horror.

"It's fine," Katsuki growled, eyes locked ahead as they continued to run. "I have a tracker. Aizawa is going to have to find us wherever we surface. We just have to find a place to lie low until he comes—which might not be anywhere at this rate."

Izuku's eyes flicked to the bodies hemming them in on all sides.

But then an idea bloomed to life as they passed by a neon sign in the shape of a flower.

“Wait—” Izuku whipped his head to Katsuki. “I know another way out! Follow me.”

They cut down another turn, breaking from the bustling congregation of buildings and gawking spectators.

Izuku drove them deeper, away from the buzzing lights and into a part of Hadeus where color faded. The streets grew narrower and dirtier. The noise condensed into a low hum. Rats scattered at their feet, fleeing from the storm of boots and ricocheting bullets that snapped against the concrete.

Behind them, their relentless pursuers pressed on, a mix of Yakuza and Vipers.

As they continued, the ceiling dipped lower as the chase funneled inward. Soon, the city’s pulse thinned into shadowed tunnels littered with tents sagging against the damp walls. Hollow-eyed squatters watched from the dark as Katsuki and Izuku tore past, splashing through stagnant puddles.

Then suddenly several, violent coughs filled the space.

Izuku glanced back—and his breath caught.

More than half of their pursuers had begun to falter. Vipers and Yakuza alike stumbled into each other like falling dominos. Blood seeped out of their noses, eyes, and mouth. They came to a screeching halt and collapsed to their knees. The tunnels filled with the wet, sickening sounds of vomiting. And soon, the floor slicked with a grotesque slurry of bile and blood.

Izuku’s heart stuttered.

Those were the ones who had eaten one slice.

He glanced at Katsuki’s watch. It was 21:45

The poison worked its fatal magic. A fatal chorus of choking, gagging, and death rattles froze the onlookers in their corners. The unaffected Yakuza stared in bewilderment as their comrades seized in agony on the ground. They knelt down and began shaking shoulders and slapping cheeks. They tried everything to force breath back into the people convulsing on the ground.

But it was useless.

One by one, they all sank into the filth, gasping out their last breath together, swallowed by the dirt and rot of Hadeus. Then soon came a second wave, and the same thing happened. The bodies piled on top of each other, and the pursuit stopped dead in its tracks.

Those left standing gazed around in horror. Hundreds of bodies were piling high.

“What the fuck?” Katsuki whispered, revolted.

Izuku jerked his head forward and pressed on.

“C’mon,” he breathed. “We can’t stop.”

Katsuki shot him a sideways glance, unsettled by how unshaken Izuku seemed. Still, he kept his stride.

The tunnels they ventured into grew tighter with every step. The walls dripped with moisture, and the air was heavy with the faint smell of sewage. In the distance, cries and coughs echoed like ghosts bouncing off the walls. Only when the dying screams behind them were out of earshot, did Izuku allow himself to breathe.

He scanned the narrowing passages with quick, practiced eyes. His pace remained unbroken as his chest burned with the ticking clock inside him. Every twist and every corner he navigated with certainty.

Then finally—there it was.

A ladder loomed out of the dark.

Relief broke through Izuku’s grim mask.

“This way,” he urged.

They rushed forward and climbed quickly. The metal rattled under their hands and feet as they made their way up. At the top, Izuku shoved hard against the manhole. His muscles strained as he gave a loud grunt of effort until the manhole screeched open.

Instantly, a blast of frigid air rushed down. It filled their lungs, jarring them as they hauled themselves to the surface. Izuku emerged first, and Katsuki was right behind him. Then together, they dragged the flower encrusted cover back into place. It fell down with a thunderous slam, sealing the chaos beneath the surface.

Silence.

The alley was utterly quiet, save for the howl of wind funneling between buildings. The shift was so abrupt it was dizzying. Izuku then quickly caught Katsuki’s hand and began tugging him into a steady jog.

They rounded a corner, and Katsuki staggered. He glanced around and blinked rapidly in confusion.

“Wait—” he muttered, eyes wide. “Is this…?”

“The plaza?” Izuku glanced back at him with the faintest smile. “Yeah.”

The two crossed the frost-bitten square together, and Katsuki stared around as if he’d been dropped into another lifetime. Their footsteps echoed in the snow like ghosts as they took the path their younger selves once walked. The angel statue was still gone, and the fountain was shut off for winter.

“How the hell did you know to get us here?” Katsuki whispered in awe.

Izuku smiled sadly.

“I used to sneak through those tunnels to see you, before that place became Hadeus,” he admitted. “I know the way by heart.”

Katsuki caught his eye, and warmth passed between them. Steadily, they laced their fingers together as they jogged. Jointly, they then turned down a familiar, neglected road that held the one place they both knew would be safe.

When they reached their destination, it glowed under the pale blood moon.

The abandoned church sat there, weathered more with chipped wood and broken stained glass windows. It looked like it' been re-boarded up in the last several years, and the rustic cross that used to sit on top was entirely missing now. The building leaned slightly even more, ready to fall apart under the weight of the snow that piled on its pointed roof.

Quietly, Izuku and Katsuki hurried around the back.

There, they found it like they left it: a giant splintering hole in the side, big enough for them to slip through. One at a time, they ducked and crawled inside. Instantly, Izuku felt warmer. The old wooden walls half sheltered them from the deep freeze as the wind whistled with a warning.

He wandered to the center, heart pounding and chest heaving. Izuku lifted his eyes, catching the towering stained-glass window that loomed at the back of the church.

Against all odds, it remained unbroken. Its panes were still intact while the rest of the building crumbled around it. Moonlight poured through the glass, scattering fractured specks of red, blue, and violet across the church. It was still so gorgeous, exactly the way it was all those years ago. Izuku stared at the unforgettable design, a coiled serpent twined around a beautiful red apple.

For a moment the whole image seemed alive.

He then turned his head to Katsuki who was staring as well.

They locked eyes in a moment of silence.

Like a floodgate being opened, safety overflowed inside Izuku. It overtook him as he realized that they had made it out—alive. Together.

Every emotion came crashing down at once. Grief. Joy. Disbelief. His shoulders shook with the weight of it all, and his face crumbled. Inside, his heart clenched hard, begging him to return to the person he always called home. He looked Katsuki up and down, still grappling to comprehend that he wasn’t dead after drowning for so long in the darkness of his grief.

Katsuki stared at him back, eyes slowly watering up.

Then, without words, they ran to each other and collided into a fierce embrace.

Izuku choked out a sob as he heard the beating of Katsuki's heart. Its thumping anchored him to reality. It showed him with every pounding pulse that this was real—this was all real. Katsuki was alive and he had somehow defied all the odds.

Before he could stop it, a heavy onslaught of tears began pouring out his eyes. He clutched Katsuki harder, fingers shaking as he grasped on to him for dear life. The weight of his emotions shedded off of him, rolling down his shoulders and cheeks as relief so intense it filled his soul to the brim. He sobbed as Katsuki tightened his hold. Izuku tightened too.

They pulled back and Izuku looked up, face wrecked.

Tears carved clear tracks down Katsuki's blood-streaked face. With a trembling smile, Izuku lifted his hand and gently tried to wipe them away.

Beautiful scarlet eyes flicked over Izuku's face, studying every gash and bruise.

But then, Katsuki paused. His faint smile faltered. And then his gaze slipped to the side, as if something unnerving passed through his mind. He fixed Izuku with a dead serious stare.

"What was up with everyone dropping like that?" He asked wearily. "That was lucky for us, but what the hell was that? Is the air down there toxic or something?"

Izuku swallowed hard. His throat tightened as he forced the words out.

"No," he whispered. "I…I laced the wedding cake with a mamushi venom mixture."

Katsuki stared.

Then piece by piece, slow, horrific realization settled in.

"Izuku…" Katsuki rasped, eyes inching wider and wider by the second. He went ghost white in the face. "But you ate the wedding cake. I watched you—"

Izuku managed a broken smile, sorrow in every curve of it. And Katsuki's grip tightened as if he could hold him in place against the inevitable.

"No. No. No—" Katsuki's voice cracked, frantic, and unraveling. "Fuck, Izuku! Wh-Why the hell would you do that—"

Then suddenly, the clock in the church struck 22:00 sharp with a loud, melodic ring.

Izuku's stomach twisted in violent agony.

He gasped and yelled. The sound bounced through the church. Blood splattered his lips as he coughed, and his body began throbbing with an unorthodox amount of searing pain. His knees buckled—and quickly, Katsuki caught him before he hit the ground, hauling him upright in a desperate grip. Petrified, Katsuki's expression broke wide open with panic.

Izuku forced himself to stand, though the world tilted at the edges of his vision

“It’s okay,” he whispered quickly. “I-I have the antidote in my pocket. It’s a triple dose so if I take it now I should be fine.”

Katsuki nodded, nerves on edge as he held Izuku up.

Quickly, and with a huge wave of relief, Izuku dug into his pants’ pocket. He reached his hand down low for the vial—

—and found nothing.

He froze.

A chill punched into his spine.

He hastily switched sides and checked the other pocket. Dread seeped onto his face as he patted down his pants for the vial. But as he did so, he came to the sinking realization it wasn’t there. His pockets were entirely empty.

He froze. Katsuki froze as well, mirroring his ghastly expression. They stared at each other as the direness of the situation settled in.

Izuku glanced at the clock in the background, ticking forward.

“I-I had it,” Izuku stammered, his voice falling apart. “I swear, it was right here—”

One footstep changed the whole mood.

Izuku and Katsuki snapped their heads to the entrance.

Standing there, covered in blood was Tomura. His clothes were soaked through with crimson that dripped in slow, obscene drops to the floor. Fly away pieces of hair clung to his forehead in matted chunks, and his eyes—his eyes burned so red they seemed lit from within with rage. The machete in his hand gleamed like bone under the moonlight, its edge blackened with gore.

He held up the small, glass vial labeled ‘mamushi’.

“Looking for this?” He seethed.

Chapter 48 — Crescendo

Tick. Tick. Tick.

Izuku couldn't move.

His bones were frozen to the marrow as the winter winds cut into him. Yet somehow the cold couldn't compare to the frigidness of Tomura's stare. His brother's eyes were icier than any storm. And the longer Tomura glared, the more Izuku's skin iced over as if it was frostbitten.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

Katsuki's grip tightened protectively.

Tomura shifted. He swung his bloody machete over his shoulder and tilted his chin up calmly. But his composure was broken. His lip was curled. His cheek twitched. And his eyes were bloodshot, with red veins spiderwebbing across every inch.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

The clock progressed steadily, every second counting down to doom.

Izuku's breath stuttered in his chest, shattering the silence. "H-How did you—"

"Before the wedding," Tomura coldly explained. "I slipped it out of your pocket when I hugged you. And then I just followed the trail of hundreds of poisoned corpses and your blood all the way here." He tapped the spot on his arm that mirrored Izuku's gunshot wound. "You really should've wrapped that up."

Izuku's gaze dropped, and there it was—his own betrayal written in red.

Bright droplets of crimson littered the floor, trickling like breadcrumbs. His hand flew to his arm, gripping uselessly over the wound. He suddenly felt small.

Tomura stepped forward.

Katsuki pulled them back.

Tomura dryly scoffed, lips contorting into a cruel sneer.

"You know," he taunted. "I mistook this vial for venom. I thought you were going to shoot this up and kill yourself after the ceremony. Because, did you really think, as the one in charge of looking after you, I wouldn't check your room when I noticed how off you were acting?"

Izuku cautiously eyed the vial. "Tomura—"

"—I saw that goddamn snake," Tomura spat, talking straight over Izuku.

He pushed forward menacingly, and malice eclipsed his eyes with every step he took.

Katsuki and Izuku backed up steadily.

"I thought for certain you had hit rock bottom and that this—" He lifted the vial. "—Was mamushi venom. I saw it in your hand in the hallway. I figured I was stopping you from doing something stupid—like always. I even prepared for you to use this on yourself and talked to the Chisakis about putting you on suicide watch. But I see I had it all wrong."

He studied Izuku with disdain.

"I would've never guessed you were plotting to take everyone down with you—" Tomura dug into Izuku, the bitter winds howling with his words. "But you did it. They're all dead, you know. The Chisakis. The Governor. Half of the Yakuza and all the Vipers. One died in my fucking arms."

He gestured to his clothes, which were drenched in blood.

“If I had known you poisoned him with mamushi venom, I could have saved him with the antidote. But instead, I was left confused at what the fuck was happening. He coughed up so much damn fluid I don’t think he had any left when he finally went.”

Izuku’s stomach knotted, twisting tighter with every breath.

“No response?” Tomura huffed a dry, unsettling laugh. “Of course not. You don’t care. You only care about him. And because of your sickly infatuation, you have, in one fell swoop, destroyed our entire lives—and betrayed me more than I could have ever imagined.”

“I didn’t want it to come to this,” Izuku countered, finding his voice. “If you had just let me go, none of this would have happened.”

“You’re so fucking stupid, Izuku,” Tomura exasperated as if he was talking to a child. “As long as you were attached to someone who slaughtered five members of the goddamn Chisaki family, you would’ve never gotten far.”

Izuku opened his mouth to retort—but instead he coughed. A small bit of blood came up, making both his and Katsuki’s eyes widen.

Tomura tilted his head, eyes narrowing in on the red drip coming from Izuku’s lips.

He held up the vial. “You need this soon, don’t you?”

“Just give him the fucking antidote,” Katsuki snapped. “I know you don’t want to see him die.”

“You have no idea what I want,” Tomura venomously whispered. His wintry gaze sliced to Katsuki, filled with a terrifying amount of hostility. “Especially now that I know my own brother tried to kill me.”

Izuku stiffened.

Tomura’s eyes darkened with unfiltered animosity.

“It was the cake, right?” Tomura asked. “Because I was the only Viper who didn’t eat it.” Another dry laugh. “Ironic, isn’t it? To think, simply not liking matcha is what spared me from your goddamn treachery. All I’ve done to keep you alive—and that is how you were ready to repay me.”

Tomura stepped forward into the stain glass’ glow. Shards of red and violet littered across his pale skin, painting him like some desecrated saint.

Izuku and Katsuki edged back.

But Izuku’s legs rattled. His adrenaline was flooding what strength he had left. Something was building. He could feel the intense pressure weighing down, and he knew when it broke loose it would be nothing short of monstrous.

Tomura's face distorted, snapping under the weight of his indignation. His features folded as hurt tore through, only to be carved over a heartbeat later by contempt.

"You have taken everything I have worked for," Tomura accused, voice fraying. "Just to be with him."

"No," Izuku said, tone steadier than he felt. "I did what I did because this has to stop, Tomura. The children, the poison, the endless killings—the cycle had to be broken."

"Broken?" Tomura parroted unkindly. "I would gladly kill a hundred children again if that's what it took, Izuku. I clawed my way up that ladder of corpses so we wouldn't be devoured at the bottom of it. And I will never apologize for that."

"But now it's gone," Izuku shot back. "M-Maybe now…you don't have to do that. You can live your life without all the death."

"You still don't get it. I think the cycle is good. Humans are not kind creatures made of fucking love or whatever else you have convinced yourself. Humans deserve death. Every single person. I put myself at the top for two reasons: survival, but the other was because I enjoy killing. I was only envious of Nine because he got to determine who to kill."

Izuku stared in horror.

Tomura truly believed everything they were taught.

"And if I get the chance, I will rebuild that cycle," Tomura promised viciously. "Do you think I was assisting One for the hell of it? No. I wanted to help him perfect it."

Izuku's eyes flicked back and forth between Tomura, the clock and the vial.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

"And now, I realize my mistakes," Tomura continued. "Every time I let you keep a shred of naivety—I should have crushed it. But my worst mistake was not killing this mutt the moment I found he had his claws in you."

His glare plunged subzero, colder than the lowest circle of hell. All the grief and fury he was feeling tangled together in his expression, as if hating Katsuki was the only way he could keep from breaking apart.

With a sharp inhale, Tomura fortified himself. His composure snapped back into place like a lock sealing shut.

"Izuku. If you want this anti-venom—he's going to have to die," Tomura declared with finality. "Because there's not a goddamn chance in hell I'm letting you go with him after what you've done."

"And then what, Tomura?" Izuku hissed, readying himself.

“And then I figure it out, like I always do. I’ll hand his head over to the Yakuza for murdering Chisaki as penance, and then you—maybe I’ll carve up that face of yours now that it’s no use to me anymore. Or maybe—maybe I’ll sell you again to the highest fucking bidder so we can get enough leverage to start over.”

Katsuki gritted his teeth and yanked Izuku behind him. “None of those things are going to happen you sick bastard.”

“Make your choice Izuku,” Tomura said, ignoring Katsuki. “The antidote or him.”

“You know I’m not going to make that decision,” Izuku replied.

Tomura pocketed the anti-venom into his pants. With a deadly, steady hand, he reached back and grabbed his second machete from its holster. It gleamed under the moonlight, and all of Izuku’s instincts snapped into place.

Katsuki straightened and grabbed his gun.

“If this is the way you want it, then fine,” Tomura spat. “I’ll make the right choice for you. Like I always do.”

Tomura struck—so fast he was invisible until impact.

Izuku barely registered the blur before he was hurled sideways, ribs screaming as he hit the ground. Katsuki tried to swiftly backslide—but was too slow. Tomura swung his machetes down in two lethal arcs, slicing straight into Katsuki’s arm.

“Shit!” Katsuki screamed, blood streaming hot down his sleeve.

He stepped back and quickly drew his gun. But Tomura was on him, far faster than Katsuki ever could be.

Izuku choked, stomach cramping as the poison stirred. When his focus re-stabilized, his heart sank. Tomura and Katsuki were clashing in a vicious struggle—and Tomura was going all out. He was aiming to kill Katsuki for real this time.

Izuku forced himself upright and sprinted forward. He tried to go low, and aim for Tomura’s legs—but Tomura’s reflexes were sharp. His brother pivoted, and his knee drove into Izuku’s ribs like a battering ram, the crack audible. Air left Izuku in a broken gasp, blood splattering from his lips as he skidded across the ground.

Katsuki raised his gun and took the shot—but Tomura bent sharply. The bullet grazed past his shoulder, and in an instant he swung at Katsuki again. But Katsuki was ready this time and dodged by a thin hair.

“Come on, bastard,” Katsuki growled, teeth showing. “Try me!”

Tomura didn’t respond. Instead, he devoured the distance, machetes glowing like two streaks of moonlight.

The two titans collided head-on, matched in strength. Katsuki caught each strike with crossed pistols, every clash sent a numbing jolt up his arms, but Tomura's speed didn't break—it built. In response, Katsuki fired point-blank, trying to blow Tomura's head straight off. The recoil cracked like thunder between them as they stormed around each other in a blizzard of steel and bullets.

In the midst, Izuku was struggling to stand up. Every time he did, he fell. The poison was gripping his ankles, dragging him further into the grave with every second that slipped away. He watched with terror twisting inside him as the two kept going.

For a breath, Katsuki held the advantage. He whipped the pistol across Tomura's jaw, once, twice and then thrice. The sickening crunch reverberated through the room.

"Die already!" Katsuki yelled, each blow punctuated with unbridled rage.

But Tomura absorbed it, his head snapped back only to return with that terrible, unflinching snarl—as if pain didn't affect him at all.

Blood ran from his split lip and he sneered, "Is that all?"

Tomura's elbow whipped up into Katsuki's jaw, rattling his skull. A blink later, a brutal head butt split the space between them. The sound of bone smashing against bone cracked loudly, and Katsuki violently stumbled.

Tomura jeered, "Just as weak as your addict of a mother."

Izuku saw Katsuki stagger, dazed and open. And then his brother took a stance—to kill.

Adrenaline bolted past the poison inside of Izuku. He forced his battered body to move, wooden shoes pounding across the floor. He stopped the next machete swing in time by slamming his shoulder into Tomura's side.

For the first time, Tomura faltered. Izuku had matched his speed.

But speed alone wasn't enough. His brother recouped in record time and dropped his elbow straight into Izuku's gut. But this round, Izuku steeled himself. He braced his body and absorbed the hit—exactly how Tomura taught him too.

In those seconds, Katsuki came back to himself, teeth bared.

The tides turned, and it was two against one.

Izuku barreled into the storm, forcing his body to comply even as his lungs disagreed. He spun in with a flurry of aerial kicks. Each one was sharp and merciless.

Tomura met him with ease. He ducked low, letting each strike whistle past by the breadth of a hair. And his arms flowed up to block while his face remained entirely unfazed. He shifted with ghostlike precision, all while managing to hit Katsuki with relentless blows even as he warded off Izuku.

Katsuki did his best to block and returned fire. With every opening Izuku could give him, he landed a thunderclap like blow behind Izuku's lightning speed.

In perfect unison, they matched Tomura's inhuman strength and speed. But Izuku could see it in Katsuki's face, he'd never seen anyone fight like this before. Tomura was the top Viper for a reason—and Izuku knew they weren't going to be enough to take him down.

For a moment, his eyes slid to the side. His heart crashed against his ribs as he looked at the clock.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

Quickly, desperation took a hold of him. They needed to knock Tomura out. Now. He feinted low, pivoted high, and finally landed a clean blow—a kick that cracked against Tomura's jaw with a snap like breaking wood. Tomura faltered a single step, teeth clenched.

For a heartbeat, Izuku's chest filled with hope.

Then Tomura's hand shot out with bone-snapping speed. He seized Izuku's next kick mid-spin, stealing the momentum from him in an instant. With one brutal twist, Tomura hurled him across the room. Izuku's body slammed into a wooden pew with a nauseating crack. The bench split apart under the force, and he crumpled into the wreckage, gasping as fire ripped through his body.

Blood spattered from his lips and his stomach heaved. He gasped with one arm clutching himself as though he could hold his insides together.

Katsuki's jaw clenched at the sight, but there was no time to breathe. The pressure on him thickened, and Tomura's darkness blotted out the world. A fist came in like a sledgehammer, striking Katsuki square in the chest. The impact pushed him back. His boots skidded against the floor and air ripped from his lungs.

"The longer you fight me, the faster he dies," Tomura said coldly. "You might as well let me cut your goddamn throat now."

"Shut up!" Katsuki screamed. "Just shut the hell up already!"

He met Tomura head-on with no hesitation. The world narrowed to the brutal rhythm of gunfire yet again as Izuku struggled to lift himself back into battle. He wheezed and a wave of nausea brought him down.

More red spilled from his lips—more than before.

From the wooden wreckage, Izuku watched yet again as the church rang with the deafening thunder of countless gunshots.

Bullets tore everywhere. They splintered the wood as they tore through walls and shattered pews. Muzzle flashes lit the hollow sanctuary in quick, violent bursts. Katsuki burned through all his magazines in seconds, and when the final click echoed, silence pressed in like a suffocating hand.

Neither waited.

Katsuki ran forward, knife flashing into his grip as he drove in. He fought like a tsunami unleashed, raw strength and sharpened brutality colliding with Tomura's frightening ruthlessness.

An opening flared—small, fleeting, but enough. Katsuki seized it. His knife tore across Tomura's ribs, the edge sliced deep, and his fists followed with bone-cracking force. The sound of Tomura's ribs snapping echoed, a thunderous crack that filled Katsuki's chest with savage satisfaction.

But Tomura didn't flinch—he struck back.

A machete swung up in a merciless swing, the blade hissing past Katsuki's guard. It carved across his temple, shallow but searing, and blood sprayed warm down Katsuki's face.

Snarling, Katsuki shifted. His eyes cut sharp to Tomura's pocket—and Izuku followed the line of vision.

There, the vial glinted faintly beneath the moonlight.

Izuku's heart stopped. Katsuki's face contorted, and he sprung with a new purpose.

He wove past Tomura's strikes, but only barely. He took hit after hit until his body was covered in gashes. Soon, his movements turned deliberate, each strike barreling towards Tomura's body but angled as if he was circling him. Tomura kept up, but his face twisted in confusion when it became clear Katsuki was no longer aiming to kill.

When he realized what Katsuki was doing, it was a split second late. Katsuki rounded him—and got a full opening for Tomura's pocket.

Quickly, Katsuki's hand shot out. His fingers closed around the vial and snatched it.

Izuku's chest surged with wild hope.

Katsuki tore away, sprinting toward him, blood streaking his face but eyes locked on Izuku. The vial was in his hand, and for the first time Izuku felt the weight lifting. He told his body to move and suddenly he was on his feet, running towards Katsuki.

But then Tomura was there.

He appeared in Katsuki's path like smoke solidifying into flesh, faster than sight and crueler than gravity. He unleashed a cruel, precise kick, and his boot slammed into Katsuki's chest, sending him flying backwards.

The vial flew.

It spun in the air, slow and helpless. The entire world narrowed to that fragile fall of glass.

Izuku ran and reached for it. His hand clawed out though he was too far. Katsuki rebalanced quickly. He sprinted and reached out, bloodied fingers stretching. But Tomura moved like he owned the moment. His hand snapped up with inhuman grace.

The vial fell into his fist, as if inevitable.

Izuku's stomach dropped into a pit of ice.

Katsuki, with blood running into his eye, ran back for the vial with a roar. Izuku did as well. They met gazes, and understanding passed between them without words: get the vial.

They began a full scale assault.

Where Izuku hit quickly and precisely, Katsuki was all brute force, each blow they landed inched Tomura step by step towards the altar. Izuku became Katsuki's shadow, darting in and out. His kicks landed with error-free precision as he blocked the blows Katsuki couldn't. And Katsuki became his echo, landing strikes of strength Izuku wasn't able to. Together, they pressured Tomura. Fully in sync, like two sides of the same coin.

But between them, the vial was chaos.

It slipped from Tomura's fist in the hurricane, glass glinting under the pale light.

Izuku dove, hitting Tomura back as his free hand closed around it. But then Tomura's boot smashed into his stomach. The vial was torn from his grasp before he could retreat. Then Katsuki threw himself recklessly. He grappled the vial from Tomura's hand as their blades locked. But Tomura twisted, elbow breaking against Katsuki's jaw, snatching it back.

It became a pendulum of fate, swaying between them.

To Katsuki. Then to Izuku. Then to Tomura.

The glass flashed in the rapid exchange of fists, blades, and kicks. Izuku struck, Katsuki sliced, and Tomura moved like the epitome of death itself.

The vial slipped, caught, slipped again—until Katsuki finally ripped it free with a savage punch that sent Tomura backwards.

But Tomura countered. In a blur, his machetes raised to carve straight through Katsuki.

But Izuku matched his speed.

He threw himself forward, body screaming in protest. He twisted in mid-air with every ounce of strength left in him. His shoe smashed into Tomura's wrist at the perfect angle—and one of the machetes flew free. It spun and it buried itself deep into the wall with a splintering crack.

Izuku hit the ground hard. He rolled, pain lancing through his ribs, but he didn't stop. He scrambled up and his fingers seized the hilt of the machete. He ripped it free in a shower of dust and plaster.

With the weapon in his hands, he surged back in.

The church rang with the clash of blades as Izuku countered Tomura in a flurry. His strikes were too fast to follow, each slash darting like electricity.

However, his brother guessed his every move. He countered Izuku with sheer strength, every counterblow heavier than the one before it, but Izuku absorbed it. He clenched his blood soaked teeth as he pushed himself through it, using his nimbleness to keep him alive.

Katsuki darted forward, fist raised to cover him. But Izuku's head whipped around. His eyes locked onto Katsuki's—wild, desperate, and burning.

"Run!" he yelled. His voice cracked, but the command boomed. "Take the vial and run! I'll catch up with you!"

Katsuki froze for the span of an inhale, and Izuku knew every instinct of his was screaming not to leave. But then he saw the plan click in Katsuki's face. They needed to outrun and confuse Tomura. If they could find each other before Tomura did, then Izuku had a chance to drink the antidote. Even if only for a second—it would be the small chance they needed.

Katsuki clenched his teeth and bolted.

Tomura tried to follow, but Izuku was on him. He leveraged his speed, getting up every time Tomura knocked him down. He tackled his brother to the ground, and together they went skidding across the floor, streaking it red with blood.

Tomura shoved him off and they began to clash again, machete against machete. Izuku met Tomura's charge head-on. Every strike hurt his bones, but he refused to yield.

"This is foolish," Tomura snarled, his blade caught Izuku's mid-swing and twisted it aside. He shoved Izuku back, voice low and venomous. "Why are you choosing him, when everything I did, I did for you—"

"—No," Izuku hissed, forcing himself upright again, blood slicking his face. He swung again, fast and sharp, forcing Tomura to parry. "Everything you did was what was best for you! Your interests were the top priority, every time. I was an afterthought!"

Tomura slammed a kick into Izuku's chest, sending him stumbling. "You have no idea what you're talking about—"

"—Yes I do!" Izuku screamed, voice breaking as he slashed upward, grazing Tomura's jaw. "Everything you've ever done has been with you in mind first! It was all for you! You've deluded yourself into thinking you could make me happy too. But you've never put me first. Your thirst for power always came before me—"

Tomura's fist crashed into his cheek, snapping his head sideways.

"You only think that because you have no idea everything I've done for you," Tomura growled, following with a relentless kick that threw Izuku into another pew. He stalked forward, machete raised. “I’ve always made sure to take into account your best interest alongside mine.”

Izuku stubbornly got back on his feet, blade trembling in his hands.

“You think this is my best interest?” His voice cracked. “You thought making me watch someone I love die was for my own good? And then selling me off to the Yakuza?!”

“Yes,” Tomura replied coldly. “Because we lived in a world where pain wasn’t an option, Izuku. We could only control where we were in the food chain, and I spent our entire lives making decisions so we didn’t have to be the ones getting punched down on.”

He pivoted and slashed low. Izuku barely twisted clear. The blade zinged past his ribs, a strand of his green hair severed in the moonlight. Tomura’s sneer widened.

“You punch down on me all the time, Tomura,” Izuku hissed.

Tomura’s eyes flashed. “It’s different when I do it.”

“So it’s okay that I’m getting hurt as long as you’re the one to do it?!” Izuku screamed.

“Yes!” Tomura yelled. “Because I know where my limits are. I would never kill you, Izuku. But I can’t guarantee that with others!”

He began a relentless charge. Izuku tried to block, but it was nearly hopeless. His brother was moving faster than him now, landing a fury of punches and kicks that knocked Izuku off balance.

“Like most children, you do not know what is best for you,” Tomura said, anger growing. He began pummeling Izuku backwards with every punch. “And that’s the paradox, isn’t it? Children always think they know better than the people raising them. But the truth is—we shelter you from so fucking much.”

The blunt end of Tomura’s machete cracked into Izuku’s temple, making stars explode across his vision. He reeled, and Tomura’s other fist crashed into his stomach, folding him in half.

“And given our situation,” Tomura hissed, driving his knee into Izuku’s jaw. “I’m sorry I couldn’t be the soft brother you daydreamed about—but I still did a damn good job. I sheltered you from so goddamn much.”

Izuku crashed to the floor, coughing blood. But Tomura wasn’t finished. He grabbed Izuku by the collar, yanking him up.

“You have no idea the type of torture that went on in that basement your whole goddamn life—and you still don’t. And that’s because of me.”

His fist slammed into Izuku’s gut again.

Izuku gagged, blood spilling from his lips, eyes wide in shock.

“You have no idea why my goddamn face looks the way it does,” Tomura snarled, roundhouse kicking him so hard Izuku smashed against the wall, the crack of bone echoing. “Instead, you got to live in the fucking penthouse because of me. You got the lightest punishments in our books, because of me. And you were allowed to live in your romantic fantasy world because I decapitated the person who would’ve killed you for such a thing!”

Izuku slid down the wall, leaving a smear of blood, clutching his ribs as he wheezed.

Tomura yanked him up again, one-handed, by the collar into the air.

Izuku choked as his feet dangled.

“And if you didn’t ruin it—you would have married into the most powerful family on this half of the globe, and you would have never lifted a gun to kill ever again if you didn’t want to!” Tomura bellowed. “All because of me!”

“Tomura…” Izuku croaked. His body dangled like a broken marionette and his eyes brimmed with tears. “Why can’t you see that everything you did, hurt me?”

“Because even though it hurt,” Tomura answered flatly. “It doesn’t mean it wasn’t for the best.”

With a yell, he hurled Izuku across the church. Izuku’s body hit the wall so hard the stained glass above him shattered, raining shards of crimson and blue across his broken frame.

“Now stay down,” Tomura threatened, icy glare digging into him. “If you pass out, you’re not going to be able to drink the damn antidote.”

He dragged the flat of his blade across his sleeve, refreshing it for new blood. Without another look, he turned and stalked deeper into the church in search of Katsuki.

Izuku’s cheek pressed against the cold floor, jagged shards of stained glass biting into his skin. His whole body quaked as he watched Tomura disappear into the shadows. He tried to move, but his limbs wouldn’t obey. Every breath that spilled out of him was ragged and wet —exactly like the other poisoned individuals.

He pushed against the floor, arms shaking violently, but they gave out under him. The poison was sinking deeper into his flesh, and stealing his strength piece by piece.

His vision swarmed with black blotches, and the edges of his world shrank inward. Flickers of fractured light smeared into the glow of the blood moon, and the building around him collapsed into a blur.

But through that blur, he caught movement. He saw Tomura circle back, pacing the church like an apex predator who had no equal.

“No—” Izuku rasped, the word tearing out of him. “Y-You’re not going to take him from me again.”

Izuku clawed at the ground, smearing blood across the broken glass as he willed his body to move. His chest convulsed with coughs, each one spattering crimson onto the floor, but still he dragged himself on his feet. His knees buckled and his lungs screamed—yet he dashed forward anyway. Because if he stopped now, Katsuki would be gone.

And Izuku couldn't lose him again.

When Tomura vanished towards the basement stairs, Izuku felt another burst of energy. He gritted his teeth, and forced his spine straight. With every ounce of will left in him, he grabbed the forgotten machete and tumbled into a sprint.

The steps to the basement opened before him. He stumbled down, breathing hard as the darkness swallowed him whole. As he descended, the basement reeked of damp earth and old mildew. The space was nearly pitch black and lined with thick pillars that jutted up.

Shadows bled across the walls, swelling until they seemed alive. Izuku's vision swam. The poison began to warp everything, like some twisted house of mirrors. Shapes coalesced in the dark, and the shadows transmuted into the outlines of people long gone. They all whispered and reached for him.

"Come out, Bakugou," Tomura's voice slithered around, echoing from everywhere and nowhere at once. "You might as well surrender. Drawing this out is pointless."

The darkness twisted under Izuku's eyes, outlines of figures flickered between the pillars. Faces from the grave birthed out the blackness. One leaned close, and its hand, long and skeletal, pointed.

It was Hiryu, trying to lead him.

"You think you can protect him?" Tomura hissed, voice sinking in like noxious gas. "You couldn't even protect your own damn mother."

Izuku tripped, and his world tilted. Mitsuki's ghost stood among the shadows now. She raised her arm and pointed further along the way. He followed, half-blinded and chasing after illusions as the world twisted around him.

Tomura's voice sharpened, closer now. "If this continues, he'll die choking on his blood. And all that strength of yours won't be able to help."

Suddenly, a hand seized his shoulder.

Izuku flinched and braced himself—until he turned and saw Katsuki. Relief poured through Izuku's chest, burning hotter than the venom. He was real, alive, and had his finger pressed to his lips in a soft hush. The antidote gleamed faintly in his other hand.

Quickly, Katsuki moved to uncap the vial—

—and the shadows attacked.

Tomura erupted from the dark, sheering through the air like a blade through silk. He slammed Izuku back against a pillar while his other arm swung for Katsuki.

Izuku reeled sideways, hitting the floor, and in the blur he caught a burst of motion—two bodies colliding at a velocity that cracked the air like whips. Steel flashed, fists broke against flesh, and in the darkness Katsuki and Tomura clashed yet again.

Katsuki was holding his own. More than that—he was winning. He adapted to be quicker than Izuku had ever seen him, weaving between Tomura's machete slashes, forcing him to overreach. Every strike Katsuki threw landed heavier and surer. His strength forced Tomura to go on the defensive.

Izuku's heart seized with pride and fear in equal measure.

Then Tomura caught his footing again.

He landed four brutal punches into Katsuki's body, making him topple over.

Izuku's legs moved before his mind did. He hurled himself forward, tackling Tomura by the legs. The collision ripped through his ribs and made his vision burst with white spots. But he held on, dragging Tomura down onto the stone floor. The impact made agony scream into his bones, but he didn't let go.

"Go!" Izuku roared, blood spraying with the shout. "G-Get to the second floor!"

Katsuki took the opening. He bolted up the stairs two at a time, already yelling back, "Head for the nook! He won't know where it is!"

Izuku's pulse surged at the word. His eyes widened when he realized that was their advantage. He stumbled upright, forcing his leaden legs to follow. Pushing through the haze of pain, he sprinted up the stairs.

He dashed up them three at a time, nearly reaching the top—

But before he could clear the last step, cold fingers clamped around his ankle. Izuku slipped, chin hitting the stairs with a brutal thud. He whipped his head, and there Tomura was. He was covered in blood and more hair had fallen out of his bun. His face twisted in a callous sneer.

"You never fucking listen," Tomura hissed.

Izuku screamed out as he was flung down the stairs with unbridled strength. He went flying, the world spinning as he tumbled. When he hit the bottom, his chest hit hard against the cold concrete.

He gasped, breathing becoming ragged as his vision went in and out.

Tomura darted up into the darkness after Katsuki, leaving Izuku sprawled on the ground below, gasping and broken.

He turned on his side and coughed up more blood. He hated how he could hear Katsuki's and Tomura's feet above. But worse, he hated that he could hear a clock down here.

Tick. Tick. Tick.

He heaved himself up, gripping the machete with his twitching fingers. With another push, he clawed his way back up the stairs, each step wearing his muscles down.

Izuku emerged into the chapel again, lungs pulling sharply with every breath. He turned his head, and there they were—Katsuki and Tomura. They were at the altar, locked in depraved combat beneath the serpent-and-apple stained glass window. Its colors washed over them in a distorted kaleidoscope, bathing their blood covered bodies in red and green.

"I'm going to enjoy killing you, properly this time," Tomura spat as his machete crashed against Katsuki's knife. "You have been nothing but a goddamn pest. Everything that has gone wrong with my brother always ties back to you."

Izuku's eyes widened as Tomura hauled his machete back, readying the next, brutal swing.

He took the same stance he had with Nine.

"Kacchan!" Izuku rasped, his voice cracked.

But before Katsuki could hear his warning, Tomura struck.

A merciless blur of punches and kicks hit Katsuki's core. One, three, five, then finally a blow so inhumanly strong crashed into Katsuki's chest. The sound was awful, like all his bones shattered on impact. Katsuki flew backwards and slammed into a row of tall iron candlesticks. The metal shrieked as they toppled and scattered across the floor right as Katsuki's skull hit against the stone wall.

Blood trickled down. His eyes rolled back and then his head lulled. And in a horrible moment, his whole body went slack, dropping into a cold heap.

"No!" Izuku screamed. He stumbled forward, heart tripling in speed.

The small glass vial slipped from Katsuki's hand and rolled across the floor. Tomura's eyes followed it. He picked it up and curled his pale fingers around the antidote. Then he turned back. And raised the machete.

Izuku's heart stopped. Tomura's shadow fell across Katsuki's unconscious form as he lifted the blade high, its edge aimed clean for the neck.

Something inside Izuku tore open.

His body exploded. With one last, impossible surge, he threw himself forward. Every ounce of strength, fury, and love drove him into Tomura's path.

The machete swung down—

And Izuku was there.

His blade caught Tomura's in midair, steel shrieking on steel as sparks spat out between them. The collision rang through the church like a bell.

Tomura staggered half a step off balance. Izuku hit the ground moving, fist driving deep into Tomura's ribs. A sharp crack split the air. Tomura doubled over with a gasp.

Izuku didn't stop. He couldn't.

Bone crunched under his knuckles as he slapped another punch into Tomura's jaw, popping his head to the side. Izuku struck again and again, driving him backwards away from Katsuki and towards the altar stairs.

His vision blurred with tears. He poured everything he had into every strike to keep Katsuki safe.

But Tomura rebounded. His head whipped back, eyes blazing, and he blocked the next blows with frightening precision. He dodged, sidestepped, countered and moved like a mirror of Izuku—beat for beat.

Izuku matched him back. Every pivot, every slash, every strike was the same brutal rhythm Tomura had drilled into him for years. He heard his brother's voice inside his skull, whispering old commands—faster, harder, cleaner—and he obeyed without thinking.

In that instant they were equals: two forces perfectly opposed, their blades like lines drawn across a battlefield.

And balanced on that thin, trembling line between them was Katsuki's life.

Izuku felt Tomura's frustration grow into rage. With each blocked strike, with each dodged punch, the resentment inside Tomura grew. It became a black mass rearing like a second head from his body. Its eyes glowed a sickly, deathlike red, searing through Izuku.

"The longer you fight me, the closer to death you get," Tomura hissed. His eyes flicked to the clock, and for a moment his anxiety showed through. "Are you really willing to put your life at risk for him? Is he really worth all this?!"

"Yes!" Izuku's voice cracked. "I'll fight for him every single time—and that will never change!"

He swung high, aiming for Tomura's temple to knock him out. But the blade missed by a hair. Tomura ducked low, and the machete caught something else. With a sharp snap, it cut the red string holding Tomura's hair.

It floated to the ground between them, severed.

His brother's long, bone white hair spilled loose over his shoulders. And in that moment something shifted. His nostrils flared, his eyes darkened, and his body adjusted. Every strike now came sharper, and far more lethal. Izuku felt it instantly. The air changed. It turned cold enough to raise goosebumps along his arms.

A swing carved too close to his neck for the first time, forcing him to stagger back, and the truth sank in.

Tomura was going for the kill.

His brother's machete lashed again and again, each strike more vicious than the last. It beat Izuku back as he made terrible, desperate blocks.

For the first time in his life, Izuku recognized he was on the other end of Tomura's lethality—the razor sharp edge his brother had always kept sheathed for him. Now it cut straight for his throat, his chest, and his vital organs. Every near-miss whispered how close he was to being cut open.

"You love him so damn much?" Tomura spat, eyes wild and composure gone. "Then die for him! Hand in fucking hand!"

He blurred forward, faster than Izuku could track. By the time Izuku caught the movement, it was already too late to block.

The machete angled straight for his heart.

Time slowed under his adrenaline. Izuku's pulse thundered in his ears, and reflex took over. He lunged and did the only thing he could do. The only thing that promised at the end of all this, Katsuki would be safe. With his face covered in blood and tears, he aimed for Tomura's heart too.

For a single heartbeat, they were mirrors. Two brothers forged in the same pit of vipers.

Izuku screamed and drove forward.

And then—Tomura shifted. At the very last instant, his blade veered, not for Izuku's heart but for his wrist—a move to disarm, not to kill.

Izuku's eyes widened in shock. He tried to pull back, but the momentum was already spent.

It carried through.

His machete sank into Tomura's chest with a bloody, final sound.

Tomura jerked, a breath escaping from him in a broken choke. They locked eyes, frozen in shock, staring at the irreversible truth of what happened. Suddenly, Tomura's body stuttered, and the next step he took changed the whole mood—and paralyzed Izuku. The world shifted into hues of red as Tomura weakly swayed on his feet, something he's never done.

His brows furrowed. Confusion flashed first in his eyes. Then betrayal. Then finally—hurt.

His gaze dropped slowly, dragging down to the blade buried deep in his chest.

“You—” he rasped. A cough tore through him and spilled crimson across his chin. “You actually…”

Izuku’s eyes flew wide.

Reality struck him, and he let go of the hilt of the blade. He stared at Tomura’s heart, already bleeding through the shirt. One inhale at a time, his breath broke down into sharp, panicked bursts.

“No…” Izuku’s voice cracked apart. “I-I didn’t—”

Dark blood welled fast, spilling down Tomura’s chest. His brother stumbled backwards with one trembling hand clawing helplessly at the hilt and the other reaching for balance that wasn’t there. When he began to fall, Izuku tried to catch him—but his poisoned body betrayed him. His knees finally collapsed.

They collided together, momentum dragging them both down the altar stairs.

The world blurred.

In the fall, the vial slipped from Tomura’s hand. It fell with them, pulled down by the inescapable force of gravity. It arced in the colored light before shattering across the floor at the same time both Izuku and Tomura hit the ground.

The liquid spilled next to them, stretching across the floor.

They laid side by side at the bottom of the altar steps, blood winding together like twin vipers coiling into one. Izuku’s chest heaved in shallow gasps, his trembling body racked with sobs as tears burned down his face.

Beside him, Tomura convulsed. He choked as he spat another mouthful of blood across the floor. The whole time, their eyes remained locked—both wide and stunned.

Izuku shook his head, coughing crimson down his chin. “I…I thought,” he wheezed, face crumbling down. “I thought you were going for the kill.”

For the first time in his life, Tomura laughed. It was sad, and almost human.

“I told you,” he whispered, blood flecking his lips, “I’d never kill you.”

The words crushed Izuku. Tears came heavy and fast, and the weight of what he’d done slammed down until it felt like his heart was the one split open. He sobbed, powerless and unable to move.

Tomura’s gaze softened. In that moment, a complicated warmth flickered in his fading eyes. He lifted a trembling hand, and with the last inch of tenderness he had, he brushed a matted curl behind Izuku’s ear.

Izuku’s chest caved with a sob, tears spilling rampantly. “I’m—I’m sorry, Big Brother.”

Tomura's hand slipped away, thudding limply against the floor. His breath shuddered once, then ebbed out. Steadily, his body slackened and collapsed into stillness. And then his gaze drifted into the unfocused quiet of death.

Izuku screamed soundlessly, throat too raw for anything more. His vision blinked in and out, but through it he saw the faint shimmer of the shattered anti-venom. He craned his neck, feeling as if he was fighting against the weight of the world.

He looked at Katsuki, his Kacchan, still laying unconscious at the top of the altar. Izuku's heart clenched.

He looked towards the spilled antidote and with his arms, he dragged himself forward.

But his body didn't cooperate. Instead, the poison fought him every step of the way. He clawed across the floor, leaving smears of blood in his wake, trying so desperately hard to go to the puddle that was inches away.

However, it was too late. All his energy was spent and his body was gone.

He collapsed with his trembling hand outstretched towards the vial's remains. His eyes found Katsuki's figure through the haze one last time, and tears spilled over his cheeks as his lips parted in a broken cry.

"Kacchan…" Izuku's voice cracked, tears falling with the syllables. "I'm sorry…"

His body gave out and the darkness on the edges of his world seeped in from all sides. He stayed focused on Katsuki, appreciating one last time the view of the man he loved. Then slowly, the shadows finally held his hand and took him along, blackening his vision until there was nothing left but darkness.

Darkness.

Pure, airless darkness swelled all around.

Katsuki drifted in it, weightless, like he was buried alive all over again. The atmosphere was thick and pressed hard against his ribs. In the dream, he couldn't tell if his chest was still rising and falling. There was no ground beneath him and no ceiling above. Only an endless, suffocating black.

And then, through the void, a voice.

It was fragile, but unmistakable.

"Kacchan…"

The word whispered through the shadows. It was thin, but it pulled him. It tugged him along by his heart, urging him to come forward. His pulse thudded and his fingers twitched.

"I'm sorry…"

Izuku.

The name ignited his mind like fire catching tinder. The shadows pressed tighter trying to keep him, but Katsuki struggled against them. His body screamed to stay down, but his need to get back to Izuku burned hotter and hotter until a bright light cracked through the black.

And with a frantic gasp, Katsuki's eyes snapped open.

A splitting, skull-deep pain throbbed in his head, as if a brick had been broken against the back of it. His trembling hand rose, gripping his scalp. And when he pulled it away, it came back full of blood. His vision swam, frantic. His eyes clawed through the haze until the scene around him snapped into focus.

The first thing he saw was blood.

It was all over. It was on him, the windows, the floor and the walls.

And then his eyes landed at the bottom of the altar—and his whole world broke.

"Izuku!" Katsuki screamed, voice splintering in two.

Ignoring the skull splitting migraine, he scrambled forward. Every breath he took burned as he dropped to his knees beside Izuku's limp body. Desperately, he checked his pulse. But when he did, his worst nightmare became a reality. Izuku was going cold, and barely breathing.

For one split second, his gaze cut to Tomura beside him. The man's white hair was soaked in scarlet and his own machete jutted from his chest. His face was slack too—and a wave of nausea hit Katsuki so hard he nearly doubled over.

"Izuku," Katsuki cried, as he gathered him in his arms.

His eyes whirled around, searching for the bottle of anti venom, and then his heart sunk all the way to the bottom of his being when he saw it next to them, broken. The vial was shattered completely, and the liquid was all over across the floor.

With one single look, Katsuki gazed at Izuku's lips and knew what to do.

He bent down, cradling Izuku tighter. With no hesitation, he pressed his mouth to the filthy floor, dragging the acrid taste of chemicals, dirt, and glass bits into his mouth. He spat the shards out, then turned back. As gentle as possible, Katsuki cupped Izuku's jaw and pressed their lips together, transferring the anti venom through a kiss.

He pulled back, and his eyes darted all over for signs of life.

Izuku gagged. He choked reflexively and some of it spilled back, dripping down his chin.

A curse slipped between Katsuki's teeth. "C'mon, Izuku. Swallow. Fucking please."

But it wasn't working. Why wasn't it fucking working? With only one idea in mind, he clamped a hand around Izuku's throat. He tried to stop his fingers from shaking as he kneaded the muscles. Tears blurred his eyes as he tried his best to coax Izuku's reflexes to work. And then—he felt the swallow catch.

Katsuki's eyes widened.

It was weak, but it was enough.

He dove back down to the puddle of anti-venom, and pulled up as much as he could.

He did this again and again. He painfully repeated the process of kissing life back into the person who had put it back into him. His lips burned with glass cuts—but he pushed forward, begging Izuku to stay with him.

"Please, Izuku. Wake up, damnit."

By the end, Katsuki's tongue burned with the anti venom, but he had picked up every drop he could scavenge. He held Izuku in his arms, trembling and panting fully ragged. He continued to shake him, tears progressively falling as he feared for Izuku's weak pulse.

"My…blazer," a weak rasp whispered, barely audible.

Katsuki's head snapped toward the voice. There, barely clinging to life, was Tomura.

His pale eyes flickered, and blood dripped from the corner of his mouth. Every breath sounded like it was hurting him to take.

"I…I got…a dose…" Tomura gasped, voice thin as paper, trembling with the last of his strength. "When I thought…he was going to…poison himself."

Katsuki's heart skipped.

He sprung for the blazer, fingers fumbling for the inner pocket.

At that same instant, Tomura's head lolled back. His eyes went half-lidded, and the fight inside them unraveled thread by thread. His breathing slowed into fragile, fractured gasps. Then ebbed into silence.

For a moment, the air itself seemed to hold its breath.

It felt unreal that someone who had clawed his way through life from the bottom would succumb to his mortality. But really, Tomura hadn't surrendered to death. No, he'd been thwarted by the one weakness he could never purge from himself.

His gaze drifted to where Izuku lay. And for the first time in years, perhaps the only time in his life, his face softened. No rage. No bitterness. No resentment. His eyes clouded over, fixed on the brother he lost long before this moment.

True serenity passed through him as he took his final breath.

His chest went completely still.

An identical vial slipped into Katsuki's hands, almost too perfectly intact. With shaking fingers, he tore the lid off with his teeth and poured it desperately into Izuku's mouth. He guided the liquid down by massaging Izuku's throat, forcing him to swallow every last drop.

And then—footsteps.

A cluster of people came running towards the front door. Unfamiliar voices echoed beyond, and all of Katsuki's panic shot through the roof.

"Tomura's signal came from in here!" Someone shouted. "Quickly, search the parameter!"

Katsuki rapidly gathered Izuku in his arms and bolted for the hallway. He stumbled as his feet flew, cradling Izuku's head against his chest. Right as the door was slammed open, Katsuki turned and saw the one place he knew no one would look.

He fumbled for the small door under the stairs as the footsteps grew closer.

With a heavy thud, he dropped to his knees. He hurriedly shuffled both him and Izuku inside the small space. They were too big now, and their limbs tangled together in the compact room, but still Katsuki made it work. He rested Izuku's head against the dusty pillow beneath the old posters and closed them in tightly.

He cupped Izuku's head, shielding his face against his chest, and buried his own trembling breaths into Izuku's hair.

Outside, muted gasps of shock cut through the night.

"Oh my god," whispered one voice, dripping with disbelief. "I think he's…dead."

Footsteps echoed, drawing closer, slow and uncertain.

"Search everywhere! They couldn't have gotten far!"

Then, a pause. A groan, faint at first, began to grow.

"Hey…" Another trembling voice whispered. "I feel really sick suddenly…"

Katsuki froze, every nerve screaming. Then came the wrenching sounds. They were horrid, grating, and probably bloody no doubt. Panic erupted in muffled screams and confusion. Directly after came the sick symphony of bodies collapsing one by one. Shoes clattered helplessly against the floor as people tried to scramble but it was useless.

They couldn't outrun poison.

Each groan made Katsuki squeeze Izuku tighter. He buried Izuku's face in the crook of his neck. Outside, the terrible sounds continued on. A horrifying cadence of bodies hitting the ground and cries came as everyone seemed confused by the poison taking them.

And finally, silence.

Katsuki tightened his arms. He shuddered out a terrified breath, and screwed his eyes shut. He tried to wake up. This had to be a dream. It had to be. This was one of his horrible, twisted goddamn nightmares. Because this wasn't how this was supposed to go at all.

Then, a faint cough brushed against his neck.

Katsuki nearly lost his breath. He jerked back in relief and saw Izuku's lashes flutter. The other man's eyes pulled open with agonizing slowness. Quickly, Katsuki's hands flew to his face, cradling the fevered skin. His thumb pressed desperately over Izuku's pulse—only to find it thinning.

He was slipping away.

"Izuku, just hang in there, okay?" Katsuki begged. "Stay with me."

Izuku's lips pulled into a faint, sorrowful curve. He hated that he knew what type of smile that was. It was the kind of smile that already held a goodbye. Izuku was gazing up at him as if it were the last time he'd ever see him—and it destroyed him.

"You found your way back to me," Izuku whispered, voice so thin it nearly disappeared in the dark.

Katsuki's face broke apart. His grip tightened as if he could hold Izuku here by force.

"Of course I did," he whispered. "Again and again, remember?"

"I missed you…so much," Izuku murmured. His eyes blinked slowly and unevenly. "I'm… I'm going to miss you."

"Don't say that, you can't die on me, Izuku," Katsuki rasped, tears streaking down his cheeks. He shook Izuku lightly, desperate to keep him tethered. "C'mon, darling, keep your eyes open. J-Just talk to me. Aizawa will be here soon. I'm sure of it. You just have to hold on a little longer, and we'll get you help, I swear it."

But Izuku's gaze was unfocused, pupils drifting. Fear crept onto his face, as if he could already see the end approaching.

"I…I don't think I'm going to make it, Kacchan." A single tear slipped down Izuku's freckled cheek. "I'm so sorry."

"Don't you fucking say that," Katsuki snapped. His chest heaved, and something inside him fell apart. He realized there was only one thing left to cling to. It was the one thing he'd spent his whole life spitting on, denying, mocking—until this moment. "You're going to make it. Because it's—"

He swallowed hard and let the word burn its way out.

"—It's fate."

Light sparked in Izuku's eyes, surprised. His lips curved into the softest, most fragile smile Katsuki had ever seen. With what little strength he had left, his eyes refocused, he looked up, and he reached out for Katsuki's hand. They gazed at each other, full of love.

"I thought you didn't believe in fate?" Izuku asked.

Katsuki cradled his lover's cheek, thumb brushing away the tears. He smiled back.

"For you, I do."

Izuku's face lit up, and for a moment, it seemed like he was holding on. But then slowly his light faded again. It went out gently, like a vanishing, blinking star in the night sky. His perfect green eyes stared up at Katsuki, scared but tranquil, and then his hand went slack. He lost his grip as his eyes slipped shut.

Katsuki's face crumbled in heartbreak.

"No—no, no, no," he whispered in denial. "Izuku. Please—"

Katsuki shook him. He begged Izuku to open his eyes again and to come back. He promised him everything. The sun, the moon, the stars and anything he could think of. But Izuku didn't wake back up. His body remained limp, and his pulse progressively slowed.

He looked at his watch. It was 22:22.

His chest split with a grief so vast it shattered soul.

Behind his eyes, he could see a transparent figure of the boy with pretty green eyes. His friend smiled brightly and sweetly called him 'Kacchan.' One last time, the boy tucked him in and gave him a kiss on the cheek. He looked back once, then exited the nook with a wistful smile.

"Don't go," Katsuki sobbed, cradling Izuku closer. "Please, don't leave me."

Chapter 49 — Decrescendo

Katsuki sobbed until his throat was stripped bare.

Every part of him throbbed with pain. His arms trembled. His legs shook. Even his lungs were barely cooperating; every breath ground through him like stone against stone. But none of it compared to the harrowing ache in his chest. His heart wasn't breaking anymore—it was caving in, entirely crushed under the thought that Izuku might be gone.

He cried so much his tears soaked Izuku's hair and streaked both their faces. Some irrational, desperate part of him hoped that the sound of his pathetic ass crying might pull Izuku back.

But it didn't.

The love of his life remained motionless in his arms, breathing shallow and unevenly. Each fragile rise of his chest came slower than the last, like a dying ember trying to hold its glow. It was the most devastating sound Katsuki ever heard. Too soft, dwindling, and final. He knew that when it stopped, the silence would destroy him.

He clutched Izuku closer, burying his face against the curve of his neck. His lips brushed against cold skin as he whispered all the apologies his trembling mouth could form. The words tangled together, breaking apart between sobs. Regret poured from him like floodwater.

But no matter how many times he whispered please or come back, Izuku stayed unbearably still.

Then suddenly, a wave of footsteps breached the church. Katsuki froze, every muscle locking with dread. He braced for the sound of guns cocking and more shouting. It was probably the Yakuza again, coming to figure out what happened to their fallen comrades.

But then, through the echoing footsteps, came a voice he knew.

“What the fuck happened here—”

Katsuki’s eyes flew open. That was Monoma.

He’d never been more relieved to hear that grating, arrogant voice.

“Over here!” Katsuki shouted, voice frayed. He rose and frantically banged his bloody hand against the small nook door. “We’re over here!” He grappled for the handle, and shoved it open, letting in all the cold air.

The freezing temperature hit him hard, but still he dragged himself out on his knees with Izuku limp in his arms. As he stood, blood clung to him in sticky patches, matting his clothes, his skin, and his hair. It was on Izuku too—too damn much of it—and Katsuki’s stomach turned at the sight.

“Help—” he gasped. He tried to shout again, but all that came out was air and panic.

His teammates rushed to him. Through his dizzy haze, Katsuki could make out Aizawa, Monoma, Sero, Shinsou, and Miruko. Their faces dropped in horror when they caught sight of Izuku. Instantly, everyone’s hands began grabbing and steadying him. Several voices overlapped in disarray and alarm.

“Is he breathing?” Shinsou asked, pale.

“We’ve been searching everywhere for you, Bakugou!” Aizawa yelled at him, full of concern. “How the hell did you end up on this side of the city?”

“Are you okay?” Sero asked wearily, looking at the gashes covering his body. “The group chasing us suddenly all passed out without warning—”

Katsuki tried to answer them, but the world tilted. He tipped on his feet, swaying.

Quickly, Monoma made a move to grab Izuku from him. But Katsuki refused. His arms tightened and he shook his head as fresh tears started to come on.

“Izuku needs mamushi anti-venom,” Katsuki’s voice cracked, breaking under the strain of dismay. “Please. We need to hurry.”

Clear confusion filled everyone, but no one asked questions.

“I can get it,” Miruko said confidently. She gave Katsuki a reassuring nod. “We’ll meet you at HQ and I can begin to give him treatment.”

They moved quickly after that. Everyone helped guide them out of the chapel as he stumbled with Izuku in his arms.

As they passed through the front, Katsuki’s gaze caught on Tomura.

There, his pale face peacefully rested. His dead body was laid out among the others collapsed across the chapel floor. Through his shirt, red pooled from his bleeding heart encircling him. His once stark white hair was now deep crimson, saturated in a mix of his and Izuku’s blood. The colorful stained glass window painted his scarred face in shimmering reds, greens, and gold in the moonlight.

And he was utterly still.

A strange, unspeakable feeling inside of Katsuki’s chest twisted. He held Izuku tighter and forced himself to keep walking.

“Grab Tomura’s body,” Katsuki hoarsely whispered to Monoma.

Immediately, his colleague reacted appalled. But with one glimpse at Izuku, he seemed to consider where Katsuki was coming from. Quietly, Monoma grabbed Shinsou and jutted his head towards Tomura’s stiff corpse. The two back walked and lifted the heavy body off the ground.

Outside, the night was unrecognizable. Snow had fallen heavily while they were trapped inside, blanketing the whole world in an eerie silence. In the front of the church, the two waiting cars gleamed under the city lights with their engines rumbling.

The team moved fast, every motion fueled with urgency. Shinsou and Monoma hauled Tomura’s limp body into the trunk while Miruko slammed the lid shut. Denki jumped into the back seat without a word. In the next car, Sero slid into the passenger seat as Katsuki climbed in the back with Izuku cradled securely against his chest.

Aizawa flung himself behind the wheel, and the moment the doors slammed, the engine roared to life and they tore down the street.

“Sorry it took so long to get you,” Aizawa said as he began to drive aggressively. “The streets are absolutely a goddamn mess. Getting to your GPS signal from the original extraction point was a nightmare.”

As the car pulled out into the main street, Katsuki turned to look out the window.

All around them, Tokyo was in chaos under the blood moon. Traffic was grid locked bumper to bumper, and ambulances wailed in every direction. Thick, suffocating crowds pressed onto the sidewalks. Inside them, some people were screaming, and others were wailing. And some were collapsed lifelessly in the snow. The underground crowds had spilled up, and it was sheer mayhem.

Aizawa's weary eyes cut to one group of police officers. They were gathered around, shoving people back as they zipped up three body bags on the sidewalk.

"What the hell happened?" Sero whispered.

Katsuki looked down in his arms. His eyes burned as he stared at Izuku's blood-streaked face.

The only genuine explanation he could give left him somber and bitter.

"…A real tragedy."

Traffic getting out of Tokyo was exactly like Aizawa said—a fucking mess.

Every time they cut someone off, they jammed further into the gridlock because in the streets were people shouting and breaking down. News reporters were striving to get into the thick crowd, attempting to figure out what was going on.

Once they cleared the heart of the city, Aizawa drove as if the roads were burning beneath them. He cut corners too tight and clipped curbs without hesitation. Every swerve and jolt was a gamble against time as they perilously raced to reach HQ before Izuku's body surrendered. It was cutting close. He was clinging to a faint thread of life through the anti-venom he received far too late.

When they finally arrived, they barged into The Company's reinforced doors in a rush of urgency.

They all began to run in a full sprint, heading straight towards the medical branch of their HQ. Above them, fluorescent lights streaked overhead and all the walls blurred with the rush of bodies.

In the panic, Aizawa and Miruko shouted at anyone in their way to move. Beside Katsuki, Monoma, Sero and Shinsou ran grim-faced. All of their eyes were locked on Izuku, who's head was bobbing with every jolt, sinking deeper into unconsciousness.

The whole run, Katsuki was profusely sweating and his vision was spotting—but he didn't give a damn.

Because Izuku's lips were officially a petrifying shade of blue.

The second they entered the medical branch of The Company, Miruko hit the ground running.

“Clear the hall!” She yelled. Her voice carried expeditiously as she began sprinting down the white corridors, gathering people to attention with a vial in her hands. “Someone get me a stretcher—now! Prep this mamushi anti-venom, IV lines, and monitors—move!”

A gurney flew towards them, and dozens of medical workers’ hands began reaching for Izuku’s limp body. Without a word, the medics wrenched Izuku from his arms and placed him on the stretcher. They wheeled him quickly into a private room, already hooking up tubes to his arms.

Katsuki stumbled after them, heart in his throat.

When he got in the room, his eyes watered in fear. Syringes snapped, bags were hung and machines whirred warnings. Miruko’s hands were steady as she administered a generous dose of anti-venom directly into Izuku’s bloodstream through a needle.

“Get some fluids running,” Miruko told someone beside her. “We’re going to need to get him breathing support.”

Katsuki pressed closer, panic digging at his ribs. He looked at Izuku’s chest and noticed it was no longer rising and falling. His eyes widened in horror.

“He stopped breathing,” Katsuki whispered in shock. His eyes grew wider and wider and his inhales pulled sharply. “Why isn’t he breathing?!”

“Bakugou, step back,” a nurse said. “We’re going to need you to back up—”

“I’m not leaving him,” Katsuki hissed. His eyes tethered to the heart monitor, and the jagged line began beeping weaker.

“Crash cart—we need one over here!” Someone shouted.

Katsuki’s knees nearly buckled. His arms curled at his sides, nails digging into his palms as he shook.

Across the large room, the others began getting treated. Sero groaned as a medic cut into his sleeve, Shinsou muttered through clenched teeth, and Monoma winced at a stitch—but Katsuki couldn’t tear his eyes away from Izuku’s unconscious body.

A firm hand tapped his shoulder. He flinched and turned his wide, frantic eyes on Miruko.

“You need treatment too,” she said.

“I—I can’t. Not now.” Katsuki’s breath hitched, breaking into a ragged cough.

“You’re bleeding from multiple wounds,” Miruko pushed, gentler now. “If you collapse, who’s going to be there when he wakes up?”

“Don’t make me leave him.” Katsuki’s voice collapsed, choked by heartbreak.

Miruko didn’t argue. She only sighed and nodded to the doctors, who were under her orders.

Two physicians came in then and gently guided him to a hospital bed next to Izuku's. They ordered him around and eventually stripped him of his ruined shirt and pants. Various hands sterilized the deep gashes on his body and wrapped gauze around his limbs.

He winced when Miruko's fingers pressed along his sides.

"You've got multiple displaced ribs," Miruko said, regretful. "Bakugou. If we don't get you into surgery now, one of them is going to pierce a lung."

Katsuki shook his head hard, panic rising in his throat. "No. Not while he's—"

Monoma's voice came then, angry enough to cut through his grief. "If you go down, you won't be able to tell him how sorry you are."

Katsuki stiffened.

He turned to his colleague, who was getting a gunshot wound patched up.

"Isn't that right?" Monoma said with a determined stare. "You haven't told him you're sorry about the deal yet. So you need to go get your sorry ass in surgery. You have to be in good enough shape to grovel when he wakes up."

"Right." Katsuki's jaw clenched, and he nodded. "I…I still have to tell him I'm sorry."

He took a steady inhale and forced himself still as the stretcher came near. He hated the weakness in his body, and the fear of leaving Izuku's side was too much for him to handle. But he didn't fight the hands hauling him toward the doors. Aizawa and Miruko helped him onto the stretcher, and when he settled down, the terror in his gut multiplied.

The stretcher moved, and he craned his neck.

He kept his eyes locked on Izuku until the doors shut.

When Katsuki stirred awake from the deep haze of anesthesia, pain greeted him.

He could feel the tug of stitches biting along his skin and the dull weight of steel plates holding his broken bones together. He groaned in the morning light. This much brightness felt wrong somehow.

With a soft groan, he sat up slowly. Immediately, his eyes searched for Izuku.

His tired gaze flicked around and then stopped, finding exactly who he was looking for. There Izuku was, lying in a large hospital bed directly beside him, still unconscious. He was hooked up to a maze of IVs and a ventilator that rose and fell steadily with each artificial breath.

All around them were white walls, different from the ones before. But when he took a second, Katsuki remembered this room. He'd woken here more times than he cared to count after bungled assignments. It was one of the private infirmary suites on the highest floor of their HQ. This section held agents whose wounds were too severe to ignore but too dangerous to explain in a public hospital.

His vision focused, and across the way he saw a cluster of figures. Each one sat rigid, staring intently at a TV mounted on the wall.

Aizawa was in a plastic chair and next to him was the whole M-Unit. Monoma was perched on the edge of the room's couch. Beside him Shinsou slouched slightly but his eyes were alert. Even Denki was there, leaning forward while Sero held a scowl fixed on the screen.

Their focus drew Katsuki's gaze.

"What…?" He rasped.

On the TV, a reporter stood. She was in a coat, standing before a tumultuous scene of blinking red and blue lights. Behind her, police tape flapped in the wind, and hundreds of body bags were being lined up for identification.

"A shocking, disturbing night has fallen upon Tokyo," she said grimly. "Bizarre rumors are circulating about what occurred, but details remain unclear. What is confirmed is horrifying: a mass murder. Authorities confirmed that over five hundred people died, including the Governor of Tokyo and his wife."

Katsuki's spine straightened. He leaned forward, bewildered by the number.

Five hundred?

"Deceased individuals were found scattered throughout the area and confirmed to be poisoned," she continued. "Some bodies have been discovered in a previously unknown underground city, which was hidden beneath Tokyo. A place called 'Hadeus' that our public officials didn't know existed until now. It seems to be a free for all for crime, mobsters, and highly illegal activity. A giant crack down unlike ever before has begun."

The reporter paused and glanced behind her with a glum expression.

"Authorities are investigating the incident, which appears to be linked to organized crime. Some witnesses, though reluctant, report that the attack took place during a wedding tied to the notorious and elusive Chisaki family. Many people, however, are refusing to speak to the police."

Katsuki's chest tightened further as he looked at everyone's serious expressions.

"Because of the attire many victims wore, black, gold, or dark green, media outlets have begun referring to this incident as The Venomous, Viridian Wedding," she finished, low and serious. "We'll provide more updates during tonight's evening news."

Denki let out a low whistle. "Five hundred people poisoned…that's…insane."

“Maybe it was an inside job,” Shinsou muttered, full of unease. “The Chisakis probably have more enemies than we realize.”

Aizawa’s gaze turned, stopping on Katsuki.

“Bakugou,” he said slowly, “do you have any idea how five hundred people got poisoned, including Izuku?”

Katsuki swallowed thickly, hung his head, and let his gaze fall to the side.

“Izuku did it,” he whispered. His hands crushed the thin hospital blanket in his grip. “He…he told me he put an altered mamushi venom mixture in the wedding cake.”

Silence.

“That can’t be right?” Sero said, confusion showing in his face. “We saw him eat…”

His words died off. For a horrible moment, the room went dead quiet. Katsuki watched as one by one, everyone turned to look at Izuku’s sleeping form. The truth sunk in and it wrapped the whole room in disbelief.

Denki’s eyes shimmered with tears and he covered his mouth. “Oh…oh no.”

Katsuki’s fingers tightened further around the blanket as a combination of guilt and sorrow crashed over him.

“It’s a good thing we got there when we did then,” Aizawa muttered.

His gaze flipped between Katsuki and Izuku, measuring the fragile line between them where everything was balanced. Katsuki didn’t reply. Honestly, he couldn’t even if he wanted to. His mind was racing with too many damn thoughts to grab hold of a single one.

Aizawa stood and crossed the room, keeping his footsteps quiet.

He came to Katsuki’s bedside, and together they stared down at Izuku’s still form.

“He’s stable,” Aizawa informed him gently. “The doctors were able to pull him back from the brink. The only thing, his breathing’s weak. But otherwise he’s holding on.”

Katsuki nodded, pleased to know.

“So he’s just sleeping?” He asked. “He’ll wake up a little later or something?”

Aizawa pressed his lips into a thin line. He glanced around the room, and suddenly everyone else’s eyes skirted off to the side or looked down to the ground. Katsuki frowned when Shinsou exhaled a heavy sigh and turned toward the window. Then suddenly Monoma’s head dropped, and shame clouded Sero’s face. Even Denki’s gaze faltered, and he couldn’t lift his eyes to meet Katsuki’s.

A sinking sensation in his gut began to grow.

“What?” Katsuki pressed. “What’s wrong? Why are you all looking like that?”

“Well.” Aizawa hesitantly put his hand on Katsuki’s shoulder, as if to brace him. “We’re unsure.”

Katsuki whipped this head up. “Hah? What the hell do you mean you’re unsure?”

“While you were in surgery,” Aizawa explained delicately, “it was determined that he’s… fallen into a coma.”

Katsuki stared, not blinking. “A coma? Izuku’s in a coma?”

“Yes.” Aizawa gave the faintest nod. He glanced at Monoma, who still wouldn’t raise his eyes. “He was extremely close to passing away when we arrived. The doctors did everything they could, but the venom was already too far along. His body’s in shock, and the lack of oxygen forced him into shutdown. We can’t predict when or if he’ll wake up.”

Katsuki’s jaw worked as he tried to hold it together, but the pain still bled through in the glassiness in his eyes.

“The only thing we can do is wait,” Aizawa finished in a whisper.

All around the room, silence stretched on.

Monoma’s brow furrowed tight, Sero’s head hung low, and Denki and Shinsou traded guilt-ridden glances.

No one could speak.

In the background, the television still played. The news unraveled the endless string of events that plunged Tokyo into pandemonium. On top of that sound, Katsuki’s own thoughts buzzed loudly.

If only they’d gotten there sooner.

If only he’d been faster. Smarter. Stronger.

If only.

“You did well,” Aizawa reassured. He turned around and looked at each of them with pride. “You all did. I want to be very clear—this was not a failed assignment. I know you’re all feeling like it was because of Izuku’s state, but we got him out. It’s okay. He’ll wake up, I’m sure of it.”

When the silence continued, Aizawa sighed.

He walked to a small duffel bag and pulled out a clean set of clothes for Katsuki. Without a word, he tossed them across the room. Katsuki caught them easily, the fabric soft and heavy in his hands. When he glanced down, he saw that every piece was black.

“Let’s get you all some food,” Aizawa suggested to the room. “We need to debrief about the assignment.”

They all nodded. Everyone began walking to the door, and Katsuki breathed tiredly.

Left alone to change, Katsuki drifted toward Izuku’s bedside. He stood there for a sobering moment, studying the other man. Izuku’s eyes were shut, and his long lashes brushed against his freckled cheeks. He looked peaceful as he took limited, fragile breaths. Katsuki noted someone tried to clean the blood off him, but there was still a trace of stubborn rust color along his chin.

With the utmost care, Katsuki brushed Izuku’s bangs aside.

Then, right when he was about to leave, he caught sight of something shiny on Izuku’s left hand. He frowned and cocked his head. His curiosity pulled at him. But when he lifted Izuku’s hand up—his blood boiled. Searing rage burned straight through him, and darkness eclipsed his eyes.

Sitting on Izuku’s ring finger was an obscene single-rock diamond ring. It was gaudy, caked in crimson, and screamed the disgusting wealth of the Chisakis.

Without a moment’s hesitation, he snatched it off. His chest heaved, and his nostrils flared violently. He tried to contain himself. But all he could feel was infinite failure.

Failure. Failure. Failure.

Fucking failure.

With an excruciating yell, he hurled the ring across the room. The sound of it striking the wall rang like a gunshot. It pathetically clattered to the floor, mocking him as it reflected back the morning light. As it sparkled, his pain tripled. It folded on itself, and took him with it. Katsuki’s eyes welled up and he frustratingly wiped the tears away.

He gripped Izuku’s left hand.

“I’m so sorry,” Katsuki hissed. “I should’ve gotten there sooner.”

When the day wound down, everyone became quiet. Their unit drifted in silence with that awkward, tired shuffle people made after something terrible concluded. With the debrief done, the assignment was officially complete. And aside from him, the others only suffered minor injuries, so there wasn’t much else to be done.

During their meeting, Aizawa learned the extent of what took place. He seemed marginally mortified when they described the various Vipers and Yakuza dropping like flies. But he was happy to know One, or whatever the hell his name was, was officially dead.

Aizawa signed off on the last bit of Izuku’s green folder and sealed it shut.

“Well,” Miruko sighed. She leaned back in the chair and grimaced. “I guess there’s just the matter of that dead guy in my trunk. What should we do with him?”

All eyes swung to Katsuki.

He frowned intensely. In the crease between his eyes, he could feel a new wrinkle form from how displeased he was.

Bitterly, Katsuki mumbled under his breath, “For now, let’s put him in the deep freezer in the basement. That’ll stop him from…decaying.” He inhaled. “If it takes Izuku too long to wake up, then…then I guess we’ll have to dispose of him ourselves.”

Sero gave him a cautious glance. “No offense, but I think that guy is better off rotting away, Bakugou.”

“I fully agree,” Katsuki spat.

Anger flared inside him like a live flame. It was hot, immediate, and truly damn endless. He despised Tomura with every fiber he was made of, and his hatred hadn’t vanished just because the man was dead. If anything, it multiplied. Because now, Izuku was lying in a coma because he thought the only way out of his brother’s abuse was to take his own life.

Honestly, Katsuki didn’t give a damn that Tomura spent his final breath saving Izuku’s life. After everything, it was the bare fucking minimum. But Katsuki’s fury shifted into exhaustion the longer he dwelled on the bastard’s last moments.

His shoulders sagged as he sighed.

“…But I know Izuku,” Katsuki continued with distant eyes. “After what happened, Izuku is going to wake up and be worried about what happened to his brother’s body. So. For Izuku’s sake, I think he should have closure, however it looks for him. Tomura was his brother, despite everything.”

Everyone at the table became silent, but no one disagreed.

Eventually, they made their way out to the van parked in the back lot. They opened up the trunk and all of them stared down at the dead body. As they stood there, there was a strange serenity to the corpse that made Katsuki’s resentment burn hotter. The usual terror that carved people’s faces when they died wasn’t there. Instead, Tomura was serene.

It was as if his last moments were in peace and not in pain.

The freezer room was covered in frost. Every exhale Katsuki took came out in a puff of white, vanishing into the bright, silver room. With a grunt, Katsuki and Monoma hauled Tomura’s weight onto a steel tray. His hefty corpse landed with a loud thud, reminding Katsuki just how much of a force of nature the bastard had been while alive.

Quietly, Katsuki stood over the body for a moment. Tomura's skin was now faded to the color of salt, with dark veins weaving beneath the surface like they'd been painted on.

Monoma wrapped his arms around himself, breath trembling as he stared down too.

"Even in death, he looks intimidating," Monoma groaned.

Katsuki scowled when he thought of Izuku's frail state.

"Let's hurry and seal him in," he muttered.

Together, Katsuki and Monoma opened one of the many containers meant for bodies. The room was lined with them. They looked like giant silver drawers and were marked with plaques carrying information about who was inside. The Company only kept this storage room for freezing dead bodies, typically for Sero and other stagers for whatever needs they had.

Katsuki picked the farthest drawer, half-hidden behind others, slightly out of spite. He gripped the steel handle and pulled it open. They slid the corpse in together and Tomura's inked body gleamed faintly under the fluorescent light. The vipers etched across his neck still looked alive, slithering even now as their black horns twisted with the angle of the light.

When Tomura's feet thudded against the back, Katsuki slammed the door shut harder than he needed to.

Monoma held up a blank tag. "What should we write? El Diablo?"

Katsuki snatched it from him. "No."

He gripped the pen tightly as he scrawled a name in sharp, deliberate strokes. He clipped it to the drawer, and took a large step back. Staring at them was the simple name, 'Mamushi Tomura'.

For a long time, Katsuki just stood there, breathing hard in the frozen air. Then, finally, he turned away and Monoma followed him.

"Rest well, bastard," he muttered.

He flicked off the lights.

As nightfall officially came, everyone said goodbye. All his colleagues gave him mixed looks of pity and apology. They all promised they'd come back tomorrow, and solemnly Katsuki nodded along.

Because what else could he really say?

It felt odd. It was like he was stuck in limbo for real this time, tethered to waiting for Izuku to wake up.

He trekked back to the room Izuku slept in, accompanied by Aizawa. When Katsuki gazed around, he finally took in the full look of the hospital suite. It was quaint. White walls with a single blue horizontal stripe, and a generic blue flower painting above the two comfortable twin-sized beds.

“I left you some clothes for the week,” Aizawa said. “I figured you’d want to sleep here until he wakes up.”

“Thanks,” Katsuki whispered quietly.

“I’ll be back in the morning, kid,” Aizawa murmured. “Get a good night’s rest.”

Katsuki waved goodbye and Aizawa did as well. Behind him, the door shut, locking him in alone with Izuku.

Quietly, he went through the motions. He brushed his teeth. He showered. He washed his face and rid himself of all the dried, flaky blood. Every step was a struggle, and his body was still fully screaming out. When he changed into the loose black pajamas and entered back into the room, he stared at the small sliver between the two beds.

Without a word, Katsuki pushed his bed towards Izuku’s, and pressed them flush together.

He climbed onto his side and scooted his pillow as close as possible towards the love of his life. As he hovered over the other man, something metallic around Izuku’s neck caught in the moonlight. Katsuki reached for it, and when he tugged it free, his heart wrenched.

It was the eternity ring, on a golden necklace.

Katsuki lay down beside him, and his hand found Izuku’s. His thumb traced slow circles over the soft skin, memorizing its warmth as if he could anchor Izuku to it. In the quiet, he replayed every moment that led them here. Every mistake. Every desperate choice. Every miscalculated alignment.

He tried with all the strength left in him to will Izuku to wake back up.

“Come back, Izuku,” he whispered. “Please…come back.”

☽ ☽ ☾ ☾

Izuku held hands with the shadows. He couldn’t see anything, but he could feel the warmth of something guiding him through the blackness, laced with his fingers. Something warm stroked gently across the back of his hand. The touch was so achingly familiar that, even through the haze, he knew it meant safety.

So he followed it, step after step, into the endless dark.

As he wandered, a sound reached him. It was soft at first, then it became clearer the closer he came.

It was a woman crying in a heartbreaking way.

He froze, uncertain. But the shadow holding him urged him forward, pulling him towards the sound.

The blackness thinned, splitting open like fog clearing to reveal a scene beyond. Through the jagged gap, he saw Inko. She was crumpled on a small kitchen floor with her face buried in her hands as her shoulders shook. Beside her sat a small boy. It was him, no more than two years old. The child version of himself was crying too. His smaller self leaned towards her, confused, reaching out.

But when his tiny hand touched her shoulder, she flinched as though the contact hurt.

Before he could step closer, the darkness surged back in. It spilled over the image, swallowing it whole.

Izuku stood there, staring into the empty black where the image had been. His chest clamped tight as though a fist closed hard around his heart.

Then, it sparked again. The fog opened up, and suddenly the scene began moving away from him. He tried to keep up with it, chasing the fading scene until another image tore through the darkness. This time, Inko stood in a dark alley with a hood pulled low over her head. Her eyes were bloodshot, and her face was worn and broken. In her trembling arms was him, red-faced and wailing loudly.

“And you’re positive he’ll go to a good family?” she whispered, voice shaking uncontrollably. “I—I can’t…I can’t take care of him the way I thought I could.”

Izuku turned, searching for the person she spoke to, and found it was Koizumi. He was younger, though still almost the same. He possessed a polite posture and a professional smile that didn’t reach his eyes.

“Yes,” Koizumi lied smoothly. “I promise he’ll go to a family that will appreciate him very much.”

Inko nodded hesitantly.

Her hands tightened around her son before she finally let go. She passed the toddler into Koizumi’s waiting arms, and in return he pressed a small bag of cash into her hands. Izuku’s younger self screamed louder, confused. He began flailing while Inko dipped her head and screwed her eyes shut. She counted the bills through her teary vision.

“Ah, he’s a crier,” Koizumi muttered, bouncing the toddler in an awkward attempt to soothe him. “Hey now. It’ll be okay, little guy.”

Inko gave one last, lingering glance at her son. Her lips trembled before she turned and slipped away into the darkness, swallowed whole.

Izuku watched, and his heart broke. His younger self reached out desperately for his mother as Koizumi began walking. His tiny fists clenched, and his sobs began rising louder and louder as he was pulled away into the abyss.

Izuku saw his mother go, disappearing into the shadows. Inko blurred out of sight, and so he began following behind Koizumi. He walked for what felt like forever, trailing the man further and further into the void.

When Koizumi finally stopped, he stood before Peter Moore. Moore grinned greedily, took the crying toddler, and immediately passed him off again—this time to Ms. Nagant. She frowned and held the toddler at arm's length as though he were something disgusting she didn't quite know what to do with. She then turned and walked on.

Izuku followed her through the darkness too until she stopped. Without a word, she set the toddler down and left him there alone, crying, trembling, and lost.

"Mommy?" his young self whimpered, voice cracking through the black.

Izuku's gaze dropped. Even from here, he could make out the faintest splash of freckles across his nose.

Then suddenly, another figure stepped out of the void. It was Tomura, no older than seven. His hair was still black, and one of his eyes was bruised purple from a fist. He was wearing a frustrated frown and his quivering lip was split and swollen. A deep, crazed anger twisted his young face, yet he approached young Izuku quietly.

Izuku's younger self looked up at Tomura. Tears streaked his cheeks and fear was in his eyes.

"Wh-Who are you?" he whispered.

Young Tomura crouched down apprehensively. He studied Izuku for a moment and slowly his angry expression melted away. Now, young Tomura only looked sad. He reached out and pushed back Izuku's messy hair with surprising gentleness.

"I'm your new big brother," he said.

Izuku stood frozen, watching as his younger self's sobs gradually subsided. The child lifted his arms, and Tomura gathered him close. His brother cradled his head with a strange, protective care. Warmth spread through Izuku's chest as he watched his younger self finally stop crying for the first time.

Then young Tomura turned. His gaze cut past the illusion and locked directly onto Izuku.

Izuku froze.

In those eyes, Izuku saw a vulnerable loneliness. But he also saw endless rage.

Without a word, young Tomura began walking into the blackness. Izuku followed, and as he did, the darkness shifted. It dissolved slowly into their old dorm room. In a strange, nostalgic blur, he watched time fold in on itself and witnessed them grow up together firsthand.

Suddenly, footsteps he could never forget echoed behind him.

Izuku turned, and there adult Tomura was. His brother was exactly as Izuku last saw him. Older, hardened, and the weight of the world carved into his face. His long white hair was flowing down, gracefully pouring over his shoulders. Izuku's whole body tightened as Tomura came to stand silently beside him.

Together, they gazed on at their younger selves growing up side by side.

"It all went by so quickly," Tomura muttered. "Didn't it?"

Izuku blinked back tears, staring at the life before them. "Yeah. It did."

Moments surfaced that he hadn't remembered until now. Tomura letting him curl up in his bed. Tomura hiding him in the closet so no one would hear him cry. Tomura returning from training every night with fresh scars and bruises.

Then came the slow, inevitable shift.

The bitterness in Tomura's eyes transformed into ruthless survival and then into something darker than anger. Izuku observed as the warmth steadily faded from Tomura along with his black hair color. His brother stopped letting him into his bed when Izuku was six and after that, the distance between them widened with each passing year.

By the time Izuku turned seven, it was undeniable. Tomura had grown colder and more calculating. He became a creature of survival alone, and the vow to be the top predator was etched deep in his resolve. Izuku in turn, despite everything, kept growing softer. He secretly curled up with his banned book, and steadily grew warmer and warmer.

Their paths diverged like two lines drawn in opposite directions. And no matter how close they remained in space, Izuku understood that they never truly ever crossed again.

The room shifted, stretching from the cramped dorm into the wide-open expanse of their shared suite. In its walls flickered the flashes of their young adult lives.

They saw it all play out before them: the good, the brutal, and the quiet in-betweens.

Many nights were spent together binging an entire TV show on the couch. Other nights were Tomura hosting the family dinners. Then some days showed them happily getting ice cream as they talked about mundane things.

Then came the brutal bits: Tomura's voice raised in anger and his fist striking Izuku to the ground. The belt beatings. Over and over. The void showed them fighting and breaking expensive items in their storm. Then silence. The darkness replayed the long stretch of days they would spend ignoring each other until one of them caved.

A quiet, bitterness passed between them as one particular memory played before their eyes.

They both watched Tomura quietly cut fruit, place it on a plate, and leave it in front of Izuku's door after he purposefully broke Izuku's nose during a disagreement.

"I…only wanted to make sure we survived," Tomura whispered beside him.

Izuku's eyes stung. His voice wobbled as he answered, "You did."

The scenes slowed, bleeding into stillness. Before them, the suite shifted into the glorious penthouse. Their adult selves played out there too, living through life after Tomura took over Nine's position.

Together, they watched Tomura help him with his skin, and began dressing him better. Izuku went along with it, happily caring for Katsuma in the meantime. Then there was a memory of Izuku playing the violin while Tomura filled out some paperwork. Beside them, Katsuma sat at the kitchen table coloring with crayons.

From this angle, Izuku saw something he hadn't remembered before. While he was playing, his brother glanced over at them and smiled.

Then it all stopped.

Their past selves checked their watches, and began getting ready to leave at the same time. They put on their coats and turned towards the door to go. Slowly, the door opened, and out poured a flood of light.

The illusion of the penthouse burned away until only the door remained, suspended in the void.

Izuku looked around, and now there was nothing but him and his brother.

No memories. No penthouse. No Katsuma.

Only them.

Tomura stepped towards the door, and Izuku followed. Every step was heavy with the weight of everything that transpired between them. Along the way, Tomura glanced back. His face was unreadable in the ethereal glow.

"Looks like it'll always be just you and me, huh?" He said thoughtfully.

Izuku's lips formed a sorrowful smile. "I guess so."

The moment they reached the door, the blinding warmth rolled over them.

It spilled across Izuku's skin like fire and water fusing together. In the light, every ache, every scar, and every fragment of sorrow inside of Izuku melted. For a lovely moment, his body felt weightless, as if he was floating in the comforting promise of eternal peace. He closed his eyes and let the feeling of letting go wash over him.

He breathed it in, trembling with relief and grief all at once.

When he opened his eyes, tears were streaming freely down his cheeks. Tomura already crossed into the light, cloaked entirely in its brilliance. His brother gave him a rare smile and extended a hand, inviting him to join.

Izuku reached toward him—

And then suddenly, something violently yanked him backwards. The shadows gripped his hand, dragging him away from the brilliance.

He blinked, startled.

And then, softly, a familiar voice echoed through the dark. It was Katsuki's. It was high, boyish and calling for him. Izuku turned around, surprised, and the tugging grew stronger.

Out of the shadows came a tiny figure. Katsuki, seven years old, searching desperately.

"Izuku?" Young Katsuki's voice cracked with panic. "Izuku! Where'd you go?"

From behind him, another child's laughter bubbled up. A smaller Izuku darted from the darkness and leapt onto Katsuki with a grin. Katsuki startled, then broke into giggles as their voices tangled together in an innocent melody.

"I'm right here, Kacchan!" Young Izuku laughed. He pressed a quick kiss against Katsuki's cheek. "Now you're it!"

Izuku watched them tumble through the dark, chasing one another in a game of tag. Their laughter echoed faintly, and on their small fingers were the makeshift rings twisted from bits of string. Then, without warning, the shadow holding his hand grew warmer. And somewhere deep in the quiet, he heard the steady thrum of a heartbeat pulsing.

Before him, the other side of his life unfolded: he and Katsuki growing up side by side.

The years played out like a delicate, intricate song: the highs, the lows, the steady climbs, and the sudden pitfalls. He saw them dancing with the violinist, then meeting in Vienna and clashing head-on during assignments.

He witnessed their lives tangle together progressively, year by year, until love bloomed between them. All the years culminated in a stolen kiss under the Okinawa moon with Katsuki holding him like he was the most precious thing in the world.

He watched them sneak away together to Biei and share gentle memories. One showed him and Katsuki laying in a field of flowers, peacefully watching the clouds. Then another showed them laughing unabashed together in the kitchen over a cup of tea.

It showed it all. The soft touches. The quiet kisses. And the gentle caresses. It showed them escaping together to the mountains hand in hand, and then finally the proposal at the orchestra.

Izuku's expression softened, and his chest filled with longing.

"Or I suppose, you were never really alone. Were you?" Tomura murmured from the other side, voice tinged with sadness. "You had someone else this whole time."

Izuku turned, and through the doorway he could see Tomura standing there. Behind him, a faint glow revealed all his siblings. Ibara and Aoyama smiled at him wistfully. Jin and Himiko stared at him, their eyes judgmental yet patient.

Izuku's chest collapsed as he took in the faces of his siblings.

"I didn't want to kill you," Izuku whispered regretfully. He gazed at the others, pain heavy in every word. "I didn't want to kill any of you."

"I know," Tomura replied softly.

From behind, a hand gently rested on Izuku's shoulder. He turned to see Hiryu smiling at him before glancing at Tomura.

"I don't think it's quite his time," Hiryu said with a soft laugh. "Maybe a full family reunion will happen in a couple decades, but not today."

Tomura pressed his lips into a thin line.

Hiryu stepped past, offering one last kind smile before joining the others. For a heartbeat, Izuku feared the worst as Tomura and Hiryu's eyes met—but in the light, the tension between them vanished. Hiryu gave Tomura's shoulder a light, brotherly fist bump as he passed, a subtle gesture of reconciliation. He walked on and joined the rest behind him.

Himiko let out a quiet, bittersweet huff. "I guess we'll see you when we see you, runt."

Izuku's chest hurt, but he managed a smile toward her, nodding faintly.

With a small inhale, Tomura crossed back over briefly. He stopped before Izuku, his unreadable expression finally cracked under the weight of what he felt but couldn't say. His eyes searched Izuku's face, lingering, trying to hold on to him and measure the impossibility of what the life between them had been.

Hesitantly, he lifted a hand. His fingers brushed Izuku's stubborn curl behind his ear in a gentle, almost desperate gesture.

"I suppose," Tomura murmured, voice rough with unshed emotion. "If I had to guess what love is…then yes. I loved you in the only way I knew how."

The words washed over Izuku, unspooling the pain he'd carried for so long. His tears fell freely, blurring his vision as he stood frozen, silently letting them fall. Tomura didn't move closer. He only lingered for a moment longer with the faintest shadow of a smile on his lips. He then slowly stepped back towards the bright doorway.

"I'll miss you," Tomura confessed.

Izuku's heart clenched, each beat reminding him that this was final. Truly final.

"I'll miss you too," Izuku cried.

One by one, his siblings faded into the light, faces all heavy with a mix of pride and sorrow. Ibara and Aoyama offered quiet waves. Jin and Himiko nodded at him, carrying the weight of shared history. Hiryu smiled proudly and Tomura stared dolefully.

The door between them creaked shut with agonizing slowness and the whole time Tomura held his gaze.

When the portal finally closed shut, The Viper Seven he knew all faded into the brightness, leaving Izuku in the dark.

The shadows clung to him still. They were heavy and encompassing, but now they felt different. There was warmth there. A small pulse beneath the void. Confused, Izuku focused and then he realized: it wasn't shadows at all holding on to him. It was a hand.

Katsuki's hand.

"Come back, Izuku," Katsuki's voice echoed from the darkness. "Please…come back."

Izuku's chest heaved as he desperately grasped the hand back. Warm was his first thought. His next thought was that he wasn't done, and that there was someone waiting for him. Someone who he didn't want to leave and promised Mitsuki he'd take care of.

Gradually, the weight in his chest began to ease. It transformed as if he shed the last layer of his snake skin. It hurt to let go, but he stepped into the new version of himself through real, agonizing transformation. The searing ache of grief inside of him slowly grew into relief as he found peace in knowing Tomura's endless struggle was over.

The pain of letting go transformed into the beautiful but heavy feeling of solace.

He squeezed Katsuki's hand back.

"Kacchan," he whispered. "I'm coming."

ɯɯɯ

Izuku's eyes fluttered open; the world around him appeared fuzzy and surreal.

For a brief, disorienting moment, he thought he was still in limbo, trapped in a blinding expanse of white. Then, through the blur, he registered the faint outline of a figure. Gradually, the edges sharpened, and he realized it was Miruko. She was wearing a white coat, and her movements were precise and methodical as she withdrew a needle from his vein.

Izuku groaned, and rolled his head away from the ceiling light.

Miruko's eyes snapped to him, wide in shock. "Oh my god—Izuku? Are you awake?"

He tried to speak, but the memories from the church slammed into him with merciless speed.

Flashes assaulted his mind: the stained glass, the vial, and the blood. Katsuki's skull smashing against the wall. The machete piercing Tomura's chest. Each image punched him, leaving his mind reeling, and a migraine split through his skull.

Then the final memory came like a blow to his gut. The last he saw Katsuki he was battered, unconscious, and drenched in blood.

With a strangled gasp, Izuku bolted upright, eyes wide with panic.

“Katsuki,” he whispered, breathless.

His gaze swept the room frantically, but Katsuki was nowhere to be seen.

Miruko put a hand on his chest, calm but firm. “Izuku, slow down. He’s okay—”

“—I-I’m sorry,” Izuku apologized, pushing aside the gentle caution entirely.

He looked down and noticed he was free of needles and draped in a hospital gown. Ignoring Miruko’s calls, he swung his legs over the edge of the unfamiliar bed. His knees wobbled dangerously and nearly gave way, but he gripped the small table beside him for support.

Slowly and shakily, he pushed forward. His legs carried him with a will of their own as he limped towards the door.

“Katsuki?” he called, voice hoarse. “Katsuki!”

He stumbled into the hallway, every step echoing against the white tiles. His chest heaved as he wheezed for air. But another desperate bellow tore from his throat again, bouncing down the corridor.

“Kacchan!”

Then he heard it. The familiar, heavy, fast-footed steps answering the frantic rhythm of his own heart. He whipped around, chest hammering, and there he was. Katsuki bursted from a room at the far end of the hall.

His eyes were wild as he searched around and when he turned towards Izuku, time seemed to stop.

They both ran, closing the space between them with desperate speed.

Every step was charged with relief and longing. Izuku outstretched his arms, and Katsuki did the same. And when they finally collided, it was as if the world itself twisted around them in a halo of warmth.

The force of their collision spun them in a dizzying whirl. Izuku was lifted clean off the ground, and he buried his face in the crook of Katsuki’s neck, inhaling the reality of him being alive.

Katsuki pressed his face hard against Izuku’s shoulder, his grip trembling violently as though he feared letting go would tear Izuku away again. His breath came in ragged gasps against Izuku’s skin, breaking with sobs he could no longer contain. Their tears mingled in the space between them, fully unrestrained. Every shudder and cry spilled the agony of separation and the fragile relief of being whole again.

Together, they landed gently against the wall with Katsuki's arms tightening around Izuku. In that instant, they were home. Nothing else existed but the two of them, breaking down together, finally reunited.

"You came back," Katsuki whispered into his cheek. He shakily exhaled full of relief. "You actually came back."

Izuku smiled through his sobbing. "Again and again, right?"

"Right." Katsuki grinned and held him tighter. "Again and again."

ᔓᔓᔓ

The room was full, alive with voices, shuffling feet, and the faint sound of the IV drip as clear liquid fed into Izuku's bloodstream.

All around were the people he thought were marked for death, and it felt strange to see them all basking in morning light. Aizawa was leaning on the couch with a newspaper in his hands. Monoma and Shinsou were casually discussing something while Sero and Denki were laughing loudly at a video on Sero's phone.

Peacefully, Izuku leaned back against the pillows with a tiny smile. His hand rested securely in Katsuki's, their fingers were intertwined as they softly gazed at each other. Judging by the new frown lines, Izuku could tell Katsuki probably wore nothing but scowls for however long he'd been out.

On the other side of him, Miruko secured another dressing across his gunshot wound.

"Ah, thank you," Izuku murmured. He turned to her with a hint of embarrassment. "Sorry for the freak out earlier."

"Oh, don't worry." Miruko's laugh was light as she peeled off her gloves. "I'm very used to the dramatics around here."

Katsuki snorted under his breath. "She means Denki."

"Obviously," Miruko agreed, and the room chuckled.

Izuku gave a soft laugh too, careful not to strain his sore stomach. His gaze lowered, settling on the white coat draped over Miruko's frame.

"I didn't know you had a medical background," he said, voice still hoarse.

"There's a lot about me you don't know," Miruko teased, flashing him a wink. She began mixing some medicine for him and leaned back with an affable grin. "But yeah, I actually started here because Aizawa needed someone with medical knowledge on hand. I've got a medical degree technically."

Izuku's eyes sparked. "Really?"

"Yeah." She smiled softer this time, her usual brashness mellowed in the moment. "I only stuck around because Aizawa and I go way back, and I got curious what his elusive 'cleaning' business was. Now I mostly handle patch jobs for idiots who don't know when to quit—your favorite knucklehead included."

Katsuki rolled his eyes. "Tch. I'm not in surgery that much."

"You literally are my most frequent patient," she said flatly.

"I am not—"

"You are," Aizawa chimed from the other side of the room, expression unimpressed. "I have you under an entirely different insurance because of it."

The laughter spread, filling the space with a warmth Izuku thought was lost forever. The pain in his chest loosened as he looked around. Denki slouched in a chair. Monoma leaned stiffly against the wall with his arms crossed but his eyes soft. Sero grinned happily, and Shinsou was in the corner with his usual quiet watchfulness.

And Katsuki, always Katsuki, his hand wrapped lovingly around Izuku's like he would never let go again.

"I…" Izuku swallowed. He blinked fast before his weak voice could betray the cracks in it. "I missed all of you. Thank you so much. You all put yourselves in danger for me, and I don't know how I can repay you."

Silence fell for a beat, heavy but not uncomfortable. Then Denki huffed out a laugh, a little shaky.

"Man, don't go saying stuff like that," he said through glassy eyes. "You're gonna make us cry."

"You're already crying," Sero pointed out and tossed him a tissue.

Denki caught it and immediately began blowing his nose. "Shut up!"

Izuku laughed again, the gesture hurt but he loved it. He nearly forgot what it was like to feel pure, unweighted joy. As the room broke in light banter, Miruko handed Izuku medicine for the hole in his stomach. He drank it down, and Katsuki's thumb brushed over his knuckles, keeping him steady.

The voices in the room blended into a low, comforting hum around him.

As the others talked Izuku's mind began to wander. His gaze flickered, first to Katsuki's hand around his, then to the steady drip of the IV, then finally across the room to the small television mounted high in the corner.

It was background noise until it wasn't. The crawl of headlines at the bottom of the screen snagged his attention. Then he saw the passing images of flashing sirens and crime tape across the TV. He tuned everyone out as he watched the news anchors speak with practiced solemnity about hundreds of bodies unearthed from something they were calling The Venomous, Viridian Wedding.

Izuku's brow furrowed.

Then his eyes caught on six numbers far simpler, yet far more devastating.

He stared. Blinked. Stared again.

"I–Is that date right?" Izuku whispered, unsure.

Suddenly, the room quieted. His wide, bewildered eyes stayed glued to the screen.

Katsuki stiffened and sat up straighter. He followed Izuku's gaze, turning just enough to glance over his shoulder. His mouth pressed into a thin, reluctant line.

"Yeah," Katsuki replied at last. "You've…uh, you've been out for two weeks."

Izuku's stomach lurched like he was going to be sick.

Two weeks. Fourteen whole days.

He pressed his free hand to his abdomen, not against the wound but against the hollow weight of time passing through his fingers.

Underneath this shock, a terrible realization struck. It's been two weeks since Tomura. Two weeks had passed since Izuku drove a blade through his brother's heart. Which meant Tomura had been dead in that church, left to rot or possibly found—Izuku didn't even know.

The wrongness of not knowing, made his chest tightened with a quiet, unplaceable guilt.

Katsuki's grip on his hand tightened, as though he could sense it.

The silence stretched until Aizawa cleared his throat. He rose from his corner, his tired eyes scanning the room.

"Alright," he said evenly. "Everyone, I think it's time we get some food in him. He needs his strength back." He glanced at Miruko. "Is he alright to head downstairs for a while?"

"Yeah, he's fine," Miruko replied. "Just no heavy food yet."

"Perfect," Aizawa said, the faintest trace of warmth lifting his tone. "Okay, c'mon. Let's give you the grand tour, Izuku."

The room shifted with movement. Everyone except Katsuki headed to the door, but Izuku stayed still a moment longer. The TV hummed faintly in the background, and though his eyes didn't turn to it, he felt the weight of the date carve into his skull.

When he finally rose, he was helped by Katsuki. The other man kept him steady as he found the slippers next to his hospital bed.

"You sure you're okay?" Katsuki asked. "If you're still too weak, it's fine. You can stay here and I'll bring you the food myself."

Izuku lifted his eyes to him. A faint smile pulled at his lips as the sharp edge of his panic finally softened.

"I'll be alright," he whispered.

As he stood up, he could feel several fractures in his body and stitches in his skin he hadn't noticed before. He must've undergone surgery, and he was thankful for the medical repairs. Together, they moved in slow, uneven steps with Izuku leaning into Katsuki's side for balance. The whole way, his body ached, but Katsuki's arm around him made each step steadier.

Just before they exited into the hallway, Izuku's gaze flickered back to the bedside table.

Arranged in quiet order were fourteen bouquets of yellow daffodils.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Downstairs, the HQ's pseudo-cafeteria buzzed alive with loud chatter. The air smelled faintly of coffee and reheated food. When Izuku entered with Katsuki's arm still around him, a wave of whispers seemed to follow.

Dozens of agents in black suits glanced up from their meals. Conversations dipped into hushed tones and all eyes wandered towards them, then flicked away again, but not fast enough to hide the curiosity.

Izuku's pulse jumped. He felt oddly exposed, like someone who'd stumbled back into the world after crossing over. Katsuki's hand stayed steady at his waist, guiding him through the crowd. They joined the others at a long table near the back, where food was already good to go.

The chatter of the room rose again as trays were passed around. Izuku's stomach growled at the sight of warm food and coffee.

As they settled in, the familiar rhythm of clinking utensils and laughter filled the table. Izuku felt something resembling normalcy as he dug in, ignoring his shaking hands. He watched as Denki teased Shinsou and Aizawa pretended not to notice Monoma's snide comments to Katsuki while drinking his tea.

Izuku smiled faintly at the group.

“Thank you all again,” he said quietly, his voice trembling a little.

“It’s no problem,” Monoma replied immediately, waving him off. “You scared the shit out of us, though.”

“Seriously,” Sero added with a smirk. “Neither of you are allowed to die anymore. It’s annoying.”

They all laughed—but Izuku didn’t. His smile wavered, then broke. The weight he’d been holding in his chest came loose all at once, and tears started spilling down his face. His hands shook where they rested in his lap. He couldn’t believe that all this time, Katsuki had been alive, and now his brother was the one who was gone.

Then, softly, Aizawa spoke. “Izuku,” he whispered. “I need to ask you something.”

Izuku blinked, looking up at him through his tears. “Of course. Anything.”

Aizawa seemed hesitant, his eyes flitted to Katsuki. Then he looked back at Izuku with a more concerned expression.

“Why did you poison the cake at the wedding?”

Izuku looked down, feeling boundless shame.

“I…I thought you were all dead and it was my fault,” he confessed quietly. He glanced at each of them, and the guilt from before came in, reminding him of all the pain he’d suffocated in for weeks. “Watching my brother bury Katsuki alive killed something inside of me. Then I heard the guards confirm he was dead.”

He took a pause, and Katsuki reached back over to hold his hand.

“They said they found him rotting away in the coffin,” Izuku explained. “I-I never felt anything like I felt after that. I spiraled down until I couldn’t…I couldn’t see the future anymore. It felt like I was sinking into misery, and the only way to make what happened feel just was to bring them down into the darkness with me.”

Aizawa’s gaze softened.

“Revenge doesn’t bring peace,” he said, lecturing kindly. “It only keeps the wound open. You can’t build a life on hate, Izuku. You’ll drown in it.”

Izuku nodded weakly. “I know,” he whispered, eyes still glassy. “I see that now.”

“Unfortunately, I think the damage has been done,” Aizawa muttered. “I’ve been keeping a pulse check on the underground in Tokyo, and it seems like it’s pretty much disorganized havoc.”

Izuku wearily glanced up. “Really?”

“Yeah. Without Chisaki Kai and his parents, the Shie Hassaikai officially disbanded. The original Yakuza families are trying to make power grabs all over the place—but there are some Chisaki loyalists who are still looking for blood.”

“That makes sense,” Izuku exhaled heavily. “The Chisakis have long memories.”

“They do, sadly,” Aizawa agreed. “And as more bodies get identified, it seems like those Chisaki loyalists are noticing you and your brother, Tomura, are unaccounted for. On top of that, there’s rumors circulating about Bakugou being back from the dead after you two ran through the crowds in Hadeus.”

Izuku dropped his head.

It wasn’t as bad as before—but still not great.

“I’m sorry,” Izuku hissed. He clenched his teeth angry at himself. “I’m so sorry for all of this. I don’t know what else to do now that we missed Nana’s window, I…” He trailed off, shoulders sinking. “I don’t think it’s safe for us to stay in Japan for too long, but I don’t know how we can get out without someone like Nana’s help. Maybe we can wait for her to open again in a couple of months—but that backfired last time.”

For a moment, no one responded.

Then Denki leaned forward, grinning. “Who said Nana’s window is closed?”

Izuku lifted his head, confused. His eyes darted from face to face for what the joke was. But no one was laughing or teasing. Shinsou gave him a small, knowing smile, and even Monoma’s usual smugness softened into kindness.

Katsuki reached over and squeezed his shoulders, drawing his attention. Beautiful scarlet eyes gazed into him with the most hopeful, lovely expression of devotion.

“She’s still an option now, Izuku.” Katsuki said.

Izuku gaped, and disbelief flooded his features. “Wh-What?”

Katsuki’s thumb began brushing gently against Izuku’s collarbone.

“She said she’d wait for you,” he explained. “Her apprentice, Yagi, has been running her operation in the meantime, while she waited until you were ready to come back.”

Izuku’s breath skipped. He covered his mouth with one trembling hand, and new tears welled up.

“She waited?” he whispered.

“Yeah,” Katsuki repeated, grin widening. “She never stopped.”

Izuku broke. The sound that left him was halfway between a laugh and a sob. Katsuki pulled him close and rubbed his back. Around them, the others smiled, and the warmth of their small circle enveloped him like nothing he's ever felt.

For the first time in what felt like forever, Izuku let himself believe in hope.

He smiled brightly at the love of his life, then slowly Katsuki's smile started to fade. His eyes darted quickly to Monoma, who now was no longer wearing a smile. Izuku caught the exchange, and frowned slightly.

"There's something else," Katsuki said. "It's about your brother."

"What is it?" Izuku asked cautiously.

Katsuki looked at him with cautious gentleness. "…It'll be better if I show you."

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku stared down at Tomura, frozen in time.

The tattoos on his skin looked dull now, faded against skin that no longer held any warmth. But somehow, he looked…peaceful.

Terrifyingly peaceful.

"I figured it was a good idea to bring him back with us," Katsuki explained with his arms crossed. "I wanted you to have the final call of what to do with him."

Izuku simply stared for a long time.

For once, in this state, Tomura looked his age: only thirty. It hit Izuku exactly how young his brother really was this whole time. The shape of his absence pulsed inside his heart. It was crooked, uneven and gutted him out in a way that hurt and relieved him all at once.

Looking at Tomura like this felt like he was losing a weight he'd learned to live with. In a way, he'd miss the weight. It moved like a phantom limb with his body because of how much he'd grown accustomed to it. But ultimately, he couldn't deny he was better off without it—without him. And that's what hurt.

Knowing he was better off without a person he loved for years was a sour pill to swallow.

Yet, Izuku swallowed it whole in that moment.

He reached out and brushed a strand of hair behind Tomura's ear.

Behind him, Katsuki lingered. He didn't make a move, and he stayed entirely respectful. When Izuku finally drew his hand back, Katsuki spoke.

"What do you want to do with him?" His tone was careful. "Anything you want, I can make sure it happens."

Izuku studied Tomura one last time, then exhaled. The breath wavered, but his decision did not.

“Can we cremate him?” He asked. “I’d like to keep his ashes.”

Katsuki nodded once. “Yeah. We can do that.”

Izuku turned towards Katsuki, full of gratitude. His lover wrapped his arm around his shoulders and soothed him. Then, with all the care in the world, Izuku quietly slid the drawer shut.

He let the silence spread throughout the room and into his body too.

The building lights dimmed, leaving everything washed in soft orange. Most of the agents from The Company left out, and without the full bustle of the crowds, Izuku felt the emptiness creep back in.

Everyone from their group began to say their goodbyes. Denki and Sero left first, both giving Izuku a hug and a reassuring grin. Aizawa followed soon after, muttering something about needing to run an errand or two. Next, Shinsou and Monoma departed. They both waved, giving half grins to Izuku and Katsuki.

Once everyone was gone, Miruko stayed behind a little longer. She plopped a small pharmacy’s worth of pill bottles into Izuku’s bed side table.

“Alrighty,” she said briskly, sorting them into a neat row on Izuku’s tray table. “These three are antibiotics. Take one of each every morning and night. And this one’s for pain. Don’t overdo it, got it?”

Izuku nodded weakly. “Got it.”

“And you,” she turned to Katsuki. “Make sure he eats before he takes the heavy ones. If he starts getting dizzy, make him sit down. And he’ll also probably get a few nightmares, so wake him up if he starts thrashing.”

“I got it,” Katsuki parroted.

Miruko eyed them both for a moment, then scowled.

“No funny business either,” she lectured while grabbing for her coat. “Try to actually rest for once.”

They exchanged quiet thanks as she left. Her footsteps faded down the hall, and suddenly it was just them standing in the private hospital room. The hum of the lights seemed louder now, amplified faintly by the walls.

“You should shower,” Katsuki suggested, nodding toward the bathroom. “You’ll feel better once you’ve cleaned off a bit more.”

Izuku gave a nod. “That sounds like a great idea.”

“Do you need any help?” Katsuki asked.

Izuku shook his head. “I’ll be okay, Kacchan. It’s just a shower.”

“Alright,” Katsuki replied, not fully convinced. “I’ll make the bed. If you change your mind, give me a holler, okay?”

“Okay.” Izuku smiled.

He walked toward the bathroom, stiff but steady. He exhaled softly and stripped off the hospital gown.

When he turned on the shower and stepped beneath the stream, the first rush of heat drew an exhausted sigh from him. The steam rose, fogging the mirror and blurring the tiled walls into soft shapes. At first, the pressure against his body stripped a layer of heaviness off his shoulders. He could feel his limbs relax under the heat as the aches in his muscles dulled for a moment.

But as he reached for the soap, a different kind of ache crept in.

It slowly eased inside like an unsuspected guest. He blinked, surprised at how heavy his arms suddenly felt. Pulling himself back, he tried to reach for the soap again. But was stopped by the onslaught of vivid memories that came in full force.

Particularly Tomura’s blood-covered, dying face.

Izuku’s chest weighed down as if a thousand ruined hearts resided inside of him. He tried to carry them all, but he was only one man—and soon, he was too tired to lift his hands. Surrendering himself, he leaned backwards and rested against the cold tile. A small break couldn’t hurt, he convinced himself. His arms shook as he tried to reach for the soap again, but the motion slowed and then steadily lost all purpose.

When the poignant weight on his shoulders became too much, he sank to the floor of the shower, curling in on himself as the water cascaded over him. Izuku tried to make himself stand up, but he was too heavy from the sadness sitting at the bottom of his being.

He didn’t know how long he stayed there. The water running over his skin went from hot to lukewarm as his mind looped the memory of Tomura dying over and over.

“Izuku?” Katsuki called. “Izuku, you good in there?”

Izuku tried to respond. But he couldn’t.

The door creaked open, and a rush of steam spilled into the cooler air beyond. Katsuki’s steps were careful, and his breath caught when he saw the other man in the shower.

“Shit,” Katsuki whispered. “Izuku…”

Izuku sat slumped against the wall, water running down his hair, his face streaked with tears that wouldn’t stop.

Katsuki’s expression twisted with pain, worry, and love. Without another word, he stripped off his shirt, his pants, and everything. He stepped into the shower fully draped in concern, and the moment he crouched beside him, Izuku wrapped his arms around him and sobbed.

Katsuki lifted him up carefully, his chest warm even under the water. Izuku’s body quaked against him, his hands clutching at Katsuki’s shoulders as if afraid he might disappear on him again.

“I’ve got you,” Katsuki murmured against his temple.

Izuku nodded weakly, pressing his face into the curve of Katsuki’s chest. The water hit Katsuki’s back and streamed down their joined bodies, tracing every scar.

Katsuki reached for the soap. “Let me help you, okay?”

Izuku didn’t answer, but he didn’t resist either.

He stayed pressed against him, eyes closed, breathing in sync with his lover. Katsuki gingerly ran his soapy hands down Izuku’s arms, over his shoulders, and through his matted hair. Every movement was filled with the kind of tenderness that didn’t need words.

The suds shifted from gray to pale blue, washing away the dirt and dried blood that clung to Izuku’s skin. The grief, though, refused to be rinsed off. It lingered deep inside him, heavy but dulled. The pain softened a touch through the steady rhythm of Katsuki’s palms.

By the time the water finally shifted to freezing, Izuku’s body was trembling, but his breathing steadied. Katsuki turned off the tap and just held him, water dripping from both of them. Izuku closed his eyes and pressed his head further inside Katsuki’s beating heart.

“Sorry,” Izuku whispered shamefully. “I…I thought I could.”

“It’s fine,” Katsuki replied. “I should’ve known. You’re always trying to do things on your own. But I’m here now, alright? You never have to do the hard shit alone. Not anymore.”

They didn’t move, and together they stayed in the moment as the steam curled around them in thick, hazy clouds. Izuku’s shoulders slumped as the last droplets ran down his skin. His body felt lighter than before, but when Katsuki reached for a towel and began gently rubbing him dry, he didn’t pull away.

His lover worked in silence, every motion careful and patient.

“Hey,” Katsuki murmured, voice low and warm against the fog. “You’re safe, okay?”

Izuku only nodded. His eyes were distant, and his lashes were wet. He dried him off first with slow, tender movements. He dabbed at the bruises along Izuku’s ribs, wiped the lingering soap from his arms, then moved up to his face, brushing away stray droplets that clung to his cheeks.

When he reached Izuku's hair, he paused. Then, with both hands, he ruffled through the damp curls until they sprang up wildly.

A startled laugh slipped from Izuku before he could stop it. Katsuki's mouth curved, and his own laughter followed, loud and unguarded.

Their eyes met in the mirror across the room. Izuku nearly flinched at his reflection—his curls were puffed into an absurd halo and his nose was pink from crying. Katsuki guided him closer, water still trailing onto the floor from their skin. More laughter bloomed between them, fragile but real.

"Looks good on you," Katsuki said, meeting his gaze.

Izuku smiled through his sniffling. "You're lying."

"Maybe," Katsuki grinned. "But it makes you look like a real damn nerd."

Izuku laughed faintly and found his strength again to finish drying off. When they both finished, they made their way back to the room together, towels wrapped around their waists. The dim light of the bedside lamp washed everything in gold.

Two pairs of clean sleepwear lay neatly on the bed, making Izuku smile. Katsuki dressed first, his movements quiet and efficient, then he turned to help Izuku. With a tired smile, he lifted the shirt and guided it over Izuku's shoulders. Along the way, his knuckles grazed damp skin in passing. The touch was featherlight, but it sent a familiar ripple through Izuku all the same. Katsuki's fingers lingered for a heartbeat too long, smoothing wrinkles that didn't exist.

"Perfect," Katsuki said quietly. "Nice and cozy, like you should be."

There was so much affection in his voice it made Izuku's heart tighten.

When they finally climbed into their combined beds, the air was thick with exhaustion. Izuku sank against Katsuki's chest, curling instinctively into the warmth. Like clockwork, his lover's arms encircled him, and a hand found the small of his back. Izuku closed his eyes, easing into how familiar this felt. He basked in the feeling of being held, it was revitalizing to be in Katsuki's embrace after mourning for so long.

"…I'm sorry you had to be the one to kill your brother, Izuku."

The words came softly, but their weight was brutal.

Izuku went entirely still.

Without his permission, his mind unraveled the tangled mess of choices that led to that moment. He tried to find a thread that would have brought them down a different path.

Maybe one that allowed him, Katsuki, and his brother all alive. But in every path he followed, it all led to the same cruel ending.

Because like every Viper, Tomura followed his resolve all the way to the bitter end.

It was inevitable, one of them was going to die. That much, Izuku was certain. Because Tomura had been killing him slowly for years. He did it with every punishment, every twisted act of control, and every lesson in cruelty that was aimed to annihilate his emotions until there was nothing left. Izuku lived inside Tomura's cage for so long that taking his life felt like the only way to be free.

If Katsuki hadn't come when he did, Izuku would be dead.

But against all odds, Katsuki had. And Tomura would and could never let him go.

He held his lover tighter, fingers sinking into his shirt as if to hold himself to reality.

"He didn't give us much of a choice," Izuku whispered sourly.

"But still." Katsuki caressed him lightly. "That's hard to carry. If there's anything I can do to help you shoulder that, let me know, alright?"

"Just your being here is enough, Kacchan."

For a while, neither of them spoke.

Izuku retraced everything from the gravesite to now. After so much mourning, his mind still struggled to process the truth that somehow Tomura was the dead one—not Katsuki.

Almost afraid that this reality would disappear if he didn't confirm it, he slipped a trembling hand beneath Katsuki's shirt. His fingertips grazed over warm skin, searching for the gunshot, until they found it. The scar was raised, uneven, and ugly in its permanence.

Izuku's fingers curled against the wound, and his face crumbled.

"I—I really thought you were gone," he whispered.

Katsuki's fingers tightened on his back. "I'm sorry. I'll never scare you like that ever again."

"How did you…" Izuku trailed off, unsure if he could finish the sentence. He blinked back several tears, trying to hold himself together. "Several Vipers said you drowned in your own blood. They—they saw your body."

Katsuki pulled back just enough to see Izuku's face. He reached up and used his thumb to brush away the stray tear that clung stubbornly to the corner of Izuku's eye.

"I might've punched my way out and got to a phone," Katsuki said, his mouth curled into a faint, lopsided smile. "I called Aizawa, and they staged the whole scene to make it look like I never made it out."

Izuku's eyes widened. "You broke out? With your hands?"

"Yeah," Katsuki scoffed lightly. "Not exactly unscathed, I've got some nerve damage, and I can't fully feel my knuckles anymore." His gaze flickered down to his battered hands. "I…I don't know what came over me. But the thought of getting back to you was enough to get me moving. I couldn't let you be trapped there."

Izuku's eyes watered again, but this time not from sadness.

This time it was of pure, intense admiration for Katsuki. He looked at the other man in the dim light and saw something truly beautiful. He stared at the person who clawed his way from the bottom in a world that always tried to bury him alive. Not only did he endure all his hardship, he'd managed to come out on the other side stronger than anyone Izuku ever knew.

"You're so amazing, Kacchan," Izuku said.

But then Katsuki's face dropped. His eyes skirted off to the side as though the words hurt him to hear. And when he met Izuku's gaze again. He retracted his hand as though he didn't deserve to touch him. He sat up slightly and gazed at Izuku, full of regret.

"…I'm not," Katsuki whispered painfully.

Izuku frowned immediately. He sat up too, confused. "Huh? What do you mean? You're one of the most incredible people I've ever known."

Katsuki looked away. His face screwed in unfiltered hurt. "I—I'm so fucking sorry about making that deal with your brother."

Izuku's eyes softened.

Ah. This is what was weighing on Katsuki.

"I should've never done that," Katsuki went on. "I was so angry back then. And I didn't have the full picture, but when I finally did, I realized how big of a mistake I'd made—but I couldn't come to terms with how to tell you—"

Izuku stopped him by threading their fingers together. "I get why you did it. It's okay."

"But it's not okay," Katsuki shot back instantly. He shook his head as remorse filled his eyes. "I was so angry and hurt that I let my need for revenge against Chisaki overshadow how much I—" His breath hitched. "—how much I love you."

Katsuki drew in a ragged breath and let out a harrowing groan, pressing his palms to his eyes for a moment before lowering them.

"And I should've told you what I did sooner," he muttered hoarsely. "I understand now why you couldn't tell me about my mom when you found out. You didn't want to hurt me…just like I didn't want to hurt you."

Izuku's lips turned up into a small, ironic smile. "I guess we just love each other a little too much, huh? We're both afraid of hurting the other."

Katsuki nodded solemnly. "Yeah."

After a beat, he reached out and took Izuku's hands into his own. His thumbs brushed over the new scars.

"But we can't do that anymore," Katsuki said. "If we really love each other, then we can't keep holding back out of fear. I've learned my damn lesson. From now on, I'll tell you everything—no matter how ugly or hard it is. You deserve honesty, even when it hurts."

Izuku's throat tightened as he squeezed Katsuki's hands back.

"I agree," he replied with a smile. "And there's nothing you could ever tell me that would make me love you less. Not after everything we've gone through."

Katsuki's expression softened. "Same here."

"Is there anything else I should know about? I think we've told each other just about everything now."

Katsuki hesitated. His gaze drifted off to the side, lips pursing as though debating whether to speak.

"…I guess there is one thing," Katsuki confessed.

Izuku frowned, taken aback. "What is it?"

Katsuki rubbed at the back of his neck, clearly guilty. "I, uh…put a tracker in your ring."

For a beat, Izuku only stared at him. Then he tilted his head and frowned deeper. He reached for the chain around his neck and held the small ring up.

"The wedding ring?" he clarified, pointing to it. "This one?"

Katsuki winced.

"Yeah." He let out a sheepish groan and scratched behind his head. "The night we got separated, I couldn't sleep. I kept thinking about what might happen if something went wrong and we got split up. You were out cold, so I, uh, welded a tiny tracker inside the band. That's…how we were able to find you. I meant to tell you after, but then the cabin got raided and everything went to shit."

Izuku stared at the ring again and then back at Katsuki—who was now visibly squirming.

"Sorry," Katsuki muttered, shoulders slumping. "I know it's creepy. We can take it out tomorrow—"

"—Lets keep it," Izuku interrupted quickly.

Katsuki startled as Izuku leaned in and caught his wrists. Izuku exploded into a brilliant, genuine smile that warmed every inch of the room.

“I think that’s the most romantic thing I’ve ever heard,” Izuku said, voice full of laughter. “You really made sure you could always come back to me, huh?”

Katsuki gawked, utterly dumbfounded. Then his face flushed, ears turning red as a shy grin tugged at the corner of his mouth.

“You’re such a weirdo,” Katsuki chuckled. “But we’ll only keep it if I put one in mine too. We can make it square.”

“I like the sound of that,” Izuku said with a smile.

Their eyes met, and wordless forgiveness passed between them. It was bright, and felt like home. All the cards were finally laid out, and Izuku accepted every single one. His gaze dropped to Katsuki’s hands, and a trembling laugh escaped him when he noticed the emerald eternity band was still glinting there.

His own chest rose and fell unevenly, intense emotions riling up like waves crashing against the shore of his heart.

As if he could read his mind, Katsuki reached forward. His fingers brushed against Izuku’s collarbone as he unclasped the chain resting there. He slipped the wedding ring free and it gleamed in the dim light.

With no hesitation, Izuku lifted his shaky hand. Katsuki steadied him, and he slid the eternity ring back onto its rightful place.

It settled perfectly, as if it never left.

“I hope this is the last time I have to put a ring on your finger,” Katsuki mumbled cheekily but tenderly.

Izuku chuckled. “Don’t worry. I’m never taking it off again.”

Their hearts seemed to move in sync.

At the same time, they leaned in. Their foreheads brushed and their noses touched lightly. In the narrow sliver of air they shared, their breaths tangled. Izuku felt the temperature under his skin spike.

Katsuki’s eyes lowered down to Izuku’s softly parted lips—and a single pull drew them together at once.

They met in a kiss, and every inch of Izuku’s body flushed warm. It felt exactly like a homecoming. Imaginary fireworks went off in Izuku’s head as he leaned into his lover. They started tender and slow, but deepened instantly. It was languid but laced with yearning that ached with relief of the other person being alive.

Katsuki's hand slid to the back of Izuku's neck, and his fingers threaded through his damp curls. He guided Izuku closer until their chests were flush together. Izuku's hands moved on their own too. He gripped Katsuki and pulled him closer, like he couldn't stand the idea of distance between them any longer.

As they lost themselves, all Izuku could think was how happy he was to have Katsuki back.Katsuki's thumb brushed along Izuku's jaw before tilting his chin up to take him deeper. Izuku's lips parted willingly, and Katsuki's mouth claimed him with the same ferocity Izuku missed more than oxygen.

By the time they sank back into the bed, they were entirely tangled together in the soft glow of the lamp.

Katsuki pulled the covers on top of them and tucked them under their chins.

With a light giggle, Izuku rested his fingers against Katsuki's cheek. His thumb traced the edge of a smile neither of them could quite suppress.

"I don't think I ever want to be apart from you again," Izuku whispered into the kiss.

"Good, because neither do I," Katsuki replied. "Not ever."

"Does this mean we're technically fiancés now?" Izuku grinned. "Since, y'know."

"Yeah. I guess we're fiancés. Because I'm going to marry you again the first chance we get."

Several more tiny, drowsy kisses passed between them. Izuku let out another soft laugh, and Katsuki responded with a quiet chuckle against his lips. Their chests touched, and Izuku counted each heartbeat as proof of life, existence, and endurance.

Somehow, despite all odds, he and Katsuki were proof that all his hopeless romantic beliefs were right: love did somehow conquer all. It defied death and survived the unimaginable.

The light in Izuku's eyes returned, resurrected by the love of his life—his true husband.

Chapter 50 — Affecttuoso

Katsuki laid awake in the dark, staring up at the ceiling.

He couldn’t sleep well. He tried, but it was pretty damn hard. The faint hum of the night pressed against the walls as his eyes drifted to the clock. It was some indecent hour where even the silence seemed restless.

He exhaled tiredly and turned onto his side.

Beside him, Izuku slept soundly. He had his face half buried in the fluffy pillow, breathing unevenly, which made Katsuki listen a little too closely. From the sound alone, it was apparent Izuku’s lungs weren’t fully recovered. He made sharp inhales and coughed occasionally as he slept.

With a crestfallen stare, Katsuki reached out and brushed his knuckles along Izuku’s soft cheek. A shitty feeling began eating away at him. He couldn’t shake this unbearable fear that if he blinked too long, Izuku might slip back into a coma—and not come back out.

Right as he was about to force himself to sleep, Izuku twitched.

He paused.

Izuku twitched again. Then again.

At first, it was small. It started out with a faint furrow of his brow, then suddenly it became a tremor on his lips.

Katsuki's attention caught when another sound came: a broken groan, muffled in Izuku's throat. The other man began breathing louder and in a blink, Izuku's body tensed. He tossed violently under the sheets and thrashed his head to the side.

"N-No—" Izuku hissed, and screwed his face in fear. "Get off me—"

"Hey. Hey—" Katsuki called, pushing up onto an elbow.

He grabbed Izuku's shoulder and shook him lightly. The smaller man flinched at the touch in his slumber, and Katsuki cursed.

"Wake up," Katsuki said loudly, shaking Izuku's shoulder vigorously. "Izuku—wake the hell up."

Izuku gasped as if he'd been drowning, and his eyes flew open. Pure terror flooded his face as his gaze darted around the room.

"Easy," Katsuki said quickly, pulling him close. "It's me."

Izuku looked up at Katsuki with his chest heaving. His wide eyes were full of panic, and Katsuki soothed him the best he could. His hand stroked gently through Izuku's hair while he made steady, peaceful deep breaths for the other man to follow.

"You're okay," Katsuki said. "Just breathe. Take your time."

Gradually, the air between them steadied. Katsuki ran a hand along Izuku's forehead, pushing aside the damp curls.

"You with me?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku nodded, coming down slowly. "Y-Yeah, sorry. I—I thought I was back…I thought I was back with…" Izuku trailed off and blinked hard.

Katsuki's eyes softened. "You thought you were back at the Chisaki estate?"

The silence Izuku gave was enough of an answer.

Gently, Katsuki leaned in and wrapped his arms around the spooked man. He tried his best to offer all he could to counterbalance the remnants of the nightmare. At the thought of what type of disgusting shit must've happened during their separation, his stomach turned. God. He didn't make Chisaki feel enough goddamn pain.

“He’s dead,” Katsuki assured. “That scum can’t touch you ever again. I made very sure of that.”

Izuku swallowed hard, still shaking.

“Sorry,” he whispered. “I didn’t mean to wake you.”

“It’s not your fault. Miruko said the medication might cause night terrors.”

“What a terrible side effect,” Izuku grumbled. He groaned and scrubbed his hands down his face. “God. It felt so real.”

“Do you want to talk about what happened there?” Katsuki whispered. “I’m wide awake. Maybe if you work through it, the nightmare won’t return. But if you’re not ready too, that’s also okay.”

Izuku’s mouth parted apprehensively. They both silently assessed the other, and Izuku’s eyes searched Katsuki’s, looking for stability to hold on to in the moment.

“It’s good to talk, right?” Izuku asked wearily. “Even about the uncomfortable things?”

“It is.” Katsuki nodded. “You’re the one who taught me that.”

Izuku smiled weakly. He encircled his arms around Katsuki to calm himself.

“I-I wasn’t tortured,” Izuku began with. “Not in the proper sense of the word, but every inch of their place was covered in gold or jade—and I mean every inch. The floors, the walls, and even the paintings.”

He lowered his eyes and Katsuki held him tighter.

“When I arrived, they assessed me like I was another item for their collection,” Izuku said with a simmering disgust. “They put that golden ankle monitor on me and tried to dress me up in gold and jade too. It was so jarring, going from feeling free to being reminded I had been bought. Like I was a possession.”

“You’re not a possession, Izuku,” Katsuki hissed. “You’re a person and they all were sick in the head.”

“I know. But Chisaki Kai in particular,” Izuku whispered. “He…he made me keep him company. The first day we spent together—” His throat bobbed. The next words came out small and shameful. “He forced himself on me. He tore my shirt open and told me if I didn’t do what he wanted—” Izuku paused and clutched at his own clothes, as if to protect himself. “He’d make his guards hold me down.”

Katsuki saw red.

God, he should’ve castrated that mother fucker.

His jaw clenched so hard he heard his molars grind. “Did he do that?”

Izuku shook his head quickly.

“No. I stopped him,” he said. “I made him think I wanted to save myself for our wedding night. So nothing happened between us. But…” His voice went below a whisper. “I guess I didn’t realize until now how terrified I was of that. It always felt looming, as if I had no control over who got my body.”

Silence stretched for long, and Katsuki craved to take all Izuku’s fears in his palms and disintegrate them.

“Every time he pawed at me,” Izuku whispered, voice welling up. “I just kept thinking this was it. This is the moment. I have no say, and he’s going to rape me because he paid Tomura for permission to do so. Before Chisaki, I believed my training made me untouchable. I could break any hand that crossed my boundaries and keep myself protected away from any violations. But with the arrangement—I had my power taken. I guess I feel…weak.”

“Don’t,” Katsuki countered. “Don’t you dare say that about yourself. He was the weak one.” His thumb brushed the side of Izuku’s face, tracing over the faint scars along his jaw. “You hear me? You’re not weak at all. You’re far from it. Izuku, you’re the strongest person I know.”

Izuku’s lips trembled. “Then why do I feel like I’m not strong at all?”

Katsuki gathered Izuku closer until their foreheads touched, and their breaths mingled in the dark. Izuku looked up, eyes wet and luminous, and Katsuki’s heart broke.

“Because you’re human,” Katsuki said. “We forget a lot of the damn time what we’re capable of. And sometimes you just need to be reminded.” His fingers brushed through Izuku’s hair, down the line of his neck, and stopped above the tattoo on his collar bone. “You’re strong, Izuku. You’re stronger than anyone I’ve ever met in my whole life.”

Izuku shivered. Not from fear this time, but from the pure human ache of being seen.

As Katsuki cradled Izuku, he ran his hands up and down the other man’s sides. He tried his best to make him feel soothed and protected.

But all the while, his anger burned in the pit of his throat. It scorched up, and Katsuki felt that destructive urge to make the world burn again. Izuku had been dragged through far too much, and he deeply needed far more than five hundred people dead to pay for what had happened.

Izuku pressed closer, burying his face against the crook of Katsuki’s neck. His breath came out warm and trembling. Katsuki’s touch slowed to soft circles over his back, drawing him down, grounding him in the steady rhythm of contact.

Then, a change happened. It was so small Katsuki thought he’d imagined it.

Izuku’s lips brushed against the base of his throat. Once. Then twice.

Katsuki’s movements stilled.

“I-I want to feel safe,” Izuku whispered desperately. “I miss feeling safe with you.”

Izuku’s breath lingered against his skin, then trailed upward along the line of his neck in a row of kisses. He kept going, trembling the entire way until his lips found the sharp edge of Katsuki’s jaw. Each kiss was full of pleading that awoke heat in Katsuki’s blood. By the time Izuku’s lips reached Katsuki’s mouth, they both were holding each other closer.

For a beat, Izuku hovered there with their breaths catching.

Then he closed the distance. Their lips met, and their troubles seemed to fall away. It was timid at first, testing the waters. Izuku’s leg intertwined with his, and Katsuki welcomed it. Their limbs tangled as the kiss deepened. It grew more and more passionate, but Katsuki couldn’t hide the surprise when the other man blatantly ground down on his thigh.

He broke away out of shock.

Izuku fisted Katsuki’s shirt tighter and their eyes met for a prolonged moment. In the silence, a pretty blush spread across Izuku’s cheeks, nose and ears. He dug his gaze into Katsuki with a fixed resolve.

“Can you make me feel safe again?” Izuku breathed, voice barely there. “Please?”

Katsuki’s heart slammed. “…Are you sure?”

He wanted to. He wanted to so damn badly. It’d be satisfying to wipe away any traces of touch on Izuku’s skin that didn’t belong to him. He’d make damn sure Izuku felt heard and cared for.

“Yes.” Izuku’s eyes glistened in the moonlight. “I missed you.”

Katsuki leaned in, apprehensive at first. Then Izuku tilted just enough for their lips to find each other. The kiss was soft, cautious, but beneath it ran the undercurrent of yearning. Izuku’s hand slid underneath the fabric of Katsuki’s shirt. He dragged his unsteady fingers across the muscles until he found the bullet wound.

“Does it hurt?” Izuku whispered during their kiss.

Katsuki shook his head. “Not when you touch it.”

Izuku caressed the wound tenderly.

That simple gesture made Katsuki decide not to rush it. He could gauge exactly what Izuku was asking for, and it wasn’t simply intimacy. Izuku wanted reassurance that he had control of what happened to his body.

Carefully, Katsuki’s thumb traced slow, grounding circles against Izuku’s pulse in his neck.

Instantly, Izuku shuddered under the touch and opened himself up more. Katsuki deepened the kiss by a breath, and his hand cupped Izuku’s jaw. Then, the warmth between them shifted. The tentative melancholy they were holding on to drifted into love so potent it felt alive.

When they finally pulled back, their foreheads were still touching. Katsuki sat up and curled his finger for Izuku to come up with him. Slowly, Izuku followed. The blanket fell away, exposing both of their bodies in the darkroom. In the low light, the only thing Katsuki could see was Izuku's shining eyes.

"Lift your arms," Katsuki instructed.

Izuku obeyed, and Katsuki peeled his shirt away.

As he gazed at all of Izuku's fresh scars, his fiancé reached for him too. Small hands caught the hem of the sleep shirt and tugged. Without breaking eye contact, Izuku hoisted up Katsuki's shirt, and lifted it over his head as well.

He watched as Izuku's beautiful eyes darted all over his chest. They went scar to scar, cataloging all the new bruises and cuts that decorated him. Katsuki proudly wore each one, because every injury he sustained was all in the name of getting Izuku back.

Following the need to be closer, he wrapped his arms around Izuku. He dragged his fiancé towards him with a single movement, pressing their chests together. They gazed at each other as Katsuki steered Izuku's legs. He spread them wide and slid the smaller man onto his lap.

"Is this okay?" Katsuki asked.

Izuku nodded, and his eyes set at half mast.

They leaned in again. The kiss was softer now, unhurried but passionate all the same. Their mouths moved in a steady rhythm. Give and take. Push and pull.

Warmth mingled until it was impossible to tell where one of them ended, and the other began. His fingers traced down Izuku's sides, earning a sharp inhale against his lips. Izuku's arms tightened around his neck. At that moment, they dissolved into each other completely.

"Where did he touch you?" Katsuki demanded.

Izuku pulled back. A moment of hesitation passed, but he raised his hand.

"Right here." He touched his hair and slowly trailed his fingers down to his cheek then to his chin. "And here." He dragged his hand down his neck, to his collarbone, and to the center of his chest. Izuku let out a shaky, distressed breath. "…And here."

Katsuki followed the trail with his lips.

He nipped at each place, making sure to override any feeling of Chisaki from Izuku's skin. He replaced it all with feathery touches of love, devotion and respect. As he worked his way down, his fiancée exhaled all the way. Izuku relaxed into him, and closed his eyes as he gave into the touch.

“Thank you,” Izuku breathed. His fingers laced through Katsuki’s locks. “Thank you, Kacchan. I don’t want anyone to touch me like this besides you.”

Katsuki kissed Izuku’s sternum. “No one but me?”

Izuku nodded. “Yeah. No one else.”

“Okay,” Katsuki rasped, voice coarse as his lips hovered over Izuku’s jaw. “I promise. I’ll make sure I’m the only one who gets to touch you like this,” he murmured. His warm breath ghosted against Izuku’s skin as he drifted lower, kissing the hollow between his collarbones. “I’ll be the only one who gets to hear you fall apart.”

Katsuki’s hand tightened at the nape of Izuku’s neck, firm enough to draw a soft, broken sound from him. His fiancé’s eyes fluttered shut, breath stuttering as Katsuki’s mouth charted a tedious path lower. His lips grazed every inch of Izuku’s skin like he knew it by heart.

“And I’ll make damn sure I’m your one and only, Izuku.”

Izuku exhaled shakily, head tipping back as if in surrender. His curls spilled with the motion. He gave himself over completely to the only man he’d ever trust to take him apart like this.

Katsuki’s gaze flicked upward. His breath caught at the sight of Izuku’s throat bared to him, the elegant curve of it laid open in latent offering.

He pressed several open mouth kisses along Izuku’s chest as he carefully laid them back down. He watched, full of wonderment, as Izuku’s hair spread across the pillowcase. Bright green eyes were tracking him, dilated all the way in the deep dark.

Slowly, he leaned up and settled between Izuku’s thighs. He pushed their pelvises together as Izuku opened his legs further. They both looked down at where their hips were joined, and the subtle hardness in both of their pants poked through.

Katsuki gave an experimental roll, and Izuku responded instantly. His damn gorgeous fiancé shuddered and ground his hips back. He did it again, drawing another soft whine from those lips he loved to kiss. He closed the distance between them as he kept going, drawing out more and more reedy sounds from Izuku.

“Please,” Izuku called breathlessly. “Make me cum.”

“Plannin’ on it,” Katsuki rasped back.

Katsuki’s powerful arms locked around Izuku’s waist, yanking him flush against his chest in a crushing embrace. He crashed their mouths together in a fierce kiss, devouring him with a raw hunger that screamed I fucking missed you.

Izuku arched up, his hips bucked into Katsuki’s with urgent need. He ground their erections together through the thin fabric of their pants. Katsuki’s tongue plunged deep into Izuku’s mouth, tasting the sweet desperation on his tongue. He swirled and sucked until Izuku wept against him. The vibration of that needy sound shot straight down to Katsuki’s groin.

He rolled his hips harder, pressing their rigid lengths firmly against each other. The friction sent glints of pleasure jolting through both of them. Izuku's moan vibrated louder this time, a broken, breathy cry that Katsuki drank in like air.

His hands slid down to grip Izuku's ass and pull him even closer. He thrusted again, deliberate and rough, dragging their cocks in a teasing rhythm that pulled out gasp after gasp from Izuku's swollen lips. The heat built to an inferno as they lost themselves in the frantic grind, every rock of their bodies fueling their desire.

Izuku gasped into their interlocked mouths as the friction surged between them. His fingers dug into Katsuki's back and scraped down the hills of his muscles as he arched up. Katsuki moved more vigorously, pressing pleasure into every inch of Izuku's body. Sparks of tantalizing static rolled up his back as Izuku locked his legs around his waist and pressed their cocks perfectly together.

Katsuki's eyes darkened with deep need as he shoved two thick fingers against Izuku's soft, parted lips.

"Get 'em soaked for me," he commanded.

Izuku's mouth fell open eagerly, no resistance in his hazy gaze. He drew the fingers inside with a wet, slurping pull, his tongue curling around them like he was starving for it. Saliva glistened as he bobbed his head, hollowing his cheeks to suck harder, coating every inch.

"Shit," Katsuki rasped. His breath hitching at the obscene sight.

Izuku's lips stretched around his digits, tongue laving greedily with eyes half-lidded in submission. Izuku's hand clamped onto Katsuki's wrist, guiding the fingers deeper, fucking his own mouth with them in slow, deliberate strokes that mimicked what they both craved lower down.

Those viridian eyes fluttered open fully, locking onto Katsuki's with a smoldering intensity that hit like a punch to the gut. Katsuki's cock throbbed painfully in his pants, straining against the fabric as he watched, mesmerized by the way Izuku's throat worked around his knuckles.

A low, primal groan tore from Katsuki's chest at that heated stare. His free hand dug into Izuku's hip to yank him impossibly closer.

"I only want you too, darling," he murmured, voice husky and edged with desperation.

He thrust his hips forward, grinding his rigid erection against Izuku's with intense force. He dragged his fingers sensually over Izuku's velvety tongue, feeling the hot, slippery slide.

"You're the only one I wanna kiss and taste every inch of." He circled his hips in a teasing grind, their cocks rubbing together through the barriers, friction building fever that made sweat bead on their skin. Katsuki pushed his fingers deeper, bumping the back of Izuku's throat, making him gag softly around them. "And you're the only man who can drive me crazy."

Izuku's body ignited at the words. His cock twitched violently in his pants, a wet spot blooming from the pre-cum leaking steadily. His toes curled tight, back arching off the surface beneath him as a muffled moan vibrated around Katsuki's fingers, the sound lewd and needy. He spread his thighs wide in invitation, knees falling open to cradle Katsuki between them.

Katsuki pulled his fingers back, cursing how well Izuku prepped them.

He leaned back on his hunches, and without a single moment of hesitation, Izuku twisted around. He rolled onto his stomach before pushing up onto all fours. His forehead pressed into the pillow, cheeks aflame with a red blush that crept down his neck as he arched his back.

Katsuki's eyes darkened.

Emboldened by the haze of passion, Izuku reached back with shaky hands. His fingers hooked into the waistband of his pants, tugging them down inch by torturous inch. The fabric dragged over his hips and pulled away from his skin. He shoved them lower, past the swell of his backside and down his thighs until they bunched at his knees, trapping his legs slightly and leaving him utterly bare.

His cock hung heavy between his legs, hard and dripping pre-cum onto the sheets below.

Katsuki's gaze turned molten, pupils blown wide as he stared at the curve of Izuku's spine, the way his cheeks parted just enough to tease the tight entrance between them. His own cock strained against his pants, the ache in his balls intensifying at the vulnerability.

He watched the cool air hit Izuku's heated skin, making him shiver. But his fiancé held the pose: ass up and head down while his heart pounded.

Something about it scratched at the back of Katsuki's mind. The position left Izuku so damn vulnerable—and it made Katsuki ache. Even after everything, Izuku was ready to give it all up to him again and again. It twisted Katsuki's gut with a fierce, protective anguish. His hands itched to claim and cherish.

"Izuku," Katsuki breathed out, heart twisting. His palm slid up Izuku's thigh, thumb brushing the sensitive inner skin. "You trust me so damn much."

Izuku lifted his head just enough to glance back, his gaze softening through the haze of desire.

"Of course I do," Izuku murmured huskily. "You're the only one who's ever made me feel safe in my skin."

Katsuki's jaw ticked as he swallowed thickly, emotion surging hot behind his eyes. He traced the hills of Izuku's spine with his fingertips, feeling the rapid flutter of his pulse.

"You think too highly of me."

“No,” Izuku countered gently. “I see you, Kacchan—all of you. I see the fire inside of you and the fight in your heart that will never go out. But most of all, I see your fierce need to protect the people you love. You’re the only person I’d ever give myself up to like this.”

Katsuki soothed small, steady circles on the small of Izuku’s back. “You’re gonna ruin me, you know that?”

Izuku smiled faintly, dilated eyes growing further. “Then let me.”

A flood of emotion rose inside him, and he leaned down.

At this angle, he could see Izuku’s delicate entrance. He teased the sensitive skin before pressing his two spit-drenched digits right against that tight rim.

He massaged in slow, firm circles. The wet tips of his pads glided, coaxing it to relax and part under the pressure. Izuku sighed tenderly, pushing back into the touch. His hole yielded as Katsuki’s fingers delved shallowly, rubbing and probing with deliberate strokes that built fresh slickness and heat.

“You’re always so beautiful back here,” Katsuki said. “I’m the luckiest man in the world.”

His rough fingers circled Izuku’s tight hole until it gave just enough for the tip of his finger to breach it.

Izuku groaned at the friction. His body tensed beneath Katsuki on the rumpled sheets, but Katsuki didn’t pause. He pressed deeper, crooking his finger to stroke that perfectly sensitive spot inside his future husband. Izuku’s moans hitched and he arched more, spreading himself wide for Katsuki to see.

“Darling,” Katsuki growled. He leaned over Izuku’s body and his breath scorched against Izuku’s skin. “You look so damn fuckable right now. I should’ve gotten lube.”

Izuku tried to respond, but all that came out was more moans. The sound turned high and fractured as his back arched off the bed.

Waves of gratification crashed through both of them, and Katsuki drank in the sight of Izuku going absolutely crazy under his touch. His future husband’s hips jerked, shook, and his thighs trembled. Freckles stood out against his flushed honey kissed skin while Katsuki observed every quiver.

Gingerly, he introduced a second finger. He stretched Izuku further, scissoring him to widen the passage, all while delivering more pleasure-filled pushes against Izuku’s sweet spot. Izuku’s body jerked, and he sang a sweet keen that hit right against Katsuki’s ego.

“Yeah, that’s it—moan for your fiancé,” he teased.

The filthy words drew a whimper from Izuku. His cock twitched, dribbling pre-cum onto the fabric below.

Katsuki leaned in, blond strands brushing his forehead. He got a good look at Izuku's sweet little hole and groaned under his breath. His hunger surged like a wildfire as he dove in without restraint.

He flattened his tongue broad and wet over the tight rim of Izuku's hole, lapping firmly at the entrance while his fingers curled to press relentlessly against Izuku's prostate. The gland swelled under his assault, swollen and sensitive. Katsuki ruthlessly fucked his fingers in and out with steady, forceful thrusts, each plunge hitting that spot dead-on to wring out sparks of electric pleasure.

Izuku shattered with a crude cry. His back bowed, spine arching in a desperate curve as the dual sensations overwhelmed him. His thighs quivered uncontrollably, muscles locking and releasing in rhythmic spasms. He shoved his ass back against Katsuki's mouth and hand, chasing the burn.

Katsuki growled low in his throat, the vibration rumbling directly into Izuku's sensitive flesh, making the smaller man quiver brokenly. He pulled his fingers out just enough to let his tongue take over, spearing in with quick, insistent licks that teased the rim before pushing past it.

His free hand gripped Izuku's hip hard, nails digging in to hold him in place as he moaned openly, the sound muffled against the twitching opening. He swirled his tongue in steady circles, laving every inch he could reach to make obscene, slurping noises that filled the room.

But he didn't abandon Izuku's sweet spot. Katsuki slid his fingers back in alongside his tongue for a moment. The stretch made Izuku gasp and clench before he crooked them again. He massaged Izuku's prostate with precise, grinding pressure, fucking into it over and over until his sweet darling's cock leaked onto the sheets below.

Katsuki's tongue worked in tandem, withdrawing to lick stripes up from Izuku's balls up to the rim, sucking gently on the sack to draw out a fresh wave of pre-cum from Izuku's tip.

Izuku's groans turned frantic as he was devoured. His hands fisted the pillows so tightly the fabric nearly tore under his grip. He arched impossibly higher, knees sliding wider apart on the bed, offering every inch of himself to Katsuki.

"K-Kacchan—right there," he begged, voice wrecked and dripping with desperation.

His body rocked back to meet each thrust, hole sucking greedily around the intrusion as tears of overwhelming ecstasy pricked at his eyes.

The air thickened with the scent of their arousal as Katsuki's own cock ached painfully in his pants. But he poured every ounce of his passion into unraveling Izuku, determined to push him to the edge with this intimate worship. His tongue kept going, delving deep alongside his fingers pounding that delicious spot until Izuku was a trembling, sobbing mess of bliss.

His gaze shifted to the nightstand, where the lotion bottle gleamed faintly in the low light. He pulled away with a slick sound, smirking at Izuku's protesting throaty sob.

He sat back on his heels, eyes raking over Izuku's flushed body. He drank it all in: the motion in which his legs trembled. And then the way his head was turned to the side on the pillow, eyes looking over his shoulder at him.

"If I could fuck you right now, I'd do it," Katsuki groaned. He began rubbing himself through his pants, drinking in the sight of Izuku's sloppy hole. "God. I'd give it to you so fucking good you wouldn't be able to think straight for a week."

"You can use my legs," Izuku suggested, eyes dilating until there was only black.

"Yeah?" Katsuki bit his lip and gripped his cock harder. "You want me to fuck these pretty thighs of yours?"

Izuku nodded and shifted his hips more.

Katsuki exhaled eagerly, nose flaring. He scrambled for the nightstand, reaching for the lotion bottle on the other side of the lamp. He clicked the cap open and poured a thick stream into his hand. The gentle scent of vanilla filled the air as he rubbed his palms together to warm the cream.

"Lower your hips," Katsuki whispered.

Izuku nodded and slowly pressed himself flat to the mattress in anticipation.

All Katsuki could think was how damn lucky he was.

He started with Izuku's back, spreading lotion over the soft skin and kneading deep into the tense muscles. Izuku relaxed into his touch, eyes blinking slowly closed as Katsuki worked his coarse hands across his body.

Gradually, he moved down, taking his time to ground Izuku into the touch. Katsuki wanted his darling to know he was safe, and that he'd always take good care of all his needs. He moved lower, thumbs dipping into the cleft of Izuku's backside, coating the sensitive skin around that puckered entrance, making Izuku whimper and push back.

Katsuki's hands slid farther, slathering the lotion along Izuku's inner thighs. His fingers brushed teasingly close to Izuku's sensitive balls, making the other man moan and twitch. He grinned mischievously as he went up again, sinking his firm fingers into Izuku's muscular globes.

He continued like that, working the slickness everywhere across Izuku's skin and ensuring every inch was slippery, primed for what was coming next.

Gripping his own throbbing erection, Katsuki swiftly pulled down his pajama pants. His heavy cock hung free and was smeared with pre-cum. He grabbed the base and aligned it with the valley between Izuku's plush backside. He thrust forward, sliding his length along the lotion smeared skin.

They both groaned as the thick head of his cock caught on Izuku's rim with each pass. The smaller man jolted as the thick tip nudged his hole, not entering but pressing just enough to tease.

“Kacchan,” Izuku hissed. He pushed back on it, biting his lip. “That feels good. K-Keep going.”

Katsuki grunted, hips rocking steadily. The friction built until it became hot and maddening. Obeying Izuku’s orders, he did it again and again. Pre-cum smeared Izuku’s entrance as his tip bumped and dragged over the tiny hole.

His fiancé’s breaths came out in steady, ragged pants. His hands clawed at the pillows as he whined, hips wiggling to chase more contact.

“Put it in, just a little,” Izuku begged. “It’s driving me insane.”

Katsuki’s lips curled into a smirk as he gripped the base of his thick cock. He pressed the fat tip right up against Izuku’s wet hole, feeling the tight ring clench instinctively around nothing, begging to be filled.

“Only a bit,” Katsuki whispered, voice laced with hunger. “Don’t wanna hurt you.”

He didn’t give Izuku time to beg more. Instead, he pushed forward just enough to breach the rim. The broad tip popped past the resistance with a lewd, wet squelch that made both of them hiss in ecstasy. Izuku’s legs jolted like he’d been shocked, and his mouth fell open with a small gasp.

Katsuki could’ve rolled his eyes back in his head. That initial stretch burned so damn good. The exquisite vice of Izuku’s hole clamping down on his tip sent shocks of rapture straight to his core. Every involuntary flutter Izuku gave, pulled him in deeper without even meaning to.

“K-Kacchan…” Izuku breathed, pushing back ever so slightly.

Katsuki pulled back deliberately, letting the head drag out with a slick pop that echoed in the dark room. His fiancé’s hips bucked up involuntarily, chasing that fullness he’d only just tasted.

“More,” Izuku insisted, pushing back.

“Not yet,” Katsuki hissed.

He smacked one hand down on Izuku’s thigh to still him. The sharp sting made Izuku’s cock jump and leak more pre-cum onto the sheets.

Katsuki lined up again, pressing the tip flush against that pretty damn hole, and thrusted shallowly. He pushed his tip in, stretching the tight muscle around his girth before he withdrew.

He did it again, and again. Each time feeling better than the last. Every wet pop was an obscene, filthy sound that had Katsuki’s balls tightening. His own breath hitched as he watched Izuku’s ass cling to him, reluctant to let go.

His darling's response was a broken moan. His body was trembling uncontrollable as Katsuki repeated the motion, fucking him with only the tip in short, torturous dips. Each shallow thrust popped the head in and out. The rim stretched and snapped back with every vulgar slide, building a maddening friction that had Izuku's toes curling and his thighs quaking around Katsuki's body.

"C'mon, Kacchan. Fuck me deeper," Izuku begged.

Satisfied with the desperation in Izuku's ragged pants, Katsuki shifted lower. He guided his cock between those slick, muscular thighs and swallowed the throaty groan that pushed out of his throat. Izuku clamped his thighs together instinctively, creating a tight channel that hugged Katsuki's girthy shaft perfectly.

"That's it. Squeeze me tight," Katsuki ordered.

He snapped his hips to slide in deep, and they both moaned at the sensation. His cock glided smoothly through the slick lotion, the tip grinding against Izuku's hard length. He tested a movement, and he could feel his length rubbing his fiancé's hard-on in tandem with the wet drag.

He set a deep pace that made them both close their eyes in pleasure. As he fucked those plush thighs, Katsuki leaned over Izuku's back. His chest pressed down on the smaller man, caging him in as he began grinding against the curve of Izuku's ass. The motion pressed Izuku's cock into the soft mattress, trapping it there with relentless pressure.

Katsuki intensified his movements, sliding in and out with greater force while nuzzling his face into the warm crook of Izuku's neck.

His hands swiftly overtook Izuku's. He interlaced their fingers before guiding one of Izuku's palms downward. He directed it to the throbbing length of Izuku's neglected cock, compelling him to stroke himself amid their fervent rutting. Izuku's loud moan echoed as Katsuki's larger hand assisted in the firm pumps that heightened their mutual pleasure.

Izuku's cute keens heightened as Katsuki's pace built. He began rutting quicker, and the wet sounds of their skin slapping echoed in the room. His balls hit against Izuku's with each drive. The way he humped forward made his shaft grind deeper into the thighs' vice.

Izuku's moans transformed into high-pitched cries as he ground back against Katsuki. He began vigorously pumping his cock and bit his lip. The lewd feeling of Katsuki's thick length battering against his sensitive area from behind sent waves of heat down his back every time.

Izuku's voice broke in a desperate sob. "Ah—Kacchan, it's so fucking good."

His thighs trembled violently around Katsuki's hot cock, squeezing it in rhythmic spasms that milked every inch. In the heat of the moment, Katsuki's fingers dug into Izuku's hands with bruising force, pinning them down as he hammered forward. He chased the explosive release building in his core.

"Cum with me, darling," he growled, his breath hot against Izuku's ear.

The tension coiled tighter in their cores, a brutal wave ready to destroy them both. Katsuki's hips snapped erratically. His cock moved wildly as he drove through the slick, sweat-slicked gap between Izuku's thighs one last punishing time.

With a guttural groan, he erupted.

He unleashed thick ropes of hot cum that splattered across Izuku's freckled skin, painting the plush flesh in sticky white streaks. His body locked up, muscles seizing as the orgasm ripped through him. He gave several pathetic, grinding thrusts deeper into the vise of those quivering legs, claiming his future husband with feral intensity.

The scorching flood of cum washed against Izuku's cock, mingling with the slick mess between them. Coupled with Katsuki's harsh pants directly into his ear, it hurled Izuku over the edge in a graceless rush.

He shattered with a piercing wail, cock pulsing heavy spurts of semen. The thick liquid smeared across their joined, clenched hands in messy bursts. But Katsuki didn't relent. His grip tightened to deliver sharp, overstimulating strokes that dragged out Izuku's climax. Izuku shuddered helplessly as Katsuki's mouth latched onto the sweat-damp skin of his neck and sucked hard.

The smaller man bucked and convulsed beneath him, lost in the overwhelming euphoria. Katsuki kept going, playing with Izuku's sensitive length, thumb sliding across the spent tip. He kept going, fondling and playing with Izuku until he was a sobbing mess that collapsed fully onto the sheets.

When he was satisfied with Izuku's whine, Katsuki decided he was spent. He slumped his full weight onto the smaller man with his softening cock still wedged snugly between those shuddering thighs. His arms banded around Izuku's waist in a possessive hold as they gasped for air in sync.

They came down in unison through the afterglow, slick with sweat. Their bodies entwined in perfect, sated harmony.

Katsuki nuzzled a soft kiss at Izuku's temple, murmuring hoarsely, "I love you."

Izuku melted with a blissful sigh. He twisted to claim Katsuki's lips in a slow, deep kiss that lingered with lazy heat.

"And I love you too, Kacchan. Always."

Katsuki practically walked with a damn skip in his step on the way back to the hospital room. He hummed under his breath too. It was a barely there tune that matched how damn freakin' he was. In his hand, a small bouquet of yellow flowers bobbed as he strolled down the hall.

Everything was finally falling into place. That bastard Tomura was gone. The crazy Chisakis were basically wiped off the map. And the other Yakuza were too busy stumbling over their own corpses to catch their breath, let alone catch them.

But better than all that, his Izuku was awake.

He grinned to himself, absolutely unashamed. Maybe he should make today a holiday: the day the stars finally lined up for once.

When Katsuki walked through the door to Izuku's private room, his fiancé smiled at him instantly. Izuku's infectious grin spread to him and his stomach filled with butterflies.

As he approached, Izuku's legs swung idly over the side of the bed. It was a small, absentminded habit Katsuki missed like hell. Besides Izuku, Miruko glanced over her shoulder while injecting another round of medication into Izuku's arm.

She caught his ridiculous upbeat stride, snorted, and shook her head.

"Welcome back," she said with humor. "Another round of flowers, huh?"

Katsuki flashed her a crooked grin and lifted the bouquet. "Yup. I figured I'd bring him my own medicine too. I heard flowers are supposed to make people heal faster or whatever."

"That's not true in the slightest," Miruko huffed, rolling her eyes.

Izuku laughed, voice still a little raspy. "Maybe not for everyone. But I feel better already just looking at them."

Katsuki grinned wide and happily plopped down onto the bed next to his future husband. "Knew you would like them."

Izuku leaned into him just slightly, and their shoulders brushed.

Miruko chuckled under her breath as she switched out the medication. She checked his vitals, asked him to stand, and to take a deep breath in and out. Izuku obeyed and did the tasks with ease despite meeting a small amount of resistance. Miruko gave a tiny, satisfied hum.

"Congratulations," she said brightly as she put a smiley face bandaid on his arm. "You're officially on a small but steady upward climb. You'll be safe to travel by tomorrow!"

"Hell yes," Katsuki cheered with a lopsided smirk. "Knew he'd bounce back fast."

Izuku laughed softly too, gratitude glowing in his eyes. Unable to help himself, Katsuki ran a hand through Izuku's messy curls and ruffled them up.

"He's one hell of a fighter," Miruko complimented, gathering her supplies. "I've got a few other patients to check on, but I'll see you both downstairs soon."

"Yup," Katsuki replied, popping the last syllable just to be a little obnoxious. "We'll be down there."

"See you soon, Miruko!" Izuku called after her as she made for the door.

“Don’t get into trouble,” she shot back with a wave before disappearing into the hall.

When it was only the two of them, Katsuki took a moment to listen to the room. The soft hum of machines filled the silence, along with the drone of the news in the background.

“Thank you for the flowers,” Izuku said, full of affection. “They’re the same ones you got me when we stayed at Midnight’s. Was that on purpose?”

“It was,” Katsuki admitted. “When I went to the flower shop, I saw them and thought of you.”

Izuku’s smile spread. He leaned in, and together they shared a grateful kiss. When they broke apart, Katsuki knew the smile on his face probably looked damn near stupid.

He rose to his feet and wandered over to the other bouquets crowding the table and windowsill. Each one sat in their own individual vase. He raised a brow as he sifted through the mess of bouquets, trying to find room for the new one.

“We’re gonna need a bigger damn room,” he muttered.

Thank fuck Izuku had woken up after two weeks. Because if the coma had gone longer, he’d have to stack bouquets on the damn floor. Katsuki shifted a few vases aside, grumbling the whole time. He then moved a small book off the sill to make room for the newest arrangement. Without thinking, he set the little book down on the mattress beside Izuku.

Izuku’s head tilted curiously. His gaze went to it, and a small, startled sound slipped from him.

“How did this get here?” he asked, voice high with surprise.

Katsuki hummed distractedly as he adjusted the flowers. He half turned to glance over his shoulder, and he saw Izuku holding the paperback book in both his hands. The title ‘Saishū kōkyōkyoku’ stared back at him in all its curvy, exaggerated lavender font.

“Oh, that?” Katsuki said casually. “I went out and found another copy of your nerdy romance book. I was reading it out loud to you while you were under.”

Izuku glanced up. “You were?”

“Yeah.” Katsuki shrugged, rubbing the back of his neck. “Miruko said talking helps coma patients, so I figured, why not read you your favorite book? Maybe you’d wake up if you heard some of your favorite passages.”

“Did I respond at all?”

“Not really. But I swore I got a twitch out of you during that perverted fireplace scene you like so much.”

Katsuki flashed a toothy grin and Izuku blushed.

“I finished the whole thing, by the way,” Katsuki continued as he fussed with the flowers. “It was actually good. I should’ve taken you more seriously when you told me to read it.”

Pleased with the bouquet’s positioning, he moved away and looked at Izuku.

But when he did, he found his fiancé staring at him with that look. That incredibly cute, admiration-filled stare that never failed to make Katsuki’s heart twist around and around. Izuku held the book against his chest like he used to with a smile so tender it could’ve melted stone.

“What?” Katsuki frowned, a little defensive from embarrassment. “Why’re you lookin’ at me like that with those big ass eyes?”

“Nothing.” Izuku laughed, full of fondness. “I just can’t believe you ever thought you couldn’t be soft. You’re the biggest softie in the world.”

Katsuki’s grin returned, crooked and bashful. He scratched his cheek, trying to disguise the validation rising in his chest.

“Just for you,” he teased. “Don’t go tellin’ everyone. I’ve got a reputation to uphold. I’m supposed to be a big scary serial killer or whatever.”

Izuku snorted, chuckling from deep in his chest.

“Oh, that reputation is gone, Kacchan,” Izuku said through his smile. “Long gone.”

He reached out for Katsuki’s hand. With his thumb, he felt out the bumps on his future husband’s knuckles, cataloging the injuries. Katsuki held his hand back, and Izuku laced their fingers together.

“Does this mean we can talk about it together now?” Izuku asked a little too eagerly. “I’ve always wanted someone to discuss it with.”

“Well duh, nerd,” Katsuki laughed. “I’m going to need to read the sequel and the prequel now too. Because what the hell was up with the part where you learn about the mountain village? We never get to see them again. It felt like such a tease.”

Izuku snickered again, and it warmed Katsuki’s whole body.

He took a moment to sit in that sound and listen to how wonderful it was. He privately swore to keep Izuku laughing like that forever, for the rest of their lives.

☽ ☽ ☾ ☾

Izuku smiled so much that he could feel it in his cheeks.

The whole day so far was good. Peaceful, even. It was his first full day conscious since the coma, and he’d spent most of it rebuilding his strength and trying to look ahead.

He did various exercises and walked the hallways up and down with Katsuki at his side. They both laughed through the clumsy stretches that Katsuki jokingly called ‘Izuku baby steps.’ His future husband helped the whole time, offering boisterous encouragement or teasing remarks to keep the mood light.

By dinner, Izuku felt like he had regained a bit more of his mobility. He still leaned on Katsuki for balance, but not as much as before.

When they sat down to eat, the mood was lighter than the previous day. It was apparent everyone’s spirits had lifted now that Izuku was awake. The pseudo cafeteria was crowded with laughter and the faint churn of chaotic conversation.

Across from him, Sero had made a game out of flicking peas at Denki until Aizawa sighed and told them to grow up. Monoma and Shinsou were quietly gossiping, no doubt. They were discreetly pointing at some of the other agents in the large room.

And at his side was his Katsuki. His shoulder was pressed against his and every now and then he muttered sarcastic remarks that made Izuku snicker into his plate.

Everything felt nice—like it had before.

Aizawa turned toward Izuku with a tired smile. “How are you feeling?”

“Good.” Izuku rolled his shoulders and offered a small nod. “Better than I thought I’d be. Surprisingly, I’m not feeling so terrible.”

“That’s great to hear,” Aizawa said, his tone light with relief. “Honestly, I expected you to need a few more days, given how far along the poisoning was.”

“That’s because he’s tough as hell,” Katsuki interjected proudly. “Strongest damn nerd I know.”

Izuku let out a quiet laugh. Even Aizawa couldn’t help but chuckle, shaking his head.

“Do you think you’ll be well enough to travel soon then?” Aizawa asked. “I don’t mean to rush, but the sooner we reach Nana, the better. The Yakuza families are still in disarray, but that won’t last. Waiting too long will allow Chisaki loyalists to find us again.”

Izuku nodded, resolute. “Tomorrow should be fine. You’re right. The sooner we move, the better.”

“Alright,” Aizawa said softly. “Tomorrow it is.”

At the thought of Nana, Izuku grinned without intending to.

But his happiness carried a turbulent anxiety behind his ribs. Mainly because of what happened last time. Even though he knew there was no Tomura or Chisaki Kai to hunt them down—he still couldn’t help but feel uneasy. Or maybe he was still in disbelief that they could truly reach safety.

In the middle of all the table's ongoing conversation, he turned to the window.

Outside, the city of Yokohama stretched out underneath a setting sun. For the first time in weeks, the snow had finally stopped pouring down. There were more people outside, enjoying the minor break in the winter weather.

"Oh man, it looks great out," Katsuki said beside him.

"Yeah, it's nice," Izuku agreed. "Its lovely to see a change in weather."

At the end of their meal, everyone moved to clean up. All of them stacked their plates and began walking towards the exit of the cafeteria area. As soon as they reached the mouth of the door, Izuku felt a gentle tap on his shoulder.

He turned, and there Aizawa stood behind him. His eyes were their usual tired, but there was also an added layer of apprehension.

"I got the cremator in the basement up and running," he said quietly. "We can do it today or tomorrow."

Izuku froze. Next to him, Katsuki went still too.

All humor drained from both of their faces as the mood shifted. It took a moment for Izuku to process what was about to happen.

"It's up to you," Aizawa tacked on when he didn't answer right away. "There's no real rush if you don't want to do it. I can also do it for you."

Izuku shook his head and pulled himself into focus.

"We can do it today," he whispered. "I don't want to hold us up."

Katsuki reached over without a word. He took his hand and squeezed it once.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The basement of The Company was quiet as a funeral would've been. Izuku liked to think that was good.

All around were clean, white walls that were as cold and colorless as his brother used to be. The faint scent of oil and ash hung in the air. The floor was a pristine white tile, and the ceiling was absent of any cobwebs.

For a place built to burn the dead, it was tidy, much to Izuku's surprise.

Him, Aizawa, and Katsuki all stood near an old cremator. It was made of silver metal, and big enough to fit a body. Izuku studied the large pipes and the gaping opening as Aizawa prepared the controls. His future husband lingered close by with his hands shoved deep in his pockets.

In front of them, Tomura laid out underneath a pale linen sheet. Izuku neatly folded the edges, taking gentle care to be as respectful as possible. He thought maybe being orderly could make up for everything that had gone wrong between them.

He reached out, brushing a hand over the fabric before pulling it back to reveal his brother's face one last time. He took a gracious moment of silence. The sharp edges of Tomura's features were softened, and his mouth was no longer twisted by exhaustion or fury.

That never-ending grief returned to Izuku's chest.

"He looks so tranquil," Izuku whispered as he smoothed Tomura's hair back. "I don't think I've ever seen him like this."

"The last thing he saw was you," Katsuki said. "That's probably why."

And that broke his heart. Izuku blinked back tears, and his throat tightened at the image of Tomura glancing at him one last time as he went. With a deep breath, he fortified his heart. He turned to his fiancé and nodded, ready.

Together they lifted Tomura.

It took both of them and all the strength he had. His brother's weight was the sum of a lifetime spent surviving, and Izuku felt every ounce of it in his arms. As they loaded him inside, he wished his throat unlocked. But it stayed clamped tight, reminding him how much he loved his brother despite all the pain he caused.

When Tomura was fully seated inside, Izuku took a step back. He closed the incinerator's door, and the finality of it all cut deeper than he'd expected. This was the last time he'd ever see him.

Katsuki rested his hands on Izuku's shoulders.

"You can start it whenever you're ready," he said softly. "No rush."

Aizawa stood at a respectful distance, saying nothing. Now, the air felt too still. The world too patient. It was as if time itself finally decided to wait, and allow Izuku to choose when to let go.

He stepped forward.

His fingers hovered above the ignition lever, trembling. On his shoulders, Katsuki's thumbs brushed affectionate circles into his skin, coaxing him to breathe. Izuku exhaled shakily and then drew in one last breath.

He screwed his eyes shut and pulled the lever down.

The furnace roared to life. All around, the air in the room filled with the growl of fire devouring what was inside. Bright solemn flames gradually built into a beautiful blaze, spilling gold and red across the white walls.

Izuku flinched at the crackle at first. Then he relaxed and looked headfirst into the funeral pyre. It was strange. It differed from any fire he'd ever seen. Somehow, it moved with quiet sorrow. Its glow was soft and thoughtful, consuming not in violence but in grace. Almost as if it understood the value of what it was taking.

Katsuki stayed beside him throughout the entire process. He didn't speak. Didn't move. His fiancé simply stood close enough for him to lean against.

When Izuku crumbled under grief, Katsuki's arms wrapped around him and held him up.

ᗰᗰᗰ

It took several hours. The whole time, they stayed in the room.

As the hours passed, Izuku traced the years backwards. He reflected on every cruel word and every fleeting moment of tenderness. He mourned quietly for who Tomura might've been if life had been kinder. Maybe then his brother would have chosen another path other than absolute power.

By the time it was over, it was well into the night. The fire sent Tomura off in enchanting embers, and the weight in Izuku's chest felt lighter.

When the ashes cooled down, Aizawa opened the chamber and carefully swept the remains onto a metal tray. Izuku wiped his tears with the back of his hand and stepped forward. He began to help with the transfer. As he looked at the grey ashes, he experienced an emotion that was part sorrow and part relief.

Katsuki turned and went to retrieve one of the urns The Company had in storage. It was dark grey and had a silver lining. He handed it silently to Izuku, and Izuku did his best to ensure his hands didn't shake too much as he handled it.

Together, they transferred the ashes. When the last remnants slid inside, Izuku placed the lid on top and sealed it tightly.

With tender care, he held the urn close against his chest. It was shockingly light. Almost too light for who was inside, but the thought made him smile faintly. Maybe that was how it should be. Tomura was finally unburdened after a lifetime of struggling to the top.

"Rest well," Izuku whispered.

☽ ☽ᗰ☾ ☾

As they made their way up to their room, Katsuki's eyes lingered on Izuku the whole way.

The smaller man held the urn tight to his chest, cradling it protectively. The solemn look in Izuku's eyes softened Katsuki's resentment of Tomura a bit. But only a bit. For all the hatred he held towards that abusive piece of shit, he was glad Izuku had been granted a proper goodbye.

It wasn't perfect, but it was something.

When they reached their room, Katsuki blinked in mild surprise to find Miruko waiting for them. She was lounging on the couch with her legs crossed and filing her nails casually. At her feet sat two ridiculously large black suitcases and two duffel bags.

"What's all this?" Katsuki asked, drawing her attention.

She turned, and perked up instantly at the sight of them.

"Hey there," she greeted with a grin. She stood, grabbed the bags and dragged them closer. "I come bearing gifts. One for you, and one for you." She nudged one suitcase toward Izuku, the other toward Katsuki. "Inside are all the essentials for your trip. Pretty much any clothes you'll need, snacks, and toiletries."

Izuku's expression softened, a genuine smile curving his lips as he set Tomura's urn gently on the table beside the flowers.

"Thank you," he said warmly. "You didn't have to do that."

"Yeah, seriously," Katsuki added. "This is kinda unlike you."

Miruko shrugged. "It was Aizawa's doing. He's been fussing for weeks about what you two might need once you're on the road." She shot them both a teasing grin. "If there's anything missing, let the old man know. He'll pretend to be annoyed but gladly get on with it right away."

Katsuki's brows rose, touched despite himself. "Uh, yeah…will do."

"Good. Then I'll leave you two to it. If you need anything, I'll be in the west corridor. I'm staying late to catch up on paperwork."

And with that, she gave a playful wave and slipped out the door.

At the same time, both Izuku and Katsuki handled the suitcases. They put them on their backs to zip them open to inspect what was inside. As he stared at the various items, Katsuki didn't quite know what to think. But he was thankful. Quietly, he held up one of the spicy snacks he always gravitated towards. As he inspected the plastic wrapping, he realized Aizawa knew him well. He had always known that, but this time it made his heart warm stupidly.

"You're very lucky to have Aizawa," Izuku said as he shuffled through some of his new shirts. He smiled gently.

"Yeah," Katsuki agreed. "I got, uh, really lucky with him."

As they sifted through the bags Katsuki noted a couple of things.

First, each one was full of fresh clothes. Everything was similar to the style he always wore. Black on black, simple and functional. But there was also a hint of orange that surprised him. He'd been leaning towards that color only after Izuku came into his life.

Aizawa saw him in orange once: during his retirement party.

It had been such a small moment, a fleeting blip he assumed no one but Izuku took seriously.

But Aizawa had.

The last thing he noticed was Izuku's eyes flicking over to Tomura's urn. It didn't take a genius to see how fast the damn nerd's brain was turning. His fiancé no doubt was stuck in an uphill battle, wrestling with the concept of his brother being gone.

A truth like that would take long to swallow. Katsuki knew first hand. Because even though he loved his mother, probably as much as Izuku loved his brother, they both had to accept that they were better off without them. Izuku would get there, he was positive.

But it was still a really, damn sad sight to watch.

Izuku's gaze lingered too long on the urn for Katsuki's liking. He watched as Izuku's fingers twitched faintly, and the pull of grief worked its way back into Izuku's face.

He hated seeing Izuku sit in that type of silence. Like, really fucking hated it.

So he cleared his throat and broke it. "Wanna go out on the town for a bit?"

Izuku turned to him, startled. "What? Kacchan—no. That is a little too dangerous."

"It'll be fine." Katsuki huffed and waved a dismissive hand. "Those Yakuza bastards are too busy. You think they've got time to look for us right now? They've got what, three hundred funerals to plan?"

Izuku tried not to laugh, but failed. But even through the humor he fidgeted with his hands, twisting his fingers together.

"…Where would we even go?" he asked quietly, uncertainty weaving across his words.

Katsuki gave a small snort, half offended. "We're in my city, nerd. I've lived here half my whole life. You think I don't know a few places worth seeing? Besides—" he tilted his head, eyes softening by a fraction, "—you could use some air."

Izuku hesitated. His eyes darted between Katsuki, the window, and the urn. He bit his lip, big ass brain weighing his options. Then slowly, a small smile painted across his face.

"Okay," Izuku said at last. "Let's do it."

Katsuki grinned wider. "That's my darling."

Katsuki tucked the fluffy scarf around Izuku's neck one last time, pulling it snug so the smaller man huddled into its warmth. They shared a short, private smile as a pair of night-shift agents drifted past them in the lobby.

“I’ll be right back,” Katsuki said. “I’m gonna ask Miruko for something.”

“Okay, I’ll try not to run away,” Izuku teased with bright eyes.

Katsuki zipped his leather jacket up and took off down the hallway. As he walked, he shuffled through the list of places he wanted to show Izuku before they left. In an odd way, he was going to enjoy chauffeuring his dork around Yokohama. It’d been the place he’d called home ever since Aizawa took him under his wing. He had a decent number of good memories here.

When he reached Miruko’s office, her door was cracked open. Through the gap he could see her leaning over her laptop with her glasses perched on the tip of her nose.

He tapped on the door in a rhythmic cadence and pushed it fully open. Miruko turned and groaned when she saw him.

“Shouldn’t you be resting?” She chastised.

With the biggest shit eating grin he could manage, Katsuki asked, “Can I borrow the keys to your bike?”

Like expected, her face dropped, entirely unimpressed.

“And where exactly do you think you’re going, Casanova?” she asked, staring him down over the rim of her glasses. “Trying to impress your little husband?”

“And if I am?” Katsuki replied, rubbing his nose to hide the rising warmth in his cheeks. “I’m just gonna take Izuku for a quick spin, nothing wild. He needs some fresh air before we’re boxed in a ship for god knows how long.”

Miruko clicked her tongue, disapproving. But then a slow, infectious grin spread across her face.

“Fine,” she laughed with a sharp snort. “But only because I like Izuku so much. If he weren’t part of the equation, I wouldn’t let you touch my bike ever again. Not after you fucking stole it when you were a teen.”

“I didn’t steal it,” Katsuki barked. “I was borrowing it.”

“Whatever you’re telling yourself these days.” She dug into the drawer beside her desk and produced a ring of keys. She held them up and narrowed her eyes. “If you put one scratch on that bike like last time, I’ll track you down and make you pay. I don’t care where that mystery lady hides you, I will find you.”

Katsuki rolled his eyes and caught the keys when she tossed them.

“Yeah, yeah. I know—you’ll find me and skin me alive,” he mocked lazily. “Thanks, Miruko.”

“Tell Izuku to enjoy the night for me!”

Izuku stared in awe at the sleek white motorcycle.

Its iridescent chrome glowed like moonlight, and the lavender decals sat beautifully against its pristine frame. He circled it once, fingertips brushing the handlebars as though afraid to taint it with his fingerprints.

“And Miruko’s actually okay with us using her bike?” Izuku asked, fully incredulous as Katsuki handed him motorcycle goggles. “This thing is gorgeous. I don’t think I’d let anyone touch it if it were mine.”

“Yeah, she’s super chill about it,” Katsuki replied with a cocky grin. He arrogantly pointed his thumb at his chest. “I was basically her favorite agent in M-Unit. She lets me borrow it all the time.”

Izuku gave a slow, skeptical smile. “For some reason, I find that oddly hard to believe, Kacchan.”

“Well, believe it, dork,” Katsuki shot back, putting on the helmet. “She trusts me more than half the idiots employed at our agency. Now quit talkin’ and get on before I change my mind.”

Izuku chuckled as he pulled the goggles over his eyes.

“Yes, sir,” he teased.

Katsuki hopped on and inserted the key. His chest swarmed with those damn butterflies again when Izuku settled in behind him. The leather seat was cool and slick beneath them, and the faint smell of gasoline clung to the air as Katsuki turned the key. With a throaty growl, the engine roared to life. The headlight blared, carving a clean beam through the dimly lit garage.

“Ready?” Katsuki asked over his shoulder.

Izuku’s arms slid around his waist, snug and steady. “Always.”

They sped out of the garage, and the echo of the engine got swallowed by the vast night. Once they emerged from the outside, all around them the city of Yokohama stretched. Buildings and people passed by them in colorful streaks of light. Through the helmet, Katsuki could hear the radio on the dashboard.

Right as he hit the long stretch of highway, the first raindrops fell.

It was barely there at first. But then it happened again, like the world was finally done holding its breath.

Izuku’s voice came muffled against the collar of Katsuki’s jacket. “Are you sure this was a good idea?”

Katsuki smirked without looking back. “What, you’re scared of a little rain?”

“I’m scared of you getting a dent in Miruko’s bike,” Izuku shot back, his words barely audible over the rising wind. “I would like to get to Nana in one piece!”

Katsuki laughed. Like truly, really laughed. It was loud, wild, and alive for the first time in months.

“Relax. I know every turn in this city. I could drive it blindfolded.”

“Please don’t test that,” Izuku said, but there was laughter in his voice too.

The drizzle thickened, and the rain became a soft curtain that blurred the edges of the streetlights. The droplets caught in the headlight like scattered diamonds and made the music vibrate underneath his fingertips. Around him, his city’s pulse became covered in liquid. The familiar skyscrapers glowed through the mist, and puddles reflected every color in the world.

Izuku’s laughter rose when Katsuki made a sharp turn. The world blurred further into streaks of color and rain sliced across the night. The wetness hit their legs, their hands, and their jackets. But neither of them suggested turning back.

He should’ve been annoyed, but instead he felt rejuvenated and refreshed—and it only pushed him harder.

The music on the radio switched, and Katsuki felt a small wave of fission ignite along his arms.

Behind him, Izuku’s grip tightened when they hit a winding road. His fiancé let out a small yelp as they twisted and turned unpredictably. It was exhilarating. With a wild surge, Katsuki hit the gas harder. Izuku squeezed him tightly then and tilted his head back, letting the rain soak him.

“God, I forgot what this felt like,” Izuku shouted over the roar.

“What, being alive?” Katsuki called back.

“Yeah,” Izuku said, and Katsuki could hear the smile in it. “Exactly that.”

That’s what Katsuki wanted to hear. With a daring glance in the mirror, he caught sight of Izuku’s reflection.

And it was beautiful.

Izuku’s head was tilted to the sky and his mouth was pulled into a light smile. His curls were blowing in the subtle drizzle. He looked like he was breathing for the first time in years.

Out of sheer joy, Katsuki let out a loud laugh and twisted the throttle.

The bike surged forward, roaring down the slick road. Water sprayed up from the tires, shining like silver dust in their wake. The cold wind slapped their skin, but it didn’t bite. It merely woke them up further.

“Hold on tight!” Katsuki yelled.

“I already am!” Izuku’s voice was bright and fearless. “You’re insane, Kacchan!”

“Damn right I am!” Katsuki shouted back, grinning like a maniac.

They sped through the dark until a tunnel appeared. It was large, and full of a yellow glow that waited for them with open arms. No one else was in sight, and the opening was entirely empty—so Katsuki didn’t slow down. He throttled harder, plunging them inside at an intoxicating speed.

The world exploded into a dazzling yellow.

Each bulb overhead zoomed past like a miniature sun, melting into the next until the tunnel became a corridor of liquid gold. Izuku’s laughter rose and scattered into the night. The sound was brilliant, catching like starlight in Katsuki’s chest.

He turned up the volume on the radio, threw his head back and let out a loud yell that mixed with his chaotic laughter. The echo came back like thunder, and Izuku’s laughter fused with it, fully unrestrained.

“Kacchan!” Izuku shouted, voice cracking with joy. “What are you doing?!”

“Letting it out!” Katsuki hollered. “Try it! Scream a little, I know you want to!”

Izuku tried.

He began hesitantly, but then slowly his yells snowballed, each one building on the other. Then finally, it all belted out of him in a final howl. He poured out all the frustration that had made a home in his chest.

Together, they yelled. Their voices bounced off the walls, blending with the revving of the bike and music.

In that tunnel, for a moment, they weren’t killers. They were somehow simply kids again. Kids who were reckless enough to believe they were invincible in a world that always reminded them they weren’t.

When they burst out the other end of the tunnel, the rain had softened to a floating mist.

The city lights glowed ahead of them, reflecting off the standing pools of water scattered across the road. Their laughter tapered off, and what was left made a weight inside of Katsuki shift. It was odd. Like a stone he wasn’t aware of inside his chest had been demolished.

When they were riding in comfortable silence, Izuku leaned forward. He rested his cheek against Katsuki’s back, and his arms wrapped tighter.

“You were right,” Izuku said softly. “This was a good idea.”

“Of course it was,” Katsuki replied. “You deserve to feel good.”

They rode on, entirely quiet now. The sound of the rain filled the space between them where words couldn't. The road stretched endlessly. And for the first time since everything had fallen apart, they weren't running from the past. They were racing toward a future—one bright enough to believe in.

The rain thinned to a silver mist by the time they reached the city's center.

Yokohama's night scene sang with bustling crowds and bright billboards holding celebrity faces. Katsuki guided the bike through the maze of traffic as he weaved in and out of the streets he knew by heart.

Originally, he didn't plan on talking. He only wanted to show his nerd a couple of his favorite spots. Just to, like, see the guy smile. Nothing big. But there was a specific magic about the city at night that always pulled to him. Driving by the familiar corners made words slip out before he could stop them.

"See that building up ahead?" Katsuki called over his shoulder. "The one with the ugly ass green sign? That used to be my high school after we moved here."

"Really?" Izuku said, head tilting slightly to look. "You actually went there?"

"Yeah. I hated every second. Not too many of my classmates liked me. Although, it wasn't like I was exactly fond of their dumbasses either. Those extras always said I had anger issues." He paused. A humorless laugh caught in his throat. "Guess they weren't exactly wrong about that part."

They weaved down another set of narrow streets and under low overpasses. When the city opened up again, he slowed near a corner bistro.

"That place," Katsuki said, nodding toward it, "has the best karaage in the whole damn city. I used to come here after some assignments. The owner used to sneak me a beer even when I was underage. I had helped him handle some knuckleheads that were giving him a hard time."

Izuku laughed. "Sounds like you've always had a thing for helping others."

"Duh." Katsuki smirked, but it didn't reach his eyes. "It's the right thing to do."

He didn't realize how quiet he'd gone until Izuku spoke again. His fiancé's tone was thoughtful.

"You talk about this place like it was another lifetime."

"Yeah," Katsuki muttered. "Feels like it, huh?"

They took a turn onto a residential street. Over here, the buildings were close together like tired old friends. Katsuki slowed the bike and nodded towards one of the apartment complexes.

“That one on the top floor, that’s where my apartment is—or, I guess, was.”

Izuku’s chin rested lightly on his shoulder now, and Katsuki could feel his gaze travel up.

“It looks nice,” Izuku said. “How long did you live there?”

“Since I was seventeen,” Katsuki replied. “Moved in right after I left my mom’s place—if you remember.” He exhaled unhappily. That memory was always a shitty one to recall. “That was right after I found out about my connection to Imasuji Goto.”

Silence hung between them for a moment. It was thick over the hum of the idling engine.

It hit him then: this was probably the last time he’d ever see this building. Or this street as a matter of fact. But why did that make him feel sad? Ultimately, it shouldn’t matter. It was just a dumb apartment and a dumb road. He had bigger problems like making sure the Yakuza didn’t kill him—he shouldn’t be sad to leave anything behind.

He knew the risks of going into this business.

But, still. It was sad to think.

Katsuki glanced at Izuku through the mirror, and caught the look of pity. Quickly, Katsuki huffed and shook his head.

“Tch. Don’t look at me like that,” he quickly snapped. “It all just…feels weird, that’s all.”

Izuku hugged him tighter. “Weird’s allowed.”

Katsuki didn’t answer.

He sat there, watching the mist drift over his apartment. And as they did, the city and all its ghosts felt distant. But with Izuku’s touch, for once, the silence didn’t ache.

“Alright,” he muttered. “Let’s get the hell outta here before I start crying or some shit.”

Izuku laughed, and the sound cracked the quiet open like sunlight.

And with that, Katsuki kicked the throttle, and they vanished into the city further.

The hum of the metropolis subdued by the time they found the night market.

Above them, red lanterns swayed lazily from thin strings overhead. Their orange glow spilled across the wet pavement. Lining the narrow passages was steam wafting up from food stalls. The smoke curled into the dark sky like breath on cold glass.

Taking a big inhale, Katsuki savored the delicious smell of grilled meat, soy, sugar, and rain.

He parked the bike near a row of shuttered shops and swung his leg over. Izuku followed, tugging his goggles off and shaking out his damp curls. His cheeks were flushed, and his eyes were glowing with a kind of wonder Katsuki hadn't seen on his face in so long.

"This place is open this late?" Izuku asked.

Katsuki smirked and shoved his hands into his jacket. "It's Yokohama. The food doesn't sleep here."

Izuku grinned, and together they started walking towards the crowds.

The number of people out was light this time of night. It was mostly couples and late-night workers grabbing a last bite. Oil popped. Music crackled faintly from an old radio perched beside a dumpling cart. Vendors called out from behind their sizzling grills and the overlapping words all blurred together: Takoyaki! Yakitori! Taiyaki!

Izuku tilted his head, eyes darting everywhere. "It's been years since I've been to one of these casually."

"Yeah?" Katsuki asked, stepping closer as someone brushed past them.

Izuku nodded, the sweetest smile curving his lips. "My brother Hiryu used to bring me to the ones near Tokyo Station. We'd get taiyakis together whenever we hung out."

Katsuki scoffed, but the sound wasn't mocking. "Figures. You're such a sweets guy."

Izuku shot him a fake offended look. "What's wrong with sweets?"

"Nothing. Just means I'm stuck eatin' all the real food myself."

He grinned when his fiancé frowned playfully. He turned ahead, and then straightened when a specific area caught his attention. With an excited step, he tugged Izuku towards the nearby stall. The vendor smiled at them and gestured to the skewers of spicy chicken rotating over the open flame.

Katsuki ordered five. The vendor peeled them off and handed them to him on a paper tray piled high.

"Fuck yeah," Katsuki grinned. "This is what I call real food."

Izuku watched him take a bite of one with a laugh. His eyes lit up with amusement.

"You always go straight for the spiciest thing, don't you?" Izuku joked.

"'Course," Katsuki said around a mouthful of food. "If it doesn't hurt, it's not worth eatin'."

Izuku shook his head, snickering softly. "You have to eat more than spicy food."

"Spicy food is the only food I care about." Katsuki tore off another bite, chewed, and glanced over. "Go on, pick something out. My treat."

Izuku hesitated when Katsuki pulled out his wallet and handed it to him.

“Oh. Kacchan, you don’t have to—”

“Didn’t ask if I had to,” Katsuki interrupted, jutting his chin toward the row of dessert stands. “Pick one before I decide for you.”

After a playful glare, Izuku gave in. He took the wallet and wandered towards a pastel stall selling taiyaki.

Katsuki smiled as he walked behind him. He watched as Izuku eyed one of the fish-shaped pastries. He observed Izuku order. And it was too damn amusing how his fiancé grinned shyly at the old woman behind the counter. It should be criminal how adorable Izuku was with the way his fingers brushed his hair back whenever he got flustered.

When Izuku returned with two taiyaki in hand, Katsuki couldn’t help but grin.

“You look like a kid in a candy store,” Katsuki teased.

“Ah, I feel like one,” Izuku said, voice soft. He held out one of the taiyaki. “Here. Try it.”

Katsuki raised a brow but took it anyway. He took a defiant bite, and the sweetness melted against his tongue.

Instantly, he made a face. “Bleh. Too damn sweet.”

Izuku chuckled, unguarded. In return, Katsuki grinned before he even realized it.

They moved through the narrow aisles, stopping for takoyaki and grilled corn. They ate until they were full and grabbed carbonated drinks in glass bottles. As they wandered through the market, every so often, Izuku’s fingers brushed Katsuki’s. Once. Then twice. Then finally, he slipped his hand into Katsuki’s.

“Still acting shy around me, huh?” Katsuki teased. “You don’t have to, y’know. I won’t bite you, I swear.”

“I know,” Izuku replied, hiding his blush a bit. “I can’t help it. You make me feel…fuzzy every time we’re together.”

Validation swelled. “You make me feel fuzzy too.”

They continued to walk like that, hand in hand, beneath the glow of lanterns. Laughter from nearby couples carried to them like music. Katsuki bought more food than either of them could eat. He refused to let Izuku go without trying everything his pretty green eyes set their sights on.

At one point, they paused near a stand selling tiny trinkets. The vendor showed them all their handmade charms that were shaped like tiny, annoyingly adorable animals.

Izuku's eyes sparkled as he picked one up. It was a small brass cat curled around an orange marble.

"This one looks like you, Kacchan," Izuku said with a wide smile.

Katsuki frowned, but the tips of his ears went pink. "Yeah? I thought I was more of a dragon type."

"A cat is better," Izuku said. "Much cuter."

Katsuki barked a laugh. "Cute, huh? You've got me mixed up with someone else."

But when they moved on, Katsuki reached into his pocket and quietly paid for the charm.

Later, when the sky was clear of any rain clouds, they sat on the curb at the edge of the market. The city lights shimmered off the puddles at their feet. And their legs stretched out with the remnants of their feast spread beside them. Between them, various skewer sticks, empty wrappers, and half drained soda bottles laid out as they both took tiny bites of the last pieces of food they were finishing off.

Izuku leaned back on his hands and exhaled. His eyes drifted upward toward the starry sky.

"I see why you loved living here, Kacchan," he said quietly. "It's nice. Thank you for taking me around."

Katsuki turned to him. His gaze caught on the curve of Izuku's jaw illuminated by the lantern glow and the rain still clinging to his curls.

"You needed it," he said simply.

"But so did you."

Izuku gave him a solemn smile.

Katsuki returned the gesture. He wordlessly turned his attention to the discarded trash on the sidewalk and picked it up. With a grunt, he rose and placed it in the nearby trash. As he wandered back to his seat, his stare roamed over the market in front of him. For a moment, the noise of the crowds fell away. All he could hear was just the soft rustle of the wind and the faint hiss of rain in the distance.

When he sat back down, the radiance of Izuku's hand found him again.

Katsuki didn't say anything. He just squeezed back.

And when Izuku scooted in towards him and rested his head against his shoulder, Katsuki thought, for just a second, that maybe the world wasn't such a bad place after all.

Izuku broke the quiet. "So…fate, huh?"

Katsuki scrunched his nose. "Oh, don't start with me, nerd."

“But you believe in it now?” Izuku asked, smile growing wider. “I may have been half dead but I heard that loud and clear.”

“Yeah, but don’t go making a big deal out of it,” Katsuki said. “It’s just—shit like this doesn’t happen for no reason, right? Running into you over and over, and ending up together. And this…” He gestured vaguely at the market and the night sky. “It’s too damn perfect to be a coincidence.”

Izuku snuggled in further. “So you think we were meant to find each other?”

Katsuki let out a chuckle. “I don’t know about all that fairytale crap,” he said. “But yeah…I think we were.” He leaned his head against Izuku’s and the smell of sweet dango wafted into his nose. “Guess I’d be an idiot not to admit it.”

“That’s a rare sentiment to hear from you, Bakugou Katsuki.”

“Don’t push it,” Katsuki warned warmly.

His arm shifted, sliding around Izuku’s back until his palm rested just above his waist.

“Y’know.” Izuku gazed up at him with those big doe eyes. “My opinion on fate has changed a lot too.”

“Oh, yeah? In what way.”

“I used to think fate meant that everything was written,” Izuku explained. “I thought that it was comforting to believe things were out of my control. It made it easier to accept I couldn’t do anything about my circumstances. But maybe…maybe fate is calling you to action. Maybe fate is that some people are drawn to each other. And they will consistently be drawn to each other until they do something about it.”

“Yeah, that sounds right,” Katsuki agreed. “I guess the universe is just going to keep throwing us together until we figure it out.”

Izuku’s fingers brushed against his arm, tentative at first, then firmer. He looped his arm around Katsuki’s sleeve.

“Do you think we’ve figured it out?” Izuku asked.

“Not fully,” Katsuki replied thoughtfully. “But I think we’re close. Hard not to believe I’m on the right path when a crazy, green-haired nerd keeps crashing back into my life every time I turn around.”

Izuku turned his head, smiling against his shoulder. “You think I’m crazy?”

“The good kind. My kind of crazy.”

Izuku looked up at him then, affectionately. “Then I guess that makes you my type of crazy too.”

Katsuki pretended to look away when his cheeks colored red. “Tch. I better be.”

They stayed like that, shoulder to shoulder. The night wrapped around them and Katsuki took the time to soak in his surroundings. The lanterns swaying. The people laughing. And somewhere in the noise, Katsuki felt the weight of fate again.

It was that strange, unshakable certainty that every failure, every fight, and every turn of bad luck, had been leading them right here.

The next morning came wrapped in a dull gray sky.

It was the kind of late winter weather that promised sleet but never followed through. The wind was extra fierce and the barren trees rustled a bit harder than usual.

The night market’s laughter and lantern lights faded into memory. The previous sounds were now replaced by the rustle of zippers, the dull thud of luggage, and the metallic rattle of the minivan’s back door.

Katsuki helped hoist one of the duffel bags inside, then wiped his hands on his jeans. He exhaled loudly, breath misting faintly in the cool air.

“Argh, this all feels gloomy,” Denki muttered as he slammed the passenger door shut. “It’s way too quiet. It’s like the world knows it’s the end of an era.”

“Don’t start getting poetic,” Sero warned, bumping Denki’s shoulder with his. “You’re not built for it.”

Denki gasped, hand over his heart. “You wound me.”

“You’ll live,” Sero shot back with a grin.

Monoma snorted from where he was, perched against the car. “He won’t, actually. He’ll just talk about it for the next hour.”

“I heard that,” Denki called.

“You were meant to,” Monoma replied smoothly, the corner of his mouth twitching upward.

Sero laughed under his breath and zipped up the last of the gear bags. “Feels like old times already. One big dysfunctional road trip at the end of a big assignment.”

Shinsou, who was leaning next to Monoma, muttered, “Except this time we don’t get to come back together.”

That stilled everyone for a second. Even Denki looked away, his usual cheerfulness dissipating.

Katsuki rolled his shoulders and tried to shrug off the sadness.

“Don’t start making it sound like a damn funeral, guys,” he said. He walked up to Shinsou and firmly patted him on the shoulder. “We’re getting on a boat, not dying.”

“As far as you know,” Monoma said dryly. “You’re heading into international waters. Who the hell knows what’s going to happen.”

“Thanks for the vote of confidence,” Katsuki grumbled.

Izuku glanced up from his snack packing, a gentle smile tugging at his mouth. “We’ll be okay,” he said reassuringly. “Really. Nana is good at what she does.”

“Yeah, you better be,” Miruko agreed, smirking again, but her eyes didn’t quite match the tone. “After all this trouble, you two owe us a happy ending.”

“I agree!” Denki pointed a finger at them. “No dying, no disappearing, and no sending cryptic postcards! I can’t handle emotional suspense.”

“Or emotions in general,” Monoma quipped.

Denki cut his eyes at Monoma and narrowed them down. “You never pass up a moment for a smart ass remark, do you?”

Monoma grinned from ear to ear. “Absolutely not.”

The two of them carried on, and in the midst of the bickering, Katsuki leaned against the van. He half-listened and half-watched. He didn’t want to admit he was going to miss this stupid shit. The roundabout fighting. The sarcastic remarks. Never in his life did he think he’d get accustomed to all these imbeciles—but he had.

His gaze softened as he watched all the different things occurring. Izuku laughed softly beside Sero. Miruko bumped shoulders with Shinsou, trying to cheer him up. And Monoma and Denki went back and forth about something absolutely pointless.

It all made him smile.

Katsuki sighed.

Damn. When did he get so soft?

“Bakugou,” Aizawa called, voice even as ever. “Come here, I got something for you.”

Katsuki turned, frowning as Aizawa gestured him towards the trunk of the minivan. He followed, leaving behind all the others. When Katsuki joined Aizawa at the back end, his ex-supervisor turned to him with a contemplative stare.

“I’ve spent the last few weeks tying up your loose ends,” Aizawa said evenly. “The Bakugou Estate’s been transferred to one of my aliases—I’ll make sure the gravesite stays tended and quiet. Your apartment’s cleared out, sold to a new buyer. And…” He reached into his coat, pulling out a folded document. “I filed an official death certificate. Bakugou Katsuki—deceased by suffocation. You’re legally dead.”

For a moment, Katsuki didn't know what to do.

Honestly, he was banking on the cities foreclosing his properties. He didn't exactly have the means or time to sell his stuff. Mainly because he didn't want to confirm the 'Bakugou Katsuki is back from the dead' rumors. Just in case the Yakuza were monitoring records from his legal name—but of course.

Aizawa had handled it like a pro, exactly like he always did.

"You didn't have to do that," Katsuki muttered.

"I know," Aizawa said. "That's why I did. I also figured you'd want to keep some things."

He stepped forward then and zipped open one particular duffel bag he brought this morning. Aizawa moved aside so Katsuki could see better.

And he nearly couldn't believe his eyes. Inside, stacked neatly, were old photo albums, notebooks, and classical music vinyls he had collected over the years.

But right on top of the pile was a photograph.

It was him and his mom—the year she died.

They were standing in a park side by side. Sunlight poured diagonally across the photo. In Mitsuki's hands was a fresh bundle of pink carnations and the grin on Katsuki's face was relaxed and happy. Katsuki stared at it for a long time, thumb brushing the edge of the frame.

His voice came out quieter than he intended. "You found this?"

Aizawa nodded. "And some others from the estate. They were hidden away but I figured you might like to keep all your family photos."

Katsuki rifled through the bag and froze.

Inside were the photographs he'd taken down from the estate long ago. Sepia-tinted faces of relatives he'd never met stared back at him: his grandparents next to a youthful version of his mother. Nestled among these photos were newer ones too. Pictures from his mother's old apartment. He recognized them because they were the ones he'd stuffed into a box after her death and never opened again.

As he thumbed through them, the years unfolded. Shots of sunlit beaches, quiet parks, and even a few candid ones taken at The Company, with Aizawa standing beside him.

"Thanks," Katsuki rasped, clearing his throat. "Really."

Aizawa didn't reply. Instead, he reached into his coat pocket and pulled out a small wrapped parcel.

"One more thing," he said, handing it to him.

Katsuki took it and then unwrapped it. The tears he was trying his best to keep at bay punched through his eyes then.

It was his baby feet plaster. And it was exactly how he remembered it, repaired by Izuku's hands with the gold lining holding the tiny pieces together. He peered around to Izuku, who was talking with Denki completely unaware. Katsuki smiled. He tried to laugh off the tears and stubbornly wiped them away with the back of his hand.

He sighed and shook his head. "You sentimental old man."

"I know. Sometimes I just can't help it."

Aizawa laughed lightly and shook his head too. He patted Katsuki on the shoulder and then smiled at him. He nodded once and zipped back up the duffel bag. When he closed the trunk he walked towards the driver's side.

"Let's get a move on, Bakugou. We have a long journey ahead of us."

Katsuki nodded, and then watched as Aizawa herded everyone into the car. One by one all the others piled in with Miruko in the passenger seat, Denki, Sero, and Shinsou in the back and Izuku and Monoma in the middle.

For a long moment, Katsuki stayed where he was.

He waded there, knee deep in his own memories. The wind tore through the empty courtyard, threading its cold fingers through his hair. He turned toward the horizon and looked out to the sleepy skyline of Yokohama.

He held the small plaster cast in both hands. His thumb traced across its smooth surface. The item was warm from his touch, as if he were still holding on to a fragment of his mother's warmth. When he lifted his eyes, he could particularly see her there. Her smile was in the passing clouds, and her love was above in the sun that peaked through the cloudy day.

He understood then why his chest hurt so much.

He would miss this place because it was the last piece of her he had left.

The memories flashed through his mind like an old flip book. They were quick and imperfect but achingly vivid. Every street corner he'd shown Izuku carried a ghost of her.

She was there in a faded outline. Her silhouette had been waiting outside his high school gates, waving him over after class sometimes. She was there in the restaurant's dim glow, where the owner slipped him free drinks. They'd sit side by side, sharing karaage as they small talk about nothing and everything. And she was there too, in his old apartment, with a gentle pride in her eyes whenever she'd visit. She'd seen the person he'd become despite her shortcomings.

Katsuki bittersweetly gazed at the sunrise.

He had officially outgrown this place, hadn't he?

“Kacchan!” Izuku’s voice broke the stillness. “Kacchan, c’mon! It’s time to go!”

“Yeah, coming!” Katsuki called back.

With one last look, Katsuki lifted two fingers and subtly saluted the skyline. The wind carried the gesture away, scattering it through the streets and rooftops that had raised him.

He said goodbye to the city he used to call home.

Chapter End Notes

Let me know what you think!

I'm so sorry I haven't been able to get around to respond to comments like normal. August through November is busy season for my field so I'm a little slammed currently :')

Thank you all so much for reading!!

Chapter 51 — Semplice

Pleasant, calming air poured into his lungs.

Katsuki closed his eyes and let the wind roll over him. He had his head leaned out the window, and the breeze was brushing through his hair and stinging his cheeks. But it didn't feel bad. It felt nice because the air had shifted. It was warmer now. Nimble and salt tinged, carrying the distant smell of the southern sea.

Next to him, his future husband rested. Izuku's eyes were closed as the breeze combed back his curls. And his expression was lazy and untroubled.

Around them, the van was rumbling down the highway. Aizawa was at the wheel with his sunglasses perched on the bridge of his nose. The light caught across the windshield as he sang under his breath.

Beside him in the passenger seat, Miruko sat with one foot propped on the dashboard. She was drumming her fingers to a generic pop song Denki and Sero were massacring in the back. All the while, Monoma's dry interjections poked fun at their pitchy voices. His remarks only fueled their group's laughter as Shinsou slept soundly, somehow.

Izuku's smile caught the light as the road curved. Ahead, the horizon opened wide before them.

They passed by a number of places Katsuki had taken for granted. Green scenery. Magnificent mountains. Even some half frozen rivers showed him their beauty, as if giving him a parting gift.

"Wow," Katsuki said in awe. "I wish we had picked up another disposable camera. We're missing out on some good shots."

Izuku turned to him. "We'll make up for it when we get to our new home."

"I'm holding you to that," Katsuki chuckled.

He returned his attention to the terrain obscuring by in washes of color. Gray towns gave way to olive hills, then to open stretches of sapphire coastline. Above, the sky steadily cleared. It broke open with patches of pale blue that gave an early promise of spring.

Without a word, Izuku reached across the seat and slid his hand into his.

Their fingers fit together effortlessly, like they always had.

"I swear this thing is leading us straight into the ocean," Aizawa unhappily muttered. He reached forward and fiddled with the GPS. "This can not be the fastest route."

"Maybe it has a point," Monoma replied sarcastically. "There's less traffic underwater."

They'd officially been driving for ten hours.

It wasn't the worst, but they were in for a long fucking trip. They were riding smoothly with the windows down, blasting whatever chaotic playlist Denki cobbled together. It was something between punk rock, eighties pop, and a remix of elevator music.

The latter was shit enough to make Shinsou threaten to leap out the window.

"Change it," Shinsou groaned. "For the love of fuck, change it."

"I did!" Denki shouted over the wind. "This is Lo-fi Road Trip Vibes!"

"Sounds more like Lo-fi Torture Vibes," Sero quipped.

Out of all of them, Izuku seemed the least bit bothered. He chuckled loudly with Miruko at their group's chaos and handed out snacks. He grinned the whole time while unwrapping rice balls and passing around bottles of Pocari Sweat.

When night time fell, Aizawa and Miruko switched seats.

The stars in the sky twinkled ‘hello’ as they began the next half of the trip.

After a couple of hours, everyone but Katsuki dozed off. He was stuck in a car full of intense snoring. It should have annoyed him, especially the way Sero fucking sounded, but it didn’t.

Maybe it was because this was one of the few times their unit was at total peace.

It was nice.

Beside him, Izuku’s head was propped on his shoulder. His eyes fluttered open and closed as the van purred steadily. Whenever the car hit a bump, Izuku grumbled. And then Katsuki would murmur something calming that made the dork smile and doze off again.

When the sun rose anew, they pulled over for a brief moment.

The smell of salt from the Seto Inland Sea wafted into his nose, and Katsuki readily breathed it in. As everyone shook out their limbs, Denki was already wide awake and putting together a new playlist.

When they started up again, Sero volunteered to drive. Or rather, he was the only one Aizawa trusted behind the wheel. Izuku had offered, bright-eyed and eager, but Katsuki immediately pressed his hand down before he could finish the sentence. An icy shiver crawled up his spine at the memory of the last time he endured Izuku’s driving. Once was enough.

As they began driving again, the van was surprisingly tranquil. The new lo-fi music that played on the speakers was much, much, better than before.

“Glad you take feedback well, Pikachu,” Katsuki said. “This, surprisingly, doesn’t make me feel like my ears are bleeding.”

“I’m a man of adaptability!” Denki replied.

A couple of snickers arose.

By the time they reached Kyushu, Miruko decided they should play a game of ‘I Spy’.

It seemed harmless, so Katsuki figured, why the hell not. But of course, the game quickly developed into chaos when Denki insisted that the thing he spied was the ‘crushing weight of shared trauma’.

“That does not count,” Monoma chastised. “You can not see that physically.”

“Oh yes I can,” Denki countered. “Look at Bakugou’s frown lines. He’s gotten like four new ones this year alone. Not to mention he has a couple of fresh grey hairs.”

“Fuck off,” Katsuki hissed.

That earned a laugh from the collective group.

As they approached the far side of the country, it was like they'd passed through every season in two days. The air had turned lukewarm, and the scent of salt crept in with every gust of wind. Everyone's laughter came easier now too, like the long awaited welcoming of spring.

When they finally rolled up to the port in Kagoshima, all of them poured out the van like they were survivors of a great odyssey. Each one of them was bleary-eyed, yet triumphant. They stood in the middle of a busy scene, the noise of fishermen clashed with the vendors calling out the morning's catch.

"Roadtrips, good for the heart but bad for the back," Sero hissed as he stretched out his legs.

Katsuki cracked his neck and let out a deep groan. "Too damn true."

Aizawa ushered them down the dock. He guided them towards a cramped pier tucked behind a line of cargo crates.

Waiting there was a small ferry. It was a shade of black that drank in all the light around it. It bore no name on its hull and there were no markings that betrayed its ownership. But all of them knew: it belonged to The Company.

Aizawa went to the cashier stand, wordlessly taking care of paperwork under one of his old aliases. His tone with the dockhand was cordial as they casually caught up in the morning mist.

"Where are we going this time, boss?" The dockhand asked with a hint of humor.

"Okinawa," Aizawa said. "We have some business there to sort out for the day."

"Ohh, another vacation so soon?"

"Something of the sort."

As Aizawa filed them as passengers, the rest of their crew busied themselves with loading the bags aboard. All of their movements were lethargic after two days of nonstop travel. When the last of the duffels were loaded, Katsuki was the first to drop into one of the seats inside the ferry's cabin.

His spine cracked as he leaned back, and a low ripple of pain moved through his body. But there was something deeply satisfying in the exhaustion. It felt earned. He knew when he finally laid down to rest this time—it would be for good.

Izuku sat down next to him as the air filled with diesel. The others climbed into the cabin in ones and twos as they found places to sit. Somewhere above them, the captain called to the crew. And with a rustic whine, the ferry pulled away from the dock.

Izuku leaned forward, with his elbows on his knees. He tilted his head and squinted at the horizon.

"Ah. You can see the island from here," Izuku claimed.

Katsuki followed his gaze.

A faint shape hovered in the mist ahead, barely visible against the brightening sky.

“Huh,” he said. “You’re right. It’s small but it’s there.”

The wind picked up, tugging through their hair. With it came the clean scent of the sea. Izuku smiled thinly, and to Katsuki that smile transcended the light of the sun. He peered around, and saw the same expression reflected in the faces of his team.

Miruko was leaning against the railing, with her hair blowing like silk. Sero and Denki sat shoulder to shoulder, whispering. Monoma and Shinsou were admiring the way the sun danced along the water, eyes reflecting the spots of light.

It was only Aizawa who stood apart.

His eyes were fixed on the distant island, and the sun painted his face in a muted yellow.

An indecipherable emotion passed across his face.

By the time they reached the heart of Okinawa City, the sun was dipping low again. The horizon became progressively painted in streaks of rose and orange above their heads, and Katsuki wondered if this was the last sunset he’d ever see in Japan.

They wandered the city streets with their bags slung over their shoulders. Exhaustion clung to everyone’s bones, but a rare harmony guided all their steps. The endless skyscrapers unfolded before them, accompanied by hundreds of concrete avenues lined with luminous street lamps.

Funny to think this place was the beginning of it all.

“I’m going to have to come back here for my vacation,” Denki said as they passed by some palm trees. “I can see why you two fell in love here. It is sooo romantic.”

“Just make sure you stay away from any pink colored resorts,” Katsuki grumbled back.

He adjusted the strap of his duffel as they wove through the crowd. Their group moved like a small current against the tide of people. In the commotion, there was a quiet awareness woven throughout everything. It was as if they all were silently recognizing the full circle.

“What was the alias of the place called again?” Denki asked.

“Lone Flora,” Shinsou replied, scanning the signs above each doorway. “It should be close. We came this way last time.”

They passed small restaurants, a street musician playing piano, and a cluster of kids chasing each other with sparklers in their hands. The deeper they went into Okinawa City, the thicker the crowds became. Right when Katsuki thought they’d turned the wrong way, they finally stumbled upon a small, unassuming alley.

“That’s it,” Miruko said, nodding toward it.

The door was inconspicuous. It was a dull violet against a wall of worn grey stone. A single overhead light flickered faintly, casting long shadows across the pavement. Above it hung a sign painted with the faint outline of a flower curling around the words ‘Lone Flora’.

Aizawa stepped forward first and knocked twice.

A moment later, a metal slit scraped open with a sharp sound. A pair of scrutinizing eyes peered out from the darkness within.

“Sorry, we’re closed for the night,” the man declared plainly. “Come back tomorrow.”

Aizawa exchanged a brief glance with Katsuki, then said clearly, “We’re here for One For All.”

For a passing second, nothing happened. Then the slot snapped shut, and the sound of a heavy lock sliding back echoed through the alley. The door creaked open, and a warm golden light spilled out.

The man on the other side jerked his head. “Hurry.”

They slipped in one by one. And the moment the last of them crossed the threshold, the door slammed shut, cutting off the street’s chaos as cleanly as a blade.

Inside, the air was thick with warmth.

All around, dark brown wood shone. Every surface was polished to a low gleam, and amber light from glass sconces spilled over the leather couches. Across the way, a long mahogany bar sat. It smelled faintly of whiskey and smoke as the bartender served several people. The faint hum of jazz spilled from a gramophone in the corner, mixing with the scent of old wood, candle wax, and cedar. Languidly clung to everything, giving the place an easy intimacy.

Katsuki mouthed ‘wow’ to himself, and Denki gave a low whistle.

A few heads turned their way, quietly assessing them. Some patrons looked startled, shrinking back into themselves. Others, who were rougher around the edges, leaned back in their chairs and scowled.

The man who had opened the door appraised them rigorously. He was a tall guy with bright red hair and a quiet, composed face. Once they all seemingly passed whatever mental test, he gave them a single nod. No words and not a lick of a welcome. He then disappeared through the door behind the bar, without another glance back.

“Talk about a warm welcome,” Monoma murmured.

Miruko shrugged. “They’re probably all on edge. Everyone’s running from something here.”

“Or worse,” Shinsou added. “Some*one*.”

When the red-haired man returned, a new person was walking beside him.

It was a woman. And she perfectly fit the description of Shimura Nana.

She looked nearly identical to the old, shabby photos in the black folder. Strong posture, kind eyes and her presence alone shifted the entire disposition of the room. People who'd been on edge before, relaxed. Safety fell across the whole room.

She stopped in front of their group, and her gaze landed immediately on Izuku.

"You made it," she breathed, relieved.

Before anyone could say a word, she pulled Izuku into her arms. He stumbled for a second and then melted into the embrace with a shaky exhale.

"It's nice to see you again," Izuku said. He smiled fragilely and leaned into the hug. "Sorry it took so long."

Nana laughed against Izuku's shoulder. "It's alright. I'm just glad to see you too."

Izuku's hands trembled as he returned the hug. When they finally pulled apart, Nana cupped Izuku's cheek.

"You've got a few more scars from the last time I saw you," she said. "But I'm glad you're safe."

Izuku laughed and wiped the corner of his eye with the back of his hand.

Nana then turned to the rest of the group, her tone brightening as she greeted everyone. She started with Shinsou, Sero and Miruko. All of whom waved to her, sharing the familiarity of meeting before.

"Nice to see you three again," Nana said with a grin. "Thank you for coming to tell me about the situation. And thank you again for coming now. Izuku is very lucky to have you all."

"It's not a problem at all," Miruko replied. "We're all just glad these two made it out alive."

Then Nana's gaze drifted to Aizawa and Denki.

"Glad to finally meet you after all the phone calls," Aizawa greeted, holding out a hand.

"Likewise," Nana replied, shaking his hand firmly. "Nice to be able to put a face to the voice."

"It's so awesome to meet you, ma'am," Denki interjected, attempting confidence. "My name is Kaminari Denki. Izuku's talked about you a little. You're like, a legend or something! It's really cool."

Nana chuckled. "A legend? I suppose I've been called worse. Thank you."

And then, her eyes met Katsuki's.

He didn't know why the air seemed to thicken in that instant. Or why he suddenly felt so aware of his own posture. He awkwardly cleared his throat, straightened his back, and stepped forward. He reached out a hand, keeping his voice lower than usual.

"Bakugou Katsuki," he said respectfully. "It's, er, an honor to meet you. And…thank you. For waiting for us. Sorry about all the chaos."

Her hand was warm when it closed around his.

"It's not a problem," she said, smiling faintly. "I would've waited as long as it took."

That was when Izuku spoke up.

"Katsuki is the reason I couldn't leave before," he said. He turned toward him, gaze full of love as if the rest of the room had faded away. "I…I couldn't really stomach the thought of leaving him behind."

Katsuki's mouth curved into a genuine smile. Without hesitation, he reached for Izuku's hand, interlacing their fingers.

"It's wonderful to meet you, Katsuki," Nana said. "I've been very excited to see you for quite some time. I understanding that you are going to need help lying low as well?"

"I will," Katsuki replied, slightly embarrassed. "I, uh, also caused a bit of a mess with the Chisakis."

"No worries. I have a no questions asked policy here. You don't have to give me any details. All I need to know is that you're trying to start over and need help." She looked around then with that calm authority. "You must all be tired," she said, and snapped her fingers once.

A pair of men appeared almost immediately. They didn't say a word as they began to collect their bags from them, lifting and taking them over to one of the backrooms.

"Come," she said, her voice warm as candlelight. "Let's get you all something to eat."

Katsuki forgot how much he hated watching Denki eat when he was ravenous.

It was disgusting.

"Slow down," Aizawa muttered, barely lifting his eyes from his own plate. "You're going to choke."

Denki mumbled something unintelligible around a mouthful of rice. He sloppily wiped the corners of his lips of grease and gave a thumbs up.

Monoma, sitting across from him, looked personally offended. “Ugh. How can you eat like that? It’s barbaric.”

Denki laughed, spitting out a small bit of food. “It’s delicious, man! And I am starving.”

“Starving or feral?” Monoma muttered with disgust.

Katsuki tried his best to hide his smirk behind a sip of water. Even after everything, some things never changed.

The conversation continued with the usual rowdiness. They were all sitting at a long table in a private lounge room, courtesy of Nana. Beside them, a low fireplace cracked with amber light. It was far too nice for such an unruly group of individuals.

The food, though, was damn delicious. Each of them had been given bowls of curry, rice, and miso soup. On the side, they were even served grilled fish. A full hearty meal that made the air rich with savory flavors. Despite how he despised the way Denki inhaled his damn food, he couldn’t disagree with him. This meal was like a warm hug. By the time Katsuki finished his second bowl, Sero was halfway through his fourth.

Suddenly, Nana cleared her throat. Everyone’s eyes turned to her.

She’d been quiet most of the meal, simply watching everyone eat with a satisfied expression. Then she set her chopsticks down and faced Izuku.

“I think we should talk about the kids, Izuku,” she said. “I have some important updates to give you.”

Izuku perked up, blinking in surprise. “Are they all safe?”

She smiled instead of answering. From the folder at her side, she pulled out a thin stack of photos. Their glossy surface caught the light of the fireplace as she passed them to Izuku. He grabbed them hesitantly, clearly unsure of what this could mean. But when he flipped through them, Katsuki felt himself relax.

It was pictures of the families with their kids.

“I was able to reunite them,” Nana said. “The parents give you their thanks for risking your life to bring them back home.”

Izuku’s face lit up. Katsuki leaned closer, watching as Izuku thumbed through the photos one by one.

Each shot showed smiling children. He’d never seen the little brats before, but he could tell they were excited to be with these new people. Each photo showed the tiny humans with adults who looked nearly identical to them. They posed together in backyards with sunlight.

“Thank you.” Izuku laughed under his breath, a sound soft as a sigh of relief. “Thank you so much, Nana. Th-This is all I ever wanted. I don’t even have the right words. Truly, thank you so, so much.”

He flipped through the photos excitedly, memorizing every one. But when Izuku reached a full circle, his smile fell.

He frowned.

He shuffled once more through the stack, searching for something. Right when Katsuki was about to ask what was wrong—it hit him. None of these photos showed Katsuma. The small wide eyed brown-haired boy was nowhere to be seen.

His stomach sank.

“Wait—” Izuku said. He whipped his head up, eyes wide. “Wh-Where’s Katsuma and his family?”

Katsuki’s stomach twisted. The air in the room changed, like someone had cut off the oxygen.

Nana’s smile faltered, and she drew in a slow breath before answering.

“There was…one complication,” she whispered.

Izuku’s voice came out smaller. “What kind of complication?”

“Katsuma’s family was assassinated. All of them. His parents and older sister.”

Katsuki’s fork slipped against his plate, metal scraping too loud in the silence.

Izuku stared. All the color drained from his face. “…They were murdered?”

“Unfortunately, yes,” Nana said sadly.

“When did this happen?” Katsuki pressed.

“It happened when Katsuma was about a year old,” Nana continued. Her eyes fell, and her mouth pulled taut. “They’d been looking for their son very intensely. They put out articles, searched every inch of the hospital security footage, and they came very close to finding him. But—they got too close.”

She then pulled two pieces of paper out of her folder and slid them to Izuku.

One was a blog post entitled ‘Children missing from hospitals and Governor of Tokyo’s ties to human trafficking.’ And the second was a newspaper clipping showing obituaries.

“They uncovered something grotesque about the Governor of Tokyo,” Nana said, tapping the document in front of them. “They found some compelling evidence linking him to an underground trafficking ring and went to the police with it. But no one listened. So they put everything they knew online, hoping someone would pick it up.”

She exhaled slowly. “However, the post barely reached anyone. And not long after, their car was T-boned off a mountain road…and then burned with them inside.”

Izuku's face dimmed.

He picked up the tattered newspaper clipping with his fingers. Dejected, teary green eyes looked at the obituary of Katsuma's family. Alongside the text were pictures of two adults and one little girl, smiling.

"Did they catch who did it?" Izuku whispered painfully.

"They did. And I looked into the man responsible," Nana continued. "He was a small-time criminal. He swore someone hired him to take care of the 'problem', but no one believed him. He kept saying the person who paid him called himself 'The Horned Viper'."

Everything froze.

Izuku's eyes widened.

Katsuki's blood went cold.

And a terrible, haunted feeling possessed them.

Nana went on, "The police couldn't find any record of such a person to absolve him. The criminal is rotting away in prison for life."

Silence pooled, thick as tar.

Izuku put down the article and rested his head in his hands. His shoulders dropped, and Katsuki wanted to burn the whole goddamn world. But deep down, he wasn't surprised. Tomura was a cold-hearted motherfucker to the bitter end. Of course, he had no damn issue committing familicide.

"Where…where is Katsuma now?" Izuku asked quietly.

Nana pushed back her chair and stood up.

"That's the part I was saving," she said, her tone lightening.

The whole table went quiet in confusion. Izuku and Katsuki shared a confused glance as she crossed the room. She rested her hand on the handle and then turned back towards them.

"Katsuma didn't want to leave," she explained. "He cried and begged to wait for his big brother. He told me he wanted to wait with me to see if you'd make it back."

Izuku froze.

His eyes widened and his mouth parted as though the words had stolen his breath clean out of him.

And then Nana opened the door.

A small pair of feet shuffled forward from the light spilling in. A boy stepped out, clutching a stuffed rabbit with one arm, the other nervously gripping the doorway. He was smaller than Katsuki remembered from their accidental run-in. And the moment those wide, tear-bright eyes lifted and landed on Izuku, the entire room transformed.

Izuku's chair screeched back as he shot to his feet.

"Katsuma?" His voice cracked, disbelieving.

The boy took off running, tiny sneakers smacking against the floor. The stuffed rabbit nearly flew from his grip as he sped into the room. Izuku met him halfway, dropping to his knees so fast his legs barely caught him. And the sound that came out of him when he pulled Katsuma into his arms was a sigh so loud it captured years of guilt, relief, and hope all collapsing into a single breath.

The boy was sobbing into Izuku's neck, and Izuku sobbed right back into his.

"You came back," Katsuma cried over and over. His little voice shook. "I-I knew you would. You said you wouldn't, but I knew you would."

Izuku laughed through his own tears. One of his hands stroked Katsuma's hair and the other held him as tightly as possible.

"You were right," he whispered hoarsely. "I'm so sorry."

Katsuki swallowed hard, his throat thick. He couldn't remember the last time something had made his chest ache like this. Watching Izuku win after losing so much, felt right.

He glanced around and everyone else at the table was watching on with sentimental, bleary expressions. Behind them, Nana smiled quietly. She had one hand resting over her heart as she looked on as well.

Katsuki couldn't take his eyes off them.

Izuku was still kneeling on the floor, arms wrapped tight around the small boy. Katsuma clung back equally as fierce, his tiny fists balled in the fabric of Izuku's jacket, face buried against his chest.

The two of them fit together so naturally.

It made sense now why Izuku had fought so hard to protect those kids.

Katsuki had always thought it was guilt, and some misplaced sense of duty. But he was wrong. This was love. Pure, unconditional love. It was the kind of love Katsuki used to think people like them weren't capable of.

Izuku lifted his head finally, eyes glassy but shining. He turned towards Nana.

"You've been taking care of him all this time?" His voice trembled in awe.

“It’s been a pleasure. He’s a very polite young boy,” Nana replied, glancing at Katsuma, who was still nestled safely in Izuku’s arms. “I was going to try to find a new home for him, but he insisted he wanted to wait and see if you’d come back. And while we were waiting, I thought it might be best if he went with you two.”

Izuku blinked rapidly. “Go with us? Out of Japan?”

She nodded. “You said your goal was to make sure these children found a place to be loved and safe. I think the best place for Katsuma now is with you. He loves you a lot.”

Izuku’s mouth opened, but no sound came out. Katsuki could see the way his throat bobbed and how his grip on the boy tightened slightly. He looked down at Katsuma again, eyes shimmering.

“What do you think, buddy?” he asked softly. “Would you want to come with me on a new adventure?”

Katsuma leaned back to meet his gaze. “I do! I want to stay with you.”

Izuku’s smile broke out wider. Right as he seemed close to breaking down again, Katsuma’s small hand came up. He brushed at one of the tears slipping down Izuku’s cheek.

“Don’t cry,” Katsuma whispered. “You don’t have to cry anymore. Nana told me we’re going somewhere happy. She said we don’t have to train anymore, and you don’t have to go away for long times again.”

That cracked Izuku completely.

He let out a broken laugh and nodded, trying to steady his breath.

“You’re right,” Izuku said, voice thick but he was smiling now. “I won’t cry. Not anymore.” He pressed Katsuma close again. His words muffled against the boy’s hair. “I’d love to have you come with me.”

Izuku turned to Katsuki then, eyes shining. “Is that alright with you, Kacchan?”

All eyes turned to Katsuki, Katsuma included.

Katsuki rubbed the back of his neck. “Yeah, of course that’s—”

Suddenly, Katsuma shrieked.

The sound tore through the quiet like a siren, and everyone jolted. The tiny boy stumbled behind Izuku, pointing at Katsuki with a trembling finger.

“M-Monster!” Katsuma screamed, clutching Izuku’s shirt. “That’s the monster I saw! With the red eyes!”

Instantly, the room froze. Every head swiveled towards Katsuki in extreme confusion. He groaned and dragged both hands down his face.

Oh, for fuck's sake. He'd forgotten about that.

Izuku blinked between the two of them, baffled. "Katsuma, what are you talking about? He's not a—"

Then Izuku stopped mid-sentence. Katsuki saw the exact second realization dawned on his fiancé. Izuku paused, his jaw twitched, and his head turned excruciatingly slow.

"Fuck me," Katsuki muttered under his breath.

"Kacchan," Izuku said carefully, a flush creeping up his neck. "Was that you he saw outside our window that night?"

A chorus of bewildered cries broke out.

"Outside the window?" Sero hissed.

Aizawa groaned and threw his head back. "Please don't tell me this is going where I think it is."

Katsuki winced. He scratched the back of his head. "Yeah. Forgot to mention. But, uh, that was me."

"What the hell were you doing peeking into his window?" Miruko snapped. "Oh my god, Bakugou! That's so creepy!"

"I wasn't peeking!" Katsuki yelled, cheeks burning. "I was making sure he was safe! It sounds bad out of context—but I only wanted to talk to him, alright? I didn't have his damn number, so I improvised! I didn't even know the kid was there until it was too late. He's freakishly small!"

"The kid is an ordinary sized child," Shinsou deadpanned.

Denki doubled over, wheezing. "Oh, this is gold! Bakugou is a peeping tom!"

"I'm not a peeping tom!" Katsuki barked, glaring at all of them. "It was a misunderstanding. Besides, I even smiled at the little guy—and he still screamed!"

The laughter that followed was merciless. Even Aizawa pinched the bridge of his nose like he was fighting a chuckle.

Izuku looked like he was trying to be serious—but he was failing miserably. His shoulders shook, and his lips pressed together. Then a small snort escaped him, and that was it. He burst into uncontrollable laughter.

"Oh my god," Izuku gasped between giggles, covering his mouth. "Kacchan, you terrified a child with a smile?"

Katsuki grumbled something incoherent as his ears turned visibly red. "It wasn't like that."

“It was exactly like that,” Izuku said, still laughing, wiping at his eyes.

He looked down at Katsuma, who was hiding behind him. He was still suspicious but curious now as everyone continued to poke fun at Katsuki.

Izuku pointed to Katsuki. “He’s not a monster. He’s just really bad at talking to people.”

“Hey,” Katsuki warned, but Izuku only motioned him closer.

Katsuki sighed and rose from his seat. He walked over to where Izuku and Katsuma were and squatted down to their level. He met Izuku eye to eye as Katsuma hid further away behind his brother.

“Come on,” Izuku called, rubbing Katsuma’s shoulders. “Kacchan is harmless. I promise.”

Izuku reached out, and before Katsuki could object, he poked his cheek. The sound that escaped Katsuki was an annoyed “oi,” which only made Izuku laugh harder.

“See?” Izuku said, grinning. He ruffled Katsuki’s hair for good measure. “He’s totally human. Just grumpy.”

Katsuma peeked out again. His curious eyes flicked between Izuku’s easy warmth and Katsuki’s forced composure. After a long, hesitant beat, he reached forward. He very quickly poked Katsuki’s cheek too. Then, when Katsuki didn’t growl or explode, Katsuma cracked into a small, uncertain giggle.

Katsuki did his best to smile. “Sorry for frightening you. I promise you can give me one good scare too as payback. I deserve it.”

That made Katsuma smile and say, “Okay!”

He shuffled a little closer to Izuku’s side, still holding onto his shirt, but this time it was more for comfort than protection.

Izuku beamed at both of them.

“There,” he said delicately. “Now you’re officially introduced.”

“Who are the others?” Katsuma asked quietly.

Izuku’s grin stretched. “They’re awesome heroes called M-Unit! Want to meet them? They’re all Kacchan’s friends, and they helped save my life.”

Katsuma nodded, shy but curious. Izuku scooped him up with an easy laugh, rising to his feet. He carried the boy from one person to the next, making warm introductions all around.

Miruko was ecstatic. She practically bounced as she ruffled Katsuma’s hair. After her, Denki looked like he met his new favorite human. Even Aizawa’s expression relaxed fully. His mouth tugged upwards before he could stop it.

While the room filled with light chitchat, Katsuki slipped back into his seat between Izuku's empty chair and Monoma. He exhaled. The lingering burn on his cheeks faded as the noise and warmth of the group filled the room.

He caught sight of Izuku kneeling beside Shinsou. Both of them were praising Katsuma for being so well mannered. The kid's grin was wide and bright. And even Shinsou, who acted like smiling was a crime, looked genuinely charmed.

Katsuki glanced away for a moment.

There was something about seeing Izuku like this that made his chest too full.

Izuku had always been kind-hearted. His fiancé was stubbornly selfless and affable to a fault. But watching him cradle a child who saw him as the center of the world, painted him in a new light. Izuku was someone who could love so deeply that it reshaped the world around him.

Katsuki let out a slow breath and leaned back in his chair. He reached for his cup of water and took a sip, trying not to get too emotional.

Monoma, watching the whole thing, sighed beside him. "Wow, man."

Katsuki shot him a look. "What?"

Monoma smirked. "Congrats on becoming a father."

Katsuki choked on his water.

He sat in silence, eyes fixed across the lounge on Izuku and Katsuma.

The two were in the middle of the room, surrounded by the others. Katsuma was proudly showing off his new toy collection. It was a bunch of gifts Nana had bought him in the last few months. And Izuku, ever the perfect big brother, fawned over every single stuffed animal like they were treasures.

The rest of M-Unit played along, offering exaggerated praise that made Katsuma's eyes shine. The sparkle in his eye was that rare, delicate kind of wonder only kids could still have.

Katsuki exhaled, sinking deeper into the couch beside Monoma. It hit him like a goddamn baseball bat to the side of the head. He and Izuku were going to be responsible for a small child. A tiny, breakable, impressionable small child.

Holy. Shit.

"You alright?" Monoma asked from beside him.

Katsuki blinked, slow. "Yeah. I'm fine."

Monoma tilted his head, unconvinced. “If something’s on your mind, now’s the time to say it.”

Katsuki opened his mouth to tell him to mind his own damn business. But then he stopped. Across the room, Katsuma laughed. It was a cute, bubbly sound that didn’t belong in the kind of world Katsuki knew.

He felt like an intruder simply watching Izuku and Katsuma play together.

“I don’t want to accidentally fuck the kid up,” Katsuki confessed quietly. “Izuku went through all this trouble to get the kids out of danger and now…” He sighed and rubbed the back of his neck. “I dunno. I never thought about raising a kid. My childhood doesn’t exactly scream ‘will make a good role model’. I don’t have a damn clue what to do with a child.”

Monoma gave a thoughtful hum.

“You’ll be fine,” he said, patting Katsuki on the shoulder. “Stop being so melodramatic. Izuku clearly knows what he’s doing. And honestly? You’re not as bad as you think.”

Katsuki snorted. “Not that bad? That’s rich coming from you.”

“I know,” Monoma chuckled. “But you’ve proven me wrong more than once, and I’m not too proud to admit it. You’re not as bad as I thought you were.”

“Only slightly bad, then?” Katsuki muttered.

Monoma smirked. “No. Not bad at all. The truth is, I thought we were too similar when we first met. I know how fucked up I am, so maybe I projected that onto you. It’s hard to trust someone who reminds you of yourself when you don’t even trust yourself.”

Katsuki tore his gaze away from Izuku and turned to look at Monoma.

His long-time colleague wasn’t smirking anymore.

“I can admit I was a bit harsh,” Monoma continued. “But what I’m saying is—you’ll be fine. You already know exactly what not to do with a kid. That alone puts you ahead of most people.”

Katsuki let out a breath that was half a laugh.

“Thanks,” he muttered. “Didn’t know you had a heart in there.”

“I let it out sometimes,” Monoma said dryly, shrugging. Then, with a crooked grin, he said, “But I expect at least one Christmas card with the three of you posing like some corny, happy family in matching onesies.”

Katsuki groaned and rolled his eyes. “Fine. Whatever.”

But he didn’t stop the small, reluctant smile that crept up on him.

Suddenly, the creak of a door drew everyone's attention.

They all turned and saw Nana step out from the back room. A small bag was slung over her shoulder, and a child-sized coat was folded neatly in her arms. The bag looked modest, but it was packed full of Katsuma's clothes.

Katsuki watched as she crossed the room. She crouched in front of the small boy, setting the coat aside just long enough to pull him into a firm hug. Katsuma wrapped his arms around her neck, whispering something only she could hear.

Behind them, Izuku started gathering the boy's new toys. He carefully packed them into one of the duffel bags. He moved gently, making sure not a single stuffed animal was left behind. Around them, the others had gone quiet, watching with an unspoken understanding.

"The boat's ready," Nana said finally. "We need to head out soon if we're going to stay on schedule. I got all your arrangements set to go."

Katsuki took a slow breath. "Time to get a move on, I guess."

Beside him, Monoma stood too. He brushed off his hands and stretched as if he were shaking off the weight in the air. Katsuki followed his lead, his gaze locked on Izuku and the boy in his arms.

"You're going to do great," Monoma whispered. "I believe in you."

Izuku turned towards him then, with Katsuma perched comfortably on his hip. His green eyes met Katsuki's, and a faint, tired smile stretched across his beautiful face. He walked up to him and reached out, taking Katsuki's hand in his free one.

"Are you ready, Kacchan?" Izuku asked patiently.

Katsuki squeezed his hand once. "I am."

The night air hung heavy with dew. It clung to Katsuki's coat and curled low across the ground as they trekked down the gravel path.

Their group moved in near silence.

No chatting. No laughing. Only the steady rhythm of their footsteps and the distant whisper of the tide calling to them. Street lamps glowed faintly along the path, halos of white light that flickered in the damp air. Every breath came out as a pale wisp, vanishing as soon as it met the dark.

Beside him, Izuku strolled peacefully. Their hands were intertwined, and Katsuma was still perched on his hip, bundled up. The kid's head rested against Izuku's shoulder, half-asleep.

A few paces ahead, Nana led the way with some of her crew.

Trailing behind them were the stragglers. There were exactly six people who hadn't made the first escape with Nana's prodigy, Yagi. They had barely missed the deadline and were forced to wait for the next dispatch.

Right when Katsuki assumed no one was going to speak on their walk, out of the quiet, one straggler spoke. She was a woman with streaks of gray in her hair and a blue scarf wound tightly around her neck. She turned and looked toward Izuku and Katsuki.

"You don't know me, but I feel the need to thank you both," she said sincerely. "If you hadn't been late, I wouldn't have made it out of the situation I was in. It was really a miracle in disguise."

Izuku gave her a kind smile. "Glad it worked out for all of us."

The woman nodded faintly before falling back in line.

They kept going and the silence returned. But it felt different now. It was nice to know other people benefited from their chaos. All the pain they had endured didn't only take lives, it had inadvertently saved some too.

As they crested the final hill, the dock came into view.

It was bathed in the pale shimmer of moonlight. The dark water reflected everything like glass and there, moored to the end of the wooden planks, was their ship.

It was massive. Three decks at least. Its steel frame caught faint glints of silver from the night sky. Painted along the side in sweeping white letters were two words: Lone Flora.

When they finally got to the end of the dock, everyone gathered on board. The stragglers went first. They all neatly piled on with their bags and hollowed out eyes. Behind them, the whole of their unit paused. They waited there, staring at the large ship meant to take them away.

Katsuki inhaled deeply.

This was it.

Hope flickered in his eyes.

Izuku stood close to Katsuki. Their fingers were laced so tightly it was impossible to tell whose hand was trembling. But if Katsuki had to guess, it was his own. His usual stoicism cracked enough to show the heaviness he was feeling.

Fuck. He was not good at goodbyes.

And from the looks of it, he wasn't alone. He speculated that's what happened when everyone was violently inclined and emotionally constipated. Shinsou rubbed his neck. Sero worked his jaw. Miruko found it hard to meet anyone's eyes. And Monoma awkwardly kicked at the dock once and pressed his lips together.

Denki was the first to break the silence.

“So,” he said. He forced a grin that didn’t quite stick. “You two finally get to live the post-hitman career dream, huh? You’ll probably go somewhere where it’s all sunshine, waves, and coconut drinks with those dumb umbrellas.”

Izuku laughed. “You could always visit.”

“Yeah,” Denki replied, eyes flicking away. “We will. Once things cool down.”

Monoma crossed his arms. His tone was prickly but still more amiable than anyone had ever heard it. “Try not to get yourselves killed again. It’s exhausting having to emotionally recover every time one of you nearly dies.”

Katsuki grinned. “Is that a confession of you caring?”

Monoma’s glare flickered into a reluctant smirk. “Closest you’ll get.”

Miruko stepped forward next. “You better take care of each other,” she said, jabbing a finger at both of them. “And Bakugou, don’t go getting dull just because you’re retired. Keep your instincts sharp in case someone crazy comes knocking.”

“Of course.” Katsuki gave her a lopsided smile. “Wouldn’t dream of becoming lazy.”

She grinned back. “Good.”

And then, to Katsuki’s surprise, she tugged them both into a tight hug. Izuku’s eyes went wide at the same time as Katsuki’s as she squeezed them.

“You’re both tougher than you think,” she murmured. “Don’t forget it.”

When she stepped back, Aizawa moved in. He looked at them both for a moment, eyes incomprehensible, before resting a hand on each of their shoulders.

“You’ve…uh…You’ve both done enough fighting,” he said rigidly. “Whatever comes next, let it be peace. You both deserve at least that much. And please, no more seeking revenge.” He shot Izuku a scolding stare. “From either of you.”

They both nervously laughed.

“We won’t, old man,” Katsuki reassured.

Then came Shinsou. He hesitated at first, hands shoved deep in his pockets. His gaze flicked between Izuku, Katsuki and the boat with Nana. He’d been quiet the whole time, doing what Shinsou did best, listening and assessing. But when the stillness fell on the dock, he stepped forward to them both.

“Guess this is it, huh?” He said gently.

Katsuki nodded. “Guess so.”

For a second, it seemed like that would be all. But then Shinsou's jaw tightened. And before either of them could react he put his hand out towards Izuku in a friendly offering. Izuku hesitantly reached out, but then shook his hand. Shinsou firmly squeezed it and cupped it lightly with his other hand.

"It's nice to know this idiot is in good hands," Shinsou said. "Live your second chance at life well, Izuku."

Izuku's wobbly smile filled with happiness. "Thank you."

"And if anyone tries to come for you again," Shinsou added, looking him in the eye, "Call us. We'll be there to come to the rescue again. Bakugou is kinda hopeless without us."

Everyone laughed, and Katsuki scoffed through a chuckle.

When they finally let go, everyone was staring at the water. The hum of the ship filled the silence. Gulls circled overhead, their calls distant.

Katsuki looked at the others, eyes full of fondness.

"You all…" Katsuki began, then stopped. He gave a signature lopsided smirk. "You weirdos made this shitty world survivable. That's all I've got to say."

Aizawa nodded once, eyes glinting. Miruko saluted him with two fingers. Denki and Sero threw up matching peace signs. Monoma rolled his eyes but mirrored them anyway. And Shinsou, standing a step behind, gave a departing nod.

"Let's get you guys loaded up on the boat," Miruko said through her sniffling.

She quickly wiped her face and grabbed one of Katsuki's bags. He tried to stop her, but she was off. Behind her, the others all followed. They all grabbed either a backpack, a duffel, or a suitcase. Izuku took off behind them too, insisting on helping with the heavier items.

In the wake of the commotion, Aizawa and Katsuki stayed on the dock.

The wind blew between them.

Wordlessly, he turned his attention back to the elder man. They both assessed one another in the moonlight as the dark clouds overhead passed by one at a time.

Katsuki stared at Aizawa, and Aizawa stared at him.

The finality hit him, and all he could feel was the push of tears.

"So this is really it," Aizawa said. He nodded slowly, eyes flicking off to the side with a strained smile. He put his hands in his pockets and tried to play it cool. "You've come a long way. I'm glad you somehow made it in one piece."

Katsuki dryly laughed. "Debatable."

“Yeah. I guess…this is where we say goodbye.”

“Feels like we’ve done that a few times already. Maybe we should switch it up. You could yell at me, for old times’ sake?”

“Don’t tempt me,” Aizawa scolded. He tried to find the humor, but the sadness in his eyes was too strong. His usually tired stare was distant, as if Katsuki was already gone. “But this time, the goodbye is for real.”

“But hopefully not for long.”

“Hopefully.”

The discomfort came again, and Katsuki looked over his shoulder. He saw all their bags being loaded up. As he watched, the first crack in his defenses came. His brows furrowed, and his traitorous damn heart became ten times heavier.

He looked at Aizawa again. For real this time. He studied his slouching posture and saw all the burdens he shouldered sitting there. He saw a man who was consistently present, even without being asked, and tried his best to help even when life was bleak.

“Thanks for always putting up with my shit,” Katsuki said awkwardly low.

Aizawa gave a small nod. It was enough to close a chapter—but not enough for Katsuki. Something in his chest rebelled. His pulse spiked, his throat tightened, and before he could stop himself, he shook his head.

“No,” he blurted. “That’s not—” He exhaled sharply, grounding himself, forcing the words to come out right this time. “That’s not all I wanna thank you for.”

Aizawa arched his brow. “Bakugou, you don’t have to get sappy.”

“I do,” Katsuki shot back. He took a step closer. “I actually, really do.”

And then, with a kind of raw, unfiltered sincerity that burned straight through his pride, he said it.

“Thank you for looking out for me these last ten years, Aizawa.”

Aizawa’s eyes widened.

He was surprised, but then the first crack in his fortress came. His eyes welled up. Of course, the damn man tried to be tough and write it off. But Katsuki knew, sadness was one of those things you couldn’t hide from. It’d track you down and make you give it recognition. Aizawa’s face crumbled, and he sniffled as he tried to wipe his eyes.

He looked touched. So Katsuki kept going.

“You weren’t perfect,” Katsuki spoke quietly. “But neither was I. And even though I was a pain in the ass, you were always looking out for me. You’re the one who made me stay in school when I wanted to drop out. You helped me get a proper diet. You took me clothes shopping when you saw the holes in my shoes. You saw every blind spot I couldn't. And every day, you warned me about shit I should've taken more seriously."

Aizawa scoffed a quiet laugh, and Katsuki did too.

His eyes burned, and the words began to stumble out.

"You wanted me to be more than a tragic story," he continued. "And you're one of the reasons I actually think I can be."

Katsuki wiped at his eyes with the heel of his hand, but it didn't help much. Aizawa was looking at him with pure pride. And it made Katsuki feel fourteen again, desperate to prove his life was worth something.

"I hated myself for a long time," Katsuki went on. "Longer than I wanna admit. I hated where I came from. I hated who I was born to. I hated my whole damn life. But you helped me make something out of the mess. You helped me play the shitty hand I was dealt. So…thank you."

He grinned through his tears.

"Thank you for being the closest thing to a dad I'll ever have, old man."

Aizawa's eyes glistened. He shook his head, a laugh caught somewhere between disbelief and love, and wiped at his face. Then, without another word, he stepped forward. He laid a firm hand on Katsuki's shoulder.

For a moment, he stood there.

Then, he pulled Katsuki into an embrace.

Aizawa held him tight, and the tension that had hung between them for years finally melted away. And in their own way, they didn't need any more words. The silence was full of everything they'd never said but always meant.

When they finally pulled apart, Aizawa's expression melted into paternal pride.

"You've always been like a son to me, Katsuki," he said, voice breaking. "And no matter where you end up—or what kind of trouble you drag yourself into—you can always call me. I'll come running…and probably yell at you a bit while I'm at it."

They both laughed.

"I'll miss you, old man."

"And I'll miss you too, kid."

Right as they stepped apart, the others finally returned. All the bags were gone, stowed away somewhere.

“Okay, I think it’s about time for us all to go officially,” Sero said. He stood next to his uncle, and gave Katsuki a wistful look. “Nana says she’s got a schedule, but she doesn’t want to push the farewells.”

Katsuki looked up at the dock of the boat and saw Izuku there holding Katsuma. The tiny, sleepy boy waved at them, and Nana waved too. Izuku smiled at him, nodding at him to take his time.

Katsuki took a deep breath in and glanced at his teammates.

His throat felt tight, but he hid it with a crooked smirk. Then, with a flick of his chin and an overdramatic spread of his arms, he barked out, “If you extras want to be rid of me, I demand a damn group hug. No exceptions.”

That was all it took.

Denki let out a loud whoop and launched himself. He slammed into Katsuki’s side like a golden retriever.

Sero was right behind him, laughing as he threw his long arms around them both. Miruko snorted but didn’t hesitate to shove her way in, nearly toppling all of them backward.

Monoma muttered something about “unprofessional displays of affection,” but his voice cracked halfway through as he joined anyway.

Aizawa followed, dragging his feet and sighing under his breath as if he were above it. But he wrapped an arm around Katsuki’s shoulder in a rare show of warmth. Shinsou stayed on the edge, pretending to adjust his bag until Monoma shot him a small glare. Then finally, with a muttered curse, he stepped forward. He completed the circle as everyone pressed in tighter.

Katsuki felt their heartbeats pass through him. He cherished the steady pulse of people who had made him feel at home.

Then Denki’s voice broke subtle sobs. “I’m so happy we were all migraines together.”

That undid the last of their composure. Sero’s grip tightened around their bundle. Shinsou sniffled and swore it was sea spray. Even Monoma blinked fast, muttering something about sand in his eyes.

Then the hug unraveled slowly. It was as if no one really wanted to be the first to let go.

One by one, they stepped back, leaving Katsuki standing in the middle of the dock. He looked over their unit one last time. No, not a unit. His mismatched, chaotic family.

The boat’s honk blew loudly.

“Guess that’s my cue,” Katsuki sniffled, trying to play it off.

He stepped onto the ramp, boots clanging against the metal. His shoulder stiffened as the crew began to pull up the mooring lines. He looked over his shoulder. Below, his family stood waving. Aizawa was smiling. Denki was shouting last-minute jokes. And the others were too choked up to speak.

Katsuki raised a hand in farewell.

When he got to the deck of the boat with Izuku, the crew finished prepping to set sail. The boat groaned as it drifted away from the dock, the water parting beneath it. He stood side by side with Izuku, and together, they both waved. They held eye contact with the others as their boat steadily pulled away.

Second by second, the figures onshore grew smaller. And in return, Katsuki's eyes blurred up.

He cried openly the second their voices faded into the wind.

Sob after heartbreaking sob spilled from his lips. He tried to stop it. But he was powerless. It was as if a piece of his heart stayed on that dock, and the hole that it left behind allowed all his pent-up emotions to escape.

Izuku leaned in close. "We'll see them again," he said tenderly and certainly.

"Yeah," Katsuki replied. He sobbed lightly. "I know we will."

☽ ☽ ☾ ☾

Saying goodbye was something Izuku never quite mastered.

But with every loss and every parting, he learned a little more. He had said goodbye to Katsuma once. And then to Katsuki, believing he'd never see him again. He said goodbye to Tomura, his brother who had made him feel a storm of emotions too volatile to name.

And now, he was saying goodbye to the most important people in Katsuki's life—his family.

He watched the way Katsuki carried the farewell in his body. He squared his shoulders as if to make space for the ache and took in a long breath. His chest rose and fell in shuddering waves that mimicked the sea and his tears caught the wind.

But Izuku saw something strangely beautiful on Katsuki's face then. It was the way grief and hope coexisted in his eyes, terrified yet bright all at once.

When the dock finally disappeared from view, Katsuki turned toward the dark horizon. The sea wind rustled his hair, and an expression of freedom Izuku had never seen before took over.

"I feel so light," Katsuki rasped, blinking away the last of his tears. "I feel light in a good way. Is that normal?"

"I don't know," Izuku said honestly. "But I feel it too. Maybe this is what it's like to start over."

And together, hand in hand, they watched the horizon stretch before them, endless and new.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The ship was larger than Izuku expected.

It was lined with countless rooms, cabins, and private lounges that weren't exactly shabby. In front of them, Nana led the way. She guided them through all the halls that were lined with pale lights.

"This is the mess hall," she said, gesturing towards a wide open room filled with tables and benches. "We run it for twenty-four hours. There's food, water, and any medical supplies you may need you can find here."

Izuku peered in quietly. Inside, several tired individuals huddled around a table. They were murmuring low to themselves. Some were bandaged, some were asleep with their heads buried in their folded arms, and a few glanced up at them. They quietly surveyed Izuku, the child on his hip, and Katsuki, who stood behind them with his arms crossed.

Nana's tour continued. She took them all around. First, to a small infirmary. Then she brought them to a storage room lined with crates and life vests. Then to another room cramped full of maps and monitors that buzzed faintly with static.

It was as if every corner of the ship breathed of purpose. And every breath came together to help those who wanted to keep living even when the world turned against them.

When they finally stopped, it was in a quieter room at the end of a corridor. They stood in the center of a small common area lit by the amber glow of a single lamp.

Nana turned to face them. "We'll be at sea for about a month," she informed. "By morning, we'll be out of Japanese territory entirely. And after that, it's pretty much smooth sailing. It'll take two, maybe three weeks for us to reach the first safe harbor." She folded her hands neatly, eyes flicking between Katsuki and Izuku. "Would you two like to be onboarded now or later?"

Katsuki tilted his head. "What does onboarding entail?"

"Logistics," she explained. "We need to get any bank accounts in your name drained and closed. We'll also need to get your new identities registered and your passports fully forged. We have everything we need to do those things back in the main office area."

Izuku pressed his lips together.

He wanted to get everything out of the way, but the sleep on his eyelids was demanding his attention. And when he glanced at Katsuki, he saw the same fatigue written in the slope of his shoulders and the faint droop in his posture.

"We'll come back to it," Izuku murmured. "It's been a long day."

Nana nodded, unsurprised. “Of course. There’s no rush. You’ve both earned a moment to relax.”

Katsuki shifted his weight. “Where’d you find a place for us?”

“Somewhere no one will come looking,” Nana said. Then her expression warmed, eyes crinkling at the corners. “Would you like to know now or later? Some people prefer to keep it a surprise. I find it gives them something to look forward to.”

Izuku looked at Katsuki happily.

“Let’s keep it a surprise,” he said. “That sounds nice.”

Katsuki’s mouth curved in agreement. “Yeah. I like that.”

“Then a surprise it is,” Nana replied with a light laugh. “I always love this part of the journey. Now, why don’t you both get some rest? We’ve got a long ride ahead, so make yourselves as comfortable as you can. I’ll show you to your cabin.”

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku sighed as he sank down onto the mattress.

The day’s exhaustion settled into his bones heavier than gravity. But seeing Katsuma’s peaceful face made him feel a little lighter. The boy barely stirred as Izuku eased him down beside him, his tiny body slack with sleep.

“Thank god you’re a heavy sleeper,” Izuku whispered.

Gently, he pried Katsuma’s fingers free and tucked him under the blanket. He smoothed it over his chest until he looked perfectly cocooned.

When he finally straightened, Izuku let his eyes wander over their cabin.

It was small but warm in its own way. There were two standard sized beds, a nightstand with a lamp, a single bathroom, and a small balcony opening. The metal floor was covered with a plain rug. It held intricate patterns that made the cold room a little less unwelcoming. Their duffel bags were stowed overhead beside neatly folded sheets.

Through the thin curtains in front of the balcony windows, Izuku caught sight of Katsuki. He was standing outside on the balcony. His fiancé was still as stone, elbows propped on the railing. His eyes were fixed on the dark horizon and the moonlight drew sharp edges along his profile.

Izuku stood, feeling the low hum of the ship’s engines through the soles of his shoes. He slipped out onto the balcony and joined him, leaning his arms against the railing until their shoulders brushed.

Together, they looked out at the horizon.

The night was entirely quiet, save for the gentle sound of waves.

“You don’t have to be nervous about Katsuma,” Izuku said. “I can do most of the heavy lifting with him. He’s always been my responsibility anyways.”

“There you go again,” Katsuki half lectured. “Stop trying to take on everything by yourself. Sorry, but that ring on your finger means we split responsibilities. Katsuma is half mine now too.”

“Really?” Izuku whispered. “You don’t mind at all?”

“Of course not.” Katsuki smiled tiredly. “How could I with the way you two look at each other? Your face lit up brighter than the damn sun when you saw him. I wanna see that everyday.”

“I’m glad you don’t mind, Kacchan. I think you two will really like each other.”

Katsuki exhaled, breath fogging faintly in the cold.

“You know,” he said in a whisper, “I never considered potentially helping raise a kid. If I do something that could be a bad influence, let me know. Maybe I should buy a couple of those parenting books and sign up for some classes.”

“You really thought this through,” Izuku said a bit cheekily.

Katsuki laughed. “I just want to avoid passing down any of my fucked up traits. And y’know, I’ve always been pretty fucking against shrinks and all that shit.” He paused, glancing sideways to meet Izuku’s gaze under the pale light. “But maybe when we get where we’re going, a shrink wouldn’t be bad.”

“The proper term is therapist, Kacchan,” Izuku said gently. “Shrink is kind of outdated.”

Katsuki clicked his tongue and rolled his eyes, though there was no real bite in it.

“Whatever, nerd. My point is, I wanna be better. I want to be the best version of myself from now on. Not just for you, but for me too. And for Katsuma now as well.” He jerked his chin toward the small figure sleeping inside. “We all deserve to live as the best versions of ourselves.”

“Okay, we can do that,” Izuku agreed. “I like that idea a lot.”

Katsuki caught Izuku’s hand and laced their fingers together. He pulled Izuku closer until their foreheads nearly touched. When they were near enough for their heartbeats to find the same rhythm, Katsuki wrapped his arms around him.

“Also,” Katsuki whispered, “if you ever get thoughts like the ones you had when you took the poison—tell me. Please.” His eyes searched Izuku’s. “I’ll be here for you, no matter what. Tell me what you need, when you need it or how you need it. I’ll drop everything for you.”

Izuku's eyes welled up. His throat tightened. "I will. I'm sorry for scaring you like that."

Katsuki brushed a strand of hair from his face.

"You don't have to be sorry," he murmured. "I just want you to live the way you deserve."

Izuku leaned into him. Katsuki curled an arm around his waist and he rested his head against Katsuki's shoulder.

"Same for you," Izuku whispered.

They stayed like that for a while, swaying with the ship's gentle tilt.

The world beyond was dark and endless, but somehow, Izuku could feel a light inside of him returning. It was small, flickering, and fighting to be alive. And it was brought back from the brink of death by the hands of Katsuma and Katsuki. Truly, he had never imagined he could finally have the loving family he always daydreamed of.

But with Katsuma and Katsuki now both at his side, it all felt impossibly in reach.

Maybe this was what fate had meant for him all along.

The days onboard blurred together in a mix of colors.

Blue from the sky melted with the pale orange of the sunset. The yellow sun blended with the silver moon. And pretty scarlet eyes mixed together with big, brown ones as Katsuki and Katsuma became the whole of Izuku's life.

As the days went on, Izuku no longer kept time by hours or minutes. Instead, he did so in the subtle changes in Katsuma's laughter, in Katsuki's smirk, and in the way his own chest began to feel a little less heavy each morning.

At first, he struggled.

Through the weeks on board, his sleep came slow and dreamless. He was still haunted by the shadow of Tomura, and how even in death he managed to still impact their lives. The murder of Katsuma's family made guilt spread inside of him. His meals felt tasteless. And some days he didn't feel like he deserved to be in Katsuma's life.

But then an unexpected shift began.

It was small and started with laughter.

Katsuma had hidden behind one of the storage trunks in their room. He crouched low, tiny shoulders shaking as he tried to stifle giggles. Izuku had been reading at the desk when Katsuki walked in, toweling his hair dry from a shower.

The moment Katsuma leapt out with a fierce “Rawr!” Katsuki stumbled back like he’d been hit.

He slapped his hand over his heart, eyes wide with mock terror.

“Argh!” He gasped, staggering dramatically into the wall. “You got me! I’m dead—”

Katsuma burst into uncontrollable laughter. “I got you, monster!”

He giggled loudly and clapped his hands. Then suddenly, Katsuki dropped the act and smirked mischievously. Katsuma tried to run, but couldn’t flee when Katsuki scooped him up and tossed him over his shoulder.

“Now I got you!” Katsuki playfully yelled.

Izuku watched the whole thing from the desk, smiling uncontrollably. He laughed as Katsuma squealed and kicked. Then laughed some more when Katsuma got free and began running around their room. Katsuki chased after him with exaggerated roars and fake growls.

The weeks filled with moments like that.

Izuku wished he could record them all.

Another moment he loved occurred a couple days later. On the upper deck under the light of dawn, Katsuma rode high on Katsuki’s shoulders. His little hands gripped Katsuki’s hair for balance as he pointed towards the mess hall.

“Onward, Kacchan!” Katsuma shouted. “I’m hungry!”

Katsuki chuckled. “Aye aye, Captain Katsuma.”

He stomped dramatically across the deck while Izuku followed a few steps behind.

Izuku couldn’t help but grin. The sight was so sweet he was positive he gained a couple cavities from it.

As another week came and went, Katsuma’s favorite pastime quickly became playing with them in the hallways. And truthfully, it became Izuku’s too.

The three of them would wander the corridors together hand in hand. Katsuma skipped between them, his small hands in theirs and his feet tapping on the floor. Every few steps, Izuku and Katsuki would lift him high into the air. Katsuma would shriek with laughter, kicking his feet as though he could fly.

“Higher!” He would giggle.

And Izuku and Katsuki would happily comply.

Then sometimes, after putting Katsuma to bed, Izuku found himself leaning against the railing on their balcony. He would observe the boundless horizon fade into dark. The air smelled of salt and freedom. And Izuku felt the ache in his chest ease. It didn't disappear, but the hold it had on him loosened like shackles finally being unchained.

And for once, the world seemed so simple.

ᔓᔓᔓ

Izuku watched as Nana typed leisurely on her laptop.

She hummed occasionally as she inputted various numbers and ran impressive logistics. They sat across from each other in her office. Off to the side were several computers, printers, and scanners that were stacked with manilla envelopes of various forged documents.

Katsuki stretched in the chair beside him. He yawned slightly and the yawn passed to Izuku.

They had been in here for a couple of hours while Katsuma was down for the night. Nana was wide awake with black coffee steaming at her side. She didn't pause for one second, continuously typing, writing, and stamping official documents for them. The sharp scratch of her pen occasionally was punctuated by the creak of the ship.

Nana beamed as she inputted one last thing on her laptop.

"There," she said excitedly. "All the money in your bank accounts have been discreetly drained and transferred to new ones."

"Ah, thank you so much," Izuku replied. He smiled with profound gratefulness. "You have no idea how much we appreciate all this."

"You can thank me later," she joked, leaning back in her large chair. "With this much money, you two will be set for life. Honestly, you don't ever have to work again if you don't want to."

Katsuki waved a dismissive hand. "I'm too much of a workaholic for that."

"I can see that," Nana replied, amused. "But it's something to keep in mind." She leaned forward and looked at her notepad. She tapped her pen a couple of times and then flipped to the next page. "So. Our next stops are as follows: we'll be making a port in South Korea first, then Taiwan, then the Philippines, and finally, Singapore."

Katsuki's brow lifted. "Singapore is our new location?"

"Yup," Nana said, grinning. "Yakuza don't usually cross into Singapore. Luckily for you, it's the territory of the Ghee Hin Kongsi. They've been enemies of the Yakuza for decades. Tons of bad blood and old grudges. The Chisakis wouldn't dare risk it."

A foreign calm settled in Izuku's chest.

They were going to be safe. It felt inconceivable, but hearing it in Nana's voice made it sound possible.

“Do either of you speak English, Mandarin, or Malay?” she asked, glancing between them.

“I suck at languages,” Katsuki admitted. “But I know enough English to get by. Luckily, Izuku’s a polyglot. He can bail me out until I improve.”

“Oh, really?” Nana’s brows rose, impressed. “How many languages do you know?”

“I know most spoken across Asia and Europe,” Izuku admitted, modestly. “I can teach Katsuki easily enough.” He turned to his fiancé with a teasing glint in his eye. “I guess your bad Mandarin is finally getting an upgrade.”

Katsuki smirked. “Oh, I bet your nerdy ass will love teaching me, huh?”

“Perfect match,” Nana said, laughing as she clicked over to the final tab on her laptop. “Now then—last thing on the checklist: your new identities and backstories. I already have worked something out that I think you’ll both adapt to pretty well.”

“What did you have in mind?” Katsuki asked.

“I’ve set you up as a married couple,” she explained. “You two are Japanese expats who’ve been living in China for a while. As a couple, you have decided to move to Singapore for a slower life. Katsuma’s legally your little brother now, Izuku. You adopted him after your parents were killed in a car crash when he was a baby.”

Izuku’s eyes dropped at how close to the truth that was.

Nana continued, “Katsuki, you’ll come from a long line of old wealth. Your family made their fortune generations ago and all tragically died in a fire. You inherited everything young.”

Katsuki raised an eyebrow. “That’s pretty dramatic, don’t you think?”

“People love drama,” Nana said simply. “But the main story is, you two are starting over after losing your families. No one looks twice at people who say that they’ve loved and lost.”

Izuku nodded, accepting the story without question. She was right, that would be easy for both of them to play along with, especially after everything they had lost. Acting like they were two orphans who found love was as close to the truth as they would get.

Katsuki nodded too. “Just to make sure the story is air tight, what kind of company did my family run?”

Nana shrugged. “Up to you. Pick something that you like.”

Katsuki went quiet for a while, fingers drumming against the arm of his chair.

Then he said, “I like the idea that my family made their fortune on classical music. Maybe we were a family of instrument makers and composers. My background could be in composition or something. We could say I met Izuku while selling him a violin, and we bonded over it.”

“I like that,” Izuku said, smiling. “That’s actually really nice, Kacchan.”

Nana chuckled as she typed. “That’s the sweetest backstory I’ve written all year.”

When she finished entering it, she leaned back again and said, “Now how about you, Izuku? What would you like your backstory to be?”

Izuku had to think about it.

He always made comments about past and future lives, but really never truly indulged himself. But as he thought about it, he envisioned what life would have been like if he and Katsuki ran away the first time. And right when he did, he could perfectly see what they could’ve been.

“I want to have a background in literature and violin,” Izuku said dreamily. “I got an education in reading romantic novels, did my thesis on them and I professionally played violin as well on the side.”

Katsuki’s hand squeezed him lovingly, showing approval.

“Lovely,” Nana commented. “And last but not least, all that’s left is your government identities. Do you want to change your first names, your surnames, or both?”

Izuku would be happy to relieve himself of his whole identity if needed. He was ready to say ‘both’ but paused when he glanced at Katsuki. There was the smallest crack in his fiancé’s expression. His mouth was pressed together and the frown on his face was deeper than normal.

“We can keep Bakugou,” Izuku said. “Let’s only change our first names.”

Katsuki turned his head. His eyes were slightly bigger, but Izuku could see the relief inside of them.

“Are you sure?” Katsuki questioned. He treaded lightly and leaned in. “I don’t mind losing Bakugou if you think another last name would be better.”

Izuku shook his head. “I think Bakugou suits you. It suits us.”

Katsuki smiled affectionately.

Nana nodded at them, smiling as well. “Bakugou it is. What do you two have in mind for first names? Let’s start with Katsuma’s.”

Izuku knew this one easily. “His favorite superhero is named Kenji. I used to secretly read him those comics when he was little. He’d be happy to be called that any day.”

Nana laughed, deep from her stomach. “Ah, yes! I had to read him a lot of those comics the last few months too. Bakugou Kenji has a nice ring to it. Now, what about you two?”

Katsuki hummed, thoughtful. “Y’know. I never really thought another name could suit me.”

They both tried to brainstorm. Izuku scanned his memory for any sort of name that would fit, and maybe represent how far they've come. And then—instantly, Izuku knew. The idea came to him in a spark, lighting through his chest.

He turned to Katsuki with wide eyes and an even wider grin.

"I think I know what names we should choose," he said, mischief glinting in his eyes.

Katsuki looked at him, confused. "Yeah? What do you have in mind?"

ᔓᔓᔓ

Nana slid the finished documents across the desk.

"All set," she said happily. "Meet your new lives."

Katsuki picked his passport up first, flipping it open with a skeptical snort.

"You're really lucky you're cute," he muttered, shooting Izuku a playful glance. "Otherwise I would've said fuck no to this."

Izuku laughed cheerfully. "I think it fits perfectly."

"Yeah, you're right," Katsuki snickered.

The two of them leaned together over the new passports. The scent of ink lingered between them as they looked at them together. Their faces stared back at them. Same eyes, same mouths, and same hair. But now, they were framed with different names, ready to start anew.

Izuku traced the letters with his thumb.

Bakugou Taro and Bakugou Hiroji.

Chapter 52 — Reprise

“Arms up,” Izuku said.

Katsuma obeyed. But as he did, his eyes drifted to the corner where his coat hung on a hook. Izuku made a move to put the tiny shirt over the boy’s head. But a moment later, Katsuma made a determined walk towards his coat. Izuku laughed softly and scooped him up before he could reach it.

“No coat needed today,” Izuku said with a smile. “It’s going to be warm where we’re going.”

Katsuma frowned, doubtful. “Are you sure?”

From across the room, Katsuki grunted. “He’s telling the truth, buddy. It’s going to be stupidly hot, like we’re walking on the sun. Be prepared to melt.”

Katsuma gasped in horror.

Izuku shot Katsuki a glare over his shoulder. “Don’t scare him.”

Katsuki shrugged, closing one bag’s zipper with a quick snap. “I’m only preparing him.”

Izuku was going to reprimand his fiancé, but he snickered instead. It was terribly difficult to be mad today. Maybe because it was the start of a new era. He could feel the burning excitement teeming beneath his skin.

Nana had informed them the previous night that they were finally docking in Singapore. After endless weeks at sea, it felt like a miracle. She had completed her excursion, stopping at discreet ports across Asia, scattering people into new lives. Some of those individuals they had grown to know. They were kind and also looking for nothing but peace. When they all parted ways, everyone wished each other nothing but the best.

And now, it was their turn.

Throughout the room, half-folded clothes stacked in uneven piles, and bags were yawning open on the beds. Katsuki hunched over the desk, muttering under his breath as he tried to commit all the details of their forged lives. And somewhere in the chaos, Izuku crouched in front of Katsuma. He finished coaxing him into the tiny button-down shirt and pants they’d picked out the night before.

Packing went quickly after that. Izuku smoothed out Katsuma’s collar. Katsuki double-checked every pocket of every bag. And outside their door, Nana called out reminders in the hallways like a general marshaling her troops.

And then, almost too quickly, the moment arrived.

Nana knocked on their door.

“Bakugous,” she called. “It’s time. Get prepared to head out in about fifteen minutes.”

Izuku nervously pressed his hand to his stomach. His heart was beating fast as he grabbed a couple of their bags and strapped Katsuma’s little red backpack to his body. They headed for the deck, arms chuck full of their belongings.

And when they arrived at the top, the air hit hard. It was thick, warm, and impossibly humid. In the sky above, the dawn was only beginning to break. A soft, molten yellow reached across the horizon and painted the sea in golden fragments.

Izuku stopped in his tracks, letting the view settle around him.

Beside him, Katsuki muttered, “Wow,” quietly. Katsuma squinted into the light, burying his face briefly against Izuku’s leg. Nana stood in front of them, hands on her hips. Her whole figure slowly became silhouetted against the rising sun. She glanced back with a wry smile.

“You won’t ever have to worry about winter again,” Nana joked.

Katsuki dryly scoffed. “Good. I’ve had enough snow to last five lifetimes.”

The cicadas were the first to greet them. Their buzzing was a steady chorus in Izuku's ears as they all stood before a house. Inside his chest, his heart beat just as loudly. It thudded frantically against his ribs as he stared at the blue door. Behind it, the house rose gracefully. Broad-leafed mahogany trees and infinite greenery framed their new home.

Izuku took in every detail that he could. The color was crisp white, and the edges were softened by climbing foliage. It stood about three stories tall directly next to the bright blue sea. Overall, it wasn't extravagant or too large.

But it was just the right size for a small circle of people who cared for each other.

"This is beautiful," Katsuki whispered in awe. "How did you pick this out?"

"Aizawa gave me some hints," Nana said. "He told me you wanted a quiet retirement in the countryside. And he suggested that you all might enjoy a warmer climate."

"He was right," Katsuki laughed, still in shock. He glanced around, eyes catching on a mango tree off to the side. "Thank you so much, Nana. I don't know how many more times I can thank you, but—I'm just so grateful."

"You may have to say thank you one more time," she teased. "You haven't even seen the backyard yet. It's big enough for a certain little boy to play around in until he's nice and sleepy."

Katsuma peered from behind Izuku's leg. "There's a backyard?"

Nana smiled at him. "Mhm. Wait until you see it. You're going to love it."

She reached into her pocket and withdrew a golden key. Katsuma smiled brightly as she stepped forward and slid it into the lock. And with a gentle click, the door eased open as if it'd been awaiting them.

"Welcome to your new beginning," Nana said, her smile widening with pride.

When they stepped inside, Izuku felt the world tilt. It shifted from teetering on danger to finally exhaling. He leaned all the way into that shift and let his shoulders creep down from his ears.

"Tour time!" Nana said with glee.

She led them inside, walking through the living room first. It was a cozy space with warm light pooling across polished floors. All around were built-in shelves waiting to be filled with books, and a wide window looked over the distant green hills through the backyard.

Izuku could already imagine mornings here. He could perfectly picture Katsuma sprawled on the rug playing with his toys and Katsuki getting ready for work on the couch smiling at him.

The kitchen was next. It was full of windows, allowing endless natural light inside. They had ample counter room in the spacious area to cook food. Izuku knew Katsuki was going to love that. And complimenting the counters, sharp stainless steel lined everything, with brand new pots and pans hanging up along the walls.

“Whoa,” Katsuki muttered, eyes widening despite himself. “This is a nice setup.”

They continued through the house. Nana showed them the backyard with the pond, and the mango trees that had fruit waiting to be picked. She showed them the long hallways that were lined with various rooms. A study. A private office. Then, when they went to the second floor, Nana opened another door. It was obvious who it was for.

Katsuma squealed with excitement.

“And this, of course, is his room,” Nana chuckled.

The boy stepped inside, eyes sparkling as he took it all in. They all admired the small bed, the soft orange walls, and the trunk of toys underneath the large window. Izuku walked over to a tiny book shelf and squatted low. He blinked back tears when he saw what was there. It was all stories that taught about love, family, and encouraged kindness.

“I figured out some stuff he might like,” Nana said quietly as Katsuma jumped on to the bed.

“You did great,” Izuku whispered.

Next, Nana opened a second door across the hall. It was a playroom stuffed with endless educational tools. There was a drawing board, and a small desk for Katsuma to do his future schooling.

Finally, they reached the top floor, and the last door.

The primary bedroom opened wide before them. It had tall windows and a gentleness about it. Izuku lingered on the threshold, overwhelmed by the promise of it. Inside wasn’t much, just a single king sized bed and a dresser.

“I decided to go light on the furnishing, so you can decorate how you want,” Nana explained. “It’s a blank canvas.”

They walked in further, and that’s when Izuku realized the large windows were actually doors. Nana pushed them open, and revealed a large, breathtaking balcony overlooking the water. Katsuki breathed in the fresh air, and Izuku smiled softened as the breeze blew through his hair.

They stepped out together with Katsuma tucked safely between them. And the world opened before them in a sweeping, breathtaking expanse. The countryside rolled into green hills and waving palms. Then beside it, the impossibly blue water shimmered under the sun.

Katsuma grabbed the railing with both hands. His eyes were wide and shining as he gasped at the sight.

“So,” Nana laughed, watching them with a tender gaze. “What do you think?”

They both glanced at her over his shoulder, grinning from ear to ear.

“It’s perfect,” Katsuki said.

ᔓᔓᔓ

The late morning light slanted through the palm leaves as Nana led them down the tranquil roads of their new neighborhood.

As they walked, Izuku noted the houses weren’t too terribly far apart. He could see their new neighbors walking and chatting with grins on their faces. He smiled at how peaceful their new town was. It had wide sidewalks and bursts of bougainvillea curling over fences.

“And this,” Nana said, gesturing ahead, “is the closest grocery store. You guys can get fresh produce every day here. It’s locally grown, and has some of the best fruit I’ve ever tasted.”

Katsuma darted ahead to peer through the glass doors. He pressed his face against the cool surface before Izuku gently pulled him back with a laugh. They continued on, passing cafes, small clinics, and a quiet park dotted with shade from trees. Inside, families lounged on benches with coffees in their hands and smiles on their lips.

Nana walked them up a small hill to a bright building with floral painted murals along the sides.

“And here,” she said, resting her hand on Katsuma’s shoulder, “is your new school, Katsuma! You’re already enrolled for next year.” She smiled at Izuku. “The teachers are good people. They’re all super patient and attentive. I think by the time fall semester comes, he’ll be adjusted enough to do great.”

Katsuma looked up at Nana with a shy grin and clutched Izuku’s hand. Izuku swallowed around the sudden rush of emotion at the sight. Who knew that seeing a kindergarten would make him feel so hopeful?

Katsuma was really going to have a normal childhood.

A montage unfolded in warm, sunlit pieces as Nana pointed out bus routes, shortcut paths, and a corner store that sold surprisingly good breakfast buns. As they strolled, Katsuki lifted Katsuma onto his shoulders so he could see the water again.

Eventually, they found themselves back at the edge of their property during sunset.

Nana turned to them with a bittersweet smile. She gazed at each one of them, taking her time. A small shimmer appeared in her eyes, and a protective love blossomed across her face. She quietly clasped her hands together.

“This is where I leave you,” she said sadly. “I’m so happy you both found me. And I’m honored to give you the opportunity to start fresh. I want you to know as well, your death certificates in Japan have been filed on public record. Your past lives are formally dead and buried."

"Thank you so much, Nana," Katsuki said, bowing slightly. "If you ever need anything, please let us know. We'd be more than happy to help you."

"The only thing I want you two to do is relax," she joked. Nana then kneeled down to Katsuma's level and held her arms out with a sweet smile. "I have to go now, Katsuma. Give me a hug."

Izuku had never seen Katsuma run towards someone so readily before. He threw himself into Nana's arms with a big hug and squeezed her tightly.

"Will you come back to visit?" He asked in a tiny voice.

Nana stroked his head and nodded. "I'll come back as soon as I can. But you have to make sure you are a good boy for your brother, okay? Don't give him much trouble and remember to give him a lot of hugs."

"I will!" Katsuma said brightly.

They pulled apart, and Izuku had to wipe a tear from the corner of his eye. "Thank you again."

"Of course," she said. "But it's not goodbye. I'll be in and out, checking in on you. I've, uh, taken a bit of a special interest in making sure you two turn out alright. So it's goodbye for now, but not forever."

"I like the sound of that," Katsuki said with a grin.

When Nana stood up, she pulled a small, sleek phone out of her pocket.

"And one last thing," she said, pressing the device into Katsuki's hand. "This is an emergency contact line. In case anything, and I mean anything, goes wrong or seems suspicious, please use this. It's encrypted and preloaded with two numbers—mine, and someone else who vigorously insisted."

Katsuki powered it on.

The screen lit up, revealing exactly two contacts.

Shimura Nana.

And—Shouta Aizawa.

Both Katsuki and Izuku froze for a moment.

Then, identical, helpless smiles broke across their faces.

After Nana departed, they all stood together in the empty living room. The silence stretched wide around them as they took in the new space. Katsuma wandered a few steps in. He kept his small hands clasped behind his back as he peered around shyly. He lifted his eyes to Izuku, enormous but uncertain.

“All this is ours?” he asked softly.

“It is,” Izuku replied warmly.

“Really?” Katsuma pressed, as though afraid the house might vanish if he blinked. He bashfully tilted his head. “Will we…see our other brothers and sisters? Are they coming too?” He paused. “Is…is Big Brother Tomura coming?”

The fear in his voice was microscopic, but it cut straight through the atmosphere.

“No,” Izuku answered solidly.

He ignored the complex sadness tugging at his chest. Wearily, he glanced at their bags in the hallway. Even though he couldn’t see it, he could feel the presence of the urn inside the luggage.

Delicately, Izuku knelt down. He placed both hands on Katsuma’s small shoulders.

“Tomura won’t be around ever again,” Izuku explained pensively.

Katsuma absorbed that, brows knitting. “So…that means you’re not going to get hurt anymore?”

Izuku’s breathing stopped—and so did Katsuki’s. Both their eyes widened, and Izuku’s heart twisted horribly.

“I—” He swallowed hard and blinked rapidly, forcing down the lump in his throat. “I’m not. You won’t ever have to see me get hurt again. And we have Kacchan to thank for that.”

Katsuma’s face lit up with pure relief. And before Izuku could brace for it, tiny arms wrapped around his neck.

“Does this mean Kacchan is going to stay with us?” Katsuma asked into his shoulder. “He’ll make sure you don’t get hurt anymore?”

A fragile laugh broke out from Izuku. He hugged Katsuma closer.

“Yeah,” he whispered. “He’s staying with us from now on.”

Izuku lifted his head, turning toward Katsuki with shining eyes. Katsuki stepped closer, unable to look away.

“Thank you, Kacchan!” Katsuma chirped as he finally pulled back.

“It’s no problem, buddy,” Katsuki replied quietly.

He crouched down beside them. His smile was small but impossibly gentle. Izuku met his gaze, and the room went entirely still. The sound of the birds faded, the ocean calmed and the sun fully set.

The only thing left was a private exchange between them.

The countryside stilled as the sky shifted from rose-gold to deep violet. They spent the hours wandering through their new home and its surroundings, simply enjoying the calm. Katsuma chased fireflies in the backyard while Katsuki joined him after finding a jar. Izuku laughed as he watched them collect the insects, both their faces illuminated by the yellow light.

Eventually, the three of them were eating a simple dinner on the floor of their empty living room with their legs stretched out. They talked about decor, and the infinite possibilities made all of their hearts full.

As night settled, the house grew dimmer but warmer.

An unfamiliar harmony draped itself around them. It was thin at first, fragile as spun glass, but Izuku held on tightly. And when Katsuma made his first yawn of the evening, they knew it was time for this surreal day to come to a close. They guided the young boy up the stairs to his new room.

“Do I have to go to school tomorrow?” Katsuma asked, climbing up onto the mattress and sitting cross-legged. “Nana said I would go to a nice people school. No more training involved.”

Izuku smiled, smoothing a wrinkle in the comforter.

“She’s right but you’re not starting just yet,” he explained. “You’re going to start next fall. But in the meantime, we’re going to get to spend time together—fully uninterrupted. I won’t be going anywhere for a long time.”

Katsuma’s shoulders eased, and a small smile formed. “Really?”

“Yup! And when you do start school,” Izuku continued, brushing a hand through Katsuma’s hair. “You’ll start kindergarten with other kids your age, and they’re going to be so kind to you.”

Katsuma’s face lit up. “You’re not lying?”

“Not at all. You’re going to make so many new, kind hearted friends.”

Izuku pulled the blanket up to Katsuma’s chin, tucking him in snugly. Katsuma immediately wrapped his arms around Izuku’s neck, yanking him down into another tight hug. Izuku closed his eyes, holding Katsuma longer than necessary. When he finally pulled back, Katsuma stared up at Katsuki expectantly.

"…I want a hug from Kacchan too."

Katsuki blinked, startled. "Me?"

Katsuma nodded, stubborn and earnest.

Izuku burst into a loud laugh and used his hand to cover his mouth. Katsuki scratched behind his head but still stepped forward. He leaned down awkwardly, arms going around Katsuma in a stiff but sincere embrace.

Katsuma giggled brightly and delightedly. Izuku laughed harder, eyes crinkling.

Katsuki pulled back, cheeks a little warm. "Alright, alright. Go to sleep, gremlin."

"Night, 'Zuku!" Katsuma chimed. "And goodnight, Kacchan!"

They said their goodbyes and switched off the lights. Izuku's heart grew tepid as he watched Katsuma snuggle into his pillow, already drifting away.

Soundlessly, they closed the door behind them and walked down the hall.

As they strolled, a bubble of happiness built inside Izuku. It grew with every step, taking up more room as his smile inched bigger and bigger. He shyly brushed Katsuki's hand, and his lover mirthfully nudged his shoulder.

He stole a glance at Katsuki and was delighted to see he wasn't alone in his joy. The other man had the same barely contained giddy expression. They made their way into their new bedroom, and the second the door closed—they broke out into boyish grins of sheer exuberance.

It was impossible to tell who kissed whom first.

Their lips met in a clumsy, laughing collision. Then suddenly, it was a cascade of tiny pecks. Katsuki kissed Izuku's nose, his eyelids, and his cheeks. He cupped Izuku's face with both hands while Izuku smiled so hard his jaw hurt.

"We did it," Katsuki said, forehead pressed to his. "Holy shit, we actually did it. Izuku. We made it out."

Izuku laughed, breathless. "We did!"

"And we're finally married again," Katsuki added, grinning so wide it bordered on feral. He kissed the corner of Izuku's mouth. "But I'm going to marry you properly one day—I mean it. Our wedding is going to be exactly how you always dreamed, and I'll be damned if it goes any other way."

Izuku felt his heart soar. "I can't wait for that day too. I'm so happy to call you my husband again."

They kissed once more, and Izuku could only describe the feeling as elation.

It was as if there were a cloud of a hundred butterflies under his feet. He floated in pure joy as they shared their joint bliss. As Izuku soared higher, the kiss intensified. The butterflies carried him away as they stumbled back, gripping each other in disbelief.

Izuku gasped lightly as the back of his knees hit the edge of the new bed. They went tumbling, and the sound of laughter came with their fall. They bounced on the mattress, smiling like fools against each other's lips.

Another burst of joy erupted in him, and Izuku threw his head back. His wild curls splayed across the white linen sheets. He laughed, unrestrained.

"I can't believe it," Izuku exclaimed. "I really can't believe it. Kacchan, we get a new life."

"It was always in the cards for us," Katsuki muttered against his lips. "It's fate or whatever the hell it's called."

His words wrapped around Izuku's heart, squeezing tight. Izuku's smile softened as Katsuki lifted his head. Otherworldly, devoted scarlet eyes locked onto him, and Izuku's heart skipped a beat. Their expressions mirrored the other, echoing years of strife and love.

Katsuki leaned in, breath ghosting against Izuku's lips.

"Y'know, I think we've shared more beds than I can keep track of now," he said mischievously. He bit his lip and raised a brow. "But it's something about knowing this one is for our new life together that makes me eager to break it in. What do you say, Mr. Bakugou?"

Izuku chuckled. "I say that sounds amazing, Mr. Bakugou."

Katsuki grinned brilliantly right before he captured Izuku's mouth.

Instantly, their lips fused with a fervency that felt both inexorable and exquisitely familiar. Those warm, time-worn hands curved around his body, drawing him into an embrace that was as anchoring as it was consuming. Izuku surrendered to it fully. He fell, impossibly deeper into the well of love he held for his husband.

Wow. He missed being able to say that.

His husband.

The kiss ignited like an ember blooming from tinder, and warmth spread across every inch of his skin. Izuku's hands roamed up Katsuki's sides, bunching up the fabric of his shirt as he arched upwards. The heat from their bodies melted together, making him feel safe and loved.

Katsuki's mouth moved with more purpose now. He sucked on Izuku's lower lip before he slid his tongue inside. Izuku moaned softly, the sound swallowed entirely as Katsuki's weight settled more firmly on him.

Izuku pushed his tongue against his husband's, chasing the warmth that spread from his core. It spilled across his body as his husband gave a slow grind. The fervor filled his veins and sent shutters down his spine. Izuku gasped as his own cock grew hard, straining against Katsuki's.

He broke away from the kiss and glanced up.

Heated stares had replaced their smiles, and electricity sparked in the air. Izuku ground up, chasing the friction that bloomed low in his belly. Katsuki's response was instant. He gripped Izuku tighter and slowly left a trail of open mouth kisses along his jaw.

"You're mine now, Izuku," he hoarsely whispered.

"And you're all mine too."

Katsuki nodded as his fingers dipped under Izuku's shirt. He pushed the fabric up slowly, and the cool air from the room caressed Izuku's skin. But Katsuki's touch chased it away. Calloused palms dragged up his sides with delicate, mindful care. His husband gripped his shirt and slowly peeled it away. Then soon, away went his pants, his socks, and his underwear.

He laid underneath Katsuki, fully on display.

Gorgeous scarlet eyes roamed his body, and Izuku felt his cock twitch. Heat rushed down between his legs as Katsuki's hands roamed everywhere, teasing and ghosting tiny trails of worship. When his husband kissed his neck, Izuku couldn't think of anyone else he'd ever want to be with like this.

He reached forward then and hooked his fingers under Katsuki's shirt. He did the same and stripped Katsuki bare and rid him of all his clothes. His husband's cock hung free, hard and already leaking for him as his taut muscles flexed under the dim moonlight.

Izuku pressed his hand flat against Katsuki's chest and then firmly flipped them.

He confidently straddled his husband's hips and seated himself directly on top.

Surprised but delighted, Katsuki smirked at him. "You wanna ride tonight?"

"Yeah." Izuku grinned while pink crept up his ears. "I've missed feeling you inside me…you have no clue."

Katsuki shifted onto his elbows. "I got some lube in my bag. I grabbed it during a pit stop on our way down to Okinawa."

"…It's funny you say that."

Katsuki raised a brow. "What do you mean?"

Izuku's heart pounded with excitement as he reached for his own bag that sat at the side of the bed. He dipped his hand into the small pocket and pulled out a tiny pink bottle of lube. He brought it up to view, showing his husband with a mirthful grin.

“Now when did you get that?” Katsuki teased.

“I may have also bought some during a pit stop?” Izuku admitted with a cheesy grin. “I guess we had the same thought.”

Katsuki barked a sharp laugh and rested a hand comfortably on Izuku’s hip. “Well, look at us —great minds really do think alike.”

Izuku smiled at him as he popped the cap. He squeezed a generous amount onto his fingers and let the slick gel warm against his skin. He massaged it between his fingertips slowly as he sat back. His husband’s cock slotted perfectly between his bare cheeks, pressing hard against all his sensitive areas.

Izuku leaned forward slightly, balancing on his knees. He brought his lubed fingers to his entrance carefully. He circled the tight ring of muscle first, coating it thoroughly, then pushed one finger inside himself.

The initial stretch burned just right, sending a shiver up his spine. He softly moaned as he worked it in and out slowly, building the rhythm. His free hand braced on top of Katsuki’s chest for support. The sensation made his own cock throb, bringing it fully erect and leaking pre-cum onto Katsuki’s abs.

His husband’s intense eyes locked onto the sight, dark and hungry. Gradually, his breathing shifted. Katsuki’s breath began to come out in shallow huffs, as he rested his hands on Izuku’s hips. He was mesmerized, thumbs rubbing soothing circles into the skin.

“Darling,” he murmured, voice full of arousal. “Look at you, opening up yourself for me like that. Does it feel good?”

Izuku nodded. “I-It does.”

Katsuki’s pupils dilated in hunger. “Can you make yourself whimper for me?”

Emboldened, Izuku added a second finger. He scissored them to stretch himself wider then angled them just right. His breath hitched low in his throat as he pressed against his prostate. Electric sparks flooded his senses.

Izuku’s eyes fluttered close as he did it again. Then once more. He set a small, addictive rhythm as he happily pleasured himself. Ecstasy coiled tight in his gut as his hips rocked instinctively, chasing the sensation. Then soon, Izuku’s breathing quickened.

He lost himself in the moment, unaware of the way Katsuki was cursing quietly.

He also then missed his husband reaching for the lube and slicking one of his own fingers down.

Izuku’s eyes snapped open when he felt an extra nudge alongside his fingers. He groaned deeply at the added stretch. His body clenched down around the intrusion, but welcomed it greedily.

Together, they moved. Katsuki's finger thrusted in sync with Izuku's, twisting and probing. He filled Izuku deeper as their breaths began to match in pace.

The dual pressure had Izuku moaning openly, his voice breaking as waves of heat pulsed through him.

He ached as the pace built and he was filled up with a second finger of Katsuki's. He shuttered, overcome with pleasure as he dropped forward. His head pushed into the crook of Katsuki's neck, lips pressing against the warm skin there as groans spilled from him.

Sweat beaded on his muscular back as the moonlight cast shadows over their joined bodies. With Katsuki participating in the effort, the slick sounds overcame the quiet room. Pleasure built relentlessly, and his cock twitched with every caress against his prostate.

Katsuki turned his head, lips brushing Izuku's temple in a soft kiss.

"Darling," Katsuki called to him in his deepest octave. "I don't think I ever told you—after you passed out in that shitty motel, you were dripping so much goddamn cum."

Izuku shivered as Katsuki pushed inside deeper. "Ye-Yeah?"

"Mhm," Katsuki hissed. He fucked his fingers in harder, making Izuku moan a little louder. "God. Darling, it was so goddamn hot. I never told you I licked you clean that night with my tongue. I ate all the cum right out of you."

Izuku's hazy eyes opened, dilated all the way. "Kacchan, you did that?"

"Damn right I did. And you were whimpering the whole time. Fuck. You should've heard yourself. I had to make sure I tongued you down very gently too."

A deep groan rumbled from the back of Izuku's throat as he pushed his hips onto the fingers harder.

Katsuki bit his lip. "You like that image, don't you?"

Izuku nodded feverishly with the base of his neck burned red. "I do. I really like that image."

Finally, when his legs were trembling just right, Izuku pulled his fingers free with a wet pop. Katsuki followed suit, leaving Izuku stretched and ready.

Izuku panted against Katsuki's neck, lifting his head to meet those scarlet eyes.

"Now to get you slicked up," Izuku whispered huskily.

Katsuki nodded, his cock standing rigid against his abs. It was fully veined with tip glistening, waiting for him. The sight alone made Izuku's mouth water, and cock jump. He shifted up and backwards and grabbed the base with one hand.

Without breaking eye contact with his husband, he began to stroke it. He poured lube all over the veiny cock, double fisting it to make sure every inch of it was nice and wet. He teased a little too. His thumb slid through the pre-cum slick slit, drawing a throaty groan from his husband that he loved.

And right when Katsuki seemed ready to burst, Izuku lined himself up.

He sank down slowly, the blunt head breaching him. It stretched his rim around its girth, and a sharp moan escaped him as he took the first few inches. He bit his trembling lip as the burn morphed into exquisite fullness. Inch by inch, he lowered himself. His walls clenched and fluttered around the throbbing cock until he was fully seated, filled up to the brim.

“Fuck, finally,” Katsuki growled in a low rumble that vibrated through Izuku’s core. “You feel so damn good.”

His hands clamped down on Izuku’s hips, fingers digging deep into the soft flesh. He held Izuku in place as if he might float away from the intensity. Katsuki closed his eyes and tipped his head back against the pillow, beautiful blond hair spilling across the cloth.

Izuku’s breath caught at the lovely sight, and his body thrummed with insatiable need.

He braced his palms flat against Katsuki’s broad chest, drinking in the rapid thud of his husband’s heartbeat under his sweat-slicked skin. The muscles there flexed under his touch, grounding him as he lifted his hips.

Katsuki’s thick cock slid almost all the way out, dragging against his inner walls. Carefully, Izuku teased his own rim with the flared head before slamming back down. The sudden fullness punched a gasp from his lungs, and his ass clenched around the base.

They both moaned at the sensation, eyes seeped in desire. Fully in sync, both their toes curled, and Izuku set a rhythm.

He began rising and falling, each descent forcing Katsuki’s cock deeper inside of him. He moaned lewdly as the tip nudged insistently against his prostate. Scorching sparks shot up his spine like electric jolts, making his vision blur at the edges. His own cock slapped against Katsuki’s skin with every bounce, leaving trails of pre-cum that glistened in the moonlight.

The wet clap of skin on skin echoed in the room. The sound mingled with their ragged breaths and the creak of the bed beneath them.

Suddenly, confidence he never felt bloomed in his chest. It was fierce, and pure as he picked up speed.

His hips rolled more fluidly now, grinding down to a circle. He clenched as he came up, milking a groan and shudder out of his husband. Izuku savored the way his lover’s perfect cock filled every inch of him.

Sweat dripped down from his nape, trailing down his back. He picked up the pace, pleasing himself fully unabashed. He angled himself just right, making Katsuki’s girthy tip hit dead on against his pleasure spot. With an enticing moan, Izuku tossed his head back, curls sticking to his forehead.

The angle was perfect. He reached down and began stroking himself, catching his sensitive slit with every pull. Izuku's thighs burned, but he didn't care. The ache fueled him, making him ride harder and faster. He chased the release that hovered just out of reach.

Katsuki began bucking up to meet every downward plunge. He snapped his hips with measured, controlled power, driving his cock in deeper. He kept a firm grip on Izuku, guiding the motion, pulling him down harder when he faltered.

"There we go," Katsuki panted. His hazy eyes were locked on Izuku's face, drinking in every parted lip moan. Beads of sweat rolled down his temples, and his abs tightened with each thrust. "C'mon. Bounce on it harder, baby. Milk me with that tight ass of yours."

The dirty praise washed over Izuku, and his body responded with a fresh wave of heat. His walls clenched involuntarily as he leaned forward, changing the angle just enough to grind his prostate harder. He sped up, setting a new, bed quaking pace. The friction sent white-hot pleasure spinning through him. His cock throbbed painfully, leaking steadily now as the head became swollen and sensitive.

"Kacchan," Izuku whimpered. "F-Fuck, Kacchan, I missed your cock so much—" His voice broke as he rode with all he had.

Katsuki's hands began to roam. One slid up to pinch and toy with Izuku's nipple while the other stayed on his hip, urging him on. Izuku twitched sharply at the sudden flick at his sensitive chest, arching into a perfect bow.

He bounced harder as Katsuki rolled his erect nub between his fingers, moaning as quietly as he could. But soon, desperation wrapped tightly around all his senses. The pleasure built, tantalizing and hypnotizing as it pushed on his core. His mouth dropped as his legs went numb from the countless ripples of rapture.

"Come on, darling," Katsuki urged, his thrusts growing erratic as well. "I want to feel you cum on my cock. You're so close, I can tell by how your little hole is clenching me."

Those words shattered Izuku's hold on sanity, and everything crashed together.

The relentless friction. The deep thrusts. The filthy encouragement.

His moans spiked to frantic cries, body tensing like a bowstring pulled taut. Pleasure crested in a blinding rush, and his balls drew up tight. Without grace, his orgasm ripped through him.

Thick ropes of cum erupted from his twitching cock, splattering across Katsuki's chest, abs, and even the tip of his chin. Izuku's walls spasmed wildly around Katsuki's length, clamping down in rhythmic pulses that milked every inch, pulling groans from both of them.

Izuku gasped as he collapsed forward onto Katsuki's chest. He ignored the way his release smeared between their bodies, mixing with their sweat. Intense waves of ecstasy pulsed through him, leaving him trembling and boneless.

However, Katsuki's cock throbbed several times. It was still rock hard, a reminder that his husband wasn't done. Izuku's mind fogged, expecting a moment to catch his breath—

—But then Katsuki bucked upward.

He slammed his cock back into Izuku's spent hole. The sudden thrust punched a startled yelp from Izuku's throat. His overstimulated walls fluttered wildly around the invading length. The pleasure it came with bordered on pain now. It was too intense as the head of Katsuki's dick ground against his prostate with ruthless precision.

Izuku's eyes flew wide, teeth gritting hard. His vision sparked white at the edges like fireworks exploding behind his lids.

"Ka-Kacchan—" Izuku gasped, eyes nearly rolling back in pleasure.

He hadn't expected this—or maybe he should've.

Katsuki placed a kiss on his nose. "I'm gonna make your pretty ass cum so much tonight."

And that was all Izuku got before his husband gave it his all.

Izuku's moans escalated in pitch, hitting higher and higher with each drive. Katsuki planted his feet flat on the mattress and began funneling all his leg power into it. He sent jolts of electric heat ripping through Izuku and Izuku felt the grip on his composure slip away.

His body stirred with fresh twitches of arousal despite the sensitivity. And then in no time, his cock throbbed back to life, oversensitive and twitching from the friction.

Izuku's nails dug into Katsuki's chest, seeking an anchor in the storm.

However, the relentless pounding made his limbs jelly, and his mind was a bustling whirlwind of white-hot sensation.

Panting through clenched teeth, Izuku forced his eyes open, blinking away the blur. Katsuki stared back at him, scarlet eyes blazing with a feral hunger that bordered on wildness. But beneath it simmered raw, possessive love that made Izuku's heart soar. His husband's face was flushed, lips parted in a snarl, and sweat trickled down his sharp jawline.

The sight of Izuku unraveling utterly consumed him.

"I wish you could see how you look right now," Katsuki rasped, eyes darkening. "You got cum all over me, whimpering, and you're shaking like a leaf. It makes me wanna wreck you even more."

"D-do it," Izuku moaned out, eyes nearly crossing in pleasure. "Ruin me, Kacchan. I wanna feel you for the next week—"

He knew those words challenged that competitive spirit in his husband.

Katsuki's eyes sharpened, and his lip twitched.

Then he adjusted for exactly half a second before he returned with a brutal snap. Izuku gasped excitedly, his body arching involuntarily into the next savage thrust. Katsuki's cock hit directly against the spot inside of him, washing his mind blank. Izuku's ragged breaths came in short bursts, and soon the room spun as pleasure-pain coiled tighter in his gut.

Katsuki shifted then, muscles flexing under Izuku's hands as he sat up in one fluid motion.

His arms wrapped around Izuku's waist, pulling them chest to chest. The heat of their bodies fused as he began thrusting like this, keeping Izuku deadlocked between overstimulation and pleasure.

Hot tears burned at the edges of Izuku's vision as Katsuki's mouth brushed his ear.

"Hold on to me," Katsuki commanded.

Izuku obeyed instinctively. His hands gripped Katsuki's shoulders, fingers sinking into the tense, corded muscles there. The new position pressed them impossibly closer, helping Katsuki's cock angle even deeper. Izuku sobbed with titillation as he clung for dear life. His nails bit into flesh as Katsuki's pace somehow quickened, hips snapping with unrelenting ferocity.

With effortless strength, Katsuki repositioned them further. He leaned forward, rolling them so he knelt between Izuku's spread thighs. The movement lifted Izuku slightly, but Katsuki's hands never left his hips, guiding him down onto that wide cock as he bounced him in his lap.

Izuku's legs draped over Katsuki's thighs, and he blinked rapidly. The impossible stretch burned anew, and the wet sounds of lube filled the room.

"Kacchan," Izuku cried as he tilted his head back.

Rapture consumed him, wave after wave swallowing his mind. His world filtered down to the relentless bounce and the grip on his hips. His curls stuck to his forehead as his throat laid exposed. He gasped and writhed, lost in the overwhelming tide.

Suddenly, Izuku felt it.

He noticed the way Katsuki's rhythm faltered and his grip on Izuku tightened like iron.

A low, desperate moan tore from Katsuki's throat.

"K-Kacchan," Izuku called again, purposefully clenching and begging to be filled. Katsuki stuttered, gasping and groaning. Izuku took the opportunity to be bold. He reached down and grasped one of Katsuki's hands. He guided it to his bare neck and closed it around his delicate throat. "Please. G-Give it to me more, I want it. Fuck me stupid—"

Suddenly, Katsuki surged forward.

He planted Izuku onto his back with a groan. Izuku hit the mattress flat, and the air whooshed from his lungs as Katsuki pinned him down.

The hand around his throat tightened into a lover’s chokehold, and Izuku choked happily with a smile.

“Anything your beautiful ass needs,” Katsuki snarled.

Without pause, Katsuki slammed back in, plowing into Izuku with brutal force. He applied pressure as the bed creaked under the surge. Izuku’s head went perfectly light as his legs wrapped around Katsuki’s waist.

His husband’s free hand found his in the chaos, and their fingers interlocked in a fierce grip.

Katsuki leaned down, hot breath mingling with Izuku’s in the scant space between their mouths. They were panting and gasping, with their lips brushing but not quite kissing. The insanity built tenfold as Izuku’s throat bobbed and gagged underneath Katsuki’s loving chokehold.

Izuku's moans turned into whimpers, then to short gasps. His body jolted with every rough thrust, and the mattress dipped and bunched beneath them like it might give way.

Katsuki got rougher, hips snapping faster, harder, and more out of control.

“Shit, darling,” he groaned in a strained voice. “You’re gonna make me cum.”

His eyes remained focused on Izuku’s flushed face, drinking him in. In response, Izuku could only nod. He was too lost in the haze. He arched as his own cock throbbed, trapped between their bodies as the mind numbing pleasure built higher and higher all down his nerves.

Suddenly, the pressure snapped all at once.

Izuku choked out a cry. His release crashed over him, and dots spotted his vision. His cock pulsed, ribbons of cum splattering across his chest. Katsuki followed a thrust later. He drove in as far as he could, burying himself to the hilt with a guttural groan. His hips seized as his cock began pumping hot cum, flooding Izuku’s tiny hole until it overflowed, trickling down his thighs.

They both collapsed, limbs tangled together. Katsuki’s full weight pressed Izuku into the mattress, a comforting blanket of sweat and heat. Under the lull, Izuku let his eyes flutter shut. He savored the bliss and aftershock that rolled through his body. Then he smiled subtly when Katsuki’s hand loosened to stroke his jaw tenderly.

After the comedown, Katsuki propped up on his elbows. He leaned over Izuku, grinned lazily as he stole a quick kiss.

They eventually cleaned up, then readjusted back to the head of the bed, snugly under the covers in the afterglow.

Nuzzled into the blankets, their fingers intertwined and their hearts spilled over with love. Izuku chuckled as Katsuki pushed back his sweat soaked bangs, and Katsuki blushed when Izuku kissed his nose. They curled up together, smiling under the silver light of the crescent moon.

Izuku put his hand over Katsuki's heart.

"Kacchan," he quietly asked, "What type of life do you think we're going to have?"

Katsuki smiled, as if the answer was obvious.

"Any life we have together will be a good life."

First Year in Retirement

The first year passed by quieter than Katsuki thought it would.

At first, he'd assume it would come with an adjustment period. Y'know, those days with awkward pauses and rough transitions as the reality of it all hit them like a brick wall. But, instead, it was entirely the opposite. Smooth. Gentle. Somehow, effortlessly easy. It was sort of a surprise, but really, he should've known a life with his darling would've come so damn smoothly.

Their mornings were quiet. Their evenings were full of games. It was seamless in a way Katsuki didn't think was possible. Only on some days did he miss everyone from back home, especially Aizawa.

But when he did, he just called.

And he was always happy to catch up with his old man.

Waking up every morning next to Izuku was like stepping into a warm house after living too long in the cold. For the first few months, they kept to themselves. Izuku caught him up to speed on the local languages, while Katsuma adjusted to being in a new home. They didn't rush anything as they took time to adjust back into society without bloodstained hands.

During this period, Katsuma took to him quicker than expected. The little boy started mirroring a lot of his behavior and treated him like a cool live-in superhero. And soon, Katsuki figured out he sort of really liked being a caretaker.

It was healing to make sure Katsuma got the childhood he never was afforded.

He remembered the way their house felt that first spring: full of jubilance and the sound of hammering. They put together so much furniture he was positive he never wanted to look at another Ikea manual in his damn life.

They furnished their whole house in a way that truly spoke to both of their personal styles. Bookshelves lined the living room, and tall plants lounged around every corner. But more importantly, they decorated the halls with pictures. They put all his old photographs of his mother in special frames and hung them up in the hallways.

And right beside them, they placed their new family photos.

They accumulated a boatload of photos those first few months. Some examples included: Katsuma smiling, Katsuki cooking, and Izuku grinning with a book in his reading chair. They even took photos of their first day in the park together along with the days they spent in the backyard playing games.

“Kacchan, smile for me one more time!” Izuku giggled once.

Katsuki grumbled as the flash went off. “Don’t you think we’ve taken enough photos?”

“No such thing. Now smile again!”

He rolled his eyes half heartedly and grinned. His husband beamed brightly and kissed him on the cheek.

Katsuki never thought he’d ever have a home so full of love like this.

By the time summer rolled around, Izuku found work first.

His brilliant nerd began teaching private violin lessons and helping at a small local ensemble. Every evening he came home smelling of rosin and jasmine soap, cheeks flushed from the walk. And every evening Katsuki pretended like he wasn’t eagerly waiting on the couch with Katsuma for the sound of his keys.

Katsuki himself juggled small composing gigs.

Nothing too terribly fancy. It was stuff like commercials, indie films, and anything that paid decent enough. As long as he wasn’t bored to death, he was game. And even though the work was inconsistent, it was his. And that was enough to heal his inner child in more ways than he knew.

Everything was falling into place slowly.

Katsuma quickly grew into his place in the family. He was bright, excitable, and damn near fearless. Katsuki was surprised at how natural it felt to spend time with the kid. It was easy to read him like he were his flesh and blood. And somehow, all the pain from the past nimbly slipped away with the sound of a happy child’s laughter ricocheting down the halls.

But even with that, eventually Katsuki needed a healthy outlet for his anger—per the suggestion from their therapist.

He picked Muay Thai over meditation ultimately. Mainly because the idea of sitting still too long made his skin crawl. However, a physical outlet was perfect for him. In the gym, he found a great fucking release in the sweat and the sharp crack of his shin against the padded floor.

Eventually, Izuku and Katsuma came to watch his sparring matches. And Katsuma cheered like Katsuki was some kind of superhero.

“Go, Kacchan!” Katsuma would scream from Izuku’s lap. “You can do it!”

Izuku cheered too. His husband would look at him so adoringly the whole time with those big pretty green eyes. It wasn't before long that the three of them moved like a natural family. The other members at his gym frequently told him he had a cute kid and husband. And every time they did, he felt like the luckiest damn person in the world.

It was going great.

However, when the fall came around, Katsuki caught Izuku zoning out a lot.

Katsuma was officially enrolled at school, which meant they had more free time. Without the presence of an ever giggling toddler, something shifted. Katsuki would walk by in the halls and find Izuku listlessly lounging on the couch under a blanket. He'd be in a complete stupor, staring at Tomura's urn that was placed on a small pedestal by their fireplace mantel.

After that, Katsuki decided to make a risky suggestion.

They had been getting ready for bed. And directly after brushing their teeth, Izuku had been staring at his tattoo in the full length mirror. His fingers grazed that 217 while a pensive gaze resided in his eyes. It was damn near identical to how Hiryu used to look at his own tattoo.

Back then, Katsuki never understood what emotion was dancing in Hiryu's ink black eyes. But now, he got it.

It was grief.

Katsuki quietly came up behind Izuku. He carefully caressed his shoulders.

"You stare at that thing a lot," Katsuki pointed out.

"…Yeah," Izuku answered distantly. "It…It's been bringing up not so great memories. We're getting close to winter."

"Maybe it's time to get it covered up? But only if you want to."

Izuku blinked slowly, as if that idea never occurred to him.

"I could," he said quietly. "But I always felt like my number was a part of me…or more so, I was my number."

"You're far more than a number," Katsuki reminded him. "You always have been."

After that, they found a tattoo parlor.

Izuku sat in the chair nervously, holding his hand the whole time as the woman worked ink into his skin. He barely flinched as the new ink engulfed the old. And soon, that ugly 217 was swallowed up—gone forever.

What now sat valorously on Izuku's collarbone was a slain viper. The creature was coiled, snarling and stabbed straight through by a single dagger. It wove in and out on Izuku's collarbone, creating an optical illusion that it was weaving in and out of his skin.

“This is the sickest tattoo I’ve ever done,” the tattoo artist complimented. “A never would have thought about a Viper Killer design. Does it have any personal meaning?”

Izuku touched the swollen skin with a trembling thumb. “It does.”

Katsuki touched it too, pride swelling in his chest. “Now this is much better.”

Second Year in Retirement

By the second year, the clay of their lives began to take shape.

Katsuma was settling into school, and he loved it. He was a little scared of the other kids at first, which Izuku assumed would happen. But steadily, the little guy realized no one was there to hurt him. And soon he was laughing and playing with the other kindergarteners.

In the meantime, Izuku discovered he had a talent for coaxing life out of plants. But not before killing half the damn garden first. Katsuma followed him everywhere, tiny boots tracking through the soil as he handed Izuku watering cans twice his weight or pointed out bugs with scientific fascination.

Katsuki often watched from the bench. He rested his chin on top of his knuckles as the two of them laughed in the sunlight. He really loved seeing Izuku brush dirt off Katsuma’s cheeks and Katsuma proudly hold up a crooked flower he plucked himself.

That same year, they discovered Katsuma had a distinct gift: he could sing.

It shocked the hell out of them.

It had been a quiet evening where Katsuki was resting on the couch while Izuku practiced a new number on the violin: F. Chopin: Nocturne in C sharp minor. Katsuki had been carefully listening to the way Izuku hit the notes for his own inspiration. He smirked a bit every time Izuku huffed and restarted the sections that gave him a bit more difficulty.

When Izuku began playing the most melodically pleasing section, a tiny voice bloomed from the next room.

Katsuki opened his eyes, thinking he must’ve misheard it—but he hadn’t. In the smallest voice, was Katsuma perfectly vocalizing along with Izuku.

Izuku nearly fumbled his bow.

Katsuki quickly waved his hand at Izuku to keep playing. Slowly, they both crept forward. They did their best to not disturb the atmosphere. And when they turned the corner, they found Katsuma singing to himself while doodling in his notebook.

Both of their mouths dropped.

After that, Katsuma's school started noticing too. His teachers were stunned at how well he grasped melody, pitch, and sound. It wasn't before long Izuku and Katsuki enrolled him in classes on the side for musically gifted children. Katsuki tried his best to not be too smug when the instructors pulled them aside to gush about Katsuma's potential.

And then came Katsuki's first professional break: a full-length composition commissioned by the city symphony.

He worked late into the night with his fingers stained with graphite. Countless stacks of sheet music were scattered across their kitchen table like fallen leaves as he tried to put together the first piece.

It looked like madness in the house those weeks. He was nervous and overly disorganized. But whenever he doubted himself, or felt himself slipping into that spiraling state of mind—Izuku was there. His husband gently reminded him that there was always beauty in madness. And that no matter what, he would do an amazing job.

And that support was enough for Katsuki to make it through.

When he perfected his first professional composition, he thought it was all a fever dream. He practiced it with the city symphony, and many of the musicians told him it was heartfelt enough to make them cry.

And when the night of the big performance arrived, they all dressed up as a family. They put Katsuma in a tiny button-up shirt that sparkled, and Izuku was radiant in an all black tux on Katsuki's arm. When they arrived, Izuku and Katsuma took their seats, leaving Katsuki alone with the orchestra. He prepped and fiddled with his cuff links as he took the stage.

It was a packed house.

Rows and rows of faces stared back at him, all dressed up to hear something he made.

And when the final note evaporated into silence, the applause rose like a wave. People stood, one after another, until the entire theater was on its feet. The thunderous claps overpowered his ears. He smiled and bowed as he fought the urge to cry from sheer joy. He felt like he was in one of his lucid dreams, living out something he only ever could imagine in the back of his mind.

Under the bright white glow of the spotlight, he searched the audience.

And there, in the front row, he found his husband.

Izuku stood clapping with both hands. He was wearing the proudest smile Katsuki had ever seen. Tears gathered at his lashes, glinting like tiny stars. Katsuma was beside him, bouncing with excitement, clapping so enthusiastically his hands barely stayed aligned.

Izuku mouthed to him, "I love you."

And Katsuki mouthed, "I love you too," right back.

Third Year in Retirement

When the third year arrived, Katsuki couldn't believe so much time had passed.

How the hell had three years gone by? It felt like only a few months. But in the third year, they were fully in their stride. After his successful composition, the city symphony offered him a permanent composer-in-residence position.

He was fucking ecstatic. He got his own office and fancy name plaque. Katsuki made sure to celebrate with Izuku very specially that night. He sent Katsuma over to a friend's house and made sure his sexy husband hit inspiring, breathless high notes all damn night long.

After he got his new job, the good news kept rolling in.

Shortly after, Izuku applied and got a part time professor position at the National University of Singapore. It was perfect and complimented his other part time job as a violinist at the local ensemble. On his free days, he started working in the school of literature with an emphasis in romantic lit. His dorky course was entitled 'Echoes of Devotion: Romanticism & The Human Condition' as he analyzed ancient and contemporary texts.

"Oh, those students are going to flock to you," Katsuki joked that night in their bedroom.

He was watching Izuku fuss over which tie to wear for his first day of teaching. Izuku, fully red in the face, spluttered at the implication and pushed his shoulder.

"No, they're not! Kacchan—"

"C'mon, you know it's true," Katsuki continued with a lopsided smirk. He leaned in and toyed with the loose tie. "You have the whole pretty boy thing going on. You're going to be the hot professor on campus. All the students are going to giggle whenever you blush. And you're not going to have a single damn problem holding anyone's attention."

"…I think you're overstating my pull."

"Sure I am." Katsuki sarcastically rolled his eyes. He grabbed the ugly purple tie and yanked his husband flush against his body. "C'mere, sensei. I think I need another lesson in my Mandarin tones—"

And after the first semester, just like Katsuki said, Izuku got known as the hot professor on campus.

And to no one's surprise, his classes quickly filled up.

With the new jobs and Katsuma excelling in school, there wasn't a single day Katsuki would say was bad.

Very often, they spent their summer nights in their backyard with the three of them beneath the sprawling Singapore sky. The fire pit glowed between them, casting gold across Izuku's beautiful cheekbones and making Katsuma's wide grin even brighter.

Most nights were Katsuma telling them stories too fast to breathe. Katsuki would tease the boy until Izuku swatted his arm. But other nights were quiet. The gentle hush of the countryside would wrap around them as they laid on their backs counting constellations.

Katsuki remembered one night in particular.

Izuku had rested his head on Katsuki's shoulder, and on the other side, Katsuma had curled up into him. He wrapped his arm around them both and realized their breathing was in sync without even meaning to be.

They stayed like that for a fleeting moment.

And Katsuki wondered, if somewhere in the sky, his parents were watching over them. He knew they would be happy to see he was finally at rest too.

Fourth Year in Retirement

The fourth year arrived without fanfare.

Katsuki only realized it arrived when he looked at the calendar that morning. He made an impressive hum to himself as Izuku whipped up pan pan pancakes and Katsuma helped pack all their lunches.

When he did notice it, the only feeling he had was the soft certainty that they were living a life they once thought was impossible.

Katsuki leaned over the sheet music spread across his desk.

His pencil tapped in a restless rhythm against the margin before he dragged it into motion again. He scratched out a half measure, rewrote it, and then changed it again. He huffed as he chased the precise shape of a melody that kept hovering an inch out of reach of his imagination.

Around him, his office was entirely quiet save for the ticking clock. He settled deeper into flow, and soon the outside world shrank into nothing. Everything faded except the melody inside his head as his muscle memory worked with the familiar rhythm of creation.

He had just penciled in another shorthand chord when a knock tapped against the doorframe.

Katsuki blinked out of his trance. "Come in."

The door swung open to reveal one of the senior musicians. He was an older, broad-shouldered guy named Jun. He always had his hair tied back in a loose knot and a delighted smile on his lips.

“I hope I’m not interrupting the mad genius in action,” Jun said as he stepped inside.

Katsuki snorted. “I’m doing nothing but beating my head against a wall. What’s up?”

Jun lifted something from behind his back. It was a flat square, wrapped in crisp paper. Katsuki recognized its shape instantly.

“You got it?” he asked, grinning.

“Pressed it myself,” Jun said as he handed it over. “I kept the name obscured, just like you asked. By the way, I think this is going to make one hell of a gift.”

Katsuki peeled back the edge just enough to see the glossy black vinyl inside. It was perfectly unmarked except for a tiny gold symbol. He grinned, thinking about how much his husband was going to really fucking love this.

“Thanks, Jun, I really appreciate your help,” Katsuki said. He tucked it carefully into his bag.

Jun laughed from his belly. “You did all the hard work, Taro! I can’t wait to hear about how much Hiroji loved it.”

Katsuki grinned. “He’s gonna lose his damn mind.”

When Jun wandered off, Katsuki checked the clock. Damn. It was later than he thought. Quickly, he stood up and began to gather his things. He glanced fondly at the framed photo on his desk of him, Izuku and Katsuma together. It was a quick picture they captured right before Katsuma’s first day of 3rd grade.

He packed his notebooks into the sleek briefcase that was embossed with their surname ‘Bakugou’. His darling had gifted it to him when he got the new job—and Katsuki made sure to use it every day.

He threw on his black wool overcoat and made his way out to the parking lot.

He hopped in their family SUV and began to drive down a route he had memorized by heart. He drove with one hand on the wheel, humming the melody he’d been working on. His mind was entirely serene as he let the sunlight warm the side of his face.

Soon a familiar university came into view.

When he pulled into a space near the front, a woman with black hair immediately waved from the walkway.

“Maestro Bakugou!” She called, laughing as she approached. “Right on time as always. I wish my lazy boyfriend was half as punctual as you are.”

Katsuki leaned out the window, smirking. “Hey there, Li Hua! How’s everything going?”

“Good, good. Same ol’ same old. My students have been a handful this year, but that’s the life I chose. How about you?”

“Pretty much the same,” he said simply. “I’m here to pick up my husband, like always.”

She rolled her eyes fondly. “Then you’ll need to go to his office. Hiroji’s up there drowning in papers. Poor man hasn’t looked up once in the last two hours.”

Katsuki sharply laughed. “Figures. He’s been like that since the day I met him.”

Li Hua waved him off as she continued walking. When she was out of view, he slung his bag over his shoulder and began his trek across campus.

He took the familiar path lined with jacaranda trees. He hummed his new melody as he idyllically walked across the scattered purple blossoms under his shoes.

Along the way, a few students called his name, waving enthusiastically. Katsuki lifted a hand and returned a small smile. He recognized a couple of them because they were music majors. A lot of the orchestra students got to know him through internships at the city symphony.

When he reached Izuku’s floor, he stopped in front of the wooden door he’d seen too many times to count. He smiled to himself as he read the neat plaque that inscribed: Mr. Bakugou Hiroji — Literature Department.

Katsuki only knocked once and pushed the door open with his shoulder.

There, his darling sat at his desk basked in afternoon sun. His octagonal glasses were perched low on his nose as he scribbled notes across the margin of a student’s exam. Katsuki cracked a grin when he noticed how damn messy Izuku’s hair was. Probably from the nerd running his hand through it subconsciously over and over.

Obnoxiously, Katsuki slammed the door and locked it tight behind him.

The sound jogged Izuku out of his grading trance. He startled upright and snapped his head towards the door.

And immediately his entire face illuminated.

“Kacchan,” Izuku said, beaming so brightly Katsuki felt it infect him too. He then glanced at the clock, and a tiny gasp escaped him. “Oh shit—I’m sorry! I completely lost track of time.”

“Yeah, yeah, I can see that.”

Katsuki walked around the desk and stood over Izuku. With a toothy grin, he reached down and plucked the glasses right off Izuku’s cute nose. His husband blinked up at him, slightly blushing.

“But I know you can’t help but be a big dork,” Katsuki teased.

Right as Izuku was about to retort, Katsuki leaned down and kissed him.

Their lips met in a soft press. Katsuki smiled into it, and he could feel Izuku calmly begin too as well. He took his time, molding his mouth perfectly to Izuku’s fuller one. Then he breathed in the pleasant exhale Izuku expelled. It was light and tender, just like the life they had built together.

Izuku's hands slid up Katsuki's chest and Katsuki hummed happily as he deepened the kiss. His free hand cupped the back of Izuku's neck, thumb stroking the skin there in lazy circles. The kiss turned languid, and Izuku melted into it with a soft sigh.

"You're terrible," Izuku murmured. "I can't come up with a witty reply when you kiss me like that."

"Mhm. You love it," Katsuki replied. His low voice vibrated through their joined lips. He brushed his thumb along Izuku's cheek, tracing his freckles tenderly. Then he pulled back just an inch and with exaggerated seriousness said, "It's okay, sensei. I forgive you for being a nerd."

Izuku's laugh was breathy and sweet. His head tipped back slightly as Katsuki kissed the corner of his jaw.

"Y'know…" Katsuki hooked a finger under Izuku's tie. "We've got thirty minutes before we have to pick up Katsuma."

Izuku's eyes clouded instantly. "Thirty whole minutes?"

"Mhm. Plenty of time for a quickie," Katsuki murmured, peppering kisses along Izuku's neck. "If we're quick."

Izuku nodded so fast Katsuki was sure he turned dizzy. "Go lock the door."

Katsuki grinned. "Already did."

He leaned back in the driver's seat, one hand draped over the wheel as Izuku limped into the car with rose colored cheeks. His curls were a little mussed, and his tie was loosened in a sloppy way that made Katsuki's mouth twitch with smug satisfaction.

The moment Izuku settled in, Katsuki reached over and buckled the seatbelt for him. Along the way, he palmed Izuku's hip a little too deliberately. Immediately, his cutie of a husband swatted his hand, slightly embarrassed, but didn't stop grinning.

By the time they pulled up to Katsuma's school, Izuku had composed himself enough to look like a respectable adult—mostly. Blush still clung to the tips of his ears.

Katsuma barreled out of the school gates the second he spotted the car. He came running with his backpack bobbing and hair sticking up in every direction. He yanked open the back door and launched himself inside.

"Hi!" he greeted, excited. "Guys! Today was awesome!"

Izuku twisted in his seat. "Oh, yeah?! What happened?"

And that was all Katsuma needed to start rambling, clearly something he picked up from Izuku. He exploded into rapid-fire recollection, recounting every detail from his day. He explained how he'd painted a giant nebula in art class and then raced a classmate during recess. Then he rounded his story off with how his teacher had given him the lead in the school choir.

Izuku soaked in every word. He was smiling so wide his cheeks must've hurt.

He kept asking gentle questions while Katsuki injected with spurts of encouragement. Both of them laughed loudly whenever Katsuma got especially animated. Katsuki listened the entire ride home, glancing at Katsuma in the rearview mirror warmly.

As Katsuma talked about gym class, Katsuki's mind wandered back to the day's date. He measured the Katsuma he saw now against the quiet one he first met. And damn, he was proud of who the kid was becoming. Katsuma spoke freely and was incredibly intelligent.

And Katsuki was sure he got that from Izuku.

He glanced at Izuku when they reached a red light. His husband laughed loudly at a joke Katsuma made, and Katsuki smiled at the sound.

"No running!" Katsuki yelled as Katsuma scampered down the hall.

"Sorry, Kacchan!" Katsuma shouted back as he turned the corner. "I really have to pee!"

Katsuki sighed as Katsuma's red backpack slid across the wooden floors.

Izuku laughed as he took his shoes off. "You know he does that every day, you always act so surprised."

"I know, I just don't want the brat to slip and hurt himself. I do not want to go to the hospital again tonight."

They settled into their routine the next moment. Katsuma came back and grabbed his bag with a grin as Izuku drifted towards the couch.

Katsuki watched as Izuku took out his laptop with a soft sigh and brought out his stack of papers to grade. Beside him, Katsuma kicked his feet up and began working on his homework, idly asking questions in between lulls of silence. Izuku answered him without looking up, big ass brain fully on display.

When he felt content, Katsuki slipped into the kitchen. He rolled up his sleeves and began preparing a meal he knew would make both of his bundles of sunlight smile. He hummed lightly to himself, still mentally working on his newest commission in the back of his mind.

Floating in from the living room, he could hear Katsuma muttering through his spelling words and Izuku groaning whenever he hit a particularly tricky rubric note.

When dinner was finally ready, the house smelled of ginger and garlic.

The three of them gathered at the table with steaming plates of food. Katsuma dove in cheerfully, talking between bites. Izuku smiled at nearly everything he said, eyes soft from the long day. And Katsuki chimed in with dry remarks that made both of them snort.

If ever asked, Katsuki would say he loved this part of his day the most.

While he liked his work, he enjoyed this time with his family more.

When the plates were cleared, Katsuma brought his homework to the table and glanced at Katsuki shyly.

“Can you help me with my math homework?” He asked with a snag-a-tooth grin. “I’m having a little trouble with some of the harder questions.”

“Of course, buddy,” Katsuki said, holding out a hand.

Katsuma passed him the worksheet, and Katsuki glanced over it. He digested it easily, pointing out how to break down the problem.

Across the table, Izuku watched them fondly. And then after a while, he walked over to his briefcase and pulled out a small folder. Katsuki didn’t glance up until he heard the sound of card stock shifting. He peeked over—then paused.

“You’re still finalizing the guest list?” Katsuki asked. “I thought you finished it last week.”

Izuku glanced at him and shyly smiled. “Nana got back to me today about one more person she located. She was tough to track down, but Nana found her. And I really want her to come. I would genuinely love for you to meet her.

“Remind me, what’s her name again?”

“Ochako,” Izuku said with a radiant glint in his eye. “I just have to send this to her, and we’re all set.”

Katsuki grinned as Izuku leaned forward, hunching over the tiny invite. He prepped it exactly how the others were, using a small box of pressed flowers and golden ink. His husband began decorating the paper, carefully brushing delicate accents along the borders, his brows furrowed in concentration.

And when he finished, he held it up for Katsuki and Katsuma to see.

They both smiled as they read the calligraphy.

You are warmly invited to the wedding of Bakugou Taro and Hiroji.

We hope to see you there.

Chapter 53 — Coda

Fifth Year in Retirement

Katsuki stood in front of the dressing room mirror, muttering loudly.

His jaw clamped tight as his fingers worked his cufflinks. These damn things kept slipping—or maybe his hands were shaking. But he'd never admit the latter to anyone alive.

His tie, a blush pink, that Izuku managed to smooth talk him into, was ironed out within an inch of its life. But he ran his sweaty palms down the front once more anyways. When he flattened the tie to his liking, he moved on to his black tux and muttered loudly when he found a wrinkle.

"Dude," Denki groaned.

Katsuki cut his eye at him through the mirror. His friend was sitting cross-legged on the small couch behind him, laughing with a mouthful of mints he'd stolen from the welcome table.

"Bakugou, at this point you're going to rip your tie if you keep fussing with it," Denki lectured. "Relax. If Izuku wanted to run away from you, he would have done so a long, long time ago."

"Shut up, Pikachu," Katsuki snapped, glowering at his reflection. "It's my wedding. I need to make sure I don't look like a clown."

"But bro, you're fine," Denki insisted. "You look like the kind of guy who charges by the minute to stand there and just be hot."

Beside Denki, Shinsou sighed. He was lounging backwards with all the boredom of a house cat. He raised a brow and side-eyed Katsuki.

"Looks wise, Denki's right," Shinsou said dryly. "What I'm more concerned about is the muttering. You sound like you're doing incantations in the mirror."

Katsuki shot him a glare too but didn't stop mumbling as he straightened the lapel. "It's a habit I've picked up from Izuku. That nerd mutters to himself around the house all day long. He's even got Katsuma doing it."

"Oh, my god." Denki giggled in delight. "Wait, that's adorable! A family of mutterers!"

Shinsou tilted his head, and a lazy grin spread across his face. "So he infected you with nervous rambling. Cute. What'd he pick up from you?"

"You should hear the way he curses now," Katsuki chuckled. He snapped the cufflink into place with more force than necessary and turned towards his friends. "He sounds like a goddamn sailor these days. It makes me so proud I could cry."

Denki wheezed. "So you taught the world's sweetest man how to say 'fuck' in twelve different emotional registers?"

"Damn right I did." Katsuki grinned. "And I can't wait to see what more we'll teach each other."

"Save it for the vows," Monoma injected abruptly, walking in through the door with Sero. "I don't mean to rush you at all, but the ceremony is about to start in ten minutes. And if I remember correctly, I was tasked with keeping everyone in order because I am, and I quote, the wielder of the biggest stick up their ass?"

The room broke out in familiar, juvenile snickers.

When the tide of mirth settled down, Katsuki sighed. He turned to the mirror one last time and ran a hand through his hair. He did so carefully, so he didn't mess up the stylist's handiwork.

"Okay, okay," Katsuki groaned, feeling heat rise in his throat again. "I'll get a move on. I…I just want it to be perfect."

And to his surprise, no jokes followed. None of his friends teased him, and instead they patiently waited for him to calm down.

Without warning, the door creaked open, and everyone's head turned.

Katsuki's heart warmed when he spotted Aizawa in the doorway.

His old man blinked once, then twice, like the sight of Katsuki as a groom was the key to recalibrate his entire worldview. Everyone quieted as he walked forward. When he stopped right in front of Katsuki, a grin wider than anything any of them had ever seen graced his face.

"Retirement looks great on you, kid," he finally said.

"Thanks," Katsuki replied, eyes shining.

Aizawa reached into the inner pocket of his suit and pulled out a carefully wrapped corsage. It was the soft pink carnation with baby's breath that Izuku had made the night before for them. Aizawa opened the small box, stepped closer, and pinned it to Katsuki's suit jacket.

"You know, out of everything, this is the biggest surprise," Aizawa said, leaning back to inspect his work. "Once upon a time, I never thought I'd see you in anything other than black on black."

"Me too." Katsuki grinned lopsidedly. "Surprisingly, I didn't hate the pink when I tried it for the first time." He brushed his fingers over the pink carnation, and could hear the faint melody of his mother's laughter. "And, uh…turns out I like pink. It brings up good memories."

Aizawa's mouth tugged up.

Sero then walked up to him and slung his arm around his shoulders.

"I gotta say, Bakugou," he started with a bright grin. "We're all surprised it took you two this long to have a proper wedding. Why'd you wait so long?"

Katsuki shrugged. "We wanted to make sure it was safe first. It was important to us that everyone who mattered could be there."

"Aw, that's so heartwarming," Denki piped up. "But wow. Who knew you two had so many friends!"

"It's less than thirty people," Katsuki deadpanned.

"Exactly!" Denki laughed. "Color me impressed!"

Katsuki shook his head but chuckled. As familiar laughter circled around the room, his nerves calmed ever so slightly. Subdued excitement replaced some of his jittering, and he steadied himself while looking at his friends.

"Okay, it's time," Monoma said, slapping his shoulder. "Let's get this killer married."

Katsuki edged up to the curtain and drew the fabric back by an inch.

The rooftop garden was staged exactly as Izuku planned. All around, soft pastels swept through the space in breathtaking harmony. Pink, orange, blue, and green drifted through the draped curtains and across the tables. Petals of pink carnations lay scattered over the floor, leading toward the aisle. And waiting there were rows of golden chairs flanking a long white runner that was as pristine as fresh snowfall.

Everyone was already seated and dressed in the spring palette they requested for the guest attire. The entire crowd glowed in bright colors that made the space feel like the first inhale of fresh air. And above it all, the sun hovered on the brink of descent. It was not quite a sunset, only slightly washing the sky in pinks and amber.

Katsuki's gaze swept anxiously over the scene.

He watched as his mixed-matched friends took their seats, and their other colorful guests chatted casually. Then somewhere in the first row, Nana caught him peeking. She lifted her hand in a graceful little wave.

Katsuki gave a stiff return wave before retreating behind the curtain.

And then—

The first notes of a violin drifted into the air.

A viola followed perfectly on cue. The melody grew, budding into a romantic ballad that hushed the chattering crowd.

Katsuki drew in one last breath, nerves spiking. He closed his eyes and tried to calm himself. Without saying a word, he touched the pink carnation above his heart. He felt his mother's presence and could feel her comforting hands steady him.

And as he imagined her, an actual hand rested firmly on his shoulder.

He half turned, and there was Aizawa, ready to go. His old man nodded at him once, and they exchanged brief nods.

"Ready?" Aizawa asked.

"Ready," Katsuki replied.

And with a leap of faith, they crossed the threshold.

The sound of the strings amplified, and the soft golden sun spilled across their faces. Katsuki smiled as all eyes turned to them. Aizawa held his head high as he walked beside Katsuki down the aisle. And through it all, Katsuki felt the presence of his parents too. He could sense his mother and father holding his hand from the other side, guiding him.

The wedding guests rose row by row as they passed down the aisle.

Several familiar faces came into focus: the loony old violinist, the Midnight Sento workers, and their colorful Paradise Crew from Okinawa.

Katsuki grinned as Kirishima and Mina excitedly waved from their seats next to Momo and Jirou. He then saw Shouto and Inasa sitting in the crowd, smiling at them too. Sekijiro and Nemuri's eyes lit up as he passed. And then Takeyama and Ryuko wiped tears from their eyes. He even spotted some of their new friends they've made in Singapore. Several of Izuku's work friends were here, and half of the city symphony staff had joined.

By the time he reached the officiant's side, his heart felt too big for his chest.

Aizawa took his seat next to Miruko and coolly folded his hands. Katsuki straightened his cufflinks once more and double-checked that his tie was straight. And soon as he finished, the music shifted.

It transformed into airy notes, as if the dusk itself began to sing.

Katsuki looked up. And his whole world stilled.

Izuku appeared at the end of the aisle, but not alone. Katsuma walked beside him, dressed in a tiny pink suit and white tie. His small fingers clasped tightly around Izuku's, and he had the biggest grin on his face.

And Izuku—

Oh, Izuku.

His darling remained the most magnificent man he's ever laid eyes on.

He matched Katsuki in a black tux, blush-pink tie, and a pink carnation corsage pinned above his heart. His dark curls framed his face, catching the fading light. He glowed beneath the sinking sun, honey-kissed skin richer from five years in the tropics.

And Izuku's gorgeous eyes drifted to him the way a tide always follows the moon.

The sight comforted Katsuki so quickly that all his nerves vanished.

His whole body loosened, soothed into a stillness only Izuku could give to him. And as his love moved down the aisle toward him, Katsuki wondered why he'd been so nervous at all. It had always been Izuku at the end of every road he'd chosen. And it would always be Izuku, the man he would chase through hell a thousand times to simply hold his hand.

Katsuki didn't even realize he was crying until the tears slipped free.

And as always, Izuku mirrored him. His darling let out a breathless, nervous laugh as he cried too.

Then, Izuku was standing right in front of him, close enough to touch. Katsuma peeled away toward his seat beside Nana, leaving the two of them standing at the altar underneath the arch of pink flowers.

Katsuki raised his hand at the same time Izuku did. Their thumbs brushed each other's cheeks, wiping away tears neither bothered to hide. And as they looked into each other's eyes, everything around Katsuki disappeared, leaving only Izuku as the center of his universe.

Katsuki never wanted to take his eyes off him.

The officiant began as the violin and viola faded off.

"Family, friends, and all gathered here to witness this union," she began. Her eyes scintillated as she glanced between the two lovers. "We stand under the open sky, in the last golden breath of the day, to celebrate a love that has endured but always persisted."

Katsuki held Izuku's hands as they looked into each other's eyes.

"Love," the officiant continued, "is not simply the warmth that blooms in the heart. It is discipline, courage, and devotion. It is the willingness to grow beside another soul and hold their darkness, their light, their sorrow, and their joy. Today, you vow not only to love, but to choose each other over and over, every day forward."

He turned to Izuku. "Hiroji, your vows."

Izuku kept his gaze focused on Katsuki's like nothing else existed.

"Taro," he said, and Katsuki broke into a small smile at their false names. "You have seen me at my worst and still offered me a place at your side. You have forgiven me in ways that can only come from someone with a pure, loving heart. Because even when I can't forgive myself, you're there to remind me I'm worth more than the bad things I've done. You chose me long before I ever believed I was worth choosing."

Izuku's breath shuddered as he continued.

"And I vow to always grow with you," he said with a smile. "Even when growth is painful. I vow to live, truly live, because you taught me that surviving is not the same as being alive. And I vow to stay, not out of obligation, but because my heart has always known that being beside yours is where it belongs."

Izuku's voice wavered slightly. More tears slipped freely down his cheeks.

"I vow to be your partner, your equal, and your home. Today and every day that follows."

Katsuki's throat tightened so hard he nearly choked. Around them, several guests were already sniffling. Katsuma openly wiped his face with both sleeves.

"Lovely," the officiant said with a smile. She then gave Katsuki a nod. "Taro, now your vows."

Katsuki drew a sharp breath. It took all he had to keep his voice steady as he cupped Izuku's hands inside his own.

“Hiroji,” he said lovingly. “You saved me from a life where I thought being strong meant sitting in solitude and anger. You taught me that loving someone doesn’t make you weaker, and that romance is one of the most beautiful, intimate things another person can give to you. And you showed me that love can forge you into someone who is wise, and that is what actual strength is.”

Katsuki swallowed hard and smiled.

“And I promise to protect you, but not because you need a shield. But because loving you means protecting the world we’re choosing to build together. I promise to fight to be better, every damn day, because you deserve the best version of me.”

Katsuki affectionately squeezed Izuku’s hands.

“And I promise,” he continued slightly softer, “to love you fiercely. I want to continue building a life with you where softness isn’t wrong. I want you to always feel certain that you can be gentle, without ever having to question if you should be.”

A tear escaped him.

“I vow to stand with you, darling,” he rasped. “I’ll walk beside you in every ugly, beautiful, terrifying, and brilliant moment of our lives. You are my partner. My future. My fate. And I will always find my way back to you, again and again…”

“…and again,” Izuku finished with him. “And I promise to always come back to you too.”

The entire crowd broke down in tears with them. Nana was openly dabbing her face with a handkerchief, Denki was crying uncontrollably into Shinsou’s shoulder, and Aizawa subtly brushed at his eyes. Even Nemuri tried her best not to cry off her mascara but was failing miserably.

“May we have the rings?” the officiant asked gently.

Katsuma hopped forward. He held up a tiny box, and sitting inside on a small silk cushion were two simple golden rings that matched the metal of their eternity rings. Katsuki picked up one first, and his hands didn’t shake.

He slid the golden ring onto Izuku’s finger, stacking it perfectly on top of the eternity ring made of rubies. Izuku took the second ring and slipped it onto Katsuki’s finger, mirroring the same with the eternity ring made of emeralds.

And when they were done, their ring fingers shone as brightly as their devotion.

The officiant smiled. “By the power entrusted to me, I pronounce you husbands! You may kiss!”

Katsuki didn’t wait to be told twice.

Right as the sun set, they both leaned in at the same time. Exquisite golden light spilled over them as their lips met and the crowd erupted into cheers.

Katsuki kissed Izuku as if he were made of precious memories. He stroked his cheek like he were touching him for the first time. It was an eloquent, majestic kiss and soft in a way that Katsuki knew he could be with his husband. Izuku's eyes drifted shut, and he gingerly tilted his head to kiss Katsuki deeply. Izuku threaded his fingers carefully through blond hair, letting himself get carried through the kiss like a ship carried off into the endless abyss.

When they finally parted, they were glowing the same as the glorious horizon.

All around them, shouts, applause, and laughter filled the atmosphere. Several people demanded an encore, and others whistled loudly.

But Katsuki only saw Izuku.

And Izuku only saw him.

Night had settled over the rooftop garden, and fairy-lights swallowed the last traces of dusk. Strings of gentle golden bulbs wove between the trellises, lighting the tables in an intimate glow. Sea air drifted through the venue, carrying the muted sound of waves far below.

Katsuki and Izuku were at the head table, privately laughing between each other with their hands intertwined.

Around them, all their wedding guests sat with freshly warm plates of their dinner. They had picked out something they thought everyone would like: coconut cashew chicken as a starter with salad. And for the main course, grilled lemon chicken accompanied by roasted potatoes and seasoned vegetables.

Katsuki grinned as he took a swig of 'his' signature cocktail for the evening. It was a spicy grapefruit paloma that was tinted orange. In contrast, Izuku's signature drink was a pink and red 'sex on the beach' cocktail. All their wedding guests got to choose either or, and from the look of it, it was split down the middle in popularity.

As the dinner moved on with live music from the small live ensemble, Katsuki leaned over and whispered in Izuku's ear.

"Whenever you're ready, you can start the speeches," he said.

Izuku nodded and grabbed his cup. With a graceful pose, he stood up and clinked his fork against his glass. The response he got was a chorus of clinks and yelps from their group cheering and smiling at them. When Izuku raised his cup, the whole rooftop quieted down.

"Taro and I wanted to thank you all for coming," Izuku announced with a handsome smile. "We couldn't have imagined this day without you—any of you." He turned and beamed at all their guests. "I've been dreaming of this day ever since I first laid eyes on my husband here, when we were only seven years old."

He laughed, and a couple of chuckles bounced around.

“Back then, I thought it meant we got to spend all our time together,” Izuku continued. “And that was enough for little me. But now that we’re actually here, I realize younger me wasn’t too far off. There’s no one in the world I would rather spend all my days with.”

Katsuki stood next, grinning like a fool. He took Izuku’s hand in his and lifted his glass.

“That’s a bit of a hard one to follow,” Katsuki joked, and a couple of laughs chimed in. “I’m sure everyone knows by now Hiroji is the one who’s better with words. But we wanted to open the floor to all of you for speeches. We know some of you have something prepared, so we wanted to give you all the chance to go crazy.”

“But not too crazy!” Izuku amended with a sheepish smile. “Please keep it PG! We have a ten year old here—”

“I am nearly eleven!” Katsuma shouted.

“Point still stands,” Izuku shot back sternly.

Everyone laughed, and in the midst of the commotion, Aizawa stood first.

He walked to the center of the small dance floor and looked around. Everyone quieted as he cleared his throat and held up his cup.

“I’ll do my best to keep this short,” Aizawa began. He looked at Katsuki first, then Izuku. “I’ve watched you two survive more than most people could bear, and still you pushed on. You rebuilt your life into something more beautiful than ever imaginable.” His mouth twitched in an attempt at a smile. “I can’t wait for all your new adventures. You’ve both made me unbelievably proud of how far you’ve come.”

The crowd applauded, hushed but heartfelt.

Then suddenly, Monoma stood with a smug look. Katsuki scoffed, and the two of them exchanged innocuous eye rolls that were filled with brotherly affection.

“Alright, my turn,” Monoma announced, posing himself in the most obnoxious way imaginable. “I want to say, I’m so glad you two got your happy ending. I knew from the way you two looked at each other that it was meant to be. And like Kat—I mean Taro.” He grimaced. “Like Taro said earlier, a bond like this is worth protecting. If anyone thinks they can jeopardize your peace now—I’ll break their legs. And their arms.” He paused and tilted his head thoughtfully. “And probably their spirits. So. Cheers to you.”

Shouto and Inasa exchanged bewildered, worried glances.

Sero laughed loudly while Denki and Shinsou chuckled. A handful of guests applauded like this was exactly what they expected of him. But their friends from Okinawa and here in Singapore were clearly perplexed. Nevertheless, they clapped with the rest of the crowd as Monoma took his seat.

Denki stood next, already blotting his oncoming tears with a napkin.

“Man, where to even begin.” He sniffed. He raised his glass with a trembling hand. “I mean, look at you guys. You’re like, so in love!” He sobbed and sighed dreamily. “Taiwan feels like only yesterday. Back then, you two couldn’t even be in the same room without making others fear for their safety.” His voice pitched upward. “I’m so happy for you!”

He burst into another round of tears, and several tables laughed affectionately.

Next, Nana stood.

She didn’t raise her glass right away. Instead, she studied Izuku. Then she shifted her gaze to Katsuki.

“Taro and Hiroji,” she began tenderly. “I’m so happy to see how far you two have come. I tried to write this speech several times over and over, and it ended up being several pages too long. But what I want to say is, I hope your marriage is full of calm nights, and cheerful mornings. I hope you have more happy memories than you could ever count, and I’m so glad I got to help a love like this come true.”

Both Izuku and Katsuki bowed their heads to her. She lifted her glass, and they returned the gesture.

And finally, a small, brown-haired woman stood up.

She had rosy cheeks and chestnut-colored eyes. The tears in her eyes resembled tiny stars as her floral print dress swayed with the wind. She nervously took to the center of the floor with her drink. Her eyes landed on Izuku, and that’s when Katsuki realized that this must’ve been Ochako.

“I wasn’t sure if I should speak,” she began softly. “Taro, it’s great to finally meet you.”

Katsuki laughed and raised his glass. “Likewise.”

She looked at Izuku with soft, adoring eyes.

“Hiroji,” she whispered. “I’m so glad to see you again. Words can’t capture how much joy it brings me to see you. And it brings me even more joy to see you standing with the love of your life.” She turned her gaze to Katsuki. “I never believed in fairytales. I…I cast all that aside when I was young and saw how harsh the world was. But when I met Hiroji—”

She paused and blinked away the tears.

“The way he spoke about you, Taro, it made me think love was real,” Ochako whispered. “And if someone were to ask me if soulmates exist, you two would be the first example as proof I would use.” She raised her glass. “To a love that always finds its way back home.”

Everyone’s glasses lifted and overlapping voices mingled. And all around, the rooftop glowed in the light of love and happiness.

“To Hiroji and Taro,” Ochako toasted.

And everyone clinked their drinks and roared.

“I think it’s time for the first dance!” Sero shouted, and a loud whoop followed from Denki.

Katsuki and Izuku laughed but still made their way to the center of the dance floor. Right when they were directly in the middle, someone in the crowd got up. When Katsuki focused on the figure, it was Souta.

The loony elder man was far more hunched than the last time they saw him, but still fairly energetic. Katsuki was more than happy Souta responded to their letter, and it felt like the final touch on their wedding.

Souta’s eyes crinkled as he strolled over to the orchestra and picked up the spare violin.

“And now, I will play my all time favorite composition,” Souta announced. “It is called The Dance of The Lovebirds. Without Taro and Hiroji, it would have never been made. This is my gift to them, for the rest of their lives.”

He closed his eyes, lifted his instrument and the mood shifted. Ethereal waves of sound careened through the rooftop, and behind him the singular viola joined him. Their instruments spun together in the night air, making the song that brought them together.

And the two lovebirds danced.

Katsuki slipped one hand around Izuku’s waist, drawing him into the passionate rhythm of the music. Izuku’s free hand found Katsuki’s shoulder. They twirled, completely swept away. Every step they took with the inflection felt like floating through the stars. Their foreheads brushed. Their breaths mingled. And behind them, the endless city lights twinkled in harmony with the constellations above.

Izuku grinned serenely as Katsuki guided him through a turn. His eyes reflected the moon above as he stared up at Katsuki.

“This feels unreal after such a long time,” Izuku whispered.

Katsuki pulled his darling husband close enough that their chests pressed together. Their hearts lined up in perfect sync to make a single, unified rhythm. Katsuki rested his head on Izuku’s and smiled continually as they swayed.

“We were worth the wait,” Katsuki murmured.

The orchestra played on. Their song rose with overwhelming emotion as they floated through the starlit garden.

Katsuki and Izuku stood pressed together in front of a wedding cake. It was three tiers of white, gold, and the shade of pink that matched their ties. It had edible glitter all around its edges, and crowning it was a cluster of sugar made pink carnations.

Everyone cheered loudly in sheer excitement as they picked up the knife together at the same time.

Izuku placed his hand over Katsuki's, guiding the knife through their wedding cake with a blissful smile. The moment they pressed down together, the crowd flared up with encouragement and whistles.

Miruko shouted, "Good job not crushing the cake, Taro!"

Sero immediately followed with, "Yeah. You're really a reformed man now!"

Katsuki rolled his eyes, and Izuku laughed. His husband leaned into him as they maneuvered together seamlessly. When they pulled back, the slice came away a perfect slice. The staff then divided the cake, and smiles gleamed all around as the dessert was served, devoured, and praised with sticky fingers.

Izuku took a delicate bite of the cake and lit up instantly. "The strawberry was a perfect choice."

"Of course you'd say that," Katsuki laughed as he sampled his own slice. "You're obsessed with strawberries."

"And you're obsessed with Boston doughnuts," Izuku shot back. He jutted his chin towards the dessert table where an entire pyramid of them sat stacked. "Tell me, was it really necessary to dedicate an entire table to your addiction?"

Katsuki's grin sharpened. "What can I say?" He plucked the one from his plate and sank his teeth into it. He then squeezed it just enough for the custard to spill over his thumb. "I've always loved a good cream filling."

Izuku shoved his playfully shoulder, laughing. "You're so crude."

After that, the night deepened and the proper celebration ignited.

Upbeat, deafening pop music pulsed through the venue's speakers. Rich bass flooded beneath the lively lyrics. All their guests spilled onto the dance floor and intermingled.

Katsuki snickered as Mina dragged Shinsou by his wrist when she spotted him standing by himself. Off to the side, Shouto attempted to sway with a rhythmic stiffness that made Inasa beam with pride. Denki spun Sero around until both nearly toppled onto a table.

Katsuki and Izuku barely made it three steps onto the dance floor before they were intercepted.

"Surprise!" Mina squealed, appearing with Eijiro beside her. Both of their hands were hidden behind their back. "We got you guys a very special present! We couldn't wait to see your faces, so we wanted to show you now!"

Both Izuku and Katsuki's eyebrows shot up, and they grinned in amusement.

“Sure thing!” Izuku laughed. “Let’s see it!”

Then, with all the theatrical flair of a Broadway cast, Mina and Eijiro at the same time revealed glittering white tracksuits, one in each of their hands. Katsuki’s face fell, appalled when he caught sight of the sparkly bedazzled letters that were positioned straight across the backside.

On one pair it read: NEWLY.

And on the other: WEDS.

Izuku choked, and Katsuki shook his head.

“Absolutely fucking not,” Katsuki said curtly, putting his hand up. “Those things are hideous.”

“I actually think they’re perfect,” Izuku said while hysterically laughing. “Thank you! Really. Thank you both so much!”

Katsuki whirled on his husband as Izuku, the damn traitor, grabbed the one in his size. Izuku grinned gratefully at the Ashido-Kirishimas, who were grinning triumphantly.

“We figured you’d need something empowering and manly!” Eijiro chuckled with a puffed out chest. “We made it just for you! It’s a one-of-a-kind set, so you two can look like the power couple you are when you hit the gym!”

Katsuki muttered, “Yeah, because nothing says ‘power’ like rhinestones glued to my ass.”

“You’re welcome, Taro,” Mina said sweetly. “You’ll find a little dazzle keeps you feeling fresh.”

Izuku hugged her tightly, and they both joked about the tracksuit’s potential. And before either groom could comment further, Momo and Jirou slipped in beside them. Momo wrapped both men in a warm, friendly hug.

“It’s so nice to all be reunited!” Momo said cheerily. “We didn’t think we’d ever hear from you two again after you left the Paradise Crew group chat. But I guess it makes sense why. You two relocated all the way to Singapore! What a big move!”

“Sorry for the disappearance,” Katsuki laughed. “We’ll make it up to you and host some time for the holidays. We just had to make sure we got our wrinkles worked out.”

“Yeah,” Izuku added. “We really wanted a fresh start after Okinawa. And moving was probably the best decision we made.”

“Aw,” Jirou said in a sweet tone. “It sounds like you two took up the couples’ counseling suggestion. You seem much better in tune with each other now.”

Izuku and Katsuki laughed awkwardly, exchanging quick sideways glances.

“Yup,” Katsuki said. “Counseling has really helped us sort out all our problems.”

“We do have a really great therapist,” Izuku quickly offered. “She’s really amazing at helping Taro get in touch with his emotions more, and she’s been helping me speak up more for myself.”

Instantly, Momo’s eyes lit up, absolutely filled with glee. She clasped her hands together and said, “I love to hear that! I can see the effort you guys put in is really coming through. You two are absolutely glowing!”

Then, right on cue, Shouto and Inasa approached. Inasa boomed congratulations so loud it nearly rattled the lights above. Following him up, Shouto offered a cooler, but no less sincere smile.

“Congratulations on your re-marriage,” Shouto teased. He raised his spicy Paloma to them and happily gestured at the dancing crowd. “I have to say, you two know a great group of people. The speeches tonight were, how did you put it, Inasa?”

“Tear-jerking!” Inasa bellowed proudly.

Shouto nodded. “Yes, tear-jerking. And some others were…interesting.”

Katsuki stiffly laughed. “Sorry about that. Our friends are a handful.”

“A good problem to have.” Shouto grinned. “But if you don’t mind my asking, I do have a more personal question.”

“Ask away,” Izuku replied with a welcoming smile.

“What made you decide to marry again?” Shouto asked. “You guys didn’t get divorced or something, did you?”

Izuku easily took the lead. “I got the idea from Mina that night we all got wasted. I couldn’t stop thinking about what she said that night, and I thought it was so beautiful.” He turned to Katsuki and stared up at him with lovesick eyes. “I would marry my Taro a thousand times over.”

Mina clapped dramatically. “Really?! You liked my idea?!”

“We did,” Izuku replied, beaming at her. “We thought it was so romantic and decided it’s something we should do.”

Mina preened. She immediately then lifted her left hand to show off a glimmering stack of six wedding rings to the group. Everyone was immediately awestruck by the different metals, shapes, and gemstones that fit together flawlessly.

“Damn,” Katsuki said. He whistled at the myriad of diamonds. “Talk about a tower of commitment.”

“We’ve gotten married twelve times,” Mina declared proudly. “Ei gives me a new ring every ceremony.”

Eijiro slid an arm around her waist and grinned. “We have another scheduled for two years out. For our thirteenth wedding, you’re all invited!”

The circle erupted in laughter.

The night continued with the music staying on an upbeat string of bops. Katsuki danced his heart away with his darling as their friends and family danced too.

People drifted toward the bar for refills, weaving through pockets of laughter as the night deepened. Everyone’s dazzling outfits caught the light, sequins winking like scattered stars. Katsuki let himself slip into the rhythm of it all. He moved in a state of flow with his palm resting on the small of Izuku’s back as they danced together.

It didn’t take long for the Midnight Sento crew to approach them. They were all practically glowing with radiant smiles and lambent attire.

Nemuri was stunning in her lavender silk dress. But the biggest surprise to Katsuki was Takeyama, who was holding her hand. Katsuki slyly smirked at Nemuri, who winked at him and pulled Takeyama closer. Behind them, Ryuko followed. She was sweating from dancing, and Sekijiro was accompanied by a woman whom they’ve never seen.

She was tall, elegant and possessed the kind of smile that could charm even someone as jaded as Aizawa.

“I have to say, Sekijiro refuses to shut up about you,” she teased, offering both men a hand to shake. “I’m Noriko, Sekijiro’s partner!”

“Ah, so glad to put a face to the name,” Izuku replied, shaking her hand with enthusiasm. “So glad to have you here with us to celebrate!”

“I have to say,” Katsuki added with a charming smile. “Sekijiro’s cooking is really good. I haven’t been able to replicate that lumpia that he cooked for us. No joke, I swear I daydream about it all the damn time.”

“It’s a secret recipe!” Sekijiro laughed, full and hearty. He clamped a hand on Katsuki’s shoulder. “Please, you have to come stay with us sometime in the Philippines. I’ll make sure to cook it every day for you.”

“Careful,” Katsuki warned with good-natured arrogance. “I’m the kind of man who actually takes people up on things.”

“Excellent,” Sekijiro replied, overly delighted. “Then we’ll have to get you a bed ready!”

The group drifted into more chatter. Nemuri hugged Izuku so tight it hurt, and Takeyama and Ryuko congratulated them on the beautiful wedding.

As the group drifted, another tide of dances and loud well-wishes swept them away. Katsuki and Izuku became pressed together in a circle full of cheers, and at some point, his damn knuckle-headed friends got drunk enough to lift them up in chairs. Much to Katsuki's surprise, they succeeded. He and Izuku laughed in both terror and excitement as M-Unit lifted them in the middle of the dance circle.

When the crowd settled down slightly again, the newlyweds found a small, quiet corner away from the drunken pandemonium. They laughed to themselves as they watched Aizawa loosen his tie and shimmy his shoulders.

"I hope someone is recording this," Katsuki snickered. "Oh, this is fucking priceless."

Small, innocent footsteps came up behind them.

They both turned when the person came close, and to their surprise, Ochako stood a few paces away. She was clutching a tiny purse to her chest, and her innocent, dove-like eyes were filled with astonishment. She drank in the sight of Izuku, and gradually, Izuku's smile fell into a heavier emotion. Both of their faces filled with overwhelming relief as they both stepped forward.

Katsuki's heart melted as they collided in an embrace. Izuku folded himself into her arms, and his own circled her. They held each other there, and when they both pulled back, everything felt calmer.

Ochako broke the silence first. She laughed through her tears and quickly wiped them away.

"I'm so happy you're safe," she said with a grin. "I couldn't believe it when I got the letter in the mail. Izuku, you look so handsome, and you're smiling. This all feels like some sort of dream."

Izuku's smile spread wider. "We have to catch up. There's a lot I left out of my letter. But I'm so happy to see you're doing well too. I was so worried about you."

"Good thing we have each other's numbers now. I'm going to be calling you all the time."

Ochako turned to Katsuki then, and instantaneously, he straightened. His hands dropped casually into his pockets, and his posture eased to show his full attention.

"It's really nice to meet you, Katsuki," she offered with a small, nervous bow of her head. "I've heard so much about you that it sort of feels like I already met you? I hope that isn't too weird!"

Katsuki bowed respectfully too. "Same to you. Izuku told me everything." He smiled admiringly. "Thank you for being Izuku's friend when he needed someone the most. And also thank you for…"

Carefully, Katsuki glanced around. To his relief, everyone was distracted on the dance floor getting extra drinks as Denki stole the show in the middle of a dance-off with Katsuma.

Katsuki dropped his voice below a whisper and said, “Thank you for getting Izuku that anti-venom. I wish there was a way to repay you. If there’s anything you need, let me know and I’ll do my hardest to make it happen.”

Ochako’s eyes stretched, and she shook her head vigorously with her hands up.

“Oh, that’s not necessary!” She laughed nervously. “You don’t owe me anything. The jewelry Izuku gave me was enough money to safely move my family and cut all our ties with the Yakuza. If anything, I’m indebted to you two. But honestly, I’m simply overjoyed he’s alive, and I’m glad he’s living out his dreams.”

“Ochako, you have to come visit us sometime,” Izuku then said. Bubbly enthusiasm lifted his voice. “It would be really wonderful if you stayed with us for a week. We can show you around Singapore, and I would love for you to get to know my little brother, Katsuma. It would be really nice to reconnect fully.”

“I’d love that,” Ochako replied. “Tell me when, and I’ll make it work!”

And from there, the night continued with good vibes.

Izuku and Ochako bonded further, and it was as if no years had ever divided them. Katsuki could tell that it was going to be a friendship for the ages, and he was glad Izuku had found someone like her in all the mess.

Eventually, they rejoined their friends on the dance floor. And soon after, they let themselves be carried by the gaudy pop music. Katsuki danced as if it would be his last night on earth, and grinned every time someone’s camera flashed bright in his face.

He wasn’t sure when the hours began slipping through his fingers.

Maybe it was during Izuku’s silly laugh against his shoulder. Or perhaps it was when Katsuma tugged Shinsou into an impromptu dance that made everyone cheer. But somewhere between the smiles, the music, and the delight of existing together in the same lifetime, the evening transformed into a hell of a night to remember.

When the night thinned and the last of the music faded, the evening closed out.

The background sound of the city echoed behind them as their guests drifted to the elevators. The rooftop garden emptied by steady degrees. First, the embraces, then the final congratulations. It kept going until at last they were all ushered gently through the glass doors down to the street level.

As they walked outside, Katsuki laced his fingers with Izuku’s.

He was prepared to say his last farewells to his friends when suddenly the crowd in front of them slowed. A collective whisper rose, spiking confusion.

Katsuki was about to ask what was wrong, but then the crowd parted for them.

He stopped in his tracks.

Waiting at the curb was a small white buggy. It was polished to a perfect glossy luster and decorated with hundreds of white orchids. A string of tin bells hung in looping arcs across the back, and on its rear was a sign written in cursive font: Just Married.

A driver stood by the open door, and stacked neatly behind him were two pieces of luggage.

Izuku stammered, eyes going as big as moons.

“Kacchan,” he whispered only for him to hear. “Did you get us a car?”

“No, this wasn’t me,” Katsuki muttered, equally floored.

Suddenly, Nana stepped forward with a guilty smile. Aizawa stood beside her with his hands buried in his pants pockets. He was trying, and really fucking failing, to look like he wasn’t pleased with himself.

“Surprise!” Nana said, full of playfulness. “It wouldn’t be a wedding if you didn’t have a honeymoon to go with it! You two are heading straight to the airport now.”

Katsuki and Izuku were taken aback.

Quickly, Izuku opened his mouth to retort, but Aizawa beat him to the punch.

“It’s already a done deal. We conspired with your little brother,” Aizawa explained with a wink to the kid. Katsuma cheerfully laughed and gave a thumbs up. “This was all his idea, by the way. He got a hold of the phone and told us you two were skipping out on a destination honeymoon in place of a staycation because you didn’t want to leave him alone.”

“We thought it would be better to stay around,” Izuku tried to explain, still in shock. “We don’t have anyone to babysit—”

“—Nana says she’ll stay with me!” Katsuma chimed happily. He skipped up to the elder woman and hugged her side. He smiled up at her with the sweetest expression in his eyes. “I really want to spend time with her too. I’ve missed her a lot!”

Nana smiled and wrapped an arm around Katsuma. “We got it covered. You two go relax on a beach.”

Katsuki frowned. “But hold on, we don’t have our stuff—”

“Oh my god,” Monoma groaned loudly. He dramatically shoved Katsuki and Izuku toward the car. “Please, you two go. Everything is packed for you. Your kid nabbed everything while you two were fussing over hairspray brands this morning.”

Izuku whipped his head towards Katsuma. “Is that true?”

“It is,” Katsuma responded proudly. “All your things are packed in the bags. I triple-checked, and then Aizawa double-checked!”

“The driver has the flight tickets,” Aizawa clarified. “Wallets, keys, and passports are in the smaller suitcase along with the resort itinerary.”

Katsuma then scurried up to Katsuki and tugged at the hem of his blazer. He pulled Katsuki down to his height and quietly whispered in his ear, “Don’t worry, I put your surprise in the big bag! It’s wrapped and everything.”

Katsuki raised a brow at Katsuma. “You sneaky little brat.”

“Now enough fussing,” Monoma said. “The flight leaves in two hours. You need to enjoy a proper honeymoon that doesn’t involve me and Shinsou kicking in the door.”

Shinsou chuckled slightly. “Yeah. You two earned it.”

Katsuki was speechless. He looked around, and everyone was grinning. His smile twitched into a reluctant but amused smirk.

“I can’t believe you guys are forcing us on vacation,” Katsuki said. “You’ve all teamed up against us.”

“Damn right we have,” Denki snickered. “Now go have a good time!”

Katsuki glanced at Izuku, who was processing the shock too. They squeezed each other’s hands and began hugging all their guests, one by one. The couple said goodbye and exchanged numbers with the people in their lives they would soon see again.

They walked towards the buggy and, like gentle snow, small tiny petals rained down on them. Katsuki grinned as he peered back and saw everyone surprise them with more and more petals. Roses, orchids and carnations floated in the air before landing in their hair, their clothes, and across the pavement at their feet as they walked to the car.

Katsuki helped Izuku climb into the back seat and joined him with a matching smile.

They turned toward their people one last time.

Katsuma was at the very front, held gently by Nana. He waved both hands with unrestrained enthusiasm, then puckered his lips and blew them an exaggerated kiss. Izuku wiped a tear with the back of his wrist and blew a kiss back. Katsuki followed suit, and their little boy cackled with delight.

The driver closed their door, stepped around, and settled into the front seat.

Outside the window, Sero lifted an arm high. Denki whistled. Miruko gave a peace sign. Aizawa offered a subtle nod that somehow felt louder than all the rest. Ochako waved lovingly, while behind her everyone else saw them off.

It was a send-off drenched in love.

The buggy pulled away from the curb with an electric purr. Izuku leaned into Katsuki’s shoulder with their hands entwined. Along the way, their eternity rings caught the passing streetlights with sharp shimmers.

And behind them, the ‘Just Married’ sign swung gently.

Izuku sighed happily as he kicked his legs across Katsuki’s lap.

He leaned his head back as the sun beat down on his skin, soaking in all the rays. He adjusted his large sunhat on his head once more before taking a small, delighted sip of his Piña colada.

“You’ve had three of those things now,” Katsuki said without looking up from the romance novel he was nose deep in. He rested a hand on Izuku’s leg and traced little hearts against his shin. “Do you want another? I could use a refill too.”

Izuku smiled at his husband. “Let’s get one before we head back to our suite. I want to soak in the views a little more.”

Katsuki turned to him with crinkled eyes. “Take your time, no rush at all.”

Izuku hummed as he leaned back some more. He glanced around at the beach they were on, loving the sight before him. Lazy palm trees swayed in the wind beside the clear blue Visayan Sea. Izuku listened to the sound of seagulls as the wind blew harder.

He looked up at their colorful umbrellas and then returned his gaze to his husband. In that exact moment, Katsuki’s mouth tugged upwards on the side as if something in the book amused him. Izuku then appreciated the way sunlight caught his beautiful blond hair. It always magically turned each strand into a stroke of gold leaf.

They finished their drinks unhurriedly, then finally rose from their sun-beds.

They strolled hand in hand across the warm sand toward the bar for one last round. The bartender recognized them by now and grinned. He slid over two Piña coladas decorated with bright slices of pineapple and miniature pink umbrellas.

From there, the day was a mesh of sun, sea, and smiles.

They hiked. They relaxed.

They even did couples’ yoga in the tracksuits Mina and Eijiro gifted to them.

And through it all, Izuku somehow fell deeper in love.

Maybe it was because with every moment he was reminded why he adored his husband so much. Katsuki always took into account what he said, and as always treated him like an equal. It was nice being in a relationship where mutual respect was the foundation. And Izuku always made sure to return the same respect too. It was a lovely balance.

When the day was at its end, they retired to the honeymoon suite.

Izuku plopped down on the bed, red rose petals fluttering with the light bounce.

“Okay,” he laughed. “I’m mad at Katsuma for pulling one over on us, but he had a great idea.”

“Yeah, that kid is too smart for his own good,” Katsuki laughed too. “But I’ll give him a big thanks when we get back.”

Izuku sighed into the fluffy white comforter. He curled into it with a content hum and ran his fingers across the soft, floral scented sheets.

As Izuku snuggled into the bed, he curiously eyed the vinyl record player next to the nightstand. When they first arrived, Katsuki requested it at the front desk. Originally, Izuku didn’t think much of it because he was so shocked Nana had booked such a nice resort. But now, he wondered why had Katsuki asked for it?

Right as he was about to inquire, Katsuki cleared his throat.

Izuku lifted his head and turned.

His heart stuttered.

Katsuki was standing in front of him, holding a giant white box with a viridian bow.

“Surprise,” Katsuki said with a toothy grin. “I know we already exchanged gifts, but I couldn’t resist getting you a second one.”

Izuku laughed, stunned. “Kacchan, you didn’t need to do that.”

“I know, but I wanted to. This one is different.”

He handed Izuku the box, and they smiled sweetly at each other. They sat down on the edge of the bed together, red rose petals all around them. With a flick of his hand, Izuku carefully unfurled the bow and opened the box up. And when he saw what was sitting inside, the world around him came to a halt.

Inside the box on a velvet cushion was a violin. It was white and a perfect replica of the one Souta had given him all those years ago. He took it in his hands as if it was calling to him, mesmerised. His eyes widened by the second as he looked at all the engravings and found a tiny etching that held his and Katsuki’s names along the side.

“Kacchan?” Izuku whispered in disbelief, taken aback. “Where did you get this from?”

“I got it specially made at that instrument shop in the city,” Katsuki said with a smile. “I wanted to give you this when it was only the two of us.”

Izuku turned the violin over in his hands. The surface shone enough that Izuku could see a faint reflection of his eyes. He blinked several times, trying to process what he was looking at. It was as if Katsuki had reached back in time and plucked it clean from the younger version of himself.

“Wow,” Izuku said in wonder. “You’re still finding ways to surprise me, even after all this time. Thank you, Kacchan. This is so thoughtful.”

“Don’t thank me yet,” Katsuki said smugly. “Lucky you, the surprise isn’t done yet.”

Izuku became even more perplexed as Katsuki lifted the velvet cushion in the box. Hiding underneath were two more concealed items. One was a folded sheet of parchment, and the other was a brand new vinyl with the name obscured. Katsuki turned to him with a nervous, loving smile as he handed Izuku the cream-colored paper.

Izuku unfolded it, and bars of music appeared before him.

The sheet music was handwritten in neat, meticulous ink. It was done in a way that only his detail-oriented husband could execute. And beneath the last measure, a tiny note in the corner read: For the one who taught me how to love, my darling.

Katsuki reached up and brushed a thumb beneath Izuku’s eye even before a tear could fall.

“I’ve been working on it since we first moved,” Katsuki explained. “I wrote it because I wanted to show how excited I am for all the years we have to come. And if you’re comfortable with it, I’d love for you to perform it for the next city symphony showcase.”

“I’d love that,” Izuku whispered as he stared at the notes on the page. “You’re too good to me, Kacchan. This is so beautiful.”

“You haven’t even heard it yet,” Katsuki reminded him. He took the record from its sleeve and walked up to the vinyl record player. “I had the city symphony record the other sections, minus the violin. So that way, you can play along any time you want.”

Izuku smiled and then laughed. “You thought of everything.”

“For you, of course I did,” Katsuki replied easily.

He brought the needle over the record and let the music flow. With a smile, he sat down next to Izuku on the bed.

“Go on. Play for me, darling.”

Izuku nodded and placed the sheets down between him and Katsuki. He lifted the violin, and the weight settled naturally against his shoulder. Izuku exhaled as if he’d just come home after a long journey.

And with a smile, he raised the bow and performed for his lover.

The first note fluttered into the air like a dove. Then another came. Then a long, sweeping phrase curled through the suite like a graceful ribbon of silver light. Izuku closed his eyes, allowing the melody to transport him. He felt Katsuki beside him, ushering him through a world that felt half memory and half a beautiful daydream.

All at once, the surrounding room transformed.

Izuku saw soft, romantic visions woven into each rising phrase. He saw himself and Katsuki as children racing through sunlit streets. He heard their giggles and felt the snowflakes against his cheeks. He saw them as teenagers, encircling one another with an intensity sharp enough to wound. Then he saw them as broken men learning gentleness again, reaching, faltering, and forgiving.

The music swelled.

And suddenly they were dancing.

They waltzed through all the hurt, the love, and the pain. Their feet twirled above the years, drifting as if the melody itself was taking them through time.

Together, he and Katsuki pirouetted through all the different versions of themselves alongside the musical notes. They laughed. They fought. They reconciled and moved together like two rivers constantly running beside each other for eternity, simply two souls in a seamless choreography of the heart.

Above the peak of the song, they balanced on the lines of life and fate, brushing past stardust along their way. Then, as the last notes lengthened, the two husbands rested together upon a cloud painted in the bright blue sky. Everything around them became weightless as they floated in each other's arms. Izuku leaned into Katsuki, and his heart synced to the last fading chords.

And when the final note fell, the vision felt like it was still around them. Izuku could have sworn he was in a cloud, laying right beside his husband. He glanced to his side, and his heart warmed.

Katsuki was admiring him like a poet who'd finally found the missing metaphor that made his poem whole.

"Perfect," Katsuki whispered. "You're still the best violinist I know."

Izuku smiled. "I think that was the most beautiful piece of music I've ever heard. You really have a way with music that's unmatched."

"Couldn't have done it without such a great muse."

Izuku lowered the violin. He placed it on his lap as he turned his body to the one he loved. He stared at the man before him: his fated husband, his best friend, and the one person who chased him through hell again and again and again to always find him.

"What's the title, Kacchan?"

Katsuki's fingertips brushed Izuku's cheek.

"Lovebirds in Repose."

Chapter End Notes

And that's a wrap!!

I genuinely can't believe it's over. As I'm posting this, I am ugly crying with tears streaming down my face. I'm not a person who usually cries either, so this is really tough for me. It's something about this fic that has been beating the shit out of my heart strings ever since chapter 48. It caught me super off guard and made me really reflect on why that is. And as I did, I realized the reason is because I am just so happy I got to experience writing this story with you all and I'm extremely sad the experience of live updating is at an end.

So, in a really cheesy ramble, I want say thank you to everyone for reading along and coming this far with me on this.
I had no intensions of this story getting this long (or even having any eyes on it because it was so messy and crazy). But I can not expression how truly touched, humbled, and grateful I am that I got to write this story with all of you.

Yes :) with you.

I know that is very cheesy to say, but it's true. Without the support of those who read while this was an ongoing process, I would have never completed a passion project this massive.
This fic has been with me through so many ups and downs in my life. From when I first started writing it after graduating my Masters in a global pandemic in 2020, to making my first big move out my parent's home. It's also been with me through some really hard times like deaths in the family, friendship break ups, and getting wrongfully fired (lol to the last one).

But more importantly, its been with me through the good times as well. While writing this I made new life long friends and landed my actual dream job after I got let go. This fic has been a staple in my life and heart.

But what I loved most this experience was the readers!

While writing this fic, I was reminded every step of the way that this is what I love most about fan fiction & fandom: the community it brings. Writing this story over the last five years with everyone reading along chapter by chapter really help me stay happy, sane, and creative.

I truly can't imagine having done it without you guys.

Commenters and silent readers alike, you all really are great. And this is why I love art so much, because of the connections it brings. Pieces of art like this have the ability to bring together people who might never cross paths and lets us bond over something we care about. I enjoyed writing every single last word of this fic and I equally enjoyed reading every comment, scream and even watching tiktoks about it (Yes, I see them! I don't have a fanfic tiktok account but my friends send them to me when they stumble upon them!)

I also made so so many great friends through this fic! Some of my closet friends I gained from writing this fic back in 2021, because they were reading along and had sent me really kind, heartfelt messages. On top of that, I was so lucky to get up every day genuinely excited to write and brainstorm for last five years! It's been such a lovely highlight of my life that had kept me grounded.

This is a bit of an emotional ramble, but I am just very emotional right now :') Its probably hitting hard because the anime ends tomorrow as well. I honestly had no plans for this story to end in sync with the anime, but it worked out that way and it seems like fate might've had a hand in that. What a weird way for life to come at ya lol But what I guess I'm trying to say is, thank you all ♥ From the bottom of my heart. I'm so glad you all enjoyed reading as much as I loved creating.

I do have plans on writing a bonus chapter that covers the events through Tomura's POV that I will add later! I had been writing his POV along side all the main events to make sure his motivation kept in sync with his actions. But For now I am going to take a relaxing break, reset, and re-read the whole story and comments with a smile.

I hope you all have have great rest of your day and happy upcoming new year :')
